which he had planted vpon a poynt of the lande from whence he beat easily that place, and besides that skowred the whole ryuer of Pavy with two gallies, which retyred immediatly, for that the Venetian fleete, who in the beginning could not enter Pavi, the mouthes of the riuer being garded by thordinance of the Duke, found entring now, being come vp by Adice against the streame, insomuch as the countrey of Ferrara suffred many domages by the presence of two fleetes of the Venetians. But those harmes ceassed forthwith together with the feares of the peoples, for that the Duke issuing out of Ferrara, set vpon that fleete whiche was entred by Primaro, and come vp to Adria, with two gallies, two foystes, and many small barkes: and hauing repulsed them with an easie fortune and no great hazarde, he came to the other, which being compounded but of foystes and other small vessels, was entred by Fornacei and come vp to Fulisella: and as they would haue entred within Adice by a ryuer neare it, they found impediment by the shalownes of the water: in so muche as standing open to perill without any apparance of succors, & being continually beaten with thartilleries of thenemie, they left their vessels abandoned, seking their safetie in those meanes which their present fortune prouided for them.

In these stirres of temporall armes, the spirituall thonderboltes began to make noyse on all partes: for the Pope ioyning authoritie to his furie, excommunicated Alfonso d'Este, and all suche as either were come or woulde come to his succors, but particularly Monsr Chaumont with all the principalls of the Frenche armie: And in Fraunce the assembly of prelates that had bene transported from Orleans to Tours, had consented (notwithstanding more not to oppose agaynst the will of their king assisting oftentimes their assembly, then of their proper will or iudgement) to many articles propounded agaynst the Pope, with this only modification, that before they went from his obedience, there should be Embassadors addressed to him, both to cõmunicate such articles as were agreed vpon by the clergie of Fraunce, and also to admonish him that hereafter he should obserue them, and in case of impugning or resisting he should be cited to the councell, wherin request solemne should be made to all Princes of Christendome to be concurrant in thaction. There was also agreed to leauie a great impost of money vpon the Churches of Fraunce. And a little after in an other session of the xxvij. of September, they published the councell to begin at Lyon in the beginning of Marche next: The same day the Bishop of Gurce entred into Tours, where he was receyued with so rare and incredible honor, that vppon thexcessiue pompes that were vsed to him, was sufficiently expressed with what long and great desire his comming had bene expected: besides, now began to be disclosed the diuision of the Cardinals agaynst the Pope, for that the Cardinals of S. Crosse and Cosenso, Spanish, & the Cardinals of Baieux & S. Malo, French, together with the Cardinal S. Seuerin, leauing the Pope going to Bolognia by the way of Romagnia, and visiting in his iourney the temple of our Lady of Loretta, very notable by many miracles, they tooke with his leaue their way through Tuskane: But beeing come to Florence, and obteining of the Florentins safeconduit, not for any time determined, but vntill they reuoked it, and fiftene dayes after the reuocation should be signified to them, they delayed with many excuses to passe further: Their long abyding gaue cause of suspicion to the Pope, who after many generall requests to haue them to go to Bolognia, wrote priuatly to the Cardinalles of S. Malo, Baieux, and S. Seuerin to come to the Court vpon payne of his indignation: and proceeding more gently with the Cardinalls Cosensa and S. Crosse, a Cardinall of marke both for his nobilitie, his knowledge, and his other merites, and also very notable for the greate and weightie embaſſages which he had managed for the ſea Apoſtolike, he delt with them by perſwaſions & inducements of friendſhip to returne to the court. But they not diſpoſed to obey him whom they did not loue, tooke the way to Millan by Lunigiana, after they had in vayne ſolicited the Florentins to giue not only to thē, but alſo to all the cardinals that would come thither, an aſſured ſafe conduit for a long time.

In this meane while Chaumont deuiſing to recouer Carpy, which had bene taken before by the ſouldiours of the Church, ſent thither Albert Pio & Monſr Paliſſo with foure hundred launces & foure thouſand footmen, Albert Pio going before with a trompet, & accompanied with a ſmall troupe of horſmen, the towne that loued well his name, hearing of his cōming began to tumult: for feare of which perill the eccleſiaſtikes lying there in garriſon to a number of xl. light horſmen, and fiue hundred footmen, forſooke their charge & tooke the way to Modona: But beeing purſued by the French which came ſoone after, they were broken & put to flight in the medow of Cuntille, which is almoſt in the halfe way betwene Carpy and Modena: The horſemen found ſafetie in the ſwiftnes of their horſes, but moſt part of their footmen fell into the laſt calamities of warre, which was ſlaughter and impriſonment. Chaumont eſteemed it the beſt policie, and to better purpoſe for the preſent warre, to ſet vpon the enemie afore the arriuall of the Spaniſhe launces, whom to aduaunce and haſten the more, the Pope had deliuered into the handes of Cardinall Regine the bull of inueſtiture: He iudged it alſo very conuenient to go to the charge afore the Venetian companies ioyned with them, who hauing rayſed certaine rampiers agaynſt thartilleries of Alfonſo, hoped ſpeedily to haue caſt downe their bridge. In this minde he drew neare to Modona, where after was ſpent a long time in skirmiſhing betweene both partes, the eccleſiaſtikes looking into their weaknes, would neuer iſſue out with all their forces, not ſeeking perill by ſeparation, where they were aſſured of ſafetie keeping together in one ſtrength. This hope being loſt, he determined to put in execution that whervnto many of his braueſt capteines, and namely the Bentiuoleis, dyd perſwade him with ſundrye offers: They aduiſed him not to conſume time vnprofitably about matters of ſo ſmall reſpect, that the difficulties were farre greater then the profites: but rayſing his minde equall to the offers of his fortune, that they wilde him to ſet vppon the body of the warre: and the principall head from whom proceeded ſo many perilles and troubles: They alleaged that he had nowe a good occaſion, for that within Bolognia were very fewe forrayne ſouldiours, and amongſt the people many mindes that fauoured the Bentiuoleis, the moſt part of the reſidue beeing inclined rather to exſpect thiſſue of things, then to take armes to ſowe the ſeedes of newe daungers, and reape the frute of newe hatreds and harmes: That if thattempte were not nowe giuen, the preſent occaſion paſſing, fortune woulde alſo vaniſhe and make vayne thexploite hereafter: for that comming the bandes of the Venetians and Spaniards that were exſpected, there was no hope to do that with an armie mighty, which now the occaſion and time made eaſie with far leſſe forces.

Chaumont beſiegeth the Pope vvithin Bolognia.

Thus the whole armie beeing aſſembled which the Bentiuoleis followed with certaine horſmen and a thouſand footmen of their owne paye, tooke the way betwene the mountaine and the high way, and aſſaulted Spilinberto, which is a borowe of the Counts Rangons, wherein was a garriſon of foure hundred footemen ſent thither by the Pope: They had no ſooner begon to batter it, then they had it by compoſition, the vallour of the ſouldiours doing nothing to helpe the weake ſituation and plot of the place: The next day Franke caſtell rendred vpon conditions more eaſie then honorable, ſauing that the fortune of the victors did ſomewhat defende their diſhonour:

nour: And from thence they marched and incamped at Cresplano a village tenne myles from Bolognia, with intention to presẽt them selues the day after affore the gates of the Citie, wherin, what by the comming of tharmie, and what by the reapport that the Bentiuoleis were in it, all things were full of confusion and tumult, and the Nobles no lesse then the Cõmons expressed an vniuersall disposition to change, the one parte fearing, and the other parte desyring the returne of the familie of Bentiuoley. But greater confusions and feares occupied the myndes of the Prelates and Courtiers, better acquaynted with the delightes of Rome, then accustomed to the daungers of warre: The Cardinalls full of tymerous passions ranne to the Pope, complayning that he had put him selfe, the sea Apostolike, and them in so great perill: their tymerous condition tooke away the reason that in cases of daunger is wont to rule wise men, and the same feare that moued their confusion, suppressed in them all respect and reuerence to the dignitie of the place and person, but pushed on with those passions whiche they were not hable to moderate, they besought him with great importunities, eyther to make some sufficient prouision for their defence (whiche in suche a shortnesse of tyme they helde impossible) or at least to seeke to appease and reassure thinges by composition vnder suche conditions as the necessitie of their estate required, wherevnto they supposed thenemie woulde incline: or at least that he woulde make his departure out of Bolognia together with them, and to consider that if his particuler daunger touched him not, of what importance it woulde be for the sea Apostolike and for all Christian religion, if there happned any inconuenience to his person. His deareſt fouourits and most acceptable ministers and seruantes did communicate in these complaintes, and hauing all one feare they followed all one sute, like men that neuer feling but securitie, had least rule ouer their passions when they sawe perill and danger at hande: But he onely, amidde so great a tumult & disorder of things, no lesse vncertayne of the fidelitie of the people, then yll contented with the slowe comming on of the Venetians, made obstinate resistance agaynst all these aduersities, neither amased with the perills that he sawe, nor once moued with the perplexities of his Cardinals, & ioyning to these afflictions the maladie that had muche weakned his body, they had all no habilitie to bende the greatnes of his minde. At the beginning he had caused to come thither M. Anth. Colonno with one part of the souldiours that were within Modona, and likewise had sent for Ierome d'Onato Embassador to the Venetians, to whom he complayned with bitter exclamations, that for the long delaying of the aydes which had bene so many times promised him, his person and his estate were in manyfest daunger, not onely with an ingratitude abhominable towardes him that had begonne the warre chiefly for their safetie, and who with his great expences and daungers hauing brought the whole empire and the french king to be his enemies, had bene the cause of the preseruation of their libertie till that daye, but also with an incredible indiscression for the regarde of themselues, seeing if he shoulde eyther be vanquished, or constrayned to yeelde to any composition, there coulde be no hope of their safetie, and lesse exspectation of good degree for their common weale: he lastly protested with wordes and action full of furie and resolution, that he would fall to agreement with the frenche if the next day past ouer and no succours of their people which lay at Stellata entred into Bolognia, hauing this difficultie to builde a bridge and to passe the ryuer vppon barkes and other vesselles: He assembled the gouernment and Colleages of Bolognia, with whome he occupied perswasions of great grauitie, that remembring the myseries of their tyrannie paste, and howe hurtfull and daungerous woulde be the returne of tyrantes after they were expulsed, they would lifte vp themselues to the defence of the iurisdiction of the Church, whiche they had founde so easie and tractable: And to induce them to a more readines, besides the fauors he had graunted them before, he gaue thē exemption of the moytie of al the impostes exacted vpō the vittels that entred into Bolognia for the vse of man, with promise to gratifie them hereafter in greater benefites: he caused to publishe these fauours by proclamation, the better to moue the people to take armes for the defence of the state ecclesiastick: But as his purpose was corrupt, so his labour was without frute, for that not one body stirred, not one hande was holden vp, nor any signe made in his fauor. These cold affections of the people considered, with other causes and showes, brought him at last to looke into the daunger wherin he stood, and pitying withal the importunities & plaints of so many peoples, ioyned to the perpetuall interceſſion and labor of thembassadors of Cæsar, the king Catholike, and the king of England set on by the Cardinalls, he consented to send to Monsr Chaumont, to suffer Iohn Fran. Piqua Count of Mirandola to go to him in safety in the Popes name: And not many houres after he dispatched to himone of his chāber, to require him to send to him Albert de Carpy, not knowing but that he was in the army. And in the action of these things, to thend that in al aduētures the most precious Reliques of the Pontificacie might be in safetie, he sent Laur. Pucci his Datario with the Regno (so they cal the principal Myter) wōderfully garnished with precious stones, to be kept in the famous Monastery of the Murato of Florence. Chaumont by cōsideration of the requests that were made to him, hoped that the Pope would incline to peace, which he did so much the more desire, by how much he knew it was agreable to thintention & minde of the king: and therfore, not to trouble such a disposition, the day following he retayned the armie in their lodgings, suffring notwithstanding the Bentiuoleis with many horsmen of their friends & followers, to run euen to the walls of Bolognia, hauing marching a good space after thē an hundred & fifty french launces: At whose cōming notwithstanding Hermes, one of the brothers both youngest & most resolute, presented himselfe on that side of the gate, yet there was no mutinie made within, the expectation of peace that was then in action preuayling more to contayne the people, then any affection or obedience they bare to the Pope. Chaumont gaue gracious audience to Fran. de Mirandola, and returned him the same day to Bolognia to signifie to the Pope the conditions wherein he was content to accorde: That the Pope should absolue Alfonso d'Este of all accursings and paynes, together with all those whosoeuer, which for any occasion were parties to the defending or offending of the state ecclesiasticke: that likewise he should acquite the Bentiuoleis of all paynes and censures, and make them repossessed of the goods which manifestly apperteined to them, referring to arbitration and iudgement suche as they were possessed of afore their exile: That it should be lawfull for them to dwell in what place they would, so farreforth as they came not neare to Bolognia by lxxx. myles: That touching the Venetians there should be nothing done contrarie to that whiche had bene agreed vppon in the confederation of Cambray: That betwene the Pope and Alfonso d'Este shoulde be a surceasing of armes at the least for six monethes, euery one reteining all that he possessed: in which respite of time their controuersies should be decided by iudges assigned by common accord, reseruing to Cæsar the order of the things of Modona, which Citie should be incontinent deposed into his hands: That Cotignole should be restored to the french king: That the Cardinall of Achx should be deliuered: That the Cardinalls that were absent sent should be pardoned: And that the collacion of benefices through all the dominions of the frenche kinge, should be dispoſed according to his nominacion: With this aunswer Mirandola returned to the Pope, not without hope that Monsr Chaumont would not continue so seuerly in all those condicions: The Pope, contrary to his custome heard the reapport with pacience, together with the peticions of the Cardinalls, who besought him with an incredible affection that he would haue regard to the estate of the tyme and their vniuersall calamities, not refusing the composicion that was offered, if he coulde obteine no better: They tolde him that he stoode in condicion to accept and not to exspect more then was offered, his owne fortune and the felicitie of his enemie striuing against him: But on the other part he complayned of the too bitter condicions that were offered, And mingling all his speeches with complaints against the Venetians, he consumed all that daye without expressing what was his resolucion, not shewing so much dout of the perill he was in, as hauing regard to the sorrowes of the Cardinalls and others that stoode before him: At the last he tooke hope for that Chappin Vitelly in the euening entred into Bolognia with six hundred light horsemen Venetians, And an esquadron of Turkes payed by them: he departed by night from Stellato, and comming vpon the spurre all the way, arriued at Bolognia in the euening being charged by the gouernor of Venice to omit no diligence to reskew the Popes daungers: The morning following Chaumont encamped with his whole armie at the bridge of Rene which is three myles from Bolognia, where the Secretories of th Embassadors of the king of Romains, the king of Aragon, and the kinge of England, went to him, and soone after th Embassadors themselues: who, together with Albert Pio which nowe was come from Carpy, returned many times that day betweene the Pope and Monsr Chaumont: But the dispoſicion of both the one and other party was greatly chaunged: for, Monsr Chaumont hauing now no hope, by thexperience of the day before, to be able to raise the people of Bolognia by meane of the Bentyuoleys, and beginning withall to fall into necessitie of vittells which would continually increase vpon him, had great distrust of the victorie: And the Pope taking courage by thaffection of the people discloſed in the fauour of the Church, reentred eftsoones into armes the same day: And because they looked for at Bolognia before night, two hundred other Venetian estradiots, 2. hundred light horsemen vnder Fabricio Colonno, and one parte of the spanish men at armes, he did not onely discerne that he was deliuered of daunger, but also returning to his accustomed glory, he threatned to assaile thennemies assoone as the Spanish bandes were come which were not nowe farre of: This confidence made him giue aunswer all that day, that he bare no inclinacion to peace, onles the french king would be bound to abandon wholly the defense and protection of Ferrara: The daye after were propowned new condicions, and during the negociacion, the Embassadors made many goings and returnings to Monsr Chaumont, but, such and so many were the difficulties that their labor remeined vaine: In so much as Chaumont distrusting to be able to profit much either by armes or by practising of peace, together that it was hard for him to remeine there both for the want of vittells, and distemperance of the tyme winter approching, he returned the same day to Frankcastell, and the day after to Rubiero, making shew that what he did was done at the requests of th Embassadors, both to giue time to the Pope to consider of the offers that had bene made, and leasure to him selfe to exspect the further will and direction of his kinge: At that time many accused the resolucion of Monsr Chaumont to be vndiscreete, and the execucion negligent: for that not hauing forces sufficient to take Bolognia (In his armie there were but three thowſand footemen) it was a councell ill debated to ſtirre and moue at the perſwacions of men baniſhed, whoſe hopes beinge meaſured more by deſire then with reaſons, become for the moſt parte fallible and vaine: At the leaſt if he deſired to embrace this enterpriſe, he ought firſt to haue reſtored and repayred the weaknes of his forces: But of the contrary they vrged, that he had abuſed & corrupted thopportunitie by his too much tarying, for that ſince the commoditie he had to depart from Peſquiero, he had vnprofitably loſt three or foure dayes, and in the meane while conſidering the weakenes of his armie he was in dout whether he ſhould aſſaye any thinge of him ſelfe or exſpect the bandes of the Duke of Ferrara and the Lorde Chaſtillion with the french launces: And be it that that might be defended, yet what excuſe can be made that Frankcaſtell being taken, he made not ſuddeine approches to the gates of Bolognia, and not to giue leaſure to a citie to take breath, wherein not one ſuccour was yet entred, the people hanging in ſuſpenſe, and as it hapneth in ſuddein thinges, all diſpoſed into feares and confuſion: A ſinguler meane (if there be any at all) to make him obteine either the victorie, or ſome honorable compoſicion: But perhaps the authoritie of ſuch as reprehend thinges that haue ill ſucceeded, would be leſſe, if at the ſame tyme might be knowne what would haue hapned if they had proceeded otherwayes.

After the retyring of Chaumont, the Pope bearing a minde inflamed againſt the french king, began to make his complaints to all Princes Chriſtian, that the french king, vſing vniuſtly and againſt truth the title and name of right Chriſtian, and deſpiſing the confederacion ſolemnly made at Cambray, and laſtly no leſſe moued with ambicion to vſurpe all Italy, then wickedly thirſting after the blood of the Popes of Rome, had ſent out his armie to beſeege him with all the Colleage of Cardinalls and the whole eſtate of Prelats within Bolognia: And in this diſpoſicion of minde, returning eſtſoones with a courage redoubled to the thoughtes and ſtudies of the warre, he refuſed to heare ſpeake th Embaſſadors, who, following the ſolicitacion begon by Chaumont, offered him the meanes of peace, if firſt Ferrara were not deliuered to him: yea, ſuch was the violence and furie of the ſpirit that gouerned him, that notwithſtanding by the trauells he had ſuffered in ſo great an accident both in body & mind, his maladie was made much worſe, yet he began to make new leauies of ſouldiours and to ſtirre vp the Venetians (who at laſt had caſt a bridge betweene Ficquerolo and Stellate) to ſend vnder the Marquis of Mantua, one part of their armie to Modena to ioyne with his, and with the other part to vexe and moleſt Ferrara, aſſuring them that " within few dayes he ſhould haue Reggia, Rubiere, and Ferrara: The ambicion of his " mind made him apt to hope for all thinges and to diſpaire in nothing, And what ſeemed vnpoſſible in reaſon, arte or pollicie, he made no dout to bringe to paſſe by the " benefit of his fortune, which he ſuppoſed was of power to remoue all the difficulties
" that could be obiected againſt him: The Venetian bandes deferred to paſſe the riuer for the perill they had ronne into, if the death of the Pope had hapned (as was douted:) But being in the ende compelled to yeelde to his wills, after they had left the other bandes vpon the ſhoare beyond Pavv, they ſent towards Modena fiue hundred men at armes, A thowſand ſix hundred light horſemen & fiue thowſand footemen, but not vnder the conduction of the Marquis of Mantua, who, ſtaying at Sermydy to leauye horſemen and footemen to thende to marche afterwards to tharmie (as he ſayd) notwithſtanding the Venetians were already entred into ſuſpicion of his longe abiding, went to S. Felix, A borow belonging to Modena: There he receiued aduertiſement that the frenche that were within Verona, were entred into the contrey of

Mantua

Mantua to pillage it, And therefore alleaging the neceſſity to go to defend his eſtate, he returned from thence to Mantua, hauing the Popes leaue, but not without great complaints of the Venetians: for that notwithſtanding his promiſſe to make preſent returne, being already entred into ſuſpicion of his faith, they beleeued (all Italy almoſt was partaking in that opinion) that Chaumont, to giue him an excuſe not to go to the armie, had ſuffered certeine french bandes to make incurſions vpon his contrey: This ſuſpicion was increaſed by a letter which he wrote from Mantua to the Pope, that he was not able to marche for a ſicknes that was newly befalne him, deſiring that his good will might be holden for recommended hauing his bodye ſubiected to his infirmitie: After the bandes of the Pope, the Venetians, and the ſpaniſh launces were reaſſembled and vnited into one armie about the confyns of Modena, if they had ioyned diligence to thopportunitie, and marched, it was thought that Chaumont had abandoned the citie of Reggio and reteyned the Citadell, hauing vpon his diſcamping from Bolognia diſmiſſed all his Italian footemen for auoyding of exſpences: But taking aduauntage of their ſlownes, and making their negligence a helpe to his fortune, he began of new to leauye bandes of footemen, determining onely to looke to the gard of Saſſuola, Rubiera, Reggio and Parma: But as the armie lay vpon the marches of Modena, without direction whether they ſhould paſſe further or turne againſt Ferrara, certeine trowpes of the Church which ronne vp towards Reggia being put to flight by the french, loſt an hundred horſes and Count de Mateligne taken priſoner: At which time the Duke of Ferrara, together with the Lorde of Chaſtyllion with the french bands, lay incamped vpon the riuer of Pavv betwene the hoſpitall and Bondin on the oppoſit to the Venetian regiments which were beyonde Pavv: whoſe nauy ſeeking to retyre for the ſharpnes of the ſeaſon and for the ill prouiſion that came from Venice, being charged by many barkes of Ferrara whoſe artilleries ſonke eight veſſels to the bottom, retyred with great paine by Nevvcaſtell vpon Pavv, into the ditch that falleth into Tanare and Adice and there is ſeperat: Immediatly after, the Pope gaue order that the armie (gouerned by Fabricio Colonno for that the Marquis of Mantua was not come) ſhould draw ſtreight to Ferrara, leauing the Duke of Vrbyn for the gard of Modena: And albeit moſt of the Capteines blamed this councel, being both preiudicial & daungerous, yet he eftſoones reaſſured them with a hope almoſt certeine that the people would draw into tumult, ſo violent was his deſire aboue all reaſon, aboue all councel, aboue all pollicie, and aboue all experience: But the mindes of men gouerned by deſire are full of variacions and ſubiect to mutabilitie and chaunge, for, the ſame day they departed, they were eftſoones returned by his commaundement, keeping from the knowledge of euery one thoccaſion that moued him ſo ſuddeinly to alter his determinacion: And leauing there his firſt deuiſes and plotts, the armie marched & incamped affore the towne of Saſſuola, whether Chaumont had ſent fiue hundred Gaſcons footemen: After they had battred it two dayes to the great pleaſure and contentment of the Pope, who hearde in the ſame chamber the noyſe of thartilleries that battred Saſſuola, wherin not many dayes before, he had heard to his great diſliking, the thundring of thennemies ſhot that were about Spilimberto, They gaue the aſſalt, which with ſmall a doe ſucceeded haply to them, for that the footemen that were within fell into diſorder: And after, the artillerie being immediatly preſented before the caſtell whether they were retyred, they yeelded almoſt without any compoſicion with the ſame infamie and infelicitie of Iohn Caſalo that was their Capteine, which he had felt & ſuffered at the ſame time that Duke Valentynois tooke the caſtell of Furly: he was a man of very lowe and baſe

place, but for that in the flower of his age he had bene conformable to Lodouvyk Sforce, he was now risen to some honorable degree, his fortune and not his vertues preferring him, and the fauor of others more then his proper merits making him able to the opinion & credit that he had: After the taking of Sassuola, the armie tooke also Formingo: And the Pope appoynting by his direction that they should goe and take Montechio which is a place of strength and importance standing betweene the high way and the Mounteine vpon the frontyers of Parma and Reggia, and part of the territory of Parma, notwithstanding it is holden by the Duke of Ferrara: Fabricio Colonno refused to execute the direction, alleaging that his king had forbidden him to moleste any thing that was vnder the iurisdiction of th Empire: Monsr Chaumont prouided not for these disorders, who hauing left within Reggia Monsr d'Aubigny with fiue hundred launces and two thowsand Gascons vnder Capteine Molard, was gon him selfe into Parma, the king hauing sent him word to absteine as much as he could from exspenses: for, the king perseuering in his deuise to temporise vntil the spring, made no purueyance for thaffayres on this side the Mountes: by meane whereof his reputacion declyned in Italy, and the courage of his enemies augmented more and more: And the Pope impatient that his armie aduaunced no more, not admitting any longer the excuses which his Capteines made vpon the season of the yeare with other difficulties, he assembled them al together at Bolognia and told them he would march to incampe affore Ferrara: A resolucion which was allowed onely by th Embassadors of Venice, either not to offende him in gainesaying his deuises, or that by that occasion their souldiours should returne more neare their frontyers: it was blamed of all the residue of Capteines and nations in the armie, but in vaine, for that he did not consult but commaund, his authoritie making him tractable to nothing that was not conformable to his liking and will: it was then determined that the armie should march to Ferrara, but with this conduction that to let the french for succoring it, they should attempt to take Mirandola if the difficulties were not greater then the aduenture: This citie together with the towne of Concorda, inherited by the sonnes of the Count Lod. Picqua, and by Fraunciſſe their mother & Tutor, was kept vnder the deuocion of the french king following the authority of Ioh. Ia. Triuulco naturall father to Fraunciſſ, by whose meane his Nephewes obteined thinuestiture of Cæsar: The Pope had receiued them long time before into his protection as appeared by writing: but now he excused him that by the condicions of the present times he was constrained so to deale, that those townes shoulde not be holden by persons suspected, offering, if they woulde willingly put them into his handes, to redeliuer them immediatly after the conquest of Ferrara: from that time it was douted (& the dout increased much more afterwards) that the Cardinall of Pauya who was already suspected to interteine secret intelligence with the french kinge, was artificially the Author of this councell: Wherein he ment by thenterprise of Mirandola, to hinder the beseeging of Ferrara, the which citie at that time was neither well fortefied, nor sufficiently manned: besides, the frenche men were made weary aswell in bodye as mind by their paynes and trauells passed, the Duke in great weakenes, and the kinge altered to make any more prouisions there.

Whilest the Pope with so great care and diligence managed thexpedicion of the warre, the french king who was more inclined to practises then to armes, recontinued with the Bishop of Gurce, the negociacion of things which had bene begon: And they carying in the beginning a shew of great facilitie, proceeded now with greater delayes, both for the slownes of the aunswers of Cæsar, and also for the dout that was

conceiued of the king of Aragon, Cæsar and the frenche kinge iudged it neceſſary to make him aſſerteyned of their intencion, aſwell in regard of the continuacion of the league of Cambray, as for thaction that was to be done with the Pope, if he ſtill perſeuered in the amitie of the Venetians, and reſted poſſeſſed of his auncient ambicion & couetouſnes to get immediatly to the Church the territories of Ferrara: The cauſe of this dout againſt the kinge of Ferrara was, that beſides his other actions, he had newly called home to the kingdom of Naples his regiments that were within Verona, expreſſing this cooller, that towards Ottranto the nauie of the Turke was diſcouered comming with a mind preiudiciall to him and his Realme: The king Catholike after certeine dayes aunſwered to the demaundes of Cæsar and the french king taking in the ſame tyme occaſion to purge him ſelfe of many thinges wherein Cæsar and the french king complained againſt him: That he had ſent the bande of three hundred launces to the Pope according to the obligacion of thinueſtiture, reſpecting onely the defenſe of the ſtate of the Church, and to recouer the thinges that were thauncient demaynes of the ſame: That he had called backe his men at armes from Verona, for that the tearme was expired for the which he had promiſed them to Cæsar, and yet he woulde not haue reuoked them had not the feare of the Turke bene greater then other occaſion: That at Bologna his Embaſſador interpoſed with others to worke the peace with Monſr Chaumont, not to giue time to the ſuccors of the Pope, but to quench and put out ſo great a fire in Chriſtendom, knowing withal that to interteine warre with the Church was grieuous to the kinge: That he continued ſtill in one ſetled purpoſe to accõpliſh all that had bene promiſed in the league of Cambray, and that he would doe more hereafter ayding Cæsar againſt the Venetians with fiue hundred launces and two thowſand footemen: That this was not his intencion to bind him ſelfe to new bands, nor to be reſtrained to new capitulacions: both for that he ſaw no vrgent occaſion, and alſo, deſiring to keepe him ſelfe free the better to make warre vpon the Infidels of Affrika, he would not increaſe the daungers and calamities of Chriſtendom, which had neede of tranquillitie and reſt: That he liked well of the councell and reformacion of the Church, if it were vniuerſal, & that times did not repugne againſt it, of which diſpoſicion he aſked no better a witnes then the french king in the ſpeeches they had together at Sauonna: but now the ſtate of tymes were much contrary, ſeeing that as peace and concord betwene Chriſtians were the foundacions of councells, and that there could be nothing agreed vpon to the vniuerſall benefit without the vnion and conſent of wills: ſo it could not but be vnworthy to begin the councell at ſuch a tyme and in ſuch ſort, that it might ſeeme to take beginning more by diſdaine & deſire of reuenge, then for the honor of God, or zeale to the eſtate of the Chriſtian common weale: he ſayde laſtly but a parte to th Embaſſadors of Cæsar, that it ſeemed ſomewhat intollerable that he ſhould ayde him to preſerue & keepe his townes, ſince he diſpoſed them afterwards to the french king for money, meaning expreſly Verona: Thus the intencion of the kinge Catholike being knowne by this aunſwer, the Biſhop of Gurce on the one part, in the name of Cæsar and the french king on the other part, in perſon, delayed no longer to make a newe confederacion, reſeruing place to the Pope to enter into it within two monethes next, and to the king Catholike and the king of Hungria, within foure: And for a neceſſary foundacion of the couenants that were made, the kinge bownde him ſelfe to pay to Cæsar an hundred thowſand duckats, part in hande, and the reſidue at tymes limited: Cæsar promiſed to paſſe into Italy in the ſpringe with three thowſand horſemen and ten thowſand footemen, againſt the Venetians: In which action the king was bownd to ſend him at his proper charges two hundred launces, and eyght thowſand footemen with ſufficient prouiſion of artilleries, And to rigge out by ſea, two light gallies,& foure baſtard gallies: That they ſhould obſerue the league made at Cambray,and in both their names require obſeruacion of the Pope and kinge Catholike: Whereunto if the Pope were heard to be induced for the regarde of Ferrara,that the king ſhould be bownd to hold him ſelfe contented with that that ſhould be reaſonable,But if the Pope would proue obſtinat & refuſe to conſent to their requeſt,that then they ſhould proſecute the councel, And for that cauſe Cæſar ſhould aſſemble the Prelats of Germany, as the french king had done the Clergy of Fraunce, to thende to proceede further as they ſhould after be aduiſed: Aſſoone as theſe capitulacions were publiſhed,the Biſhop of Gurce receiuing many honors & rich gratificacions of the king,returned to his Prince: And the kinge, with whome the fiue Cardinalls that were parties to the calling of a councell, had preſently contracted that neyther he without them,nor they without his conſent, ſhoulde capitulat any thing with the Pope,expreſſed with vehement demonſtracion in wordes, the forward deſire he had to diſcende into Italy in perſon,leading ſuch a power as ſhoulde be able for longe tyme afterwards to aſſure his affayres: And to thende that affore his marching they fell into no aduerſitie or declinacion, he ſent to Chaumont to miniſter ſpeedy ſuccours to the Duke of Ferrara,and at the ſame inſtant he added eight hundred launceknightes to the companie of two hundred launces which he had affore ſent to the Duke vnder the leading of the Lord of Chaſtillon.

On the other ſide the Popes armie,after they had made with great delayes,neceſſary prouiſions,and left Mar.Anth.Colonno for the gard of Modona with an hundred men at armes,foure hundred light horſemen and two thowſand fiue hundred footemen,went and incamped before Concorda,which they forced the ſame day thartillery was planted: And taking immediatly afterwards the caſtell by compoſicion,they approched neare to Mirandola: it drew now towards the ende of September,& happly the ſeaſon of that yeare was much more ſharpe then ordinarily it had wont to be: In which reſpects,and that the towne was ſtrong, & being alſo beleued that the french would not leaue a place ſo conuenient,the Capteines began to diſtruſt of the victorie, not hauing regard to the felicity of the Pope which made all things fal out well to him,but iudged according to experience and pollicie, which in matters of enterpriſe ought principally to guide men of warre: Neuertheles the Pope promiſing to him ſelfe ſo aſſuredly the victorie of the whole warre,that ſending Cardinall Sinagale a new Legat into tharmie,for the diſcord that was betwene the Duke of Vrbyn and the Cardinall of Pauya,he charged him in the preſence of many,that aboue all thinges when the armie ſhould enter into Ferrara they ſhould looke to the keeping of that citie: The fourth day after the armie approached neare Mirandola,the artillerie began to execute,notwithſtanding with no leſſe trauell then diſcommoditie,aſwel for regard of the preſent ſeaſon,as for want of vittels which came very ſparingly from Modona: The reaſon of this reſtraint of vittells grew by thimpediments that the frenche gaue,who hauing beſtowed fifty launces within Guaſtallo, as many within Corregia,and two hundred and fifty in Carpy,and hauing withall caſt downe al the bridges & occupied all the paſſages by the which reliefe might come from Mãtua,they kept the armie no leſſe diſtreſſed with want of foode,then the hardnes of the ſeaſon hindred their other actions:But as neceſſity is mighty to make men reſolute, ſo their extremitie ſtirred them vppe to a deuiſe that diminiſhed their ſkarceties,for that deliuering out a falſe brute that tharmie would come and aſſayle Carpy, ſuch as were within being fearefull for that they were not furnished with artillerie, did presently dislodge from thence, leauing the place abandoned, not by compulsion but by feare.

About the ende of this yeare there fell vpon the person of the Pope some imputacion and infamie as though it was conspired by his priuitie and consenting that by the meane of Cardinall de Medicis, there was practise with Marke Anth. Colonno and certeine younge gentlemen of Florence, to kill Pe. Soderin Gonfalonier, by whose working it was supposed that the Florentyns followed the french faction: This suspicion was aggrauated by this coniecture, that the Pope notwithstanding he labored by all his meanes and authoritie to winne that common weale, yet he was neuer able to bring that to passe by practise, by pollicie, nor by compulsion, which they refused for want of affection, opinion, and liking: Besides, a litle before at the french kings request, and to the Popes discontentment, they were broken of from the truce with the people of Syenna, although they had refused to moue armes vntill six monethes after: A thing which the king desired, to hold the people in feare: And lastly, they had sent to the king two hundred men at armes for the gard of the Duchy of Myllan, A matter demaunded by the king by vertue of their confederacion, not so much for thimportance and necessitie of such a succor, as for desire to make them enemies with the Pope: In this estate of affayres did ende the yeare a thowsand fiue hundred and ten.

But the beginning of the new yeare was made notable by a matter not exspected according to the time present, nor neuer read of in anye the actions or examples of ages past: The Pope was ielous that there was not vsed that diligence in the seruice of Mirandola that was eyther necessary to such an enterprise, or able to satisfie his desire, wherein taking occasion of their slowe proceedings, he interpreted to the ignorance and infidelitie of his Capteines, but chiefly to his Nephewe, that which reasonably proceeded of many difficulties: for these respects together with his ambicion which helde him altogether subiected, he determined to goe thether and aduaunce thinges by his presence, preferring thimportunitie and violence of his minde affore all other regardes: he considered not howe daungerous and vnworthye it was for the maiestie of suche a degree, that a Pope of Rome shoulde in person leade armies against townes of Christians, And much lesse was he carefull of the opinion and iudgement that the worlde woulde make of him, to giue an apparant cooller and almost a manifest iustificacion to those factions as were in practise, to call a councell and stirre vppe Princes agaynst him, making their suggestion that his gouernment was hurtfull to the Churche and his vices infamous and incorrigible: Suche speeches ranne thorow the Court: suche coniectures were made: some marueled at his furye: some blamed his intemperance: some feared the thinge they durst not vtter: And euery one comparing his actions with the importance of his place and calling, accused his indiscrecion, wherein the Venetian Embassadors were no lesse forward then the residue: The Cardinalls besought him with great instance, his fauorits made reasons to perswade, but durst not displease him, And his whole Court obiected against the vnworthines of the iorney, but his obstinat resolucion made vaine all their labours and deuises: his singuler passion was inuincible against all reason, in which disposicion he parted from Bologna the second of Ianuarie, accompanied with three Cardinalls, And being come to the campe, the necessitye of the place compelled him to be lodged in a litle contreye cottage subiect and open to the artilleries of thennemies, for that it was no further from the walls of Mirandola then a common crosbow will ſhoote at twiſe: There he diſpenſed with no trauell of his bodye nor forbare any care or ſtudie of minde, There he was no leſſe prodigall of his authoritie, then of his preſence, And riding continually thorow and about the campe, he had almoſt finiſhed the planting of thartillerie, whereof till that daye the leſſer parte coulde not be employed for thimpediments which the vnſeaſonable tyme and ſnowes gaue to all actions of warre: Beſides, the pyoners and laborers coulde not doe their office, who the more they were vrged and put forward, the more they ſhronke and gaue backe, the daunger of the ſhotte that came out of the towne being greater then their vertue: And for this reaſon being thought neceſſary to rayſe newe rampiers in the places where thartilleries were to be planted, and to refurniſh the campe with newe pyoners, the Pope, in that reſpit of tyme, withdrewe him ſelfe to Concorda, ſomewhat to eſchewe thincommodities of tharmie: At this place Chaumont addreſſed vnto him Albert Pio to make many offers and meanes of accord, which, (notwithſtanding the many labors and meetings of thone and other ſide) grewe to no reſolucion or effect, eyther for his accuſtomed hardnes and obſtinacie, or els for thinfidelitie of Albert, who was more and more ſuſpected not to negociat with that ſinceritie that apperteined: The Pope remeined not longe at Concorda, the ſame impatience and violence of minde cauſing him to returne, which firſt procured him to come to the campe: neither was his fury any thing abated by the hurtfull ſnowes that continually fell from heauen whileſt he was in the fielde, nor his rigor the more reſtrayned by the ſharpe cold, whoſe bitternes the ſouldiours could not endure but with great payne: he was lodged in a litle Church neare to his artilleries, but ſomwhat nearer the wals then was his former lodging: And being diſcontented with all thinges that either were already done, or ſtoode to be done, he complayned with bitter wordes againſt all his Capteines, except onely Mar. Anth. Colonno whom he had newly ſent for from Modona: he trauelled with great impacience about the armie, enforcing him to perſwade a diligence in the men in whoſe ſlownes he tooke griefe, he accompliſhed both in wordes and action the office of a Capteine, promiſing the ſoldiours for the reward of their vallours the ſpoyle of Mirandola, which he ſayd he would not take to compoſicion, but leaue it to their libertie to ranſecke or raunſom to their owne profit: In this action he forbare nothing which he thought might aduaunce his deſire, not ſparing to make that lawfull to the ſoldiours by his graunt & proper adminiſtracion, which of woulde haue bene: And yet, for the reſiſtance of many difficulties, they had but ſlowe proceeding both for the ſmall numbers of poyeners, and alſo for that the campe bare no great proporcion of artilleries, and withall the weetenes of the ſeaſon was an impediment to the powder to do his office: They that were within made a valiant defence, hauing for their gouernor Alexander Triuulce with foure hundred footemen forreyners: And they ſupported all daungers with ſo muche the more vallour and reſolucion, by howe much they had hope in the ſuccors promiſed by Monſr Chaumont, who, being commaunded from his kinge not to ſuffer the Pope to take that towne, had ſent for all the bandes of ſpaniſh footemen that were at Verona, and making continuall leauyes of men from all partes, wherein was concurrant with him the Duke of Ferrara, he promiſed to ſette vppon thennemies in their campe before the twenty daye of Ianuarie: But theſe difficulties made that promiſſe both harde and daungerous: the litle tyme he had to make ſo great prouiſions, the leaſure giuen to thennemies to fortifie their campe, the much a doe to conueye thartilleries, municions, and vittelles in a ſeaſon ſo hurtfull by wayes ſo troubleſome, and thorow ſo great ſnowes as had not bene ſeene of long tyme: laſtly, by him were augmented the difficulties, in whome was exſpectacion to diminiſh them by recompenſing the tyme loſte with a newe diligence: for, Chaumont vppon the ſuddeine made a poſting iorney to Myllan, promiſing that the cauſe of his going thether was to make prouiſion of money and other thinges neceſſary for the warre: but it was beleeued that ſome amorous paſſion towardes a Ladye of Myllan caryed him more then any other regarde: This haſtye iorney (notwithſtanding his returne was ſpeedye) abated greatly the courages of the ſoldiours, and no leſſe diminiſhed the hopes of ſuch as defended Mirandola: Amongeſt whome as their opinions were diuerſe touching the delayes he vſed, ſo ſome were bold to vſe this libertie of iudgement, that no leſſe did hurt the negligence of Chaumont then the hate he bare to Iohn Iacques Triuulce, In which regarde, inclining more to his propper paſſion, then to the profitte of his Kinge, they ſuppoſed it was not diſagreeable to him that the Nephewes of Triuulce ſhoulde be depriued of Mirandola.

And on the other ſide the Pope diſpenſed with nothing that might be made a furtherer of his victorie, wherein his furie was ſo much the more renewed, by how much the Canon from within the towne ſlew 2. of his men in his kechin: for which daunger forſaking that lodging, And eftſoones returning thether againe being caried with his intemperances, he was likewiſe conſtrayned by new perills to take the lodging of the Cardinal of Regina, againſt the which, they within the towne (happly ſuſpecting that he was there ariued) braked a great peece not without the daunger of his life: At the laſt, the defendants ſtanding deſperat to be ſuccored on all ſides, & ſeeing what great execucion thartillerie of thennemy had made, And fearing withal that by the harde froſen ditche being able to beare the ſoldiours, they ſhould not be able to reſiſt thaſſalt that was to be giuen within two dayes, ſent, the ſelfe ſame day that Chaumont had promiſed to ſuccor them, Embaſſadors to the Pope, to yeld them ſelues, their goods and liues ſaued: To whom albeit the Pope made aunſwere in the beginning that he woulde not be bownde to ſaue the life of the ſoldiours, yet in the ende he ſuffered him ſelfe to be wonne by the peticions of his Court, and accepted the towne vnder ſuch condicions as were offered, ſauing that Alexander Triuulce with certeine other Capteines of footemen, ſhoulde remeyne his priſoners, And the towne to pay a certeine rate of money, to redeeme the ſpoile which he had promiſed to the ſouldiours: And yet the ſouldiours ſeeming to vrge that as due which was promiſed, & which by their vallour they had wonne, the Pope had much to do to ſatisfie the ſouldiours & keepe the towne from ſacking: By thexãple of the towne, the caſtel alſo yeelded, with this permiſſion to ſuffer the Countiſſe to depart with all her goods, one fortune at one inſtant ſubiecting both the towne and the caſtel, as the glory of one man reuerſed with one kind of calamitie a whole eſtate & famulie of great antiquitie: The Pope reſtored Mirandola to Count Iohn Franciſquo & indued him with all the rights of the ſonnes of Count Lodovvyk, as gotten by him in iuſt warres: he receiued of him bond, and for performance the perſon of his ſonne, to pay within a certeine tyme for all defrayments, twenty thowſand duckats: And, not to loſe that by negligence which had bene wonne with ſo great payne and perill, but chiefly to keepe the frenche from reconquering it after the armie was retyred, he left within it a ſtrength of fiue hundred footemen Spanyards, and three hundred Italians: from Mirandola he went to Sermydy, A borow vpon the lymits of Mantua ſtanding neare the riuer of Pavv, And being by the victorie of Mirandola puffed vp into aſſured hopes to haue Ferrara, he gaue reſolute anſwere to Albert Pio, that he would heare no more of any offers or ſpeeches of peace, if, for the firſt condicion, he were not made poſſeſſed of Ferrara.

A new deliberacion of the french according to the kinges direction.

But thoſe thoughtes were chaunged by a newe deliberacion of the french: for, the king conſidering how much the loſſe of Mirandola had diminiſhed his reputacion, And now fully diſpayring that the mind of the Pope would be raunged to councells payſible, addreſſed preſent direction to Monſr Chaumont not onely to looke well to the defending of Ferrara, but alſo not to forbeare vppon conuenient occaſion, to offend the ſtate of the Church: According to which commiſſion, he made preſent leauies of men from all partes, and ſo really entred into thaction that the Pope by the councell of his Capteines, retyred to Bolognia, And abiding there but very few dayes, eyther for feare or to aduaunce (as he ſayd) more ſpeedely the battring of the baſtillion of Geniuola, againſt the which he determined to ſend certeine bandes of ſouldiours which he had in Romania, he came to Lugo and from thence laſtly to Rauenna, thinking perhaps that ſo ſmall an expedicion was not worthy his preſence: The Venetian armie, who, for the nearenes of thennemies, could not well be employed in the ſeege of Ferrara, were ſtayed at Bondyn, as the ſpaniſh and Eccleſiaſtikes remeyned diſtributed betweene Cento and Finalo: They, notwithſtanding the tearme of three monethes was paſte, ſurceaſſed at the requeſte of the Pope.

On the other ſide, Monſr Chaumont, hauing aſſembled his armie which was aboue his enemies in footemen, and farre abouethem as touching the vallour of the horſemen, but inferior in numbers & multitudes, tooke councel with his Capteines what were beſt to be done: The french Capteines perſwaded that the companies of the Duke of Ferrara being ioyned to the armye, it were beſt to marche directly to ſeeke thennemies, who notwithſtanding were lodged in places ſtronge and ſure, yet there was hope that with the vertue of armes and importunitie of thartilleries, they would be driuen to diſlodge and retyre: A matter that would not onely make Ferrara deliuered and acquited of daunger, but alſo in this expedicion would be wonne agayne the reputacion that had bene loſt till that day: They alleaged alſo for the ſame opinion, that the armye paſſing by the marches of Mantua, they ſhoulde take from the Marquis all thexcuſes and impediments for the which he profeſſed to be reteyned to take armes as Feodater of Cæſar, and ſouldiour to the king, And that it was a thing profitable for the ſewertie of Ferrara that he ſhould come in and declare: laſtly, that he being declared, thennemie would find many diſcommodities in this warre, both for reſtraint of vittels, and annoyances of bridges and paſſages of riuers which thereby ſhoulde be taken awaye from the Venetian armies, and alſo the Marquis ſhoulde reuoke immediatly the ſouldiours which he had in the campe of the Church: But Triuulco, being returned out of Fraunce about the ſame tyme that Mirandola was loſt, gaue councell to the contrary: he declared what daunger it were to goe ſeeke the ennemies and ſet vpon them in their campe, and how hurtfull it would be to be referred and gouerned by neceſſitie, to proceede day by day according to the proceeding and doings of thennemie: That it was farre more profitable and better aſſured, to turne tharmie to Modona or to Bolognia, for that, if thennemies remoued for feare to loſe thone of thoſe two townes, then were wonne the way that was ſought, to deliuer Ferrara from the warre: And if they did not ſtirre, there was yet this benefite in the councel, that the one or the other of thoſe two townes would be eaſily caried: In which caſe as a great neceſſitie would drawe them out to defend their owne, ſo in leauing their place of ſtrength, the armie ſhould be ſubiect to many occaſions to obteyne an honorable victorie: This was the perſwaſion of Tryuulco, and theſe were the reaſons he occupied, ſuch, as for their grauitie expreſſed his greate wiſedome, but for ſecrete enuie and partialitie, were neyther embraced nor followed: for, the other opinion was allowed, Chaumont and the other french Capteynes bearing an inclynacion to diminiſh his authoritie, Alfonſo d'Eſte being alſo concurrant for hope that thennemies woulde be conſtrayned to diſſolue or at leaſt retyre from his eſtate, which being ſo afflicted and conſumed, he ſayde was vnhable any longer to ſuſteyne ſo heauy burdens: he feared, that if the frenche men went away, thennemies woulde make entreye vppon Poliſena de Ferrara, A thinge which woulde ſo muche haue increaſed the calamities of that citie depriued of all hope and ſpirit, that there remeyned no more comfort nor remedie: So the Frenche armye marched by the way of Luſero and Gonſagno, to encampe at Raſſoula and at Moia where they remeyned three dayes for the yll weather that fell, reiecting the councell of ſuche as perſwaded to goe aſſayle Mirandola, both for thincommoditie to incampe in the fieldes, and alſo that at the Popes going awaye, the ſubburbes were burnt and all the houſes about: They ſuppoſed it in like ſorte neyther conuenient nor honorable to charge vppon Concorda fiue myles from them, holdinge it but loſt tyme to enterteyne action in a matter of ſo ſmall importance: The armye therefore came to Quiſtello, and makinge paſſage ouer the riuer of Secchia vppon a bridge of boates, they lodged the daye after at Rouera vppon the riuer of Pavv: The ſame being the cauſe that Andre Gritti, who, hauing affore recouered Poliſſena Rouigno, and left one parte of the Venetian ſouldiours at Montagnana vnder Barnardin Montono, to make reſiſtance agaynſt the garriſons that kept Verona, was withdrawne to Montagnana with three hundred men at armes, a thowſand light horſe men, and a thowſand footemen: Theſe were already drawne neare the riuer of Pavv to ioyne with the armie of the church, hauing affore ſacked the towne of Guaſtallo: from Rouero the french men went to Sermydy, and diſperſed them ſelues in good order in the villages thereabouts: from thence Monſr Chaumont accompanied with certeine Capteines (but not with Triuulco) went to the towne of Stellata, beeing there exſpected by Alfonſo d'Eſte, to take councell in what maner they were to proceede againſt their enemies, who were nowe lodged altogether at Finalo: it was there agreed that the bandes of Alfonſo ſhould be ioyned with the frenche armie about Bondyn, and ſo to march altogether and encampe in certeine villages three miles from Finalo, to proceede afterwards according to the nature of places, and occasions offered by the enemies: But as Chaumont was returned to Sermyde, it was tolde him how hard it was to goe to that place both for thimpediment of waters whereof the contrey was full about Finalo, and also that by necessitie, he was to take the high way along the risings of the canall which thennemie had cut of in many places and bestowed gard to hinder passage, A matter also which seemed so much the more hard and troublesom, by how much the yll weather and season was ioyned to the other impediments: The consideracion of these perils bringing Chaumont into no small dout, Alfonso that had about him certeine discouerers and men knowing the contrey, and by them well informed of the situacion and disposicion of places, labored to perswade the contrary, assuring him that with the force of artillerie, suche as manned the passages that were cutte of, woulde be compelled to leaue them abandoned, by which meane it would be very easie to cast bridges for passage in any place where it should be necessary: These reasons being brought by Chaumont into councell and debated, the opinion of Alfonso was approued, to whome Triuulce was rather not contrarye, then consenting, his silence leauing to the company a more occasion of murmure, then if he had directly impugned the deuise: for, what with the greatnes of the difficulties, which still augmented, and authority of that Capteine carying long experience, and had alwayes reproued that expedicion, it was thought that the harmes and inconueniences hapning, the kinge woulde laye them vpon the Authors of that opinion: In which respect Monsr Chaumont, assembling an other daye the councell for the same matter, desired Triuulce, that not with silence as he did before, but frankely and simply as apperteyned to him, he woulde expresse his opinion, which he deliuered in this sort hauing no lesse regarde to the grauetie and importance of such a councell, then to the greate desire and exspectation of thassistantes so well disposed to heare him.

I vsed silence yesterdaye, not bearing a minde preiudiciall to the present busines, and much lesse to arrogate to my selfe any singularitie of councell, And yet if my " opinion had founde imitacion in the beginning, we had not nowe stande possessed
" with dowtes, nor this gallant army had spent so many dayes in vaine, which might
" haue bene employed with more profit: And I could yet continue in silence, if, sup" pressing all other respectes, I were not spurred on with thimportance of the matter, " being now vpon tearmes to set vpon one incerteine cast of a dye, both this florishing
" army, the state of Ferrara, and the Duchie of Myllan, matters too great to be put all
" to aduenture without reteyning some parte from chaunce and fortune: Besides, one " reason that moues me to speake, is an opinion I haue that Monsr Chaumont desireth
" that I may be he that in this action shall giue the first councell: A matter which as " he beginneth now to find good by reason, so it is no new thing to me, for that here" tofore I haue proued by experience that my councels haue bene lesse reiected when
" was question to retract any thinge not sufficiently deliberated, then when the first
" deliberacions were debated: And as true councel consistes not onely in telling what " must be done, but also what will be the ende and succesſe of things, so, for my part, I " make bold thus farre to enable my selfe that the man of obseruacion by the experi" ences he hath made, giues often times better councel then the man of learning by al
" the rules he hath read: we debate to go seeke the enemy to fight with him, & I haue
" alwaies seene great capteines hold this as a firme principle, not to attẽpt the fortune " of a battel, onles there be offer of special aduauntage, or cõpulsion by great necessity:

the lawes and rules of warre giue it to thenemies that be thinuadors, and haue taken the fielde to conquer Ferrara, to seeke to assayle and charge vs: But to vs to whome it is sufficient to defende our selues, it can not but be impertinent to obtrude into thaction, contrarie to all directions and disciplines of warre. Suche as resist iniuries and fight for their owne safeties, are of more merite and valour, then they that enter into armes to oppresse others: But let vs examine the aduantages & necessities that may draw vs: I am of opinion which hope is confirmed by euident reason, that there is no possibilitie to execute the deuise of the duke of Ferrara, but to our great harmes and disaduauntage: since we can not go to their campe, but by a hill side, a straite and narrowe way, where all our forces can not be employed, and yet they with small numbers may make resistance, hauing thoportunitie of the place fauorable to their vertues: We must marche by the rising of the hill one horse after another, neither haue we any other way to drawe our artilleries, our baggage, our carts, and bridges, but by the straite of the hill: And who doubteth that in a way so narrow and comberous, euery artillerie, euery carte, or euery wheele that shall breake, will not stay a whole armie for an howre at the least, by which impedimentes euery contrarie accident may easily put vs into disorder. Thenemies are lodged in couert, prouided of vittels and forrages: and we must encampe all bare and naked, not carrying with vs that should serue for our necessarie noriture, but muste exspect the things to come after, which in reason ought to go with vs. It belongeth not to vs to be credulous in brutes, and muche lesse to be carried with the reapportes and opinions of the countreymen that knowe the countrey, since warres are managed with the weapons of souldiours, and with the counsels of capteins: they are determined by the execution of the sworde, and not by suche plottes as are presented in paper by people ignorant in warre, bearing no other knowledge then according to thinstruction of their rude nature. To attempt newe enterprises whereof the victorie is lesse certayne then the perill, is contrarie to the grauitie and reputation of a leader: and in actions of warre, those enterprises are put to aduenture, that are done by will and not by reason. For my part I neither suppose our enemies to weake, nor their campe in suche disorder: and much lesse that in their encamping they haue bene so negligent to take thoportunitie of the waters and other situations, that it can be in our power to assayle them, though our fortune bring vs in safetie to the place where we seeme so desirous to expresse our valours. Many difficulties may compell vs to make our aboade there two or three dayes, yea the snowes and raynes ioyned to the crabbednes of the season may suffice to deteine vs: howe shall we then do for vittels and forrages? what shall we be hable to do in the warre, wanting the things that should giue vs strength and sustenance? In warre no lesse needefull is foode and forrage, then the weapon to strike: And be it we should haue them in our power to assayle them, what is he that can promise any suretie of the victorie, which seldome foloweth the multitude of the souldiours that fight, but hath regard to the innocencie of the cause that is followed? What is he that considereth not how daungerous it is to go seeke thenemie in a strong campe, and to be driuen at one time to fighte agaynst them, and agaynst thincommodities of the situation of the place? If wee compell them not to abandon their campe, we can not but be enforced to retyre: A matter of very harde action in a countrey so wholly agaynst vs, and where euery little disfauour will turne to our great disaduauntage. I see no necessitie to put the kings whole estate in a danger so present, since (as I take it) we are entred into armes for no other occasion then to succour the citie of Ferrara, which if we do eftsoones

" refurniſhe with newe garriſons, we may holde our ſelues in ſuretie, though we " ſhoulde diſſolue our whole armie: And be it that that Citie is ſo much conſumed,
" that it is impoſſible that in ſhort time it will not fall of it ſelfe, thenemies remayning
" at the backe of it, yet we haue meane to diuert them, which in warre is a moſt migh-
" tie remedie, and with the which we may enforce them to drawe backe from Ferrara
" without putting one horſe in daunger. I haue alwayes perſwaded, and ſtande ſtyll
" firme in this counſell, that we turne eyther to Modona or to Bolognia, taking the high " way, and leauing Ferrara well furniſhed onely for thoſe fewe dayes it ſhall be neceſ" ſarie. This is no fleeing from the enemie, and yet in warre it is no ſhame to flee,
" when the fleeing profiteth in giuing place to the aduerſarie. I holde it beſt accor" ding to the time, that we goe to Modona, whither alſo we are called by the Cardi-
" nall of Eſte, A perſonage of name and merite not vnknowen, and by whom we are
" aſſured of intelligences hable to put it into our handes: and conquering a place of " that importance, there reſteth no other ſafetie to thenemies, then to retyre towards " Bolognia, like as alſo if our fortune make vs fayle of our exſpectation of Modona, yet
" the feare that thenemies will haue aſwell of it as of theſtate of Bolognia, will dryue
" them to abandon: A thing which no doubt they had done many dayes ſince, if this
" counſell had bene executed from the beginning.

Now did the whole aſſiſtance, by the reaſons of this graue Capteine, diſcerne the difficulties that were preſent, which he had founde and ſeene when they were farre of: In which regarde his opinion was allowed of euery one. And Chaumont leauing to the Duke of Ferrara for his better ſuretie, a greater ſtrength of men, he drewe towardes Carpy by the ſame way, hauing not yet obteined that the Marquis of Mantua ſhould come in, which was one of the principalleſt reaſons that had bene alleaged by thoſe that gaue counſell agaynſt thoppinion of Triuulco: for the Marquis deſiring to ſtande indifferent, and as a perſon newter during the troubles, when the time drewe on wherein he had giuen hope to declare himſelfe, he ſolicited with many excuſes to be yet deferred for certeine dayes, debating with the Pope the daunger of the Frenche armie that threatned him, and beſeeching Monſr Chaumont not to take from him the hope he had that the Pope would reſtore to him his ſonne within a very ſhort time. But the deuiſe to take Modona tooke no good ſucceſſe, the ſuttle and ſecret counſells of the king of Aragon, giuing greater impedimentes, then the armies of the Pope.

Cæſar ſhewed him ſelfe yll contented that the Pope vſurped Modona, a citie eſtemed in all times of the iuriſdiction of the empire, and holden by long continuance by the familie of Eſte with priuiledges and inueſtitures from themperours: And albeit he had made requeſt with many complaints to haue it deliuered to him, yet the Pope, nouriſhing an other opinion touching the rightes of that citie, had alwayes refuſed it, but principally ſo long as he hoped to be hable to take Ferrara. But aſſone as the French armies began to diſcouer more manyfeſtly in fauour of them of Eſte: and that he had no habilitie to defend Modona without making great expences and defraymentes: he began to taſte the counſell of the king of Aragon, who encouraged him to redeliuer it, both to auoyde ſo many preſent troubles, and to appeaſe the minde of Cæſar, and alſo by that action to kindle ſome alteration betwene him and the French king: he induced him beſides with this comfort, that if he deſyred to haue it agayne in an other time more conuenient, it would be a matter of no great difficultie, contenting Cæſar with a reaſonable ſumme of money. This debating was prolonged for many dayes, for that, according to the diuerſitie of hopes, the deliberation of the Pope chaunged: onely they ſtucke alwayes vpon this one difficultie, that Cæſar refuſed to receiue it, vnleſſe in the inſtrument of aſſignation it were clearely expreſſed, that that Citie apperteined to thempire: A matter wherevnto albeit the Pope would not conſent at the firſt, yet ſeing after the taking of Mirandola that Monſr Chaumont was the ſtrongeſt in the fielde, and that the wonted expences and difficulties for the defence of Modona returned vpon him agayne, he left the diſputation of words, & conſented to haue it ſet downe in writing, that Modona ſhould be reſtored to Cæſar of whoſe iuriſdiction it was. And as Vitfruch thembaſſadour of Cæſar reſident with the Pope, had receiued the poſſeſſion of it, and that he might remayne there in ſuretie by the authoritie of Cæſar, he diſmiſſed Mark. Anth. Colonno with the other bands with whom he had kept it afore in the name of the Church, aduertiſing Monſr Chaumont that Modona was no more the Popes, but was iuſtly reuerted to the iuriſdiction of Cæſar: This was not beleeued of Chaumont, who ſtill continued to worke the Cardinal of Eſte to put in execution the conſpiracie and intelligence whiche he interteyned with that Citie: In ſo muche that according to direction, the Frenche bandes which Chaumont had left in garriſon within Rubiero, were made out one night, but notwithſtanding they marched with as litle brute as they coulde within a myle of Modona, they returned the ſame night to Rubiero, either for that the order of their faction within was not correſpondent, or els the Frenchmen had preuented their time and were come to ſoone: Neuertheleſſe they gaue no place to this yll ſucceſſe, but made an other ſally out of Rubiero to come to Modona, falling notwithſtanding into the ſame impedimentes they did before, aggrauated nowe by the deapth and rage of the waters to paſſe the ryuer of Sekchie whiche runneth before Rubiero. At laſte Vitfruch became ſuſpicious, and committing to impriſonment certayne of the Citie, vpon whom he impoſed an intelligence with the cardinall of Eſte, he obteined of the Pope that Marke Anth. Colouno ſhould eftſones returne thither with the garriſon that was there before: A matter whiche had not ſtayed Monſr Chaumont (beeing nowe come to Carpy) to marche and encampe before it, if the qualitie and ſeaſon of the time had not taken from him the drawing of his artillerie along the way betwene Ruolo and Carpy, A way not more then ten miles from thence, but euen the worſt of all the ways in Lombardie, notwithſtanding their ouerflowing with waters and mariſhe natures: Beſides all this, Chaumont was euery day more and more aduertiſed, that Modona was redeliuered to Cæſar ſimply and abſolutely, which made him make this couenant with Vitfruch, not to offende Modona nor his territories, receiuing reciprocally his promiſe, that in the actions betwene the Pope and his king, he ſhould not fauour the one nor the other partie. But ſuche is the deſtinie and ende of all fleſhe, that all men borne in humaine nature, muſte in their time appoynted reſigne to the earth the life they had of the earth: it happned not many dayes after that Chaumont fell into a greeuous maladie, and beeing carried to Correge, ended his life within fiftene dayes, expreſſing deuoutly ſomewhat affore his death, how greatly he was repented and remorſed of the vexations he had done to the Church, and beſought the Pope by a publike inſtrument to giue him pardon and abſolution, which being graunted whileſt he yet lyued, coulde not come to his knowledge by reaſon of the ſodennes of his death: He was a Captayne that in his life bare great authoritie in Italie, both by the ſingular credite of the Cardinall Amboyſe, and alſo for that he managed almoſt abſolutely the Duchie of Millan and all the armies of the king: But touching his habilitie or vallour, it was farre inferiour to ſo great a burden, the greatnes of his place carrying him into ſuche ſingularitie of minde and weening, that not knowing of him ſelfe the arte and order of warre, he would not giue fayth to ſuche as were hable to inſtruct him: by whiche it happned that after the death of his vncle, his inſufficiencie beeing no more ſupported by countenance and fauour, he fell in his latter dayes almoſte into the diſdayne of the ſouldiours, notwithſtanding he ſuffred in them wonderfull inſolencies and licencious behauiours to ſtoppe them from yll reapporting him to the king: In ſo muche as Triuulce, a captayne trayned in auncient diſcipline, woulde oftentimes proteſt by othe, that he would neuer go more into the Frenche armies, vnleſſe the king marched in perſon, or at leaſt him ſelfe commaunded as cheefe: Neuertheleſſe the king was determined affore to ſende for his ſucceſſor, Monſr Longeuille, diſcended of the bloud royall, but a baſtarde borne, and not ſo muche eſteemed for his vertue, as for his diſcending and ryches. By the death of Chaumont, Iohn Ia. Triuulce remayned gouernour of tharmie by the prerogatiue that he was one of the foure Mareshalls of Fraunce, to whom, the generall beeing dead, the rule of tharmie apperteineth by the ſtatutes of Fraunce vntill the king do otherwiſe diſpoſe of it: And albeit, not knowing how long he ſhoulde be continued in that gouernment, he durſte not attempt any matter of conſequence: yet he returned with tharmie to Sermidi to go to the ſuccors of Geniuola, afore the which the Pope had not onely ſent his bands that were in Romagnia, but alſo had procured the Venetian fleete to approche at the ſame inſtant, which came thither with thirtene light gallies, and many other veſſelles of meaner burden: But he had no neceſſitie to paſſe further, for whileſt the landemen incamped about it with very litle obedience and order, there was diſcouered vpon a ſudden the Duke of Ferrara and the Lorde of Chaſtillon with the Frenche ſouldiours that were ledde out of Ferrara in greater numbers then were thenemies: and marching along the brinke of the ryuer of Pavv, and beeing come vp as farre as the ryuer of Santerno, they caſt the bridge which they had brought with them, and in one moment charged and confuſed thenemies, who, by reaſon of their diſorder beeing not hable to make reſiſtance, fell into one generall and voluntarie fleeing, ſauing three hundred Spaniſhe footemen whiche garded thartillerie: In which confuſion they loſte their enſignes and artilleries, many chieftaynes of the horſemen finding more ſafetie in the fortune and ſwiftnes of their horſes, then in their proper valours: By reaſon of this aduerſitie the Venetian fleete, to auoide the daunger that threatned, hoyſed ſayle into the winde, and ſo retyred into the ryuer of Pavv.

The affayres of the warres had theſe diuers proceedings, not expreſſing any aſſured token to iudge what would be the iſſue of it: The thoughts alſo of Princes were no leſſe diuerſe, and no leſſe incertayne, ſpecially the cogitations of Cæſar, who contrarie to all exſpectation, determined to ſende the Biſhop of Gurce to Mantua to negociate a peace.

It is ſet downe before that by the working of the Biſhop of Gurce, it was reſolued betwene Cæſar and the French king, to make ſtrong warre vppon the Venetians in the ſpring time, and withall, to call a councell, if the Pope conſented not to the obſeruation of the league of Cambray. To this Cæſar bearing a very vehement inclination, had ſince the returning of the Biſhop of Gurce, ſent to all his prelates of his eſtats patrimonial, to debate in what maner & in what place the coũcel ſhould be celebrated. But as he was of natural cõdition variable & inconſtant, & an enuior of the greatnes & name of the French, ſo making no leſſe vayne his proper promiſes then thexſpectation that others had of him, he declined afterwardes to inconſtancie, and liſtned to the perſwaſions of the king of Aragon, who conſidering that what by the

vnitie of Cæsar with the French king, and the embasing of the Venetians by their common armies, and withall the ruine of the Pope by meane of the Councell, the French might rise into a greatnes too ielouse and suspected, laboured to perswade him that an vniuersall peace woulde fall out better for his purposes, so farreforth as by it he obteined eyther the whole or the greatest part of those peeces whiche the Venetians vsurped vpon him: he aduised him to sende to this effect, some notable personage to Mantua with full power, and labouring to induce the Frenche king to do the like, he promised that he would also sende thither, by which examples he alleaged that the Pope could not refuse to ioyne in the action, & lastly that he would not go agaynst the will of so many great Princes: he tolde him that vpon the resolution of the Pope, depended all the deliberations of the Venetians, in whom was a necessitie to followe his authoritie, as not beeing hable to stande alone: for which reasons it was to be hoped, that Cæsar without difficultie, without armes, and without increasing the reputation and might of the Frenche king, should to his perpetuall prayse, reobtayne his estate together with an vniuersall peace. And be it that it brought not foorth that succesſe which reasonably may be expected, yet he should not be depriued of meanes to moue the warre at the time appoynted, and with the same commodities and hopes: But beeing cheefe of all Christian princes, and protector of the church, his iustifications would be the more augmented, as also by suche a Councell would come the exaltation of his glorie, for that it woulde appeare to euery one, that as he principally had sought and desyred the peace and vnitie of Christians, so by the obstinacie and wicked counsels of others he was constrayned to make warre. These reasons no lesse by the grauitie of matter they expressed, then by thauthoritie of the personage from whom they came, were right acceptable to Cæsar, who at the same instant addressed letters to the Pope and to the French king: To the Pope, that he had determined to sende the Bishop of Gurce into Italie, for that (as apperteined to a Prince religious, being protector of the church and chiefe aboue Princes Christian) he was resolued in all that he might, to procure the tranquillitie of the sea Apostolike, and the vniuersall peace of Christendome: sommoning him, bearing thoffice of the high vicare of Christ, to ioyne and procede with him in the same intention, and to do that which belonged to the place & name of Pope, to thende he were not constrayned to haue recourse to other remedies, to establishe the peace of Christendome: That he did not allowe the practise that was made to depriue the Cardinalls that were absent, of their holy dignitie, for that being absent not to any euill ende, nor for hatred they bare to him, neither could they deserue so great a payne, neither was the authoritie of the Pope onely hable to impose it vpon them: He tolde him besides, that it was a matter very vnworthy and vnprofitable, in so great troubles to make creation of newe Cardinalls, since he was specially forbidden by the capitulations which the Cardinalls made with him when he was elected Pope: He desired him to reserue that office tyll times of better tranquillitie, when he should either haue no necessitie or no cause, to preferre to so great dignities none but persons well allowed of for their discression, their doctrine, and good life. To the French king he wrote, that according to his vertuous disposition alwayes inclined to embrace a good and assured peace, he was resolued to sende to Mantua the Bishop of Gurce to solicite a peace vniuersall, wherevnto he beleeued (with reasons and fundations not light nor vayne) that the Pope (whose authoritie the Venetians were constrayned to followe) would readily incline, the Embassadors of the king of Aragon concurring in thaction, and promising the like on the behalfe of their king: Therfore he desired him to send thither likewise his Embassadors with full power, and in the generall assembly, the Bishop of Gurce should beseech the Pope to do the like, wherevnto if he made refusall, the Bishop should denounce the councell in the names of them all, hauing also giuen order that to make their procedings more iustifiable, and to put ende to all controuersies, the Bishop of Gurce shoulde indifferently vnderstande the reasons of euery one: onely in all accidentes that he should holde this for certayne, neuer to make any agreement with the Venetians, if at the same time were not resolued the controuersies which he had with the Pope. This solicitation pleased well the Pope, not for any desire he had to peace and concorde, but for that he perswaded him selfe to be hable to dispose the Senate of Venice to compounde with Cæsar, and so deliuering him from necessitie to remayne vnited with the French king: he supposed to seperate him from him, and the same easily to be made a cause of confederation of many Princes agaynst him. But the Frenche king stoode not a little discontented with these resolutions bothe newe and vnexspected, for that nothing hoping that an vniuersall peace would proceede of them, he iudged that the least euill that might happen, would be a protracting and delaying of thexecution of those things which he had agreed with Cæsar, he feared also that the Pope, promising to helpe Cæsar to reconquer the Duchie of Millan, and to indue the Bishop of Gurce with the dignitie of Cardinall and other graces ecclesiastike, would separate him from him: or at least, beeing the worker of the composition with the Venetians to the aduauntage of Cæsar, he might be put into necessitie to accept the peace with conditions dishoneſt: wherein one thing also that encreased his suspicion was, that Cæsar was newely confedered with the Svvizzers, notwithstanding for defence only: Besides, he occupied in himselfe this perswasion, that the king Catholike had bene the author of this newe counsell, of whose intention he doubted muche for many reasons: for he was not ignorant that his Embassador resident with Cæsar, made open trauell and solicitation to establish an accorde betwene Cæsar and the Venetians: he beleeued that he gaue secrete encouragement to the Pope, in whose armie his companies and bandes of souldiours had remayned a longer time then he was bound vnto by the capitulations made touching thinuestiture of the kingdome of Naples: he was not ignorant that to giue impediment to his actions, he obiected him selfe manifestly agaynst the conuocation of the councell, and vnder cooller of modestie he blamed apparantly that with armed hand and in a time when Italie burned with an vniuersal fire of warre, there should be such negociation of a matter which without the concorde and consent of all Princes, could not bring forth but fruites full of venim and infection: lastly, he was well aduertised that he prepared a strong army by sea, with the which, albeit he published a brute, that he would passe in person into Affrika, yet it could not be decided whether he leauied that force for other endes: Wherein he was so muche the more suspicious, by howmuch his words were alwayes full of sweetnes and affabilitie: for he alwayes besought the king (as it were with a brotherly affection to make peace with the Pope, forsaking (if otherwise it coulde not be wrought) some peece of his owne rightes, both not to shewe himselfe a persecuter of the Churche contrarie to the auncient pietie and deuotion of the house of Fraunce: and also not to turne him from the warre which he had determined to make vpon the Mores in Affrika for thexaltation of the name of Christ: he added lastely, that albeit it had beene a perpetuall custome amongest Christian Princes, when they prepared armies agaynst infidells to demaunde succors of others in a cause so holy and honorable, yet for his part it suffised fised him not to be hindred, and was content to require no other ayde but that Italie might remayne in peace: Whiche wordes notwithstanding they were caried to the Frenche king by his Embassadour, and pronounced by his owne mouth to the Frenche Embassadour resident with him, and that with great demonstration of amitie: yet it seemed that they conteined a secret protestation to take armes in fauor of the Pope: A matter which seemed not likely to the king that he durste do without hope to be hable to induce Cæsar to the same. These things troubled muche the kings mind, & filled him ful of many suspiciõs, fearing that to work the peace by the meane of the Bishop of Gurce, would be a thing no lesse vayne then preiudiciall vnto him: And yet, not to stirre vp Cæsar, he determined to sende to Mantua the Bishop of Paris, a Prelate of great authoritie and deepe knowledge in the science of the Lawes. These were the doubtes of the one king and the deceites of the other, the one full of deuises and the other not voyde of distruste: they both open in words, and yet kept both their intentions dissembled: A matter of familiar custome with Princes to interteine one an other with vayne hopes and artificiall feares.

All this whyle Iohn Iacques Triuulce remayned with tharmie at Sermidi dispersed into many places thereaboutes for the better commoditie of lodging and vittelles: And in this time he receyued signification from the king, that it was his will that the warre should be administred by him, with this limitation, that expecting the comming of the Bishop of Gurce, he shoulde abstayne from all violent action vpon the state ecclesiastike, the hardnes of the season beeing also agaynst it, by reason wherof it was impossible to incampe in the fielde notwithstanding Marche was nowe begonne: Therefore Triuulce, both for that he had no occasion to attempt any other enterprise, and for that he was in places so very neare, determined to deuise howe he might offende tharmie of thennemies, who being dispersed abroade when Monsr Chaumont returned from Sermidi to Carpy, moste parte of their footemen were lodged at Bondin, and the horsemen in the townes neare about Finale. But assoone as he had receyued his commission from the king, he marched the day after to Stellata, and the day following somewhat further, where he bestowed tharmie abrode in the villages thereabouts, and raysed a bridge of boates vpon the ryuer of Pavv betwene Stellata and Ficquerolla, hauing giuen direction to the duke of Ferrara to make an other a myle lower at the place which is called the poynt, beeing that breache or braunche of Pavv which goeth to Ferrara, & that also he should marche with thartillerie to the hospital, a place right oueragainst Bondin. In this meane while Triuulce was aduertised by his espials, that many trowpes of light horsmen of that part of the Venetian armie which lay on the other side Pavv, were the next night to approche Mirandola to dresse some ambushe: Agaynst whome he sent out secretly certayne horsmen, who being come vp to Belair, a plaine house in the contrey of Mirandola, found within it Leonard Napolitain capteine of the Venetian light horsmen, & a man of great place & reputation in tharmie: he nothing doubting that his enemies would discend so farre as to that place, was withdrawne thither onely with fiftie horse, and there expecting a greater strẽgth that was to follow, he with many of his were slain, their vallour not being able to resist the malice of their fortune. Alfonso d'Este came to the hospitall according to his direction, beginning the night following to imploy his artillery against Bondin: And at the same time, not omitting thoportunity of their felicitie, Triuulce sent Guaston lord of Foix the kings sisters sonne, a man very young and newly come to the armie the yeare before, to runne vp euen to the barres of thenemies campe, with an hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsemen, and fiue hundred footmen, with whom he put to flight fiue hundred footmen appoynted to garde that front or parte of the campe: By this example, bringing diſtruſte of greater perill, all the reſidue leauing Bondin vnder good garde, retyred into places of ſtrength on the other ſide the Canall. The counſayles of warre and enterpriſe carrie with them for the moſte parte a ſucceſſe variable and differing from exſpectation, for that no more in thoſe actions, then in any other mortall cauſes, the deuiſes of man can not be ſeparate from their imperfections: not one of the plottes of Triuulce ſucceeded as was looked for, for that thartillerie planted agaynſt Bondin made little exployte, both for the diſtance of the place (Pavv being betweene them) and alſo the ryuer beeing ſwelled and the riſing parte cutte of by them of Bondin, it ſo drowned the countrey that there was no poſſibilitie of paſſage from the front of the Frenche campe to Bondin but vpon barkes: In ſo muche as the Captayne diſpayring eftſoones to vſe the commoditie of that waye to diſtreſſe the lodging of thennemies, called from Verona two thouſande Launceknightes, giuing alſo direction to leauie three thouſande Griſons, the better to drawe neare them by the wayes of Saint Felix, in caſe the peace proceeded not by the working of the Biſhop of Gurce, whoſe comming had bene made ſomewhat the more ſlowe and delitorie, for that at Sale vppon the lake of Garde he had in vayne exſpected aunſwere from the Pope, whome he had prayed by letters to ſende Embaſſadours to negociate: At laſte he came to Mantua accompanied with Dom Peter de Vree ordinarily reſident with Cæſar for the king of Aragon: not manye dayes after arryued there the Biſhoppe of Paris, the Frenche kinge (who to be more neare the ſolicitations of peace, and the better to furniſhe his prouiſions for the warre, was nowe come to Lyon) perſwading him ſelfe that the Pope woulde alſo ſende thither and ioyne frankly in the action: But ſuche was his obſtinacie agaynſt the deuoute willes of all theſe great Princes, that he made greate inſtance to haue the Biſhop of Gurce to come to him: not ſo much that he thought it aunſwered thexſpectation of his dignitie Pontificall, as for that he hoped, that in loading him with honours, ceremonies, and promiſes, ioyned to the efficacie and authoritie of his preſence, he might raunge him, and make him conformable to his wyll, beeing nowe more eſtraunged then euer from peace and agreement, wherein to make the labour more eaſie, and the ſucceſſe agreable to hys deſyre, he ſolicited Hierome Vich whiche was of Valence and Embaſſadour reſident for the king Catholike, to goe on hys behalfe to the Biſhop of Gurce: The Biſhoppe of Gurce refuſed not to condiſcende to the Popes wyll, but he obiected, that it were good he woulde firſte take order for that that was to be done afterwardes, aſſuring that the difficulties woulde bee more eaſilye diſſolued and decyded, if the negociation were firſte managed at Mantua, with intention to goe afterwardes to the Pope with matters well debated and almoſte reſolued: He alleaged that this courſe he was bounde to take, no leſſe for the neceſſitie then for the facilitie of thinges: For, as it coulde not bee conuenient for him to leaue alone the Biſhoppe of Paris, whome the Frenche king had ſent to Mantua at the inſtance of Cæſar, ſo there was no hope he ſhoulde debate in thaffayres of his king, and no leſſe inconuenient to require him to goe with him to the Pope, ſeeing that neyther it aunſwered his commiſſion nor the dignitie of his king to goe to the houſe of thennemie affore their controuerſies were accorded, or at leaſt very neare to bee reſolued: Of the contrarie, the two Embaſſadors of Aragon, declared that the whole hope of peace making depended vppon the agreement and compoſing of the affayres affayres of Ferrara, for that they beeing determined, and no more cause remayning to the Pope to sustayne the Venetians, they shoulde bee constrayned to yeelde to peace with suche lawes and conditions as Cæsar woulde: That the Pope pretended that the sea Apostolike had great and strong rightes ouer the citie of Ferrara, and did esteeme Alfonso to haue vsed towards him a great ingratitude, and had done him many vnworthy iniuries: That to abate and qualifie the rigor of his minde whiche was nowe full of displeasure, it was more conuenient that the subiect or vassall shoulde implore the clemencie of his Lorde, then to come and dispute of his iustice: For which reasons they perswaded that it was not only comely and honest, but also conuenient and necessarie, to go to him, in which iuste humilitie and submission they doubted not but he woulde diminishe a great parte of his rigour: They thought it not profitable that that diligence, that industrie, that authoritie whiche was to be imployed to dispose the Pope to peace, shoulde be consumed in perswasions tending to endes doubtfull: Lastely they added with very sweete wordes, that neither could matters haue their full disputation, nor the quarrells sufficiently searched into, vnlesse all the parties were together in full assistance. And that within Mantua was onely but one parte, for that Cæsar, the French king, and the king Catholike, were in suche vnitie of leagues, parentages, and amities, that in this action they were to be reputed as brethren, thintereste of euery particular beeing common to them all. What by these perswasions and other respectes more speciall and priuate, the Bishoppe of Gurce suffred him selfe to bee wonne to goe thither, with intention that the Bishoppe of Paris shoulde exspect at Parma, what woulde be the succesſe of his voyage. During these actions the Pope, notwithstanding all solicitation made apperteining to the peace, had not yet altered his thoughtes from the warre, interteyning the one with showes dissembled, and embrasing the other with desires burning and importunat: He supposed to surprise of newe the bastillion of Geniuola, recommending the charge of that enterprise to Iohn Vitelli: But aswell for the small and slowe paymentes that were made, the numbers of footemen were farre inferiour to thappoyntment, as also that all the countrey theteaboutes stoode ouerflowed bothe by the plentie of raynes that fell, and by the cutting of the rysinges of the ryuer of Pavv, there was nothing aduaunced: Besides, Alfonso d'Este was the stronger by water, who, with an armie of Gallies and Brigantins so charged the Venetian fleete neare S. Albert, that what with the furie of that encounter, and with the feare of an other fleete of lesser vesselles which they discerned sayling from Comaccho, they retyred to the porte of Rauenna with the losse of two sustes, two barbottes, and more then fourtie smaller vesselles: This accident disappoynted the Popes hope to take the Bastyllion, and therefore he returned those companies to the campe whiche lodged at Finalo, very muche weakened of the strength of footemen for that the paye was so small. About this tyme the Pope created eyght Cardinalles, partely to allure to him the myndes of Princes, and partly to arme him agaynst the threatnings of the Councell: Suche as he created were prelates learned and experienced, and as they bare in the Court of Rome a greate authoritie, so they were personages of speciall election, suche as he reappoſed moste suretie in: Of the number of this creation was the Archbyshoppe of Yorke Embassadour for the kinge of Englande, and the Byshoppe of Syon, the one beeing a man of importaunce to stirre vppe the Swvizzers, and the other beeing gracious with hys king, whom he hoped to kindle agaynst the Frenchemen: And to drawe on the Bishop of Gurce as it were with an earnest penny certayne of the ſame dignitie, and with that hope to make him the more tractable to his deſyre, he reſerued to him ſelfe with the conſent of the Conſiſtorie, a power to name an other, ſuche a one as he had faſhioned already in his mynde. After he vnderſtoode that the Biſhop of Gurce had conſented to come to him, he determined to receyue him with great honour, wherein to expreſſe more office then theſtate of a Biſhop of Gurce coulde chalenge, and leſſe reſpect then apperteined to ſo ſupreme a dignitie as a high Biſhop of Rome, he went from Rauenna to Bolognia, to thende to ioyne the magnificence of the place to the reſidue of the honours he pretended: There he receiued him with pompes and ceremonies equall to the eſtate and dignitie of any king, the glory of his demonſtrations and ſhowes giuing great detection of his diſſembled minde. The Biſhop alſo for his parte expreſſed no leſſe pompe and magnificence, for that diſcending into Italie with the title of Cæſars liefetenant, he came accompanied with a very great trayne of nobilitie, all their bands and followers beeing ſumptuouſly apparelled. The Embaſſador of Venice reſident with the Pope came to meete him at the gate of the towne, making ſignes of very great ſubmiſſion: But he, with a wonderfull pride and arrogancie both in his geſtures and wordes, ſhewed him ſelfe not a little diſcontented that he that repreſented the ennemies of Cæſar, coulde not ſo muche brydle his impudencie and boldneſſe, as to forbeare to come in his preſence. With this pompe he went vp to the publike Conſiſtorie, where the perſon of the Pope attended hym with all the Cardinalls: There he expreſſed in ſhort ſpeeche, but with very hawty and proude wordes, that as Cæſar had ſent him into Italie, in a deſire to obteyne that that apperteined to him, more by the waye of peace then by the rigour of warre: ſo neuertheleſſe, there was no place or poſſibilitie for peace, if the Venetians made not franke reſtitution of thoſe things that belonged to him in any ſort ſoeuer. After he had declared thus much in publike audience, he deliuered no leſſe in priuat to the Pope, nothing abating his hawtines, and the day following he accompanied theſe ſeuere beginnings with actions no leſſe proude & arrogant: for the Pope hauing by his conſent appointed three Cardinals to negociat with him, the cardinall S. George, Cardinall Regina, and Cardinall de Medicis, who attended him at the houre aſſigned to meete together: he ſent three of his gentlemen to negociat with them, excuſing him ſelfe to haue other buſines, holding it in deede a matter of great indignitie to debate with any other then the Pope. This indignitie with many others the Pope ſwallowed ſweetely, thincredible hatred which he bare to the French, ſurmounting the diſpoſition of his nature. But in the accorde betwene Cæſar and the Venetians which began firſt to be drawne into diſputation, there were many difficulties: for albeit the Cardinall of Gurce who in the beginning had demaunded all the townes, conſented in the ende that Padoa and Treuiſa ſhould remayne to them with all their partes and appurtenances, yet he ſtucke to haue them giue to Cæſar in recompence a very great quantitie of money, and that they ſhould holde them of him in chiefe, and reſigne to him the rightes of the other townes: Matters which coulde neuer be agreed vnto by the Senate of Venice, wherein it was vniuerſally concluded, that it was better for their common weale, hauing already ſo fortified Padoa and Treuiſa that they feared not to looſe them, to preſerue and keepe their money, for that yf euer that tempeſt paſſed ouer, there might fall out ſome occaſion to recouer eaſily all the reſidue of their dominion. On the other ſide the Pope nouriſhed an importunate deſire to haue them agreed with Cæſar, hoping to make that an occaſion to eſtraunge him from the Frenche king, in which regarde he preſſed them partly by requeſtes, requeſtes, and partly by threates, to accept the conditions that were offred them: But his authoritie was no more ſo great with them, not ſo much for that they were not ignoraunt from whence proceeded ſo great a deſire, as for that they knewe that their aſſociation and companie was ſo neceſſarie to him if he were not reconciled with the French king, that they made aſſured reckonings that he would neuer abandon them: Neuertheleſſe, after the trauell of many dayes and muche diſputation made, the Biſhop of Gurce abating ſomewhat of the harde conditions which he offred, and the Venetians yeelding more to the vehement inſtance of the Pope then they had determined, and withal thembaſſadors of the king of Aragon interpoſing in the action, it ſeemed they came at laſte to accorde, the Venetians (the better to retayne Padoa and Treuiſa by the conſent of Cæſar) paying huge ſummes of money, but referred to long tearmes: There reſted onely a meane to reconcile the Pope and the Frenche king, betweene whome appeared no other difference then for the quarrells of the Duke of Ferrara: and to reſolue them with the reſidue of the controuerſies (for without that Cæſar was determined to eſtabliſhe nothing) the Biſhop of Gurce went to ſpeake with the Pope (to whome he went but ſeldome) beeing perſwaded by the hopes whiche the Cardinall of Pauia and the Catholike kinges Embaſſadors had put him in, that it woulde be a matter of very eaſie action: And on the other ſide he knewe, that the Frenche king hauing leſſe regarde to dignitie then to tranquillitie, was diſpoſed to conſent to many thinges, which bare but little preiudice to the Duke of Ferrara: But the Pope on the contrarie cutting him off at the firſt, began to exhort him, that agreeing with the Venetians, he ſhoulde leaue at libertie the matters of Ferrara, ſeeming to be ſorie that Cæſar knewe not thoccaſion that offred, to be reuenged with the forces and money of an other, of ſo many great iniuries done agaynſt him by the French: and withall that he tarried to be required in a matter wherein reaſonably he ſhould beſeech others with great inſtance. To whiche things when the Biſhop of Gurce had replyed with many reaſons, ſeeing he was not hable to turne him from his opinion, he tolde him he would depart without giuing other perfection to the peace with the Venetians: And at the inſtant, hauing according to the cuſtome, kiſſed his feete, he departed the ſame day (beeing the xv. after his arriuall at Bolognia) to Modona, the Pope ſending after him in vayne to call him agayne, aſſoone as he was departed the Citie: from Modena he tooke his way towards Millan, complayning of the Pope for many things, but ſpecially for that whileſt by his comming into Italie there was almoſt a general ſurceaſſing frō armes, the Pope had ſent ſecretly the Biſhop of Vintemille, ſonne to the late Cardinall Fregoſa, to trouble the ſtate of Genes: neuertheleſſe the Frenche men ſette ſuch good eſpiall of his iorney, that they tooke him in the contrey of Mountferat all diſguiſed and vnknowen as he was, and from thence carried him to Millan, where he made manifeſt detection of the cauſe of his going, and the whole enterpriſe: his preſent perill driuing him to ſeeke his ſafetie more by diſcloſing then by excuſing. When the Biſhop of Gurce departed from Bolognia, he required the Embaſſadors of Aragon (ſeeming not a little diſcontented with the Popes obſtinacie) to ſee returned to the realme of Naples the three hundred Spaniſh launces: whervnto they condiſcended readily: A matter which made men to maruell the more, for that at the ſame time that the generall councell was in negociation, with exſpectation that the armies of Fraunce & Germanie accompanied with the preſence of their Princes, ſhould be moſt mightie in Italie, the Pope, beſides the yllwill of the French king, ſeperated Cæſar frō him, & ſtoode depriued of the ſuccors of the king Catholike. Some doubted that in this action (as almost in al others) the counsels of the king of Aragon were different from his demonstrations, and that his Embassadors had practised one thing in publike, and an other thing in secret with the Pope: for that hauing prouoked the French king by new offences, and in the same giuen a new memorie to auncient wrongs, it seemed he ought to feare least the peace with all others came not to be the cause of great perills agaynst him, the Venetians remayning weakned of estate, of money, and of reputation, and Cæsar no more mightie in Italie, and more variable and prodigall then euer: Others that discoursed more suttelly and deepely of things, made this interpretation, that notwithstanding al protestations that the king Catholike made to abandon the Pope, yea though he reuoked his bandes, yet the Pope dwelt firmely in this confidence, that he would alwayes support and defende him in his greatest necessities, considering that the embasing of him could not but be preiudiciall to the king.

Within foure dayes after the departing of the Bishop of Gurce, the Pope sent after him the Scottish Embassador to debate of the peace with the french king, wherin theffect was no lesse frustrate, then the deuise and hope of the Pope were vayne: And as by his departing the hopes of the peace were left troubled, and lesse exspectation of agreement in so great a discorde of willes: so by his going away also did ceasse the causes that had so long lingred Iohn Iacques Triuulce, who thirsted in an honest ambition to do some thing worthy his vertue and auncient glory, and by the which he might induce the king to knowe, howe hurtfull it is to recommende the gouernment of warres (a matter aboue all other humaine actions moste paynefull and harde, and most requiring discression and experience) not to captaynes hable and trayned, but to young men vnexperienced, and of whose vertue there is none other thing to giue testimonie then fauour and countenance. Therfore continuing in his first resolutions, notwithstanding the foote bandes of the Grisons were not yet arriued (for the generall of Normandy, vpon whome depended thexpeditions, had deferred to sende men to leauie them, both hoping that the peace woulde go forwarde, and also seeking to auoyde expences to the king) he brought the campe affore Concorda in the beginning of May, conteining a thousande two hundred launces and seuen thousande footmen: he tooke it the same day he presented his campe affore it, wherein the securitie of the townesmen helped no lesse then his owne vallour, for that being made feareful with the first execution of thartillerie, whilest they sent Embassadors to make their composition with him, the footemen of his armie entred the towne and sacked it, the townes men beeing negligent in their garde, by the hope they had in their Embassadors that were sent out to capitulat for their safeties. After the taking of Concorda, to thende to giue no occasion to suche as enuyed him to charge him with partialitie, as respecting more his proper profite, then the kings seruice, he left Mirandola behinde him, and drewe towards Bonport (a village vpon the ryuer of Panaro) to approche so neare thenemie, as eyther to constrayne them to dislodge, or to fight out of their strength, and by the same meane to cut off their vittels and prouisions: As he was entred into the countrey of Modena and lodged in the village of Cauesse, he sent Gaston de Foix with three hundred footmen and fiue hundred horsmen, to do an enterprise vpon Iohn Paule Manfron that lay at Massa neare to Finale with three hundred light horsemen of the Venetians, who hearing of their comming put himselfe in battayle aray vpon a bridge: but the vallour of hys souldiours not answering his vertue and corage, he was made prisoner, being abandoned both of his fortune and fayth of his people. After this tharmie drawing neare to Bonport, Tryuulce had an intencion to caſt a bridge there where the channel which is drawne from aboue Modena out of the riuer of Panaro, entreth into the riuer. But thennemie, to giue impediment to his paſſage ouer the riuer, was already incamped in a place ſo neare, that they diſtreſſed him with their artilleries wherwith Capteine Perault a Spanyard & commaunder within the Church armie, was killed, as he walked along the riſing of the riuer: In that place the banke is very high, by which help as it was eaſie to thennemie to diſtreſſe him: ſo Tryuulce, meeting with theſe impediments by a new councell, caſt his bridge ſomewhat higher, A myle onely aboue the channel: And hauing paſſed the channell he drewe towards Modena, marching along the riſing of Panaro, and ſeeking out a place where he might more eaſily caſt his bridge: But becauſe he ſaw alwayes affore him, bands of horſemen and footemen of his enemies, who were incamped neare to Frankcaſtell vpon the way of Romagna (but their lodgings all enuironed with bankes and waters) he came by the ſame way to the bridge of Foſſalto two myles neare to Modona, and there turning on the left hand towards the mounteine, he paſſed without impediment the foard of Panaro which in that place hath his channell very large and without bankes: from thence he encamped in a place called the beache of Panaro three myles from the armie Eccleſiaſtike: The day after he drew towards Plumacce being refurniſhed with vittells from them of Modona by the conſent of Vitfruch: And likewiſe the ſame day the armie Eccleſiaſtike, which durſt not preſent them ſelues in plaine field, ſuppoſing it very neceſſary to draw neare to Bolognia, the better to preuent all mutinies and ſtirres in that citie, the rather for that the famulie of the Bentyuoleis followed the french armie, went and incamped at the bridge of Caſalecquo three miles aboue Bolognia, A place very ſtrong and ſure, hauing his ſituacion betwene the riuer of Rene and the channel, And by the commoditie of the mounteine at his backe, it defendes Bolognia from all priuacion of the releeffe of the channell which comming from the riuer, paſſeth into that citie: This is that place wherein, in the dayes of our Auncеſtors Ioh. Galeas Viſcounte, the mighty Duke of Myllan, obteyned a moſt great victorie againſt the Florentyns, the Bolognians and other ſtates confedered, his numbers farre exceeding the ennemies: The day following Frankcaſtell was rendred to Tryuulce, who, after he had remeyned three dayes in the lodging of Plumacce, both for thimpediment of the raines that fell, and alſo to reuittell his people being then in great neceſſitie, he came to incampe vpon the high way betwene Samoggia and Frankcaſtell, where he ſtoode in great dout what he were beſt to doe for many difficulties that appeared to him in all deliberacions: for, he knew well enough that it would be to no purpoſe to execute any thing againſt Bolognia, if the people made no tumult within: And if he ſhoulde draw neare to it vnder hope of popular emotions, he feared he ſhould be compelled to retyre as Chaumont did, not without diminucion of his reputacion: And he knew that it would be a matter of greater perill and indiſcreſſion, to go fight with thennemies encamped in places of ſtrength and of aduauntage: And to make his approch to Bolognia on that ſide below, there was no other hope, ſauing that happly thennemies might remoue for feare leaſt he aſſayled Romagnia, in which might be offered ſome occaſion, eyther to him to fight, or to the people of Bolognia to make ſome tumult: Neuertheles in the ende after he had reſolued to make tryall, if eyther the vniuerſal diſpoſicion of the citie, or the particuler intelligences of the Bentyuoleis, would ſtand him in any ſteede, he led the army, the vauntgard guided by Theodore Tryuulce, the mayne battell by him ſelfe, and the reareguard by Gaſton de Foix, to encampe at the bridge of Laine, which is a place vpon the high way fiue myles from Bolognia, and bearing a perpetuall renowme for the memorie of thenterviewe of Lepidus,*Mark. Antho.*and Octauius,who,by the teſtimonie of hiſtories,vnder the name of Tryumuirat,eſtabliſhed in that place the tyrannie of Rome, together with that proſcripcion which can neuer be blamed and deteſted enough: The Pope was not at this time at Bolognia,but ſince the departure of the Biſhop of Gurce beeing perplexed in varietie of thoughts and councells,ſometymes courage and ſometimes feare bearing dominion in him,aſſoone as he heard Tryuulce began to march(notwithſtanding the ſpaniſh launces were gone) he went from Bolognia to tharmie,to thend by his preſence to encourage the Capteines to giue battell to thennemies, to the which he coulde neuer diſpoſe them either by his letters, or labor of his Embaſſadors: he departed with intencion to lodge the firſt day at Cente,but he was compelled to lodge within the towne of Pieua, for that a thowſand of his footemen which were entred within Cente,refuſed to depart till they were ſatisfied of their payes: whereupon,being eyther made angry with this contempt,or happly looking more deepely into the preſent daunger, he altered his reſolucion returning eftſoones to Bolognia where his feares ſo redoubled vpon him by thapproching of Tryuulce, that being determined to goe to Rauenna,he ſent for the Magiſtrates to whom he occupied theſe perſwaſions: That by the benefit of the ſea Apoſtolike and by his meane and labor they had ſhaked of a yoke of moſt greeuous tyrannie, and had obteyned libertie with many exemptions,beſides many graces both publike and priuat which they had receiued and were to receiue of him in particuler: by which meane, in place where before they were holden oppreſſed with moſt hard ſeruitude, and ſo embaſed and troden downe by tyrants,that in other partes of Italy there was no reputacion of them,now they were rayſed into honor & riches,their citie repleniſhed with all ſortes of trades and marchandiſes,and ſome of them eſtabliſhed in right worthy and high dignities: In ſo much as now,their fortune being chaunged, they bare an vniuerſall reputacion in euery place,they ſtoode free of themſelues,abſolute Lords of Bolognia,and the whole territorie,the offices and honors being in their handes,and the publike reuenues of their citie in their free diſtribucion: onely the Church hath but the name,& keepeth there for ſigne of ſuperioritie a Legat or gouerner,who muche leſſe that without them can deliberat of any matter of importance,ſeeing that for ſuch cauſes as are referred to his arbitracion, he communicateth ordinarily with them,ſubiecting him ſelfe to their aduiſe and wills: That if for theſe benefits and proſperities, there remeyned in them any deſire to defend their propper libertie, they ſhoulde receiue of him no worſe ſuccour,comfort,and protection, then he would miniſter to the citie of Rome ſtanding in the like neceſſitie: That though thimportance of the preſent affayres conſtreyned him to goe to Rome, yet,he neyther did nor would forget to prouide for the ſewertie and ſauetie of Bolognia: That for that regard,he had giuen direction that the Venetian bandes which lay on the other ſide Pavv with Andrevv Gritti and to that ende caſt the bridge at Sermydy, ſhould come to ioyne with tharmie: That albeit his prouiſions were very able and ſufficient to defende them, yet he coulde not reſt contented, nor ſatisfied, if withall he left them not deliuered from the troubles of the warre: In which reſpect, to driue the french men into neceſſitie to defend their owne things,there were already leauyed x.thowſand Svvyzzers to diſcend vpon the Duchie of Myllan, And for their better prouiſion and expedicion he had ſent twenty thowſand duckats to Venice, the Venetians preparing the like ſumme: Neuertheleſſe if they had rather returne vnder the ſeruitude of the Bentyuoleis,then to enioy the ſweetnes of the libertie of the Church,he deſired them to expresse frankely what mindes they bare, for that he would make him selfe conformable to their likings: onely he tolde them that if they had any resolucion to defend them selues, the time now was very conuenient not onely to expresse their vertue, but also to make bownd to them for euer, the sea Apostolike, himselfe, and all the succession of Popes that shoulde come after him. To this forme of perswasion pronownced (according to his custom) with more feruencie then eloquence, after they had debated amongest them selues in councell, the President of the gouernment made aunswer in the name of the whole, not forgetting with wordes of great boasting to magnifie their faith, their thankfulnes to benefits, and their perpetuall & infinit deuocion to his holines and name: That they were not ignorant of the happy estate wherein they stoode, and how much, since the expulsing of Tyrants, their wealth had bene augmented, together with the worship of their citie: That where before their liues and hauiors were miserably subiected to the commaundement of others, now by the benefit of peace and tranquillitie they liue in sewertie, their liues without feare, and their goods without perill of execucion, their persons pertaking in the gouernment & in the reuenues: That there was not one amongest them who had not particularly receiued of him many graces and honors: That they sawe renewed in their citie the dignitie of Cardinallship, and many of their Citizens furnished with the principall offices of the Court of Rome: In recompense of which singuler benefits, they bare mindes disposed to consume all their goods, to weare and wast their proper liues, and to put in peril the honor and sauetie of their wife & children, rather then to fall any ioate from the deuocion of the sea Apostolike: Therefore they desired him to depart, no lesse happie then glad, nourishing neither feare nor ielousie touching the things of Bolognia, for that he should sooner heare that al the channell should swimme with the blood of the people of Bolognia, then that city should call vpon other name or obey other Lord then Pope Iulio. The man that aspireth is credulous in all thinges that are conformable to his hope, yea sometymes his ambicion makes him beleeue contrary to reason or wisedom: These words protested more in glory then with good meaning, gaue to the Pope a greater hope then was conuenient, And leauing there the Cardinall of Pauia, he went to Rauenna, not by the high way although he was accompanied with the spanish launces which returned to the realme of Naples, but for feare of the Duke of Ferrara, he tooke the way of Furly, which further about, he went from Bolognia better satisfied then well assured, and could not but expect of them fidelitie and confidence whom he had vndiscretly left to their libertie and discression: After Triuulce was come to the bridge of Laine, the citie of Bolognia began to declare an vniuersall murmure, the mindes of men being repleniished with diuerse impressions and thoughts: some accustomed to the libertie of tyrannie, and to liue of the goods and states of others, desired vehemently the returne of the Bentyuoleis, hating already the gouernment Ecclesiastike: some, aswel for the harmes they had already receiued, as for the feare of further hurtes, seing two such armies vpon their landes and ready to cut downe their harueſt, desired all thinges by the which they might be deliuered from such ruines: others, affore whose eyes stoode yet the memorie of the french insolencies, executed in their citie vnder Monsr Chaumont, and fearing now least by their wel speeding the citie drawing into tumult, might come to be sacked, seemed not to care into what gouernment or iurisdiction they fell, so that in it they might be assured to be deliuered from such daungers: There were very few that affore had declared themselues enemies to the famulie of Bentyuoley, which now fauored the iurisdiction of the Church, and that more in ſhew then in good meaning: In ſo much that the whole being drawne into armes, ſome for deſire of innouacion and chaunge, and ſome for their proper ſewertie, All thinges were full of feare and confuſion: The Cardinall of Pauia and Legat reſident in Bolognia, had neither courage nor councell ſufficient for ſuch a daunger: Beſides, in a citie ſo great and populous, he hauing no more but two hundred light horſemen and a thowſand footemen, and being at that time more then euer at variance with the Duke of Vrbyn who lay with tharmie at Caſalecqua, he had eyther at aduenture or by deſtinie leauyed and payed fiueteene Capteines of the Citizens, to whom, together with their companies and with the people, he had committed the garde of the towne: it ſeemed he vſed no great regarde in the election of theſe Capteines, for that the moſt part of them were of the faction of the Bentyuoleys, but principally Lavvrence Arioſto, who, being firſt impriſoned and racked at Rome for ſuſpicion of conſpiracie with the famulie of Bentyuoleys, ſuffered afterwards a long impriſonment in the caſtell of S. Ange: The people after they had once their weapons in their handes, began to draw to aſſemblies, and make ſecret conuenticles ſpreding through the towne new ſlaunders: Their manifeſt rebellion began to make the Legat ſee too late into his owne indiſcreſſion, And to auoyde the perill whereunto he had brought him ſelf, he appoynted that the new Capteines with their bands ſhould goe to the armie fayning too late that the Duke of Vrbyn would it ſo: But they aunſwering that it was not reaſonable they ſhould abandon the gard of their towne, he proued to bring in capteine Ramaſſote with a thowſand footemen, which the people would not ſuffer: Theſe manifeſt contempts made the Cardinall both a coward & deſperat being vnable by perſwacion and pollicie to releeue the perill which he had put vpon him ſelfe not by fortune, but by negligence: Therefore remembring how hateful his gouernment was to the people, and him ſelfe no leſſe deteſted of the Nobles, for that not longe affore vnder the Popes commaundement and power royall as he ſayd, he had cut of the heades of three honorable Citizens: he ſtoale out of the pallaice by a ſecret way and in diſguiſed habits, and ſo ſuddeinly withdrew him ſelfe into the Citadell, that he forgot to cary with him his Iewells and money, which he ſent for in haſte after, And ſo went out by the gate towards Imola accompanied with a band of horſemen led by Guido Vaine who had maried his ſiſter and was Capteine of the horſemen appoynted for his garde: A litle after him went out of the Citadell Octa. Fregoſa without other companie then a guide, they both ſuffering one fortune as they were both followers of one cauſe: The fleeing of the Legat was no ſooner knowne in the towne, then throughout the whole citie the name of the people was cryed and called vpon with great tumult and emocion: an occaſion which Arioſto not willing to loſe together with Frauncis Riuucci one of the fiueteene Capteines & affected to the Bentyuoleis, they tooke many of their followers and faction and roone to the gates of S. Felix and Lama moſt conuenient for the campe of the frenchmen, which they brake open with barres and hatchets, and being poſſeſſed of them they ſent immediatly to call the Bentyuoleis: And they receiuing of Triuulce many french horſemen to auoyd the high way of the bridge of Rene which was garded by Raphaell de Paſſi one of the Capteines of the Church, they paſſed the riuer more lowe, and approching the gate of Lama were let in, their gladnes being nothing inferior to their fortune: To this rebellion of Bolognia was added the breaking and fleeing away of the armie: for, about three of the clocke in the night, the Duke of Vrbyn whoſe bandes of ſouldiours ſtretched out from the bridge of Caſalecqua vntill the gate of Saragoſſe, hearing of the fleeing of the Legat & mutinies of the people, left the moſt

part of his tents and pauilions pitched, and in great haſt went away with the whole armie, except thoſe that being appoynted for the garde of the campe, were on that ſide the riuer towards the french men, to whome his haſte would not ſuffer him to giue knowledge of his diſcamping: it is ſeldom ſeene that one aduerſitie commeth alone, and it is found in all ages and times that when ills begin to fall, they thunder all at once: for, the Bentyuoleis being now entred the towne, hearing of the breaking vp of the campe, gaue preſent aduertiſement to Triuulce, and ſent out of the towne a part of the people to diſtreſſe them: By whom and by the multitudes of payſants which diſcended on all partes with rude cryes and brutes, their campe that paſſed along the walls was aſſailed, their artilleries and municions taken from them, and the moſt part of their baggage ſpoyled: notwithſtanding the french that by this tyme were come to the medley tooke from the people & payſants by force and violence, the thinges they had rauiſhed from others with the perill of their liues: By this time alſo Theoder Triuulce with the vauntgard was arriued at the bridge of Rene, where Raphaell Paſſi with ſinguler vallour made head long time againſt his enemies, but being ouercharged both with numbers and fortune, he was at laſt taken priſoner, hauing giuen by the reſiſtance he made, a notable oportunitie to the Church ſouldiours to ſaue them ſelues: But the Venetian companies and the bandes of Raſſotte which lay vppon the hill aboue S. Luke, hauing but very late knowledge of the fleeing of the Duke of Vrbyn, ſought their ſaueties by the wayes of the mounteines, by the which notwithſtanding they receiued great harmes, they got at laſt into Romagnia: In this victorie wonne without fighting, were taken fiueteene peeces of great artillerie, and many of leſſer ſort, belonging both to the Pope and to the Venetians: certeine men at armes of the Church ſpoyled and ſtripped together with an hundred and fifty of the Venetians, and almoſt all the footemen of both the one and the other armie diſperſed: There remeyned priſoners Vrſin de Mugnano, Iulia Manfron, with many other Capteines of meane condicion: within Bologna there was not a man ſlaine, nor any violence done eyther to the Nobles or to the Commons, only there were made priſoners, the Biſhop of Cluſo together with many other Prelats, Secretories, and officers which were about the Cardinall and remeyned ſtill in his pallaice for that he had kept from them his departing: The ſame night & the day following the people fell vpon an image of braſſe being the Popes picture, which they trayled along the market place in great ſkorne and mockerie, vſing no more reuerence to the Image, then they bare affection to the perſon that it repreſented: the cauſe of this inſolencie was referred either to the ſouldiours of Bentyuoley who could not be gouerned, or elſe to the humor of the people, who bearing a nature vnthankefull and deſirous of new things, and no leſſe weary with the trauells and harmes of the warre, bare hatred to the name and memorie of him that had bene the cauſe of the libertie and felicitie of their contrey: The day after which was the xxij of Maye Tryuulce ſtayed in his lodging, and the day following, leauing Bologna behind him, he drew to the riuer of Adice and afterward ſtayed at the borow of S. Peter which is a frontyer vpon the territories of Bologna, exſpecting before he marched further, what would be thintencion of the french king, whether he would execute any further action vpon the ſtate of the Pope, or elſe contenting him ſelfe to haue reaſſured Ferrara and taken from the Church the citie of Bologna which he had gotten by his meanes, he would eſtabliſh there the courſe of his victorie: By reaſon of this temporiſing, although Saſſatella the Popes Capteine and who hauing chaſſed oute of Imola the faction Gibeline, commaunded that citie as chiefe of the Guelffes, made him ſecret offers to put into his handes the citie of Ymola, yet he refuſed to accept it till he had the kings aunſwer: There reſted onely the Citadell of Bolognia wherein was the Biſhop of Vitelli, A Citadell large and ſtronge, but manned and furniſhed according to the cuſtom of the fortreſſes of the church, conteining but a very ſlender ſtrength of footemen, very ſmall prouiſion of vittells, and almoſt no municions at all: Whileſt it was holden beſeeged, Vitfruch, being certefied of the ſucceſſe of Bolognia, was come from Modona by night to perſwade the Biſhop with great promiſſes and offers to deliuer it to Cæſar: But the Biſhop, hauing the fift day compownded with them of Bolognia that the liues and goods of ſuch as were within ſhould be ſaued, and receiued obligacion that within a time certeine they ſhould pay him three thowſand duckats, deliuered it vp into their handes: And they were no ſooner poſſeſſed of it, then they ronne by heapes to diſmantle and reuerſe it, the Bentyuoleis ſtirring them to thaction, not ſo much to winne fauor with the citizens, as for feare leſt the french king would withhold it, ſome of his Capteines being already of a councell to demaunde it: But Tryuulce would neuer giue his conſent, for that he thought it would be a thing contrary to the kinges profit to giue occaſion to thinke that he had deſire to make him ſelfe Lord of Bolognia: By the occaſion of this victorie, the Duke of Ferrara recouered beſides Cento and Pieua, Cotignuola, Lugo and the other townes of Romagnia: expulſing at the ſame time Albert Pie who poſſeſſed them in common with him.

It was reaſonable, that the Pope ſhoulde receiue greate diſcontentments for the loſſe of Bolognia, not onely for that the citie of moſt importance through the whole ſtate Eccleſiaſtike next to Rome, was taken from him, wherein he ſuffered priuacion of that glory which he had gottē in conquering it, which was no leſſe great towards men then moſt principall and great in his owne conceite: but alſo for feare leſt the ſame fortune and felicitie which in that action had made his enemie happy, would « not eftſoones allure him to purſue his victorie further: ſuch be the variacions of « mindes poſſeſſed with dowtes and feare, and ſuch the mocions and ſuggeſtions of a « conſcience troubled and infected: he knew if the armie ſhould proſecute the courſe of their victorie, there was in him no abilitie of reſiſtance, And ſeeking to remoue all occaſions that might prouoke them to paſſe further: he ſolicited that the remeinders of the Venetian ſouldiours already reuoked by the Senat, ſhould embarke at the port of Ceſena, and for the ſame cauſe he ſent to haue reſtored to him the xx. thowſand duckats, which remeyned yet in Venice being ſent thether affore to ſtirre vp the Swyzzers: Moreouer he gaue order that the Cardinall of Nantes A Britton by nation, ſhould as it were of him ſelf, ſolicit Tryuulce to peace, perſwading that the time was then conuenient to worke it: But the Cardinall made aunſwere that it was not conuenient to proceede in that generalitie, but rather to come expreſſely to perticularities: he told him that when the king deſired peace, he did offer the condicions, and that it was now no leſſe neceſſary for the Pope to doe the like, the eſtate of the affayres ſo requiring, and his preſent fortune nothing impugning: The Pope vſed this maner of proceeding, more to auoid the preſent daunger, then for any deſire he had to haue peace, ſtriuing in him at one time feare, obſtinacie, hatred, and diſdaine: And with theſe paſſions was concurrant at the ſame tyme an other accident that hapned redoubling in him his ſorowes, and making him ſuſpect and feare further: There were brought to him many accuſacions againſt the Cardinall of Pauia, ſome charged him with infidelitie, ſome impoſed vpon him cowardiſe, and ſome blamed him of negligence, euery one thinking to make his fault the greater by the varietie of their imputacions: he came to Rauenna to make his owne iuſtificacion, and ſent

to the Pope to signifie his comming and to haue assignacion for audience: to whom the Pope, whose gladnes for his comming was nothing inferior to the affection he bare him, made aunswer that he should come to dine with him: But as he was going to the Popes pallaice, being accompanied with Guido Vaine & the gard of his horsemen: The Duke of Vrbyn, both for an auncient hatred he bare him, and also for a suspicion that the reuolt of Bolognia hapned through his fault, by which occasion followed the fleeing of the armie, followed him with a small traine: And thrusting in amongest his gard of horsemen who for reuerence sake made him place, he slew the Cardinall with his owne handes: he might happly seeme worthy for the degree he held, vpon whom violent handes should not be layed, but touching his infinit vices, he deserued most cruell punishment, his faultes being farre greater then the opinion that went on them, & his vertues farre lesse then were conuenient for such a profession: Assoone as the report of his death was brought to the Pope, he began to lamēt with miserable cryes and complaynings, being not a litle moued for the losse of a Cardinall so deare to him, but much more touched that such a holy dignitie fell into violacion almost euen affore his eyes, by the handes of his owne Nephew, & with an example not vsed: A matter so much the more greeuous to him, by how much he made profession to preserue & exalt the authoritie Ecclesiastike: These sorowes he was not able to beare, and much lesse to temper his furie, in which respect, as also with the presence of the place to pretermit the memorie of the fact, he departed the same day from Rauenna to returne to Rome: And, to thende that at one time he were enuyroned on all partes with infinit calamities, he was no sooner arriued at Rymyny, then he had aduertisement that within Modena, within Bolognia, and in many other cities, there were fixed and set vp many placards in publike places, by the which was denownced to him the conuocacion of the councell, with citacion to go thether in person.

For, as the Bishop of Gurcy, after he was gon from Modena, had trauelled certeine dayes by easie iorneies, exspecting the aūswer of the Skottish Embassador, who went from him to Bolognia for affayres which the Pope him selfe had propownded: so, he being eftsoones returned with aunswers very vncerteine, the Bishop of Gurcy dispatched immediatly to Myllan in the name of Cæsar three Proctors, who, ioyning with the Cardinalls and with the Proctors of the french king, published the councell to be celebrated the first daye of September next in the citie of Pysa: The Cardinalls made choyse of Pysa, as a place no lesse conuenient for the oportunitie of the sea, for those that were there to assemble, then of speciall sewertie for the confidence the french king had in the Florentyns: And withall for that many other places, which though they might haue bene capable of such an assembly, yet they were eyther inconuenient or suspected, or at least the Pope might refuse them with iust cooller: There had bene no conueniencie to assemble it in Fraunce or in other place of the kinges obedience, and Constance one of the free townes of Germany recommended by Cæsar, seemed for this action to beare no indifferencie, notwithstanding it had bene made notable by that worthy councell, wherein three Popes were deposed, and the schisme confounded that had continued for fortye yeares in the Churche: And in Thurin was more matter of suspicion to both partyes for the neighbourhood of the Svvyzzers and the estates of Fraunce: Bolognia affore it was out of thobedience of the Churche was not sure for the Cardinalls: and, now it standes in the lyke case for the regarde of the Pope: Moreouer in the election of the towne of Pysa was partely respected the felicitie of an example paste touchinge

the memorye of two councells which had beene there right happely celebrated: the one, when almoſt all the Cardinalls who abandoned Gregorye the twelue and Benet the xiij quarrelling together for the Popedom, choaſe Pope Alexander the v. celebrating the councell in that citie: And the other which was long tyme before celebrated in the ſame place about the yeare a thowſande one hundred and xxxvj. by Innocent the ſecond, at ſuch tyme as Peter Leon Antipape of Rome was condemned, who making him ſelfe be called Anacletus the ſeconde, with ſuche a ſchiſme had not onely much troubled Innocent, but alſo all the regions of Chriſtendom: The Florentyns had affore accorded Pyſa to the french king, who required it of them, giuing them to vnderſtand that Cæſar, no leſſe then he, was the Author of the conuocacion of the councell, the king of Aragon alſo conſenting and concurring in it: In this action the Florentyns deſerue to be prayſed, more perhaps for their ſilence, then for their wiſedome or conſtancie: for, eyther not hauing the courage to deny the king the thinge that was greeuous to them, or not conſidering howe many difficulties and daungers might growe vppon them by a councell which was celebrated agaynſt the Popes will, they helde ſo ſecrete that deliberacion that was made in an aſſembly or councell of more then an hundred and fifty Citizens, that the Cardinalls to whom the french king gaue hope of their conformetie, were neuer aſſured that they had accorded, neyther had the Pope any knowledge of it: The Cardinalls pretended that the councell might be iudicially called by them, without thauthoritie of the Pope, for the preſent neceſſitie (as they ſayd) that the Church had, to be reformed not onely in her members, but alſo in her heade, meaning the perſonne of the Pope: They publiſhed him to be ſo hardned in ſimonie, and corrupted with maners infamous and damnable, both vnfit to gouerne the Papacie, and Author of ſo many vniuſt warres, that he was incorrigible, to the vniuerſall ſlaunder of all Chriſtendom, for the ſauetie and preſeruacion of whome there was no other medicine ſufficient then the conuocacion of a councell: whereof ſeeing the Pope made no care, they alleaged that the full and legittimat power of conuocacion was diuolued to them, ſpecially thauthoritie of the elect Emperour being adioyned, and the conſent of the right Chriſtian king, together with the Cleargie of Germany and Fraunce concurring: They perſwaded, that to vſe often this medicine, was a meane not onely profitable but neceſſary for the diſeaſed bodie of the Church both to roote out the olde errours, and to reſiſt ſuch others as would of newe budde vp: To explayne and interpret the dowtes which dayly hapned, and to correct thinges which though in the beginning were ſownd and well ordered, yet in that tryall they appeared pernicious by experience: That for theſe reaſons the auncient fathers, in the councell of Conſtance, had wholeſomely enacted and prouided, that for alwayes afterwardes the councell ſhould be celebrated from ten yeares to ten yeares: The Popes had no other bridle then this, to holde them from going out of the right way: And without this, weighing with the naturall frailtie of men, the many inticements which nature breedes in vs to doe euill during our life, what ſewertie could remeyne to kingdoms and regions, if he that tooke to him ſelfe all liberty and licence, might ſtand exempted from all authoritie, and were aſſured that he ſhould neuer come to giue a reckoning of him ſelfe: On the other ſide, many occupied theſe reaſons, pertaking more with the doctrine of the Diuines, then of the Cannoniſtes, that the authoritie to call councells was inueſted onely in the perſon of the Pope: yea though he were infected with all vices, if onely he were not ſuſpected of hereſies: That if the holy authoritie were otherwayes interpreted, it would reſt in the power of a few, eyther for ambi-ambicion or for perticuler hatreds, couering their wicked intencions with falſe coolers, to alter and chaunge dayly the peaſible eſtate of the Church: A matter which ought not to be conſented no leſſe for the preiudice, then for the ill example it brought: They alleaged that be it that all medicines were wholeſome, yet if they were not miniſtred with due proporcions, and in tymes conuenient, they bare more of poyſon then of medicine: By which reaſons condemning all thoſe that had other opinions, they called this aſſemblie not a councell, but matter to deuide and ſeperat the vnitie of the ſea Apoſtolike, A beginning of ſchiſme in the Churche of God, and a councelling of Deuills.

THE ARGVMENT OF THE TENTH BOOKE.

After the taking of Bolognia, the french armie returneth to the Duchie of Myllan: The councell that was to be holden at Pyſa againſt the Pope, is transferred to Myllan, where many ſtirs happen: The Popes armie beſeegeth Bolognia: The frenchmen take Breſſia: The battell is giuen at Rauenna: The Pope publiſheth the councell at Rome: And afterwards the affayres of the french begin to decline.

THE TENTH BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

THE ſucceſſe of the victorie hapning vpon the french king, drewe all Chriſtendom but principally the vniuerſall regions of Italy, to exſpect (in greate dowt of minde) what he would further deliberat of his fortune: for, euery one gaue this iudgement that it was in his power to make him ſelfe Lorde of Rome and the whole ſtate Eccleſiaſtike, both for that all the Popes regiments together with the Venetians were diſperſed and almoſt diſſolued, and alſo there remeyned not in Italy other armies able to make reſiſtance agaynſt the furie of the Victor: And as for the Pope, ſeeming onely to be defended with the name & Maieſtie of the place, he ſtoode in all other regardes reduced to the diſcreſſion of fortune, his reſolucion of mind only remeining to ſupport the aduerſitye of his eſtate: Neuertheleſſe the french king, eyther the reuerence which he bare to religion reteyning him, or the feare to ſtirre vppe other Princes againſt him driuing him to vſe a moderacion in his fortune, determined not to vſe thoccaſion of his vi-ctorie, but with a councell perhaps more religious then profitable, he addreſſed his commaundements to Ioh. Iac. Tryuulce, to returne with the armie to the Duchie of Myllan, leauing Bolognia to the Bentyuoleis, and making reſtitucion of all other peeces which he occupied of the Church: To theſe actions ſo gracious and affable, he added wordes and demonſtracions no leſſe acceptable and full of pietie: for, he forbad throughout his Realmes to make any publike ſignes of gladnes, And proteſted oftentymes in the preſence of many, that notwithſtanding he had nothing committed againſt the ſea Apoſtolike, nor againſt the perſon of the Pope, And much leſſe done any thing but by prouocacion and conſtraint: yet, he would come to humilitie with the Pope, and for the reuerence and deuocion he bare to that ſea, he would ſue for pardon where he had done no offence: he perſwaded him ſelfe that the Pope, knowing by experience what were the difficulties of his conceites, and being reaſſured of the ſuſpiciō which he had of him without occaſion, would with all his hart come to deſire peace, the practiſe and negociacion whereof had not bene altogether giuen ouer, ſeeing the Pope, ſince he parted from affore Bolognia, had for that occaſion ſent to the king, thē baſſador of the king of Skotland, continuing to ſolicit the ſame points which by the ſame Biſhop had bene begon to be debated with the Biſhop of Gurce: In this diſpoſicion to peace ioyned alſo the famulie of the Bentyuoleis, who, notwithſtanding they followed thauthoritie of the king, yet they ſignified to the Pope, that much leſſe they would expreſſe contumacie and rebellion to the Churche, ſeeing they layed them ſelues downe with ready and franke mindes to liue and dye in that ſubiection wherein their fathers had continued by ſo many yeares: And in token thereof they did not onely ſette at libertie the Biſhop of Cluſe, but according to the auncient vſage, they lodged him in the pallayce as Liefetenant to the ſea Apoſtolike.

Tryuulce departed with tharmie and drew neare to Mirandola to recouer it, notwithſtanding at the requeſt of Iohan. Fran. Piqua, Vitfruch was entred vnder cooller to hold it in the name of Cæſar, And by proteſtacion had ſent to require Tryuulce, that becauſe it was of the iuriſdiction of th Empire, he ſhould abſteine from all violent action: But finding in the ende that his vayne authoritie was not ſufficient, he went his way, Tryuulce giuing him onely certaine promiſſes more honorable for Cæſar in ſhewe then in effect: The like did Iohn Fran. after he had ſafeconduit for goods and life: And Triuulce, hauing to follow no other expedicion, ſent to the gard of Verona fiue hundred launces and a thowſand three hundred launceknights vnder Capteine Iacob: And reſeruing to him ſelfe two thowſand fiue hundred Gaſcoins vnder the regiment of Capteine Molard and Mangiron, which, with the companies of the men at armes, he ſent diſperſed into the townes of the Duchie of Myllan, he gaue leaue & diſmiſſed all the other bandes of footemen: But to the deſire and hope of the king was nothing agreeable the diſpoſicion of the Pope, who riſing into a newe courage by the reuoking of the armie, And being euery day made more hard and obſtinat by the thinges that in deede ſhould haue made him more eaſie and tractable, ſeing withall that at Rymyny where he yet remeyned he laye tormented with the gowte: In the middeſt of ſo many perplexeties he ſette downe more in the perſonne of a Victor then one that was vanquiſhed, and that by the meane and working of the ſame Skottiſhe Embaſſador, That the Duke of Ferrara ſhoulde paye to him hereafter, the tributes which he was wont to paye before the diminucion whiche had bene made by Pope Alexander: That the Churche ſhoulde holde a Viſdomino in Ferrara, as the Venetians dyd before: And that there ſhould bee rendered to him Lugo with the other townes which Alfonso d'Este possessed in Romagnia: These condicions notwithstanding they seemed to the kinge no lesse greeuous, then to holde too muche of iniquitie, yet the desire to haue peace with the Pope preuailing aboue all other respectes, he made aunswere that he was contented to consent to all those demaundes, so farre forth as Cæsar might also condiscend and concurre in them: But the Pope being now returned to Rome, seemed with the place to chaunge both councell and will, the perswasions of the king of Aragon helping no lesse then his naturall lightnes and mutabilitie: for, the king of Aragon, whome the late victorie of the french king had confirmed in very great suspicion, had suddeinly layde aside all the great preparacions which he had made to passe in person into Afryca where he menteyned continuall warres with the Moares: And hauing called home from thence Peter of Nauarre with three thowsand spanish footemen, he sent him to the Realme of Naples, both to thend to assure at one tyme his owne estates, and to giue courage to the Pope to be so much the more estraunged from the peace: In so much that by these encouragements conformable to his owne variable disposicion, the Pope made aunswer, that he would not heare of peace, onles the Venetians might be accorded with Cæsar: onles Alfonso d'Este, ouer and besides the first demaundes, made him satisfied of all the expenses which he had defrayed in the warre: And lastly, onles the king were bownde not to hinder him in the recouerie of Bolognia: which citie, as a rebell to the Church, he had already put vnder Ecclesiasticall interdiction: And, to make a spoyle of the corne of their contrey, he had sent into Romagnia Mar. Anth. Colonno and Ramassore, who notwithstanding were easily chassed by the people being skarcely entred into the frontyers: Notwithstanding this aunswer, the Pope, what by the peticions of the Cardinalls and for other priuat respects, assoone as he came to Rome, consented to the deliuerie of the Cardinall of Achx, hauing bene till that daye kept prisoner within the castell of S. Angeo: but to his libertie he ioyned this condicion, that he should not goe out of the pallaice of Vatican till all the Prelats and officers that were taken within Bolognia were sette at libertie, and afterwards that he shoulde departe from Rome vnder payne of fortye thowsande duckattes for the which he was to putte in sufficient sewertie: And yet not longe after he suffered him to returne into Fraunce with charge not to bee at the councell, vppon the lyke payne.

The Popes answer moued so much the more the mind of the king, by how much he was perswaded that he should consent to the condicions which he him selfe had offered: And therefore determining to withstande him in the recouerie of Bolognia he sent thether immediatly a new strength of foure hundred launces, and not long after, he tooke into his protection the citie with all the famulie of the Bentyuoleis without receiuing of him any couenant to minister eyther men or money: And knowing that thalliance of Cæsar was now more necessary to him then euer, in place where affore he bare some inclinacion not to giue him those supplies of men which he had promised him in the capitulacion made with the Bishop of Gurcy, so farre forth as he passed in person into Italy (that being the couenant and condicion of his promisse:) he gaue present order that from the Duchie of Myllan the bandes that had bene promised should marche thether vnder the gouernment of Monsr de la Paliſſa for that Tryuulce whome Cæsar had required, refused the iorney.

The fr. k takes Bolognia into his protection

By this tyme Cæsar was come to Yspruch, nourishing on the one side, a greate desire to make warre vppon the Venetians, and on the other side, he founde him selfe confused with many thoughtes and perplexities: for, considering that all that he should doe, would make vp no matter of substance if he tooke not Padoa, and to that enterprise were required so great forces and so mightye preparacions, as it was almost impossible to gather together: sometymes he suffered him selfe to be caried with a desire to agree with the Venetians, whereunto the kinge Catholike vrged him much, And sometymes he stoode ouerruled with his owne conceites, thinking to marche to Rome in person with his armie, to occupie according to his auncient desire all the estate of the Church: wherein he layed his plot to leade thether a mightie armie of Almains, besides the french companies: But what by his disabilities and by his disorders the execucion of thinges was so farre inferior to thimaginacion, that he consumed the tyme without putting any thinge to action, sometymes promising to come in person, and sometymes giuing a naked hope to sende men: By these vncerteinties it seemed greeuous to the king to take vpon him to susteine alone the whole burden of the warre: A reason, which, hauing conformetie with his nature being sparing and holding, could doe more in him for the most part, then the wise perswacions that many made to the contrary, that if Cæsar were not mightely succored by him, he would at last ioine with his enemies, by which it would happen, that besides his necessitie to be at a greater charge, yet his estates in Italy could not but fall into right manifest daungers: Amyd these dowtes and difficulties, the tumults of the temporall armes began to grow cold, but the fire of the spirituall armes kindled into greater flames, aswell on the part of the Cardinalls Authors of the councell, as on the Popes side, who labored altogether to oppresse such an euill affore it became greater.

You haue heard heretofore how the councell was denownced & signified vnder thauthoritie of the king of Romains and the french king, the voices of the Cardinalls of S. Croff, S. Mallo, Bayeux, & Cosenso being interposed, the Cardinall also of S. Seuerin consenting manifestly, and successiuely, the Proctors of both the one & other king did assist the councels and deliberacions that were made: Moreouer, and to giue it a greater authoritie, the fiue Cardinals, Authors of this pestilence, added by the way of intimacion the names of other Cardinals, of whom Cardinal Albert a french man durst not disobey the commaundements of his king, being innocent in all things saue in the compulsion that was vsed to him to subscribe his consent: And for the other Cardinals named by them, Cardinal Adrian and Cardinal Finalo, protested openly that the matter was wrought wholly without their priuitie & consent: So that more then six Cardinalls were not manifestly declared of this faction: whome, for that the Pope hoped to draw them to a voluntary renowncing of the matter, he enterteyned with them continuall practise, offering to pardon the errours that had bin committed, and that with such sewertie that they should not neede to feare any violence or displeasure to happen to them: whereunto the Cardinals gaue a dissembled eare, beleeuing the Popes promisses no further then they saw them confirmed with good meanes of their saueties: But the Pope could not for all this absteyne from most mighty and extreame remedies, In so much as following the councell of Antho. du Mont saint Sansouyn one of the Cardinalls of his last creacion at Rauenna, seeking to purge him selfe of negligence, assigned an vniuersall councell in the towne of Rome within the Churche of S. Iohn de Latran for the firste daye of Maye next comming: By which conuocacion he pretended that the councell called by his aduersaryes was broken, and that in that which he had published was iudicially conteyned the power and authoritie of all, notwithstanding that the Cardi-

nalls alleadged, that it was true in the beginning, yet seeing they had preuented it, the Councell that had bene instituted and called by them ought to haue place: The Councell beeing publiſhed, and the Pope reappoſing more then euer in his right, and withall diſpayring to be hable to reconcile the Cardinall of S. Croſſe, who through ambition to be Pope had bene in effect the mouer of this alteration: And likewiſe doubting to reclayme the Cardinalls S. Mallo and Coſenſa, for touching the others he was not without hope to reduce them to his obedience: he publiſhed agaynſt thoſe three a threatning monition vnder payne of priuation of the dignitie of Cardinall and all Churche rightes and benefites, if within threeſcore and fiue dayes they made not their apparaunce affore him: And the better to diſpoſe them to the Popes wyll, the Colleage of Cardinalls ſent to them an Auditor de la Rote to perſwade and pray them, that leauing their priuate contentions, they ſhoulde eftſones returne into the vnion of the Churche, offring to giue them ſuche forme of ſecuritie as they deſired.

In this time alſo the Pope, eyther for that he was irreſolute, or laboured with ſome other paſſion of worſe nature, harkned continually after the practiſe of peace with the French king, the which was ſolicited in his owne Court by the kings Embaſſadors, and in the Frenche Court by thembaſſador of Scotlande and the Biſhop of Tyuoli the Nuncio Apoſtolike: And on the other ſide he laboured to make with the king of Aragon and the Venetians a newe confederation againſt the Frenchmen, making all thinges lawfull and ſeemely that he ſuppoſed mighte turne to the aduauntage of his affayres. About this time alſo, the Pope ſought to render Montpulcian to the Florentins, not for any good he wiſhed to them, but for feare leaſt the truce which they had with Sienna beeing expired, they woulde call into Tuskane the French bandes to thende to haue a greater ſtrength to recouer that towne. And albeit it was greeuous to the Pope that the Florentins ſhoulde recouer Montpulcian, and that to hinder them he had already ſent to Sienna Iohn Vitelli enterteined with an hundred men at armes by the Siennois, and Guido Vaino with an hundred lighte horſemen leauyed and payed by him: yet afterwardes conſidering better, that by howmuche the difficultie appeared great, by ſo muche more would the Florentins be induced to call them, he determined, to thende to take from the king all occaſions to ſende armed bandes into a place ſo neare Rome, to prouide for this daunger by a way contrarie, Pandolffe Petruccio conſenting to it, whom the Florentins nouriſhed artificially in the ſame ſuſpicion. The matter was debated many dayes, for that (ſmall things oftentimes haue no leſſe difficulties, nor are no leſſe harde to be reſolued, then ſuche as be of a greater nature) Pandolffe to auoyde the hatred of the people of Sienna, would the proceeding ſhould be ſuch, that it might ſeeme there was no other remedie to aſſure him from the warre, and not to alienate the Popes mind. Moreouer the Pope & he would that at the ſame time ſhould be made betwene the Florentins and the Siennois a confederation for the defence of their eſtates: And yet they feared on the other ſide, that they of Montpulcian eſpying what was ment and practiſed, would not preuent them in rendring them ſelues voluntarily, winning by that meane the fauour of the Florentins, who atchieuing their intention, might afterwardes refuſe to make the confederation. For this cauſe Iohn Vitelli was ſent to remayne within Montpulcian, and the Pope ſent thither Iames Simoner auditor de la rote called certayn yeares after to be Cardinal, to thēd that by his working, thaffaires of Montpulcian might be raunged and brought to conformitie: In the ende, there was made at one time, a confederation for xxv. yeres, betweene the Florentins and the Siennois: And Montpulcian returned into the hands of the Florentins, Simonet interposing for the pardon and confirmation of the auncient exemptions and priuileages.

For certayne monethes, the warre and actions of hostilitie were more easie and tollerable betweene the king of Romains and the Venetians, then had wont to be: for that the Almains beeing neither strong in men, nor prouided of money, thought they did a seruice of no small importance, if they kept Verona. And the Venetian armie wanting sufficient forces to take that Citie, were retyred betweene Soaue and Louigno, from whence they made a sally one night and burnt both on this side and beyonde the ryuer of Adice a great quantitie of the fruites of thinhabitantes of Verona, loasing notwithstanding in the action, three hundred footmen as they retyred, the greatnes of their pray giuing impedimentes to their vallour for the defence of their proper lyues: But assoone as they heard that Monsr Palissa was comming to Verona with twelue hundred launces and eight thousande footmen, their armie retyred betweene Vincensa and Leguaguo into a place of strength, bearing almoste the forme and situation of an Ilande by reason of certayne waters and trenches that had bene there cut vp: Neuertheless they tarried not in this place many dayes, for that Monsr Palissa arriuing at Verona with a great parte of his armie, and without exspecting the residue taking the fielde presently together with the Almains, they retyred almost in flying to Louigne, and afterwards with the same feare abandoning Vincensa and all the other townes together with Polisena Rouisne, which sometimes was pillaged by the Venetians, and sometimes prayed by the Duke of Ferrara, they withdrew to Padoa and Treuisa, their feare enforcing them to followe those meanes for safetie and refuge, which were not so conuenient for their honour and reputation. For the better defence of these cities, many of the youth & nobilitie of Venice came thither with minds resolued to share and cõmunicate with the fortunes of those two cities: holding it a iust office in Citizens & contrey men to oppose their liues against the perills and iniuries done to their contrey. The armie of the French and Almains sacked Louigne: And Vincensa whiche was become a miserable pray to those that were the strongest in the fielde, rendred it selfe. But all these enterprises & conquests were of small consequence for the substaunce of the warre, so farreforth as the Venetians helde Padoa and Treuisa: for that by the oportunitie of those Cities assoone as the Frenche succours were deuided from th Almains, they reconquered without difficultie, the peeces they had lost: by reason whereof, after these proceedings and aduauncements, the armie stayed many dayes at the bridge of Barberano, exspecting there eyther the arriuall or the resolution of Cæsar, who beeing come betwene Trent and Rouiero, deuising at one time howe to followe his pleasures in hunting wylde beastes according to his custome, and to sende bandes of footmen to tharmie, promised to come to Montagnana, sometimes pretending to embrace thenterprise of Padoa, sometimes to execute vpon Treuisa, and sometimes to go take Rome, casting in his minde those plottes and deuises of enterprise, wherevnto his naturall mutabilitie would suffer him to giue no action. But besides his disposition frayle and variable, and which had not lesse communitie with any thing then with constancie and resolution, he founde difficulties in these actions for his extreme pouertie and want, and no lesse in the attempt of Rome then in the other enterprises: for that to marche thither with those forces of the Frenche, seemed to him an action both agaynst his dignitie and suretie: and the feare least in the absence of that armie, the Venetians would assayle Verona, compelled him to leaue there a strong garrison: Besides the

French king made difficultie to seperate his people from the duchie of Millan by so great a distance and space of countreys, for the small hope he had to haue accorde with the Svvizzers: who besides thinclinations they expressed to the desires of the Pope, spake openly to thembassador of the French king, that the peoples of their Nation were not a little greeued with the ruines of the Venetians for the communitie that their common weales had together. At laste the plottes, conceptions, and great discourses of Cæsar came, according to his custome, to resolue into effectes vnworthy his reputation: for that on the one side, hauing increased tharmie wyth three hundred men at armes Almains, and on the other side, giuen familiar audience to the Venetian Embassadors with whom he debated continually, and had caused Monsr Palissa to come first to Lungaro neare Vincensa, and afterwards to S.Crosse, he solicited him to go take Newcastell, whiche is a passage belowe Escalo drawing to Friull, within twentie myles of Feltre, and all to make his discending more easie on that side. By this direction Monsr Palissa marched to Montbellono tenne myles from Treuisa, from whence, hauing sent fiue hundred horsemen and two thousand footmen to open the passage of Newcastell, they went to Escalo. About which tyme the light horsemen of the Venetians who ouerranne all the countrey without impediment, ouerthrew neare to Morostiqua, about seuen hundred footmen and many horsmen both Frenche and Italian: who, to passe in suretie where the armie was, went from Verona to Soaue, to ioyne with three hundred French launces, who being come after Monsr Palissa, exspected in that place his direction. And albeit in the beginning, things succeeded well with the Frenchmen and Almains, and that Count Guido Rangon leader of the Venetians was taken, his fortune beeing farre inferiour to his vallour: yet many paysantes descending in fauour of the Venetians, and many occasions rysing to their aduauntage, they remayned in the ende victorious, foure hundred of the French footemen beeing left dead, and their capteines Mangiron and Chemaro deteined prisoners: Suche is the ordinarie variation of warre, and such the naturall infirmitie of humaine causes, not certayne in their owne condition, but subiected to those endes wherevnto they haue bene ordeined from the beginning. The resolutions which before had beene debated and set downe, grewe more and more to declining and diminution, both for that the French king seing the preparations of Cæsar aunswered nothing his promises and offers, to thende he would drawe further off from Italie, returned from Dauphine where he had remayned many dayes, to Bloys: And also Cæsar, beeing nowe retyred from Trent with a minde to go no more to tharmie in place to reconquer all that the Venetians held in the firme lande, or to impatronise himselfe vpon Rome and the whole estate ecclesiastike, gaue direction that the Almains should enter into Friull and vpon the peeces of Treuisan, not so muche to vexe the Venetians, as to constrayne the townes of the countrey to giue him money to preserue them from sacke and pillage. And to thende his people should not be hindred, he appoynted the Frenche men to passe further, bestowing two hundred launces within Verona where the plague raged with great daunger: His reason in this appoyntment was, for that (hauing an intention to assayle Friull) there could not be assigned to that seruice other of his bands, then suche as were reserued for the garde of the Castells. Palissa consented to all these appoyntmentes, with whome beeing ioyned Monsr d'Aubigni capteine of three hundred launces which were at Soaue, he went and incamped vpon the ryuer of Piaua: Besides this, for a greater suretie of Verona, the Almains left two hundred horsemen within Soaue, who lying there in great disorder and negligence, vsing neither watche nor warde, ſuffred a ſmarting payne of their ſecuritie, beeing one night almoſte all ſlayne or taken by foure hundred light horſemen and foure hundred footemen of the Venetians. During all this yere there fell diuerſe ordinarie accidents and ſtirres in the countrey of Friull, in Iſtria, and in the quarters of Trieſte and Fiume, ſometime by lande with incurſions and inuaſions, and ſometimes by ſea with little veſſells, thoſe wretched countreis enduring afflictions and calamities by both the armies, ſometimes ioyntly, and ſometimes ſeuerally. Afterwards the armie of the Almains entred into Friull, and aſſoone as they made their approches before Vdina the principall place of that prouince, and where the Venetian Magiſtrates make their reſidencie: the ſayde Magiſtrates preferring feare before honor, fledde with that cowardiſe whiche makes men of ſeruice diſhonored: by whoſe feares not onely the towne was yeelded, but alſo by one courſe of victorie all the countrey of Friull did the like, euery towne being taxed to a proportion of money according to their habilities: There remayned onely Gradiſquo ſituated vpon the ryuer of Liſonce, wherein was Lovvis Moſſenigno treaſorer of Friull with three hundred horſemen, and many bandes of footemen: This was no ſooner viſited by thartillerie, and onely made defence agaynſt the firſt aſſault, but it was yeelded vp by thimportunitie of the ſouldiours, the treaſorer remayning priſoner. From Friull the Almains returned to ioyne with Monſr Paliſſa incamping within fiue myles of Treuiſa, to whiche Citie they made their approches altogether, Cæſar making great requeſt that they would aſſay to take it: But finding it well fortified on all ſides, and wanting in them ſelues both the ſeruice of pioners, munitions, with other prouiſions neceſſarie, they retyred, their wantes taking away their hope and poſſibilitie of good ſucceſſe. A little after, Paliſſa by the kings direction, departed to returne to the Duchie of Millan, for that feare of newe confederations and conſpiracies of the Svvizzers, encreaſed continually: In retyring he had alwayes at his backe the Venetian eſtradiots, who albeit hoped to diſtreſſe him at the leaſt at the paſſage of the ryuers of Brent and Adice, yet his vallour made his paſſage aſſured, & committed to ſpoyle two hundred horſmen of the Venetians which were incamped without Padoa, of whō Peter de Lungaro their capteyne remained priſoner: his departing left the Almains not a little confuſed, for that not obteining that three hundred other French launces ſhould remayne for the garde of Verona, they were conſtrayned to retyre thither, leauing in pray to thenemies all that they had gayned that ſommer. By which occaſion the Venetian armie whereof Iohn Paule Baillon was gouernour by the death of Luke Maluazzo, recouered immediatly Vincenſa: and entring afterwards into Friull, they raſed Cremonſa, and recouered the whole countrey, except Gradiſqua which they knewe they coulde not take, notwithſtanding a fewe dayes after certayne bands of footemen leauied in the countrey of Tyroll, tooke Codora, and ſacked in like ſort Bellona.

The Venetiās recouer Friul.

In this ſort, with light effects, were determined (for the preſent ſommer) the actions & enterpriſes of armes, with leſſe profit then ignominie to the name of Cæſar, but with ſpeciall reputation to the Venetians, who by the ſpace of two yeres, inuaded by the armies of Cæſar & the French king, came at laſt to reteine their owne forces & their owne iuriſdiction: Matters which albeit were directly agaynſt Cæſar, yet they brought much more harmes to the French king: for, whileſt he did not miniſter to Cæſar ſuch proportions of ſuccors as might make him hable to obtaine the victorie deſired, eyther fearing happly the two great proſperitie and greatnes of Cæſar, or being carried with falſe counſels and fundations, and leſſe looking into the daungers that were at hande, or happly wiſdome beeing blinded with couetouſneſſe: he gaue

him occasion, yea he brought him almoste into necessitie to open his eares to such as ceassed not to perswade him to separation from him, preseruing at one tyme the Venetians in suche estate that they were hable with greater forces to knit with those that desired to embase his power: In so muche that men began euen nowe to discerne that both in the minde of Cæsar, newe thoughts began to kindle, specially for the regarde of the councell, and also his plottes and deuises were abated, chiefly since the publication of the councell of Latran: for neither did he sende thither according to his many promises any Almain prelates in the name of Germanie, nor any proctors to assist in his name: neither did he once stirre for the example of the French king, who had giuen order that in the common name of the French churches, foure and twentie Bishops should go to Pisa, and all the other Prelates of his Realme should eyther go thither in person, or else refurnishe the action by assistance and deputation: yet neuertheless, eyther to excuse these delayes, or that such was his desire in deede, he began in that time to make instance, that aswell for a greater cõmoditie of the Prelates of Germanie, as for that he promised to be there in person, the Councell that had bene denounced at Pisa, might be transferred to Mantua, to Verona, or to Trente. This demaunde was greeuous to all the others for many causes, and onely aggreable to the Cardinall of S. Crosse, who burning in glorious ambition to mount vp to the Popedome (to whiche ende he had sowen all those discords) hoped that with the fauour & countenance of Cæsar, he might easily be rayssed to that seate: Notwithstanding for that the cause of the Councell would stande much weakned & almost frustrate without thauthoritie of Cæsar, they sent by common consent the Cardinall of S. Seuerin, both to beseech him that he would sende away the Prelates and Proctors which he had so often promised, and also to giue him fayth on their behalfe, that assoone as they had giuen beginning to the Councell at Pisa, they would transferre it to the place whiche he shoulde thinke good: which (say they) if we should do afore, it coulde not but be very preiudiciall to the common cause, specially it importing greatly to preuent the Conuocation whiche the Pope had published: Galeas the brother of S. Seuerin, whom with a felicitie farre different from thinfelicitie of Lodovvike Sforce his first Lord, the king had honored with the office of the Maister of his horse, went also in this expedition to make the same instance to Cæsar on the kings behalfe: But the king sent him principally of purpose to confirme with newe offers and plottes, the minde of Cæsar, for whose inconstancie he lyued in no little doubt and suspicion, notwithstanding at the same time he was not without hope to conclude the peace with the Pope. That peace, beeing disputed at Rome by the Cardinall of Nantes, and by the Cardinall of Strigonia, and prosecuted in Fraunce by the Scottishe Bishop and the Bishop of Tiuoly, was drawne into suche tearmes, that almoste all the conditions beeing accorded, the Pope had eftsoones ioyned to the Bishop of Tiuoli a further power to giue it full perfection: neuertheless there were inserted in this newe power, certayne limitations, which gaue no small occasion to men to thinke that his will and intention were farre otherwise then were his wordes and protestations, specially for that it was discerned, that at the same time he had to do with many potentates in matters altogether contrarie to this, not sparing to embrace all occasions & opportunities, though they brought with them matter of yll opinion and murmure.

In this great doubt and suspicion of things, there lacked not muche that an accident falling vpon the Popes person, brake not all the practises and beginnings of euilles that laye in preparation: for falling into a newe fitte of his sickneesse the xvij.

of Auguſt, the fourth day after, there tooke him ſuche a qualme, that for certayne houres ſuche as were about him, helde him for dead: And the brute beeing no leſſe quicke, then the accident was mortall, many of the Cardinalles that were abſent put thē ſelues vpon the way to come to Rome,, together alſo with ſome of thoſe that had conuocated the Councell: Within Rome the people made no leſſe ſtirre and mouings. then they haue bene wont to do at the death of Popes, yea there appeared ſignes and tokens of farre greater tumultes, for that Pompey Colonno Biſhop of Reato, and Anthony Sauello, young men of the Romaine nobilitie full of ſedition and faction, aſſembling the commons in the Capitall, perſwaded them with words ſedicious to put them ſelues in libertie: But during the action, and as they laboured with a very vehement ambition, to ſtirre vp the people of Rome to publike rebellion, the Pope reuyued from his daungerous qualme: and albeit there was as yet greater feare then hope of his lyfe, yet, the day following, in the preſence of the Cardinalls whiche were aſſembled in forme of a Conſiſtorie, he gaue abſolution to his nephew of the murder he had committed vpon the Cardinall of Pauia, not by ordinarie way of iuſtice as he had bene aduiſed before, (the ſhortnes of the tyme impugning) but by grace and apoſtolike remiſſion, as to a perſon penitent. In the ſame Conſiſtorie he ſolicited that thelection of his ſucceſſor ſhoulde be made Cannonically: And ſeeking to barre others from clymbing to ſo highe a degree, by the meanes which rayſed him to it, he cauſed to be publiſhed a Bull full of horrible paynes agaynſt thoſe that ſhould aſpire to that election eyther by money or by other recompence, bothe declaring as nothing all election that ſhoulde be made by ſymonie, and giuing an entry and meane very eaſie to any Cardinall to impugne it. This conſtitution he had pronounced from the tyme he was within Bologna, ſtanding then diſcontented with certayne Cardinalls who laboured openly to purchaſe the promiſes of other Cardinalls to poſſeſſe the Papacie after his death. He began nowe to growe better and better, eyther by his ſtrong and hable complexion, or els for that by deſtinie he was reſerued to be the author and principall occaſion of more great and long calamities: for it was not reaſonable to attribute the recouerie of his helth to the vertue or remedie of medicines, for that he obeyed neither rule nor order, eating in the greateſt perill of his maladie, rawe apples and things contrarie to the preſcription of Phiſicke.

The Pope was no ſooner deliuered from daunger of death, then he returned eftſones to his olde deuiſes and cogitations, continuing at one time to ſolicite a peace with the Frenche king, and a confederation with the king of Aragon and the Senate of Venice agaynſt the Frenchmen: ſuche was his deſire to chaſe out of Italie all dominion and imperie of the Frenche. And albeit his will was more inclined to warre then to peace, yet he ſeemed oftentimes drawen with varietie of fancies, and for many reaſons followed ſometimes one opinion, and ſometimes an other, not beeing hable to ſettle in minde and iudgement, hauing his thoughts wandring and reaching to endes farre aboue his power. The thing that carried his inclination to the warre, beſides his auncient hatred agaynſt the Frenche, and that he was not hable to obteine all the conditions of peace which he deſired, were the vehement and importunate perſwaſions of the king of Aragon, who feared nowe more then euer, leaſt the French king beeing once at peace with the Pope, would not execute vppon the realme of Naples vppon the firſt occaſion: Wherein to thende his counſells might carrie a greater authoritie, beſides the armie at ſea which was affore repaſſed out of Affrika into Italie vnder Peter Nauarre, he had ſent newly out of Spayne an other ſea armie armie conteyning fiue hundred men at armes, six hundred horsmen mounted vpon iennets, and three thousand footmen: Neuertheles this king proceeding vnderhand with his accustomed subtelties, made show that he desired more then euer the warre agaynst the Moores, from which his owne profire or particuler interest did not draw him, but onely a holy deuotion which he had alwayes borne to the sea Apostolike: onely he alleaged that beeing not hable of him selfe to interteine his souldiours, it was necessarie that the Pope and the state of Venice shoulde minister to him, wherevnto, to thende they might condiscende more easily, his bands that were all descended into the yle of Capri neare to Naples, made showes as though they prepared to passe into Affrika: But his immoderate demaundes muche amasing the Pope, and his suttleties pleasing him nothing at all, he entred into many suspicions, well knowing that that king ceassed not to giue to the Frenche king hopes all contrarie: he knewe the Venetians would not willingly be drawne from his will and purposes: euen so he was not ignoraunt that for the greatnes of suche a warre wherein they were, they were no longer hable to beare out the burden and charges as before: And that time had brought the Senate nowe to seeke more to defende their owne, then to take in hande a newe warre which could not be continued without intollerable exspences: He hoped that the Svvizzers, by a common inclination of those contreimen, would declare them selues agaynst the Frenche king, but hauing no certentie thereof, he seemed to holde it vndiscrete to oppose him selfe to so great daungers for a hope so yll assured, not beeing ignorant that as yet were not reiected and cut off their practises with the Frenche king, and many of their chieftaines and principalls, to whome reuerted not small profites by the Frenche amities, labored all they might that in thassembly which was presently to be holden, their alliance might be renewed with the kinge. Touching the will and intention of Cæsar, notwithstanding he had many inclinations by the king Catholik, & of his owne nature a sworne enemie to the Frenche name, yet his hope of him was lesse then his feare, knowing the great offers that were made to him of new aswell against the Venetians as against him, to the which the French king was hable to giue more high state and perfection then to any others that could be made to him: he sawe that if Cæsar shoulde ioyne with the Frenche king, he had greatly to feare the counsell by reason of his authoritie: And also his owne power ioyned in good fayth and meaning, with the forces and treasures of the Crowne of Fraunce, and with thopportunitie of the states of them both, the Pope coulde not in reason haue any hope of the victorie which he founde very harde to obteine agaynst the Frenche king alone: But that whiche gaue him the greatest stomacke, was a hope he had that the king of Englande would be wonne to rayse warre agaynst the Crowne of Fraunce, both by the counsels and perswasions of the king Catholike his father in lawe, and for thauthoritie of the sea Apostolike which was then great in the yle of Englande, and in whose name he had with vehement petitions implored his succors against the french king as agaynst an vsurper & oppressor of the Church: to these inducements was ioyned also the naturall hatred aswell of that king as of the people of England to the french nation, much helping in this action the forwardnes of the kings youth & great abundance of treasor left to him by his father, which was supposed to amount to a wōderful quantity. These were proper instrumēts to kindle fire in the mind of this yong king, & hauing neuer experiēced in his kingdom but fortunes happy & plausible: he was also pushed forward by an honorable desire to renew the glory of his aunceſtors, who intituling them selues kings of Fraunce, and at sundry times vexing that kingdome with great warres, had not onely holden for many yeres Guyenne and Normandy (rich & mighty prouinces of that crowne,) and taken in a battell neare to Poyeters the Frenche king with two of his sonnes and many of his Nobilitie: but also, had occupied together with the moste part of the kingdome the citie of Paris the capitall citie of the kingdome: lastly their vallours and fortunes haue bin so terrible to the Frenchmen, that if Henry the fift then king of Englande had not exchaunged this life in the flower of his age and glorious course of his victories, it was beleeued he had made an absolute conqueſt of the whole realme of Fraunce, and brought subiected to him selfe the Crowne and imperie of that nation. The memorie of these honorable victories working with the youth and disposition of the king, were not of little force to draw him to action, notwithstanding his father vppon his dying had expresly aduised him aboue all other things to enterteine peace with the Frenche nation as the onely meane for the kinges of Englande to raigne surely and hapeply. It was not to bee doubted but the warre of thEnglishe agaynst the Frenche king (beeing also assayled in other places) was of right great consequence, for that in that action the very intralls of the kingdome were charged, the Frenchemen redoubting muche the name of thEnglishe by the memorie of victories and conqueſtes passed. Notwithstanding all these, the Pope for thincerteintie of the fayth of straungers, and for the farre distaunce of those contreys so farre remoued, coulde nor establishe or reappose his counsayles vppon those fauours. These were the hopes of the Pope, and thus were they limited and layed out in condition and proportion.

The thoughts of the fr. king.

On the other side the Frenche king, to whom nothing was lesse pleasing then to be in warre agaynst the Churche, was greatly desirous to haue peace, by meane whereof as he was to shake of the yll will of the Pope, so also he was to be deliuered of thimportunate demaunds and necessities of Cæsar: two respects which troubled him not a litle, the one offending his conscience being to muche addicted, and the other consuming his treasors whereof he had made many prodigalities: he made no difficultie to breake the Councell of Pisa, whiche he had introduced onely to make the Pope condiscende to peace by that feare, so farrefoorth as there might be pardon and remission to the Cardinalls and others that had bene partakers eyther in councell or in action: But on the contrarie, the demaunde for the restoring of Bolognia kepte hym in suspence: a Citie by reason of his situation, most conuenient to molest him: he feared the peace was not sincerely accepted by the Pope, nor with a minde disposed to obserue it if occasions returned, but only to deliuer himselfe presently from the daunger of the Councell and from the warre of whose succesſe he had no small ielousie. And yet he hoped to confirme the mind of Cæsar, with the greatnes of his offers, and therefore negociating of common occurrantes as with a confederate, he perswaded him vehemently amonges other things not to consent that Bolognia a Citie of so great importaunce, should eftsones retourne vnder the iurisdiction of the Pope: And touching the kinges of Aragon and of Englande, he did not together distruste them, notwithstanding the manner of proceeding of the one was already manyfest, and the brute of thintention of the other no lesse publike and generall: And notwithstanding their Embassadors ioyntly had perswaded him, first with words of modestie bearing a pretẽce of office and amitie, & afterwards pressed him with importunities to cõmaund that both the cardinalls & prelates of his kingdome should be at the councell of Latran, and also to suffer and see that the Churche were eftsones repossessed of the Citie of Bolognia one of her members not in the least degree. The reason of this confidence touching thEngliſh was,that they made ſhow to haue deſire to perſeuer in the confederation which they had with him and many of his counſell,giuing him ſurety of the ſame,he beleued they would attempt nothing againſt him: And for the king of Aragon,his ſleights & ſuttel apparances were ſuch, that the king gaue a leſſe faith to his doings then to his ſpeeches,wherin he alwayes aſſured him neuer to enter into action of armes againſt him: with which opinion,he ſuffred himſelfe ſomewhat to be perſwaded,that that king would neuer ioyne in armes ſo manifeſtly with his enemies,as he profeſſed by his counſels & ſecret deliberations: he beguiled him ſelf ſo much in theſe opinions, that notwithſtāding he had hope giuen by thoſe that were of his faction in Svvizzerlande, that he might yet reconcile that nation if he would conſent to their demaunds for increaſing their penſions,yet he eftſones refuſed it with no leſſe obſtinacy then before,alleaging that it were no equity to yeld him ſelf to be taxed by thē: And vſing ſharp remedies,where eaſie meanes had bin more neceſſary,he made reſtraint that they ſhould haue no releeſe of vittels out of the duchie of Millan, thinking that by their vniuerſall ſcarceties redoubled by rhe ſterrilitie of their contrey, he ſhould in thende bring them to agree to the renouation of thalliance according to the auncient conditions.

Ouerture of the Councell of Piſa.

By this time was come the firſt day of September which had bin afore ſet downe for the beginning of the councell of Piſa,at which day the Proctors of the Cardinals being come to Piſa,celebrated in their names the actes apperteining to thexpreſſing of the ſame. At this the Pope did not a litle ſtorme, ſpecially againſt the Florentins, for that they had conſented that the Councell of Deuills (for ſo did he alwayes call it) tooke beginning vpon their eſtates, for which tranſgreſſion he declared that the cities of Florence and Piſa ſtoode ſubiect to thinterdiction eccleſiaſtike by vertue of the Bull of the Councell which he had cauſed to be publiſhed: wherein it was ſet downe in an expreſſe article, that whoſoeuer he were that fauored the diueliſhe aſſembly at Piſa, ſtoode excommunicated, interdicted, and ſubiect to all paynes ſeuerely ordayned by the lawes agaynſt ſchiſmatikes and heretikes: And threatning to inuade them with armes,he elected the Cardinall of Medicis, Legate of Perouſa: And not long after,the cardinall Regina Legat of Bolognia beeing dead, he beſtowed him in his place,to thend that he who enuied their eſtate being vpon their marches with ſo great authority,his preſence might make them fall amongſt themſelues into ſuſpicion & confuſion: a thing which he hoped might eaſily ſuccede for theſtate & reputation wherein he ſtoode at that time in that citie: for,beſides the affections of certaine particulars deſiring the returne of the Medicis, diſcordes and diuiſions (the auncient maladie of that citie) raigned amongſt the generall number of Citizens of greateſt apparance. Theſe diuiſions bred at that time by the greatnes and authoritie of the Magiſtrate whiche they call Confalonnier,which ſome for ambition and enuie could not ſuffer, and others ſtoode yll contented, for that iudging him to intrude more into the deliberation of thinges then apperteined to his place, they thought he left not to them that parte of authoritie which their eſtates and conditions deſerued: They complayned that in the gouernment of the Citie ordeyned and conteined in two extremities,that is to ſay,the publike magiſtrate & the counſell popular,was manifeſt error touching the true inſtitution of cōmon weales: for a ſenat duly ordeined,by the which beſides that it ſhould be as a reaſonable tēperature betwene the one & other extremity,the principalls & beſt qualified citizens ſhould obteine in the cōmon weale a degree more honorable: But the Gonfalonnier did the contrary,either by ambition,or by vaine ſuſpiciō, being notwithſtāding principally choſen for the redreſſe & order of that. The thing which they deſired in this action notwithſtanding it was reaſonable, and yet not of that importaunce as to turne their mindes to diuiſions, for that without it they were both honorably rayſed & aduanced, and withall there was no forme of diſpoſing of the publike affaires without thē, was the very originall and principall cauſe of the great calamities which fell afterwards vpon that citie: The factions & diuiſions amōgſt the citizens, being grounded therevpon, and thenemies of the Gonfalonnier ſuſpecting him with the Cardinall of Volterre his brother to be at the deuotion of the French king, and to reappoſe altogether in his amitie: oppoſed as muche as they could agaynſt the deliberations that were to be made in fauour of that king, deſiring that all might be transferred to the Pope. By this alſo it came to paſſe, that the name of the familie of Medicis beganne to be leſſe hatefull in that Citie then before, for that thoſe chiefeſt and mightieſt Citizens who earſt denyed their returne, were nowe no more concurrant to perſecute them, and muche leſſe to hinder the communitie and conuerſation of others with them: The malice they bare to the Gonfalōnier wrought this alteration & change of their affection, and the more to abate his authoritie, they ſtucke not to expreſſe by many tokens, how little that familie was eſtraunged from their fauour and amitie, not forbearing alſo to giue ſhadowe to others to deſire their returne and greatneſſe: And of this it happned that not onely thoſe that were their aſſured and perfect friendes (in whom was no great power) entred into hopes of innouation and newe thinges, but alſo many of the Nobilitie and youth of the Citie, puſhed on eyther by their great prodigalities and exſpences, or by certayne particular diſdaynes, or at leaſt by ambicious deſires to ſurpaſſe others in dignities, exſpected a mutation of that eſtate by the meane of their returning (that diſpoſition hauing bin noriſhed and encreaſed many yeares by the Cardinall Medicis with great ſleight and ſubteltie:) for euer ſince the death of his brother Peter whoſe name was both feared and hated, he had made no ſhow to entermeddle in thaffaires of Florence, nor to haue any deſire to aſpire to the auncient greatneſſe of his familie: And to omitte no office which might eyther make him merite the more, or inſinuate further, he forgate not with great humanitie and fauours to welcome and receiue all the ſeuerall people of Florence that had recourſe to Rome, offring himſelfe a ready inſtrument for the diſpatche of their affayres, wherein diſpoſing his fauour no leſſe to ſuche that had bene manyfeſt enemies agaynſt his brother, then to others whom he helde indifferent, he vſed in his behauiour and ſpeache to laye all the fault vpon his brother, as though the faultes with the memorie and hate thereof, were determined together with his death. This forme and manner of behauior he continued many yeares, which accompanied with the opinion that went of him in the Court of Rome to be by diſpoſition liberall, affable, and gracious to all men, brought hym in the ende to bee acceptable to many at Florence: In whiche reſpect the Pope that deſired not a little thalteration of that gouernment, preferred him with great foreſight to that legation.

The Florentins appealed from thinterdiction, and to commit the leſſe offence in thappellation, they called it not the councell of Piſa, but named it the ſacred councell of the Churche vniuerſall: And as though by thappellation theffect of thinterdiction had bene ſuſpended, the prieſtes of the foure principall Churches were cōpelled by commaundement of the ſupreme Magiſtrate to make publike celebration of all diuine offices, the ſame diſcloſing more and more the diuiſion of the Citizens, and left in the diſcreſſion of euery one either to obſerue or contemne thinterdict: for this this reaſon, thembaſſadors of the kings of Englande and Aragon made new inſtance to the french king, offring him peace with the Pope, ſo farreforth as he would ſee Bologna rendred to the Church, and that the Cardinalls might make a preſence at the Councell of Latran, when they offred that the Pope ſhould receiue them all to pardon. But the regard and conſideration of Bologna holding him from conſenting to the peace, he made anſwer, that as he did not defend a citie in contumacie and rebellion againſt the Church, vnder whoſe iuriſdiction & obedience it was gouerned in the ſame forme and eſtate of policie wherin it had bin ruled many yeres afore the pontificacy of Iulius, to whom it belonged not to demaund a greater authoritie then had bin required & practiſed by his predeceſſors: ſo alſo touching the Councell of Piſa, it had bin introduced in a moſt honorable and holy purpoſe to reforme the notorious & intollerable diſorders of the Church, wherevnto would be eaſily reduced her auncient vertue & brightnes, and that without perill of ſchiſme or diuiſion, if the Pope would agree to aſſiſt that councell, the reaſon being no leſſe iuſt, then the action conuenient for him managing the ſupreme place: he added laſtly that his vnquietnes together with his inflamed minde addicted to warres and troubles, had chiefly induced him to binde himſelfe to the protection of Bologna, whiche for his honor he would defende with no leſſe care and ſtudie, then he would ſee to the protection of his towne of Paris. The Pope then ſhakinge of all his cogitations and thoughts to the peace, no leſſe for his auncient hatreds and couetouſnes, then for feare of the councel & his deſire to Bologna, and finally ſuſpecting, that if he deferred any lõger to deliberat & reſolue, he ſhould be left abãdoned of euery one, the ſpaniſh ſouldiers beginning now to ẽbarke at Carpy making as though they would paſſe into Affrika: he determined to finiſh the cõfederation negociated with the king Catholike & the ſenat of Venice, which was ſolemnly publiſhed the fifth of October in the Church of S. Maria de populo, the Pope and all the Cardinalls aſſiſting. This confederation bare that they ſhoulde principally preſerue the vnitie of the Churche, and the better to defende her from preſent ſchiſme, to reuerſe and diſſolue the aſſembly of Piſa: To recouer the Citie of Bologna apperteining immediately to the ſea Apoſtolike, together with all other peeces and places whiche directly or indirectly belonged to the Churche, Ferrara beeing comprehended vnder that ſence: That agaynſt all ſuche that ſhoulde oppoſe agaynſt any of theſe thinges, or labour to throwe any impedimentes (theſe wordes ſignified the Frenche king) they ſhoulde proceede to chaſe them out of Italie with a mightie armie, wherein the Pope was to mayntaine foure hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen: The Senat of Venice ſhould furniſh eight hũdred men at armes, a thouſande light horſemen, and eight thouſand footmen: And to the king of Aragon were allotted twelue hundred men at armes, a thouſande light horſemen, and tenne thouſand footemen, for the interteinment of whome the Pope ſhoulde paye during the warre eight thouſande duckettes euery moneth, and the Venetians as much, furniſhing preſently a paye for two monethes, within which time they were bound to march into Romagnia or to other place where the confederates ſhould be: That the king of Aragon ſhould arme twelue gallies, and the Venetians fourteene, whiche at the ſame time ſhould make warre vpon the Frenche king in Lombardie: That Dom Raimond of Cardona then Viceroy in the realme of Naples, ſhoulde be capteine generall of tharmie: That if in this warre there were conquered any townes in Lombardy which had bene the Venetians, that in that caſe ſhoulde be obſerued the declaration of the Pope, who forthwith in a writing apart & ſeueral, pronoũced that they ſhould be rendred to the Venetians: There was reſerued for Cæſar liberty to enter into the confederation, and likewiſe to the king of Englande, bearing to the one an vncertayne hope to be hable in the ende to ſeperate him from the french king: and for the other was left a tyme by the expreſſe conſent of the Cardinall of Yorke, who did alwayes aſſiſt and communicate in the treatiſe of the league. As this confederation was fully reſolued & eſtabliſhed, Ierome Donato the Venetian embaſſador died, who for his ſinguler wiſdome and habilitie being very deare to the Pope, had in this action & other affaires during his legation, done many great ſeruices to his contrey.

Thopinion that vvas conceiued of the league.

This confederation made by the Pope vnder cooller to deliuer Italy from the imperie of ſtraungers, drew the mindes of men to diuerſe interpretations according to the diuerſitie of their iudgements & paſſions: for many, beguiled with the reſpect & magnificence of the title, ſet out with great merites & prayſes ſo diuine and high an enterpriſe: ſayde it was an action right worthye the maieſtie of his place, and that the greatnes of his minde could not haue choſen an enterpriſe more gracious, nor leſſe full of diſcreſſion then of magnanimitie, ſtirring vp by his induſtry one ſtranger againſt an other: In ſuch ſort that the blood of forreiners more then of naturall Italians being ſpilt vpon the French men, not only the liues of Italians were ſpared and reſerued, but alſo after one of the parties ſhould be expulſed, it would be eaſie with the naturall armies of the countrey to chaſe out the other beeing already weakened and out of breath: Others on the other ſide, in whō perhaps were ſetled more depe impreſſions & conſiderations of the ſubſtance of things, reappoſing litle in the deluding ſhowes of a title magnificall, feared that the warres that were begon with intention to deliuer Italie from forreine powers, would not grow more to hurt the vitall ſpirites of that body, then other warres that had bene begon with a manyfeſt profeſſion and reſolute intention to ſubdue it: They ſaide it was no leſſe vayne then yll aduiſed to hope that the armies of Italie depriued of vertue, of diſcipline, of reputation, of Capteines, of authoritie, and the willes of their Princes not conformed, ſhould be mightie ynough to driue out of Italie him that is already poſſeſſed of conqueſt and victorie, in whom albeit all other remedies ſhould fayle, at leaſt he could neuer fayle of the meane to be reunited with thoſe that he had vanquiſhed to the common ruine of all the ſtates and regions of Italie: They foreſawe that there was more reaſon to feare that in theſe newe ſtirres were not occaſion to make pillage of Italie by new nations, then to hope that by the vnion of the Pope and the Venetians, there ſhould be any habilitie to vanquiſh the Frenchmen and the Spaniards: They ſayd that as it was to be wiſhed that the diſagreement and yll diſgeſted counſells of their Princes had not opened the way to forrayne armies to enter into the mayne body of Italie: ſo notwithſtanding, ſince by their infelicitie, two of the moſte worthy members of that body were occupied by the Frenche and Spaniſhe kings, it was to be eſteemed a farre leſſe calamitie, that they both continued there vntill eyther the goodnes of God whoſe rule goeth through all, or the fauor of fortune, who ordereth things in time, would miniſter occaſions better grounded, and ayde them with oportunities more conuenient, for that the one king waighing in ballance agaynſt the other, their mutuall iealouſies would defende the libertie of ſuch as were not yet falne into ſeruitude: then that betwene them ſelues they ſhould fall into armes by meane of which, whileſt the warre ſhould laſt, the partes that yet remayned ſounde would be torne in peeces by pillages, by fyrings, by blood, and by other miſerable accidents which warre draweth with it: And laſtly which of them ſhould remayne victor, would aſſuredly afflict the whole body with a more hard & heauy ſeruitude.

But

But the thoughts of the Pope (in whom was an other opinion) being become more violent and kindled by the new confederacion: Assoone as the tearme limited in thadmonicion published before against those Cardinalls that were Authors of the councell, was passed, he called together the publike Consistorie with great solemnitie, and sitting in habit pontificall in the hall named the hall of the kings, he declared that the Cardinalls of S. Croff, of S. Mallo, of Cosense, and of Bayeux, were falne from the dignitie of Cardinalls, and had incurred all those paynes whereunto are subiect heretikes and schismatikes: he published also an admonicion of the same forme against the Cardinall S. Seuerin whom he had not molested till that day: And proceeding in the same heate to the deuises for warre, he solicited continually the comming of the Spanyards, hauing an intencion affore all other thinges to bringe warre vpon the Florentyns both to draw to the deuocion of the confederats that cōmon weale, restoring to the gouernment the famulie of Medicis: and also to satisfie the infinit malice which he bare to Peter Soderin Gonfalonnier, as though it was thorow his authoritie that the Florentyns would neuer be seperated from the french king, giuing also a consent afterwards that the councell should be holden at Pysa.

Of this resolucion many signes & relacions were brought to Florence, where falling into preparacions to be able to susteine the warre, it was propownded amongst other thinges, that it could not be vnreasonable to resist with the reuenues & goods of the Church, the warre which the Church went about to make vniustly: And therefore it were no offence to equitie or conscience to constraine the Churchmen to contribute some great quantitie of money, but vnder these condicions, that they should be bestowed in places of sewertie, and the money not to be disburssed but in the action of warre, which not hapning, and the feare thereof ceassing, euery porcion should be restored to the parties that lent it: To this deuise many of the Citizens spake against, some for feare to incurre the paynes imposed by the cannon lawes vpon the defilers of the libertie of the Church: they were the least in number and most inferior in power and authoritie: but the greater parte impugned this proposicion onely to obiect against the will and reasons of the Gonfalonnier, of whose authoritie it was manifest that this councell did proceede: In so much as the new lawe ordeyned hereupon being already debated in the councels priuie no lesse by the diligence of the Gonfalonnier, then inclinacion of many others, and nothing wanting now but thapprobacion of the great and publike councell which stoode assembled for that purpose, the Gonfalonnier reasoned for the law in this maner.

I hope my Lordes, there are none amongest you that reasonably can doubt what haue bene the perpetuall intencions of the Pope against your libertie: wherein if you be not assured by consideracion of his present dealing subiecting you vniustly to thinterdiction, and neither heard your iustificacions which be no lesse true then many in number, nor respected the hope that was giuen him to remoue the councell from Pysa within few dayes: laye your selues downe at least to the comparison and iudgement of his other actions, no lesse malicious in their seuerall working, then contrary to the memorie and examples of his Predecessors, and yet by him continued in all seasons since his pontificacie. I will not perticulat the seuerall tokens and testimonies of his ill mind towards this estate, and much lesse obiect the sundry effects of his great enuie & malice: such repeticions bring no frute where the harmes be already suffered and passed, And it aunswereth not the modestie that this place exspecteth to labor in inuectiues and make men infamous by imputacion: yet, for that the memorie of actions passed, serueth some tyme as a warning against acci-

" dents that may happen, I hold it not inconuenient to the preſent matter to inferre
" ſome, hoping I ſhall not be interpreted to be the inuenter of the thing through ma" lice, which I deliuer but by relacion: None of you can be ignorant, that during our " long warres againſt the Pyſans this common weale neither by ſupplicacions which " brought with them their piety & neceſſitie, nor by the extremitie of our eſtate which " often tymes we humbled at his feete, could obteyne of him any fauor either publike
" or ſecret, notwithſtanding that both the iuſtice of our cauſe deſerued it, and alſo it " was an action apperteyning to the ſewertie of the Church and tranquilletie of all I- " taly to ſeeke to quenche ſuch a fire which not many yeares before had kindled many " great calamities and troubles: where, of the contrary, as often as they of Pyſa had re" courſſe to him (A thinge which we coulde not but ſuſpect and were alwayes made " more certeine after our victorie) he did not onely receiue the complaint of their af" flictions with compaſſion and pity, but alſo nouriſhed them in their obſtinacie with " diuers hopes, which was not a new inclinacion in him, but begon & continued ſince
" he was Cardinall: for, after the french men had leauied their campe from before Pi-
" ſa, he wrought what he could with the french king and the Cardinall Amboiſe, that
" Pyſa ſhould be receiued into protection, and we left excluded & abandoned: he ſha" dowed the enuie he bare to vs, with a diſſembled remorſe vpon the neceſſities of the " Pyſans, and vnder the regard and title of his profeſſion, made vs blinde in the proper-
" tie of his diſpoſicion: being become Pope, he neuer imparted to our common weale
" any one of thoſe graces which the ſea Apoſtolike is wont to miniſter in great libe-
" ralitie: he would not in ſo many difficulties and neceſſities of ours, once conſent
" that we might at any tyme ſo muche as releeue our ſelues with the reuenues of the " Churche, contrarye to the example of Alexander the ſixt, who gaue vs that libertie
" many tymes, notwithſtanding he was a ſetled enemie to this common weale: yea,
" expreſſing one will in thinges inferior and in matters of greater nature, he forbad
" vs to leauye money of the Cleargie for thinterteyning of Doctors and publike ſtu-
" dies, notwithſtanding that both the ſumme was litle and had continued by licence " of many Popes, and alſo it was conuerted to thinſtruction of youth and aduaunce-
" ment of learning: A worke of ſinguler pietie and vertue: Beſides, that which was " practiſed in Rome by Bartlemevv Aluiano with Cardinall Aſcagnius, was not debated " without his priuitie, wherein as the apparances were publike and manifeſt, ſo thef-
" fects had alſo ſucceeded, if others of greater power had not withdrawne them ſelues
" by the ſuddeine death of the Cardinall: And yet the firſt foundacions failing, he " would neuer (at our iuſt requeſts) conſent, to reſtraine Aluiano to make leauies or wa" ging of ſouldiours in the territories of Rome: Onely he forbad the famulies of Colon-
" no and Sauello, to inuade the landes of ſuch as were prepared to offend vs, by whoſe
" helpes we might haue ſhaked of our daungers with very ſmall charges: that minde
" can not be free from ſuſpiciõ of malice which forbeareth to remedie vniuſt harmes, " forbiddeth all other meanes that are offered, forſaketh the cauſes of men iuſtly com" plaining, and foreſeeth through the deuiſes of his enuie, the ruines of thoſe whom " he is bownd to ſupport, though by no other reſpect of office, yet by the propertie of " his profeſſion and calling. Touching our buſines with Sienna, he meinteined alwaies
" againſt vs Pandolffe Petruccio, and compelled vs with threatnings to prolonge the " truce: And for no other cauſe did he ioyne with vs for the recouering of Montpul-
" cian (for whoſe defenſe he had ſent men to Sienna) then for feare leaſt the armie of " the french king ſhould be called by vs into Tuskane: he ioyned with vs at times when " his feare was greater then our perill, and delt ſeuerally when he ſaw he might do vs
" harme

harme by too much truſting him, he would not ſticke to abuſe his authoritie to apply vs to his will,and was alwayes at hand to ſerue his purpoſes of our ready diſpoſicion: of the contrary,we did neuer offend him,but ſought to proceede in all things with reſpect and reuerence to the Church,and perticularly haue gratified him in all thoſe demaunds which haue lyen in our power, yea euen to ſende our men at armes to ayde him in the enterpriſe of Bolognia,being neither bownd, nor our proper profit reſpected in the action: But not one office,not one obedience,not one humilitie, could ſuffice to appeaſe the ſeueritie of his minde, whereof,beſides many other apparant teſtimonies and tokens,this is not the leaſt, that he receiued them willingly and gladly that offered to kill me,not for hatred he bare to me that neuer offended him, and in the tyme of his Cardinalſhip he had honorably embraſed me, but for a burning deſire he had to depriue you of your libertie: I am loath to offend the lawes of modeſtie,and muche more to be ouercaried with the memorie of myne owne harmes: but becauſe the thing is true by your proper witnes and teſtimonie, and in remẽbring the offence the offender ſuffreth no iniurie, I hope I ſhall not be thought to arrogãt in ſpeaking,where leſſe ſilence might haue made me ſuſpected of ſimplenes: he hath alwayes ſought to bring this common weale to cleaue to his immoderat and vniuſt wills: he hath alwayes wrought to make it a pertaker of his exſpenſes and daungers: And therefore not hoping but that raſh and vndiſcreete reſolucions might ſucceede of the moderacion and maturitie of your councells, he hath diſpoſed all his deuiſes to this ende to bringe into this citie, a tyrannie, which depending vpon him,ſhould not be directed and managed according to your profit, but after the importunitie of his luſtes and couetouſnes, with the which (being drawne from endes exceſſiue) he thinketh vpon no other thing then to ſowe ſeedes of diſcord, to bring forth one warre after an other, and to nouriſh and keepe kindled a perpetuall fire in Chriſtendom: And why ſhould we doubt,that at this preſent he is not poſſeſſed of an intencion to ſet vpon vs, hauing two mighty armies ioyned with him, being Lord of Romagnia,and the ſtate of Siena ſubiected to his obedience: it is not hard to draw to action the mind that is ſo addicted to dominion and imperie,And where we are perſwaded is emulacion of our greatnes and glory, there let vs looke for the worſt that malice and hatred can doe: we haue reaſon to ſuſpect that he will aſſay to obteine that by open force,whereunto he hath ſo long aſpired by ſecret deuiſes, his thirſt being ſo much the greater by howe muche he ſeeth vs ill prepared for our defence: A matter which though no other thing would detect and ſignifie vnto vs,his thoughtes and deuiſes haue ſufficiently expreſſed it,by appoynting lately for Legat of Bolognia, the Cardinall of Medicis in intencion to preferre him to tharmie:A Cardinall who had neuer receiued any honorable place of him,neuer gratified with benefits,neuer acceptable to him for ſeruice, councell, opinion, truſt or confidence: take your conſideracions of theſe thinges,and what els can you iudge, then that giuing authoritie to march vpon your frontyers,and almoſt to ſet his foote vpon your neckes,with ſuch a dignitie,ſuch a reputacion,and ſuch a terror of armes, the man that onely aſpyreth to be your tyrant,deſiring to ſtirre vp and conſpire your Citiſens to affect tyrannie more then libertie,and to draw your ſubiects to mutinie, to thend to introduce his imperie: it belongs to wiſe men to foreſee a miſchiefe affore it happen,and it is the reward of men vnhappy to lament it when it is chaunced: The wiſe ſayler takes his iudgement of the wether by the clowdes and tokens of the ayre, and men pollitike turne to their proper warning the ſignes that are ſent from him whom they both ſuſpect and feare: In regard of theſe reaſons it hath bene iudged neceſſary

" by this honorable councell and many other Citizens of reſpect and merit, that for " the defence and protection of this libertie, there ſhould be leauyed the ſame prouiſions as if the warre were certeine: And albeit it is very likely that the french king,
" at leaſt for his proper intereſt, wil ayde vs mightely: yet, we are neither for that hope
" to leaue of thoſe remedies which be in our power, nor forget that many impedimēts
" may eaſily chaunce, which in ſome ſorte may depriue vs of his ſuccours: it may be " there be ſome that will obiect againſt this councell as being neither neceſſary nor " profitable, in ſuch men perhaps is more dominion of paſſion or other perticuler humor, then of affection or zeale to the common benefit: Some alſo alleage, that being " vncerteine of the Popes intencion to enter into warre, it is a reſolucion vnprofitable,
" ſuch as offendeth his authoritie, and by taxing the reuenues of the Church, to giue
" him iuſt occaſion to be angry and to prouoke him to make warre vpon vs almoſt by " neceſſitie: as though by ſo many euident ſignes & arguments is not manifeſtly comprehended the ſubſtance of his intencion, or as though it apperteyned to wiſe go-
" uernors of common weales to deferre preparacions till after the beginning of thaſſalt, & firſt to receiue the blow of thennemie, affore we couer our bodies with armes
" neceſſary for our defence: The medicine that is miniſtred out of tyme, workes not " to the benefit of the patient, the councel is without frute that commes after the fact,
" and it is too late to applye the remedie after the ill be hapned: others of vs dwell in
" this opinion, that not to adde the wrathe of God to the anger of the Pope, we muſt
" prouide for our ſauetie by ſome other meane, ſince we are not yet falne into that neceſſitie without the which ſecular Princes haue bene alwayes forbidden by the can" non lawes and that vnder great paynes to impoſe any charge vppon the perſons or " goods of the Church: This reaſon hath bene alſo conſidered by vs and others that
" haue giuen councell to the publicacion of this law: But who dowteth that ſince our " publike reuenues are not ſufficient to furniſh thexpenſes we muſt ſuſteyne, And our " treaſors hauing bene ſo long time drayned, and our neceſſities no leſſe encreaſing by " the continuacion of the warres: who doubteth I ſay that it is not both reaſonable &
" neceſſary, that the charges we are to ſuſteine for the defence of a warre vniuſtly begon by the Church, ſhould not be leauyed and ſupported with the moneyes of the " perſons of the Church: A matter which many tymes heretofore hath bene practiſed by our citie, and of no leſſe example with other Princes and common weales:
" But neuer with greater moderacion and reſpect neither here nor elſewhere, for that " there is no intencion to employ them in other action, but onely to laye them vp in " places of ſuretie, to thende to make repayment to the perſons them ſelues if we find
" no occaſion to feare: So that if the Pope bring not warre vpon vs, as it is reaſonable
" we disburſſe not the treaſors of the Churche, and in effect they ſhall be no way ex-
" ſpended: So alſo if he make no conſcience to afflict vs, why ſhoulde we be curious
" by all our wayes and meanes poſſible to defend vs from the iniuries of a warre ſo vniuſt: where tyrants turne their authoritie to oppreſſe innocents, to enter into armes
" for our owne ſauetie can be no breache of obedience nor order: it holdes ſufficiently of equitie to repulſe a violence by the ſame meanes wherewith it is offered: what
" occaſion of diſpleaſure hath he found in this common weale, which by neceſſitie &
" not by will, hath ſuffered the councell to be aſſembled at Pyſa: ſhall we for this be interpreted to haue prouoked his anger: faultes done by neceſſitie bring with them a
" ſufficient reaſon of excuſe: is it to prouoke his anger, when we refuſe to lay downe
" our neckes to him that hath vowed to ſtryke them of? it is farre from thimputacion
" of prouoking to prepare and put our ſelues in order to reſiſt his vniuſt violence: No,

we ſhould the rather prouoke him, if we fayled to make conuenient prouiſions, for that the hope of the facilitie of the enterpriſe would make his furie the greater, raging already with a burning emulacion to deſtroy your libertie euen to the foundacions:
The feare to offend God neede not reteyne you: for, our neceſſitie is ſo great, and our daunger ſo manifeſt, not ſtanding ſubiect to any thing that may more preiudice vs: that it is ſuffered not onely to ſerue our turnes with that part of thoſe reuenues which is not conuerted into workes of pietie and charitie, but alſo it is lawfull to lay handes euen vpon the thinges ſacred: for that according to the lawe of nature, the defenſe and reſiſting of iniuries is common to all men, allowed of God, and approued of all nations, A perpetuall rule to men, & engendred together with the world:
it will laſte as longe as the worlde, and is not ſubiect to derogacion by any of the lawes ciuill or cannon, grounded vpon the wills and tradicions of men, which being not otherwayes recorded, then in paper or other matter fraile and declyning, haue no power to derogat a perpetuall law, not made by men or their councells, but engraued by nature her ſelfe in the ſpirits and hartes of all mankind: we muſt not exſpect and temporiſe till we be brought into the laſt extremitie, for that being once enuyroned with oppreſſions our recourſſe to remedies woulde be too late, and we ſhould ſtand to lament the harmes which we might haue auoyded: it is too late to prouoke to vomit when the poyſon hath pearſed to the bones: the ſoldiour ſerueth no turne that beginneth to march when the battell is done: Beſides all this, how can it be denied, that the ſtate and multitude of priuat perſons ſhall ſuffer great diſtreſſe by it, ſeeing that by thimpoſtes that are layed vpon them, the greateſt part of them are conſtrayned to cut of ſome of thoſe exſpenſes without the which they can not liue but with great incommoditie & diminucion of things neceſſary to their degree:
That is the neceſſitie which hath bene conſidered vppon by ſuch as haue made the lawes, by which we are forbidden to exſpect till our Citiſens be brought to the daũger of famine and no longer able to ſuſteyne their famulies: On the other part, by this taxacion, there is no incõmoditie impoſed vpon the Churchmen, for that they doe onely diſfurniſh them ſelues of that parte of their reuenues, which, either they kepe vnprofitable in their coffers, or reſerue to exſpend in prodigalities ſuperfluous, or perhaps ſome of them (I ſpeake vnder pardon) would laſhe out in pleaſures di-ſhoneſt: This is a perpetuall reſolucion of all wiſe men, that the libertie of cities and common weales is acceptable to God, for that in them, more then in any other ſort of gouernment is preſerued the common benefit, iuſtice adminiſtred without ac-ception of perſons, the minde of Citiſens rayſed more and more to workes of vertue and honor, and more reſpect and reuerence borne to religion: And yet you beleeue it is an action not a litle diſpleaſing to God that to defend a thing ſo precious for the which who ſheds his proper blood winneth greateſt merit and prayſe, you employ a litle part of the frutes and reuenues of temporall thinges: which notwithſtanding they are dedicated to Churches, yet they are all diſcended vnto them by almes, by donations, and by inducements of laye men our elders: They are to be no leſſe employed for the preſeruacion and ſauetie of Churches, ſubiect and expoſed in a time of warre then thinges ſecular which are layed downe to the crueltie and couetouſ-nes of ſoldiours, neyther are they more to be reſpected in a warre made by the Pope, then if there were a perſecution by the Turkes or the greateſt tyrants of the worlde: forbeare not whileſt you haue tyme to prouide for the ſauetie of your contrey, be not curious in conſcience to defend your libertie, then the which you can not offer to God a temporall ſacrifice more acceptable or worthy: Thinke that to chaſſe the

" warre from your houſes, from your temples, from your Monaſteries, and from your " poſſeſſions, there is no better remedie then to make knowne to him that is riſen to " offende you, that you are determined to forget nothing that may ſerue to your de-
" fenſe: That force is iuſt that is rayſed in a neceſſary cauſe, and where you want ſecu-
" lar meanes to warrant your liues, to apply the goods of the Church in this propor-
" cion, can be no breache of equitie nor conſcience: nature by prerogatiue makes " things lawfull for defence, which the law ceremonially reſerueth for other reſpects.

The diſcourſſe of this graue Magiſtrat, no leſſe reaſonable in it ſelfe, then neceſſary for their common ſauetie, wrought ſuch impreſſion in the mindes of the hearers, that the law proponed was without any difficultie approued by the great councell: By reaſon whereof notwithſtanding the diſpleaſure and diſcontentment of the Pope increaſed more and more, taking more hoat occaſion to diſpoſe the confederats to begin warre with the Florentyns: yet the perſwaſions of Pandolffo Petruccio had power to turne from that opinion aſwell the Pope as the Deputies that ſolicited in Italy for the king of Aragon: for Pandolffo giuing councell to aſſaile Bolognia, blamed much all deuiſes and enterpriſes to bring the warre into Tuskane, alleaging that Bolognia being vnable for her proper weakenes, to defend her ſelfe, ſhould be enforced to call in the forces of the french king, And for the Florentyns, what with their own power, concurring alſo the proper profit of the king, he would no leſſe ſee to their defence, then to Bolognia: That albeit the Florentyns bare a certeine inclinacion of minde to the french king, yet neuertheleſſe they were wiſe and ſtoode alwayes ielous of the preſeruacion of their eſtate, neuer hauing at his inſtance offended any with armes during ſo great ſtirs: yea they had not miniſtred to him in any other ſort of ſeruice, but onely furniſhed him, for the defenſe of the ſtate of Lombardy with two hundred men at armes according to the bondes of the capitulacion made in common betwene him and the king Catholike: he ſayd there could not be done to the french king a thing more agreeable or profitable, then to conſtraine the Florentyns to giue ouer to be Newters and to ioyne their cauſe with his: That it would be a matter of great indiſcreſſion, if his enemies were the cauſe to make him obteyne that which he could neuer bring to paſſe by his authoritie, the king hauing in vaine ſolicited by many prayers and promiſſes to declare them ſelues for him: That it was diſcerned of many by many ſignes, and by him comprehended by moſt certeine knowledge, how greeuous it was to the Florentyns, that the councell ſhould be celebrated at Pyſa, whereunto they had not conſented for other reſpect then that they durſt not gaineſay the french kings demaundes, made immediatly after the rebellion of Bolognia: A tyme when in Italy was not ſeene any armie to oppoſe againſt him: Beſides, it was a thing certeine that thauthoritie of Cæſar was concurrant in the councell, accompanied alſo with the conſent of the king Catholike: That likewiſe he knew that the Florentyns were not to ſuffer the french ſoldiours to ſtay vpon their landes: And that it was a matter daungerous to threaten or prouoke them, where, of the contrary it could not be but profitable to deale with them with affabilitie and demonſtracion to admit their excuſes: for that proceeding in ſuch maner, either there would be obteyned of them with time and occaſion, thinges which then could not be hoped for, or at leaſt, forbearing to conſtraine them by feare of newe reſolucions, they might be ſo interteyned that they ſhould doe no hurt in times of daunger and perill: And in caſe of victorie and preuailing, it would reſt in the power of the confederats to giue to the Florentyns ſuch forme of gouernment as they ſhould thinke moſt expedient: The matter that in this action diminiſhed thauthoritie of Pandolffo was the knowledge that was had that he desired for his profit perticuler, that a warre of that consequence should not begin in Tuskane, by meane of which the whole bodie & partes of the contrey would suffer indifferent destruction eyther by tharmies of thennemie or by the incursions of friendes: But what by the efficacie of his reasons, set out so as they resisted all obiections, and by thauthoritie of the man, in whome was no small opinion for matters of councell, it was easily determined not to assaile the Florentyns: This councell was the better approued by a contencion that a fewe dayes after began to kindle betweene the Florentyns and the Cardinalls.

It is set downe before that the presence of the Cardinalls was not at the first actes of the councell: for, they taried at the borow of S. Donyn, eyther to expect the Prelats that were to come out of Fraunce, or to be accompanied with those which Cæsar had promised to send, or happly lingring for other occasions: And being departed from thence by sondry wayes, the brute ranne that the two spanish Cardinalls who had taken the way of Bolognia would be reconciled to the Pope, being knowne to solicit continually to that end the Embassador of the king of Aragon which lay resident with the Pope: That opinion seemed so much the more credible by how much they had obteyned of the Florentyns vnder publike faith and promisse, that they might remeine in sewertie within Florence: But by that tyme they were come vpon the contrey of Mugello, they turned suddeinly towards Lucqua, eyther to ioyne with the others, or perhaps their intencion had bene alwayes so, or els as touching the Cardinall S. Croff his auncient ambicion preuayled more then his newe feare, or lastly, receyuing aduertisements in that place that they were depriued of the dignitie and cappe of Cardinalls, they dispayred to fall to any accorde with the Pope: About this tyme the three french Cardinalls, S. Mallo, Albert, and Bayeux, passed the Appenyn by the waye of Pontresmo together with the Prelats of Fraunce: After whome and at their request, marched out of Lombardye three hundred frenche launces commaunded by Odet Foix Lorde of Lautrich: he was appoynted garde of the councell by the Cardinalls, eyther to thende that the councell accompanied with the armes of the french king, should continue with more authoritie, or els (which was more likely) to haue power to suppresse who soeuer durst ryse agaynst the obedience of their decrees: But so soone as the Florentyns came to the discouerie of that resolucion which had bene conceyled from them vntill the bandes began to marche, they determined not to receyue into a citie of so greate importance, such a number of soldiours, both considering the ill disposicion of the Pysans, and that the last rebellion hapned King Charles being present and suffering it, and also the inclinacion which the french soldiours bare to the towne of Pysa: In tymes of perill wise men feare all thinges, and doe holde it necessary to their sewertie to interteyne a suspicion of thinges which in common foresight and coniecture they haue no reason to doubt: for, the Florentyns fearing that besides the daungerous accidents that might happen by thinsolency of men of warre, doubted also that the soldiours of the french king entring into Pysa, it fell not out (& perhaps such was the secret desire of the king) that he sought to make Tuskane the seat of his warres: In these feares, they signified at thinstant to the french king, that it was harde to harbour so many people for the straitnes and sterrilitie of the contrey, very vnable to prouide for the norriture of so many peoples as came from all partes to the councell: They alleaged also that the place was not necessary for the sauetie of the Cardinals to whom might be offered some violence either by straungers, or by the proper inhabitants, their multitudes and numbers exceeding farre the pollicie & garde that they had assigned to contein them: To the Cardinal of S. Mallovv, by whose direction the french men were gouerned in all thinges, they sent word that they were determined to admit no soldiours into Pisa: who, by the returne of his aunswers, seeming to consent & be contented, gaue order on the other side, that the bands should aduaunce & marche seuerally and without making any semblance, perswading himself that being approched neare to Pisa, they would enter either by force or by sutletie, or at least for feare that the Florentyns durst not doe such an iniurie to the french king as to let them: But the king hauing clearely aunswered that they should not marche thether at all, the Florentyns dispatched Frauncis Vittoryo to the Cardinall of S. Mallo with an embassage equall to his hawtines and pride: he told him, from the state of Florence, that if the Cardinalls entred vppon their landes armed and with bandes of soldiours, they would not onely not admit them into Pysa, but also would holde them for ennemies and pursue them for such, And would also doe the like, if the men of warre passed the Appenin towardes Tuskane, for that they were to presume that they passed not for other purpose, then to steale secretly into Pysa, or to execute some other stratageame: This message wrought so with the Cardinall, that he resolued the bandes should eftsoones returne agayne beyonde th Appenyn, the Florentyns consenting that besides the persons of the Lordes of Lavvtrech and Chastyllion, he might reteyne with him an hundred and fiftie Archers: All the Cardinalls were together at Lucqua, which citie, for suffering that assemblie and presence, the Pope pronownced to be falne into thinterdiction: And leauing there very sicke the Cardinall of Cossensa, who, not long after sawe there the laste daye of his mortall life, the other foure went to Pysa, where they were receyued by the Magistrates with colde shewes, and by the Commons was expressed no great reuerence, both for that their comming was displeasing to the Florentyns, and the cause of that councell not well receiued nor approued by the nations of Christendom: for, notwithstanding the title and pretence to reforme the Churche was both very honest and greatly profitable, and also no lesse necessarye then agreeable to all the regions of Christendom: yet it was discerned of wise men that the Authors and workers of the same were pushed on with endes ambicious: They were all caried with couetous desires of temporall thinges, and vnder the shadowe of the weale and benefit vniuersall, they respected their perticular interests making holines and pietie a couer to their greatnes and glorie: And yet which of them should be raysed to the Popedome, stoode in no lesse necessitie to be reformed then others that they went about to compell to reformacion: Moreouer it was seene of many, that besides the ambicion of Preestes, the quarrells of Princes and questions of estates, had stirred vp and nourished this councell: That respect had moued the french king to procure it, the king of Romaines to consent to it, and the king of Aragon to desire it: So that it being clearely deserned that vnder the cause of the councell, was comprehended the quarrel of armes and Empires, the people expressed an vniuersall horror that vnder deuout shadowes of spirituall thinges (instruments of warres and troubles) men should thirst and aspire to matters temporal: And therefore not onely at the entrey of the Cardinalls into Pysa, the common disdayne and hatred of people was disclosed, but also euen in the actes of the councel, their grudge and discontentment burst out more manifest: for albeit they summoned the Cleargie to be in the Cathedrall church at the first session, yet much lesse that any of them respected the summonce, seeing the very Preests of the Church refused to lend their ornaments and vestures, when (according to their custome) they meant to haue celebrated the Masse for thimploracion of the ayde & light of the holy ſpirit: yea, the Preſtes iuſtifying their contẽpt with actes of greater inſolẽcie, for bare not to ſhut the dores of their church & would not ſuffer them to enter: The Cardinals compleyned of theſe contempts at Florence, where was commaunded that neyther the vſe of Churches nor the ſeruice of inſtrumẽts ordeyned for diuine office, ſhould be denied thẽ, but as touching the Cleargie, there was no compulſion eyther to be at the Church or to aſſiſt the action: Theſe directions almoſt repugnant in them ſelues, as they proceded of the diuiſion of the Citiſens & by meane of them, on the one ſide the coũcel was receiued into their dominiõ, & on the other ſide followed with contẽpt & reiection, brought at one time offence to the Pope, and diſcontentment to the french king: In regarde whereof, the Cardinalls ſeeing howe daungerous it was to remeine in Piſa without armes, & no leſſe conſidering that it would bring diminucion to thauthority of their councell, to celebrat in a citie that obeyed not their decrees, were vpon tearmes to depart aſſoone as they ſhould haue accompliſhed thaffaires of the councell: wherein their reſolucion was further compelled and haſtned by an accident hapning ſuddeinely, which albeit was by chaunce, tooke notwithſtanding his foundacion of the wicked diſpoſicion of mẽ: for, a french ſoldiour, in a publike place committing ſome inſolẽcy vpon a ſtrompet, and ſuch as ſaw it raiſing a preſent outcry, many ſoldiours aſwell french as of the Cardinalls traine and other Prelats prepared in armes to the place where the brute was: on the other ſide likewiſe many trowpes of the people of Piſa & of the Florentyn bands flockt thether to behold the accident: And as for the moſt part popular tumults are full of faction and varietie of affection, ſo the alarme being ſownded, ſome cryed vpon the name of Fraunce, and ſome vppon the title of Morzocco (the ſigne & enſeigne of the common weale of Florence) occupying amõgeſt them daũgerous fight, wherin their furie made them feare nothing leſſe thẽ the hazard of their liues, which at other tymes they would ſeeke to preſerue with no litle care & ielouſie: But the Capteines and chieftaines of the french, and commaunders of the Florentyns, ioyning diſcreſſion to vallour and authoritie, abated the fury of the fight, their diligence doing much to reſtrayne thintemperance on all ſides: In the ende the tumult was appayſed, many on both partes bearing away no ſmall hurtes, amongſt whom fell into that fortune the Lord Chaſtyllion & the Lord of Lavvtrich, notwithſtanding neither the one nor the other bare away any wounds of peril: This accident brought ſuch aſtoniſhment to the Cardinals, happly at that hower aſſembled in the Church of S. Michaell which is there ioyning, that they made the day after the ſecond ſeſſion wherein they ordeined that the councel ſhould be transferred to Myllan: not holding thopportunitie of that place conuenient for the actes of the councel, which gaue no ſewertie for the ſauetie of their liues: And therefore before the xv. day of their arriual they departed in great diligence from Piſa, greatly to the reioycing of the Florentyns & Piſans, & no leſſe to the contentment and liking of the Prelats that followed the councel, whom it did not a litle diſcontent to be come into a place, which, what for the incommodity of lodging, & what for the incõueniency of other wants growen by the long warrs that were paſſed, did not miniſter to them that fulnes of helps & means to liue delicatly & prodigally which the Preſts & frẽch men are wont to find in the like actions: They murmured alſo, & being come thether by the kings cõmaũdement & againſt their wils, they deſired chaũg of place & all other accidents that might bring difficulty, prolongation, or diſſoluciõ of the coũcel. But, ſuch was the vniuerſal contempt of this councel, that the hatred & grudging of peoples following the Cardinalls to Myllan, they founde there euen the like deſ-piſing,& farre greater difficulties: for the cleargie of Myllan communicating in the contempts of Pyſa euen in the beginning refuſed of them ſelues to celebrat the diuine ſeruice,as though there were entred into their city,not cardinals of the church of Rome who were wont to be honored and worſhipped in euery place, but perſons profane & accurſed,& carying with them all priuacion of honor,reuerence,and reſpect: And when they had occaſion to ſhew them ſelues in publike,the cõmons forbare not to raile at them,ſ korning them as well in wordes as geſtures: but ſpecially their malice was moſt expreſſed vpon the Cardinal of S.Croſſ whõ as they ſuppoſed to be the author of that ſtir,ſo euery one exerciſed their iudgement moſt vpon him, being alſo in the laſt ſeſſion of Piſa elected Preſident of the councell: Theſe were the manifeſt & common murmures of people, that heretofore councels were wont to bring to contreys benedictions, peace & cõcord, but in this was bred to contreyes, kingdoms,& peoples,maledictions,warres,& diſcordes: That other councells were aſſembled to reunite the Church that was out of vnitie, but this was aſſembled to breake her vnitie,when ſhe was in good agreement: That the contagion of ſuch a peſtilence infected al ſuch as receiued it,altered all thoſe that obeyed it, abuſed euen thoſe that fauored it,defiled ſuch as had conuerſacion with it, and ſeduced all thoſe that heard it: There was to be exſpected of their cõming no other thing,then blood, famine,& peſtilence,together with the perdicion both of bodies and ſoules of men: by the originall and cauſe,they gathered what would be the ſucceſſe and effect, and reaſonably they could exſpect no frute or confirmacion of vnity,from ſuch as began to ſowe their labors with ſeedes of diuiſion: Gaſton de Foix,who not many monethes affore the departing of Monſr Longueville had bene preferred both to the Duchie of Myllan and to the armie,ſomewhat ſuppreſſed thoſe murmures tending almoſt to a tumult and manifeſt ſedicion: he ioyned to his authoritie,commaundements thretning and peynall,conſtraining the Cleargie to celebrate ſeruice as they were wont, and enioyned the Commons to ſpeake more modeſtly hereafter.

In regard of theſe difficulties the beginnings of the councel were continued with very litle ſucceſſe or iſſue: The plots that had bene layd with ſo great deuiſe & ſtudy, brought forth euents quite contrary to the exſpectacion of the authors: thinges debated by long time & deepe diſcourſe of councel,drew no reſolucion according to the weening & cõiectures of the parties: where ſownd meaning goeth not with the wiſ-
" dom & imaginacions of men,there their workings are ful of frailty & the whole bo" dy of their actions clothed with imperfections: But the thing that moſt troubled the " hopes of the Cardinals was that Cæſar did not onely from day to day deferre to ſend eyther Prelats or Proctors, notwithſtanding the conſent he had giuen & that often tymes reaſſured by perpetuall promiſſes to the french king & the Cardinal of S.Seuerin: but alſo,he alleaged for his excuſe (being happly induced & councelled by others) that it was not agreable to his dignitie, to ſend to the councel of Piſa,the Prelats of his proper eſtates & territories,if both the example and name of all Germany were not concurrant in thaction: And for that cauſe he ſayd he had called a conuocacion of the Prelats of Germany at Auſpurge,to deliberat of ſome ioynt & vniuerſall forme of proceeding to be vſed touching the councel: aſſuring notwithſtanding the french mẽ,that vnder that meane he would ſo work as they ſhould all be ſent: Moreouer he much troubled the kings mind with his varietie & diuers maners of proceeding,for,beſides his vncertein & cold dealings in the affaires of the coũcel,be inclined fully & opẽly to the mocion of peace with the Venetians,which was ſolicited by the Pope & the king of Aragon with many offers: And on the other ſide, cõplaining

bitterly against the king Catholike, both for that contrary to all shame, he had so apparantly impugned the league of Cambray, & also in this new confederacion (which he rather called traison) he had named him but as accessary: he suborned Galeas S. Seueryn to goe to Rome in person as enemie to the Pope, but refurnished by the king for the greatest part of his armie, and releeued with great quantities of treasor: And yet he made no declaracion of these thinges with such assurance as it could not be doubted what he would at last determine (notwithstanding all his demaunds were satisfied to him): In this sort the kinges mind was eftsoones trauelled with his accustomed suspicions, that if he abandoned Cæsar, he left him at liberty to ioyne with his enemies: And if he would still sticke to him and susteine him, his alliance would be bought with too deare a price, and yet doubtfull what fruite would reuert of it well knowing by experience of thinges past, that oftentymes his owne disorders did hurt him more, then his forces did ayde him: yea the king was not able to iudge in himselfe, which would most hurt him in this action, either the well doings & good successe of Cæsar, or the contraries: besides, the king Catholike nourished him & enterteyned him as much as he could in that doubt, And, to make him proceede more slowly in the prouisions of the warre, he gaue him hope not to stirre in armes: The king of England did the like, and for the same causes, who had made aunswer to the french Embassador that it was not true that he had consented to the league made at Rome, but that he was fully determined to keepe thalliance which he had with the french king: Besides, at the same time the Bishop of Tyuoly proponed peace in the name of the Pope, so farre forth as the king would no more fauor the councell, and withdraw him selfe from the protection of Bolognia, for the which he offered to giue assurance that the Pope should dresse no more new enterprises against him: The king seemed lesse displeased with the peace, notwithstanding it bare hard condicions, the to put him selfe to the daungers & exspenses of the warre, which by computacion seemed infinit, hauing to make resistance against his enemies, and to refurnish the wants of Cæsar: Neuertheless, disdaine drew him almost to be forced by the king of Aragon to make peace for feare of warre: besides that it was a matter very hard to assure him that the Pope would obserue the couenants of peace, after he had recouered Bolognia, & should be deliuered from the feare of the councell: he doubted also that when he should be ready to consent to the condicions offered, the Pope would draw backe as he was wont to doe at other tymes: In which maner of proceeding, besides that his dignitie should be offended, and his reputacion diminished, Cæsar would hold him selfe iniuried, for that leauing him in warre with the Venetians, he sought of him selfe alone to conclude the peace: Therefore he made precise aunswer to the Bishop of Tyuoly, that he would not condiscend to subiect Bolognia to the Church in other forme then it had wont to be in auncient tymes: And at the same time, to establish a firme resolucion with Cæsar who lay at Bruueth, a towne neare to Trente, he sent to him in great diligence, & with very large offers, Andre de Burgo Cæsars Embassador resident with him: At this time certeine of his subiects of the contrey of Tyroll occupied Batisten, a place of very great strength in the entrey of the vallye of Caldora.

The practises of the peace being wholly broken & dissolued, the first thoughts & deuises of the king were, that when Monsr Palissa, (leauing in Verona three thowsand footemen to appease Cæsar not well contented with his departure) should haue led the residue of the bands to the Duchie of Myllan, there should be made new leauies of footemen: And so all the armie being reassembled, they should marche to assaile

Romagnia, hoping to occupye it either all or in parte, before the Spanyard should approach: And then either to march further according to occasions, or at least to enterteyne and beare out the warre vpon the dominions of others vntill springe time, when the king passing into Italy in person with all the forces of his kingdom, hoped to make an vniuersall suppression of his enemies: But as he stoode wauering in this deuise, his resolucions not proceeding with that expedicion which the occasions required, & by reason of his nature estraunged from exspenses, him selfe no lesse slow in many prouisions but specially to wage new soldiours: he fell into new suspicions of the stirring of the Swyzzers, of which nation for that heretofore we haue sette downe some generall mention in sondry places, it can not be inconuenient to the present purpose, to deale somewhat more perticularly.

What people the Swyzzers be.

The Swyzzers, which are those peoples whom auncient histories cal Heluetians, haue their habitations in the most high mounteins of Iura named S. Claudo, S. Brigit, & S. Godat: A race of men naturally valiant, warlike, and rude, And for the sterilitie of the contrey, more giuen to grazing, then to tillage: They haue bene in times past vnder the subiection of the Dukes of Austrich, whose iurisdiction they shaked of by rebellion many yeares sithens: They haue their pollicie & gouernment of them selues, without any signe of depēding or relation to either Emprours, kings, or other Princes: They are diuided into xiij communalties which they call cantons, & euery of them seuerally are gouerned by Magistrates, lawes & ordenances proper & perticular: They hold their parliament or councel euery yeare, or more often if occasion & necessitie require, wherein they dispute of vniuersal affaires, their assemblies & meetings being not subiect to certeinty of places, but referred as best pleaseth the Deputies of euery canton: They call those assemblies dyets or iorneyes, imitating the phrase & customs of the Germains: In them they resolue vpon peace, vpon warre, vpon confederacions, vpon legacions & demaunds made to leauy soldiours eyther by publike decree, or by permission: in them also they set downe directions for al things that apperteyne to their common interest: when they agree by publike decree to deliuer soldiours, the cantons chuse amongest them selues a Capteine general, to whō they giue the banner with the enseigne & name publike: Their vnitie & agreement, together with the glory of their armes, hath made them very notable & renowmed thorow the regions of the earth, notwithstanding for their outward shape & personage, they beare a presence barbarous & rude, & for their behauior & conuersacion, hold more of inciuilitie then of comlines: By their natural vallour ioyned to due discipline & order, they haue not onely & at all times made valiant defense at home for their owne contrey, but also in forreine warres they haue performed singuler feates of armes to their perpetuall praise: wherein sure their recommendacion and merit had bene farre greater, if they had expressed such effects of vallour for their proper iurisdiction and imperie, and not bene mercenarie to thappoyntments of others, & for thincreasing of the dominion of straungers, or if they had sette before theyr eyes an ende more worthy and noble then the desire of money, by the loue and corruption whereof they haue lost thoccasion to be feared and redoubted in Italy: for, where they haue not come out of their contrey but as soldiours waged & mercenary, they haue not caried back a publike frute of their victories: The desire of gayne makes them for the most part to follow armies, & besides their huge pensions, to be troublesom by new demaundes of payes almost intollerable: To such as wage & pay them, they are for the most part hard & vneasy in conuersation & obediēce: In their houses & apart, the principalls of them forbeare not to receiue giftes & pensions of Princes,

Princes, to follow and fauour their faction in their dyets and parlyaments: By reason whereof, thinges publike being referred to priuat profit, and fauors and voyces being made vendible and corrupted, discordes by litle and litle haue bene kindled amongst them selues: the same beeing thoccasion that matters which haue ben approued in the parliaments by the moste parte of the Cantons, beginning not to be embraced and followed of all, they fell at laste, not many yeeres affore that time, to manifest warres amongst them selues, muche to the diminution of the authoritie which they bare throughout the partes of the worlde: Somewhat belowe these be certayne townes & villages inhabited by a people called Valleymen, as hauing their dwellings in valleys, they are inferiour to the Svvizzers in number, in authoritie, in vallour, and in euery other disposition: And yet more lower then they is an other generation of men called Grisons, which are gouerned by three Cantons, and vppon that are called the Lordes of the three leagues: the capitall towne of their countrey is called Coire: they haue often societie and confederation with the Svvizzers, and with them they go commonly to the warre: they haue almoste the same policie, the same lawes, the same constitution of maners and customes: In matters of armes and vallour they are preferred affore the valley men, but they holde no comparison with the Svvizzers, eyther in numbers, in politie, or in vertue. The Svvizzers then, who at that time were not so muche degenerate and corrupted as they haue beene since, tooke incitation by the Pope, and prepared to discende vpon the Duchie of Millan, both dissembling that that leauie of armes proceeded of the vniuersitie of the Cantons, and also spreading a brute, that the Canton of Svvitz and Fribourg were the authors of the action: of whom, the first tooke his complaint and consideration of this, that a post of theirs passing throwe the duchie of Millan was murdred by certayne French souldiours: The other pretended a reuenge for certayne particular wronges that had bene done to them: The Councells of these, and generally, the resolution of the whole nation, albeit they were affore signified to the French king, yet they coulde do nothing to drawe him to accorde with them, notwithstanding the aduise and perswasions of his Lordes and wise men concurred in it, and the friendes and fauourers which he had amongst them gaue him hope to be hable to obteine it: He was stayed also by his accustomed difficulties to enlarge their auncient pensions with twentie thousande frankes, which may be a little more or lesse then tenne thousande duckets: So that he refused for a matter of small price and vallue the amitie, which afterwardes he would haue bought with infinite treasurs: He perswaded him selfe that eyther they would not stirre at all, or if they did, at leaste they could not muche hurt him, for that beeing accustomed to go to the warre on foote, their want of horse and artilleries would bring great impedimentes to their seruice: Besides, about that time (nowe was Nouember begonne) the ryuers were swelled, and they had neither vesselles nor bridges: The vittayles of the Duchie of Millan were restrayned into fortresses and places of strength, the townes thereabout well garded and kept, and in the playne the men at armes were hable to make head agaynst them: By whiche impedimentes and necessities he presumed that if they did march, they would be constrayned eftsones to retyre. But the Svvizzers taking little amaze by these difficulties, began to discende at Varesa, at which place their numbers increased continually: They had with them seuen fielde peeces and many harquebushes a crocke caried by horses, and some reasonable prouision of vittells: Their comming seemed to be so muche the more daungerous, by howemuche, the inhabitantes of Millan began to be weary of the Frenche iurisdiction, the ſame growing both by certayne newe inſolencies and diſorders in the Frenche ſouldiours more then of cuſtome: and alſo by the couetouſneſſe of the king, who would not ſuffer to be made any newe leauyes or prouiſion of footmen: Beſides, the men at armes that at that tyme were in Italie which in true computation exceeded not a thouſande and three hundred launces, together with the two hundred gentlemen, were not all hable to make reſiſtance to the Svvizzers, both for that parte of them were gone to the garde of Verona and Breſſa, and alſo Monſr de Foix had newly ſent two hundred launces to Bolognia to withſtande the comming of the Cardinall of Medicis and M. Anth. Colonno to Faenza: where albeit they had no footemen as yet leauyed, yet both to repreſſe the deuiſions that were in Bolognia, and alſo for that at that time the Caſtlekeeper of the rocke of Saſſilon (a borowe of the mountayne of Bolognia) had voluntarily put it into the Legates handes, it was thought neceſſarie to ſende a garriſon thither: From Vareſa the Svvizzers ſent a trompet to defye the kinges liefetenant, who hauing aſyet but a ſlender ſtrength of men at armes, and no more then two thouſande footemen, whereof he was not yet reſolued to make newe leauies for feare to diſpleaſe the king, was nowe come to Aſſaron a place about xiij. miles from Millan: he had no intention to feight with them, but to accoaſte them and cut of their vittells, in which action onely reſted his hope to lette and ſtay them, ſeeing there was not betweene Vareſa and Millan neither ryuers harde to paſſe, nor any place of defence. From Vareſa, the Svvizzers marched to Galera, where they muſtred their armie whiche conteined ten thouſande hable bodies: Monſr de Foix who followed Iohn Ia. Triuulce, put him ſelfe within Leguano, which is about iiij. miles from Galera: By reaſon wherof they of Millan hauing more feare then aſſurance, and yet their perill aſyet leſſe then their ſuſpicion, waged bands of footemen at their proper charges for the garde of their towne: Alſo Theoder Triuulce cauſed to fortifie the baſtillions, and (as though the armie would haue retyred within Millan) he cauſed to caſt ſquares and Cariers within and about the rampiers that enuironed the ſuburbes, the more eaſily to manage horſes. Neuertheles, Monſr de Foix accompanied with fiue hundred launces, and the two hundred Gentlemen of the kings, preſented himſelfe before Galera, with great ſtore of artilleries: which aſſoone as the Svvizzers were aware of, they iſſued out in order of battell, and retired eftſones within the towne, refuſing to feight in a place open vnleſſe their numbers were greater. During theſe actions, and in a ſmall reſpite of time, their numbers increaſed, in which reſpect determining no more to refuſe the feight, they marched to Buſty, where was a garriſon of an hundred launces, who ſaued them ſelues with much a do, loaſing their baggage and part of their horſes: At laſt the Frenchmen, who retyred alway by the like meaſure and diſtaunce that tht Svvizzers aduaunced, were returned and lodged within the ſuburbes of Millan, but there was no ſuretie that they would ſtay and ſtande to defence, for that ſometimes they affirmed and ſometimes denied, furniſhing with great diligence the Caſtells with vittayles. The Svvizzers afterwardes marched within two miles of the ſuburbes, but the vniuerſal feare that was had of them before, began now to diminiſh much, both for that the bandes of mē at armes that were reuoked began to arriue continually at Millan: and beſides, they muſtred many footemen, exſpecting alſo from time to time Captaine Molard wirh his regiment of Gaſcon footemen, and Captaine Iacob with hys launceknightes, the one directed to come from Verona, and the other from Carpy: About this time alſo were ſurpriſed certayne letters written by the Svvizzers to their Lordes, whom they aduertiſed that the Frenchemen gaue them no great impedimentes, pedimentes, And that albeit they had as yet receiued no newes from the Pope, and lesse intelligence what the Venetian armie did (whereof they marueyled) yet they forbare not to marche and aduaunce continually according to the orders of the resolution. They were by this time xvj. thousande in number and turned towardes Moncia, which they assayed not to take, but bearing more towards the ryuer of Adda, they kept the Frenchmen in feare that they woulde aduenture to passe ouer: By reason whereof they caste a bridge at Cassan to hinder their passage, vsing therein thopportunitie of the towne and the bridge. In this meane while a capteine of the Svvizzers hauing first obteined safeconduit, came to Millan and demaunded a monethes paye for all the footemen which offred to returne into their countrey: But being departed without any effect of his message, for that their offers were farre inferiour to his asking, he returned the day following with greater demaundes: and albeit there were made to him greater offers then the day before, yet assoone as he was returned to his armie he sent backe immediatly a trompet to signifie to them that they woulde no more harken to accorde: The day following contrarie to thexspectation of euery one, they retired towards Coma, and so returned into their countreys, leauing to iudge whether they were discended to assayle the Duchie of Millan, or to passe into some other place: and also for what cause, beeing as yet constrayned by no euident necessitie, they returned so sodenly: and if they were affore determined so to do, why they did not accept the money that was offred them, seeing withall, them selues made the demaundes. What so euer the cause was, this is certayne, that as they retyred, there came two postes from the Pope and the Venetians, who if they had arriued somewhat sooner, it is likely the armie of the Svvizzers had not returned: And it is not to be doubted, that if at the same time that the Svvizzers entred the Duchie of Millan, the Spaniardes had bene neare to Bolognia, the affayres of the French who were not hable to make resistance in so many places, had forthwith falne into manyfest ruine and perdition.

The French king finding nowe by experience the perill which he could not foresee afore by reason, sent to Monsr de Foix (before he knewe of the breaking vp of the Svvizzers) that he should not spare neither labour, money, nor diligence, to make agreement with them: And not doubting of any other violent assault, the Svvizzers beeing compounded withall, he gaue present direction to all the men at armes that he had in Fraunce (except two hundred launces which he reserued for Pikardy) to passe the Mountes, sending besides a new strength of Gascon footemen, and commaunded Monsr de Foix to furnishe his armie with footemen of Italians and launceknightes. And becausé the succors of the Florentins were of great importance to him, both for that the warre was made very neare them, and also for thopportunitie of their frontiers to trouble thestate ecclesiastike, besides cutting off of vittayles and other commodities from tharmie of the enemies if they should approch Bolognia, he solicited them with great instance, to declare on his side and ioyne with him in the warre with all their forces, for that the present necessitie required an other matter then eyther a succor litle or limited, or that they should nowe stande conteined within the tearmes of confederations: Besides, they could neuer exspecte a more great or goodly occasion to binde him perpetually to them, nor do a more singular benefite or pleasure which both he and his successors should reknowledge to them and their estate from age to age: Lastly he tolde them that if they discended into the matter with necessarie consideration, they shoulde finde that to succor and defende him, did comprehende to support and protect their owne cause, for that they were not ignorant what hatred the Pope bare to them, and with what desire the king Catholike laboured to dresse and establishe in that Citie an estate depending wholly vpon him. But at Florence the opinions of men varied and were deuided, for many blinded with the sweetnes of present sparing, considered not what the tyme to come might bring: and with others preuayled not a litle the memorie of auncient dealings, wherein neither the fayth nor the actions of that cõmon weale had bene at any time thankfully requited by the king raigning, nor by Charles the eyght his predecessor: They remembred howe he had solde with a great price his promise, not to hinder them in the recouery of Pisa, by which examples they sayde they had no reason to trust eftsones in his promises, neither could they stande assured by any offers he could make, that he would yeelde recompence, for any office or benefite they should do to him: In these respectes they helde it great rashnes to resolue to enter into a warre, which not well succeeding they should partake in all the euills more then eyther reason would, or in due proportion they ought: and falling out happily, they should in no sort communicate with the fruites and benefites, or at least in very small parte and share. But of farre greater importance were they, who either for hatred, or for ambition, or for the desire of an other forme of gouernment, were opposed agaynst the Magistrate or Gonfalonnier: They extolled the reasons afforesayde, and inferred others, that beeing newters they should not incurre the hatred of eyther partie, nor giue to any of the two kings iuste occasion to complayne: for that touching the french king, they were not bound to him in any other thing, then to ayde him with three hũdred men at armes for the defence of his proper estates, a proportion which they had already accomplished to him: And for the king of Aragon, he could not be discontented with them, but would esteeme it a great gayne if they would forbeare to intermeddle otherwise in that warre. They occupied also this reason that suche as kept their fayth best, were most worthy of prayse and merite: and by that example he was to hope that when he shoulde fall into affayres and doings, they would likewise obserue iustly to him that which was promised in the capitulation made in common with the French king and with him: That proceeding in this sort, if peace were made betwene the Princes, the Citie should be named and preserued of them both: And in case the victorie should fall to the one of them, neither holding him selfe offended, nor bearing them any particular hatred, they should more easily buy his friendship with the same money and happely with a lesse quantitie, then they should haue disbursed vpon the warre, which was an expedition & meane, with the which, more then by armies and warres, their elders had many times saued their libertie: where if they should proceede otherwise, they should defray for an other during the warre and without any necessitie, intollerable exspences: And yet the victorie falling to thenemie, the libertie and safetie of their countrey should remayne in most manifest perill: The aduise of the Magistrat or Gonfalonnier was contrarie to thoppinions of these men: he helde it better that the common weale should take armes for the French king, for which reason he had afore fauoured the councell, and giuen to the Pope sufficient matter to be discontented, to thende that the Citie beeing prouoked by him, or at least beginning to enter into suspicion, might be as it were constrayned to make that resolution: he perswaded besides, that in that nature of time it could not be but a councell preiudiciall, to remayne ydle, exspecting the issue of the warre managed so neare them, and betwene Princes so mightie and farre aboue them: for that in the warres of an other, then is newtralitie commendable and apt to shake off and auoyde many troubles

bles and exſpences, when our proper forces are not ſo weake as may make vs feare the victorie of eyther partie, ſeeing that then it bringeth vs a ſuretie, and oftentimes by their long warres, we are enhabled to good meanes to encreaſe our eſtate: He tolde them it was no ſure foundation not to haue offended eyther partie, or not to haue giuen any iuſt occaſion to complayne, for that very rarely it happneth that the inſolencie of the conqueror is brydled or repreſſed eyther by equitie, iuſtice, conſcience, or other diſcrete conſiderations, the ſame beeing the reaſons whye great Princes eſteeme them ſelues not the leſſe iniuried, when they are refuſed in the things they deſire, but ſtande diſdainefull agaynſt euery one that followeth not their will, and ioyneth not their mindes to their fortune: The Prince for the time he cõmaundeth hath his fortune hardly brought to limitte his deſires, or in his ambition to reſpect other things then ſuche as may glorifie his victories: That it was a follie to beleeue that the French king would not take it for an offence, to ſee himſelfe left abandoned in ſo great perills, to finde that the effects nothing aunſwered the confidence and exſpectation whiche he had in the Florentins, bothe touching matters which he promiſed to himſelfe of them, and alſo for thinges which they had ſo oftentimes aſſured: That it was alſo a greater follie to beleeue that the Pope and the king of Aragon beeing victors, would not diſpoſe immoderately of the victorie agaynſt that common weale, waighing with thinſatiable hate of the one, the ioynt deſire of them both, to erect there a gouernment to their fancie, leaſt that Citie remayning in her libertie, woulde be alwayes more inclined to the Frenche then to them: Thexperience and proofe of which deſire might be eaſily diſcerned, in that the Pope (the king Catholike approuing it) had preferred the Cardinall Medicis as Legate to tharmie: So that as to remayne Newter, was as muche as to offer them ſelues a willing pray to who ſoeuer ſhould become victor: ſo, in ioyning to the one of them, at the leaſt, by his victorie, they ſhould be aſſured and preſerued, a reward and fruite to be well conſidered vpon, ſeeing the daunger wherein were reduced theſtate of their affayres: And in caſe the peace were made, they ſhould reape benefites vnder better conditions: But to whether of the parties they ought rather to ioyne themſelues, it was ſuperfluous to diſpute, for that there was no compariſon betweene friendſhippes auncient, experienced, and tryed, and fauors newe, vncertayne, and doubtfull: Leſſe doubt to followe an auncient amitie, by whoſe meane albeit the common weale had not bene rewarded and recompenced, at leaſt it had bene oftentimes defended and preſerued, then to embraſe newe fauours & leagues which would be neuer vnaccompanied with their infidelities and ſuſpicions. The Magiſtrate occupied in vayne theſe diſcourſes, ſuche beeing the moſte hindrers of his aduiſe, whome it greeued moſt that it ſhould come to the French kings knowledge that it was by his meane and working that the Florentins ſhoulde be ioyned with him: Suche is the propertie of enuy, not onely to wiſhe harme to an other, but alſo to lette that by an other no good be done. The Adder doth ſhoote out his ſting, and partaketh no more after with poyſon: but the man of enuie, when he can do no more harme of him ſelf, forbeareth not to let an other to do good. Amid theſe contentions, one faction breaking thaduiſe of the other, there could be eſtabliſhed no reſolution, whether they ſhould declare, or ſtande newters: Their counſels oftentimes were very vncertayne, their affections different, their willes contrarie, and their deliberations repugnant in them ſelues, without concluding any grace or merite towards any partie. But that which more is, proceeding with theſe incertenties, they ſent (to the great diſpleaſure of the Frenche king) Embaſſador to the king of

Aragon, Frauncis Guicciardin Doctor of Lawe, he who wrote this preſent hiſtorie, and at that time of ſo young age, that, according to the lawes of the contrey, he was vnhable to manage any office: and yet they gaue him not ſuche natures of commiſſions, as thereby he was hable to make the confederates to leaue off in any ſort their yll diſpoſitions.

But a little after the Svvizzers were returned to their countreys, the Popiſh and Spaniſh ſouldiours began to enter into Romagnia, whoſe comming bringing more feare then perill, made all the townes which the Duke of Ferrara helde on this ſide Pavv, except the Baſtillion of la Foſſe and the foard of Geniuola, to render at the ſommonce of a ſimple trompet. And for that the whole regimentes were not yet aſſembled & arriued in Romagnia, nor the artilleries which the Viceroy exſpected at Ymola: it was thought good, to thende the tyme ſhould not be ſpent without profite, that Peter of Nauarre Captayne generall of the Spaniſh footemen, ſhould go to beſiege the Baſtill: he begon to batter it with three peeces of artillerie, and finding it more harde to be taken then he looked for, both for the quantitie of munitions being aptly applied and executed, and for the reſolute defence of the ſouldiours, beeing fiftie hable bodies, he cauſed to make two bridges of wood to giue a greater commoditie to the ſouldiours to paſſe the diches whiche were full of water: And aſſoone as he might cary with him thoportunitie of theſe bridges, the thirde day after his approching before the Baſtill, which was the laſte day of the yere 1511. he gaue a furious aſſault, and ſuch as after a long and braue feight, the footemen winning the walles with the helpe of their ladders, at laſt tooke it, making ſlaughter almoſte of all the footemen defendantes together with their capteine. Peter of Nauarre left two hundred footemen within the Baſtill, contrarie to thopinion of Iohn Vitelli, who aſſured that it was ſo much ſhaken with artillerie, that there was no poſſibilitie to defende it without making new fortifications: But he was ſcarſly returned to ioyne him ſelfe with the Viceroy, ere the Duke of Ferrara, being gone thither with nine great peeces of artillerie, aſſaulted it with ſuche furie, that laying open a little place reuerſed in many partes, he entred by force the very ſame daye of his enterpriſe, where were ſlayne partly in fighting, and partly to reuenge the death of his people, the Captayne with all his footmen. The Duke himſelfe was hurt on the head with a ſtoane, which did him little harme for the defence of his head peece, his vallour carrying him further into perill then belonged to the regarde of ſuche a perſonage, if in noble men honor and reputation were not dearer then life.

In this meane while all the regiments eccleſiaſtik and Spaniſhe were aſſembled at Ymola, mightie in numbers, braue ſouldiours, and valiaunt capteines: for as the brute went, the king of Aragon had there a thouſande men at armes, eight hundred mounted vpon Iennets, and eight thouſande footmen Spaniſhe, to whome beſides the perſon of the Viceroy, were ioyned many barons of the kingdome of Naples, of whom the moſt notable and renowmed by experience of armes, was Fabricio Colonno, in whom was inueſted the title of Gouernor generall, Proſper Colonno hauing refuſed it, for that in the warre he could not brooke to be ſubiect to the commaundementes of the Viceroy. On the Popes ſide there were eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, and eight thouſande footemen Italians vnder M. Anth. Colonno, Iohn Vitelli, Malateſta Baillon ſonne to Iohn Paule, Raphael de Pazzi, with other leaders and capteines, all ſubiect to thobedience of the Cardinall de Meditis, Legate: onely they had not as yet a capteine generall, for that the Duke of Termini whom the Pope had choſen as one in whom the king of Aragon reappoſed muche, dyed at Ciuita Castellana comming to tharmie: And the Duke of Vrbin to whom that place was wont to be transferred, came not at all, eyther for that suche was the Popes pleasure, or else that he helde it as a thing vnworthy of him euen vpon the territories and lands of the Church, to obey a Viceroy bearing authoritie of capteine generall ouer the whole armie of the confederates.

With this Armie plentyfully furnished with artilleries whiche were almoste all come from the Realme of Naples, they determined to bring the campe before Bologna: Not that they were not ignoraunt that the enterprise was of very harde action, seeing howe easily the Frenche men might minister succours: but for that there was no other sorte of enterprise whiche conteyned not greater difficulties and impedimentes: And to remayne ydle with so greate an armie, coulde not be without manyfest argumente of cowardise. Moreouer the Pope made so greate instaunce to embrace some enterprise, that who so euer woulde put into consideration the difficulties, seemed to giue him occasion to beleeue and cause to complayne, that the sleightes and wyles of the Spaniardes beganne to appeare. The forwarde horse is not holden backe with the brydle without foaming and shewing his furie: The streame that runneth is not stayed contrarie to his course, without roaring and making a noyse: And to the mynde desirous, euery little impediment is greeuous, and with hys trouble bringes both suspicion and feare (exspectation of it selfe beeing no lesse ielouse then infinite in desire.) In these respectes the Viceroy causeth the Armie to marche, incamping betweene the ryuer of Adice and Bologna, where, after he had giuen order to thinges necessarie for the besieging of that Citie, and turned the Channells which go to Bologna by the ryuers of Rhene and Sauanna, he approched neare the walls, he stretched out and bestowed the greatest parte of his armie betweene the mountayne and the waye that goeth from Bologna to Romagnia, and that for the commoditie of vittailes that come from that side: Fabricio Colonno with the auauntgarde conteining seuen hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horsmen, and six thousand footmen, was lodged betwene the bridge of Rhene standing vpon the high waye of Romagnia whiche leadeth into Lombardy, and the gate S. Felix beeing also vppon the same waye, and that to obiect more easie impediments for any French succors to enter: And because they would commaunde the mountaynes, they bestowed one parte of their bandes of souldiors in the Monasterie of S. Michaell of the wood which is very neare the Citie, but seated in a high place and commaunding ouer it: They also made themselues Lord of the Church which is more high called S. Maria on the Mount. In Bologna, besides the people that bare armes happly more by necessitie then by nature, with certaine trowpes of horsmen and footmen waged by the familie of Bentiuoley, Monsr de Foix had sent thither two thousand launceknights, and two hundred launces, vnder Odet de Foix and Yues Allegre very notable Capteines, the one for his long experience in warre, and the other for the nobilitie of his house ioyned to the great tokens of valor that euen his youth did expresse: with them was capteine Saietta and Vincent called the great deuill: Neuertheles they reapposed more surety in the succors which Monsr de Foix had promised them, then in their proper forces, bothe considering the great circuite of the Citie, and also wayghing thincommodities that were on the Mountayne syde: Besides, there were no other fortifications, then suche as for the present daunger were made in haste, and the Bentiuolois distrusted manye of the Nobilitie and people: And lastly they had made a late experience about the Bastill of Geniuola, that the vallour of the Spanishe footemen aunswered the prayſes that haue gone on them in all tymes, to bee men apte to beſiege townes by reaſon of their great agilitie: Neuertheleſſe they beganne eftſoones to be aſſured, when they ſawe thenemies aduaunced litle, lying nyne dayes about the walles without dooing any thing, ſauing that they beganne with two Sakers and two Colueringes planted in the Monaſterie of S. Michaell to ſhoote in vayne into the Citie, rather to terrifie men then to hurt howſes: An execution whiche they gaue ouer immediatly, knowing by experience that in dooing little domage to thennemie in that ſorte, they made alſo an vnprofitable waſte of their Munitions. The matter that kepte them ſo long from dooing any thing, was an aduertiſement that they had the ſame daye they incamped, that Monſr de Foix beeing then come to Finalo, waged ſouldiours from all partes, with intention (which he cauſed to be iuſtified with a brute running) to offer him ſelfe to all perills for the preſeruation of the Citie, knowing howe muche it woulde preiudice thaffayres of the king, and no leſſe diminiſhe his owne reputation, if he ſuffred a Citie of that importance and conueniencie to be taken out of his handes. This made them drawe into councell to debate better, not onely on whiche ſide they might beſiege it with moſte hope and greateſt facilitie, but alſo by what wayes they might lette the Frenche ſuccours for entring: In the firſte councell it was aggreed, that Fabricio Colonno paſſing to the other ſyde of the towne with his due prouiſions of vittayles and artilleries, ſhoulde lodge vppon the hill ſyde beneath S. Maria of the Mount, from whence he might both eaſily giue impedimentes to any that ſhoulde attempt to enter into Bolognia, and yet he ſhould not be ſo farre deuided from the reſidue of the armie, as not to be ſuccoured in time what perill ſoeuer could happen: And that at the ſame time they ſhould begin from that part where they were incamped, or very neare, to batter the towne. Suche as were thauthors of this counſell, alleaged, that as all that the french helde in Italie depended wholly vpon the preſeruation of tharmie, ſo, it concerned Monſr de Foix in diſcreſſion and all good reſpects, not to hazarde to do any thing, in thexecution wherof he might be conſtrayned to fight: And much leſſe would he be of that iudgement, albeit he knew he might do it in ſuretie, to encloſe himſelf with al his army within Bolognia: An action wherin he ſhould depriue himſelf of all meanes to ſuccor in caſes of neceſſity theſtate of Millan, which was not as yet wholly aſſured from the mouings of the Svvizzers, and where alſo was greater doutes to be aſſayled by the Venetian army, which beeing come vpon the marches of Verona, ſeemed to threaten the town of Breſſia. Theſe reaſons being layd in conſideration with thennemie and his eſtate, and waighed withal with the examples & experiences of times paſt, ſeemed at the firſt to cary much in the minds of men: But the day folowing almoſt all ſuch as had approued this councell, were of opinion contrarie, conſidering it was not a thing certayne that the Frenche armie would not come, and if it dyd come, the vauntgard only would not ſuffice to reſiſt them. They ſayd alſo that that deliberation was not to be approued which was eſtabliſhed vpon ſuche a fundation that it reſted alwayes in the power of thenemie to innouate or chaunge it: for this cauſe the aduiſe of Peter of Nauarre was allowed by the Viceroy, to whom onely he communicated his opinion, that making prouiſion for fiue dayes, & leauing a garde only in the church of S. Michael, al the army ſhould paſſe to the other ſide on the city, where both might be obiected cõuenient impediments, that thenemy ſhould not enter: and alſo the towne, not fortified on that ſide (neuer fearing to be there aſſailed) they ſhould be hable without doubt to cary it in fiue dayes. But aſſone as this reſolution was diſpearſed amongeſt the armie and generall bands of ſouldiours, there was

none whiche did not openly reproue the direction to go lodge with tharmie in a place mearely voyde of all traffike of vittells whiche were brought from Romagnia: which as it was the onely meane to sustayne and nourishe the armie, so no doubt it could not stand vndissolued and broken, if within fiue dayes it enforced not Bologna. And what is he (sayth Fabricio Colonno) that can assuredly make promise of suche a thing within so short a time, seeing there is nothing lesse likely to come to passe then that whiche dependes vppon many daungers and difficulties: Matters of enterprise can not be warranted by coniectures onely, seeing oftentimes they draw with them so many accidentes, that euen the wisedomes of the wisest men are found vnperfect to assure them: What reason is there that vnder a vayne hope, which of her proper nature is fallible and subiect to chaunces, we should offer so glorious an armie to so manifest a daunger? It is more honorable to auoyde a perill by counsells and considerat ons, then by too muche rashnes and presuming to offer our selues to an action wherein the confidence is farre lesse then the dispayre: Who seeth not, that our houres & tyme limited being ronne out, we haue no possibilitie to retyre our selues & our people made hungry, disordred, and feareful, without our losse and certaine ouerthrowe, hauing Bologna in our face, where is a great masse of people and many souldiours, and at our backs the French armie which will not ouersee the oportunitie of our great presuming and securitie. Some others aduised, that bestowing in the vauntgard a greater strength of footmen, it should incampe on thother side of Bologna almost at the foote of the mountaine betwene the gate Seragossa and S. Felix, fortifying them selues with trenches and other defenses: And from that side the towne should be battred, being there not onely the weakest in walles and rampiers, but also by planting some peeces of thartillerie aboue the mountayne, they should execute in flanke during thassault, such of the defendantes as would come to the breach. This counsell also was reiected as not sufficient to let the comming of the Frenche: and no lesse daungerous, for that if they shoulde be charged by thennemie, the armie, notwithstanding it commaunded the mountaynes, coulde not discende to their succors in lesse time then three houres. Amid these variations and ambiguities, being farre more easie to reproue the counsells that were propounded by others, then to open other aduises that deserued to bee followed: At laste the capteines grewe to a deuise to assayle the towne on that side wherein the armie was already incamped: A resolution which amongest other reasons tooke furtherance by an opinion they had that Monsr de Foix would not come at all, since he lingred so long: Therfore they began to caste platformes to bring the artillerie to the walles, and called backe the vauntgarde to incampe together with the others. But a little after they had many aduertisementes that the Frenche bandes increased dayly at Finalo, which reuiuing eftsones their former suspicion of their comming, there might be discerned amongst them a newe diuersitie and disagreement of opinions: for euery one being of this minde, that if Monsr de Foix approched, they should laye to set vpō him afore he entred Bologna, many perswaded that in that case, thartillery planted already before the walls, which then should be retired, would giue many impedimēts & difficulties to tharmy: A matter in such tearmes of affaires, both dangerous & hurtfull: Others reasoned, that it was no lesse to their infamie then to their hurt, to remayne so many dayes about the walles of Bologna without dooing any thing, both confirming at one time the courage of those that were within, and giuing leasure to such as were without to prepare to succour them: And therefore it were not beste to [illegible] anye longer to plant thartillerie, but in suche place as it might be easily retyred, making, the better to oppose agaynst the Frenche men, the platformes so large, that both the artilleries and the armie might be hable to moue together: The Legat was fully with them that gaue counsell to begin to batter the towne, both for the displeasure he had of so long deferring, and also somewhat suspecting least the matter had bene wrought by the direction and fancie of the king of Aragon, according to the subtleties & dissembled maner of procedings of the Spanish: he complayned that if from the first incamping they had begon to batter the towne, they might happly afore that time haue bin masters of it: That it belonged not to noble men of warre to ioyne fault vnto fault, & much lesse to remaine as enemies about a towne, and yet expresse no valour to assayle it: That the Pope sent to him dayly corriers and postes, but he knewe no more what to answere and alleage, holding it a dishonor to enterteine & norish him any longer with promises & vaine hopes: Lastly, that it touched much the reputation of a general to prepare to an enterprise which he durst not execute. These wordes moued not a litle the Viceroy, complayning much againſt his importunitie & hast, that he being a man of no trayning in armes nor exercises of warre, would so vehemētly solicit a resolution so rash and dangerous, he said that in those counsels there was debated thintereſt of all the world, wherin yet they could not procede with such absolute maturity as there were not further nede of deper counsel & cōsideration: that there were no humane things more suttle & intricate then thenterprises of warre, nor any worldly accidēt of more cōpassion then the losse of a battell: that the counsels of warre drew with them infinite considerations and reasons, and yet kept alwayes suppressed and reteined some secrets which the wisedome of men could not finde out: that it was the custome of Popes and common weales to enter willingly into warre, and afterwardes thexpenses and perplexities encreasing aboue exspectation, to wishe the ende with vndiscrete desires: he willed him to giue ouer to the Capteines the deliberations of thinges, who hauing the same intention that he had, were somewhat aboue him in thadministration and experience of a warre: Lastly Peter de Nauarre, in whom the Viceroy reappposed moste, alleaged, that in an expedition of so great importance, men ought not to respect so much the distance of two or three dayes: and therefore it was necessarie to continue the counsell & direction for prouisions necessarie, aswell for the besieging of Bolognia, as for the battell, and for their better gouernment afterwards according to the proceedings of the French: two daies passed afore could appeare any light of the better resolution, for that Monsr de Foix, to whome Centa, Piaua, with many other borowes of the countrey of Bolognia were rendred, remayned still at Finalo, where he layed to reassemble his forces and bandes of souldiors, who aswell for that they had bene distributed in many places, as also that his foote-bandes which he had waged were long in comming, could not so sodenly come to the muster: So that, no further cause of deferring appearing, at laste the artilleries were planted agaynst the walles, about thirtie fadomes neare the gate of S. Stephen whiche leades to Florence, where the wall turning and crooking towardes the gate called Chastillon that hath his prospect vppon the mountayne, maketh an angle. And at the same tyme Peter de Nauarre was about to make a mine drawinge more towards the gate of the way of Chastillon, on that side the wall where within is a litle chappell called Barbacana, to thende that thassault beeing giuen at the same instant, they might with more difficultie make resistance beeing deuided, then if they were vnited and ioyned, to defende one onely place: Moreouer following still their firste thoughtes to oppose agaynst the French men, they gaue order that the vauntgarde should ſhould returne to the lodging where it was before: The artilleries brought downe to the earth in xxiiij. houres an hundred fadomes of wal: and the towér of the gate was battred with ſuch furie, that being no more hable to mainteine defence, it was abandoned, ſo that they might very conueniently giue thaſſault on that ſide: But they exſpected til the mine were accompliſhed, notwithſtanding by the raſhnes of the ſouldiors, thaſſault was almoſt executed the ſame day in diſorder: for certayne Spanishe footmen being climed vp by a ladder to a hole which had bin made in the towre, diſcended that way into a litle houſe whiche on the inner ſide belonged to the walles, wherein was no garde: which being found by the other bands of footmen, they had all ronne thither by heapes, if the capteines hearing of the noyſe, had not repreſſed their wilfulnes: But after the defendantes, hauing leauyed a Cannon iuſte with the houſe, had ſlayne one part of them, the others fled for ſafetie from the place where vndiſcretly they entred to ſeeke for perill: And whyleſt they were buſie about the mine, others labored in the armie to make bridges of wood, and to fill vp the diches with baskets and earth, the better to be hable (marching as it were in a playne way) to bring the footemen to the wall which had bene well battred, and to drawe euen vpon the ruines ſome peeces of artillerie, to thend that in the execution of thaſſault, the defendants ſhould not be hable to continue the reſiſtance: But the Frenchmen, ſeeing into theſe preparations, & diſcerning withal that the people began already to giue thẽ ſelues ouer to feare, ſent immediatly to pray ſuccors of Monſr de Foix, who diſpatched thither the ſame daye a thouſand footmen, and the daye after fourſcore launces: a matter which made the enemies beleue aſſutedly that he was determined to paſſe no further, it ſeeming a matter not likely nor congruent that he would ſeperat from himſelfe one part of his ſtrength if he had an other intention: But truely ſuche was his meaning, for that holding that ſuccor ſufficient to defend Bologna, he would not without neceſſitie aſſay the fortune of the battell. At laſt the mine was accompliſhed, & the army ſtanding in order of battell to go forthwith to thaſſalt, for the execution wherof with greater ſtrength the vauntgard was reuoked, Peter of Nauarre cauſed fire to be put to the mine, which with ſo great noyſe & fury blew vp ſo high the wall and chappell, that in that ſpace and diuiſion was made open to thoſe without, the intralls of the Citie within together with the maner of the ſouldiors prepared to defende it: But falling eftſones downe agayne, the whole wall tooke the ſame place from whence the violence of the fire had driuen it, and was ſo reioyned and knitte agayne as if there had not bene any ſeparation or remouing at all: ſo that being impoſſible for the ſouldiours to go to thaſſault on that ſide, the Capteines iudged it no leſſe harde to follow it on the other part: They of Bologna interpreted this aduenture to a miracle, ſaying it was impoſſible without diuine ayde that the wall ſhoulde fall and reioyne ſo iuſtly vppon his olde foundations: for which cauſe the Chappell was afterwardes increaſed and frequented of the people in great deuotion. This ſucceſſe (as though there remayned nothing elſe to be feared touching thaffayres of Bologna) was the cauſe that Monſr de Foix thought good to go to Breſcia, both for an eſpiall he had that the Venetian armie drew that way, and alſo for feare leaſt thinhabitants there fell not into ſome want and neceſſitie, for that by reaſon of the perills of Bologna he had lefte there a very ſlender garriſon, and nó leſſe doubted of ſecret practiſes and intelligences: Neuertheleſſe he chaunged opinion at the contemplation and requeſtes of the Capteines that were within Bologna, who ſometimes alleaged to hym that yf he wente hys waye, the daungers of the warre woulde redouble and become greater then before, and ſometimes they gaue

him hope to ouerthrowe the campe of the enemies if he would but ioyne his presence to their valour: In regarde of which reasons accompanied with a deepe consideration of the perill of the affaires present, notwithstanding in the councel almost all the capteines were agaynst him, he issued very late out of Finalo: and the morning following, being but two houres of daylight, he drew towards Bologna with all his army in battell aray, laboring with importunitie of trauell against the snowes, the yse, & bitter wether: he entred by the gate of S. Felix, hauing with hin xiij. hundred launces, vj. thousand launceknights whom he had bestowed al in the vauntgard, and viij. thousand footmen aswell French as Italians: Being thus with great felicitie and valour entred into Bologna, he put into question to assaile the morning folowing the camp of the enemies, the souldiors making their sallies at three gates, & the people issuing out by the way of the mountaine: if this resolution had bin aduaunced he had found them not douting of his cõming: A matter which assuredly their capteins had no knowledge of, neither that day nor the most part of the day folowing: The executiõ was hindred by Yues Allegre who gaue counsel that the bands made wearie with the bitter wayes they had marched, should haue one day to repose themselues, thinking withal (which also any wise man might haue iudged) that it was not possible that so great an army, & in the broad day, & by the high way, could without their knowlege enter into a citie before the which they lay incamped. The same ignorance had also kept them abused the day after, if by aduẽture a Greeke stradiot had not bin taken being issued out of the skirmish amongst other horsmen: and beeing demaunded of the state of the towne, & what they did within it: he answered that he was hable litle to informe them, for that he had but entred the day before with the French armie: Vppon his words, confirmed both with fayth and constancie, the capteynes entred into such amaze & maruell, that they determined to leauy their campe, holding the danger to great to remaine there, aswel for the bitternes of the season which greatly afflicted the souldiors, as for the neighborhead of the citie whereinto so great an army was entred: They iudged it no policie to contend at one time, & with one force, against so many aduersities: thintemperance & afflictions of the season were more intollerable to them then the hande of thenemie, who yet could not but be fearefull, both for their numbers, their trayning, and their resolute mindes: They made also coniectures of the monstrous reioyning of the wall after it was blowen vp, a consideration whiche not the least increased their feare, though in souldiours vallour ought to be more ready then superstition. The night following, whiche was the xix day since their incamping, they retyred their artilleries with as litle brute as they could, & marched with their armie in good time along the high way towards Ymola, drawing along the playnes and squares by the which they came, in the middest of which was the high waye and the artillerie: and bestowing in their rearegard the flower of their armie, they marched & wonne way with surety, for that there issued none out of Bologna other then certayne French horsmen, who hauing made spoile of parte of the munitions and vittells, and therefore begonne to fall into disorder, were to their harmes repulsed euen to Bologna by Malatesta Baillon, who gouerned the last parte of tharmie.

Assoone as the campe was leauyed, Monsr Foix leauing three hundred launces and foure thousande footmen within Bologna, departed in great diligence to march to the succors of the Castel of Bressia, the Citie being taken by the Venetians, the day before he entred into Bologna: for Andrevv Gritti induced by Count Lovvis Auogato a gentleman of Bressia, the moste parte of the people of the contrey concurring also,

and

and hoping much that within the towne they would drawe to some mutinie, had passed by commaundement of the Senat with an armie of three hundred men at armes, xiij hundred light horsemen, and three thowsand footemen, the riuer of Adice at Albera which is a place neare to Leguague, and afterwards waded the foarde of Myncia at the turning mill betweene Croito and Valegge: And comming at last to Montcharo, he encamped by night at Castagnet a village within fiue miles of Bressia, & from thence made suddeine incursions with his horsemen euen to the gates: And at the same time the authoritie and affection to the name of S. Marke resounding in all places, Count Lovvys came hard to the gates with eight hundred men of the vallyes of Entropien and Sabina whome he had drawne into commocion, and sent his sonne on the other side of the citie euen to the gates with other cõpanies of footemen: But Andrevv Gritti, neither receiuing from within the citie those intelligences which he exspected, nor being made to him any such signes as were agreed, he helde him selfe preuented by the pollicie and well garding of the citie: And therefore, refusing to abide perill where he saw no tokens of sauetie, and at the same tyme the sonne of Auogato being taken prisoner by a sallye made out of the towne, he retyred to Montagnano from whence he departed at first, leauing a sufficient garde vpon the bridge which he had made vppon Adice: But being called againe not many dayes after, he repassed the riuer of Adice with two cannons and foure falconets and incamped at Castagnet, Count Lovvys beeing at the same tyme approched within a mile of Bressia with a great strength of the sayde vallye men: And albeit there were as yet small tokens or apparance of fauour from them within, yet, Gritty seeing his strength to be greater then it was, determined to venter to haue it by force: his vallour made him resolute against all doubtes of fortune, which is not the least vertue in a man of warre disposed to doe an enterprise: he brought all his paysants to the walls, and began to execute the assalt in three places, which albeit was ill followed at the gate of the tower, yet it did more happely succeede at the gate of the piles where Auogato fought, and at the gate La Garzula where the soldiours led by Baltazar Scipion entred by the yrõ grates, by the which the riuer (bearing his name of the towne) entreth into the citie: In this furie of thassalt, notwithstanding the resistance of the french men, who both seeing the ennemies enter the citie, and the townesmen conspyre in their fauor, they retyred into the castell together with Monsr du Lude their gouernor, losing their horses and baggage: In this tumult, that part of the towne which is called the Citadell and standeth separated from the residue of the citie, A part wherein almost all the Gebelins inhabited, was spoyled and sacked, except the houses of the Guelffes: After the conquest of Bressia, Bergama rendred immediatly except the two castells, whereof the one is in the middest of the citie, and the other standes within halfe a myle: This rendring happened not so much by the example of Bressia, as by the meane and working of certeine Citizens: Orciuecche, Orcinouo, and Pontuiquo, with many other places there about did the like: And perhaps much more had bene done, or at the least the victorie had bene better assured, if at Venice they had had a care necessary and conuenient both to send soldiours and artilleries to get the castell, which no doubt would haue made no great resistance, And also to create Magistrates for the well guiding of places already recouered: Their ioy was greater for the victorie they had gotten, then their prouision to preserue the thinges which their fortune had brought them: Their glory was farre aboue their pollicie which in men of warre is not the least errour, for that it makes them more apt to winne, thẽ able to hold: And this negligence of the Venetians was so much the more hurtfull, by how much more great was the celeritie and diligence of Monſr de Foix, who, hauing paſſed the riuer of Pavv at Stellato (from whence he ſent launces for the gard of Ferrara and fiue hundred french footemen) he paſſed alſo the riuer of Myncia at the mill bridge, hauing almoſt at the ſame time of his marching, ſent to demaunde paſſage of the Marquis of Mantua: his ſuddeine demaund of the Marquis drew one of theſe two reaſons, either to giue him no reſpit to take aduiſe in a matter ſo preſent and perentory, or els that the Venetian bandes ſhould be ſo much the later aduertiſed of his comming: A man of warre hath no one propertie more commendable then his celeritie and ſpeede, for that by aduauncing opportunities, he takes from his aduerſarie all councel, And by his quicknes ouercommeth the hardnes of things which otherwayes his vallour were not able to ſuppreſſe: The tyde that is driuen with a violence more then ordinary, beguileth the Mariner that ſtādeth to exſpect, but maketh much for the ſhip that taketh the benefit of it: There is no ſort of action wherein fortune more fauoreth men of enterpriſe, then when their celeritie is equall to their vallour, for that it cuts of from the enemy all diſcourſe of councel and makes him blind in the defenſe of his proper harmes. From thence he went the day after to Nogero vpon the territories of Verona, and the day following to Pontpeſere & to Treuilla three miles from Eskalo: where, receiuing aduertiſement that Iohn Paule Baillon was come from Frankcaſtel with three hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſemen and twelue hundred footemen, to encampe within the Ile of Eskalo: he made haſte thether to charge him with three hundred launces & ſeuen hundred Archers, the reſidue of tharmie comming after, which otherwayes could not march with ſuch diligence: But finding that he was remoued an hower affore his comming, he put him ſelfe in order to follow him without tarying: Ioh. P. Baillon had receiued aduertiſement that Barnardin de Montono to whom was left the garde of the bridge made at Albero, had broken it vp, hearing of the comming of the french, for feare he ſhould not be incloſed by them, and the launceknightes which were within Verona, whether Cæſar had a litle before ſent three thowſand footemen which he had in Fryull, being at that time releaſed of all gard at Fryull, for that all was returned to the power of the Venetians, except Gradiſqua, who more then the reſt expreſſed her fidelitie againſt the aduerſaties of the warre: for this cauſe Ioh. P. Baillon had gotten into Breſsia, if he had not bene told that a litle beneath Verona the riuer might be paſſed ouer by foard: But as he went to performe his paſſage, he diſcouered a farre of Monſr de Foix, whoſe incredible celeritie for that it was farre more then the reaport and renowme that went of him, he thought they could be no other trowpes then one part of the ſoldiours that were within Verona, And in that perſwaſion ranging his companies in battell araye, he taried their comming with great courage at the tower Magnanino, which is ſomewhat neare Adice, and of a very litle diſtance from the tower of Eskalo: The encownter of both parties was very furious with their laūces, and afterwards falling to other weapons, the battell was hoatly continued more then an hower: But the condicion of the Italians grew worſe and worſe, for that the other part was continually ſupplied with newe releefe of ſoldiours from the armie which was left behind: And albeit not ſo much by the vallour of their enemies as by their proper imbecillitie of numbers, they were often put to diſorder, yet by their vertue and gouernment they reaſſembled as often: At laſt, being not able to make a perpetual reſiſtance againſt the greater number, they were broken and put to flight, and were chaſſed by thennemie (the night now beginning) euen to the riuer which Ioh. P. paſſed in ſafetie, his fortune being better then many of his people who were drowned drowned by the furie of the chaſſe: In this medley were ſlaine and taken about foure ſkore and ten men at armes of the Venetians, Amongeſt whom fell into the calamitie of priſoners Guido Rangon and Baltazar Signorello de Perouſa: The footemen were all diſperſed and broken, and two falconnets loſt which was all they had to leaue to thennemie as monuments of that miſerable aduenture: In this calamitie, it ſeemed fortune reſpected much the french men, for that few of them fell into the mercie of thennemie, and fewer into the miſerie of impriſonment, (their felicitie with their vallour, making them free from thoſe daungers which reaſon and coniecture threw vpon them): The day after they encowntred Meleager de Furly with certeine light horſemen of the Venetians, whom they eaſily put to flight Meleager remeyning priſoner: And in this courſe of felicitie, holding it not neceſſary to loſe one hower of time, the ninth day after they parted from Bologna, Monſr de Foix with the vauntgard incamped within the ſubburbs of Breſcia about two croſbowſhootes from the gate of Tourlonguo, and the reſidue of tharmie more backeward along the way that leades to Peſquiero: Aſſoone as he was incamped, not giuing to him ſelfe as it were any leaſure to breathe, he ſent one part of his footemen to charge vppon the Monaſterie of S. Fridian, which is halfe way to the hill vnder the which he was incamped, and the hill kept by many payſants of the vallye Tropia: This gard was ſoone broken and moſt of them ſlaine by the footemen, who made their entrey into many places by clyming being fauored with certeine ſhowers of rayne by the which thartilleries that were in the Monaſterie could not execute: The day following Monſr de Foix ſent a trompet to ſomon the towne to render with condicions of ſauetie for their liues and goods, except the Venetians: And his Meſſenger being prowdly aunſwered in the preſence of Andrevv Gritty, he turned his armie to thother ſide on the towne to be more neare the caſtell, and was lodged in the ſubburbes of the gate called S. Johns gate: The morning following, euen by the firſt reuealing of the daye, he chuſed out of the mayne armie more then foure hundred men at armes all armed in white, and ſix thowſand footemen, part Gaſcons and part launceknightes, And with them putting him ſelf on foote, he went vp on that ſide towards the gate of the piles and entred without reſiſtance within the firſt waſte of the caſtell: where cauſing his companies to reſt and refreſhe them ſelues a litle, he encouraged them with ſhort ſpeeches to mount reſolutly vp to that riche and welthy citie, where the glorye and bootie would be greater without all compariſon then the paine or perill, hauing to fight with ſoldiours of Venice who were manifeſtly inferior to them in numbers, in vertue, and in fortune: he contemned their numbers, for that being people vnexperienced in warre, he iudged them more apt to flee then to fight: he bad them hope that the cowardiſe of ſome bringing diſorder to the reſidue woulde be the cauſe that the whole would fal into feare, negligence & confuſion: be put them in remẽbrance of their auncient victories wherein their vertue was no leſſe meritorius then their fortune: he told them that to men of action nothing more hindreth their glory then to be ſlow to take the benefit of occaſions, and the reſolute man neuer findeth want of fortune where he expreſſeth no want of vallour: he deſired them laſtly that as he had choſen them for the moſt valiant of the whole armie, ſo they would not bringe ſhame to them ſelues and to his iudgement, but that they would conſider what infamie and diſhonor it would be to them, if they who made profeſſion to enter cities notwithſtanding the reſiſtance of ſoldiours, of artilleries, of walls, and of rampiers, ſhould not now reioyce in their deſires, hauing no other impediment then men only in whom nothing was leſſe familiar then diſpoſicions to fight: Immediatly he put his footemen before his men at armes and began to march out of the caſtell, and at his going out he found certeine bandes of footemen who with their artillerie aſſayed to ſtoppe him for paſſing further: But his vallour making them to retyre, he diſcended furiouſly by the ſkirtes of the pallaice greene of the Capteine Burletto where the Venetian regiments well raunged and cloaſe together, exſpected him with great reſolucion: They fell immediatly to hand ſtrokes, when the medley was terrible for a long time, the one part fighting for their proper ſauetie, and the other part for glorye, ioyned to a deſire to ſacke a citie ſo full of riches: The Capteines, beſides their office to commaund and diſpoſe, moſt often tooke the places of meane ſoldiours, the vertue of Monſr de Foix being ſinguler aboue the reſidue: At laſt the Venetian armie were driuen from the place after they had made a wonderfull defenſe: In ſo much as the Conquerers, who nowe deuided them ſelues into two bandes, made their entrey, the one by the citie, and the other by the Citadel, finding in euery quarter and corner a meruelous reſiſtance by the ſoldiours and by the people, In whom it ſeemed their aduerſitie had nothing diminiſhed their vertue: But the french men being alwayes followed with victorie paſſed thorow all impediments and chaſſed all their ennemies that ſtoode affore them: They gaue not their mindes to pillage vntill they ſawe them ſelues abſolute Maiſters of the towne: ſuch was their direction of their Capteine, whom they obeyed and obſerued ſo iuſtly, that what ſoeuer he were that did otherwayes, he was forthwith ſlayne by his fellowes: In theſe encownters there dyed of the french parte many footemen and a greate number of men at armes: But of thennemies were left on the ground eyght thowſand dead carkaſſes, part of the people and part of the Venetian ſoldiours which were fiue hundred men at armes, eyght hundred light horſemen, and eyght thowſand footemen, amongeſt whom was Contaryn commaunder of the ſtradiots, who was ſlaine vpon the greene with a bullet of a harquebuze: All the reſidue were taken except two hundred ſtradiots who fled by a poſterne neare the gate of S. Nazareth, albeit with no better fortune, for that falling vppon the french armie which remeyned without the towne they were almoſt all taken or killed: They alſo immediatly after the execution entred the towne by the ſame gate, and falling to pillage aſwell as the reſidue, they enioyed the trauells and daungers of others: Andrevv Gritty & Anth. Iuſtynian whom the Senat had ſent into that citie as gouernour, remeyned priſoners together with Ioh. P. Manfron & his ſonne the Knight de la Volpe, Baltazar Scipion, one of the ſonnes of Anth. de Pio, Count Lovvys Auogato, and one of his ſonnes, and Domynik Buſechio Capteine of the ſtradiots: Theſe being chieftaines of tharmie were reſerued as miſerable examples of their owne calamitie: they were by the wretchednes and fortune of priſoners diſpoſed & caried about as beſt pleaſed the appetit of the Victors, ſometymes brought to behold the dead bodyes of their companions and friends, A ſpectacle lamentable to be compelled to ſee thoſe men deade, whom in life they ſo much honored and loued: And ſometymes appoynted to ſtande in the preſence of thennemie, taking ſpeciall glorie in that which to them could not be but an increaſe of diſcomfort: by ſtrait commaundement of Monſr de Foix, the honors of the women of religion were kept vndefiled, but their goods together with ſuch others, as for protection were conueyed into their couents, were made a praye to the Capteines: Count Lovvys was executed in the market place Monſr de Foix being preſent, and ſeemed to holde it a ſacrifice beſt acceptable and pleaſing to his eyes: his two ſonnes albeit they were for a tyme deferred, ſuffered in the ende the ſame payne, thauthoritie of the Victor raigning very iudicially ouer the liues of whome ſoeuer it pleaſed pleased him: In this sort by the vallour & fortune of the french men of whom they of Bressia vaunted to be discended, fell into this extremitie that citie, for nobilitie & dignitie nothing inferior to any other citie of Lombardye, but in riches and plentye, farre aboue them all except Myllan: And as the miseries that warre draweth with it are infinit, so the whole citie for seuen daies together was exposed to the couetousnes, to the lust, and to the crueltie of soldiours, thinges sacred aswell as prophane being percell of the pray, And no lesse the liues then the goods of men committed to the discression of spoylers: This victorie brought great reputacion to the name of Monsr de Foix, Italy, no lesse then the other regions of Christendō resounding much his glory, that by his celeritie and vallour in the space of xv. daies, he had compelled the armies Ecclesiastike and spanish to discampe from before Bolognia, ouerthrowne in the plaine fielde Ioh. P. Baillon with part of the Venetian regiments, and reconquered Bressia with so great aslaughter of soldiours and other sortes of peoples: it was confirmed by the iudgement of wise men, that touching enterprise and matters of warre, Italy had not felt the like of long time, the aduersitie farre exceeding the memorie and example of all times past.

After the action of Bressia together with the other places that were lost, of whom Bergamo drawne into rebellion by the ayde of very few of the towne, had by cōmon consent reuoked the french men before Monsr de Foix made his entrye into Bressia: And after Monsr de Foix had set downe a forme to thaffayres of Bressia, and had somwhat refreshed and reordered his armie made wearie with so great trauells, and no lesse disordered partly by keeping and partly by distribucion of the spoyle: he determined according to the kinges commaundement, to go seeke the armie of the confederats, which, after his departure from before the walls of Bolognia, was stayed vpon the landes of the Bolognois: To this direction the king was constrayned by many vrgent accidents, which droaue him into neceffitie to take newe councells for the sauetie and benefit of his affayres: for, he discerned manifestly that he should haue warre with the king of England, notwithstanding that king had in franke termes afore, assured him the contrary, And since, kept him in suspence with tokens and wordes doubtfull: The actions which were quite contrary to his promisses could be no more couered, for that there came aduertisement from Rome, howe he had at last approued and ratified the league by writing: Besides, the french king was not ignorant that in England were made great preparacions of men and ships, and in Spayne was rigged a great nauie to passe into England where was an vniuersall disposicion in all sortes of the people of that region, to make warre vppon the Realme of Fraunce: To this humor of the king & people, was much helping the arriual of a galeasse from the Pope laden with Greeke wines, with cheeses, and other prouisions, which distributed in his name to the king, Barons, and Prelats of the Realme, were receiued of all with a wonderfull gladnes: The common sort of people which oftentymes is no lesse caried by vaine and small thinges, then by matters more graue and great, ronne with generall admiracion to beholde the galeasse, accounting it so much more to their pleasure and glorie, by how much they had neuer seene in that Ile any vessell bearing the Popes banners: At last Bishop Morton, who had long negociated betwene the Pope and the french king, induced either by his conscience, or by desire to be Cardinall, was appoynted in an assembly of all the states of that ylande, where he shewed with equall fauor & full testimonie, what was the iustice of the Popes cause: Vppon this both it was determined to send the Prelats to the councell of Latran in the name of the whole Realme: And also, (the importunities of the Popes Embassador concurring) the king commaunded the french kings Embassador to depart out of the Realme: he published this reason of his commaundement that it was not cõuenient to enterteine about the person of a king and in a kingdome so deuout to the Churche, a man that represented a king so manifestly persecuting the sea Apostolike. Now began to be discouered the secret resolucion wherein the king of England with his armie by sea should molest the shoares of Normandy and Britaine, & should send eyght thowsand footemen into Spaine to make warre vpon the Duchie of Guyenne together with the forces of the king of Aragon: A suspicion which not a litle afflicted the french king, both for that the memorie of the warres past had made the english name very terrible to those peoples, and also he knewe the daunger woulde grow so much the greater by how much the spanish forces were ioyned with them: He was fearefull also by the consideracion of his owne weakenes, hauing sent into Italy all his companies of men at armes sauing two hundred launces, which if he should call backe eyther in part or in all, the Duchie of Myllan, which he esteemed much should remeyne in manifest perill: And if for his resupplie he should encrease the auncient band of eyght hundred launces, he could reapose litle confidence and hope for lesse assurance amyd so great daungers, in persons newly created and vnexpericnced: he added to this the suspicion of thallienacion of Cæsar which daily more and more encreased: for, notwithstanding Andrewe Burgos whom he had sent with so great exspectacion, and being returned, brought tydings that Cæsar was disposed to abide in the confederacion, yet he made offers of very harde condicions entermedling many cõplaints: for, he required of the king, to assure him to recouer al that apperteyned to him by the capitulacions of Cambray, alleaging that he could no more trust in simple promisses, for that he hath alwayes knowen, both from the beginning and since, that it was a matter very greeuous to the king that he should conquer Padoa, And that to consume and hold him in continuall, trauels he had willingly wasted two hundred thowsand duckats euery yeare, knowing that to him, the spẽding of l. thowsand was much more: That he had refused the last yeare to deliuer to him the person of Tryuulce, being a Capteine that had both the will and the experience to put a speedy ende to the warre: he required that the kings second Daughter being but two yeares olde, might be promised to his Nephew, in duing her for her dowrye with Burgonnye, and that the Daughter might presently be deliuered to his handes: Lastly that there should be left referred to him the quarrells of Ferrara, of Bolognia, and the controuersie of the councell, forbidding the french armie to march towards Rome, & protesting that he was not to endure that the king should any way encrease his estate in Italy: These condicions of them selues greeuous and almoste intollerable, were yet made more heauy by the experience he had, that notwithstãding he should accord to him so many thinges, yet he could not be assured that he would not varye, eyther according to occasions or according to his custome: yea, thiniquitie of the condicions offered, serued almost as a certeine argument that being already alienated from the french king, he sought thoccasion to put it to effect vnder some cooller, seeing that aswell in words as in works he disclosed many signes of an ill will: for, both the Proctors which he had so many tymes promised to sende to the councell of Pysa were not come with Burgos, and also the Prelats assembled at Auspurge, had at last made aunswer by a publike decree, that the councell of Pysa was schismatike and detestable, but yet with this moderacion that they were ready to chaunge sentence, if they might be resolued in the contrary by reasons more strong and auaileable: And yet notwithstanding the king, at a tyme when he stoode most

neede to assemble his forces, was constrayned to menteyne at the request of Cæsar two hundred launces and three thowsand footemen in Verona, & a garde of a thowsand footemen in Leguagne: Moreouer the feare of the Svvyzzers vexed not a litle the kings mind: for, albeit he had obteyned to send to their parliaments the Bayliffe of Amyens to whom he had giuen very ample commissions, and was nowe resolued by discreete councell, (if such may be called councells discreete as are taken when thoportunitie of helping is past) to spare no liberalities nor offers of money to reduce them to his amitie: yet what with the hatred of the Commons (which in this respit was made greater) and with thimportunate persuasions of the Cardinall of Syon, preuailing aboue thauthoritie of those that from parliament to parliament had hindred all resolucions that were to be made against him: it was discerned that they inclined to send 6. thowsand footemen to the pay of the confederats, who made demaund of them, to oppose against the firme squadrons of the launceknightes: Besides all this, the king found him selfe depriued of all hopes of peace and agreement, notwithstanding during the heate of the warre, there had bene great labor and solicitacion made by the Cardinall of Nantes and the Cardinall of Strigonia, A mightie Prelate of the Realme of Hungria: for, the Pope had made this last and resolute aunswer that if they would be better heard then before, they shoulde so bringe to passe that the diabolicall councel of Pysa might be reuersed, & see restored to the Church her cities of Bolognia and Ferrara: Wherein expressing no lesse violence in effects then furie in wordes: he had newly deposed from their dignities many of the french Prelats which were resorted to the councell, together with Phillipp Dece one of the most excellent lawyers of that time, both for that he had written and disputed in the iustice of their cause, and did follow the Cardinalls to be at hand for direction when matters required aduise and interpretacion of law: In all these difficulties, daungers, and aduersities which inuyroned the french king on all sides, he had not one firme or certeine footing in any part of Italy: The estates of Ferrara and Bolognia serued him (as in times past) more for vexacions and charges, then for any other vse: And touching the Florentyns to whom he made a new instance to ioyne with him in a warre against Romagnia, he could not draw from them other then general aunswers: No he rather held them suspected by reason of the Vicerois Embassador of Naples ordinarily remeining at Florence, but much more for that they had sent th Embassador to the king Catholike, & did no more communicat with him of their affaires, as they were wont: But most of all, for that hauing labored to prolonge the league which was finished within fewe moneths, without that they demaunded eyther money or other great obligacions, they temporised, to thende to be at libertie to take that part that seemed best for their sauetie, & conuenience of their affaires: The Pope also to augment this disposicion, & for feare withall, lest his too great seueritie and rigour induced them to follow with their force, the fortune of the french king, both gaue them absolucion of paines & censures, the common weale not suing for it, and also sent as Nuncio to Florence with very easie and gracious condicions, Ioh. Gossadin a Bolognois one of the Clerkes of the chamber Apostolike laboring to take from them the suspicion that they had had of him: So that the king seeing him selfe left alone against so many ennemies eyther already pronownced or very likely to be so, And hauing but very hard meanes of resistance, if so many aduersities should thunder vppon him in one time: he addressed speedy commaundement to Monsr de Foix, to march with as great diligence as he could against the army of the confederats, against whom, as he promised to him self the victory, supposing thē to be the weakest, so, being possessed of the victorie, he ſhoulde proceede to aſſayle Rome and the Pope without any reſpect, in the good yſſue and ſucceeding of which, he had opinion that he ſhoulde ſtande acquited of all his greate daungers; And to thende that both the enuye of thenterpriſe might bee diminiſhed, and his iuſtificacions the more increaſed, he gaue order that thenterpriſe ſhoulde be made in the name of the councell of Pyſa, by whom ſhould be aſſigned a Deputie Legat to goe with the armie, and vnder the ſayd name, to receiue the townes that ſhould be conquered.

Thus, Monſr de Foix, departing from Breſſia, came to Finalo, where he remeyned certeyne dayes, partely to make prouiſion of vittells that came out of Lombardye, and partely to reaſſemble and drawe into one ſtrength all his bandes which the king had ſent out of Italy except ſuch as by neceſſitie remeyned for the garde of townes, and partely for the great and ſuddeine raynes that fell, which gaue impediment to his marching: from thence he went to S. Georges which is vpon the territories of Bolognia, and thether came to him a new ſupplie of three thowſand footemen Gaſcons, A thowſand aduenturers, and a thowſand Pickards, all men of choyſſe and ſuch as the french men made great reputacion and reckoning of: his whole campe according to a iuſte number conteyned fiue thowſand launceknightes, fiue thowſand Gaſcons, and eyght thowſand Italians and frenche, with a thowſand ſix hundred launces comprehending the bande of two hundred gentlemen: The Duke of Ferrara was alſo to ioyne to this armie with a hundred men at armes & a great traine of good artilleries, Monſr de Foix hauing left behind him all his great ſhot and municions for the deepe and fowle wayes to drawe them: To this armie was alſo to come, and was already on his way, the Cardinall S. Seuerin appoynted Legat of Bolognia by the councel, he was a braue and valiant Cardinall bearing more inclinacion to armes then to holy exerciſes and contemplacions of religion, And leſſe giuen to the vocacion of the church or ciuil or priuat profeſſion, then to publike action & warlike imitacion: Aſſoone as Monſr de Foix had ſet downe theſe directions for his affayres, he marched forward to ſeeke thennemies, his vallour carying him in a burning deſire to fight with them, no leſſe for the continuall commaundements and incitacions of the king, then by a reſolute working and propertie of his owne minde, naturally thirſting after glorie, and in him ſo much the more vehement & kindled, by how much his former ſucceſſe and victories caried him into a weening of further fortune and felicitie: And yet he gaue not him ſelfe ouer ſo much to this humor of glory and deſire as that his intencion was to ſet vppon them raſhly, but approching neare their campe either to ſee if he could willingly drawe them out to the battell in ſome place where the qualitie of the ſituacion might giue leaſt impediment to his vertue, or els to conſtrayne them to fight in cutting of their vittells and their other ſuccours: But farre other was thintencion of thennemies, in whoſe armie (after the regiment of the Duke of Vrbyn was gonne vnder cooller of ſome controuerſie) were a thowſand foure hundred men at armes, a thowſand light horſemen & ſeuen thowſand ſpaniſh footemen, with three thowſand Italians newely leauyed: They were of this opinion that being both inferior in nũbers, & the french horſemen better diſpoſed then theirs, it could not be for their ſewertie to fight in a place of equalitye at the leaſt affore the ſix thowſand Swyzzers were come, which, being newly graunted by the Cantons, there was practiſe at Venice, whether the Cardinall of Syon with twelue Embaſſadors of that nation were gon for that purpoſe, to leauy at the cõmon charges of the Pope and the Venetians: There was added to this, the wil of the king of Aragon, who had giuen commaundement both by letters and Meſſengers expreſſe, to abſteine from battel as much as could be: for he hoped ſpecially in the thing which the french king feared moſt, that if the battel were deferred vntil the king of England & he began the warre in Fraunce, the french king would be conſtrained to cal home either all or the greateſt part of his companies, & by that meane he ſhould put ende to the warre of Italy & remeine poſſeſſed of the victorie without blood or daunger: And for this reaſon he had forbidden the Viceroy to beſeege Bolognia, had it not bin for the great inſtance and complaints that the Pope made: Thus the Viceroy of Naples together with the other capteines, were at this point to encampe alwayes neare to the french armie, both to let that the townes of Romagnia remeyned not to them in pray, & alſo to ſtoppe the way for going to Rome: And withall they were reſolued to keepe them alwayes in places of ſtrength, where, eyther for their ſituacion, or to be backt with ſome great towne, the french men ſhoulde haue no opportunitie to charge them but to their great diſaduauntage: And therefore they were determined to make no account nor difficultie to retyre as often as neede ſhoulde bee, iudging, as men well vnderſtanding the qualitie of warre, that they were not bownd to thapparances and brutes that ranne, but principally had to looke to obteine the victorie which was followed with glory, with reputacion, & with praiſe of men: According to which reſolucion, the ſame daye that tharmie was lodged at the caſtell Guelffe & at Medicina, ſuch as were incamped neare thoſe places, retyred to the wals of Ymola: The day following the french men paſſed within a mile & an half of Ymola, thennemies keeping good order in the place where they were incamped: But refuſing to aſſaile thē at ſo great a diſaduantage, they paſſed further, the vauntgard lodging in the borow of Bubana foure myles from Ymola, and the other part of tharmie at Mordana and Baguaro, townes ſomewhat more then a myle one from an other: They chuſed their lodging places beneth the high way for the oportunity of vittels, which with ſewertie were brought by the riuer of Pavv, Lugo, Bagua Cauall and the townes thereabout, being abandoned of the Spanyards & eftſoones returned to the deuocion of the Duke of Ferrara when Monſr de Foix entred vppon the territories of Bolognia: The day after the Spanyards, leauing ſufficient garriſon in the caſtell of Ymola, and lx. men at armes in the towne vnder Ioh. Saſſatello, went to Caſtell Boulonnois, and incamped vppon the high way, their campe ſtretching towards the Mounteines: And the ſame day, the french men tooke by force the borow of Solarola, the terror whereof made Cotignola and Grauarola to render to them, where they remeyned the daye following And the ennemies encamping in a place called the fielde of flees: In theſe litle remouings and nearenes of places, the two armies marched alwayes in good order, their artillerie going formoſt, with the face to thennemye as though the battell were to beginne at euery hower: And yet both the armies marched with very great reſpect, the one not to be conſtrayned to come to blowes but in a place where thaduauntage of the ſituacion ſhoulde recompenſe the diſaduauntage of their number and forces: And the other to ſeeke to drawe thennemies to a neceſſitie to fight, but with this regarde that at one tyme, both the weapons and place ſhoulde not bee contrarye to them: In that place, Monſr de Foix receyued a newe commaundement from the Kinge to haſten the battell, the ſame cauſes and reaſons ſtill increaſinge that had firſt induced him to aduaunce to ſeeke thennemyes: For, where the Venetians had obſtinately refuſed to make peace with Cæſar but vppon condicion that they might reteyne Vincenſa, notwithſtanding they were muche weakened by the accident of Breſſia, and alſo muche preſſed firſt by requeſtes and after by proteſtacions and threatninges of the Pope and Kinge of

Aragon: There was at laſt made betwene them a truce for eyght monethes before the Pope, with couenant that either partes ſhould reteyne the thinges they poſſeſſed, and to pay to Cæſar fiftye thowſand florins of the Rhein: The ſame remouing from the king all doubtes that he would not be deuided from him, and at the ſame tyme he had intelligence that he would haue warre beyond the Mountes: for, Ierome Cabauillo the king of Aragons Embaſſador and reſident in his Court, making inſtance to be heard in playne councell, tolde him he had receiued commaundement from the king his Maiſter, to departe, exhorting him in his name to forbeare to fauor againſt the Church the tyrants of Bolognia, &, for ſo vniuſt a cauſe, to leaue of to trouble a peace of ſo great importance and profit to the whole common weale of Chriſtendom: In which exhortacion he offered, that in caſe he feared to receiue any domage for the reſtitucion of Bolognia, he would aſſure him in all ſorts he would deſire, Adding in the ende for a reſolucion immouable, that he would not nor could not faile to defend the Church according to the office of euery Chriſtian Prince.

Therefore Monſr de Foix, being now certeine that he ſhould neuer accompliſh his intencion in accoaſting and following thennemie, for that, for the commoditie they had of the townes of Romagnia, he could not eaſily cut of their vittells nor force them to the battell without great diſaduauntage: And his owne armie alſo ſuffering no ſmall neceſſitie of vittells by the barreinnes of places where he lay, he tooke councel of his Capteines and determined to goe to incampe affore Rauenna: he hoped by this meane, thennemies, not to diminiſh their reputacion would not ſuffer to be loſt before their eyes a citie of that importance: And withall he doubted not vnder this occaſion to fight with thennemies in a place of indifferencie: And to lette the ennemie (happly ſuſpecting his deuiſe) to approche to Rauenna, he incamped betwene Cotignola and Granarola ſeuen myles from them, where he ſtayed foure dayes exſpecting from Ferrara twelue Cannons and twelue other leſſer peeces of artillerie: Thennemies doubted ſuch a reſolucion, and for that cauſe ſent to Rauenna Mark. Anth. Colonno, who before he entred into the iorney tooke the fayth and promiſſe of the Legat, the Viceroy, Fabricio and Peter of Nauarre with all the other Capteines of tharmie (otherwayes he woulde not vndertake thenterpriſe) that if the frenche came to encampe affore it, they ſhould make to his ſuccours with the whole armie: There went with him in this expedicion, three skore men at armes of his owne bande, An hundred light horſemen vnder Peter de Caſtre, and ſix hundred ſpaniſhe footemen commaunded by Capteyne Parades and Salezart: touching the reſidue of tharmie, they encamped neare the walls of Faenza along the gate that goeth to Rauenna, enterteyning the tyme of their abyding there with a hoat skirmiſhe with thennemie: About that tyme Monſr de Foix ſent an hundred launces and fiueteene hundred footemen to take the borowe of Ruſſi garded by a garriſon of the place it ſelfe, who, notwithſtanding in the beginning (according to the manner of commons and popular men,) ſhowed them ſelues very reſolute and aſſured, yet, their naturall feares vanquiſhing their frayle ſhowes of courage, they entred the ſame daye into a parley to render and yeelde: during which commonings the French men taking thopportunitie of their negligence and diſorder, entred the place with no litle furie and ſacked it, putting to the ſworde more then two hundred men, and reduced all the reſidue to the calamitie of priſoners: from Ruſſi, Monſr de Foix drewe neare to Rauenna, and the day after incamped neare the walls betweene the two riuers in the middeſt whereof the towne hath her ſituacion: The ryuer of Ronquo which olde hiſtories call Vitis, and the ryuer of Montono,

Montono, not a litle esteemed for that next after Pavv, it is the chiefest of those riuers that haue their heade on the left hande of th'Appenyn, and entreth into the sea of his propper courrse, fall from th'Appenyn hills, And where they take their head, there they make the separacion of Romagna from Tuskane: These riuers make their courrse so, as they inclose the citie of Furly: Montono that ronneth on the left hande toucheth almost the walls, And Ronquo falling on the right hande, passeth within two myles of it, and afterwards are restrayned and drawne narrow neare Rauenna with so litle space, that the one on the one parte and the other on the other, make their courrse fast by the walls, A litle belowe which walls, their waters meeting and embrasing together, they fall afterwards into the sea beeing nowe three myles of, but in olde tyme (as is sayd) did beate vpon the walls of the towne: Monsr de Foix commaunded the space or distance that is betweene the one and other of the riuers, the front of his campe bearing towardes the gate Adriana which is almost ioyning to the brinke or shoare of Montono: The daye after he was incamped, he made to plant thartillerie, partly against the tower called Roncono situated betwene the port Adriana and the ryuer of Ronquo, and partly on the other side of Montono whether one parte of tharmie was passed by a bridge which was cast ouer the riuer: he hastned the batterie as much as he could, to thende to come to thassault, both affore the ennemies approched whome he knewe to bee marching, and also for his great necessitie and difficultie to recouer prouision of vittells, seeing the Venetian bandes which lay at Ficqueroles, with many vessells armed, gaue impediment to such as were brought out of Lombardye: And hauing soonke to the bottome certeine barkes in the mouth of the channell which entreth into Pavv twelue myles from Rauenna and passeth there within two myles, they also stopped the entrey of those that came from Ferrara in vessells of that contrey: A prouision which was no lesse daungerous then vneasie to be brought by waggen or cart: besides this, the incommodities and daungers were no lesse for their forragers, who of necessitie were to raunge seuen or eyght myles from the campe: impediments not small to a campe lying vppon thexecucion of some enterprise: In regarde of these difficulties, concurring also the consideracion of other extremities and daungers, Monsr de Foix determined to giue thassalt the same day, notwithstanding he knew it was no lesse hard then daungerous to make his entrey: for, of the wall that was battred, there was brought downe to the earth but thirty fadoms, and yet they not altogether ruinous for that three fadoms were yet left standing on high, so that there could be made no entrey but by ladders: But to surmount these difficulties with vallour and direction, and the better to encourage his people by a striuing and emulacion amongest them selues, he deuided in three squadrons distinct and separat one from an other, the regiments of footemen of the Almains, Italyans, & french: And after he had chosen out of euery companie of the men at armes, tenne of the most trayned & resolute, he charged, that being couered with the same armes with the which they were wont to fight on horsebacke, they shoulde marche affore the footemen: he brought them all in good order of warre affore the walls, and recommending them to their seuerall fortune, he sawe them giue a very furious assault, respecting so much the lesse the perills that were affore them, by how much more euery one of them labored to make good his election and iudgement of their vallour: The defendants made valiant resistance, to the speciall prayse of Mark. Anth. Colonno, who, duringe that sharpe storme, omitted in him selfe no office, no parte, no place, that concerned the reskewe and succour of his people doing double ſeruice, both by direction and by example: The french men were wonderfully troubled with a coluerine that was planted vpon a baſtillion, by which, with other afflictions farre contrary to their looking, they ſawe them ſelues out of all hope to be able to force the towne, & therefore after they had fought three howers, they retyred to their lodgings with the loſſe of three hundred footemen and certeyne men at armes: many were miſerably hurt, as Monſr Chaſtillon and the Capteine of thartillerie, who receyuing their woundes from out of the towne, dyed not many dayes after: Federyk de Boſſolo was alſo hurt but not to the death, All men in ſuche a calamitie, not being ſubiect to one kinde of fortune: The daye following, the deuiſes to batter the walls, were turned to fight with thennemies in the fielde: They, aſſoone as the frenche armie was remoued remembring their fayth and promiſſe to Mark. Anth., were entred within Furly which is betweene the ſame ryuers, and hauing afterwardes paſſed the ryuer of Ronquo a fewe myles lower, they came towardes Rauenna: About which tyme the Citizens of the towne, brought into terrour by the aſſalt of the daye before, ſent out one to treate of compoſicion without the priuitie of Mark. Anth.: But as he was in the action, going and returning with aunſwers, the armye of thennemie was diſcouered, which marched along the ryuer, And aſſoone as the Frenche men diſcerned it, they drew immediatly into armes with a greate noyſe and ranged their companies vnder their enſeignes: They retyred in greate haſte their artilleries from before their walls, and turned them towardes their ennemies: And in the meane whyle Monſr de Foix, conſulted with the other Capteynes whether it were good to paſſe the ryuer at the ſame inſtant, to lette them for entring into Rauenna: A matter which eyther they had not determined to doe, or at leaſte it was impoſſible with order conuenient, and with neceſſary diligence: where it was eaſie to tharmye of the confederats to enter the ſame daye into Rauenna by the wodde of Pineta which is betweene the ſea and the citie, A deuiſe which had conſtrayned the French men to retyre with ſhame, and to goe out of Romagna conſidering the want of vittells: But they eyther not knowing thoccaſion, and fearing withall that as they marched they ſhoulde be enforced to fight in the playne fielde: or els ſuppoſing that by the onely viewe and ſhowing of their armye, Rauenna was ſufficiently ſuccored, for that Monſr de Foix durſte not eſtſoones ſende to thaſſault: They encamped, contrarye to all exſpectacion three myles within Rauenna in a place called Monlinacco, ſpending the reſidue of that daye and the nyght following in intrenching their campe with ditches ſo large and deepe, as the ſhortnes of the tyme woulde ſuffer: In this reſpyt of tyme, the french Capteines conſulted together not without diuerſitie of opinions: ſome held it an enterpriſe too daungerous to giue a new aſſault to them within Rauenna, hauing before them ſo litle a breache in the wall, & behind thē ſo great a campe & armie of enemies: They iudged it vnprofitable to remeine there without hope to be able to doe any thinge, yea the ſkarcetie of vittells bringing apparant impoſſibilitie to all action: And that in retyring, there would growe to the Spanyards a greater reputacion then was wonne the daye before by aduauncing: Laſtly, that as it was a matter very daungerous and agaynſt all deliberacions and councells made before, to goe charge them in their campe which they had to thinke was well fortefied, ſo, of all ſortes of daungers that chiefly was to bee eſchewed by which might happen greateſt harmes, and of all other harmes this is the greateſt without all compariſon to bee ouerthrowne: Amydd theſe diſcourſes of difficulties and perills it was in the ende reſolued, that they woulde goe sette vppon the ennemie assone as it were day, Monsr de Foix allowing that resolution as moste agreable to his glory, and their common safetie. All the night they wrought to set vp the bridge vpon the ryuer of Ronquo making playne the risings of the bankes on all sides, to make the way more easie and passible: The next morning by the first appearing of the day, beeing the eleuenth of Aprill, a daye very solemne for the memorie of the holy resurrection, the Launceknights of the footemen marched ouer the bridge, almoste all the vauntgarde and the battell passed the ryuer by foarde, and the rearegard guyded by Yues d'Allegre wherein were foure hundred launces, remayned vpon the shore of the ryuer on Rauenna side, to thende to succor the armie in necessitie, and to make head if the souldiours or people issued out of Rauenna: And to the garde of the bridge which had bene affore buylt vpon the ryuer of Montono, was appoynted capteine Paris a Skottishe man with a strength of a thousande footemen: Immediatly vpon this the Frenchmen prepared them selues to the battell in this order: The vauntgarde with thartillerie before, gouerned by the Duke of Ferrara with seuen hundred launces and the Launceknightes, was placed vpon the banke or shoare of the ryuer which was on their right hande, the footmen beeing on the left hande to the horsemen: On the side of the vauntgarde and in flanke, were bestowed the footemen of the battell whiche were eighte thowsande, parte Gascons and parte Pickardes: And after, in enlarging alwayes and bearing further from the banke of the ryuer, was the laste esquadron of Italian footemen ledde by Federike Bossolo, wherein was not aboue the number of fiue thousande bodies: for notwithstanding Monsr de Foix comming from before Bolognia tooke with him such as were there in garrison, yet many of them were shronke away by reason the paye was small: And on the side or wing of this squadron were all the archers and light horsemen, which exceeded the number of three thousande. After the ordering of all these squadrons, who not stretching directly right foorth, but plying and bowing, bare the forme of a halfe moone, and vppon the banke of the ryuer, were the six hundred launces of the battel commaunded by Monsr de la Palissa, together with the Cardinall S. Seuerin Legate of the councell, who being of stature huge & mightie, and of courage and minde nothing inferior, and armed withall from toppe to toa with glittering armes, performed farre better the office of a Capteine then of a Cardinall or Legate. In this disposing of the armie, Monsr de Foix reserued to him selfe no charge or place particular, but hauing made a choyse of thirtie of the most valiaunt Gentlemen of the whole armie, he stoode free and at libertie to be the better hable to succour and minister to all partes: The goodly estate and presence of his personage couered with armor shining and wrought, made him easie to bee discerned from all others, ioyning his liuery or cassacke, in whose coollers was represented the inclination of his minde: And because there shoulde be omitted in him nothing that eyther belonged to the testification of his proper vallour, or was necessarie to stirre vp the mindes of his people, he mounted vpon the rysing of the shore of the ryuer, and with a countenance of singuler ioye and comfort dispersed into his eyes and all his other outward senses and partes, he spake to his companies with an eloquence more then martiall in this sort:

The order of the Frenchmē in the battell of Rauenna.

My good friendes and souldiours, this is the day wherein fortune offreth to leade vs to fight with our enemies in open fielde: A matter so muche the more welcome, by howe muche it hath bene long desired with an vniuersall exspectation of vs all: The same fortune, whose fauour we haue caried alwayes vpon our shoulders in so many victories, presenteth her selfe nowe to kisse our cheekes in signe of her perpe-

Mōsr de Foix encourageth his souldiours to the battell.

" tuall assistaunce: and holding her lappe open, she puttes into our handes an oc" casion to winne the moste honorable and glorious victorie that euer was gotte by " any armie in the memorie of man: for not onely Rauenna, not onely all the townes
" and limites of Romagnia, are subiect to your discression, but also the wealth and plen-
" tie of riches conteined in those large limites, shall be the least parte of the rewardes
" of your valour. Not one Prince, or Potentat remayning in Italie hable to make head
" agaynst your force and felicitie, what shall lette you to ronne vp euen to Rome, where " the infinite treasors of that wicked Court drawne in so many ages out of the bowels
" and intrals of Christendome, shall be the honorable fruites of your trauell: yea your " vallour and your fortune will put into your handes so manye stately ornamentes, " suche heapes of siluer, so many wedges of golde, suche mountaynes of precious " stones, and so many riche prisoners, that the whole world will enuy your condition:
" And from Rome, euen with the same facilitie, we shall marche into the bowels of
" the kingdome of Naples, executing reuenge vppon the iniuries done to vs and ours " heretofore. These be felicities which I see not subiect to any impediment when I " consider your vertue, your fortune, and the honorable victories you haue gotten in
" fewe dayes. These expeditions bring with them no doubt nor feare, when I beholde
" your countenances, and do remember that there are very fewe amongest you, who
" in my presence hath not giuen some notable testimonie of his vallour. Our enemies
" be the same Spaniardes whom our arriuall forced with shame to flee by night from " before Bolognia, they be the same mindes and bodies who not many dayes since " sought their safetie from vs, no otherwise then by hiding themselues vnder the walls " of Imola and Faenza, and afterwards couered their dishonour in places montenous " and impassible. This is a race of people and nation that in the kingdome of Naples
" neuer fought agaynst our armies in playne fielde, or places discouered, but brought " with them alwayes the aduauntage of rampiers, of ryuers, of diches, or the wether, " reapposing lesse in their vallour and vertue, then in their sleightes and ambushes:
" And yet I can not tearme them that portion of Spaniards which haue bene norished
" and made olde in the warres of Naples, but rather a people newe, rawe, and vnexpe-
" rienced, who neuer fought agaynst other armes then bowes and arrowes and laun-
" ces poynted after the maner of the Moores: who notwithstanding is a nation and " people weake of body, without harte, without armour, and wholly without know" ledge of the arte of warre, yet the laste yere they ouerthrew this prowde generation " of Spaniards to their great infamie in the yle of Gerbes: from which place fledde this " Peter of Nauarre a capteine of so great name and reputation with them, seruing as a " notable example to all the worlde touching the difference to make walles fall with " the furie of powder, and subteltie of vaultes secrete and vnder earth, and to feight
" in the fielde with a true resolution and magnanimitie of courage: They are nowe
" inclosed with a trenche which feare hath driuen them to make this night in great
" haste: their footemen are shadowed and couered with the rysing of the banke, and " they put confidence in their armed wagons, as if the battell were to be performed
" by those childishe instrumentes, and not with the resolution of minde, and meare
" force of handes and armes: But with our artilleries we can not but hunte them out " of their vaultes and caues, and compell them to come into the fielde and open
" playnes, where the world shall heare of the oddes and difference betwene the furie
" of the Frenchmen, the resolution of th Almains, vallour of th Italians, and the subtel-" ties, wyles, and ambushes of the Spaniards. The greatest matter that I finde to di" minishe our glorie, is the inequalitie of our numbers beeing almost twice so many

as they: And yet to vſe this aduauntage can not be referred to our cowardiſe, but to » their raſhnes, for that their vallour and courage is not the cauſe of their appearing, » but the authoritie of Fabricio Colonno in reſpect of his promiſes vndiſcretly made to » Marke Antho. or rather it is a ſentence of Gods iuſtice for the iuſte punithment of » the pride and impudent vices of that falſe Pope Iulius, and of ſo many treaſons and » deceites as that diſloyall king of Aragon hath wrought againſt vs, abuſing the good- » neſſe of our king. But in vſing ſo large a skoape of perſwaſions to ſouldiours of your » vertue, methinkes I do ſo muche deferre and hinder our victorie and the glory ther- » of, as I ſpende time in debating with you to whom the rewardes of the iourney are » not vnknowen: Marche on a Gods name according to the direction ſet downe, and » feight with this hope, that this day will giue vnto the king the imperie and iuriſdi- » ction, and to you the wealth and ryches of all Italie: For my parte I will be all this » day at your election, not further extending my authoritie then may needefully tend » to the benefite of the ſeruice, and make leſſe reſeruation of my ſelfe then belonges » to the place which I occupie amongeſt you. The ſeruice of this day beeing all one, » the perill ſhall be equall both to you and to me, and as I promiſe to be indifferent » with you in the action, ſo I doubt not but we ſhall all communicate in one fortune » and felicitie: It ſhall be a great happineſſe to me, that being the Capteine of this » dayes battell, my ſouldiours ſhall be made more glorious and more riche, then hath » bene euer any army or ſouldiours theſe three hundred yeres. »

With theſe wordes the army fell to a generall ſhowting and crying, euery one wiſhing that they were at the place where they might expreſſe their vallour: They all called vpon him to be forwarde to leade them, whom they were willing to follow euen to the laſte man. Then the trompettes blewe and the drommes ſtroke vppe, warning euery ſouldiour to repayre to his enſigne: in which order, with more ioye then feare, they began to marche towardes thennemies campe, diſtant from the place where they paſſed the ryuer leſſe then two myles: Their lodgings ſtretched out along the ſhoare of the ryuer, which was of their lefte hande, where they had caſte afore them a trenche ſo deepe as the ſhortneſſe of the time would ſuffer, which winding and turning vppon the right hande, inuironed all the place where they were incamped, ſauing they had left at the entrie of the trenche an opening of xx. paſſes for the horſemen to iſſue out to the skirmiſhe. In this campe, aſſone as they ſawe the Frenche begin to paſſe the ryuer, they were ranged in battell in this ſorte: The vauntgard of eight hundred men at armes commaunded by Fabricio Colonno, was beſtowed along the ſhoare of the ryuer, and ioyning to the right hande of the ſame a ſquadron of ſix thouſande footemen: after the vauntgarde occupying the place along the ryuer, was the battell of ſix hundred launces, and on the wing a ſquadron of foure thouſande footemen, all gouerned by the Viceroy, who was accompanied by the Marquis of Palude: The Cardinall de Medicis who by nature had no cleare ſight, and in behauiour very eaſie and tractable, marched in the battell in an habite of peace, ſeeming aſwell in demonſtrations as in effects, very vnlike to the Cardinall S. Seuerin. After the battell, and likewiſe along the brinke of the riuer, followed the arearegard of foure hundred men at armes, ledde by Caruagiall a Spaniſh Capteine, with a ſquadron for his wing of foure thouſande footemen, and with the bands of light horſemen, of whom was capteine generall Fernand d'Aualo Marquis of Peſquiere, albeit but very young, yet of ſingular exſpectation: They were on the right hande at the backes of the footemen to ſuccor ſuch as ſhoulde ſuffer diſtreſſe: The artilleries were beſtowed aboue the men at armes: And for Peter of Nauarre

who had made a choyse of fiue hundred footemen, and would not for that day be bounde to any one place, had bestowed vpon the trench affore the footemen, thirtie waggons resembling the example of the olde tymes: euery waggon was full of small shotte, with a very long boare speare vppon them, the more easily to susteine thassault of the Frenche men: In this order they kept themselues cloase within the body of their trenche, exspecting tharmie of thenemie to come and charge them: A resolution that as it proued in the ende little to their profite: so, from the beginning it appeared very preiudiciall: for Fabricio Colonno had giuen aduise to charge thennemie when they began to passe the ryuer, iudging a greater aduauntage to consiste in this to feight agaynst one parte onely, then to stande to the defence of a slender trenche whiche they had caste affore them: Agaynst this aduise was Peter of Nauarre, whose counsayles were receyued of the Viceroy as Oracles, and by him it was resolued to suffer them to passe: An opinion no lesse vndiscrete, then altogether full of perill. The Frenche men marched on, and were by this tyme come within two hundred passes of the trenche: and seeing their enemies showe no disposition to come out of their place, they stayed for not to giue them thaduauntage whiche they sought to haue: and in that sorte both the one and the other armie stoode at gaze without stirring for the space of two howres, onely the shotte executed on both partes, endomaging not a little the Frenche footemen, for that by direction of Peter of Nauarre, thartilleries were planted in a place that gaue great oportunitie to distresse them. But the Duke of Ferrara retyring behinde the armie one parte of thartillerie, drewe it in great haste to the poynt of the Frenchemen, in the very place where the archers had bene bestowed: This poynt, for that tharmie bare the forme of a halfe Moone, was almoste vppon the backes of thennemies, who were nowe furiously battered in flanke, and to their great harmes, but specially the horsemen: Those companies of the Spanishe footemen whiche the Capteine of Nauarre had withdrawen into a lowe place on the syde of the rising of the ryuer, beeing in no perill to be hurte, for that according to his commaundement they threwe them selues flatte vpon the earth, Fabricio cryed aloude, and with greate importunities by messengers, called on him to issue out to the battell, and not tarye tyll they were consumed with the shotte of thartilleries: But it was in vayne to raunge the Capteine of Nauarre, in whome bare more dominion a cursed ambition, then eyther reason or conduit: for imagining that by the vallour of the Spanishe footemen (though all the residue perished) he should cary the victorie, he esteemed his glory would by so much be augmented, by howmuche shoulde be increased the daunger of tharmie. By this tyme thartillerie had made suche mortallitie of the men at armes and light horsemen, that they were hable to susteine no longer: There might be seene with a miserable spectacle mingled with cryes lamentable, bothe men and horses fall dead to the grounde, their quarters flye into the ayre, and their heades and armes separate from the residue of their bodies: An execution so bloudy in the eyes of Fabricio, that he cryed out, shall we all dye heare through the wretched obstinacie of one straunger, shall this galland Army be offred to the butchers bowle without anye reuenge of the blood that is spilte? Where is the glorie of our victories so oftentymes obteyned agaynst the Frenchmen? Shall the honour of Spayne and Italie be loste for the pleasure of a particular man of Nauarre? In whiche rage and furie of complainte, he caused his companies to issue out on the other side of the trenche without tarrying for licence or direction from the Viceroy: And beeing followed with all the horsemen, Peter of

Nauarre was compelled to make signe to his footemen, who beeing risen from the ground charged with incredible furie the footemen of the launceknightes whiche were already come vpon them: By this meane all the squadrons being ioyned pelmell, there began a moste desperate and hoat battell, and out of doubt one of the greateſt, and best executed that had bene fought in Italie of long time: for the battell of Taro was almoste no other thing then a gallande encounter of launces, and the deedes of armes in the kingdome of Naples, were rather actions of disorder and rashnes, then battels pitched and performed: and in Guiaradada the lesser part onely of the Venetians was brought to the feight: but here there was not a body which passed not through the middest of the battell, the feight beeing in the playne feelde without impediments of waters or rampiers, both the armies fought with a wonderfull resolution and courage, they came to the fieldes with mindes indifferently determined to dye or lyue, beeing kindled not onely with glorie, with hope, and with daunger, but also with hatred of Nation agaynst Nation. In the heate of the feight there hapned this spectacle worthy of memorie: In the medley of the launceknightes with the Spaniards, two capteines of great reputation marching affore their squadrons, fought hande to hande as it were by defyance, where the Launceknight beeing slayne, the Spaniard had no more glory by his victorie, then the other had honor by his death. The horsmen of the league which ordinarily were not equall to the French, and that day hauing suffred muche by the artillerie, were become farre inferiour, being not hable to make further resistance, gaue their backes to the enemie, hauing long borne out the furie of the feight more with courage then with strēgth: And Yues d'Allegre also whom Monsr la Palisſa had called, comming with the rearegard to charge them in the flanke, and with a thousande footemen that had bene left at Montona, were taken prisoners by the souldiours of the Duke of Ferrara, together with Fabritio Colonno feighting valiauntly: In this giuing backe the example of the capteines did muche, for that the Viceroy and Caruagiall, without making a laste proofe of the vertue of their men, began to flee, carying with them the thirde squadron almoste whole and vnbroken: with them fled Antho. de leua, a man at that tyme of very base condition, but rysing by continuall exercise of armes, to all the degrees of warre, he became at laste a capteine of singular reputation and name: All the light horsemen were likewise ouerthrowen, and their capteine the Marquis of Pesquiere taken prisoner, hauing his armor all couered with blood, and his body full of woundes, expressing his vallour to be greater then his fortune: There was taken also the Marquis of Palude, who in great disorder had ledde the seconde squadron to the battell through a fielde full of diches and bushes: And albeit by the wretched succesſe of that daye, all the place was couered with bodies of dead men and carkasses of horses, yet the footemen of the Spaniards abandoned of their horsmen, continued to feight with an incredible vallour and assurance: for albeit in the beginning of the feight and at the first encounter with the launceknights, they were somewhat shaken by the firme and close order of the pikes, yet comming afterwards to the swordes poynt, and many of the Spaniards couered with their targets running with their daggers and short weapons betwene the legges of the launceknightes, they came with a wonderfull slaughter almoste euen to the middest of their squadron: And neare vnto them the Gascon footmen hauing occupied the way betwene the ryuer and the rysing, had charged the Italian footmen, and albeit they had much suffered by the artilleries, yet they had expulsed them to their great prayse, if, with a guidon of horsemen Yues Allegre had not thrust in amongest them, with a greater vallour then fortune: for Monsr Vinarais his sonne being slaine in the action euen afore his eies, he thought to take present reuenge of his new sorow, or happly hauing lesse delite to liue after he sawe the priuation of his sonne, he thrust in with his horse into the thickest presse of enemies, where he cõmunicated in the miserable destinie of his sonne, fighting as apperteined to a valiant capteine: The Italian footmen gaue backe, being no more hable to resist so great a multitude: but one part of the Spanish footmen running to their succors susteined them for a time: neither could the footmen of the launceknightes make any further resistance, being also oppressed by the other part of the Spaniards: but the horsmen being already fled, Monsr de Foix turned him to charge them with a great troupe of horsmen, by reason wherof the Spaniards rather retyring then chased out of the battel, and winning the way which is betwene the riuer and the rising without shewing any maner of disorder, they began to gette further off, not giuing faster back then by foote pases, keping the front of their squadron very close, by whose force they repulsed the frenchmen: It was at that time that Peter de Nauarre hauing lesse desire to liue thẽ to saue himself, & in that mind would not go out of the battell, was taken prisoner, receiuing a reward of his obstinacie to the vniuersall ruine of tharmy. The minde thirsting after glory is infinite in opinion & weening, and to the man that is caried with ambition & desire of honor, nothing can stay or limitte his aduentures: for Monsr de Foix could not brooke that the Spanish footmen should go their waies as it were victorious & in so good order, neither could he thinke his victorie was perfect, if they were not ouerthrowen aswell as the residue: therfore respecting more the glory he should get, then the perils that commonly lye lurking vnder vndiscrete aduentures, he went furiously to the charge with a squadron of horsmen, and executed vpon those that were last, by whom being enuironed and caste from his horse, or as some suppose, his horse falling vpon him whilest he fought, he was slayne with a thrust of a pyke giuen him in the flanke. And if it be then time for a man to desire to dye, when his fortune hath set him in the full of his felicitie, he may by imputation be sayd to dye happily, falling into his last time when he fell into the last act of so glorious a victorie: He dyed very yong, but with a singular reputation throughout the world, hauing in lesse thẽ three moneths, & being almost a capteine before he was a souldiour, obteined so many victories with incredible celeritie & valour: Neare vnto him Monsr Lautrech was left as dead, hauing vpon him twenty wounds, but being afterwardes carried to Ferrara, his life was saued by the diligent cure of Phisitions. Monsr de Foix being dead, the Spaniards went away without receiuing afterwardes any trouble or impediment, the residue of the army being dispersed and put to chase, the baggage sacked, the ensignes and artilleries spoyled, and the Popes Legate taken, who from the handes of the stradiottes being come into the power of Federike Bossolo, was by him presented to the Legate of the councell: There fell also into the fortune of prisoners Fabricio Colonno, Peter Nauarre, the Marquis Palude, the Marquis Bitonte, the Marquis Pesquiere, with many other Lords, Barons, and honorable gentlemen, aswell Spaniards as of the kingdome of Naples. In battells there is nothing more vncertayne then the computation and number of the dead, the common brute was, that of the one and the other armie, there was left on the ground at the least ten thousande bodies of men, one part being of the French part, and the two other halues of the confederates: some publishe a greater number, onely this is certayne, that the calamitie fell vpon the moste valiaunt and braueste sort, of which number on the ecclesiastike side was Raphaell de Fassi, a capteine of great name, and of suche as were hurt the number was infinite: Touching ching the Frenchmen, the victorie was not more glorious then full of domage and discomfort, by reason of the death of Monsr de Foix, Yues de Alegre, and many of the nobilitie of Fraunce: as also of the Almains, for the losse of capteine Iacob with many other resolute leaders and commaunders, to whose vallour (but with a great price of their blood) the victorie in the greatest part was attributed: And lastely for the death of many Gascons and Pickards being left there with capteine Molard, whiche nations loste that day all their glory with the French: onely the harme that exceeded all those losses, was the death of Monsr de Foix, with whome perished wholly the very synewe and strength of that armie: Of suche as were vanquished and saued themselues from the miserie of the battell, the moste parte drewe towardes Cesena, and from thence fledde further of: The Viceroy him selfe made small reposeis tyll he came into the contrey of Ancona, whither he brought with him a very slender trowpe of horsemen: Many escaping the stroake of the battell, founde perill by fleeing where they sought for safetie, for that the wayes beeing full of peisantes, they were slayne and stripped by them, their fortune taking them out of one daunger which they could not but feare, and carryed them into another whiche they had no reason to doubt: so suttle is the stroake of destinie, ordeined from the beginning to fall vpon mortall men: And the Duke of Vrbin did not onely stirre vp the countreymen agaynst suche as fledde, but also sent bandes of souldiours into the territorie of Pesera to aggrauate their calamitie: He was in this suspected, for that many dayes affore he had sent Baltazar Chastillon to the Frenche king, and enterteyned also certayne bandes of men with Monsr de Foix: reasons that made some men beleeue he had secretly conspired agaynst his Vncle: onely suche as fledde by the dominions of the Florentins, passed without any harme, the compassion of that common weale beeing greater then to adde affliction to the afflicted, since one sorte of calamities sufficeth to vex the minde that caryeth with it feare and dispaire: Assoone as the Frenche armie was returned to their tentes, not more reioycing in the honour of their victorie, then loaden with burdens of sorrowe and lamentations, the people of Rauenna sent to render them selues: But suche is the nature of fortune to suffer no parte vntouched whom she hateth, as they were in debating of the couenauntes, or happly beeing already concluded, the Almain footemen and Gascons taking thopportunitie of their negligence in garding their walles, entred the towne at the breache whiche Monsr de Foix had made: And as men whose myndes were not yet free from the blood of the battell, they sacked it in great crueltie, adding to the despite of the harmes they receyued in the battell, the vniuersall and naturall hatred they bare to the Italians. In this cruell action nothing was lesse respected then moderation in killing and spoyling, no age spared, no sex reserued, no sorte of people nor goodes pardoned, all thinges were brought into the rewardes of the victorie, and nothing lefte free from the violence and furie of the souldiours. The fourth day after Marke Antho. Colonno forsooke the Citadell into the whiche he was retyred, yelding it vpon promise of lyfe and goodes saued, giuing also hys fayth, as also for his other capteines not to beare armes neyther agaynst the French king, nor agaynst the Councell of Pisa vntill Magdalen day next: By this example, and vnder the same conditions, the Bishop Vitelli with an hundred and fiftie footemen, consented to giue vp the Rocke whiche was committed to his keeping: The Cities of Ymola, of Furly, of Cesena, and Rimini, together with all the peeces of Romagnia, except the rocks of Furly and Ymola, followed also the fortune of the victorie, and were all receyued by the Legate in the name of the councell of Rauenna sacked.

Pisa: But the Frenche armie, bothe for the death of Monsr de Foix, and for so great harmes receyued at the battell, remayned foure myles from Rauenna, without doing any thing, the terrour of their losses beeing greater in them, then that they were yet apte to take counsayle what to do: The Legate and Monsr Palissa to whom was diuolued the gouernement of tharmie (for Alfonso d'Este was nowe returned to Ferrara) beeing vncertayne what woulde be the kings will, temporised and tarryed for his further direction: neither was their authoritie suche with the souldiours, as to commaunde the armie to marche, beeing so troubled in sending to places of suretie the things they had sacked: and also so weakned in force and courage for so bloudy a victorie, that they seemed to carrye the countenaunces rather of men vanquished, then of conquerours: This amaze and confusion made all the souldiours with plaintes and teares call vppon the name of Monsr de Foix, whose presence onely had sufficed to remoue all impedimentes that mighte haue lette them to haue followed him: And it was not to be doubted, that beeing pushed on with the furie of his vallour, and the promises that the king had made to him, that to his vse the kingdome of Naples shoulde be conquered, he had not with his accustomed felicitie and diligence stretched out his victorie euen to the bosome of Rome, and that the Pope and all his dependantes had not bene put to chase, hauing no other hope to saue them selues.

The Cardinals councell the Pope to harke to peace.

The thirteenth daye of Aprill the newes of the battell came to Rome by the relation of Octauian Fregoso, who went thither in post from Fossambrun: They were heard not without a great feare and tumulte of the whole Court, whiche made the Cardinalls runne in haste to the Pope, and with vehement petitions to presse him, that accepting peace, which they distrusted not to obteine of the French king vnder honest conditions, he would at last dispose himselfe to deliuer the sea Apostolike and his person from so many perills: They tolde him he had taken trouble and trauell ynough for thaduauncement of the Churche, and the libertie of Italie, his intention onely giuing him sufficient glory: They alleaged, that in so holy an enterprise, the will of God stryuing agaynst him, which he might knowe by many signes and tokens, to obiect him selfe agaynst Gods ordinance, were no other thing then to tempt God, and turne the whole Churche into her lateste ruine: That as to God more then to him apperteined the care of his spouse: so it belonged to hym beeing a man to referre him selfe to his will, and embrasing peace according to the voyce of the Gospell, to retyre his olde age and the state of the Churche from so many perplexities and trauells, giuing his whole Court time to take breath from the long afflictions of so raging a time: That it was to be beleeued that the fortune of the victors would rayse them vp to a higher ambition, euen to come to the walls of Rome: that felicitie beeing to be feared wherein is offred glory ioyned with profite and riches: It was to be doubted leaste his nephew woulde ioyne with them, Robert Vrsin, Pompei Colonno, Antho. Sauello, Peter Margano, and Rance Mancin, bearing the same inclination: And as it was knowen that all these had receyued money of the French king, and were prepared euen affore the battell to distresse Rome: so to meete with these pretences affore they burst out into action, and to auoyde the falling of the storme that was already gathered into a cloude, there was no other helpe then the remedie of peace. On the other side thembassadors of the king of Aragon and the Senate of Venice, solicited vehemently to the contrarie: They perswaded him that the state of things was not reduced to so great affliction, that the despayre was lesse then the hope and comfort, nor the armie so extremely dispearsed, that without great charge and in little tyme it might not be readreſſed: They alleaged that the Viceroy was in ſafetie with the greateſt parte of the horſemen, and that the Spaniſhe footemen not broken were retyred from the battell in good order, who if they were reſerued (as was very likely) all the other loſſes were of no importaunce: It was not to be feared that the Frenche men could marche ſo ſpeedily to Rome but that there woulde be reſpite enough to prouide agaynſt them, both for that it could not be but that the death of their Capteine woulde be followed with many diſorders and inſolencies, and alſo that they woulde be holden in ſuſpence for feare of the Svvizzers, who nowe were no more to be doubted to profeſſe openly for the league and diſcende into Lombardie: Laſtely, that there was no hope to obteyne peace of the Frenche king but vnder conditions vnequall and full of infamie, being alſo driuen to receiue lawes of the pride of Bernardin Caruagiall, and of the inſolencie of Federike S. Seuerin. In theſe reſpectes they helde it better to take anye other courſe then to ſtowpe vnder the winges of peace, ſpecially in ſuche intollerable and vnfaythfull ſeruitude, and with ſo greate indignitie and infamie: the rather (ſayde they) for that theſe trowpes and leagues of Schiſmatikes woulde neuer ceaſſe to perſecute his authoritie and his lyfe: They helde it yet a leſſe euill (yf extremitie woulde it ſo) to abandon Rome, and to withdrawe himſelfe and all his court eyther to the kingdome of Naples or to Venice, where he might remayne with the ſame ſurety, the ſame honor, and the ſame greatneſſe, that he had there: for that with the loſſe of Rome, the Pontificacie was not loſte, beeing alwayes tyed to the perſon of the Pope in what place ſoeuer he were: Laſtely, they encouraged him to keepe ſtill his accuſtomed conſtancie and magnanimitie, and that God, who is the ſearcher of the heartes of men, woulde neuer fayle to ayde him in ſo holy a purpoſe, and muche leſſe woulde abandon the little ſhippe of Saint Peter, whiche though it hath bene wont to be tormented with the ſtormes and waues of the Sea, yet it is ordeyned neuer to bee drowned: And finally, it woulde ſtande with the zeale, with the honour, with the pietie, and with the policie of Chriſtian princes, to be ielouſe ouer the mightineſſe of the Frenche king, and bearing any affection to religion, they woulde communicate with him in this quarrell, and ioyne to hys defence both with their forces and their proper perſons. Theſe reaſons were heard of the Pope with ſo greate doubte and ambiguitie of mynde, that beeing not hable to conceale his paſſion, it was diſcerned howe on the one ſide dyd worke in him hate, diſdayne, and his inuincible obſtinacie to bende or ſubmitte: and on the other ſide, the conſiderations of feare, ſuſpicion, and daunger: The aunſwers he made to thembaſſadors comprehended that it was not ſo greeuous to him to abandon Rome, as that he coulde not reſorte to any place where he ſhould not be in the power of an other: He tolde the Cardinalls that he woulde haue peace, conſenting that the Florentins might be ſolicited to interpoſe to that end with the French king: And yet his aunſwere bare not that reſolution, nor was ſo cleare from doubtes, as might aſſure them what was his intention. He cauſed to come from Ciuitavechie, Baſcia a Genovvay and capteyne of his Gallies, which was a manyfeſt coniecture that he woulde go from Rome: but afterwardes he diſmiſſed him to returne to his charge, leauing doubtfull that exſpectation: He ſpake to leauye thoſe Barons of Rome which were not of the conſpiracie with the others: He heard willingly the comfortes of the two Embaſſadors, but ſo, as oftentimes he aunſwered them with words full of reproche and diſdayne: He diſſembled alwayes in incertenties, whiche for the moſte parte deceiued the wiſedomes of ſuche as gaue him counſell.

About this time came Iulio de Medicis knight of the Roades and afterwards Pope, him the Cardinal Medicis vnder the leaue of the Cardinall S. Seuerin, ſent from tharmie vnder cooller to recommende him ſelfe to him in ſo greate a calamitie, but in dede to relate vnto him in what condition and ſtate things ſtoode: The Pope vnderſtanding by him at large how much the Frenchmen were weakned, of howe many capteines they were depriued and made naked, and howe many valiaunt bodies of ſouldiours they had loſt: how many lay hurt, and for many dayes would be vnprofitable, what ſpoyle of horſes they had ſuffred, and howe one parte of the armie was diſperſed abroade by reaſon of the ſacke of Rauenna, the Capteines vncertaine of the kings will, and not at good agreement amongſt them ſelues, becauſe Monſr Paliſſa refuſed to endure thinſolencie of the Cardinal S. Seuerin vſurping the office of a Legate and a capteine: that there were ſecret murmures of a diſcending of Svvizzers, and no apparant token ſene that the armie could marche ſo ſoone: This diſcourſe recomforted muche the Pope, who cauſing the reporter to be brought into the conſiſtorie, he willed him eftſones to relate them in the preſence of the Cardinalls in the ſame forme of diſcourſe which he had vſed to him apart: To theſe was added the doing of the Duke of Vrbin, who (whatſoeuer moued him) chaunged councel, & ſent to offer the Pope two hundred men at armes and foure thouſande footemen. Notwithſtanding theſe reapportes and all the comfortes they brought with them, the Cardinalls continued to aduiſe him to peace: A matter whiche albeit in wordes & outward actions ſeemed not vnplauſible to him, yet in mind he was not reſolued to accept it but for a laſt remedy: yea albeit for the preſent there appeared no preſent cure or ſalue for the ſore, yet he would rather chooſe to go from Rome, ſo farreforth as he were not out of all hope that his cauſe might be ſupported by the armies of princes, and principally that the Svvizzers would ſtirre, who ſhowing great inclination to his deſires, had many dayes before forbidden the French kings Embaſſadors, to be in the place wherein were aſſembled the deputies of all the Cantons to determine vpon the Popes demaundes.

In this eſtate of affayres, there appeared ſome hope of peace, for that, before the battell of Rauenna, the french king what with the conſideration of the daungers that hong vpon him on all ſides: and what with the deſpite of thinconſtancie of Cæſar & the hard conditions he proponed, reſpects that much induced him to yeld rather to the Popes will in many things: had ſecretly ſent Fabritio Caietto brother to the Cardinall Finalo, to the cardinalls of Nantes and Strigonia, who had not yet altogether abandoned the negociations of peace: his charge was to require thē to propound to the Pope that he was cōtent to render vp Bolognia to him: That Alfonſo d'Eſte ſhould giue vp to him Lugo with the other townes that he held in Romagnia: That he ſhould be bounde to paye him his auncient tributes, and to make no more ſalte vppon his grounds: And that he would agree to thextinction of the councell: he demaunded no other thing of the Pope, thē to haue peace with him, & that Alfonſo d'Eſte might be abſolued of the paynes, and reſtored to his auncient rightes & priuiledges: That to the family of Bentiuoleis, who ſhould remaine in exile, their proper goodes ſhould be reſerued, & the dignities reſtored to the cardinals & prelates which had folowed the councell. Which conditions albeit the two cardinals feared that the king would no more conſent vnto by reaſon of the victorie that had ſucceeded ſince, yet they durſt not propound them in other maner: And the Pope, ſeeing them ſo honorable for him, & not yet willing to manifeſt that which he had ſecretly determined in him ſelfe, iudged not that the king could refuſe them, but peraduenture that it was more profitable with theſe enterſpeeches to ſtaye the kings armie, to haue the better leaſure to ſee what would be done by thoſe in whom he had reapoſed the reſidue of his hopes: So that the Cardinalls ſtill importuning him, he ſubſigned thoſe articles the ninth day after the battell of Rauenna, giuing to the Cardinals his fayth & promiſe to accept them if the king did confirme them: He ſent alſo by letters to the Cardinall Finale remaining in Fraunce, but abſented from the Court for feare to offende the Pope, and to the Biſhop of Tiuoli, who kept the place of legate in Auignon, that they ſhould go to the king to debate of theſe things: but he ſent them no authoritie nor power to conclude them.

Vntill this time thaffayres of the Pope went but in an euill courſe: vntill this day was aduaunced the full of his calamities & his daungers: but after this day (worldly affaires haue their ordinarie mutations) his hopes began to appeare greater, and the wheele of his fortune ceaſed not with an incredible ſwiftnes to turne to his greatnes.

The thing that gaue beginning to ſo great a mutation, was the ſodayne departing of Monſr Paliſſa out of Romagnia: he was reuoked by the generall of Normandy for feare of the diſcending of the Svvizzers, and for that cauſe he drewe his armie towards the duchie of Millan, leauing in Romagnia vnder the Legate of the councell three hundred launces, three hundred light horſemen, and ſix thouſande footemen with eight peeces of great artilleries. The feare of the comming of the Svvizzers was made greater, for that the ſame generall thinking to do a ſeruice more agreable to the king, had vndiſcretely diſmiſſed the Italian footmen, and parte of the French footemen immediately after the battell of Rauenna, contrarie to all reaſon, pollicie, and that which the preſent affayres required. By the departure of Monſr Paliſſa, the Pope was deliuered of the feare that troubled him moſte, he was more confirmed in his obſtinacie, and it helped him greatly to aſſure the affaires of Rome: for the better oportunitie whereof he had leauyed certayne Romaine Barons with three hundred men at armes, and debated to make capteine generall Proſper Colonno, the rather for that the courages of ſuche as deſyred newe thinges beeing abated, Pompey Colonno that made preparation at Montfortin, conſented by the working of Proſper to depoſe Montfortin into the handes of Marke Antho. Colonno for the Popes ſuretie, reteyning baſely in his handes the money he had receyued of the French king: By this example alſo Robert Vrſin who was come affore from Petillano vppon the landes of the Colonnois to leauye armes, keeping likewiſe in his handes the money he had receyued of the Frenche king, was brought in afterwardes by the meane of Iulio Vrſin, receyuing of the Pope in recompence of his diſloyaltie, the Archbiſhoprike of Regge in Calabria: Only Peter de Margana was aſhamed to kepe the money he had receiued, doing the ſame happly with a councell no leſſe honorable then happy, for that otherwayes he had iuſtly payed the merite and payne of his deceite, beeing not long tyme after taken priſoner by the ſucceſſor of the king raigning.

But nowe the Popes mynde beeing greately confirmed by reaſon of theſe thinges, and hauing no more to feare eyther enemies forreine or domeſticall, the thirde daye of Maye in greate ſolemnitie, he gaue beginning to the Councell in the Churche of Saint Iohn Latran, beeing nowe aſſured that not onely the moſte regions of Italie woulde come thither, but alſo the Realmes of Spayne, of Englande, and of Hungary: In this firſte action, he was in perſon in habite pontificall accompanied with the colledge of Cardinalls and great multitudes of Biſhoppes, where the Maſſe of the holy Ghoſt (beſides many other prayers) being celebrated according to auncient cuſtome, and the fathers exhorted with a publike oration to inclined with all their hartes to the publike benefite & dignitie of christian religion: it was declared(the better to lay fundatiõs for other matters)that afterwards ſhould be ordeined that the councel aſſembled was a true,a lawfull,& holy councel,& that in the ſame remayned vndoubtedly all the authoritie and power of the vniuerſall Churche: Ceremonies aſſuredly both goodly and holy, and hable to pearce euen into the heartes of men,if it might haue bene beleued that the thoughtes and intentions of the authors had bene ſuch as were their words.In this ſort did the Pope gouerne him ſelfe after the battell of Rauenna.

But the french king,notwithſtanding that after the death of Monſr de Foix which ſomewhat troubled the ioy of the victorie as one whom he loued dearely,had commaunded Monſr de Paliſſa and the Legate to leade the armie vp to Rome aſſoone as they could: yet he ſeemed to abate of that inclination,and began to returne with all his deuiſes to the deſire of peace, fearing that at one tyme and from many places, great ſtormes woulde thunder vpon him and trouble his affayres: for,notwithſtanding Cæſar diminiſhed nothing of his promiſes that he would remayne firme with him, aſſuring that the truce made with the Venetians in his name, was concluded without his conſent,neither would he ratifie it: yet beſides the feare of thinconſtancie of Cæſar, and doubt whether his promiſes were diſſembled,it ſeemed to the king that for the conditions which he demaunded, he ſhould haue a companion in time of warre chargefull to him,and to the proceeding of the peace very preiudiciall and hurtfull,fearing that by his interpoſing,he ſhould be conſtrained to conſent to more vnworthy conditions: Beſides all theſe, he had no more doubt that the Swvizzers would ioyne with them of the league: And he was ſure he ſhould haue warre with the king of Englande,who had already ſent a Herald to ſignifie to him that he pretended to be ended all confederations and couenantes betwene them, for that in them all was comprehended this exception,that he ſhould make no warre neither againſt the Church,nor agaynſt the king Catholike his father in lawe: Therefore the king vnderſtanding with a great pleaſure that the Florentins were ſolicited to worke the peace, he diſpatched ſpedely to Florence the preſident of Grenoble with verye large commiſſion,to thende matters might be debated more at hande, and if neede were he might go vp to Rome: And knowing afterwards by the ſubſcription of the articles that the Popes inclination was more ready then he ſeemed, he gaue him ſelfe ouer for his parte wholly to the peace: And yet fearing leaſt for the retyring of his armie the Pope would eftſones returne to his obſtinacy,he ſent to Monſr Paliſſa lying then at Parma,to marche agayne immediatly into Romagnia with part of his regimentes, ſpreading a brute that it was to paſſe further. It ſeemed to him a matter greuous to deliuer vp Bolognia,not ſo much for the inſtance that Cæſar made to the contrarie,as for the feare he had,that notwithſtanding the peace, the Pope woulde continue his euill minde towards him: and therfore it could not but be an action preiudiciall to him to depriue him ſelfe of the towne of Bolognia,which was as the fort and bulwark of the Duchie of Millan: And beſides,the Cardinall Finalo and the Biſhop of Tiuoly being come without expreſſe authoritie to conclude, he interpreted that to an apparant ſigne that he had diſſemblingly giuen his conſent, partly for the ſtraytes and daungers wherewith he ſtoode enuironed: Neuertheleſſe at laſte he determined to accept the ſayde articles vnder certayne limitations,and yet not ſuch as by them the ſubſtance of things ſhould be troubled or altered. With which aunſwere the Secretorie of the Biſhop of Tiuoly went to Rome, demaunding in the kings name, that the Pope would ſende authoritie to the Cardinall and the Biſhoppe to conclude, or els, that he would call affore him the Presidēt of Grenoble who was at Florence, to whom was recommended sufficient power to doe the like: But the hopes of the Pope augmented daily, and by consequent, if he euer had had any inclinacion to the peace, it was now diminished, he being a man more disposed to obserue and followe tymes, then to respect and imitate the qualitie of his calling.

About this time arriued the commission of the king of England, by the which, being dispatched since the moneth of Nouember, he gaue power to the Cardinall of Yorke to enter into the league: The reason why he was so long in comming, was the longe course he had by sea hauing bene affore in Spayne: Cæsar also, after very longe doubtes, had newely ratified the league made with the Venetians, beeing principally pushed on to that action for the hopes which the kinges Catholike and of England gaue to him of the Duchies of Myllan and of Burgondye: In like sort the matter that much helped to confirme the Pope were the very great hopes which the king of Aragon put him in: who, hauing the first knowledge of the ouerthrow by letters from the french king written to the Queene, expressing that Guaston de Foix her brother was dead with great glorie, carying with him the reputacion of a famous victorie obteyned vpon his enemies: And afterwards more perticularly by aduertisements of his owne people comming somewhat later for thimpediments of the sea: And for that withall, it seemed to him that greater perill would growe to the kingdom of Naples: he had determined to sende into Italy the Great Capteine with a strength of new men: A remedy which he was driuen to vse, hauing almost no choyse of others: for, notwithstanding in outward show he semed to respect much the Great Capteine, for his behauior in the kingdom of Naples, yet he both suspected his greatnes, and durst not trust him with authoritie: The Pope then, being confirmed by these occasions, at suche time as the Secretory of the Bishop of Tyuoly ariued with the articles that had bene debated, putting him also in hope that the limitacions added by the king to moderat thinfamie that might grow to him by abandoning the protection of Bolognia, should bee referred to his will: he determined altogether not to accept them: But making semblance of the contrary in regard of the subscripcion & faith he had giuen to the Colleage of Cardinalls, A manner which some times he vsed contrary to the opinion that went on him to be alwayes vpright and iust: he caused the articles to be red in the Consistorie, and asked aduise of the Cardinalls: Whereupon the Cardinall Arborenso a Spanyard, and the Cardinal of Yorke an English man, according to a secret packt affore, the one speaking for the king of Aragon, and the other in the name of the king of England, perswaded him to perseuer in his constancie, and not to leaue abandoned the cause of the Churche which he had embraced with so great honor: They alleaged that all the necessities that had induced him to harken to these offers were remoued and ceassed, And that nowe it was manifestly seene that God woulde not suffer his shippe to perish though for some purpose vnknowne to the wit of man he had suffered it to lye open & subiect to sondry stormes: They told him it was not reasonable, that he made peace onely for him self, & much lesse to debate it without the participacion of the other confederats, the action being common and deuided from all particularitie: Lastly they exhorted him to consider well what preiudice it might bring to the sea Apostolike and to him, to seperat him selfe from true and faithfull friendes, to embrace the amitie of enemies reconciled: By the operacion of these councells, the Pope openly refused the peace: And within a very short time after, proceeding in his auncient furie, he pronownced in the Consistorie an admonicion against the french king, charging him to release the Cardinall of Medicis vpon the penalties ordeyned in the holy Cannons: But he forbare to publish it, for that the Colleage of Cardinalls beseeching him to deferre asmuch as he could rigorous remedies, offred to worke by letters written in the name of them all, by the which they would both comfort him and beseech him as a right Christian Prince to set him at libertie.

The Cardinall de Medicis was caried to Myllan, where he was kept vnder reasonable and easie garde: And albeit his fortune had brought him subiect to the power and disposing of others, yet such was his vertue & spirit, that thauthoritie of the sea Apostolike shined in him, together with a wonderfull reuerence of religion: And about this time beganne to appeare a great contemning of the councell of Pysa, the cause whereof was not onely abandoned of others with deuocion, with diligence, & with faith, but also euen of such as affore had followed it with armes and fauored it with affection, with studie, & with resolucion: for, the Pope hauing sent to the Cardinall of Medicis, full power both to absolue from all paines and cursings the souldiours that would promise to beare no more armes against the Churche, and also to giue libertie of holy buriall for all the bodies that were slaine at the battell, (A fauor demaunded with great importunities) The concurse of people was wonderfull, and no lesse maruelous the deuocion of them that came to demaund and promise such matters: yea the Ministers and officers of the king were not against it: onely it was not without manifest indignacion of the Cardinalls who saw euen before their eyes and in the place where was the seate of the councell, the souldiours and subiects of the king, contrary to his honor, against his profit, vpon the landes of his iurisdiction, and without respecting any thing thauthoritie of the councell, ronne after and follow the Romaine Church, acknowledging with great reuerence as Legat Apostolike, the Cardinall Medicis being prisoner: great is the force of a people and multitude beginning to vary and chaunge, And so much more preiudiciall and perillous their reuolt, by how much vpon their numbers and forces depende principally the estate and exspectacion of affayres.

Nowe because the truce was ratified by Cæsar, notwithstanding his agents that were within Verona menteyned that it was nothing, the french king called home one part of the bandes that he had in garrison in that citie as seruing to small purpose: And hauing reuoked also the band of two hundred gentlemen, the Archers of his garde, and two hundred other launces, fearing the threats of the king of England, he knewe by the suspicion he had of the Svvyzzers which was redoubled in him, that he should neede greater forces in the Duchie of Myllan: for which cause he had presséd the Florentyns to send him into Lombardye three hundred men at armes, as they were bownd by the couenants of confederacion betwene them for the defence of his estates in Italy: And for that, that confederacion drew to end within two monethes, he compelled them (the memorie and reputacion of the victorie being yet fresh) to confederat with him of new for fiue yeares: Wherein he bownd him selfe to defend their estates with six hundred launces, and the Florentyns for their partes promised to furnishe him with foure hundred men at armes for the defence of all that he possessed in Italy: And yet, to auoide all occasions to enter warre with the Pope, they excepted in the generall obligacion of defence, the towne of Cotignole, as if the Church might pretend right to it.

But nowe were apparantly disclosed right great daungers to the affaires of the king, for that the Svvyzzers at last were determined to send six thowsand footemen to the pay of the Pope, who had demaunded them vnder cooller to employ them against gainſt Ferrara: Thoſe that in this action ſuſteyned and fauored the kings ſide, could obteyne no other thing but to protract and deferre the deliberacion till that tyme: And againſt thoſe men the Communalties of people made vniuerſall exclamacion in their parliaments for the wonderfull hatred they bare to the name of the french king: They affirmed that the king reſted not contented with this kind of ingratitude, to refuſe to encreaſe a litle the penſions of thoſe by whoſe blood and vallour he had won perpetuall reputacion accompanied with a great eſtate, but alſo with wordes full of reproche he had deſpiſed and reiected them as Villaines, as though all men in the beginning were not conceyued vnder one element, were not caſt in one molde, and had not one maner of creacion vpon the earth, and as though any mortall man were nowe either great, renowmed or noble, whoſe Aunceſtors in the beginning were not poore, vnknowen, & baſely diſcended: That he had begon to wage footemen of the launceknightes, to ſhow the contempt he had of their nation for the ſeruice of his warres, perſwading him ſelf that ſuffering priuacion of his pay, they could not but dye in their Mounteines of idlenes and famine: Therefore they had reaſon to expreſſe to all the world, how much he was deceyued in his vaine thoughtes and perſwaſions: That his ingratitude was only hurtfull to him ſelf: That nothing could ſtay men of warre from ſhowing their vallour: That for ſuch was fit the vſe of gold and ſiluer, in whom was moſt apt and readye the managing of armes: Laſtly that it was neceſſary to ſhow once to the world howe vndiſcreete were the reſolucions of him, who in warre would preferre the launceknight footemen affore the nation of the Svvyzzers: This affection and violence of paſſion caried them ſo farre, that wedding them ſelues to the cauſe of the Pope, as if it had bene their owne, they departed from their houſes, hauing receiued in preſt onely one Florin of the Rhein for a man, where affore they were not wont to marche for the ſeruice of the king, without promiſe of many payes, and great diſtribucion of preſents amongeſt their Capteines: Their mooſter was at Coire the capitall towne of the Griſons, who hauing confederacion with the french king, and being in his ordinary penſions, had ſent to excuſe them ſelues, that for the auncient alliances they had with the higheſt Cantons of Svvyzzers, they coulde not refuſe to ſend with them certaine bandes of footemen: This mouing troubled much the minds of the french men, whoſe forces were now much diminiſhed: for, after the generall of Normandie had diſmiſſed the regiments of thItalian footemen, they had not in all aboue ten thowſand footemen, And the companies of men at armes which the king had reuoked being returned ouer the Mountes, there were left in Italy but xiij hundred launces whereof three hundred were at Parma: And yet the generall of Normandie doing more the office of a Treaſorer then of a man of warre, woulde in no wiſe leauye newe ſuccours of footemen without the kings commiſſion: Onely he had cauſed to returne to Myllan the bands that ſhould haue marched into Romagnia vnder Monſr Paliſſa which were already ariued at Finalo: The Cardinall of S. Seuerin had direction alſo to doe the like with thoſe companies that were in Romagnia: for the retyring of which ſtrengthes ſo needefull for the ſewertie of that contrey, Rymyny and Ceſena together with their caſtells, & alſo Rauenna, reuerted without difficultie to the obedience of the Pope: And becauſe the french men would not diſfurniſh the Duchie of Myllan, Bolognia for the defending whereof they had receyued ſo many afflictions, ſtoode in great daunger being almoſt abandoned both of fortune and of men: ſuch is the inſtabilitie of mortall thinges, neither certeine in them ſelues for an vniuerſall frailtie in all earthly actions, nor made aſſured by the deuiſes and wiſedoms of men for infinit imperfecti-

ſtered at Coire, they marched from thence to Trente, hauing permiſſion of Cæſar to paſſe thorow his landes, who yet ſtudying to hyde from the french king as much as he could, the thinges he had determined, excuſed him ſelfe that he could not withſtand their paſſage in reſpect of the confederacion he had with them: from Trente they went vpon the territories of Verona, where they were taried for by the armie of the Venetians who together with the Pope contributed to their paye: And albeit there was not in the campe ſufficient money to pay them for that their number was farre greater then ſix thowſand which was demaunded, yet, ſuch was the hatred that the Commons bare to the kings name, that contrary to their cuſtom they brooked with patience all difficulties.

On the other ſide Monſr Paliſſa, who was firſt come with his armie to Pontoillo to thende to hinder their paſſage thinking they would deſcend into Italy on that ſide, but finding afterwards their intencions to be otherwayes, he incamped at Chaſtillon, A place ſix miles from Peſquiera, being vncertein whether they would take towards Ferrara according to the brute, or els doe ſome enterpriſe vpon the Duchie of Myllan which was to be feared: It may be that this incerteintie haſtened and brought forth the harmes that hapned: for, it is not to be doubted that they had not taken the way to Ferrara, if by ill aduenture had not falne into the handes of the Venetian eſtradiots, A letter, by the which Monſr Paliſſa debated with the generall of Normandie beeing at Myllan, the eſtate wherein ſtoode their affaires, aſſuring him it woulde be hard to reſiſt them if they turned towards the Duchie of Myllan: By the direction of this letter they chaunged aduiſe, and the cardinall of Syon who was now come from Venice, with the other Capteines, after they had taken councel together, determined with reaſon (which ſeldom beguileth men) to follow that enterpriſe which they perceiued by the letters to be moſt troubleſom to thennemies: In which opinion they went from Verona to Villa Franche where they ioined with the Venetian armie, where in (vnder the gouernment of Ioh. P. Baillon,) were foure hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, and ſix thowſand footemen with diuerſe peeces of artillery aſwell for batterie, as for the fielde: This was the cauſe why Monſr Paliſſa abandoning Valegge the place not being defenſible, retyred to Gambara, with intencion to incampe at Pontuiqua: his ſtrength was not aboue a thowſand launces, and ſix or ſeuen thowſand footemen, the reſidue being diſtributed in Breßia, Peſquiero, and Leguaguo, for, notwithſtanding he was reſolued to call backe the three hundred launces that were at Parma, yet, what by compulſion of thapparant daunger of Bolognia, and great importunities of the Bentyuoleis, he gaue order that they ſhould be beſtowed in that citie remeyning almoſt without garriſon. But ſeeing in that place into the daunger wherein they were, and examining at laſt the vanitie of the hopes wherewith they had bene beguiled, & withall complayning bitterly againſt the couetouſnes and corrupt councells of the generall of Normandy, they conſtrayned him to ſuffer Federyk Boſſolo with certeine other Italian Capteines to leauye ſo faſt as they could, ſix thowſand footemen: A remedie which they could not apply to any purpoſe, till at leaſt the ſpace of ten dayes were paſt: And beſides the ſmall number of ſouldiours, the diſagreement amongeſt the Capteines weakened much the french armie: for, the Capteines were hardly brought to obey Monſr Paliſſa, And the ſoldiours and men at armes made weary with ſo long troubles & trauells of warre, wiſhed rather the Duchie of Myllan were loſt to thende they might returne into their contrey, then to continue the defence of it with ſo many diſaduauntages and daun-

gers: Assoone as Monsr Palissa was gon from Valegge, the Venetians and the Svvyzzers entred into it, and afterwards passing ouer the riuer of Myncie, they lodged vpon the territories of the Mantuans, where the Marquis gaue them libertie of passage, excusing him selfe vpon his disabilitie: Amyd these difficulties, the generall resolucion of the Capteines was to abandon wholly the fielde, and to laye for the defence of places of most importance, hoping that by temporising, so great a multitude and number of Svvyzzers would at last disperse and breake: Wherein they were gouerned with this reason, that the Pope no lesse cold to furnish the exspenses, then hoat to further the warre, was very slow in sending their payes, being no more able to aduaunce the wages of so great a number.

The french men bestowed within Bressia two thowsand footemen, an hundred & fifty launces, and an hundred men at armes of the Florentyns: To Crema they sent fifty launces and a thowsand footemen: And in Bergama they put a thowsand footemen and an hundred men at armes of the Florentyns: The residue of tharmie which conteyned six hundred launces, two thowsand footemen french, & foure thowsand launceknightes, was retyred to Pontuiqua, A place very stronge by the benefit of his situacion, and no lesse conuenient to succour Myllan, Cremona, Bressia, and Bergama, and there they hoped to be able to susteine thennemies: But the day after came letters and commaundements from Cæsar to the Almain footemen, to depart immediatly from the pay of the french king, And they, being subiects of the contrey of Tyroll, obeyed the letters the same day they receyued them, as not to be disobedient to their natural Lord: By reason of their departure no lesse suddeine and vnlooked for, then most preiudiciall to the french affayres, Palissa and his Capteines lost all hope to be able any longer to defend the Duchie of Myllan: And in that passion of feare and dispaire, they retyred in great haste from Pontuique to Pisqueton: by whose departure, they of Cremona being left abandoned, gaue them selues vp to the armie of the confederats which was at hande, binding them selues to paye to the Svvyzzers xl. thowsand duckats: But as amongest such varieties of nations, nourishing not few differences of ambicion, desire, and opinion, there was no certeintie in whose name the money should be receyued, so after some disputacion, the Venetians making great instance that it might be deliuered to them, it was at last receiued (the french men notwithstanding holding as yet the castell) in the name of the league and of Maxymylian sonne to Lodovvyk Sforce, on whose behalfe the Pope and the Svvyzzers pretended the conquest of the Duchie of Myllan: At the same tyme the citie of Bergama fell into the power of the confederats, the meane was this: After Monsr Palissa had called backe the companies that were there to ioyne them to tharmie, certeine of the banished crewes who entred assoone as the other companies were departed, procured them to reuolt: (it beeing no hard matter to alter a multitude that hath no heade to hold them) from Pisqueton Monsr Palissa passed the riuer of Adda, where the three hundred launces appoynted for the defence of Bolognia came to him, hauing reuoked them to him for the greatnes of the perill: There he hoped to be able to giue impediment to thennemie to passe ouer the riuer, if the strength of footemen that were appoynted to be leauyed, had come: But it was in vayne for him to thinke vpon those things, for that neyther was there present money to wage so many footemen, neither could the generall of Normandye, binding for securitie the kings demaine, raise it by any deuise, (credit being wholly lost in so great daungers:) And therefore hauing remeyned there foure dayes, assoone as he saw thennemies approch the riuer three myles below Pisqueton, he retyred to S. Ange to goe the day following to Pauia: And ſo their daunger redoubling and no exſpectacion of ſuccours in a ſtate ſo deſperat, both the hope to defend Myllan being taken away, & the contrey already drawing faſt into tumult, Ioh. Iacq. Tryuulce, the generall of Normandie, Anth. Maria Paluoiſin, Galeas Viſconte, with many other gentlemen, and all the kinges ſeruauntes and officers, went from Myllan, & ſought their ſauetie in Piemont: Not many dayes affore the Cardinalls fearing no leſſe the people then thennemies, were fled, notwithſtanding (to ſhowe that vallour in decrees, which they durſt not expreſſe in other actions) they had at that tyme almoſt ſuſpended the Pope from all adminiſtracion ſpirituall and temporall of the Church: A degree to depriue him of the place which he helde: Theſe tumultes were much helping to the ſauetie of the Cardinall Medicis whom it ſeemed God reſerued to a greater happines: for, as they were leading him into Fraunce, and the morning that he entred the barke at the paſſage of Pavv which is right ouer againſt Baſignany called in hiſtories Anguſta Bacienorum, certeine paiſants of the village beginning to murmure, one Reignold de Lallo chiefe of the conſpiracie accompanied with certeine of the Cardinalls fauorits lodging there all night, aſſembled a number, and tooke him from the french men that garded him: They, whom other aduerſities had made fearefull of all accidents, hearing a noyſe of a tumult which they durſt not abide to ſuppreſſe, were more carefull to flee then to fight, loſing their priſoner by cowardiſſe whome they had wonne in the daunger of a battel: Paliſſa being entred into Pauia determined to ſtay there, ſending for Tryuulce and the generall to come to him thether: Whereupon Tryuulce by thaduiſe of the general and principalls of the french ſide, laied affore him the vanity of the councell, and how vnpoſſible it was to abide ſo great a ruine, the armie being vnmanned with footemen: That the ſhortnes of the time ſuffered not to wage new companies, And much leſſe to drawe any but from places farre remoued and with great difficulties: Laſtly, that though all theſe impediments were not, yet there was no money to pay them, all their reputacion being loſt, their friendes full of aſtoniſhment, and the people puffed vp with incredible hatreds for the immoderat inſolencies which the ſoldiours had vſed ſo long time: Tryuulce applying this councell to the preſent neceſſitie of thinges, he went and cauſed to caſt a bridge where the riuer is ſtraighteſt and furtheſt of from Valence towards Aſt, by the commoditie of which he ment to paſſe his companies ouer Pavv: But by this the armie of the confederats (to the which after the french men were retyred from Adda, the citie of Lody was rendred together with the caſtell) diſcamping from S. Ange, was come neare to Pauia where the Venetian Capteines euen at the firſt arriuall began to batter the caſtell & one part of the Svvyzzers to paſſe the riuer that ioyneth to the citie, with boates: The french men fearing they ſhoulde finde impediments to paſſe the ſtone bridge which is vppon the riuer of Teſin, by the which onely they might ſaue them ſelues, wonne the other bridge to be able to yſſue out of Pauia: But affore the reareguard was come forth, wherein to ſuſteine the horſemen, certein footemen of the launceknightes which were not yſſued out with the others, were beſtowed the laſt of all, with whom the Svvyzzers, yſſuing out of the new gate and of the caſtell which was now abandoned, went skirmiſhing all along Pauia and the bridge, the footemen of the launceknightes making a reſolute defence aboue all others: But paſſing ouer the bridge of Grauatona which was of wood, the plankes breaking with the waight of the horſes, all the french men and launceknightes that were not yet paſſed ouer, were eyther ſlayne on the place, or taken priſoners: (That laſt calamitie being ſo much the more lamentable and greeuous, by howe much they hoped by their diligenc gence to make waye for their sauetie which they sawe their fortune persecuted to thuttermost) The towne of Pauia bownd it selfe to pay a great quantitie of money, by whose example also Myllan compownded but for a greater summe, And all the other townes except Bressia and Crema, fled from the aduersities of the french men: All the contrey cryed now vpon the name of thEmpire, the state was receiued and gouerned in the name of the holy league (so was it called vniuersally) and all affaires disposed by thauthoritie of the Cardinall of Syon assigned Legat for the Pope: But the treasor, and what soeuer was taxed vpon the townes was made a reward to the Svvyzzers, to whom was transferred an interest in all things that concerned gaine or profit: the same beeing the cause that many other bandes and trowpes of them discended into Lombardye to ioyne with the residue, after the parliament of Zurich was ended which was assembled for that cause: In this mutacion, the cities of Plaisance and Parma, gaue them selues willingly to the Pope, who pretended they apperteyned to him as members of Rauenna: The Svvyzzers made them selues Lordes of Lucarno, and the Grisons got Valuoltolino and Chiauenna, places very commodious for them: And in the heate of this fortune, Ianus Fregosa, Capteine of the Venetian armie, beeing gonne to Genes with such bandes of horsemen and footemen as he had obteyned of tharmie, was the cause that that citie renolted (the french gouernor beeing fled) whereof he was created Duke, A dignitie affore tyme inuested in his father: with the same violence of fortune, all the townes and castells of Romagnia returned to the Popes obedience: And lastly the Duke of Vrbyn approching neare to Bolognia with the bandes of souldiours of the Churche, the famulie of the Bentyuoleis, left it abandoned, their fortune leauing them desperat, hauing by these violent degrees depriued them of all hope: The Pope pursued this famulie very sharpely, excommunicating all the places that should receiue them hereafter: he expressed no lesse hatred against the citie, And beeing most kindled for their forgetfulnes of so many his benefits bestowed vpon them, and in that ingratitude not only reuolting from his obedience, but also in their spite, had not forborne to spurne his picture, and rayle out many villanous words against him: he would consent no more that they should create new Magistrates, nor communicat any way in the gouernment of the towne: he exacted by the meane of seuere officers, huge summes of money of sundry Citisens, as partakers with the Bentyuoleis: yea the opinion ronne, that if his deuises had not bene broken by death, he had a meaning to destroy that citie, and translate thinhabitants to Centa.

THE ARGVMENT OF THE ELEVENTH BOOKE.

THe Duke of Ferrara is in great trouble: The Medicis returne to Florence: The king of Romains makes alyance with the Pope: Maxymylian Sforce is put in the possession of the Duchie of Myllan: The French king makes his preparacions to recouer Myllan: Pope Iulio dyeth: Leon the tenth is created Pope: The French men are ouerthrowen neare to Nouaro: and the Venetians neare to Vincensa.

THE ELEVENTH BOOKE OF THE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

NOTwithstanding the Pope, amyd his greatest aduersities & daungers, had not onely obteyned victorye of his ennemies contrary to all hope and coniecture, but also with the same felicitie, had amplified the iurisdiction of the Churche aboue exspectacion and contrary to common equitie: yet, his auncient couetousnes to the citie of Ferrara, (the first matter of all these broyles) so helde him still ouerruled, that he could not make his desires equal to his fortune, nor conforme his wandring minde to rest and tranquilletie: Such " is the rage of couetousnes when it hath thassistance of authority, which makes men
" hard to be contented with that which occasion doth offer, for that those things that " come first doe abhorre them, so long as by the greatnes of their power and place,
" they aspyre and thirst for better: But albeit the Pope had violent desires to turne his forces against Ferrara, yet, the way of peace seeming more easie then the warre, or rather hoping more in the benefitte of secret and artificiall practises, then in actions apparant and discouered: he gaue eare first of all to the Marquis of Mantua who besought him that Alfonso d'Este might come to him to Rome to demaunde pardon, and that he woulde eftsoones reclayme him to grace vnder some indifferent condicions: In this request was concurrant thEmbassador of the king of Aragon, suing for him bothe for that he was the kinsman of his king (for Alfonso came of a Daughter of tholde Ferdinand king of Naples) and also for that he esteemed it more to the commoditie of the affayres of his kinge to binde him to him by this propertie of benefitte, then to suffer so great an estate to bee adioyned to the greatnes of the Churche: Moreouer the famulie of the Colonnois, beeing become of greate amitie with Alfonso, were earnest solycitors in this cause: The reason of their compassion was, for that after the battell of Rauenna, Fabricio Colonno, who was Alfonsoes prisoner, beeing sent for and requyred of him, he vsed so many delayes, first in refusing, and then in interposing many excuses, that by the

the mutacion that hapned, he brought it into his owne power to giue him his libertie without any charge or raunsom: At last safeconduit was obteyned for him from the Pope, by the sewertie whereof confirmed also with the faith of thEmbassador of Aragon in the name of his king, which was protested to him by the consent and priuitie of the Pope, he went to Rome, his submission beeing greater then his hope to be forgiuen: And being come to Rome, the Pope admitted him into the Consistorie suspending in the meane while all censures and paynes: There, with great humilitie he demaunded pardon, & with the same submission besought him, that he might bee receyued into his grace and restored to the fauour of the sea Apostolike, offering to doe hereafter all those offices and duties which might apperteyne to a moste deuout and faythfull Vassall of the Church: The Pope heard him with a countenance and asspect reasonably peasible, and substituted six Cardinalls to debate with him touching condicions of agreement: who, after certeine dayes spent in disputacion and argument, declared to him, that the Pope neyther would nor ment to depriue the Church of the citie of Ferrara, since it was lawefully reuerted to the imperie of the Churche: But in recompense, there should be giuen to him the citie of Ast, which beeing receyued in the name and authoritie of the league by the departure of the frenche men, the Pope had vainely sent thether to take possession of it, the Bishop of Agrigenta, pretending that what soeuer was on this side Pauy, apperteyned to the Churche: This offer was constantly refused of Alfonso, who, for that it comprehended a demaunde contrary to all the hopes that had bene giuen him, beganne to feareleast the Pope sought but to interteyne him cunningly within Rome, whilest he dressed some execucion agaynst Ferrara, the late accident at Regge nothinge diminishing the reason of this feare.

The D. of Ferrara goeth to Rome to demaund pardon of the Pope.

The Pope had dealt with thinhabitants of Regge, (who in so great confusion of thinges feared much) to giue them selues vppe to the Churche, following the example of Parma and Plaisance, wherein to giue greater force to his councells and perswasions, he had giuen direction to the Duke of Vrbyn to march with his companies vppon the territories of Modona: In like sorte Vitfruch was gonne to Regge, to attempt the like action for the profitte of Cæsar, on whose behalfe did worke the Cardinall of Este, who, in the absence of his brother had charge ouer his estates, he, seeing that citie could not bee kept, and iudging the daunger would bee lesse if it fell into the handes of Cæsar, who bothe pretended nothing against Ferrara, and also in his affayres there was hope of a greater chaunge, he aduised the people of Regge, rather to acknowledge the Empire then the Church: But they aunswered (in matters of election the will of a popular multitude is stronger then their reason) that they woulde followe thexample of the Duke, who was gonne to the Pope and not to Cæsar, And so receyued into their towne the souldiours of the Church, who immediatly founde meanes to bee Lordes of the Citadell, notwithstanding Vitfruch had furnished it with a garrison of footemen: Lastly Garfagnana was rendred to the Duke of Vrbyn, who returning afterwards to Bolognia, dismissed all his bandes of footemen: for that the confederats somewhat angrie that the Pope occupied Parma and Plaisance, the Cardinall of Syon signified to the Duke that it was not necessary he passed further, since the victorie was already obteyned against the common enemies.

The Duke of Ferrara, being entred into many suspicions, both for the hard condicions that the Pope offered, and for the taking of Regge, made meane to the Pope by the spanish Embassador and Fabrice Colonno who neuer left to accompanie him, to haue leaue to returne to Ferrara: This requeſt the Pope ſhowed no diſpoſicion to agree vnto, but menteyned that the ſafeconduit which he had giuen him for the controuerſie he had with the Church, could not let him to doe iuſtice to his perticular Creditors, of whom many demaunded inſtantly that he would adminiſter iuſtice to them: ThEmbaſſador and Fabricio aunſwered him frankely, that it was not to the Duke and to them that he ought to breake his faith, And therefore to preuent the Pope to doe any further ſpite againſt him, the next morning Fabricio being well mounted, went towards the portall of S. Iohn de Latran, the Duke and Mark. Anth. Colonno following him a good diſtance of: And finding the portall garded with a greater ſtrength then it was wont to bee and ſuche as was ſette to ſtoppe his going, he, hauing a force aboue theirs, brought the Duke thorowe the gate and conducted him in ſewertie to the water ſide: This friendſhippe he did to the Duke, in recompenſe of the benefit of his libertie which he had receyued of him: for, it is not to bee doubted, that the Pope would not ſtill haue reteyned him priſoner, had it not beene for thimpediment of the Colonnois, who finding that the way was daungerous for him to goe by lande, were driuen to procure his paſſage by ſea to Ferrara.

And whileſt theſe thinges were in doing, the Pope, in whome was yet no diminucion of hatred agaynſt the libertie of the Florentyns, had ſo wrought with the Cardinall of Syon, that the bandes of ſouldiours which they had ſent to the king, were ſtrypped and put to ſpoyle: of theſe bandes, albeit ſuche as were vnder Luke Sauella being ſix skore men at armes and fifty light horſemen (the reſidue were left for the garde of Breſcia vnder Frauncis Torelle) had, affore the Frenche armye were paſſed the ryuer of Pavv, obteyned ſafeconduit of the Cardinall of Syon confirmed by the othe and fayth of Io. Pavvle Baillon and almoſte all the Venetian Capteynes, that they myght returne to Tuskane: yet, as they laye lodged neare to Cremona according to the rule and direction they had receyued, they were ſpoyled by the Venetian ſouldiours by the conſent of the Cardinall of Syon: Who, to thende the violence myght bee executed with more ſewertie, ſent thether (as ſome ſuppoſe) two thowſande footemen, the rather for that the companyes of Tryuulce and others were lodged with them, and they for that they were almoſte all Italian ſouldiours had lykewiſe obteyned ſaffeconduit to paſſe: Immediatly vpon the robberye and ſpoyle of theſe ſouldiours, the Biſhoppe of Syon ſent to Chriſtopher More and Pavvle Capello agents for the Senat, to demaunde the bootye that had bene made, as apperteyning to the Svvyzzers: But they refuſed it, and therefore comming the next daye to the campe of the Svvyzzers to ſpeake with the Cardinall of Syon, they were almoſte all ledde priſoners to Iacques Staffler their Capteyne, and by him caryed to the Cardinall, who conſtrayned them to paye ſix thowſande duckatts in recompenſe of the praye, (not holding it conuenient that his diſloyaltye ſhoulde turne to the profitte of others:) he ſent alſo to ſummon the Marquis of Montferrat to deliuer to him as pryſoner Nicholas Capponi Embaſſador of the Florentyns, to whome he had giuen ſaffeconduit beeing retyred to Caſall Ceruas: In this meane whyle, the Senat, deſiring to recouer Breſcia and Crema, labored the Cardinall of Syon, that their companies myght be returned, whom the Cardinall enterteyned vnder cooller to marche together with the Svvyzzers into Pyemont agaynſt the Duke of Sauoye and the Marquis of Saluſſa, who had followed the faction of the Frenche King: But that reaſon ceaſſing afterwardes, bothe for the wonderfull augmentacion of the number of Svvyzzers, and alſo for that it was well seene that the frenche souldiours returned ouer the Mountes, he neither refused nor agreed, that they should goe, A matter supposed altogether to proceede of the instance of Cæsar to thende they should not recouer those townes: At last, the Svvyzzers beeing in Alexandria, the Venetians departed from Bosco vppon the suddeine, and passed the riuer of Pavv without any impediment, at Caua vppon the territories of Cremona: An expedicion which the Cardinall might haue let, if he had not dissembled it (as was beleeued) at the Popes request: But beeing once ouer the riuer, some marched agaynst Bressia, and some tooke the entreprise of Crema, bothe which were kept yet for the frenche king: The frenche men that were within Bressia, seeing their present fortune could suffer no delay of action, went out and sette vppon them at the village of Paterna, where they were constrayned to retyre within the towne with the losse of more then three hundred men.

Conqueſt draweth with it ambicion, insolencies and couetousnes, And with men of warre triumphing in the victorie, all things seeme to hold of equitie, that they do in their rage and couetousnes: for, the Svvyzzers remeyning alone in the Duchie of Myllan and Pyemont, deuised how to taxe and rate the whole contrey, being now wholly assured of the french men: And albeit the french king, for the great affection he bare to the Duchie of Myllan, was hardly brought to abandon altogether the affayres of Italy: yet necessitie compelled him to harken to the councells of such, as aduised him to deferre those deuises to an other tyme, and dispose his witts for that sommer, to defende the Realme of Fraunce: The rather for that the king of England, according to the contract made with the king Catholike, had sent by sea an armye of six thowsand footemen to Fontarabio, A towne of the kingdome of Spayne standing vppon the Occean sea: the chiefe ende of this iorney was, that ioyning to the companies of the sayd king Catholike, they might in one mayne force, assayle the Duchie of Guihen: he beganne also with an other nauie, to skower all alonge the coasts of Normandye and Brittaine to the great astonishment of the peoples of those prouinces: Moreouer the french king had no hope to drawe agayne Cæsar into amitie with him, for that he vnderstoode by the Bishop of Marseilles his last Embassador resident in his Court, that he bare a minde farre estraunged: he aduertised him also that Cæsar had not enterteyned him with so many hopes, nor for other regarde debated with him vppon so many matters with so fayre apparance, then to wynne occasion to oppresse him when he thought least of it, or at least to gyue him (as it were) some violent and deadely blowe, as he gloried that he had done at such tyme as he reuoked the launceknightes.

Thus Italy being for this yeare assured from the armies of the french king, whose souldiours notwithstanding helde as yet, Bressia, Crema, Leguague, the castell and lanterne of Genes, the castell of Myllan, the castell of Cremona, with certeine other fortresses of that estate: There were discerned amongest the confederats, many signes of difference and disagreement, for the diuersitie of their wills, and their endes: for, as the Venetians desired to recouer Bressia and Crema, as due to them by the articles of capitulacion, & for that they had borne out the daungers & troubles of the warre: A matter which the Pope desired likewise for them: So, on the other side, Cæsar, (from whose will the king of Aragon at last could not be seperat) thought to appropriate them to him selfe, and also to depriue the Venetians of all that had bene iudged to them by the league of Cambray: Besides, Cæsar and the king of Aragon practised (but very secretly) to make to diuolue the Duchie of Myllan to one of their Nephewes: A working quite contrary to the Pope and the Svvyzzers, who labored apparantly as much as they could, that according to the vniuerſall reſolucion and conſent from the beginning, Maxymylian, ſonne to Lodovvyk Sforce might be reſtored to the place of his father, after whoſe fall he had remeyned alwayes in Germanye: The matter that moued the Pope, was a feare he had, leaſt Italy ſhoulde fall into a miſerable ſeruitude of the Almaines and Spanyards: And that which induced the Svvyzzers, was a deſire for their owne profit, that that eſtate ſhoulde not bee brought into the power of ſo mightie Princes, but rather to ſtande ſubiected to one that could not menteyne him ſelfe without their ayde and ſuccours: Which election, as it depended almoſt wholly vppon thoſe in whoſe power was that eſtate, and for the feare of their forces: ſo, the Pope, the more to confirme them in that wil, and in all neceſſities to haue in his hande the bridle with the which he might moderate thambicion of Cæſar and the kinge Catholike, did all that he could to winne their amitie: And for that cauſe, beſides the great account he made publikely of the nation of Svvyzzers, rayſing to the ſtarres the actions they had done for the ſauetie of the ſea Apoſtolike, he gaue them yet for their greater honor the banners of the Church, with this glorious title, to bee the Champions and defenders of the Eccleſiaſtike libertie: Beſides theſe diuerſities, the Viceroy had readdreſſed the ſpaniſh companies which after the battell were retyred with him into the kingdom of Naples: And beginning eſtſoones to march and to paſſe with them into Lombardye, the Pope and the Venetians refuſed to recontinue the payes of forty thowſand duckats by the moneth, which had bene diſcontinued ſince the ouerthrowe: Their reaſon was, that ſeeing the frenche armie was chaſſed home, they ſtoode no more ſubiect to ſuche bonde, for that it was to ceaſſe by the articles of the confederacion when ſoeuer the frenche were expulſed out of Italy: Whereunto was replyed on the behalfe of the King of Aragon, that it could not bee ſayde that the Frenche King was dryuen out of Italy, ſo long as Breſſia, Crema, with other many ſtronge places, ſtoode at his deuocion: Moreouer the Kinge of Aragon together with Cæſar complayned in that the Pope did appropriat to him ſelfe the profitts of the victorie that was common to them both, And vſurped that which manifeſtly apperteyned to an other, making him ſelfe Lorde, (vnder cooller of certeine reaſons ſubborned, or at leaſt ſo olde and withered, that their force was gonne) vppon Parma and Plaiſance, cities which the Lordes of Myllan had holden ſo long tyme, as freeholders of thEmpire. The diuerſitie was alſo expreſſed for matters that concerned the Duke of Ferrara: for, as the Pope, on the one ſide nouriſhed his auncient couetouſnes to vſurpe that Dukedom, ſo, on the other ſide, the king of Aragon who deſired to preſerue & protect him, ſtoode yet diſcontented with the iniurie that was offered to haue ſtaied him at Rome contrary to the law of faith & ſafeconduit giuen: for theſe reaſons the Pope deferred to vexe Ferrara, exſpecting perhaps the yſſue of affayres of farre greater importance, whereof Cæſar not thinking good that any reſolucion were made without him, diſpatched into Italy the Biſhop of Gurcy whom he had appoynted to that expedicion euer ſince, after the battell of Rauenna, there was negociacion of peace betweene the Pope and the French king: he appoynted to ſende him then for the feare he had leaſt they compownded amongeſt them ſelues without reſpecting him and his affayres: but the mutacion of thinges hapning afterwards, he ſtill continued his deuiſe to ſende him: In like ſorte, fell into conſideracion the affayres of the Florentyns, who beeing filled full of ſuſpicion, began now to feele the frutes of the newtralitie which vndiſcreetely they had vſed, finding with all that it was not ſufficient to beare themſelues vpon the iuſtice of their cauſe, wanting diſcreſſion and forecaſte: for in the warre preſent, neyther had they offended the confederates, nor miniſtred any ſuccours to the French king, but ſo farrefoorth as they were bound for the defence of the Duchie of Millan according to the confederation made in common betweene them, the king Catholike, and with him: They had not ſuffred within their iuriſdiction any violence to be done vpon thoſe Spanishe ſouldiours whiche fledde from the battell of Rauenna, for the which the king of Aragon himſelfe gaue thankes to thembaſſador of Florence: yea they had ſatisfied all his demaundes, for that after the councell was broken vp from Piſa, his Agentes beeing in Italie, and the king him ſelfe offring to their Embaſſador to be bounde to defende their common weale agaynſt all men, ſo farre foorth as they promiſed him they woulde not defende Bologna, nor take armes agaynſt the Churche, nor fauour thunlawfull councell of Piſa: But they being lette by ciuill diſcordes to make the better election, gaue themſelues neither to followe the Frenche, nor any other, and obſeruing newtralitie from one day to an other, and that with counſells no leſſe doubtfull then broken, not ioyntly and fully reſolued whether they woulde obſerue it, they offended muche the Frenche king, who in the beginning promiſed muche of them, they remoued not the hatred of the Pope, and lefte the king of Aragon without any recompence to enioy the fruite of their newtralitie: A matter which he would gladly haue couenaunted with them to obteine: So that the Pope puſhed on with his auncient hatred agaynſt the Gonfalonnier or Magiſtrate, and a perpetuall deſire diſcending from all Popes to haue authoritie in that common weale, ſolicited earneſtly the reſtitution of the familie of Medicis to their auncient greatnes. To this the king of Aragon, notwithſtanding he vſed diſſembled phraſes to the Embaſſador of Florence, bare ſome inclination, but not with ſo great vehemency, for feare leaſt in any ſtirre or alteration, they might be brought to fauor the Frenche king by thauthoritie of the Magiſtrate: yea it was diſtruſted that though the Gonfalonnier were depoſed and taken away, yet the common weale beeing freely gouerned, woulde not haue the ſame affection, in reſpect of the newe and auncient dependances: But the reſolution of this matter together with others, was reſerued till the comming of the Biſhop of Gurce, with whom it was agreed that the Viceroy and ſuche as were for the other confederates, ſhoulde meete at Mantua. In this reſpite of time that the Biſhop was comming, the Pope ſent to Florence his Datario, Laurence Pucci a Florentin (he was afterwardes choſen Cardinall, and called Cardinall of foure Saintes) to ſolicite them, together with thembaſſador which the Viceroy had there, that they would ſticke to the league and contribute to the charges agaynſt the Frenchmen: That was the cooller of his going, but in true meaning he was ſent to ſounde the wills of the Citizens. That demaunde was debated many dayes without any concluſion: The Florentins made offers to paye to the confederates certayne proportions of money, but they aunſwered doubtfully to the demaunde to enter the league and proteſt them ſelues agaynſt the Frenche king: Which doubtfulneſſe moued partly by an opinion they had (which was true) that thoſe matters were proponed artificially, rather to entrappe them then to aſſure them: and partly by an aunſwere which the Biſhop of Gurce had made to their Embaſſador at Trent, whom they ſent to meete him: He ſeeming to make ſmall reckoning of the reapport made to him that Cæſar by the capitulation of Vincenſa ſubſigned with his owne hande, was bounde to defende them, aſſured them that the Pope was determined to trouble them, and yet in paying to Cæſar xl. thouſand

Duckets, he would deliuer them of that daunger: To this he added that the confederation betweene Cæsar and the Frenche king continuing yet, they shoulde not therefore enter into the league, if first Cæsar gaue them not example. The Florentins were not farre estraunged to buye their quiet with money, but they feared that the onely name of Cæsar (notwithstanding the Bishop assured them that his will should be followed by the Spaniards) would not suffice to remoue and make ceasse the yll intention of the others: A perswasion which helde them in doubt, and kept them so restrayned, that with a councell well disposed, they could not minister the salue to suche as had power to helpe their infirmitie: It was a matter perhaps considered vppon with councell and discression, and yet it could not but proceede either of negligence, or of their discordes, or of too muche confidence in their strength of footemen, forbearing in that respect to refurnishe themselues of souldiors trayned, by whom they might haue bene defended from any sodaine assault, or at least might haue made easie the couenantes with the confederates, and with better conditions, knowing once howe harde a matter it were to force them. Whileste these thinges were in action, the Viceroy with his regimentes of footemen was entred vpon the countrey of the Bolonnois, where hauing no meane to satisfie the payes which he had promised to the souldiours, they ranne with suche a tumult to his tent threatning and conspiring to kill kim, that he had scarce leasure to steale away, seeking his safetie by fleeing towards Modena: one parte of tharmie tooke towardes the countrey of the Florentins, the residue chaunged not place, but liued there without law, without order, and without commaundement: And within three or foure dayes after, their light rages beeing somewhat satisfied with parte of the payes that had bene promised, the Viceroy also and the residue beeing reassembled and returned to tharmie, they gaue their promise to tarrie for him in that place tyll he returned from Mantua, where the Bishop of Gurce was nowe arriued. As the Bishop passed by the territories of them of Verona, the Frenche men that laye in garrison in Leguaguo hauing refused many offers of the Venetians, gaue vp to the Bishop that towne whiche they coulde no longer holde: This was thought to be done by a former commaundement of Monsr Palissa, aswell to them as to all the residue that had in charge the other townes, to thende to nourishe discorde betweene Cæsar and the Venetians: But it was an action very vnfortunate for the souldiours, who (without respecting their safeconduit obteined from the Bishop of Gurce) were miserably robbed and stripped by the Venetian armie which lay encamped vpon the confines of Bressia, after they were returned from Bosco, and after they had recouered Bergama without any difficultie: onely they forbare to batter the towne, for that (as was sayd) the cardinall of Sion had forbidden them.

The resolutiõ of the treatie of Mantua by the confederates.

It was resolued in the assemblie of Mantua, that Maximilian Sforce should be reinuested in the Duchie of Millan, the desire of the people beeing nothing inferior to the equitie of his title. To this agreed the king of Aragon and Cæsar, no lesse to satisfie the great instance of the Pope, then to please the wills of the Svvizzers: Touching thassignation of the maner and time, it was referred till the Bishop of Gurce mette with the Pope, to whom he was to go, both to conclude thalliance betwene Cæsar and him, and to solicite peace with the Venetians, and so by the meane of common alliance, to confirme Italie in her auncient suretie that the Frenche king should no more trouble it: In that assembly also was disputed the expedition against the Florentins, wherein Iulio de Medicis made instance aswell in his owne name, as for the Cardinall: he proued that the alteration of that state would be easie, for the

diuision amongest the Citizens: for thaffection of many that desired their returne: for the secrete intelligences they had with sundrye noble and mightie personages: And withall for that one parte of the men at armes of that common weale being in Lombardie, and an other moytie inclosed within Bressia, they had not sufficient forces to make defence agaynst an assault so sodayne: Lastely, besides the money he offred, he showed the frute that woulde come by restoring them to their former dignitie: for, the authoritie and power of that Citie beeing taken out of the handes of one that depended wholly vpon the French king, it would fal to thadministration of persons, who standing discontented and wronged by that king, had no reason to depende or holde vpon other alliance then of the confederates. Barnard de Bibiena (afterwardes Cardinall) vrged this matter muche in the name of the Pope, who for that occasion had sent him to Mantua, a man for his learning no lesse meete for this legation, then for his affection moste friendly to the Medicis in whose house both he and his brothers had bene trained vp euen from their youth. Iohn Vittorio Soderin a Lawyer and brother to the Gonfalonnier, was at this time Embassador to the Florentins with the Bishoppe of Gurce, to whom nothing was sayde, nor any thing demaunded, eyther by the Viceroy or in the name of the league: Onely the Bishop declared to him the daunger, and howe conuenient it was that they accorded with Cæsar according to the demaundes made before, offring that Cæsar and the king of Aragon should receiue them into protection: But the Embassador in whom was no power to conclude, could do no other thing then aduertise the common weale and expect aunswers: neither did he solicite the Viceroy by him selfe or by others, nor vsed any diligence to hinder the workings of the Medicis: hauing no fulnesse of authoritie, he was driuen to be silent in thinges that concerned directly the safetie of the common weale: And yet the matter of it selfe was not without many difficulties, both for that the Viceroy had not so great an armie, as to aduenture to make triall of his forces without necessitie: and also the Bishop of Gurce, to let the Venetians for recouering Bressia, or to make any greater proceedings, desired that the Spaniards might passe into Lombardie with all speede conuenient. By these considerations it was beleeued, that if the Florentins forbearing their nigardnes as the present perills required, had consented to contribute to Cæsar the money he demaunded, and releeued the Viceroy with some small summe whereof he had great necessitie, they had easily turned away and auoyded the storme: yea the Bishop of Gurce and the Viceroy might perhaps with better will haue entred into couenant with the common weale, of whom they were certayne to receiue the things that should be promised, then with the Medicis, who had no habilitie to giue them any thing, if first they returned not to Florence with armes. But the cause of that Citie being almost abandoned, eyther by the negligence or by the malice of men, it was determined that the Spanishe armie together with the Cardinall and Iulian Medicis, shoulde marche towards Florence: In which expedition the Pope had declared the Cardinall Legate of Tuskane, with fulnesse of power to leauie the souldiors of the church, and wage suche others of the townes adioyning, as he shoulde thinke conuenient for that seruice: The Pope omitted nothing that might aduaunce this enterprise, rather applying his authoritie to his will, then to the equitie of the matter.

But assone as the assembly of Mantua was broken vp, the Viceroy returning to the territories of Bologna, caused his armie to marche with speede agaynst the Florentins, who had very small respite to make necessarie prouisions, for that they were not aforehand aduertised of the resolutions of Mantua. The Cardinall ioyned with the Viceroy assoone as he drewe neare the frontiers, hauing caused to be drawen from Bolognia two Cannons to supplie the want of the Spaniards who had no peeces of batterie: Also Frauntis Vrsin and the Vitelli (capteines for the Churche) came thither to him, but without their bands of souldiours, both they and the other companies of the Church being forbidden by the Duke of Vrbin: who, notwithstanding Iulian Medicis had had some bringing vp in his Court, A matter to moue fauor, and that he had alwayes professed to desire the greatnesse of the Medicis, which was a strong argument of affection, refused to refurnishe them with artilleries or any sort of succours eyther of his souldiours or subiectes, though the Pope had commaunded the contrarie by large letters, aswell to him as to other townes subiect to the Churche. Assoone as the Viceroy was entred vpon the landes of the Florentins, there came to him an Embassador, who in the name of the whole common weale declaring the respectes they had alwayes borne to the king of Aragon, both what were their actions in the laste warres, and also what that king might hope for of suche a Citie receyuing it to his amitie, besought him, afore he passed further, to signifie what it was he demaunded of the Florentins: for that in demaundes reasonable, and not exceeding their power, they would willingly satisfie him. The Viceroy aunswered that his comming had not bene determined onely by the king Catholike, but also by all the confederates for the common suretie of Italie, seeing that so long as the Gonfalonnier remayned in that administration, they coulde not be assured that that common weale would not followe the French king, and be seruiceable to his occasions: Therefore he demaunded in the name of the whole league, that the Gonfalonnier might be depriued of the gouernment, and that there might be instituted a forme of policie not suspected to the confederates: which coulde not be vnlesse the Cardinall and Iulian Medicis were restored to their naturall countrey: That if they would consent to these things, they should finde agreement in the residue more easily: Lastely, he willed him to signifie this reapport and his intention to the state of Florence, and yet he woulde not staye his armie tyll aunswere were returned.

At Florence immediatly vpon the brute of the marching of the Spaniards, mighte be discerned an vniuersall astonishment in the mindes of men, bothe doubting that the Popes forces woulde inuade them on some other side, and fearing the diuision of Citizens, and thinclination of the multitude to newe thinges: They were verye weake in men at armes, and had no other strength of footemen, then suche as were eythet leauyed in haste, or at least drawen out of their garrisons, an estate of souldiours not yet experienced in warre: They had no excellent capteine vppon whose vertue and authoritie they might reappose the guyding of an army, and their other leaders were such as in the memorie of man they had not in their paye men of lesse exspectation: Their weakenesse was great in regarde of the strength that was comming agaynst them, their wantes were farre inferiour to the preparations of their enemies, their wisdomes vnhable to preuent the daungers that threatned, their wealth vnprofitable, where wanted men for action: Lastely, they had nothing amongest them which did not helpe to the desolation of their estate, and wanted all thinges wherein they might hope for comfort, counsell, or compassion: Their feares were vayne, for that their perill was swifter then their prouision: And there coulde be no place for confidence, where was nothing to assure their hope: All thinges were full of confusion, and the soddennesse of the calamitie made them lesse apte to consulte for their safetie: And yet making suche prouision as they coulde according to the shortnesse of time, they reassembled their men at armes distributed into many many places, they waged footemen, but ſuche bodies as they coulde get: They chooſed out the beſte bandes of their Penſioners, and drewe to Florence all their principall forces, both for the ſuretie of their Citie, and to refurniſhe from thence all other places that ſhoulde ſuffer moſte daunger: And amidde theſe meanes of prouiſions for the warre, they forgate not (but very late) to proue what they coulde do by way of accorde: for which cauſe, beſides the continuall ſolicitation of their Embaſſador with the Viceroy, they wrote to the Cardinall of Voltero lying at Gradoli neare to Rome, to go to the Pope, and labour to appeaſe him with offers, with petitions, with humilities, and all other ſortes of offices what ſo euer: But he hauing a heart hardned, aunſwered notwithſtanding with words contrarie to his doings, that the enterpriſe came not of him, and that it was followed without his forces: onely not to ſtirre vp the league agaynſt him, he was conſtrayned to conſent to it, and to ſuffer the Cardinall of Medicis to drawe artillerie from Bolognia: That he was not hable to ſtaye the expedition affore it was begon, and muche leſſe coulde he breake it nowe that it was in action: He made him ſelfe ſorrowfull for their affliction, and yet expreſſed no inclination to compaſſion: his wordes were doubtfull, and his intentions diſſembled: he ſawe the humor that was offended, and yet woulde not aplye the medicine to comfort it, iudging it beſt for the ſeruing of his turne, to ſuffer them to languiſhe in their proper calamities. By this time the Viceroy had paſſed the mountaynes of Barberina within fifteene myles of Florence, from whence he ſent to ſignifie to the Florentins, that it was not thintention of the league neither to alter the iuriſdiction, nor chaunge the libertie, ſo farrefoorth as for the ſuretie of Italie, they would depoſe the Gonfalonnier from his eſtate: He deſired that the Medicis might be reſtored to their countrey, not as chieftaynes of the gouernment, but as perſons priuate, ſubiected to the lawes, and to the Magiſtrates, and not ſeperate in any thing from other Citizens: This propoſition being knowen throughout the Citie, the opinions of men were diuerſe according to the diuerſitie of iudgementes, paſſions, and feare: Some blamed the Councell, that would, for the regard of one onely, preferre to ſo great a daunger the generalitie of Citizens and the vniuerſall iuriſdiction: ſeeing that in depoſing him, they loſt neyther the councell popular, nor the publike libertie: A thing which it could not be hard to keepe, though the Medicis, depriued of reputation and power, woulde ſtriue to exceede their degree priuate and limited: That it was to be conſidered in what ſorte the Citie might reſiſte thauthoritie and forces of ſo great a league: that of themſelues they were not hable: that all Italie was become their enemie: that they had wholly loſte all hope of ſuccours with the Frenche men, both for that beeing driuen with cowardiſe out of Italie, they had enough to do to defende their owne Realme, and alſo knowing their weaknes, they had aunſwered to the demaundes of the Florentins, that they were contented to ſet them at libertie to make accord with the league. Of the cõtrary, others reaſoned how vayne it was to beleue that ſo great a ſtirre was made onely for hatred to the Gonfalonnier, or to ſet vp the Medicis in Florence as Citizens priuat: That farre otherwiſe was the intention of the confederates, who to ioyne the Citie to their willes, and to make it contributorie to their wantes of money, reſpected no other ende then to bring in the Medicis in tyrannie: onely they diſguiſed their corrupt intentions with demaundes not ſharpe nor ſeuere, and yet pretended the ſame effect: for it was no other thing to take out of the pallace the Gonfalonnier in a time ſo troubled, and with ſuche threatning and compulſion of armes, then to leaue a flocke wandring without a paſtor, the more eaſily to fall into the iawes of the wolfe:

It comprehended no other thing to bring the Medicis into Florence in so greate a tumult, then to strike vp the dromme and aduaunce the standarde that suche might followe it, as liued in no other studie then to deface the name, the memorie, and the forme of the great councell: an estate of gouernement whiche could not be deposed without the absolute ruine of the common libertie: And what is there to let the Medicis, backt from the forreine with the Spanishe armie, and followed at home with trowpes sedicious and ambicious, that they maye not oppresse the libertie euen assone as they make their entrie into Florence: They haue the time by election, the place is prepared, mens minds altered, the good men of the towne do feare, the euill sort exspect, if there be any place of the towne free from tumult, at least there is none voyde of suspicion, few to be trusted and none assured, all things in confusion; yea euen the wyseste furtheste of to auoyde the storme which euen nowe is gathered into a cloude and ready to breake: It were good to consider what the ouerture of suche thinges might engender, and what maye happen by yeelding to demaundes vniust and preiudiciall: That it is no good affection so muche to feare their daungers, as thereby to forget the safetie of their lyues, and to consider how intollerable it woulde be to lyue in seruitude, to suche as haue bene borne and bredde vp in libertie: That they were to remember with what vallour they had opposed agaynst the late king Charles the eight for the protection of their libertie, at such tyme as he was possessed of the Citie with a mightie armie: Lastely that they had to consider howe easily they might resiste so small an armie, vnfurnished of money, vnprouided of vittells, naked of great artilleries, & all other commodities to beare out the warre, if onely the Citie resisted their first furie: yea when they found a resolute defence in place of the vayne hopes that had bene giuen to cary Florence at the first assalt, they would be easily raunged to agreement vpon reasonable conditions. These discourses ranne in the market places and streetes amongst the Citizens: but the Gonfalonnier holding it best that the aunswere which the Magistrate was to make to the Viceroy, should be communicated with the people, called together the great councell, and in full presence of the Citizens, gaue his opinion in this maner:

Peter Soderin reasoneth in the Councell.

If I thought the demaunde of the Viceroy touched me onely, or that his desires were stayed simply vpon particularities, I would of my selfe make a resolution conformable to my intention, & do the thing without your counsel, which could not but
" turne to your common safety: for hauing alwayes caried this minde to giue my life
" for your benefite, it could not but be iust in me to resolue of my selfe, to renounce
" the office you haue giuen me, to deliuer you from the daungers and harmes of the " warre, hauing especially worne out both my body and mind with the trauells of the " place in so many yeres since you preferred me to it: But since it may be that this de-
" maund stretcheth to things further then to me and my priuate interest, it is thought " good by this honorable assistance & by me, not to deliberate without publike con" sent in a matter that so vniuersally concerneth you al, & lesse seeming that a cause so
" graue & generall, should be referred to the councell of that ordinary number of Ci" tizens which are ordinarily called to the priuitie of common thinges, but to you in " whose persons is resembled the soueraigne Maiestie and presence of this Citie, and " by whose wisedomes are to passe deliberations of so great importance. I induce " you, not to incline more to the one parte then to the other, I referre all to your
" counsell and iudgement: I bring hither no meaning to perswade you to parciali-
" tie, I sette not my selfe betweene your affections and the present cause: The same
" you shall resolue, the same shall be accepted by me, who do not onely laye at your

feete the office which is your owne, but also my person and life which is to my selfe alone: A sacrifice which I would thinke happily dedicated, if it had any operation tending to your safetie: Examine of what importance the Viceroys demaunde may be for your libertie, wherein I beseeche God so to leade your mindes as you maye make election of the better waye. If the Medicis were disposed to liue in this Citie as priuate Citisens with conformitie to your lawes and rulers, it could not be but vertuous and commendable to suffer them to returne, and receiue them, to thende the members of our common countrey might at last be reincorporate into one cõmon body: but if they bring with them other intentions, and vnder shadowes of conformitie, shrowde minds of tyrannie, it were good you considered of your danger, not holding it greeuous to susteine all expenses and difficulties to preserue your libertie, A Iewell whose preciousnes you shall then beste discerne, when you shall suffer priuation of it. Be not perswaded that the gouernment of the Medicis will be the same it was affore they were expulsed, seing the forme and fundations of things are chaunged: for then as they had their trayning vp amongest vs almoste as Citisens priuate, wealthie in goods according to the degree they helde, and not offended of any, made their fundation of the good will of the Citisens, vsed to consulte with the principalls of publike affayres, and labored with the cloke of ciuilitie to couer rather then to discouer their greatnes: So nowe that they haue bene so many yeres separate from the lawes of Florence, infected with the fashions & customes of straungers, and by that reason lesse practised in ciuill causes, mindefull of their exile and seuerities done to them, poore in goods, iniuried of so many families, & according to their own testimonie knowing that the most part of this presence abhorreth tyrannie: They will reapose confidence in no citisen, nor haue no conformitie to your lawes & magistrates, but compelled by pouertie & suspicion, will bring backe to themselues the administration of all things: They will not reestablishe good will and loue, but recontinue force & armes: they will reduce this citie in short time to the image and state of Bolognia, and to Sienna & Perousa in the time of the Bentiuoleis. I speake this to such as kepe obseruation of the time and gouernment of Lavvrence .Medicis, which yet in cõparison of this would seeme a golden age, notwithstanding the conditions of that time were hard, and the gouernment was a kinde of tyrannie, albeit more easie then many others. Now it apperteineth to you to resolue wisely, and to me, either to giue vp constantly this office, or else resolutely to apply my selfe to the preseruation of your libertie: You are to determine, and I to be directed, you stande in the handes of your owne councell, and I subiected to your arbitration.

There was no dout what the councell would resolue, the whole multitude of the people bearing almost an vniuersall inclination to mainteine the popular gouernment: Therfore it was determined by a wõderful accord, to cõsent to the returning of the Medicis in the nature of persons priuate: and that in no wise the Gonfalonnier should be deposed frõ his place, against which if thenemies were obstinate, then the whole body of the city should be applied to the defence of their liberty & countrey, not sparing either goods or life in an action so honorable & necessary: so that disposing all their thoughts to the warre, they made prouisions of money, & sent men to the town of Prato ten miles frõ Florence, A place which they thought would be subiect to the first violence of the Viceroy: who after he had gathered together his army at Barberina together with thartillerie with was drawen with a wõderfull paine both for the yll way of Appenin, and also for that for want of money they lacked laborers & instruments necessary for the cariage, he tooke the way to Prato as had bin supposed: he arriued there about the breaking of the daye, and euen then beganne with two Falconettes to batter the gate Mercatala by the space of an howre, albeit little to his profite for that it was mightily rampiered within. The Florentins had bestowed within Frato about two thousande footemen, the moste parte of their pensioners, and the residue leauyed in haste of all sciences and base trades: In that number there were very fewe experienced and trayned to the warre: They hadde also sente thither with an hundred men at armes Luke Sauello an auncient capteine, but yet neyther for his age, nor for his experience come to anye degree of marciall knowledge: And the men at armes were the same bodyes who a little before had bene spoyled and stripped in Lombardie: To this was added what by the shortnesse of the tyme, and thignoraunce of suche as had the charge to make prouisions, bothe greate wante of artilleries, and not halfe the munitions and other thinges necessarie to defende the place. The Viceroy had in hys armie two hundred men at armes, fiue thousande footemen Spaniardes, and two Cannons onely: An armie very small in numbers and other prouisions, but greate as touching their vallour, for that the footemen were all of those bodies, who in so great reputation were retyred from the battell of Rauenna, and who reapposing muche in their vertue, despised greatly thignorance of their aduersaries: But being brought to marche and no order taken for their vittayles, and lesse releese through the whole countrey, for that as yet harueſt was fullye finished, and all gleaned and carryed into places of strength, they beganne immediatly to fall into necessityes of foode, whiche made the Viceroy to incline to accorde, and the same followed with continuall solicitation, that the Florentins suffring the Medicis to returne equall with the other Citisens, there was no more speache of the deposing of the Gonfalonnier, onely the Citie shoulde paye to the Viceroy (to thende to withdrawe his armie from their dominions) a certayne summe of money, whiche was supposed not to exceede thirtie thousande duckets: In respect of this he had graunted safeconduit to thembassadors elected for that expedition, and had absteined vntill their comming, from any further action agaynst Prato, if they within had furnished him with vittells. There is nothing that fleeth faster awaye then occasion: "Nothing more daungerous then to iudge of thintention and profession of an o-"ther: Nor nothing more hurtefull then an immoderate suspition. All the cheefe Citisens desired agreement, beeing accustomed by thexamples of their elders, to defende their libertie agaynst armes, with golde: And therefore they made requeſt that thembassadors elect shoulde departe incontinently, beeing charged amongest other things to see them of Prato furnishe the Spanish armie with vittells, to thend the Viceroy should expect with pacience if the composition that was now in action woulde bring foorth anye effect. But the Gonfalonnier perswading himselfe agaynst his naturall tymerousnes, that thenemies dispayring to be hable to do any more would depart of themselues, or fearing that the Medicis by one meanes or other would returne to Florence, or whether his destinie pushed him on to bee the cause of his owne ruine and the calamities of his countrey, he helde artificially in delay the dispatche of thembassadors, not suffring them to departe the daye that was appoynted according to the resolution which had bene made: In so much as the Viceroy both pressed with the want of vittells, and vncertayne whether thembassadors would come, dislodged by night from the gate Mercatale, and incamping before the gate called Seraglio from the which the way goeth to the mountayne, he began to batter the next wall with two Cannons, choosing that place for the commoditie

moditie of a high heape of earth ioyning to the wall, by the which he might easily go to the breache of the wall from aboue that was battred: whiche facilitie for the campe beeing turned into a difficultie for the towne, for that the breache that was made aboue the heape of earth, remayned within very high and thicke of earth, one of the Cannons was broken at the firste execution, and the other with the whiche the battrie was continued, had so loste his force with often shooting, that his boollets came slowely to the wall, and yet did no great harme: Lastely after they had executed many howres and made an opening in the wall of more then twelue fadomes, certayne of the Spanishe footemen got vp to the terrasse or heape of earth, and began to assayle the breache: from thence they got to the toppe of the wall where they slewe two of the footemen that garded it, whose death giuing feare to the residue and driuing them to retyre, the Spaniards forbare not to take thoportunitie of their tymerousnesse, and clymbe vp by the helpe of skaling ladders: And albeit there was within neare the wall a squadron of shotte and pykes, bestowed there both to suffer none of thennemies to staye vppon the wall, and also to make slaughter of the firste man that rashely should leape within or otherwise go downe, yet (suche is the feare of men vnexperienced in daungers) assone as they sawe thennemies vpon the wall, they brake their rancke, and of themselues abandoned the defense of the place: This cowardise depending somewhat vppon wante of experience in the seruice and perilles of warre, gaue courage to the Spaniardes to make their entrie in sundrie places without anye impediment: And crying Victorie, they followed their fortune with vallour, and beganne to runne thorow the towne, where was seene no other thing then flying, violence, spoyling, blood, murders, and crying, the footemen of the Florentins making no resistance, but casting away their weapons, they offred their bodies to the rigour of their enemies: from whose couetousnesse, luste, and crueltie, nothing had escaped if the Cardinall Medicis by bestowing gardes in the great Churche had not saued the honor of women whiche in their calamitie were fledde thither for safetie. There were more then two thousande men that dyed, not in fighting, for almost not one would ioyne him selfe to the fray, but in fleing, in hyding, and in crying mercy to thenemies, who disdayned to shewe compassion vpon men of so small merite: The residue were reserued prisoners together with the Florentine commissioners, none escaping the calamitie that so wretched a fortune did bring. By the losse of Prato they of Pistoye, not falling otherwise from the iurisdiction of the Florentins, agreed to releeue the Viceroy with vittayles, receyuing his promise not to be distressed by his armie. But at Florence, assone as the succesſe of Prato was knowen, and thembassadors that went to the Viceroy beeing on the halfe waye, were returned by the bruite of thaccident, there were discerned manifest alterations in the minds of euery one: some lamenting the losse that was happned, some fearing greater harmes, some suspecting by nature more then they ought to do by reason, some distrusting shadows whose bodies were farre of, all things in confusion, and euen those men the least assured, in whom was moste reason of confidence and resolution. The Gonfalonnier repenting now the vanitie of his counsell, was no lesse amased then the residue, and hauing almoste altogether loste both reputation and authoritie, he stoode so irresolute & vngouerned, that he gaue him selfe vp to the wills of others, without making prouision either for his own safety, or the cõmon tranquilitie: others, who desired thalteration of the gouernment, tooke audacitie by the state of their fortune, & blamed publikly the things present: but the multitude of citisens not accustomed to tumults & armes, & hauing alwayes affore their eyes the miſerable example of Prato, notwithſtanding they affected much the gouernment popular, yet what through feare & cowardiſe, ſtoode as a miſerable pray to whoſoeuer would oppreſſe them. In this tumult and ſeperation of mindes Paule Vettori and Antho. Fran. Albizi, two yong gentlemen of the nobilitie, no leſſe ſedicious and deſirous of new things, then by theſe occaſions full of audacitie & boldnes, hauing many monthes affore conſpired ſecretly with others in fauor of the Medicis, and for the better forme & maner of their reſtoring, had ſecretly ſpoken with Iulian de Medicis in a village of the Florentin territory neare to Siena, determined to make experience to draw the Gonfalonnier out of the publike pallace by force: And drawing into this councell one Barth. Valori a young man of like qualitie, but entangled by his vnreaſonable prodigalities with ſundry debtes, as was alſo Paule, they went the ſeconde morning after the loſſe of Prato, beeing the laſte day of Auguſt, with a ſmal cõpany to the pallace, where finding no great gard or reſiſtance, for that the Gonfalonnier left all things to aduenture, they entred his chamber, and threatned him to take his life frõ him if he would not depart the pallace, but in caſe he would go out, they gaue him their faith to defend him from harme: his feare and the preſent extremitie made him obedient to the rage of the young men: Then the whole city was drawen into tumult, & many were diſcloſed againſt him, but not one appeared in his fauour: He by and by, by direction and commaundement of others, cauſed to aſſemble the Magiſtrates, whom, hauing by the lawes a full authority ouer the Gonfalonniers, they required to depriue him lawfully of his office, or otherwiſe they would kill him: In which feare they depoſed him contrary to their will, and led him in ſafetie into the houſe of Paule, from whence in the night beeing well accompanied, he was conueyed vpon the dominions of Sienna, and from thence making ſhowe to go to Rome with ſafeconduit obteined of the Pope, he tooke ſecretly the way of Ancona, and paſſed by ſea to Raugia, for that he was aduertiſed by the meane of his brother the Cardinall, that the Pope would breake his promiſe with him, and ſpoyle him of the money which he had, ſuppoſed to be in great quantitie: Aſſone as the Gonfalonnier was depoſed from his place, the citie diſpatched preſent Embaſſadors to the Viceroy, with whom they compounded eaſily by meane of the Cardinall de Medicis: for the Cardinall was contented as touching his particular, that there ſhould be no further commoning but for the reſtoring of him and his, and all ſuche as had followed him, as Citiſens priuate, with power to redeeme within a certayne time the goodes that had bene alyened by the fiske: That there ſhoulde be repayment of the moneys that had bene disburſed, and amendes made by ſuch to whom they had bene transferred: That touching the common affayres, the Florentins entred the league: They were bounde to paye to the kinge of Romains fourtie thouſande duckettes, according to the promiſe whiche the Medicis had made at Mantua to the Biſhoppe of Gurce, in recompence of their reſtoring: To the Viceroy twentie thouſande, and to tharmie foureſcore thouſande, the one halfe preſently, and the reſidue within two monethes: but vppon this condition that the firſt payment beeing receyued, the armie ſhoulde foorthwith departe the landes of the Florentins, leauing at libertie all that they had poſſeſſed: Beſides this, they contracted a league with the king of Aragon, with bondes reciprocall for certayne numbers of men at armes for the defence of their eſtates, and that the Florentins ſhoulde interteine in their paye two hundred men at armes of the ſubiectes of that king: wherein albeit it was not expreſſed vnder whom they ſhoulde be ledde, yet the charge was ment to the Marquis of Paluda, to whom the Cardinall had promiſed, miſed, or at leaſt giuen him hope, to make him capteine generall of the Florentin men of warre. Thus the buſineſſe of the depoſing of the Gonfalonnier beeing paſte ouer, and the daungers of the warre remoued by the compoſition, the Citiſens beganne to fall to correct the gouernment in poyntes wherein the former forme was thought vnprofitable, but with an vniuerſall intention, excepte of a verye fewe which were young and almoſte not falling in conſideration, to preſerue the libertie, and ſupport the councell popular: Therfore they determined with newe lawes that the election of the Gonfalonnier ſhould not be eſtabliſhed perpetuall, but for one yere onely: That to the councell of the foureſcore, which chaunged from ſix monethes to ſix monethes, & by whoſe authoritie cauſes of greateſt gravitie were determined, to thend there might be a continuall communitie of the Citiſens of greateſt qualitie, ſhoulde bee alwayes added all thoſe that had adminiſtred eyther at home or abroade, the chiefe offices and places: At home, ſuche as had bene eyther Gonfalonniers of iuſtice, or of the tenne of the Balia, an office in that common weale of greate authoritie: Abroade, ſuche as beeing choſen by the councell of the foureſcore, had ſerued eyther as Embaſſadors to forreine Princes, or elſe as generall ſuperintendentes ouer the warre: All the other orders and ordinances of the gouernment remayned firme and ſtable without innouation.

After theſe things were reſolued, they elected Gonfalonnier for the firſt yere, Iohn Babtiſta Rodolffe, a Citiſen of noble diſcending, and no leſſe eſteemed for his diſcreſſion and gouernment: And as it happneth in all times troubled, ſo in this election the people not beholding ſo muche ſuche as by popular practiſes were moſte agreable to them, as one, who what with the great authoritie he had in the Citie, ſpecially with the nobilitie, and with his proper vertue whiche was peculiar to him, might reduce and make firme and ſtable the ſhaking eſtate of the common weale: But by the preſent tumult things were to much diſordred, the common libertie had to many mightie enemies, in the bowels of the contrey was an armie ſuſpected, and within the Citie an vnbridled boldneſſe of young men deſirous to oppreſſe it, and to their wills was conformable the will of the Cardinall Medicis, notwithſtanding in words he made demonſtration of the contrarie: for, as in the beginning he eſteemed not the reſtoring of him and his as Citiſens priuate, A recompence worthy of ſo many trauells and paynes, ſo alſo he conſidered for the preſent that that ſtate coulde not endure, for that together with his name, they ſhoulde bee greately hated of all ſortes, the Citiſens lyuing in continuall ſuſpicion that they woulde dreſſe ſome ambuſhe agaynſt their libertie: They woulde alwayes remayne diſcontented, for that they had broughte the Spaniſhe armie agaynſt their countrey, and were the cauſes of the wretched ſpoyle and ſacke of Prato: And laſtely that by compulſion of armes the Citie had bene conſtrayned to receyue conditions ſo vnworthy and vniuſte. To this he was vrged by ſuche as affore had conſpired with hym, and others who in a common weale well ordered, helde no honorable place: But the conſente of the Viceroy was neceſſarie, who exſpecting the firſte payment, whiche for the diuiſions in the Citie coulde not ſo ſoone be made, kepte as yet within Prato, and had no fancie (what ſoeuer was the cauſe) that any newe chaunge ſhoulde bee made in the Citie of Florence, notwithſtanding the Cardinall ioyning to hym the Marquis of Paluda and Andrevv Caraffe capteines in the armie, tolde him that the name of the Spaniards coulde not be but very odious to a Citie agaynſt whiche they had done ſo many harmes: That in all occaſions they woulde ſticke alwayes to thennemies of the king Catholike, and that there was daunger, leaſt when the armie ſhould departe, they woulde reuoke the Gonfalonnier whom they had expulſed by conſtraint. By theſe perſwaſions he conſented to the Cardinall, who aſſone as he had made agreement & reſolution of affayres with him, came with diligence to Florence into his houſes, where many capteines and ſouldiors of thItalians entred, ſome with him, and ſome ſeperate, the Magiſtrates being affrayed to let their entry for feare of the Spaniards that were at hande: The next morning the councell of the multitude of Citizens beeing aſſembled at the publike pallace to conſult vpon thaffaires preſent, Iulian de Medicis being preſent and aſſiſting the action, the ſouldiours charged the gate of the pallace, and climbing vp by ladders, they made themſelues maiſters of the pallace, and made pillage of the ſiluer veſſell which laye there of ſtore for the vſe and ſeruice of the Citie: There the Citie together with the Gonfalonnier compelled to giue place to thinſolencies of ſuche as coulde do more with armes and weapons then the Magiſtrate with reuerence and authoritie, called together with the ringing of the great bell (by the direction of Iulian de Medicis) the people, to parliament vpon the pallace grene: where, ſuche as went thither being enuironed with armed ſouldiours, and the yong men of the Citie that had taken armes for the Citie, they conſented that to fiftie Citizens of the Cardinals naming, ſhoulde be giuen the ſame authoritie ouer publike buſineſſe which all the people had: A forme or ſtate of power which the Florentins call Ampla balia: By the decree of theſe men, the gouernment being reduced to that forme which it caryed before the yere a thouſand foure hundred nintie and foure, & a garriſon eſtabliſhed within the pallace, the Medicis reſumed vpon them the ſelfe ſame ſtate of greatnes which their father had, but their gouernment was more imperious and with a power more abſolute.

In this ſorte, and with armes, was oppreſſed the libertie of the Florentins, beeing brought to that degree of aduerſitie principally by the diſagreementes of the Citizens. It was thought it had not falne ſo farre, if they had not behaued them ſelues with great negligence in the defence of the common buſineſſe, ſpecially in the laſte times, not ſpeaking of the newtrality which they vſed very vndiſcretly: & the cowardiſe of the Gonfalonnier giuing too muche head to thennemies of the popular gouernment. The king of Aragon had not from the beginning ſo great a deſire to reuerſe the libertie, as to turne away that Citie from thalliance of the Frenche king, and to drawe ſome ſommes of money to paye his armie: In ſo muche that aſſone as the Frenche had abandoned the Duchie of Millan, he ſent to tell the Viceroy, that whether the affaires occurrant ſhoulde drawe him to an other enterpriſe, or for any other occaſion, he ſhould knowe that the reſtitution of the Medicis woulde be of harde action, that he ſhould take libertie to determine according to the condition of times, and agree or not agree with the Citie, according to the meane that brought the beſt oportunitie to his affayres. This was his commaundement in the beginning: but being afterwardes diſcontented with the Pope for the violence he would haue done at Rome to Alfonſo d'Eſte, and entring withall into ſuſpicion for the threates he gaue publikely agaynſt ſtraungers, he gaue playnely to vnderſtande to the ſame Embaſſador of Florence that came to him in the beginning of the warre, enioyning no leſſe to the Viceroy, that there ſhoulde be no ſtryuing to alter the gouernment. In whiche deuiſe theſe two reaſons were indifferent to him: he iudged that eyther it would be a thing of more ſuretie to him to preſerue the Gonfalonnier, who was enemie to the Pope, or elſe he feared that the Cardinall of Medicis being reſtored, would not more depende of the Pope then of him: But his laſt deliberation

came not to the knowledge of the Viceroy, vntill the daye after the common weale was reduced to the power of the Cardinall.

By this discourse it may be discerned that if the Florentyns, after the french were chassed, had looked to assure their affaytes by some agreement, or at least had made them selues strong with men and soldiours trayned, eyther the Viceroy had not marched against them, or at least finding resistance, he would easily haue bene brought to composicion for money: But their destinie was against their sauetie, beeing besides the coniectures and comprehension of mans wisedom, warned of the perills that were towards them, by certein signes in the ayre: for, not long affore, the lightning that fell vpon the gate that leades from Florence to Prato, caried away from an auncient shield of Marble, a golden flower de Lys, which is the enseigne or armes of the french kings: An other tyme a flashe of lightning discending from the toppe of the pallaice into the chamber of the Gonfalonnier, touched no other thinge then a great vessell of siluer wherein the lotts are wont to be put when they come to bee made equall for the creacion of the great Magistrat: And afterwards falling downe it stroke so violently a great stone which laye at the foote of the stayres and bare vp the burden of the building, that beeing remoued from his place without any other hurt, it seemed that the handes of men had taken him out with a wonderfull knowledge in Archytecture.

About these tymes, or a litle before, the Genovvais beating vpon the castell of Genes with thartilleries which the Pope had lent them, the castell keeper beeing corrupted with a bribe of ten thowsand duckatts, deliuered it vppe to the townes men: This treason of the keeper moued partely by feare, for that an armie by sea which was sent out of Prouence for the defence of the towne, hauing not courage to take land, were retyred, by whose cowardisse he had no hope to bee succoured: But the lanterne held out for the king, wherein the same day certeine french vessels had conueyed vittells and other necessary prouisions. The castell of Genes taken by the Genowaies.

Assoone as the matters of Florence were dispatched and the money receiued, The Viceroy remoued his armie to march to Bressia: About which citie the Venetians, hauing now appaised the wills of the Svvyzzers, were encamped and laye affore the gate of S. Iohn, battering at one tyme both the towne and the castell with artilleries planted vpon the mountaine opposit: They had a certeine light hope to be let in at the pile gate by meane of an intelligence which neuertheless proued vaine for that it was discloses: But when the Spanish armie ariued at the borow of Gairo which is neare to Bressia, Monsr d'Aubigny gouernor of the french that were within, had a mind to giue vp the towne together with the castell to the Viceroy with composicion that all the soldiours that were within should yssue out their goods and liues saued, but their enseignes folded and the pointes of their weapons downeward, and leauing behind them their artillerie: wherein it seemed Monsr d'Aubigny respected more the Viceroy then the Venetians by a commaundement which he had receiued affore from his king, to deliuer it to the Spanyards or to Cæsar, not that he hated more the Venetians, but rather to enterteine matter of contencion with Cæsar and with the king of Aragon: The french men that kept Leguague followed the same councell affore the Spanyards passed into Lombardie: for, litle esteeming of the many offers of the Venetians, they surrendred it vp to the Bishop of Gurcy, as also did Pesquiero at the same tyme that the Viceroy entred Bressia, the possession whereof the same Bishoppe desired to haue, but it pleased the Viceroy to reteyne it for the league, in whose name he had receiued it: it hapned otherwayes to the towne of Crema, about the which Bressia rendred by the french to the Viceroy.

lay incamped Ranze de Cere with a part of the Venetian ſoldiours: for, by that tyme the army of the foure thouſand Svvyzzers which Octauian Sforce Biſhop of Lode & gouernor of Myllan ſent to conquer it in the name of the exſpected Duke Maxymylian Sforce, were come neare the walls, Benedict Cribario what by corrupcion of money, and an ambicious deſire to be created a gentleman of Venice, gaue it vp to the Venetians: in which action was concurrant the conſent of Monſr Duraz that kept the caſtel, who reapoſed no confidence for his fauetie in the faith of the Svvyzzers.

Crema rendred to the Venetians.

The Biſhop of Gurcy at Rome.

Immediatly vpon theſe expedicions the Biſhop of Gurcy went to Rome, whome the Pope deſiring earneſtly to reconcile to him, gaue order to receiue him through all the dominions of the Church with all ſortes of honors: And not ſparing to enforce his nature to aduaunce his deſire, he defrayed his exſpenſes by the wayes, together with all ſuch as followed him, to whom were made many great feaſtes and liberalities: euery towne which he entred honored him with ſhowes and offices not accuſtomed, both for their varietie which was ſtraunge, and for their ſtate and maieſtie moſt rich and ſumptuous: The wayes which he paſſed were full of perſonages appoynted to meete him, and in many ſeuerall places he was viſited by ſundry new Embaſſadors of Prelats & perſonages of honor of the Popes ſending: yea he would that the Colleage of Cardinalls ſhould haue gonne to the gates of Rome to receiue him, but the whole Colleage refuſing, as a matter for the newnes, hurtfull in example, and for thindignitie, moſt preiudiciall to their reputacion, They appoynted only the Cardinalls Agiuenſe and Strigonia to goe out of the gates halfe a mile into the medowes, to receiue him in the name of the Pope, who with great reſpect and ceremonie led him to the Churche of S. Maria de Popolo, he beeing in the middeſt betweene them as Liefetenant to Cæſar: There the two Cardinalls left him, and from thence being honorably accompanied beſides the generall multitudes that followed, he went to the Pope, who ſitting in ſolemne habit vnder his eſtate pontificall exſpected his comming in the publike Conſiſtorie, where not many dayes before he had in great honor receiued the twelue Embaſſadors of the Svvyzzers whome all the Cantons had ſent to him, both to giue him publike obedience, and to make offer of their nation to be perpetuall defendors of the ſtate of the Church, and withall to thanke him, that with ſo great honor he had giuen them the ſworde, the hat, the helmet and the banner, together with the title to be the defendors of th Eccleſiaſtike libertie: When the Cardinall was ariued and had performed his preſence to the Pope, they began to debate of the eſtabliſhment of the common affayres, whereof the foundacion reſted in this, to remoue all quarrells and contencions particular, to thende that the regions of Italy reunited and confirmed, might with one ioynt reſolucion and councell, be able to make a full reſiſtance to the french king: The hardeſt matter in this action was the compoſicion ſo many tymes practiſed betweene Cæſar and the Venetians: for, the Biſhop of Gurcy could haue bene contented that Padoa, Treuiſa, Breſsia, Bergama, and Crema ſhould remeyne to the Venetians, ſo farre forth as they would render to Cæſar Vincenſa, renownce their claimes and rightes they pretended to the townes that Cæſar held, and pay to him preſently two hundred thowſand florins of Rhein, and thirty thowſand yearely for euer in forme of tribute: It troubled the Venetians to acknowledge them ſelues tributaries for thoſe townes which they had poſſeſſed for many yeares as proper owners: And no leſſe were they greeued to giue money, notwithſtanding the Pope offered to lend them part of the ſumme: But the thing that troubled them moſt, was the reſtoring of Vincenſa, In which action they alleaged they ſhould ſeperat the body of their eſtate, and ſtande

depriued of the commoditie to passe from the head and principall partes, to the other members, by which priuacion the possession of Bressia, Bergama, & Crema would stand ill assured: Besides, to refuse the restitucion vnder more honest coollers, they sayd, they had giuen their faith to the Vincentyns the last tyme they put them selues into their handes, neuer to seperat them from them: Other condicions were debated betweene the Pope and the king of Aragons Embassadors, proponed more for reuenge and recompense of the complaints of others, then that there was hope to obteyne them: for, the Pope demaunded that that king according to the contents of the confederacion, should ayde him to conquer Ferrara: he required him to leaue of the protection of Fabricio and Mar. Anth. Colonno, against whom he had begon to proceede with spirituall armes, for that they had forced the gate of Latran, and receiued the Duke of Ferrara (rebelled against him) into those townes whose iurisdiction apperteined directly to the Church: he required him to renownce the protections he had made in Tuskane of the Florentyns, of the Sienoys, of the Lucquois, and of Plombyn, matters done to the diminucion of the rightes of thEmpire, and generally suspected of all Italy, but particularly of the Church: for that as it was not profitable to the other Potentats that he should haue so many alyances in Italy, so it was most daungerous for the church, that a prouince belõging to the dominion of the same, should depend vpon his authoritie: To these the spanish Embassadors replied, that they refused not to ayde him against Ferrara, so farreforth as according to the bonds of the same confederacion, he made payment of the money due to tharmie both for that was past, and to make new prouision for hereafter: That it was an action neyther of praise nor merit to procede against Fabricio & Mar. Anth. Colonno, by whom, if they were pursued, what by reason of their great friends and dependances, and for that they were Capteines of authoritie, would bee renewed matter of a new warre: That the king Catholike could not leaue them abandoned, without speciall preiudice to his proper honor, neither did their seueral seruices in the ioynt warres of the Pope and him against the french king, deserue that propertie of recompense: Touching the complaint he made of the protections of Tuskane, they thought it proceeded not of any good or iust zeale, but to thend that Syenna, Lucqua, & Plombyn, should remeyne a pray to his couetousnes, condiscending notwithstanding to referre them selues in those actions, to the arbytrement of Cæsar: All the confederats agreed with full consent that Maxymylian Sforce should enter vppon the Duchie of Myllan, but Cæsar consented not to inuest him, nor to indue him with the name of Duke or any title iudiciall: But eftsoones did renewe the complaintes of the Bishop of Gurcy and the Spanyards touching thoccupacion of Parma and Plaisance: they brought great preiudice of the rightes of thEmpire, too much encrease of greatnes to the Popes, and an apparant weakening to the Duchie of Myllan, which had neede to be made more stronge and able, for that it lay alwayes open and subiect to the first inuasions of the french: That in the capitulacions of the league, the Pope had made mention of no other thinges then of Bolognia and Ferrara: That nowe he vsurped that which of long tyme since, had not bene possessed by the Church of Rome, yea there was no certeine knowledge that euer she could claime interest, not in the tymes most auncient: That this vsurpacion was vnder shadow of rightes and interests, whereof appeared no authentike memorie, he seeming to make the donations of Emperours none other thing then a simple writing which might be forged or feyned according to fancie: And yet the Pope, taking the occasion of the tumultes of Lombardye, did reason to him selfe, as in a matter manifest and notorious: These disputacions could not be resolued easily: But the matter that troubled most the yssue of thinges, was the controuersie betweene Cæsar and the Venetians, by reason whereof the Pope did what he could, sometimes prouoking them, sometimes praying them, & sometimes threatning them, and all for a desire he still nourished to preserue the Venetians, both for the common benefit of Italy, and also for that he hoped, vnder the oportunitie of their succours, to be able to cary Ferrara without the forces of the Spanyards: In this action the Aragon Embassadors labored with great importunitie fearing, least to a common daunger, there were not cause added to the Venetians to turne their disposicions to the french and be eftsoones reunited to that nation: But they were driuen to proceede aduisedly and with temperance, both not to prouoke Cæsar to make aliance with the frenche men, from whome their kinge had seperat him with so great paine, and also for other reasons necessarily mouing him not to breake amitie with him: Lastly the Svvyzzer Embassadors omitted no trauell in this action, for that being bownd to defend the Venetians, who also in that regarde were bownd to paye them euery yeare xxv. thowsande duckatts, they wished not to be brought to this necessitie, eyther not to obserue their promise, or to be driuen to make head against Cæsar if he offered to vexe them: At last, neyther the Bishop of Gurcy, beeing not to be drawne from the demaund he made that the Venetians should render Vincensa to Cæsar, nor the Venetians disposed to giue it vppe, who stoode also yet disagreed touching the quantitie of money: The Pope, who aboue all thinges desired, the rather to reuerse the name and authoritie of the councell of Pysa, that Cæsar might approue the councell of Latran, protested to their Embassadors, that he shoulde bee constrayned to persecute that common weale with armes spirituall and temporall: which protestacion because it moued them not, he onely was brought to confederat with Cæsar, the spanish Embassador refusing to deale in the action, eyther for that he had no commission from his king, or els for that that king sought still to nourish the Venetians with some hope, notwithstanding he was resolued in minde to ayde Cæsar: It was expressed vppon the proëme of the confederacion which a litle after was solemnly published in the Church of S. Maria de Popolo: That for that the Venetians had obstinatly refused the peace, and the Pope by the necessitie of the Christian common weale, had protested to abandon them: Cæsar did nowe enter and accept the league made in the yeare a thowsand fiue hundred and eleuen, betweene the Pope, the king of Aragon, and the Venetians, according as the libertie and respit was reserued for him: That he promised to cleaue to the councell of Latran, disavowing and reuoking all commissions, procuracions, and actes done in the fauor of the councell of Pysa: he bownd him selfe not to ayde any one of the subiects or ennemies of the Church, but chiefly Alfonso d'Este and the Bentyuoleis occupyers of Ferrara and Bolognia: And lastly he promised to call home all the bandes of Almain footemen that were in the payes of Alfonso, together with Federyk de Bossolo that held on him: On the other side the Pope promised to ayde Cæsar against the Venetians with armes both spirituall and temporall, vntill he had recouered all that was conteyned in the league of Cambray: it was declared that the Venetians were altogether excluded out of the league and truce made with Cæsar, for that in many sortes they had impugned both the one and the other: That they were ennemies to the Pope, to Cæsar and to the king Catholike, to whom they reserued place and tyme to enter the confederacion, and vnder certeine condicions: That the Pope could make no couenant with them without the consent of Cæsar, or till Cæsar had recouered that which apperteined to him, as was sayd affore: That neyther the Pope nor Cæsar sar, without reciprocall priuitie and consent, could contract or couenant with any Prince Christian: That during the warre against the Venetians, the Pope should doe no displeasure to Fabricio and Mark.Anth.Colonno, beeing notwithstanding left at libertie to proceede against Pompey and Iulio and others that had bene declared rebells: That notwithstanding he was suffered to possesse Parma, Reggia and Plaisance, yet by this capitulacion it was not ment to preiudice the rights of thempire: When this confederacion was published, the Bishoppe of Gurcy in the next session of the councell of Latran, approued the councell in the name of Cæsar, and as his Liefetenant generall in Italy: And cancelling all former commissions, actes, and procurations, he testified in the presence of the whole councell, that Cæsar neuer consented to the conuocacion of Pysa, disauowing all such as had vsed his name: Assoone as he had thus ratified the councell of Latran, he departed from Rome to be present when Maxymylian Sforce (being now come by commission of Cæsar to Verona,) should take possession of the Duchie of Myllan: the Cardinall of Syon disposed him selfe very hardly to expect and attend his comming, and also the Embassadors of the whole nation of Svvyzzers that were at Myllan, for that they would that in the demonstracions and solemnitie of thactions that was to be vsed, it might appeare that the Svvyzzers were the men that had chassed the french men out of that state, and by their vallour and courage Maxymylian receiued it: They would that the veritie and effect of that conquest might be transferred to them by such publike ceremonies as were to be vsed in the enstalling of him, whom their vertue onely made Lord of the Duchie: But such was the working of the Viceroy, that, more by practise then by his authoritie he obteyned so much that they taried for the comming of the Bishop of Gurcy: who, after he had ratified at Florence in the name of Cæsar, the confederacion made in Prato, and receiued certeine summes of money of the Lucquoys whome he tooke into protection, came at last to Cremona, where Max. Sforce and the Viceroy attended him: from thence they went al together to Myllan to make their entrie at the day appoynted, into that citie with solemnities and honors accustomed to newe Princes: In which action albeit it was long disputed betweene the Cardinall of Syon and the Viceroy which of them should giue him the keyes at the entry of the gate in signe of possession, yet, in the ende the Viceroy giuing place, the Cardinall put into his handes the keyes of the towne in the vniuersall name of the Svvyzzers, And that day, being one of the last dayes of December, he did all thinges both in showe and act, that were necessary to make knowen that Maxymylian Sforce receiued the possession of them: he was receiued with an incredible gladnes of all the people, both for the desire they had to haue a Prince proper and perticular, and also they hoped he would resemble his grandfather or his father, of whome the memorie of one remeyned very fresh in the mindes of the people of that state, and touching the other, the despites they had receiued by the gouernment of straungers, had turned their hatred, into good will: The working of tyme, with thexperience of the yoke of straungers had made in that people a wonderfull conuersion, and nature in those actions works not a litle, bringing that people to reioyce at the returne of him, whose father they abhorred with a iust and vniuersall hatred: But these gratulacions and ioyes were yet vnperfect vntill the castell of Nouarro were recouered: A matter not long deferred, for that they within, yeelded it vp, their fortune being farre inferior to their faith.

Maxymylian Sforce restored to Myllan

The confederacion made at Rome, had not altogether broken the hopes of agreement betweene Cæsar and the Venetians, for that the Pope had vppon the suddeine sent to Venice Iacques Staffilio his Nuncio, with whom went accompanied three Embassadors of the Svvyzzers to perswade them to accord: And on the other side, the Senat, the better to enterteine the goodwil of the Pope, and not to giue cause to Cæsar to inuade them with armes, had sent to their Embassadors a newe direction to cleaue to the councell of Latran: They had commaunded also the men of warre, assoone as the confederacion was made, to retyre vpon the territories of Padoa: And for that cause the Viceroy not willing to trouble the hopes of the peace, had turned his armie towards Myllan: But all these thinges serued to no purpose, for that the same difficulties did yet continue touching the restitucion of Vincensa and the payments of money which Cæsar demaunded: That was the cause that the Pope assayled not the Duke of Ferrara, whom (agreement going betweene Cæsar and the Venetians) he supposed he should be able to vanquish with the aydes of the Venetians, together with the brute that the Spanyards were to come on if neede should be: otherwayes he had resolued to deferre that expedicion till the springe tyme, for that he accounted it a matter of hard action to take in a season of winter, the towne of Ferrara, the situacion being strong in respect of the riuer, and greatly fortefied besides, by the continuall industrie of Alfonso.

It may happly seeme to some, if I intangle my historie with thaccidents of Fraunce in that yeare, that I wander or chaunge my course, which is not to speake of matters hapning out of the bondes of Italy: But becausse the affayres of that nation haue some affinitie and relacion with the busines of these partes, And that to the succesſe of the one, the councells and yssues of the other were oftentymes conioyned, I am constrayned not to passe them altogether vnder forgetfulnes and silence.

Th English men at Fontarabye against the french king.

About the beginning of Maye, an armie of six thowsand English footemen, sailed in vessells of England and Spayne, to Fontarabye, A frontyer towne belonging to the crowne of Spayne vpon the coast of Fraunce, and standing vpon the Occean sea: The seruice and purpose of this armie, according to the couenants made betweene the father in law and sonne in law, was, together with the forces of Spaine, to set vpon the Duchie of Guyen, which is a part of the prouince of Aquitaine according to the auncient names and diuisions of the same: Against this warre, the french king not yet assured on the coast of Picardy, prepared a new pencionary band of eight hundred launces which he had erected, & waged many bands of footemen of the lower parts of Germany not subiected to th Emprour: And knowing of what importance for the defence of the Duchie of Guyen, was the Realme of Nauarre which was both appropriat and dowrie to Katherin de Foix, and possessed ioyntly with Iohn the sonne of Albert who was her husband: he called to the Court the father of the sayd Iohn, and carefully considered how he might make him his friende and consociat: Wherein serued to good purpose, the death of Gaston de Foix, by the instigacion of whome pretending the same kingdom not to fall vpon the femall, and by consequent to apperteine to him as to the next heire male of the house of Foix, the french king had pursued the sayd Iohn. On the other side the king Catholike, who had sette his eyes vppon that Realme, required the king of Nauarre to stande Newter betweene the french king and him: And to suffer to passe thorow his Realme, his souldiours that were to enter Fraunce: And for the assurance of these things, he would put into his handes certeine places of strength vnder promise to render them assoone as the warre should ende: It hath bene a perpetuall desire in the auncient kings of Spaine to impatronise them selues vpon the Realme of Nauarre, In which respect the king of Nauarre, being also not ignorant whither those demaundes tended, chused rather

to offer him selfe to a perill that was vncerteine, then to accept a losse certeine, hoping he should not faile of the succors promised by the french king, for whose affayres it came well to passe that the warre begon in the Realme of Nauarre: And at the same tyme, eyther to giue more leasure to such as were appoynted to come to his succours, or to deliuer him selfe if he could from those demaundes, he treated with the king of Aragon, who according to his custom proceeded in those conferences with great cunning: But the industrie and warines of the king of Aragon hurt not more the king of Nauarre, then the negligence of the french king, who taking courage by the slownes of thEnglish armie that for many dayes since they were arriued at Fontarabye, had done nothing, And trusting withall, that the king of Nauarre was able with his owne forces to defende him selfe for a tyme, deferred very long to send him succours: By the commoditie of which delayes, the king of Aragon, who had cunningly nourished and enterteyned the hopes of the king of Nauarre, conuerted thether with great expedicion the bandes which he had prepared to ioyne with thEnglish: So that the king of Nauarre both vnprepared of him selfe, and by his priuacion of hope, dispayring to be able to make resistance, gaue place to his fortune and fled into Bearu beyond the Pyreney hils: By which accident, the Realme of Nauarre was left abandoned, except certeine stronge places which yet held out for the king who in his feare was fled, And so without any exspenses or difficultie, and more for feare and reputacion of thEnglish that were at hand, then by his owne forces that were farre of, the king of Aragon made him selfe Lorde of that kingdom: And becawse he could not affirme that he possessed it lawefully with any other title, he alleaged that he was rightfully and iudicially impatronised of it by thauthoritie of the sea Apostolike: for, the Pope not satisfied for the happy succesſe of Italy, had a litle before published a Bull against the french king, wherein, naming him no more Christianissimo but illustrissimo, he subiected aswell his person as whosoeuer were his adherents, to all the paynes of heretykes and schismatykes, giuing sufferance to euery one to occupy their substances, estates, and all that apperteyned vnto them: And in the same seueritie and rigour, ioyned to an indignacion that the Cardinalls and other Prelats who were fled to Myllan, had bene receiued into the towne of Lyon, he commaunded vnder greeuous penalties and taxacions, that the fayre or mart accustomed to be kept at Lyon foure tymes euery yeare, the traffike of Marchantes beeing no lesse plentifull, then the resort of straungers infinit, shoulde bee hereafter transferred to the citie of Geneua, from whence king Lovvys the eleuenth had taken it for the benefitte of his kingdome: And lastly he had brought the whole Realme of Fraunce vnder thinterdiction Ecclesiasticall: In his malice he omitted nothing that might apperteyne to seueritie or rigour: But after the king of Aragon had conquered the kingdom of Nauarre, which albeit is but of litle circuit and of lesse reuenue, yet for the situacion, it is very conuenient for the kingdom of Spayne, and greatly auaileable to the sewertie of it: he determined in him selfe to passe no further, esteeming it no lesse against his profit then inconuenient for his sauetie, to make warre against the french king beyond the Mountes: In this respect, as also euen from the beginning that thEnglishmen arriued, he had beene dilatorie in bringing forth his forces, rather temporising with euasions and deuises, then aduauncing according to the true meaning of his promisse: And after the conqueſt of Nauarre, as the English solicited him to ioyne his forces with them to thende to marche together and incampe affore Bayon, A citie neare to Fontarabye and almoste standing vppon the Occean sea: so he protracted thexpedicion they required,and proponed other enterprises in places remoued from the sea,alleaging that Bayonne was so manned and fortefied that there was no hope or possibilitie to cary it: These reasons were aunswered and auoided by thenglishmen,who,without the towne of Bayonne, esteemed nothing of all the other conqueſt of the Duchie of Guyhenno: And therefore after thenglish armie had vainely spent much time to vrge the king,that was altogether vnwilling, they contemned his suttleties and delayes, & embarked to returne into England without commission or licēce of their Prince: By the retyring of which armie the french king remeyned assured on that side, And fearing no more thinuasions of thEnglish by sea,for that at last he was become so stronge by sea,that he commaunded all that part of the Occean from the coastes of Spayne to the shoares of England: he determined to make tryall if he could reconquer the Realme of Nauarre: To which expedicion he was encouraged besides the departing of thEnglish fleete, for that by reason of his aduersities in Italy, all his bandes of souldiours that remeyned,were returned into Fraunce: At the tyme that the king of Aragon gaue hope to thEnglishmen to enter into the warre,the better to bring vnder him the whole iurisdiction of the Realme of Nauarre, he had sent certeine regiments of men to *S.Ioh.Pie de Porto,*which is the last place of that kingdom standing at the foote of the Pireney hills on that side towards Fraunce: And afterwards as the french forces began to encrease thereabouts, he had sent thether with the maine armie,Federyk Duke of *Alba,*capteine general of the warre:But the french armie at laste beeing become farre more mightye,by the presence of the Daulphin, Charles Duke of Burbon, and Monsr Longeville, the very flowers of the Realme of Fraunce: The Duke of Alba lying encamped in a stronge place betweene the plaine and the Mountaine,held it an action very necessary to that seruice, to let the french men for entring into the Realme of Nauarre: The french men not able to force him out of that place for the strength of his situacion, determined that the king of Nauarre with seuen thowsand footemen of his contrey, and Monsr Palissa with his companie of three hundred launces remouing from Sauueterra neare to *S.Ioh.Pie de Porto,*where the whole armie lay,should passe the Pireney hils by the way of the vale of willowes: And drawing neare to Pampelune the Capitall towne of the kingdom, their deuise was to occupy the way of the willowes, by the which were brought to the spanish armie,vittells whereof the sterrilitie of the contrey had made them suffer great want:In *Pampeluna,*the peoples taking corage by the nearenes of the french men,beganne already to draw to mutinie, not otherwaies rebelling then to releeue their king, for whose restoring they thought it good deuocion to aduenture their liues: This was theffect of this deuise, After the king of Nauarre and Monsr Palissa had wonne the way that is vppon the toppe of the Pireney hills, they tooke by assalt the towne that standes at the foote of the hills, wherein was Baldes Capteine of the garde to the king of Aragon with many bandes of footemen: And if to wynne the way of the willowes they had vsed the celeritie that the consideracion of the seruice required, famine onely had beene sufficient to vanquishe the spanishe armye enuyroned on all sides with ennemies, with ill wayes, with ill fortune, and with wantes: But the diligence of the Duke of Alba preuented thennemye and preserued him selfe, for that leauing in S. Ioh. Pie de Porto a thowsande footemen with all thartillerie, he passed to Pampelune by the waye of the willowes affore they came thether. So that the King of Nauarre and Palissa beeing disapoynted of that hope, to whom also the Daulphin had sent a newe strength of foure hundred launces and seuen thowsande launceknightes, made their approches to Pampeluna with foure

peeces of artillerie which they had drawne with great difficultie by reason of the steepenes of the mountaines: They gaue the assalt, but with a fortune farre inferior to their forwardnes, for that being not able to cary by their vallour, that they were denied by the present season (being then December,) and by the want of vittells (being falne into a contrey barreine) they repassed the Mountes Pireney, vpon the which they were constrayned to leaue thartillerie, both for the difficultie of the passages, and for thimpediments of the paisants of those hills: And at the same tyme Monsr de Lavvtrech who was entred Biskay with three hundred launces and three thowsand footemen, making waste and pillage of the whole contrey, after he had in vaine assalted the towne of Saint Sebastian, he repassed the mountes and returned to the armie, which now brake vp, both hope and feare ceassing on all partes, and the whole Realme of Nauarre remeyning free and peasible to the king of Aragon. About this time, there was a detection of a conspiracie, that Ferdinand sonne to the late Federyk king of Naples who called him selfe Duke of Calabria, had secretly conspired with the french king and to steale to the french armie not farre from the towne of Logrognia, where at that time was the king of Aragon: who sent him to the castell of Sciatyua whither the kings of Aragon are wont to send prisoners, personages of name & merit either for their nobilitie or for their vertue: for this conspiracie was quartered Philip Coppolo a Neapolytane, who was the secret Messenger to the french king in these actions: Such is the alteracion of the state of worldly thinges, that he was executed in the seruice of him whose grandfather by the father side had cutte of the heade of Counte de Sarny, his father: The detection of this conspyracie was of some consequence for thaffayres of Italy: for, as it had his beginning of a certeyne gray Freare which the Duke of Ferrara had secretly sent to Ferdinand; so, the Kinge Catholike, hauing already an inclinacion to satisfie the Popes will, tooke this matter so to harte, that he commaunded the Viceroy and his Embassadors resident with the Pope, to conuert when they thought good, his armye agaynst Ferrara, seeking to exacte no further taxacions of money, then suche as shoulde bee necessary to enterteyne them: These were the accidents of that yeare both in Italye, in Fraunce, and in Spayne, their yssues beeing diuerse, as their causes were seuerall.

Nowe followeth the yeare a thowsand fiue hundred and thirteene, no lesse full of occurrants straunge & sundry, then the other: In the beginning of this yeare, armes ceassed on all partes, for that neither the Venetians molested others, nor any other moued against them: onely the Viceroy marched with three thowsand footemen to incampe affore the rocke of Tressa, which immediatly was giuen vntō him vnder condicion that the bodies that were within, should departe with goods and life saued. But euery one vniuersally was troubled with the consideracion of thinges to come: They sawe that the french king deliuered from forreine armes, and estsoones reincouraged both for the great leauy of launceknightes he had made, and for thencrease of his numbers of men at armes, had nothing in so great desire as to recouer the Duchy of Myllan: Which disposicion albeit was very violent in him, and no lesse desire to hasten the warre whilest the castells of Myllan & Cremona were yet kept by his soldiours: yet looking into the great impediments offered by thopposing of so many ennemyes, and beeing not yet assured that the king of England woulde not make stronge warre against him the next sommer: he determined to enter into no action onlesse he seperated some one of the confederats from the common allyance, or else to wynne to him the amitie of the Venetians: of these thinges, the yeare paſt gaue him many hopes, that ſome one of them might happly ſucceede to him: for, at that tyme that the Biſhop of Gurcy went from Rome to Myllan, he heard graciouſly by the way one of the familiar friendes of the Cardinall S. Seuerin ſent to him from the french Queene, and afterwardes he had ſent into Fraunce one of his men to make theſe ouertures: that the king ſhould be bownd to ayde Cæſar againſt the Venetians: That the mariage ſhould goe forward betweene the ſecond Daughter of the king, and Charles Nephewe to Cæſar: That to the Daughter ſhould be giuen in dowrie the Duchie of Myllan: That the king beſides, ſhould giue vppe to his Daughter and his future ſonne in law, the rights he pretended to the Realme of Naples: And becauſe ſimple wordes and promiſſes ſhould not ſtand to Cæſar as a ſewertie, he required that the Daughter might be immediatly put into his handes: And that when the king ſhould haue recouered the Duchie of Myllan, Cremona and Guiaradada ſhoulde bee to Cæſar: The king hoped likewiſe that he might eaſily ioyne to him the Venetians, who were not a litle angrie at that time that the Viceroy occupied Breſsia, but much more for the matters which afterwards were accorded at Rome betweene Cæſar and the Pope: Therefore from that time, the king had cauſed to come ſecretly to his Court, Andrevv Gritty, who being taken within Breſsia, remeyned as yet priſoner in Fraunce: he wrought ſo alſo that Ioh. Ia. Tryuulce, in whom the Venetians reapoſed much, did ſend to Venice one of his Secretories vnder ſhadowe of other affayres: There offered him withall a certeine hope to be able to compownd with the king of Aragon, who, according to his cuſtom often times to debate in his affaires by the negociacion of men religious, had ſent ſecretly into Fraunce two gray Frears, to thende that expreſſing howe they were touched with a conſcience and zeale to the common benefitte, they might beginne to negociat with the Queene in ſome pointes either concerning the peace vniuerſall, or particular betwene the two kings: Wherein neuertheleſſe there was no great hope, the king knowing well enough that he would ſtill reteyne the Realme of Nauarre, and to him it was a matter of no leſſe indignitie to leaue abandoned that king, who to reenter into his amitie & vnder hope of his ſuccours, was falne into that calamitie: But nothing troubled ſo much the mind of the frēch king as the deſire he had to be reconciled to the Svvyzzers: he knewe that vppon their amitie depended his aſſured victorie, both for the great authoritie that that nation had then got, and their armes no leſſe feared; and for that they ſeemed to be nowe drawne into a forme of gouernment not as ſouldiours marcenary, nor men ſauage, but with a wonderfull warines and vigilancie, as men trayned vp in a common weale well inſtituted, and nouriſhed in thadminiſtracion of eſtates and managing of affayres, without ſuffering any ſtirre or leauyes to be made but by good councell and diſcreſſion: By this conformitie of theirs, there was in Svvyzzerlande a reſort and preſence of Embaſſadors from all Princes in Chriſtendom: The Pope with almoſt all Potentats, payed them yearly penſions, to bee receyued into their confederacion, and to haue ſufferance to leauye for their proper defence in times of neceſſitie, ſoldiours of that nation: The remembrance of theſe thinges made them ſo proude, that weighing withall how king Charles the eyght by their armes had firſt altered the quiet eſtate of Italy, and after king Lovvys his ſucceſſor by their vallour had conquered the Duchie of Myllan, recouered Genes, and ouerthrowne the Venetians, they vſed towards all men an imperious and gayne for Monſr de Aſperot brother to Monſr de Lautrech already gone from the Court with his commiſſion to finde the Biſhoppe of Gurce: On the other ſide, the feare of the vnion betweene the king and the Venetians encreaſing dayly, the king of Aragon aduiſed Cæſar to render Verona, and to transferre the warre into Burgondy, by the helpe of the money which he ſhoulde receiue of the Venetians, and with the Spanishe armie: Of this aduiſe was the Biſhop of Gurcy, who hoping to be hable to moue Cæſar by his preſence nowe returned into Germanie, being followed not onely of Dom Peter de Vree which was come with him, but alſo of Iohn Baptiſta Spinella Count of Carriato Embaſſador to the ſayde king of Aragon reſident with the Venetians. And becauſe no newe difficulties ſhould breake of the matters that were nowe in action, he induced firſt the ſenate to make truce with Cæſar for the whole moneth of Marche: And thoſe Embaſſadors gaue them their fayth that Cæſar ſhoulde render Verona, if they would promiſe him within certayne times two hundred and fiftie thouſande duckets, and for yerely penſion fiftie thouſande.

In theſe alterations of affayres, and in theſe times ſo deuided and conſpiring, the Pope fell ſicke: And happly he was then more full of high conceites and trauelling thoughts then at any time before: for notwithſtāding he had brought his fortune to be equall to his deſires, & obteined the thing he aſpired vnto, yet his deuiſes & plots did nothing diminiſh, but grewe increaſing by the ſame meane which ſhould haue ſatisfied them: he had determined in the beginning of the ſpring and firſt opening of the yere, to ſende to thenterpriſe of Ferrara which he ſo muche deſired, and his opinion was that that ſtate was hable to make no reſiſtance, both for that it was naked of all ſuccours, & becauſe the Spanish armie was to ioyne with his companies: He had ſecretly bought of Cæſar for the price of xxx. thouſande duckets, the Citie of Siena for the behoofe of the Duke of Vrbin, to whom (except Peſera) he woulde neuer giue any thing of theſtate eccleſiaſtike, to thende to reſerue to him ſelfe the whole glorie to haue ſimply and onely ſtudyed for thexaltation of the Churche: he agreed to lende to Cæſar fortie thouſande duckettes receyuing Modona in gage: he threatned them of Lucquoy, who in the heate of thaffayres of the Duke of Ferrara, were become lordes of Garſagnana, making inſtance that they woulde deliuer it to him: He was out of conceite with the Cardinall of Medicis, for that he thought him to cleaue more to the king Catholike then to him: And becauſe he knewe he was not hable to diſpoſe of the Citie of Florence as he thought, he ſtudied already newe plottes and newe practiſes to alter that eſtate: He was yll contented with the Cardinall of Sion, from whom he tooke the name of Legate, and enioyned him to come to Rome, for that in the Duchie of Myllan he had appropriate to him ſelfe a yerely rent of more then thirtie thouſande duckets of the eſtates and goods of diuers perſons. The better to aſſure the Duke of Vrbin of Sienna by intelligences of his neighbours, he had of newe taken into his paye Charles Baillon, to chaſe out of Perouſa Iohn Paule, who by affinitie was very neare ioyned to the ſonnes of Pandolffe Petruccio ſucceſſors to the greatnes of their father. He would of newe create Duke of Genes, Octauian Fregoſa, depoſing Ianus from that dignitie: an action wherevnto did conſent the others of the houſe of Fregoſa, becauſe for the degree that his auncеſtors helde in that ſtate, it ſeemed beſt to apperteine to him. He ſtudied continually either howe he might worke out of Italie the Spanish armie, or cut it in peeces by the ayde of the Svvizzers, whom aboue all others he exalted and embraced: In this deuiſe he had this intention, that the kingdome of Naples beeing occupied by him, Italie ſhould remayne free from ſtraungers, A ſpeeche that often paſſed out of his mouth, and to that ende he had hindred that the Svvizzers did not confederate with the king Catholike. And yet, as though it had bene in his power to batter all the world at one time, he continued his accuſtomed rigour agaynſt the French king, and notwithſtanding he had heard a meſſage from the Queene, yet he ſtyrred vp to make warre, the king of Englande, to whom he had transferred by publike decree of the councel of Latran, the name of Chriſtianiſſimo, whereof there was already a Bul written, and in it likewiſe was conteyned the priuation of the dignitie and name of the king of Fraunce, giuing his kingdome to who coulde occupie it. In theſe conceptions no leſſe ſtraunge for their varietie, then great for the importance they drewe, and perhaps in other thoughtes, more ſecret and ſinguler, (for in a minde ſo fierce and terrible, all ſortes of imaginations howe great and vayne ſo euer they be, are not incredible) after the continuation of his ſickneſſe for many dayes, he declined towardes death: And feeling the ende of his mortalitie to haſten on, and the ſame to preuent the execution of his high thoughts, he cauſed to cal together the conſiſtorie, which albeit he could not aſſiſt in perſon by reaſon of his diſeaſe, yet by the authoritie of it, he cauſed to be confirmed the Bull which he had publiſhed before againſt ſuche as by ſymonie would climbe to the Popedome: He declared that the election of his ſucceſſor apperteined to the colledge of Cardinalls, and not to the councell: And that the Cardinals ſchiſmatikes could haue no preſence or communitie there, to whom he proteſted there to pardon the iniuries they had done him, and prayed to God to forgiue them the wrongs they had done to his Churche. After this he beſought the Colledge of Cardinalls, that in his fauor and for his ſake, they woulde graunt to the Duke of Vrbin his Nephew, the Citie of Pezera in patronage or vicarage, alleaging the conſideration that by meane of the duke it had bene recouered to the Church after the death of Iohn Sforce: In no other matter he expreſſed no priuate or particular affection: In ſo muche as Madame Felice his daughter (ioyning with her the petitions of many others) beſeeching him with great importunitie, to create Cardinall Guido de Montfalcon being her brother by the mothers ſide, he aunſwered roundly that he was not worthy of that degree: He made not his affections conformable to their deſires: In that laſte action of lyfe he ſhowed no partialitie in worldly cauſes: his preſent debilitie coulde diminiſhe nothing of his auncient reſolution, but expreſſed in all things the ſame conſtancie and ſeueritie, together with that iudgement and force of minde whiche he had before his ſickneſſe: In whiche firme eſtate & diſpoſition of ſpirite, he receiued deuoutly the offices of the church, and the xxj. day of February he ended his courſe of theſe mortal and preſent paines: He was a prince of incredible conſtancie and courage, but ſo full of furie and vnruled conceptions, that the reuerence that was borne to the Churche, the diſcorde of princes, and the condition of times, did more to ſtaye him from his ruine, then eyther his moderation or his diſcreſſion: Worthy no doubt of great glory, if eyther he had bene a Prince ſecular, or if that care and intention which he had to rayſe the Churche into temporall greatneſſe by the meane of warre, had bene employed to exalte it by the mediation of peace, in matters ſpirituall: Neuertheleſſe he was lamented aboue all his predeceſſors, and no leſſe eſteemed of thoſe, who hauing eyther loſte the true conſideration of things, or at leaſt ignorant howe to diſtinguiſhe and peaze them rightly, iudged it an office more duely apperteining to Popes, to increaſe the iuriſdiction of the ſea Apoſtolike by armes and blood of Chriſtians, then by good example of life and due curing and correction of corrupt maners, to trauell for the ſauing of thoſe ſoules, for whom they glory ſo much that Ieſus Chriſt hath lightnes conuey them to the ſtarres: They conſidered not that theſtate of humane felicitie is ſubiect to emulacion,& nothing of more difficultie to worldly men then to beare well the height & greatnes of fortune: And yet,the french king,notwithſtanding the perſwaſions of many particulars of that nation,together with his own opinion that they would ſtirre & draw into armes for the great offers of money that were made them,was not without hope to winne them: his reaſon was, that albeit ſuch as gouerned Myllan hauing agreed with thEmbaſſadors of the Swyzzers in the name of Maxymylian Sforce that he ſhould giue them an hundred and 50.thowſand duckats ſo ſoone as he had receiued the poſſeſſion of Myllan & the caſtells,and penſiõ of xl.thowſand duckats euery yeare for xxv.yeares,taking him into their protection with couenant to deliuer into his pay,bands of their footemen: yet the cantons would neuer ratifie thoſe couenants: In which hope, in the beginning of the yeare preſent, notwithſtanding affore he had in vaine proued to haue his Embaſſadors heard which he ment to ſend to ſolicit in thoſe affayres, yet to purchaſſe audience in their parliaments,he cõſented to giue vp to them frankly & freely the caſtels of the vale of Lugan & Lugarna: with ſo great indignitie great Princes ſought at that time the amitie of that nation:In the end Monſr Trymouille with cõmiſſion from the king came to Lucerna,a place appoynted to heare him in publike aſſembly, And albeit he was receiued with good ſhow & countenance, yet he ſaw he ſhould do litle good touching the action of the Duchie of Myllan:for that not many dayes before, 6.Cantons had ratified & ſubſigned the capitulacions made with Maxymylian Sforce,three had determined to confirme them,and touching the other three,they were not yet reſolued: by reaſon of which doubts, thEmbaſſador ſpeaking no further of Myllan nor thaffayres thereof, demaunded that at leaſt they would ayde the king to recouer Genes & Aſt,matters not comprehended in the capitulaciõ made with Maxymylian Sforce:And the better to aduaunce that demaunde, Tryuulce made requeſt that he might be at the parliament vnder cooller to treate vppon affaires particular, wherin ſaffeconduit was graunted to him, but with this cõdicion that he ſhould not ſolicit in any matter apperteining to the french king:And being come to Lucerna,he was enioyned not to haue conference with Trymouille neither in publike nor in priuat:At laſt by an vniuerſall conſent, the capitulacions made with the Duke of Myllan were ratified by all the Cantons,& all the demaundes of the french king denied, with this addicion, that they would not ſuffer any leauies of footemen of that nation to ſerue him either in Italy or out of Italy:A matter which made the king deſperat of all fauor,hope,or amitie with that people, & therefore being excluded quite out where he thought to finde ſome entrance,he ſaw by conſideracions of his affayres, that it was neceſſary for him to be reconciled either to Cæſar or the Venetians, who for their partes ſolicited at the ſame time with Cæſar, for that the ſuſpicion of their reconciliacion ceaſſing in the mindes of the confederats, the Biſhop of Gurcy conſented that they ſhould reteyne ſtill Vincenſa: But the ſame reaſons encouraging the Senat which gaue feare to thennemies: they ſtoode vppon this to make no more peace,if Verona were not rendred to them,giuing Cæſar a recõpenſe of a great quantitie of money: This demaund ſeemed to conteyne difficultie, which made the Venetians to incline ſo much the more to the french amitie, & in that diſpoſicion contracted with the Secretorie of Tryuulce to be confederat with the king according to the capitulacions made betwene them affore, by the which Cremona & Guiaraddada ſhould remeine to thẽ:But the Secretory ſet downe expreſſe mẽtion in the capitulaciõ,that that agreemẽt ſhould ſtand as void & of none effect,if within a certein time it were not approued by the king: In whose councell the disputacions were greate, which was most to be desired, eyther a reconciliacion with Cæsar, or a confederacion with the Venetians: Robert Est a Secretorie of great authoritie, Tryuulce, & almost all the chiefest of the councel proued the necessitie of confederacion with the Venetians: They alleaged that which the present experience made them to know of thinconstancy of Cæsar bringing no small domage to the kings affaires: They ript vp the hatred he bare to the king, together with his dispositicion to reuenge: They related what they had heard of personages worthy of opinion & credit, who reaported how oftē they had heard him say in that time that he kept precisely in mind the remembrance of xvij iniuries receiued by the french, and that when soeuer the oportunitie serued him to be reuenged of all, he would not lose thoccasion nor forget the desire: They alleaged that these solicitacions were practised by him for none other effect, then by the meane of reconciliacion full of fraude and ill meaning, to haue a greater way to doe harme, or at least to breake of that which he knew was practised with the Venetians, or else in his spyte, to detract the preparacions of the warre: Lastly they gaue this as a warning and lesson, that that man was neither to be excused, nor esteemed worthy of compassion, who beeing once beguiled by an other, returneth eftsoones to reappose confidence in him: An enemie reconciled, charitie leades vs to loue him, but wisedome willeth vs not to trust him, and to a friend once disproued, there can be no greater daunger, then eftsoones to reenter into confidence with him: The Cardinall of S. Seuerin was of an other opinion, who, (as his aduersaries sayd crossing Tryuulce more through enuie then for other occasion for that with his brethren he had alwaies defended the Gebelin faction in Myllan,) replied in the contrary that nothing could be more profitable to the king and his seruices, then in ioyning with Cæsar, to breake the vnion of thennemies, specially the confederacion being made by such meane as they might hope it would last: That it was the propertie of Princes in their councells and deliberacions to preferre alwayes profitte affore good will, affore hatred, and affore other affections: And what greater benefit could be done to Cæsar, then to ayde him presently against the Venetians, with hope that his Nephew should come to succeede in the Duchie of Myllan: That Cæsar being seperat from the others, the king Catholike would not obiect against his authoritie, as well for thintersts of his Nephew, as for other regards: Moreouer that as nothing could more amaze the Pope then this confederacion, so, of the contrary to confederat with the Venetians, was full of indignitie, since there must be accorded to them Cremona & Guiaradada, members so conuenient to the Duchie of Myllan, that to recouer them, the king had stirred vppe all the worlde: And yet if the vnion of the others were not broken and deuided, the confederacion with the Venetians would not suffice to obteyne the victorie: At last this opinion caried the king, the rather for thauthoritie of the Queene, who desired greatly thaduauncement of her Daughter: onely her desire was accompanied with this condicion, so farre forth as it might bee obteyned, that till the consummacion of the mariage the younge Damesell might remeyne with her, And she to bind her faith and promisse to keepe her in the name of Cæsar as the spowse assigned for his Nephew, to whome she would redeliuer her assoone as her age and yeares made her able to the full office of mariage: But the Kinge beeing afterwardes certefied that Cæsar woulde not agree vnder this forme of lymitacion, but rather that he foysted in those offers for the tyme and by suttletie, to detract his diligence and giue him cause to proceede more slowely in his other plottes, he brake off from this practise, and sent backe a-named them his Vicars in earth.

The Viceroy of Naples who was marched with his Spanishe armie towards Plaiſanca, conſtrayned that Citie to returne vnder the gouernment of the Dukes of Millan, on whom it depended by auncient tenure: They of Parma did the like, hauing the ſame feare of the Spanishe ſouldiours, beeing followed in all places with more terror then loue. On the other ſide the Duke of Ferrara, after he had in great ſpede recouered the townes of Romagnia, drewe neare to Reggia: but finding no ſtirre nor tumult within the towne, he durſt not abyde there for feare of the Spanishe armie, which laye diſpearſed betweene Plaiſanca and Reggia. Touching theſtate of the Churche, there appeared no other ſtirre nor mouing: and the Citie of Rome nor the Colledge of Cardinalls, felt none of thoſe difficulties which they had felte in the death of the two laſte Popes: So that the obſequies and funeralls beeing ended according to thaccuſtomed maner, xxiiij. Cardinalls entred peaſibly into the Conclaue, hauing graunted afore that the Marquis of Mantuaes ſonne whom Pope Iulio kept with him for oſtage, ſhoulde be made free and acquited of his fayth and promiſe, with libertie to returne to his father. The firſt matter that was debated in the Conclaue, was with ſtraite articles to moderate thauthoritie of the Pope to come, which they ſayde the laſte Pope had vſed too immoderately: And yet, as amongeſt men ſome haue not the heart to oppoſe agaynſt a prince and great Lorde, and ſome deſire to enter into his grace and lyking: ſo within ſmall time after, they diſſolued and cancelled of themſelues the articles which they had made with ſo great aduiſe, and to ſo good purpoſe: The ſeuenth day they chooſed Pope without any diſcorde of conſent, the Cardinal of Medicis, who tooke vpon him the name of Leo the tenth: He bare but xxxvij. yeres of age, which albeit was ſo muche the more marueilous and wonderfull, by howmuche the election was contrarie to cuſtome, yet the yong Cardinalls were the principall cauſers of it by their induſtrie, hauing long time afore ſecretly agreed amongeſt themſelues to create the firſt Pope of their number. The moſte partes and nations of Chriſtendome reioyced muche at this election, euery one enterteining an aſſured exſpectation of his vertues, aſwell by the preſent and greene memorie of the vallour of his late father, as for an vniuerſall reputation that went of his owne inclinations and liberalities: To this eſtimation alſo was ioyned a generall opinion of his continencie and life not attaynted, together with a gladſome hope that by theexample of his father, he would be a furtherer of learning, and beare fauor to wittes diſpoſed to ſtudie and knowledge: To theſe hopes was muche helping the maner of theelection, beeing made in his perſon ſincerely, and without ſymonie or ſuſpicion of other corruption. And it ſeemed that God began to approue and confirme his ſeate, for that the fourth day after his election, came into his power the Cardinalls of S. Croſſe and S. Seuerin, who aſſone as they heard of the death of Pope Iulio, went by ſea to Rome accompanied with thembaſſador of the French king: In their paſſage they ſtroke into the hauen of Lyuorno, where vnderſtanding that the Cardinall of Medicis was choſen Pope, they tooke lande, the one hauing confidence in the naturall inclination and clemencie of the Pope, and the other reappoſing muche in the auncient friendſhippe and ſtraite familiaritie had with him and with his brother: There they obteined ſafeconduit of the capteine of Lyuorna, whiche albeit ſtretched no further then the boundes of his iuriſdiction, yet without ſeeking other ſuretie, they went vp in that confidence to Piſa: In whiche Citie they were honorably receyued, and afterwards in no leſſe aſſurance conueied to Florence, where they were kept with that eaſie and fauourable garde, that they had no disposition to departe: the same being the desire of the Pope, who sent to them the Bishop of Oruietto to exhorte them with words gracious and full of affection, that aswell for their proper surety, as for the present tranquilitie of the Church, they would abyde at Florence vntill the Court had determined in what manner they shoulde come to Rome: He willed them also, that whereas they had bene iudicially depriued, and their depriuation confirmed in the Councell of Latran, they shoulde forbeare to go in habites of Cardinalls, to thende that expressing signes of humiliation, he might take the better occasion to reduce and readresse their affayres according to their desire and his determination. The first act of this newe Pope was his Coronation, which was represented according to the vsage of his predecessors in the Church of S. Iohn de Latran: The pompe was so great both of his famulie & his Court, and also of the Prelates and multitudes that were there, together with the popular and vniuersall assemblies of peoples, that by the opinion and iudgement of men, the pride and maiestie of that action did farre surpasse all the celebrations that had bene done in Rome since the tyrannies of the Goathes and sauage nations: In this solemnitie the Gonfalone of the Churche was caryed by Alfonso d'Este, who hauing obteined a suspencion of his Censures and paynes, was come to Rome, wyth great hope that by the clemencie and facilitie of the Pope, he should be hable to compounde for his affayres: The Gonfalone of the religion of Rhodes was borne by Iulio de Medicis mounted vpon a stately Courser armed at all poyntes: by his nature he bare an inclination to the profession of armes, but by destinie he was drawen to the life ecclesiastike, in which estate he may serue as a wonderfull example of the variation of fortune. One matter that made the memorie of that daye wonderfull, was the consideration, that the person that then in so high and rare pompe was honored with the moste supreme and soueraigne dignitie of the worlde, was the yere before, and on the very same day, miserably made prisoner: The great magnificence that appeared vpon his person, and his expences, confirmed in the generalitie and multitude of men, thexpectation that was had of him, euery one promising that Rome shoulde be happie vnder a Pope so plentifully indued with the vertue of liberalitie, whereof that day he had giuen an honorable experience, his expenses beeing aboue an hundred thousande ducketts: But wyse men desired in him a greater grauitie and moderation: they iudged that neither suche a maiestie of pompe was conuenient for Popes, neyther did the condition of the present time require, that he should so vnprofitably disperse the treasors that had bene gathered by his predecessor to other vses.

Disposition of princes to the warre.

But suche was the disposition of Princes to warre, that neyther the chaunging of the Pope, nor the presence nor feare of other accidentes, were sufficient to establishe and assure the tranquillitie of Italie: euery one discerned that things of their proper inclination tended more to warre then to peace: for Cæsar woulde heare no more speaking of the rendring of Verona, fearing thereby to be depriued of all oportunitie and meane to haue any easie entry into Italie: And albeit the truce was prolonged for the full moneth of Aprill, yet he kept no rekoning of the condicions of accorde that had bene debated at Millan: And in that minde beeing discontented with thinstance and importunities of the king Catholikes Embassadors, he stucke not to tell the Count of Carriato, that for the inclination he expressed to the Venetians he deserued better to beare the name of an Embassador of Venice then of Spayne. But that whiche muche more augmented this disposition, was the truce that was made for a whole yere betwene the French king and the king Catholike tending onely to thaffayres on the other ſide the Mountes: The oportunitie of which truce, gaue to the French king (being nowe deliuered of the ſuſpicions of Spayne) a great facilitie to renewe the warre in the duchie of Millan.

The king Catholike had neuer any diſpoſition to haue warre with the Frenche men beyonde the Mountes, for that beeing not mightie enough in money and treaſor, and therefore depending on the forces and aydes of the Barons and peoples of Spayne, eyther he had no readynes of ſuccours, or elſe by his neceſſities in tymes of warre, they would holde him with them as it were in ſubiection: But then principally he ſtoode confirmed in his auncient counſell, for that together with his owne tranquillitie and reſt, he was ſo muche the more aſſured of the Realme of Nauarre newly conquered by him: and withall for that ſince the death of queene Iſabell, his abſolute authoritie ouer Caſtillo beeing embaſed into a gouernment limited, he had not in troubled ſeaſons ſo great and firme authoritie: Of this he had ſeene a late experience in the action of the kingdome of Nauarre, wherein albeit he had an ende happie and honorable, yet it happned not by other meane then by the negligence and ſlowneſſe of ſuccours. And hauing no more deſire to returne to the daungers which he had ſuffred, and not knowing yet of the Popes death, he agreed to the truce, which neuertheleſſe was not publiſhed before he had receyued newes of the election of the new Pope. The better to iuſtifie him ſelfe of this vnlooked for deliberation, he alleaged that the Pope & the Venetians had behaued them ſelues towards him cleane contrarie to the league: for that ſince the battell of Rauenna, they neuer offred to pay to him the fortie thouſande duckets as they were bounde whileſt the French king poſſeſſed any thing in Italie: That onely he had had care of the common benefite of the confederates, and yet had not attributed to himſelf the rewards of the common victorie: That he did not poſſeſſe in Italie ſo much as a ſmall tower more then that he had before the warre. But the Pope had had regarde to his benefite particular, and made proper to him ſelfe the things that were common: That he occupied Parma, Plaiſanca, and Reggia, and nouriſhed a continuall ſtudie to poſſeſſe Ferrara: which couetouſneſſe of his had bene the onely impediment of the recouering of the Caſtells in the Duchie of Millan and the Lanterne of Genes: That touching his parte, he had interpoſed all his diligence and authoritie to worke thaccorde betweene Cæſar and the Venetians, but the Pope for his proper intereſtes, labored to exclude them out of the league: wherein he ſayde his Embaſſadors had behaued themſelues vndiſcretly, who not conſenting (for that they knewe ſuche was his intention) that he was named in the head of the confederation, had ſuffred him to be expreſſed in that article wherein euery one named the confederates, of which the Venetians were not: Moreouer that in thoſe negociations and practiſes the Venetians had not aunſwered thopinion that men had of their wiſedome and diſcreſſion, holding ſuch an eſtimation and accompt of Vincenſa, that the feare to loaſe it, hath kept them from deliuering them ſelues from the trauells of the warre: That it was impoſſible to him to nouriſhe the armie he had in Italie without the payes and contributions that were promiſed, and muche leſſe reaſonable to ſuſteine the whole warre vpon the confines of his realmes, A matter which he knewe all the reſidue did deſire and procure: That the Pope coulde no more diſſemble his deſire and intention to take from him the kingdome of Naples: And yet notwithſtanding, neyther theſe preſent iniuries, nor the conſideration of other wrongs, could euer moue him to haue a thought to abandon the Churche and the other eſtates of Italie, ſo farre foorth as he might finde in them a reaſonable correſpondencie to contract and capitulate with him for their common defence: A matter which he hoped they would be moued vnto, the rather by thopportunitie and meane of this truce: He causèd to expresse in the instrument of the truce the names of Cæsar and the king of Englande, notwithstanding he had nothing cõmunicated with them: & therfore it was a thing very scornefull & ridiculous that at the same time that the truce was solemnly publisshed through all partes and regions of Spayne, A Heralt arriued euen in the action from the king of Englande, to signifie to him the strong preparations and furnitures of warre which he leauyed to inuade Fraunce, soliciting that he would likewise enter into the warre agaynst the king on the coasts of Spayne, according to the articles and promises reciprocally passed betweene them.

The truce made in this maner, amazed much in Italie the mindes of suche as had any discontentment with the rule or iurisdiction of the French men, euery one holding it almost for certaine, that the French king woulde not be long ere he sent an army on this side the Mountes: and also that by the obstinacie of Cæsar touching the conditions of the peace, the Venetians would ioyne with him, agaynst whom it seemed a very hard matter to be hable to resist, for that the Spanish army had nowe no more meane to be enterteined, notwithstãding they had at times drawẽ some sums of money out of thestate of Millan which stoode greatly impouerished with continuall expenses. Touching the new Pope, men could not discerne what was his intention: he seemed to wish secretly that the power of the French king should haue his ends & limites within the Alpes: and yet being newly ascended to the Popedom, and no lesse confused then the others for the truce that was made by the king Catholike in a time when men had greatest exspectation that he woulde applye his thoughts to the warre, he was in great doubt and variation of mind: Besides, he was angry, for that demaunding with great instance the restitution of Parma & Placentia to the church, he found a readynes of hope & promise, but very slow dispositions to execute & performe, all the others desiring to preserue them to the duchy of Millan, & happly hoping that his desire to recouer them, would induce him to the defence of that state: The Svvizzers seemed to be a more certayne and a more mightie defence & succour, but becausè the summes of money which according to the couenantes were necessary to wage & leauie them, could not be aduaunced neither by Maximilian Sforce nor the residue, there was great feare that in greatest necessitie that nation would not refuse to discende to the reskew of Millan.

On the other side the French king, after he had finished the truce, determined to sende an army into Italie, the reasons affore recited giuing him great hope of the victorie: To those reasons also he added the propertie of his owne iudgement vpon the people of Millan, who, vexed with so many taxes and impostes of the Svvizzers, and no lesse troubled with the harboring & payes made to the Spaniards, he knew had an vniuersall desire to returne eftsones vnder his obedience: he gathered by generall argument, that hauing nowe compared the heauy yoke of others with the easie impery of the French, the seueritie of the one woulde make the other lesse contemnible: And particularly he vnderstoode by many gentlemen, some relating to him selfe, and some enterteyning intelligence with Triuulce, whome the king had sent to Lyon the better to debate with them of Millan, that he was not to deferre to sende an armie, hauing their promise to take armes and be his, assoone as his armie were passed the Mountes. To these furtherances the king wanted no sort of continuall perswasions, aswell of Triuulce, as of others that were banished, who according to such as be depriued of the liberty of their naturall contrey, omitted no

reasons which might make thenterprise seeme easy, specially the Venetians beeing brought to ioyne with him in the action. But the matter that enforced the king to make haste, was the confidence he had to preuent with the ende of that expedition, the beginning of a warre which the king of England ment to make vpon him, which yet he could not begin till after certayne monethes: both for that that kingdome hauing liued many yeres in peace, was vpon the sodein disfurnished of armes and armor, of artilleries, & almost of all other necessary hablementes of warre: and also in great want of horses of seruice, for that to the inhabitantes of those regions, the seruice on foote is more familiar, then to make warre on horsbacke: and also the footemen lacking training & experience, the king of England was constrained for the better strength & habilitie of his army, to leauye a great number of Almain footemen: Matters which could not be dispatched without great tract of time. The french king in like sort made more hast to haue his army to march, for that he feared the castles & peces that held for him would be lost for want of vittels, but specially the lanterne of Genes, whiche not many dayes before had missed to releeue with vittells, a shippe sent for that effect: which from Arbinga being thither accompanied with three ships & one galeon, being entred the mayne sea with a good wind, had by a strainable gale passed thorow the middest of the Genouvaies flete, & cõming neare the castell of the Lanterne she cast anker, and throwing yet with good succesſe her cables to those of the castell, she began to vnlade her vittels and munitions whiche she had brought: But euen in the action and before the desolate soules of the Castels coulde take the frute of the benefite which their fortune seemed to offer, Andrea Doria, he who afterwards was so notable in marine seruice, thrust in with a great ship wherof he was owner, betwene the castel of the Lantern & the french ship, and cutting a sunder the cable that was caste to them of the castell and the cables that helde the ankers, he set vpon the ship with no lesse felicitie then peril, & albeit in the fight he was wounded in the face, yet by his vallour he wanne and caryed away the shippe. The king therefore beeing determined not to deferre the beginning of the warre, in which respect, and to be ready in al occasions, he had already sent many launces into Burgondie & Dauphine, he thought good now to harken with diligence after the matter debated vpon so many monthes with the Venetians: They had bene somewhat deferred and protracted aswell by the one as by the other party, both for that sometimes the hope to haue peace with Cæsar, & sometimes the great instance made by the Venetians, for Cremona & Guiaradada, had holden the king in suspence: And also in the senat the opinions of Councellors were diuerse, for that many of great authoritie in that cõmon weale, preferred thaccord with Cæsar: wherin they shewed that it would be more profitable to discharge them selues for the present of so huge expences, with freedome from daungers, thereby to be the more ready to embrase thoccasions that would offer, then their common weale being so ouerweried and trauelled, and the wealth of priuat men abated, to entangle theselues with new warres in companie of the Frenche king, whose amitie howe faythfull and assured it was, they were not without a late and greene experience. Neuertheleſſe the greater parte seeming that rarelye an occasion woulde ryse to make them recouer their auncient estate, and that thagrement with Cæsar (he reteyning Verona) would not deliuer them from troubles and daungers: they reiected all thoughtes and deuises for Cremona and Guiaradada, & resolued to make confederation with the french king, in whose Court it was concluded by Andrea Gritti representing already, more the person and place of an Embassador then of a prisoner. By this confederation, after it was graunted that Bart. Aluiano & Andrea Gritti ſhould be ſet at liberty, the Venetians were bound to aide the king with eight hũdred men at armes, a thouſand fiue hũdred light horſmen, & ten thouſand footmen, & that againſt all ſuch as would riſe vp to let him for recouering of Aſt, of Genes, & the duchy of Millan: The king for his part was bound to ioyne with thẽ vntill they had recouered all that they poſſeſſed in Lombardy & the Marquiſdome of Treuiſana, afore the league of Cambray. Vpon the reſolution of this contract, Iohn Iacques Triuulce and Bart. Aluiano went to Suſo: the one to go from thence to Venice by the more ſure way, and the other to aſſemble there the army appoynted for the warre: It conteined vpon the full muſter xv. hundred launces, eight hundred light horſmen, and xv. thouſande footemen, whereof eight thouſande were Launceknights, and the reſidue of the French nation. This army was committed to the authoritie and guyding of Monſr Trimouille, whom the king appoynted his lieſe-tenaunt, to thend the action might proceede with moré reputation.

In this time the french king made great requeſt to the Pope not to hinder him in recouering his duchy of Millan: And the better to conteine the Pope, he offred that he would not only not paſſe further after the victory, but alſo would alwayes referre himſelfe to him to make peace vnder what conditions it ſhould pleaſe him beſt. To which motions albeit the Pope gaue gracious & willing eare, and that to drawe better faith to his words, he vſed to ſolicite with the king by the meane and labour of Iulian his brother, yet many things made him ſuſpected with the king: firſt the memory of things done afore the time of his Papacie: then ſince he was Pope, how he had ſent to him Cinthio his familiar & fauorit with letters & very frendly cõmiſſions, but ſo generall as they well declared the litle inclination of minde he bare to him or his affaires: alſo for that he had cõſented that Proſp. Colõno ſhould be elected captein generall ouer the duchy of Millan, A matter which his predeceſſor had alwaies hindred for the hatred he bare to the famuly of Colonno: he entred alſo into greater dout by a ſignification which the Pope addreſſed to the king of England to cõtinue ſtill in the cõfederation made with Cæſar, with the king catholike, & him: Laſtly he wrote to the cõmunalties of the Svvizzers, exhorting thẽ almoſt to the defẽce of Italie, wherin he could not diſſimule that he would continue with thẽ the cõfederation made by his predeceſſor, by the which they were boũd to the defence of the ſtate eccleſiaſtik, receiuing of him a yerely penſion of xx. thouſand duckets: It was alſo a ſigne of his wil & intẽtion, that he had not receiued into grace the duke of Ferrara, but by many excuſes deferred to render to him Reggia vntil his brother the cardinal came to Rome, who to auoide the perſecutions of Pope Iulio, was withdrawen into the countrey of Hungaria, & liued vpon his biſhoprike of Agria: But the matter that aboue all other things made the king enter into ſuſpicion againſt the Pope was, that he had in great ſecrecy counſelled the ſtate of Venice to come to accord with Cæſar: A matter cleane contrary to thintẽtion of the king: who alſo had interpreted in ill part, that the Pope declaring that he moued not for other reſpect thẽ to ſatisfie his ſoueraine duty, had writtẽ vnto him in a kind exhorting, not to take armes, but rather to expres a diſpoſitiõ to finiſh the warwith ſome honorable cõpoſition: a matter which the king would not haue blamed, if for the ſame deſire to peace he had alſo declared to the king of England that he ought not to make war vpõ the frẽch king. Sure this ſuſpiciõ of the king was not without cauſe, for that the Pope deſired that the French might be cut off from all ſeate & habitation in Italy, either for that he thought it more profitable for the cõmon ſurety, or for the greatnes & aduauncement of the church: or at leaſt that he kept ſtil fixed in his mind the remẽbrãce of harmes receiued by the crown of

Fraunce, whervnto albeit his father & other his predeceſſors had borne no litle affection, & in ſundry accidents had reaped many honors & profites: yet it was an iniury freſhe in memorie that his brethren & he had bene expulſed Florence by the comming of king Charles: and that the king raigning bearing fauour to the popular gouernment, had eyther alwayes reiected them, or if at any time he ſhowed inclination to them, it was to vſe them as inſtrumentes to drawe the Florentins by that ſuſpicion to couenantes of more aduauntage for himſelfe, without bearing reſpect or care to them. To this perhaps was muche helping, a diſdayne that he was ledde priſoner to Millan after the battell of Rauenna, and by the kings commaundement ſhoulde haue bene caried in that calamitie into Fraunce: But what ſo euer was the diſpoſition of the Pope, or howe ſo euer his coniecture was caried for theſe or other cauſes, he proceeded aduiſedly, and diſſembled as muche as he could his intention, for that both he ſawe he had not ſo ſtrong fundations to reſiſt, as he wiſhed, and alſo he gaue eare dayly with great affection to the demaundes and complaintes made agaynſt the king: for the Svvizzers bearing an vniuerſall inclination, to ſtirre and ryſe for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, offred to enter into thaction with a farre greater number then before, ſo farrefoorth as they were furniſhed in preſte with a certayne ſumme of money, which for the pouertie and weaknes of others, could not be hoped for otherwiſe then of the Pope. Touching the Viceroy, his counſells were vncertayne, and his ſpeeches ſeuerall and ſuttle, for that ſometimes he offred the Pope to oppoſe agaynſt the Frenchmen, not ſparing to enter openly into the cauſe, by ſending his bands of ſouldiors to ioyne with him, and waging for three monethes a great number of footemen, and the rather to accompany his doings with fayth & credit, he cauſed to be retyred his ſouldiors from the townes of Parma and Reggia, and lay incamped with his army vpon the ryuer of Trebia, leauing notwithſtanding certayne bands of his ſouldiours for the garde of Torrona and Alexandria, ſuche as had not ſtirred from thence: Sometimes alſo he did aſſure that he had receiued commaundement from his king, and that at the ſame time that he wrote to him of the truce, to leade backe the armie to the kingdome of Naples: But Ierome Vich Embaſſador reſident with the Pope, vſed other ſpeeches, and yet he agreed with him in this, that his king promiſed, ſo farreforth as the Pope would take vpon him the defence of Millan, to beginne the warre in Fraunce, without bearing reſpect to the truce that had bene made: A libertie whiche he ſayd he might lawfully take without making violation of his fayth promiſed. Therefore it was beleeued of many that the king Catholike, fearing that by the truce that had bene made not one woulde appeare to oppoſe agaynſt the Frenche king, had commaunded the Viceroy, that if he ſawe none woulde proceede roundly to the defence of the Duchie of Millan, that he ſhoulde not ſeeke to prouoke the Frenche king by newe iniuries, but ſhoulde retyre his armie to Naples: for whiche cauſe alſo he ſhewed to the king, a contentment to harken to the peace, offring withall to bring in Cæſar and the king of Englande: And to make him the more tractable if he ſhould recouer the Duchie of Millan, he made almoſte an aſſured promiſe that his armie ſhould be no impediment to him: So that the Viceroy who was determined to go his way, reuoked the ſouldiors that were vnder the Marquis of Peſquiero in Alexãdria and Torrona, and at the ſame time, as was ſayd, did communicate his reſolution to Triuulce, to thend his departing might be more acceptable to the French king: Neuertheleſſe he did not execute ſo ſpeedily his deuiſe, for that the Svvizzers very deſyrous to defende the Duchie of Millan, had ſente thither by common conſent fiue thousande footemen, and giuen hope to supplye the seruice with a greater number: But making demonstration of the contrary, he sent Prosper Colonno to debate with the Svvizzers of the place where they should assemble against the frēch, either that he had receiued aduertisement that the truce was discontenting to Cæsar, or els that he was enioyned by new cōmissions from his king to folow the will of the Pope, who perseuered still in the same perplexities, suffring a conflict betweene his small hope & his proper inclination: And yet notwithstanding the Svvizzers being come vpon the territories of Tortona, where Prosper had signified to them that the Viceroy would come & ioyne with them, interposing many excuses, he labored thē to come vpon the lands of Trebia to ioyne with him: By which maner of solicitation they finding a diuersitie betwene his will and his words, made this braue aunswere, that the Viceroy made no such demaund to thend to go looke thenemies in the face, but to turne their backs with greater surety: They saide they cared not whether he feared to fight with the frenchmē or not, neither did it import thē, whether he went away, or whether he taried stil, whether he folowed, or whether he fled, for that their vallour onely did suffice to defende the duchie of Millan agaynst all enemies.

But now was all the contrey in a mutinie, & the Count Mussocke sonne to Iohn Iacques was got into Ast without any impediment, & after into Alexandria, al those bāds of frenchmen which were parted frō Susa, marching with great diligence. The duke of Millan who was come somewhat to late to enter Alexandria, ioyned himself to the Svvizzers neare Tortona, and they being made to vnderstande by the Viceroy that he

" contrarie to all reason and confidence (that feare and fickleneſſe which they haue by nature beeing not hable to be assured by any order or discression:) for thinhabitantes of Millan at the first brute of the departing of the Viceroy, sent Embassadors to their Duke at Nouarro to excuse them, if hauing no habilitie nor meane of defence, they compounded with the French men, to thende to auoyde the extreame calamitie: He was tractable according to the condition of his present fortune, and with a minde humbled with the consideration of his miseries that were towards, he accepted willingly their excuse, recommending to them with words of great affection and zeale, to haue a charitable care ouer the safetie of the common countrey. Vpon this occasion Sacromoro Viscounto to whom was appoynted the besieging of the Castell of Millan, turned to the French, and reuittled the Castell which he was sente to batter and beate. The Viceroy brake vp from Trebia with all his armie, whiche was twelue hundred men at armes and eyght thousande footemen, to returne to the kingdome of Naples, as though the affayres of Lombardie had bene desperate: A reason onely wherein he soughte to saue his armie: But receyuing the same day in the way betweene Plaisanca and Florenzola letters from Rome, he caused immediatly the ensignes to marche backe agayne, returning to the same lodging from whence he was departed: The cause was, that the Pope, to whome almoste at the same tyme were rendred Plaisanca and Parma, determining to proue if the Duchie of Millan might be defended by the force of the Svvizzers, gaue very secretely to Ierome Moron the Dukes Embassador remayning in his Court, fortie two thousande duckettes to sende to the Svvizzers: but with this charge, that if the matter came to the knowledge of others, he should giue out, that twentie thousande of them were vppon the accompt of their pensions, and the other twentie two thousande to satisfie a pretended due to the three Cantons by his predecessor, but alwayes refused to be payed by him: This returning of the Viceroy with his armie, together with a brute of the descending of newe companies of the Svvizzers, made the Millanois eftsoones sorie for their sodaine reuolting and in that confusion betwene a newe hope and their olde feare, they gaue tokens to Maximilian Sforce their Duke, that they woulde bee readie to returne to his obedience, whensoeuer they saw the Svvizzers and the spanishe armie ioyne together in the field: And the more to nourrish them in these hopes, the Viceroy, with whom was Prosper Colonno, prepared to plant a bridge vppon Pavv, promising from time to time to passe ouer, but neuer did put it in effect, for that hauing a speciall care to saue his armie, he determined to proceede according as thinges fell out: He helde it very daungerous to haue the Frenchemen in his face, and the Venetian armie at his backe, who hauing alreadie taken the Citie of Cremona, and cast downe the bridge into the bottome of Pavv, were not farre from him: By this was Bartl. Aluiano gone from Susa to Venice: Where after he had in open councell without any contradiction, cast vppon the Count Petillano the fault of the ouerthrowe of Guiaradada, he spake very prowdlie of the present warre, and by the Senate was chosen Capteine generall of their armie with the same condicions vnder the which the Counte Petillano had bene preferred to the same degree: This estate and election happened to him much about the same time that foure yeares before he fell into the power of thenemies: so often doth fortune laugh at thignorance of mortall men deuising in their vaine fancies what shall happen vnto them: Assoone as he was chosen Generall, he went to tharmie that was mustering at S. Boniface vppon the demaines of Verona: Theodar Triuulce was with him as Liefetenaunt to the Frenche king, with whome he drewe neere in great diligence to the gates of Verona the selfe same day that the French armie parted from Susa: the reason of this expedicion was, that in that Citie certaine factions had conspired to receiue him in: But the day after, a strength of fiue hundred launceknightes entred the towne by the riuer of Adice, by which impediment together with the detection of the conspiracie Aluiano loasing all hope to preuaile determined, contrarie to thauthoritie of the Venetian assistant, to drawe towardes the riuer of Pavv, either to stoppe the Spanyards, or else according to the state and behauiour of thinges, to ioyne with the French armie: A resolution which he did not imparte to the Senate vntill he was gone from Verona one bayte, for that notwithstanding he alleaged that the whole depended vppon that which shoulde succeede in the Duchie of Millan, and that there the affaires of the Frenchemen being in ill condicion, whatsoeuer should be attempted or obteined in any other place woulde be but vaine and not durable, and therefore it was necessarie by all possible meanes, to helpe to make the Frenche king victorious: yet he feared (and not without cause) that the Senate woulde be against it, not so muche for the desire he had that there shoulde be first a care to recouer Verona and Bressia, as for that certeine other of the Capteines allowed not that they shoulde passe the riuer of Mincia, onlesse they had first a more particular knowledge of the proceedinges of the Frenche: wherein they shewed, in case of any inconuenience, howe hard it woulde be to retyre in safetie hauinge to passe by the confines of Verona and Mantua, contreys either subiected, or at the deuocion of Cæsar: Valeggia and the towne of Pesquiero fearinge the threates of Aluiano, yeelded them selues to him, by whose example also the castellkeeper gaue vp the rocke, his feare beeing greater then that any hope could assure him: onely he receiued by composition a ſmall ſumme of money aſwell for him ſelfe, as alſo to be ſhared amongeſt certayne launceknightes that were within it. About the ſame time certayne of the chieftains of the Mountayne, entred into Breſſia in fauor of the Venetians with a great ſtrength of peiſantes: And yet Aluiano, neither for the requeſtes of the Breſſian Embaſſadors which came to him to Gambaro, nor at the deſire of the Venetian Aſſiſtante, coulde not be brought to conſent to go thither and remayne there onely one day, to recouer the Caſtell that was kepte in the name of the Viceroy, ſo great was his deſire to followe without intermiſſion his firſte deliberation: With whiche celeritie beeing come to the gates of Cremona, he founde that at the ſame time Galeas Paluoiſin (called by certayne of Cremona) was entred in fauor of the Frenche king: But hauing in him no leſſe ambition then vallor, and not liking that any other ſhoulde participate with him in the glory of that action, he brake and put to pray his bandes of ſouldiors, and entring the towne he ſtripped Cæſar Fieramoſqua that was left there in garriſon with three hundred horſe and fiue hundred footemen of the Duke of Millans. He had not to loaſe time to recouer the Caſtell, for that it had bene alwayes holden by the French king, and newly reuitled a litle before by Ranſe de Cere: who as he returned to Crema where he was appoynted gouernour, he brake a trowpe of two hundred horſmen of Alexander Sforce, which he encoūtred at Serzana. From thence Aluiano encamping at the channell vpon Pavv with the bridge made to paſſe ouer, he could not let his ſouldiors to do inſolencies ſometimes vpon the landes of the Pope, his diſcipline not being hable to conteine the men who had as great cuſtome in ſpoyling as in well ſeruing. Afterwards he marched to Piſqueton, hauing already for the mutation of Cremona, Soncino, Lody, and other places thereaboutes, aduaunced the French enſignes: But affore, aſſone as he had recouered Cremona, he had ſent to Breſſia, Ranſe de Cero with one parte of the men of warre, both to aſſure that Citie, and to recouer the Caſtell, but muche more to hinder the good ſucceſſe of th Almains: for that almoſte aſſone as he was broken vp from before Cremona, Rocand capteine of the Launceknightes and Feder Gonſago de Boſſolo iſſuing out of Verona with ſix hundred horſe and two thouſande footemen, were gone to S. Boniface, where Aluiano had lefte vnder Sigiſmond Cauallo and Iohn Fortin, three hundred light horſemen and ſixe hundred footemen: and they beeing ſcattered in the countrey without all diſcipline and order, hearing of the comming of thenemies, were fledde to Colorguo, where the Launceknightes following them in chaſe, entred the towne by force, and committing all the ſouldiours to the calamitie of priſoners, they ſackte and burnte the towne. Afterwardes their furie redoubling with their fortune, they executed the lyke crueltie vppon Saouo, and brake downe the bridge whiche the Venetians had made ouer Adice: yea they had with the ſame rigour occupied Vincenſa, if a great ſtrength of peiſantes had not ſodaynely entred: Whiche maner of actions in that kynde of crueltie were ſo much the more feared, by howmuche the brute ranne, that there came to Verona newe ſupplies of footemen out of Tyroll.

About this time the Frenche Nauie conteining nyne light gallies and certayne other veſſels, drewe neare to Genes by ſea: And Antho. and Ierome brethren of the houſe of Adorna, approched by lande with the fauor of thoſe of the ryuers that helde their faction, with other bandes of ſouldiours that had bene leauyed with the kings money: This action was aduaunced with the benefite of a great occaſion, by reaſon of a diſcorde hapned a litle before betweene the Fieſquois and the duke of Genes, with whom they were at firſt confederate agaynſt the famulie of the Adornei: This was the manner of the accident: either for some quarrell that hapned by chaunce, or for some suspicion that could not be tempered, Ierom the sonne of Iohn Lovvys fiesquo, comming out of the common pallaice, was slaine by Lodovvyk and Fregosin, the Dukes brothers: for which iniurie, the violence being greater then their abilitie to reuenge, Othobon and Sinybald his brethren, retyring to their castells, and a litle after contracting with the french king and conspyring with the Adornes, approched neare to Genes by an other way with foure thowsand footemen. The Duke was not mighty enough of him selfe to make resistance against both the famulies of Fiesqua and Adorna ioyned together, and by the celeritie and diligence of his aduersaries, the succors which he had demaunded of the Viceroy, could not ariue in time: And as one aduersitie draweth on an other, and no euill comes vnaccompanied, so the thing that in this condicion of fortune, did wholly embase him, was, that a thowsand of his footemen who were possessed of the Mounteines neare the towne, were ouerthrowen, their weakenes beeing not able to resist the calamitie that his destinie did hasten on: In which aduersitie or persecution of fortune, the Duke together with Fregosin, hauing skarce leasure to saue his owne life, fled away by sea, leauing Lodovvyk his other brother to gard the castell: In which oportunitie the Victors entred Genes, where the brethren of the famulie of Fiesqua caried with furious desires of reuenge, murdred and cruelly caused to be drawne at a horse tayle Zachary the Dukes brother, who had bene taken in the encownter vpon the Mountaines, & was present with the others at the slaughter of their brother: And so Genes beeing reduced to the deuocion of the french king, Anth. Adorna was created gouernor in the name of the king, and as the french nauie by sea, reuittled the lanterne and afterwards sacked Spetia, and then roade at Portouenere: so there now remeyned no more but Nouaro and Como, to make perfect the kings conqueſt, & recouering of all those estates which he had lost the yeare before: only those two cities through the whole Duchie of Myllan, held out yet for Maxymylian Sforce.

But the glory of this warre was reserued to the great infamie of all others, not to the french men, not to th Almain footemen, not to the spanish regiments, nor to the Venetian bands: But it was an honor, a reputacion, a renowme, and perpetual praise prepared by destinie for the Svvyzzers onely, against whom the french armie, hauing first left sufficient garrison within Alexandria the better to assure those peeces that were beyond Pavv, drewe neare to Nauarro brauing in great arrogancie of so many happy successes, boasting of thennemies whom they had inclosed within the walls, and contemning the manifest feare of the Spanyards: Besides, there seemed to present to the memorie of men, as it were an image and representacion of thinges that had bene passed: That that was the same Nouarro wherein Lodovvyk Sforce father to the Duke raigning, was made prisoner: That in the french campe were the same leaders, Trymouille, and Tryuulco: yea certeine of the same enseignes and Capteines of those Cantons which in an other warre had solde the father, did nowe accompany the sonne in this warre: This made Monsr Trymouille write proudly to the king that he would sende to him prisoner, the sonne from the same place where he had deliuered into captiuitie the father: The french men did violent execucions vpon the walls of Nauarro with their artillerie, but in a place of no lesse difficultie then daunger to discend into the towne, And for the Svvyzzers, they contemned them so much and showed to haue so litle feare of their vallours, that they would neuer suffer to be shut that gate of the towne that was towardes the campe: After thartillerie had beaten downe to the earth, a sufficient space of the wall, the armie without prepared furiously to thassalt, but finding so valiant resistance within, and vnderstanding they did presently exspect Altosaszo a Capteine of greate renowme with a farre greater supply, they doubted of the successe of thenterprise, which made them the day following to retyre from the wals of Nouarro two myles, hoping afterwards to cary the victorie more by the disorders and wants of thennemies, then by the fortune or furie of their armes: They hoped to doe more by temporising then by present action, and looked that other accidents would make easie the enterprise which was almost desperat to their vallour: But these hopes were made vaine by the resolute minde of Motyn one of the Svvyzzer Capteines, who calling together all the bands of souldiours vppon the market place of Nouarro, encouraged them with wordes full of resolucion, and assurance, that without tarying for the succours of Altosaszo who was to arriue the day following, they should yssue out and set vppon their enemies in their campe: he told them howe farre it was contrary to their honor, and reputacion of their vallour to suffer the glory and victory which they might appropriat to them selues, to become common, or rather wholly transferred to an other: seeing (sayth he) that as things that follow drawe with them such as goe afore, and thencreasing of any thing couetreth the part that is augmented, so the merit and praise of this warre would not be cast vppon vs, but vppon the supplies that came after: By how much the enterprise may seeme hard and perillous by so much the yssue is to be considered more easie and sure, for that the more suddeine and vnexspected are accidents, the more doe they terrifie and amaze the men that suffer them: The french men will rather doubt all other thinges at this hower then to be charged by vs, and yet where they lye incamped, they can not but suffer disorder, the place being neither intrenched nor fortefied: The french men were neuer wont to haue the courage to goe to battell if their armies were not full of our men, And though of late they haue aduentured to fight without vs, yet they were neuer so hardy once to lift vp their weapons against vs: So that it can not but bringe to them great astonishment when they see them charged vppon the suddeine, aboue exspectacion, in a time of their feare, and by those bodies whose vertue and resolucion were wont to encourage and assure them: Stand not amazed with the multitude of their horsemen, nor the furie of their artillerie, since we haue had many experiences, what confidence they reappose in those thinges against vs: it is but two yeares sithens Gaston de Foix so braue a Capteine, notwithstanding he was stronge in multitudes of launces and cannons, gaue place to our armes and suffered vs to passe by him along the plaines euen to the gates of Myllan, and yet we were not otherwayes armed then with pykes: They haue nowe with them many bandes and companies of launceknightes, A matter that doth so much the more encourage me to thenterprise, by how much fortune doth offer vs at one time an occasion both to showe to him who with so great couetousnes and with so great ingratitude hath contemned our trauells and our blud, that he neuer made a worse resolucion either for the honor of him selfe, or profit of his Realme: And also to declare to those that thinke that themployment & seruice of their persons, is sufficient to make vs perish of hunger, that the launceknightes are not equall to the Svvyzzers, and albeit they beare with vs one language and forme of discipline, yet they haue neither the same vallour nor the same resolucion: The prayse they beare for seruice is lesse by their proper merit, then for their naturall vertue, more by the name of their nation and Auncestors, then by any experience of their owne bodies, not so much in deede and substance, as in reapport and opinion, not equall to the show they make, and farre inferior riour to the vniuerſall coniecture, yea they are but ſhadowes whoſe bodies be farre of: all their perill is to winne their artillerie, and yet in the action you haue theſe comfortes, that it is not planted in a place fortified, that our inuaſion is ſodayne, and to thenterpriſe beareth a ſpeciall fauor the darkneſſe of the night: And whyleſt we are at the feight there can domage vs but a very ſmall ſpace of time, which yet can not but be cut off with the tumult, with their diſorders, with their feares, and with the ſodayne confuſion of things. Touching the reſidue, this brings facilitie to the action, that neither their horſemen dare venture vpon our pykes, nor their vyle trowpes of French footemen and Gaſcons, will enter the skirmiſhe with vs. This is the counſell, this is the plot, and this is the enterpriſe, wherein we ſhall make no leſſe proofe of our wiſedomes and gouernment, then of our vallour and reſolution. Our nation beareth that reputation and fame, that the glory of our name can not be preſerued, but by attempting ſome matter beyonde the exſpectation and common vſage of all men: And ſince we are vpon the territories of Nouarro, the place it ſelfe ſpeakes to vs, that in other ſorte we can not quenche the auncient infamie we gotte here in the paye and ſeruice of Lodovvike Sforce: It is a double honor to be reuenged of infamie. It is a vyle infirmitie in a man of warre, to ſuffer the reparation of honor to be more ſlowe then the infamie, and to refuſe to recouer the reputation loſt, is to be guyltie of the ſlaunder and to confirme it: A diſpoſition moſte baſe in the minde of a ſouldiour, who of all other ſortes of men ought to be moſt ielouſe of his honour. Let vs go on then in the name of the great God, the perſecuter of ſchiſmatikes, excommunicantes, and all enemies to his name: Let vs marche on to a victorie no leſſe eaſie then aſſured, if we haue not mindes to feare the thing we haue not proued: And by howe muche the daunger ſeemeth great, by ſo muche ſhall our name be made glorious, and the greater our enemies be in number, the more ſhall we be enriched by their ſpoyles: Things got with moſte difficultie are of moſte merite, and where is hope of honor, pray, and perpetuall prayſe, what can be wanting to prouoke ſuche as you are to the feight.

At theſe ſpeches of Motin all the bands of ſouldiours began to reioyce, euery one approuing his deuiſe by holding vp his hande: he commaunded them to go to reſt, and to cheriſhe ſomewhat their perſons, the better to fall into araye when the drum ſhould ſtrike. The nation of Svvizzers neuer made a more braue, nor more reſolute counſell, beeing but a fewe in number, without horſemen, and without artilleries, agaynſt an armie moſte mightie in men, munitions, horſes, and all other things meete for defence: Beſides, they ſtoode not deſperate for anye neceſſitie, for that both Nouarro was deliuered from daunger, and they exſpected the daye after a great ſtrength of ſouldiors: They made rather a choyſe of this waye wherein the ſurety was leſſe, and the hope of glory greater, then any other, that for a greater ſafetie there might happen to them a leſſe glory. The ſixte day of Iune about midnight they iſſued out of Nouarro, bearing mindes leſſe affected to ſafetie then to glorie: their whole ſtrength was about ten thouſande men, who were ſo diſtributed and diſpoſed, that ſeuen thouſand were appoynted to charge thartillerie which was garded by the Launceknightes, the reſidue were to be beſtowed with their pikes an end vpright oueragaynſt the men at armes. The Frenchmen, what for the ſhortneſſe of the tyme, or that they doubted no ſuche accident, or at leaſt looked not for it ſo ſoone, had made no fortification of their campe: And albeit at the firſt tumult and alarme that their ſentinell made of the comming of thenemies, the ſodenneſſe of the aduenture, and the darkneſſe of the night, brought vpon them a great feare and confusion: yet both the men at armes drewe forthwith into strength, and presented them selues in battelray, and also the Launceknightes who were followed with the other bands of footemen, fell presently into order: The artillerie shotte off with great noyse agaynst those squadrons of Svvizzers that came to assayle it, making lamentable slaughters, and deuiding their places and rankes, which was rather discerned by the cryings of men, then by the benefite of the eyes, the vse whereof was taken away by the darkenesse of the night: Neuertheleſſe, suche was their desperate resolution, that neither respecting their death present, nor discouraged with the slaughter of their felowes slayne at their feete, and for all these daungers not once breaking their order, they ranne as faste as they coulde vpon thartillerie: and being come to it, the launceknightes and they had together a bloudy medley, the one fighting agaynst the other with an vnappeasable furie, which in them both was so muche the more redoubled, by howmuche in the one was infinite the humor of hate, and in the other no lesse resolute the desire of glory. There might haue bene seene (for nowe the sunne began to showe) the estate and diuersitie of the feight, sometimes one side to yeelde, sometimes the other: oftentimes that part to seeme to preuayle which earst was thought to haue the worst: on one side, and in one time the one battell to swaigh, and the other to aduaunce, some to exspect aduauntage, some to lose no oportunitie, one parte to inuade furiously, and an other parte to resiste hardly: all things on all partes full of dead bodies, wounded men, and of blood: sometimes the capteines would valiauntly enter into thoffice of souldiours, bothe striking their enemies and defending them selues, and sometimes they woulde discretly manage the place of capteines, encouraging, prouiding, succoring, releuing, and commaunding: there was nothing lesse feared then death, nor any thing more abhorred then feare: the greatnes of the perill made both sides more resolute then any other thing: On the other side the trowpes of men at armes stoode firme without doing any seruice, for neither the authoritie, the perswasions, the commaundementes, thexclamations, the threatnings, nor the example of Triuulco and Trimouillo, could do any thing to moue the horsemen, whose mindes were already made tymerous: Neither the consideration of their owne perill, (whiche their cowardise made the greater) nor the calamities of their fellowes (which were redoubled by the feare they showed) could once drawe them to the charge: They seemed to stande and abide the daunger which by fighting they might haue auoyded: It sufficed the Svvizzers to keepe them impaled in their rankes, and to let them from ministring succours to the footemen: Suche was the calamitie of that feight, that those found moste certentie of perill who ventured furtheſt for their safetie, and on such whose feare was greater then their vallour, fortune threwe moste fauour and securitie: At laste in so great a hardinesse and vallour of such as fought, the vertue of the Svvizzers caryed the battell, who hauing wonne thartilleries, turned them vppon their enemies, whom they put to flight aswell by that meane as by their incredible vertue: To the flying of the footemen was ioyned the breaking and running away of the men at armes, who in that seruice shewed no vertue, nor did any thing worthy of merite or prayse: onely the lorde Robert la Marche caryed with a vehement affection of a father, entred the battell of the Svvizzers with a squadron of horsemen, to reskew Florango and Iames his sonnes, capteines of Almain footemen, who lying sore wounded on the earth, his vallour to the great wonder of the Svvizzers, drewe them on liue out of that daunger: The battell continued about two howres, bothe parties receiuing no small discomfiture. There was slayne of the Svvizzers about fifteene fiueteene hundred bodies, of which number was that Capteine Motyn that was the first mouer of that glorious councell: his deathes wounde was by a thrust of a pyke thorow the throate: But farre greater was the slaughter of thennemies, of whome some say were left dead ten thowsand carkasses: The most part of the launceknights died in fighting, and the greatest execucion and slaughter on the french and Gascon footemen, was in fleeing: Almost all the horsemen went away in sauetie, the chasse being so swift that the Svvyzzers were not able to followe them: if the Svvyzzers had had horsemen, they had made their calamitie equall with the footemen; their feare beeing greater and their disorder nothing inferior: All the baggage and stuffe became a pray to the Victors, with xxij peeces of great artillerie and all the horses assigned for the seruice of the same: The same day the Svvyzzers returned into Nauarro almost triumphantly, but with such reputacion and renowme thorow out the world, that what with the consideracion of the magnanimitie of their enterprise, the euident reiecting and despising of death, the resolucion they showed in the fight, & the happy and honorable victorie of the same, there were some that durst preferre this action, almost affore all the enterprises worthy of memorie which we read set downe vpon the Greekes and Romains: The french men fled into Pyedomont, from whence Tryuulco lost time to cry after them, their feare being swifter in fleeing then his force able to follow them.

Vpon the reaport of this victorie Myllan with all the other places that were declared for the french, humbled them selues and sent to demaund pardon, which accordingly was graunted to them vppon bondes and condicions to disburse a great porcion of money: Thinhabitants of Myllan were taxed at two hundred thousand duckats, and euery particular of the others rated according to his behauior: The whole taxacion was giuen to the Svvyzzers, to whom ought iustly to be transferred aswell the gaine as the glorie of the victorie gotte with their vallour and with their blud: And as men whose felicitie made them to accompt it to good equitie to draw all the frute they could, they entred afterwards into the Marquisdom of Montferrat and Pyedmont, contreyes which they charged to haue receiued the french armie: There, partly by pillage, and partly by raunsoming the poore peoples, they raysed a great gaine, forbearing notwithstanding to touche either the life or honor of persons: The Spanyards also were not altogether depriued of the profits of the victorie for that Ianus lastly chassed out of Genes, and Octauian Fregoso (both which aspyred to be Duke) being retyred to the Viceroy after the battell, the Viceroy preferring Octauian, for whom the Pope did what he could in regard of their auncient amity, and withall receiuing his promise to paye him l. thowsand duckatts when he should be possessed of Genes, he deliuered him three thowsand footemen vnder the Marquis of Pisquiero, and for his owne part, went with the residue of tharmie to Chiesteggio, making semblance to passe further if neede required: As the Marquis and Octauian drewe neare to Genes, the brethren of the famulie of Adorno, knowing their owne weakenes abandoned the towne without any triall of resistance: And immediatly entred Octauian and was created duke of that citie which in the course of a yere had for gouernors the french men, Ianus Fregoso, the Adorney, and Octauian. Bartlemevv Aluiano hearing of the ouerthrowe giuen to the french armie, and fearing least he should be also put to the chasse by the Spanyards, retyred with speede to Pontvvicquo leauing in the way (for losing of time) certeine peeces of artillerie whose inconueniencie and slownes of cariage might haue bene an impediment to the expedicion of his marching: from thence he sent Ranso de Cere vnto Crema, And after he had abandoned Breſsia he wente to Tomba neare to Adice, neuer reaposing in any place longer then the neceſſitie to refreſhe his men and horſes, did conſtraine him: The reaſon of his abandoning Breſsia & diſpoſing Ranſa de Cere in Crema, was, for that he held it a matter very vnprofitable to diminiſhe tharmie wherein were remeining ſix hundred men at armes, a thowſand light horſemen, and fiue thowſande footemen: he marched with the ſame celeritie that he retyred to Pontvvicqua, and had ſo great feare and disfauor of the contrey, that the leaſt companies that had followed them might haue ſufficed to haue diſordered and broken them: When he ſaw that both feare and perill ceaſſed, ſince no man followed him, he ſtayed at Tomba, where he gaue order to be conueyed to Padoa and to Treuiſa, the greateſt prouiſion of vittells that he could draw from the territories of Verona: And at the ſame time he ſent to Leguague with lx. men at armes and twelue hundred footemen, Iohn Pavvle Baillon, who, being immediatly receiued by thinhabitantes of the towne where was no garriſon, gaue aſſault to the rocke which was garded by a hundred & fifty footmen, parte Spaniſh and parte launceknightes: he firſt did execution vpon it with thartillerie battering that place that had his proſpect towardes the greene: In this aſſault it may be a queſtion which had more force, vallour or fortune, for that during the feight, the fire by aduenture faſtning vppon the munitions by meane of certeine inſtrumentes of artificiall fiers throwen by thoſe that were without, part of the rocke was burned: In which tumult the footmen that gaue thaſſault being entred ſome at the breach, & ſome by ladders, killed & tooke priſoners ſo many as they found within, their Capteine that was a Spaniard falling with much a doe into the fortune of a priſoner: After thenterpriſe of Leguague, Aluiano cauſed to builde a bridge vppon Adice, and afterwardes certeine inhabitantes of Verona giuing him hope that they woulde mutine againſt th Almaines, he went to incampe at the village of S. Iohn a quarter of a mile from Verona: And from thence the morning following drawing neare to the gate called S. Maximo, he planted his artilleries with great furie againſt the tower of the gate and the wall ioyning to it, exſpecting in the meane while if there would riſe any tumult in the towne: And after he had brought downe to the earth about fortie faddom of the wall, beſides the tower, whoſe fall was ſuch that the ruines ſerued for a very ſtrong rampier to the gate, he gaue a very hotte and furious aſſault: But there were within Verona three hundred horſemen & three thowſande launceknightes vnder Rocandolphe a Capteine much eſteemed, by whom was made a valliant defenſe: beſides, the breach was verie high on the townes ſide which made the diſcending vneaſie, and laſtly they of Verona ſtirred not according to the hopes that were giuen: So that Aluiano ſeeing what difficulties reſiſted his victorie, retyred his footemen: from before the walls, and beganne alſo to withdraw thartillerie: When chaunging councell in a moment, and, as was ſuppoſed, by a certeine meſſage which he receiued from the towne, he returned immediatly his footemen to the walls, & recontinued thaſſault with a greater furie then before: But he found the former difficulties redoubled, & the faction that had called him, ſo terrified and wearied, that hauing loſt at thaſſault more then two hundred of his people of whom Tho. Fabro of Rauenna Mariſhal of his footemen was one, he began to diſpaire wholly of the victorie, and retyring with great diligence his artillerie, he returned the ſame day to the lodging from whence he was departed the morning: That day he was nothing eſteemed either for his councel or for the iſſue of the ſame, only his celeritie was renowmed thorow out Italie, for that in one day he had done that, which hardly other Capteines are wont to doe in three or foure: After all this he gaue the ſpoyle to the countrey, prouing by that feare to conſtrayne thinhabitantes of Verona to come to ſome accorde. But by this did the Spaniſhe armie marche and come on, for that the Viceroy after he heard of the loſſe of Leguague, fearing leaſt by the yll diſpoſition of the towneſmen, Verona would ſet open her gates to the Venetians, determined to giue preſent ſuccours to the actions of Cæſar: wherein he had nowe no impediment, nor was not reteyned ſince the affayres of Genes had happily ſucceded. Therefore after he had paſſed without difficultie the ryuer of Pavo at Stradella, and that the cities of Bergama and Breſcia were rendred to him without reſiſtance together with the towne of Peſquiera, he encamped before the caſtell that was manned with two hundred & fifty footmen: This peece, notwithſtanding by cõmon opinion might haue holden out yet certaine daies, came by force into his power, the Venetiã ruler being made priſoner and all the reſidue of the footemen that were not ſlaine at the aſſault: for that the Spaniards approched, Aluiano retyred to Albero to the other ſide of Adice, and called to refurniſhe his army, ſuche numbers as he could, not onely certaine bands of footmen which were at Poliſena Rouigna, but alſo euen thoſe regiments whom he had left within Leguaguo. A litle after the launceknightes ioyned at S. Martin with the Viceroy, who alſo after the recouery of Leguagua went to Montagnana: And the Venetians who held no more in that quarter but Padoa and Treuiſa, caring for no other thing then the preſeruation of thoſe cities, ordeined that the army ſhould be diſtributed in them, & that Io. P. Baillon, with whõ were Malateſta Sogliano and the knight la Volpe, ſhould be beſtowed in Treuiſa with two hundred mẽ at armes three hundred light horſmen, & two thouſand footmen, Aluiano remaining in Padoa with the reſidue of the army. There, in conſidering the fortifications and ſtate of the baſtillions, & giuing perfectiõ to many things that were vnperfect, he cauſed to diſmantell & raze vp all the houſes and cut downe all the trees that were within three miles about Padoa, to make more hard & daungerous thapproch of thenemies, and to giue to their ſeruice neceſſitie of multitudes of laborers and poyners.

But whileſt the matters of warre proceeded in this ſorte, the Pope trauelled with great induſtry to weede out of the Church the diuiſion brought in by the coũcell of Piſa: A matter as it wholly depended vpon the will of the French king, ſo he labored to appaiſe him by manỹ meanes: He aſſured the king that touching the rumor that ranne that he had ſent money to the Svvizzers, it was a falſe brute ſuborned by men of litle fidelity, ſince he referred him ſelfe to all his actions, wherin he had expreſſed to deſire nothing more then an vniuerſal peace, & to be the cõmon father of al princes chriſtned: And he alleaged how greeuous it was to him that his diſſention with the church, depriued him of al meanes to know how naturally he was inclined to his amity, ſeing that for the honor of the ſea apoſtolike, & the dignitie of his perſon, he was cõſtrained to procede with him ſeuerally, vntill by his returning to the obediẽce of the church of Rome, it were lawful for him to receiue him as king moſt chriſtian, & embraſe him as the eldeſt ſonne of the church. The king alſo for the regard of his affaires, deſired the vniõ of his kingdom with the church, the ſame being alſo demaũded by al his peoples, & the queene no leſſe concurrant then the reſidue: it was well diſcerned by the king & his coũcell that there could be no hope of alliance with the Pope in matters tẽporal, if firſt they fell not to agreement for controuerſies ſpiritual: for which cauſe either truſting in dede, or at leaſt diſſẽbling vnder ſhowes & ſeming to giue faith to his words, he ſent to him as embaſſador to negociate in theſe cauſes the Biſhop of Marſeilles: at whoſe cõming the Pope by decree of the councell reinueſted the Biſhops and Prelates of Fraunce with power to purge thẽſelues of their contumacie during the whole moneth of Nouember. Agaynſt theſe Cleargie men his predeceſſor had proceeded rigorouſly by waye of threatning as agaynſt perſons guyltie of ſchiſme: And the ſame moarning wherein this decree was determined, there was read in the councell a writing ſubſcribed by Bernar.Caruiagall and Feder.S. Seuerin, wherin forbearing to name themſelues Cardinals, they approued al the acts of the councel of Latran, & promiſed to cleaue to the ſame & obey the Pope. In this action conſequently they confeſſed themſelues to be lawfully depriued of the eſtate of Cardinals, which priuation being done by Pope Iulio, had bin in his life time confirmed by the ſame councell. It had bene debated afore in the conſiſtorie to haue them reſtored, but the reſolution was afterwards deferred for thimpedimēt of thembaſſadors of Cæſar and the king of Aragon, together with the Cardinalls of Sion and Yorke, who alleaged that it was a matter vnworthy the maieſtie of the ſea Apoſtolike and of very ill example to pardon the authors of ſo great wickedneſſe accompanied with manifeſt abhomination & impietie: A matter which the laſte Pope had conſtantly mainteined againſt them euen to the laſt moment of his life, and that for no other cauſe then for the publike benefite. But the Pope raigning inclined to that ſide that was leaſt rigorous, iudging it more eaſy and worthy to quenche altogether the name of the councell of Piſa, rather with clemencie then with ſeueritie: Beſides, he would not ſtirre vp the minde of the French king, who was a diligent interceſſor for them: neither was he caryed agaynſt them by any particuler hatred, for that neither was the iniurie done to him, neither before his pontificacie he nor his brethren had bene great friendes to Federike: for which reaſons, of his owne motion he cauſed to be read before the fathers of the councell the writing of their humiliation, and aſſigned a day for their reſtoring, which was done in this maner: Bernar. and Feder. entred ſecretly into Rome by night without eyther habite or ceremonies of Cardinalls, and the moarning folowing being to preſent themſelues before the Pope ſitting in full conſiſtory with the preſence of all the Cardinals, except the Svvizzer and the Engliſh, who refuſed to aſſiſt the action: They firſt paſſed apparelled as ſimple prieſtes, with blacke bonnets on their heades through all the publike places of the pallace of Vatican, where they had lodged: A wonderfull concourſe & preſſe of people flocked to ſee them, euery one iudging that a puniſhment ſo honorable did ſerue as a cruell torment for the vnruled pride of Bernardin, and no leſſe for the vnſtayed arrogancie of Federike. Aſſone as they were admitted into the preſence of the conſiſtorie, they fell downe of their knees, and with many ſignes of great humilitie they demaunded pardon of the Pope and the Cardinalls: They approued all thinges that had bene done by Pope Iulio, and namely their priuation and thelection of the newe Pope, as an act cannonical: And they publikely reproued the councel of Piſa to be an aſſembly ſchiſmatike & deteſtable. When this confeſſion was ſubſigned with their hands & ſolemnly enregiſtred, they roſe vp & ſtoode on their fete, & after reuerence done, they embraſed all the cardinalls who ſtirred not out of their ſeates: then they were reinueſted & apparelled in the habite of Cardinalls, & receiued by the reſidue to ſit in the ſame order wherin they were wont to ſit before their priuation: They recouered only by this act the dignitie of Cardinalls, and not their benefices and other reuenues which they had poſſeſſed, for that long time before they had bin diſtributed to others by the liberty of vacation. In this act the Pope ſatisfied the French king, if not ſo muche as he deſired, at leaſt in parte of that he exſpected: But he ſatisfied him nothing in other matters, for that he ſought by all the wayes he could to accord Cæſar and the Venetians, A matter which ſeemed to him of eaſie action for the accidents that were hapned: for it was beleeued that Cæſar ſtirred vp by thoccaſions beyonde the Mountes, would be brought to be contented to be diſcharged of ſuche a burden, to haue the more oportunitie to harkē to the recouering of Burgondy for his nephew. And touching the Venetians, it was hoped that they would much more deſire it, aſwel for that they ſtood amaſed with the ouerthrow of the frenchmen, as alſo that they knew that the french king for the many dangers hanging ouer his realme, was not hable for that yere to do any more to thaffaires of Italie: Beſides, they ſawe faſt vpon them the Spaniſh armie, wherevnto were to be vnited the companies that were within Verona: They were made drye of money and treaſor, yll furniſhed of ſouldiors and namely of footemen: and (which was not leaſt in their conſideration) they were to reſiſt all alone of themſelues without any hope or ſhowe of other ſuccors: And yet the Senate anſwered very conſtantly, that they would not harken to any accorde, vnleſſe they were repoſſeſſed of Vincenſa ane Verona.

Cæſar at that time demaunded of the Pope two hundred men at armes againſt the Venetians: A demaund which albeit was greeuous to the Pope, both for feare leaſt the french king ſhould be diſcontented, and alſo he ſawe how inconuenient it would be for Cæſar & him to become ſuſpected to the Venetians for a matter of ſo ſmall importance: yet by the obſtinate importunitie of Cæſar, he ſent him vnder Troyllo Sanello, Achilles Torello, and Mutio Colonno, the numbers he required, bothe for that by refuſing he would not ſhow any token not to perſeuer in the confederation contracted with the laſte Pope, and alſo he conſidered he was not holden by any bonde or obligation that he had with the Venetians: who beſides that their armie did almoſte expreſſe behauiours of hoſtilitie vpon the landes of Parma & Plaiſantin, at ſuch time as Aluiano laye neare to Cremona, yet they had not elected Embaſſadors to proteſt their obedience to him according to their cuſtome, vntill the Frenche men beeing ouerthrowen, were returned beyonde the Mountes. This deliberation brought no litle amaſe to the Venetians, not ſo much for thimportance of ſuch a ſuccour, as for feare leaſt by this beginning the Pope woulde paſſe further, taking it for a manifeſt ſigne that he would neuer be ſeperate from their enemies. Neuertheleſſe all theſe daungers & ſhowes of calamities could not make them chaunge their firſt counſels, but ſtanding reſolute to make as good head as they could againſt fortune, they ſent to their Admirall that was at Corfu to aſſemble his nauie, & aſſayle the marine places of Pouuilla. And yet conſidering a litle after, of what importance it would be to prouoke ſo much the king of Aragon, they reuoked that councel being more coragious then diſcrete, no leſſe for the might and power of the ſame king, then for that he had alwayes ſhowed that he perſwaded Cæſar to peace.

The Viceroy remained at Mōtagnano, hauing as yet determined vpō nothing of that he had to do, both for that the conceptions of the launceknights were diuerſe, and very hard the enterpriſes that remained to be attēpted eyther of Padoa or of Treuiſa, and the forces farre inferior to the difficulties: for in the armie there was litle more then a thouſande men at armes, not many light horſemen, and onely ten thouſande footemen aſwell Spaniſh as launceknights: And laſtly there was exſpectation of the comming of the Biſhop of Gurce, vpon whoſe will & direction depended reſolutely all things. About this time a Spaniſh magiſtrate being in Bergamo to gather the impoſt of xxv. thouſand duckets taxed vpon that citie at ſuch time as it was rendred to the Viceroy, Ranſo de Cero ſent thither from Cremo one part of the ſouldiors, who entring by night by the helpe of certayne conſpirators of the towne, tooke the Spaniard with all the money he had leauyed, and returned afterwarde to Crema.

There was discerned about this tyme a preparation to newe troubles in the state of Genes, beeing conformable in that plot the wills of the Duke of Millan and the Svvizzers, to whom Antho. and Ierome Adorno had recourse: They declared to the Duke the affinitie and dependencie which their fathers had had with Lodovvike his father: That by the ayde of their famuly he had recouered and many yeres holden in peace the principalitie of Genes, from the whiche he had bene fraudulently deuested by the Dukes Fregoso: That the famulie of the Adornei had participated with the aduersities and fortunes of the Sforceis, for that at the same time that Lodovvike loste the duchie of Millan the Adornei were chased out of Genes: And therfore they perswaded that it was conuenient that they should likewise communicate in the returne of good hap & fortune, seeing the same affection & the same faith continued: That they ought not to be charged by imputation, if being not so muche as harde in any one place, but abandoned of all hope, their necessitie & their goodwill had dryuen them to haue recourse to that king, by whom they had bene chased & expulsed before: That on the other side he was to remember the auncient hatred of the Fregosei, and howe many iniuries and practises had bene wrought agaynst his father by Baptista and the Cardinall Fregosa, dukes of Genes successiuely: and lastly he was to consider how farre he was to trust Octauian Fregosa, who, besides the auncient hatred he bare, refused to haue a superiour in that gouernment. To the Svvizzers they recommended the profite, the surety, & the honor that they might reape by thenterprise: that if by their meane they were eftsones restored to their countrey, they would pay a summe of money equall to that which Octaui. Fregosa payed to the Spaniards: that as by their vertue the duchy of Millan had bin preserued, so to them apperteined in honor the protection & defence of the thing they had gotten by their vallor: wherin they were to cõsider what a matter it would be contrary to the surety of that state, that Genes a citie of so neare neighborhood & importance, should obey a duke that depended wholly vpon the king of Aragon: That it were an action vnworthy their name & their glory, to suffer Genes (the frute of the victory of Nouarro) to fall to the share and profite of the Spaniards, who whylest the Svvizzers with so great vallour ranne their bodies vpon the thundring shot of the Frenche, were with more ease then daunger vpon Trebia, watching as it were the issue of the battell to robbe & vsurpe by suttletie the rewards of the victorie gotten with the blood of others. Vpon these complaints accõpanied with other reasons of cõpassion, the duke caused his cõpanies to march, & the Svvizzers aduanced foure thousand footmen: but what with the threates of the Viceroy against the Duke, and the authority of the Pope with the Svvizzers, the enterprise ceassed euẽ assone as it was begõ, thaffectiõ that the Pope bare to thaffaires of Octauian, doing more to dashe the expedition then any other thing. In this meane while the Viceroy went vp to Battell, a place about seuẽ miles frõ Padoa, where Caruigial riding vndiscretly with a small strength of horsmen to view the seate of the contrey, was taken by Mercario capteine of the Venetian light horsmẽ. About which time the bishop of Gurcy arriuing in the army, they drew to cõsultation what was to be done: The Bishop gaue coũsel to besiege Padoa, saying he hoped so much in the vertue of the Spaniards & launceknights against the Italiãs, that in the end they should be able to ouercome al difficulties: he said it was a matter of lesse labor to take Treuisa, but the honor & rewards of the victory were far differẽt, for that to win only Treuisa was not of much importãce for the substance of the war, but by the taking of Padoa, both the townes & peces of Cæsars obediẽce should stand assured frõ troubles & perils of the warre, & the Venetians should be lefte depriued of all hope to bee hable to reconquer the places they had loſte. The Viceroye and almoſt all the other capteines were of a contrary opinion: they iudged it rather impoſſible then hard to force Padoa for the incredible fortifications: it was throwly furniſhed with artilleries & all things neceſſary for defence: it was double manned with ſouldiors, beſides many yongmen of the nobilitie of Venice that were come thither as they had wõt to do at other times: they alleaged that the circuit of Padoa was large, in which regard, as alſo for the multitude of the defendãts & other difficulties, it required to be enuironed with a ſiege of two armies: a computation ſo farre from them, that they were not hable to make one ſufficient, the number of their ſouldiors being not great, and yet no ſigne of readynes in the Launceknightes, for that they murmured already for want of pay: Laſtly, they had not ſufficient munitions, & no leſſe want of poyeners, a prouiſion very neceſſary for an enterpriſe of that difficulty. But in the ende the reaſons of the Viceroy and the other capteines gaue place to the authoritie and will of the Biſhop of Gurce, according to whoſe direction the armie drawing neare to Padoa, encamped at Baſſanella vpon the right ſhoare of the channell: But beeing ſubiect there to the affliction of certayne double cannons that laye planted vpon the baſtillion of the towne, they paſſed the channell and lodged a little further from the towne, from whence ſending certayne bands of footmen to S. Anthonies Church within halfe a myle of Padoa, they began to approch with leſſe daunger, and to caſt trenches neare to S. Anthonies gate: but for that the worke was great, and the wante of pyoners no leſſe, and in a countrey abandoned of all inhabitantes, the trenches aduaunced little, and not without daunger, for that the ſouldiors making many ſodain ſallies aſwell by day as by night, gaue great domage and impediment to thoſe that trauelled: They ſuffred beſides great want of vittells, both for that only a ſmal part of the towne was inuironed by thenemies, & alſo the eſtradiots that had libertie to iſſue out of the other quarters of the towne, ouerronning freely the whole contrey, gaue impedimẽt to al that was brought to the camp: The traffike of vittels was alſo hindred by certaine armed barkes which the Venetians had ſet for that purpoſe vpon the ryuer of Adice, for that the men that they caryed ceaſſed not to make incurſions into the vplande and playne countrey, skouring all places and reſpected nothing in the furie of their ſpoyle: In regard of theſe difficulties, theſtate of things beeing eftſones brought into the counſell by the Viceroy, euery one gaue this free iudgement, that it would be a leſſe infamie to correct the deliberation vndiſcretly made in leauying the campe, then by iuſtifying the error to breede & bring vpon them ſome greater domage, & that not without the ſocietie of a farre greater ſhame. This opinion beeing related to the Biſhop of Gurce by the Viceroy in the preſence of many capteines, for that he had refuſed to be at that councell: he made aunſwere, that for that the diſcipline and practiſe of warre was not his profeſſion, it was no ſhame to him to confeſſe his ignoraunce in the ſeruice & guyding of warre: only touching the coũſell he had giuen to pitch the camp afore Padoa, it moued not by any ſingularitie of credit in his owne wiſdom, but in the action he was caryed by the opinion & authoritie of the Viceroy, who both by letters & expreſſe meſſengers had counſelled themperour, and giuen him great hope to cary it. At laſte the difficulties not ceaſſing neither for their complaintes, nor for their debating, no rather the diſpayre of thenterpriſe daily increaſing, the camp brake vp after it had lien xviij. dayes afore the walles of Padoa: And hauing both at their breaking vp, and vpon the way, the light horſemen at their backes, they withdrew to Vincenſa, which then was voyde of inhabitantes, and lay as a pray to who was maſter of the fielde.

Padoa beſieged by the Viceroy.

In this meane while the ſouldiors of the duke of Millan, to whoſe ayde the Viceroy had ſent Antho. de Leue with a thouſande footmen, tooke Pantovviquo, wherin were two hundred footemen in garriſon for the Venetians, who neither amaſed with the thunder of thartilleries, nor diſcoraged with the mynes that were made, were conſtrayned at the ende of a moneth to yelde for want of vittels, after they had valiauntly ſuſteined thaſſault. About the ſame time Ranſo de Cero iſſuing out of Cremo ouerthrewe Siluio Sauello marching with his bandes and foure hundred Spaniſhe footemen to Bergamo, whither the Duke of Millan ſent him. And a little after a Spaniſhe officer being returned to Bergamo to gather money, Ranſo ſent thither a ſtrength of three hundred horſemen and fiue hundred footemen, who tooke together with the officer the rocke wherevnto he was fledde for his ſafety with the money he had leauied: In this rocke were very fewe men of warre, for that lx. men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and ſeuen hundred footemen, with two thouſand paiſants of the Mount of Brianſo were gone from Millan vnder the leading of Siluio Sauello & Cæſar Fieromoſquo, to reconquer Bergamo: and they encountring vpon the way fiue hundred light horſemen and three hundred footemen ſent by Ranſo to Bergamo, were eaſily put to flight, by whoſe example the reſidue that affore had occupied Bergamo, abandoned it, leauing onely a garriſon in the Rocke which ſtandeth out of the Citie vpon a mountayne called the Chappell.

The Viceroy and Biſhop of Gurce remayned certayne dayes at Vincenſa, and ſente one parte of the Spaniards vnder Proſper Colonno to ſacke Baſciano & Maroſtiquo: not that they had offended, but that the ſubſtances of that wretched people ſhould miniſter norriture to tharmy, wherein the payes did fayle, Cæſar ſtanding alwayes oppreſſed with his accuſtomed difficulties, the king of Aragon not hable of himſelfe to beare out ſo great a burden, and the duchie of Millan being exceſſiuely taxed by the Svvizzers, was no more hable to contribute to the releefe of the reſidue. The army aboade at Vincenſa, not without great diſcommodities by the continuall vexations of the light horſemen, who ouerrunning day and night the whole contrey, ſtopped all traffike and paſſage of vittels, vnleſſe they were garded with a great ſtrength, and that of neceſſitie muſt be of men at armes, for that they were very fewe light horſemen: Therefore to be out of theſe torments, the Biſhop of Gurce went to Verona very muche diſcontented with the Viceroy, who following him by ſmall iourneys, got into Albero vpon the ryuer of Adice, where he remained certaine dayes to giue oportunitie to them of Verona to make their harueſt, thincurſions of the light horſemen not ceaſſing for all that, who tooke from the Almains euen neare the gates of Verona, the oxen that drewe thartilleries. The Viceroy had layde a former plot to beſtow the armie in garriſon in the countreys of Breſſia and Bergamaſqua, and at the ſame time to moleſt Crema, which was all that the Venetians helde on the other ſide the riuer of Mincia: which deuiſe being publiſhed, had ſo aſſured the countreys thereaboutes that the territories of Padoa were full of inhabitantes and goods, the ſame beeing the cauſe that the Viceroy, who had no other meane to feede his armie then by prayes and pillage, altered his plot, and calling backe the Almains, went to Montagnana and to Eſte, and from thence to the village of Bouolento, where after he had driuen away great flockes of cattell, the ſouldiours conſumed with fyre many fayre houſes that ſtoode thereabout: Still the deſyre of pillage caryed them on, and being the rather encouraged that the bandes of the Venetian footemen were diſtributed to the garde of Padoa and Treuiſa, the Viceroy marching in pillage from Bouolento, determined to approche Venice, but agaynſt thopinion of Proſpero Colonno, who tolde

him that no leſſe was the daunger of thenterpriſe then the councell rash: So that after they had paſſed the riuer of Bacquillon and ſacked Pieue de ſacco which is a borow both great in ſituacion, populous, and full of all thinges, they went to Meſtro and ſo to Marguera which ſtandeth vpon the ſalt waters: from that place, to leaue a more honorable memorie of this expedicion, they diſcharged towards Venice ten peeces of great artillerie whoſe boollets pearced the Monaſterie of S. Secondo: And as in warre where diſcipline is at libertie, there inſolencies be infinit, ſo they proceeded ſtill in pilling & waſting the whole contrey whoſe inhabitants being fled, they made with great iniquitie warres againſt the walls: for, not content with the rich prayes of cattell and other wealth, in their crueltie they burned Meſtra, Marguera, and Liſſafuſnia together with all the other villages and townes of the contry, not ſparing any houſe or pallace which had any extraordinary repreſentacion or apparance: In theſe inſolencies, thimpietie of the Popes ſouldiours and the other Italians, was not the leaſt, but ſo much the greater by howe much it was more infamous in them then in the forreiners to vſe crueltie againſt the magnificence & ornaments of their proper contrey: But they of Venice diſcerning within their towne the ſmoke by day, & by night the fire thorow the whole contrey, And hearing within their owne houſes the noyſe of thartillerie of thennemies which was planted for no other purpoſe then to encreaſe their ignominie: were touched in their mindes with right great indignacion and ſorow: It ſeemed to euery one a hard and greeuous chaunce of fortune, that in place of ſo great glorie and ſo many victories obteyned in Italy affore tyme both by ſea and land, their eyes ſhould beholde at that inſtant a ſmall armie in compariſon of their auncient force and power, to offer to the maieſtie of their common weale, ſo great a brauery to their perpetual reproch & ignominie: In regard of which indignities, the deliberacions of that Senat being enforced, who till that day ſtoode reſolute, what hopes ſoeuer were offered, to eſchew to make any experience of fortune: They now conſented by the hawtie perſwaſions of Bart. Aluiano, that reaſſembling all the ſouldiours and ſtirring vp all the villages aſwell of the plaines as of the mounteines, they ſhould aſſay to ſtoppe the returne of thennemies: A matter which Aluiano proued to be of very eaſie action, for that their raſhnes hauing brought them in the middeſt of Venice, Treuiſa, and Padoa, and being laden with burdens of pray and ſpoyle, they could not retyre without great daunger, aſwell for thincommoditie of vittells, as for thimpediment of riuers and hard paſſages: And now the Spanyards vnderſtanding of the mooſters and preparacions that were in hand, marching a good paſſe, were by this time comen to Citadella, which when they ſaw they could not get for a ſuccour of ſouldiours newly entred, they lodged a litle beneath neare to Brenta to paſſe to the village of Contycella, A place where the riuer of Brenta was paſſible by foarde: But they durſt not venture to paſſe ouer for feare of Aluiano, who ſtoode on the other ſide with his companies ranged in battell and his artillerie planted along the ſhoare of the riuer, carefully prouiding for the ſauetie not onely of that place, but alſo of many others: Whereunto, if reſiſtance had not bene made, thennemie had had eaſie paſſage: It hapned (ſuch be the ſtratagemes of ſouldiours) that as the Viceroy continued his ſhewes and demonſtracions to paſſe ouer at the place below, to the which Aluiano had turned all his forces, he paſſed the night after without any impediment at the paſſage called the new croſſe three miles aboue Citadella: from thence with great diligence he tooke his way to Vincenſa, but Aluiano ſeeking to ſtop his paſſage ouer the riuer of Bacquillon, preuented him. Ioh. P. Baillon and Andr. Gritty with a ſtrength of two hundred men at armes, and two thowſand footemen of the forces of Treuiſa, came and ioyned with Aluiano neare to Vincenſa: They with the other Venetian Capteines were of councell not to fight with thenemies with banner diſplayed and in an open place, but garding well the paſſages of ſtrength and places moſt conuenient, they ſhould labor to ſtoppe their way on what place ſo euer they came, drawing now towards Vincenſa: To this end they had ſent Ioh. P. Manfrono to Montechio with foure thowſand men trained: And to Barberano to hinder their paſſage in the mounteines, were ſent v. hundred light horſemen with many other bands of the paiſantes: They had alſo ſtopped in the villages all the paſſages that led into Germanie, & fortified them with trenches, with ſtones, and with trees cut downe and layed a thwart the wayes: Aluiano left Theodore Triuulco to gard Vincenſa with a garriſon ſufficient, and him ſelfe with the reſidue of tharmie encamped at Olmo a place within two myles of Vincenſa vpon the way that leades to Verona: This paſſage with an other faſt by, was ſo choaked with trenches, ditches and artilleries planted vppon the places comming to it, that it was almoſt impoſſible to paſſe: As the way towards Verona was full of theſe impedimentes, ſo it was likewiſe hard for the Spanyards that marched along the mountaines, to goe larger thorow the contreys that were full of marriſhe and waters, and no leſſe hard to take the way of the mountaine which was narrow and garded by many armed men: Inſomuch as being enuirronned almoſt on all partes with enemies, their perill all one both before, behinde, and in flancke, and continually chaſſed by great troupes of light horſemen, they could make no deliberacion wherein the difficultie was not greater then the daunger: After they had ſpent certeine time in skirmiſhing, they incamped towards the entrie of the night, within halfe a mile of the place where the Venetians lay, and there the Captaines drawing to councell what was beſt to doe amidde ſo many aduerſities and perills, they chooſed as leaſt daungerous to turne their enſeignes towards Germanie: They iudged that the beſt way to returne to Verona by Trenta, notwithſtanding what for the longnes of the way, and the ſmall garriſon they had left there, they had almoſt an aſſured opinion that the celeritie of the Venetians woulde preuent their purpoſe: In this ſorte then did they marche at the dawning of the day towards Baſſan turning their backes to thenemies, a matter then the which there is nothing more timerous nor pernicious to armies: And albeit they marched in order, yet their fortune had left them ſo ſmall hope of ſauetie, that they thought the loſſe of their baggage and horſes of cariage, would be the leaſt harme that could happen to them: What by their ſecret diſcamping without ſound of trompet or dromme, and the commodity of a thicke miſt falling that morning which tooke away the benefit of his eyes, Aluiano was not ſo ſpeedily aware of their breaking vp: But he was no ſooner aduertiſed of their departing, then he ſet to follow them with all the army, wherin was thought to be a thowſand men at armes, a thowſand ſtradiots, and ſix thowſande footemen: The ſtradiots vexed them continually on all ſides, and infinit troupes of paiſants deſcending from the mountaines, were no little trouble to them with their ſmall ſhot: So that with their daunger, the difficultie of the wayes encreaſed continually both for the multitude of their cariages, and the great quantitie of their pray, and alſo for that they were driuen to paſſe thorowe wayes ſtraite and full of ditches, which they had had no oportunitie to enlarge or make plaine with mattockes and ſpades: And yet notwithſtanding by howe much their aduerſities were great and apparant by ſo much greater was their neceſſitie of ſpeede and haſt, their extremities coulde not make them forget to march in order, the ſame proceding as wel of the vertue of the ſouldiours as the care and good office of the Capteines: Neuertheleſſe after they had had marched two miles with so many perplexities of wayes and trauell, they iudged it would be harde to holde out long in that sort, their greefe beeing greater by the wearinsse of their bodies, then by any feare of the perills they saw at hande. But the enemies by their rashnes had not patience to expect till so fayre an occasion mighte be rypened which already was come to his perfection: for Aluiano according to his custome being not hable to conteine himselfe, charged vpon the rearegard of thennemies guyded by Prospero Colonno: he went to the charge not in disorder, but with tharmie araunged in battell, and his artilleries planted ready for thexecution: and it was sayde for certayne, that beeing long in preparing to the charge, Loredano a ruler amongest the Venetians rebuked him with very sharpe wordes that he went not to the charge, whose slowneſse, sayd he, gaue oportunitie to thenemies being alreadie broken, to saue themselues. By these prouocations so valiaunt a Capteine was compelled to runne headlong to the feight, and in great furie gaue the signe of the battell. Some other affirme that Prospero Colonno was the cause of all the actions of armes that day, by whose counsell the Viceroy had rather proue the vncertayne chaunce and fortune of the feight, then otherwise to followe so small a hope of safetie: And it is sayde, that hauing made a showe that he would returne towards Vincensa, Aluiano had caused to be bestowed in the suburbes of Vincensa, Iohn P. Baillon with those bandes that were come from Treuisa, and him selfe with the residue of tharmie was incamped at Creatia within two miles of Vincensa: In this place is a litle hill that gaue a conuenient commoditie for the vse and seruice of thartillerie against thenemies, and at the foote of it is a valley capable of a mayne armie raunged in battell, but it hath no way of accesse but onely by one straite way that runneth vp along the hilles, and is almoste encompased with marishes: It is sayde that Prospero knowing what incommodities this place gaue to thenemies, perswaded to set vppon them in that quarter, hauing there thoportunitie and seate of the place to set foorth their vallour: But what so euer it was, Prospero began to go to the charge with a resolution worthy of the reputation he bare, and hauing sent to call the Viceroy which brought on the battell, and on the one side, and at one tyme the Spanishe footemen aduauncing by the direction of the Marquis of Pisquairo, and on the other hande the squadrons of the launceknightes, they brought vpon the Venetians so hotte and furious a charge, that their feares beeing redoubled by the terror and vallour of their enemies, the first assault almost suffised to put them all to flight: The footmen threw downe their pikes and fledde with more shame then hope of safetie, their ignorance or want of courage making them vnhable to susteine the furie of the charge: The footemen of Romagnia, whose Coronell was Ra. de Naldo Brisiquello, were the first that serued to the others as an example of cowardise and infamie: the residue of tharmy tooke the same course, no man almost being seene to fight or once looke his enemy in the face, yea the vertue of Aluiano was so abated and confused by this sodayne fleeing away, that without stroke striking he left the victorie to thenemies, to whom thartilleries with all the baggage remayned a pray: The footemen were skattered into diuerse places, and for the men at armes, some fledde to hyde their shame in the mountaynes, and some sought their safetie in Padoa and in Treuisa, whither fled in like sorte Aluiano and Gritti. In this encounter were slaine Antho. Pio an auncient capteine with Constance his sonne, Meleager Furly, and Lodo. Parma, and the fortune of P. S. Ange was litle better, who though his lyfe was reserued, yet he escaped not without many miserable and mortall wounds: The prisoners were Iohn P. Baillon, Iulio the sonne of Iohn P. Manfron, Malatesto Soligiano, with many other Capteines and persons of name and marke: Loredano the Venetian ruler fell into this calamitie, but with a worse fortune: for that two souldiours striuing whose prisoner he should be, the one of them killed him against all humanitie: Touching the generall slaughter of this conflict both of dead bodies and prisoners, there remeyned about foure hundred men at armes and foure thowsand footemen, the slaughter being so much the greater by howe much there could be no expedicion of fleing by reason of the marrais: This also brought great domage to such as trusted in the chasse, that Theo. Tryuulco shut the gates of Vincensa and would receiue in no kind of person for feare least the Victor and the vanquished should enter pellmell together: By which impediment many striuing to passe further drowned them selues in the next riuer, amongest whom were Hermio Bentyuiolo and Sacramoro Visconte.

This was the ouerthrow that fell vpon the Venetians the seuenth day of October neare to Vincensa: worthy to be remẽbred both for the example it gaue to capteines not to haue confidence touching matters of armes, in th Italian footemen not experienced in battells pitched and raunged, and also that almost in the turning of a hand the victorie was transferred to those in whom was least hope of sauetie. This ouerthrow had put in daunger eyther Treuisa or Padoa notwithstanding with the residue of tharmie Aluiano was retyred to the one and Gritty to the other, if both the season of the yeare when raynes began to fall, had not bene contrary, and the townes bearing good fortificacions, and the Capteines much troubled to dispose to new enterprises the souldiours that were not yet payd: Neuertheles, albeit the Venetians stood afflicted with so many aduersities, & no lesse confused with an accident so farre contrary to their hopes, yet they forbare not according to the time and their abilitie, to refurnish those cities, to the which, besides other prouisions they sent many younge gentlemen of the nobilitie as they had wont to doe in times of greatest perill.

After this battell, things began to draw from armes to cogitacions and deuises of peace, which was negociated with the Pope: towards whom was gon the Bishop of Gurcy principally to protest obedience to him in the name of Cæsar and tharch Duke: In which action he was followed by Frauncis Sforce Duke of Bary to performe the like for his brother Maxymylian Sforce: And albeit the Bishop of Gurcy represented in Italy the ful person of Cæsar as he did at other times, yet laying now aside his pomp and accustomed magnificence, he entred more modestly into Rome, and forbare by the way to weare the cappe of Cardinall which the Pope had sent to him at Poggibonso: At his comming was compownded a compromisse by him and the Venetian Embassadors in the person of the Pope, of all the controuersies that were betweene Cæsar and their common weale: But it was a compromisse more in name and apparance, then in effect and substance, for that neither of the parties for thimportance of the cause would be referred to an arbytrement suspected, vntill they had seuerally and secretly receiued promisse of him, that he would not giue vppe his arbytracion without their consent and priuitie: The Pope by this authority of Compromitting, declared in writing that there should be a surceassing of armes betweene the two parties, which albeit was ioyfully accepted by them both, was yet ill obserued by the Viceroy: for that being come betweene Montagnana and Este, besides that he had done no other thing since the victorie then made pillage and ouerronne the whole contry, hauing withall sent part of his souldiours to Policena, he committed in sondry places many insolencies and harmes: sometymes he excused his doings, in that they were vpon the landes of Cæsar, & sometimes he alleaged that he exspected new intelligence from the Cardinall of Gurcy: lastly the ende of the compromisse was no more happie then had bene the middeſt and the beginning, by reaſon of difficulties that fell out in the negociacion of affaires: for, Cæſar would out conſent to thaccord, but with condicion to reteine parte of the townes, & for the other to receiue a great proporcion of money: and of the contrary, the Venetians demaunded all the townes and offered a very ſmall ſumme of money: it was beleued alſo that the king Catholike did ſecretly diſſwade the accorde, notwithſtanding openly he made demonſtration to deſire it: yea it was ſaid, that to make it more hard, he had at the ſame time put Breſſa into the hands of Cæſar, a place which the Viceroy neuer til that day would giue vp, alleaging that he kept it to make him more inclined to the peace: But the cauſes were coniectured diuerſly, either he had ſo farre offended the Venetians that he iudged he would no more enterteine with them a true and aſſured amitie, or elſe he knew that his reputacion and greatnes in Italie depended vppon continuing and keeping on foote the armie, which for want of money he was not able to feede and nourriſh but by racking & raunſoming the peoples that were his frendes, and in making praye and pillage of the countreys that were enemies: Theſe difficulties together with the vntowardneſſe of the parties, made the Pope leaue the matter vnperfect, when a litle after, the Almains, by the helpe of the exiles and baniſhed men, tooke Marano vpon the ſuddeine, a ſeafaring towne in the countrey of Friull, and ſo diſcended to the like action vpon Montfalcon: and albeit the Venetians both for their honor & profit, deſired to reconquer Marano being threeſcore miles from Venice, & in that diſpoſition did aſſaile it both by ſea and land, yet their fortune being all one in all places, they receiued loſſe & vexacion on all ſides: only Ranſo de Cero in that time ſuſteyned the name and credit of their armes, to his great praiſe and merit: for, albeit there was a great rage of plague and hunger in Crema where he lay in garriſon, and that the bands of Spanyards and Millanois being diſperſed into the townes thereabout by reaſon of the ſeaſon, he was as it were beſieged: yet he gaue a ſuddeine charge vppon Calcinaia a towne of the countrey of Bergamo, and ſtripped Cæſar Fieramoſquo with forty men at armes and two hundred light horſemen of the regiment of Proſpero Colonno: And not many dayes after, he entred by night into Quinſano, and tooke the Lieutenaunt of the Count S. Seuerin, and ſpoyled fifty men at armes, and within Treuy, ſtripped ten men at armes of the company of Proſpero.

About this time thinges were quiet enough in other places of Italie, ſauing that the Adorneis and the Fieſqueis with three thowſand men of the countrey, accompanied perhappes with the ſecret fauor of the Duke of Millan, drew neare the walls of Genes, after they had taken Spetia and other places of the riuer of Leuant: But their fortune being farre inferior to their valour, they went away almoſt ouerthrowen, hauing loſte parte of the men they brought to thenterpriſe, and certaine peeces of artillerie: There appeared alſo in Tuskane certeine beginninges of new iniuries: for, the Florentins beganne to moleſt them of Lucquay, truſting that thorow feare of the Pope, they ſhould redeeme peace in reſtoring to them Pietraſanta & Mutrona: They alleaged beſides, that it was not conuenient that they ſhould enioy the benefitte of that confederacion, which they had broken in minſtring ſecret ſuccours to the Piſans: Againſt theſe ſuggeſtions they of Lucquay complained to the Pope and to the king Catholike in whoſe protection they were, but ſeeing there grew no remedy to them, they were at laſt contented (to auoyde greater miſchiefes) to referre a compromiſſe to the perſon of the Pope: Who hauing like authoritie for the Florentins, pronounced that they of Lucquay who had affore rendered to the Duke of Ferrara, Garſagnana, ſhoulde leaue to the Florentins the places of Pietraſanta and Mutrona,

About the ende of this yere, the Caſtles of Millan and Cremona, who for the neceſſitie of vittells had agreed to yeelde if they were not ſuccored in a certayne time, were deliuered into the power of the Duke of Millan: So that there remayned no more that the French king helde in Italie, but the lanterne of Genes, which in the end of the ſame yere the Genovvaies aſſayed to caſte downe by mynes: They approched to it vnder the benefite of a Caske or veſſell of wood conteining thirtie fadomes in length and twentie in breadth: within which was ſtowage for three hundred men, and ſet rounde about with packes of wooll the better to defende the ſhotte: At the firſt ſhowe it caryed great arte and deepe inuention, but being brought to tryall, it ſerued to litle vſe, as moſt often is ſeene by thoſe newe and ſtraunge workes.

THE TVVELFTH BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

THERE happned the ſame yere in the regions beyonde the Mountes, moſt dangerous warres, wherof I wil make preſent diſcourſe, both for the ſame reaſõs, & with the ſame ſhortnes that I haue touched thẽ in the narration of the yere before.

The beginning of theſe preparations and ſtirres grew vpon a reſolution which the king of Englande made to inuade that ſommer the Realme of Fraunce with a mayne army both by ſea and lande: And to make the victorie of this enterpriſe more eaſie, he had agreed with Cæſar to furniſhe him of an hundred and twentie thouſande duckets, to make an entrie at the ſame tyme into Burgondy with an army of three thouſande horſemen, and eight thouſande footmen, parte Svvizzers and parte Almains. He promiſed alſo to the Svvizzers a certayne proportion of money, the rather to induce them to ioyne in the action with Cæſar, who was contented to put into their hands in pawne one parte of Burgondy vntill he had fully ſatisfied them of their payes: Laſtely alſo the king of Englande occupied this perſwaſion, that his father in lawe the king Catholike, cleauing to the confederation of Cæſar and him (which he had alwayes proteſted and aſſured) would open the the warre on his side at the same instante: By reason whereof the reapporte of the truce made by thenglishe with the Frenche king (and yet for all that the desire to make warre was nothing diminished) was so yll brooked not onely by him, but by all sortes of states and peoples in Englande, that the Commons had done violent execution vpon the Spanishe Embassador, if the kings authoritie had not resisted their furie. To these things were added thoportunitie of the state of tharchduke, not so muche that he letted not his subiectes to take paye agaynst the Frenchemen, as for that he promised to giue sufferaunce and passage of vittayles out of his countreys into thenglishe armie.

It behoued the French king to omit no sortes of prouisions agaynst so great preparations and daungerous threatning: By sea he furnished a strong nauy to encounter thadmirall of Englande, and by lande he leauyed men from all partes, laboring specially to haue as great a strength of launceknightes as he coulde: He had also afore made great instance to the Swvizzers, that since they refused to ayde him in the warres of Italie, at leaste, that they woulde so farre fauour him as to delyuer him a proportion of footemen to helpe to defende the Crowne of Fraunce. But they beeing wholly resoluted to protect and assure the Duchie of Millan, refused in any wyse to minister to him, vnlesse he woulde eftsoones returne to the vnitie of the Churche: and giue vp the Castell of Millan which was not yet rendred: and also cancelling his rights & interests to that estate, he would promise no more to molest neither Millan nor Genes, Limitations no lesse vnprofitable to the French king, then contrary to his honour, and preiudiciall to the soueraigne dignitie of the crowne of Fraunce. Likewise the French king, the more to terrifie thenglish & make them more intangled with their owne affayres, had called into Fraunce the duke of Suffolke as Competitor and aspirant to the Crowne of Englande: A deuise little helping the purposes of Fraunce, and of great daunger to the race and progenie of the Duke, for that in reuenge of their dealing, the king of Englande by ordinarie course of the iustice of his Realme, cutte off the head of his brother, who tyll then had bene holden prisoner in Englande, since the tyme that Phillip king of Castillo sayling into Spayne, delinered him into the handes of the king his father. The French king also was not without hope to haue peace with the king Catholike: for that when the king Catholike vnderstoode of the league made betwene the French and the Venetians, he began to distrust muche of the defence of the duchie of Millan, and sent into Fraunce one of his secretaries, to practise newe offers: And it was beleued, that considering howmuch the greatnes of Cæsar and the archduke might alter his gouernment of Castillo, he could not in good pollicy stand well contented with thembasing of the realme of Fraunce: Besides all these, omitting no oportunities wherein occasion might be taken, the french king forgat not in these actiõs to stirre vp Iames the king of Skottes his auncient confederate, to thende that he opening the warre vpon the frontiers of Englande, he might with more facilitie make defence against so many & mightie inuasions. The Skottish king was moued to this warre by the consideration of his proper interests, for that the aduersities of Fraunce could not but be daungerous to the crowne of Skotland, in which regard ioyned to the respect of confederation, he prepared him selfe to the action with all diligence, demaunding of the Frenche king no other ayde then fiftie thousande frankes to leauye munitions and vittels. Neuertheless the Frenche king was very slowe in gathering together his forces and prouisions, bothe for that he had turned all his thoughtes to thenterprise of Millan, and reaposed not a litle in the truce made with the king

Catholike: Laſtly his accuſtomed negligence was no litle impediment to thexpedi-
" tion of his buſines, A vice moſt hurtfull to thaffayres of Princes, to whom is ſeldome
" ſeene to returne theffect or fruite of their exſpectation, when they ſtande to tempo-
" riſe vpon euery new occaſion after the reſolution is ſet downe and things referred to " action. And touching the king of England, he cõſumed many monthes in meaſuring his proportions, in leauying his prouiſions, in rating the ſtate & maner of his payes, and in diſtinguiſhing the ſortes of his ſouldiors and their faſhions of armor & weapons, for that his ſubiectes hauing bene many yeeres without warres, and no leſſe chaunged the maner of warfaring, both their bowes and their other vſual natures of armes being become vnprofitable, he was conſtrayned to make great prouiſion of forreine armors, artilleries, and munitions, and by the ſame neceſſitie to leauye as ſouldiors trayned many bands of launceknights & horſmen, the ancient cuſtome of the Engliſh being to fight on foote: for theſe impedimentes thengliſh army paſſed not the ſeas ſoner then the moneth of Iuly. And after they had for many dayes runne vp into the champayne countrey neare vnto Bolleine, they went to incampe affore Torvvaine, A towne ſtanding vpon the marches of Pikardy, & in the region of thoſe peoples whõ the Latins call Morini: The perſon of the king of Englande paſſed the ſea a litle after, who had in his maine army fiue thouſand horſes of ſeruice, and more then forty thouſand footmen: An army not more notable by the multitudes of ſoul-
" diors & conſideration of their vallor, then moſt glorious by the preſence & maieſtie
" of their king, in whoſe perſon appeared at that inſtant being in an age diſpoſed and " actiue, al thoſe tokens of honor & magnanimitie, which riſing afterwards to their ful
" ripenes & perfection by degrees of time, ſtudy, and experience, made him the moſt " renowmed and mightie prince that lyued in his age in all this part or circuite of the " earth which we call Chriſtendome. After the Engliſhe were drawne into campe, which according to their cuſtome they enuironed with trenches & with cartes, and ſo rampired it with wood and other firme matter, and then planted it rounde about with artillerie, that they ſeemed to be in a walled towne: They began to batter the town of Torvvaine in many places, & to make many mines, but they forbare to giue thaſſalt, perhaps their prouiſions beeing leſſe then their vertue, though their vallour was nothing inferior to the reaport that went of thẽ: The towne of Torvvain within was very wel furniſhed with artilleries, & manned with a ſtrength of two hundred & fifty launces & two thouſand footmen: which though it was a garriſon very ſmal in regard of thimportaunce of the place, yet their daunger was no greater then their hope of ſuccors: for that the french king was come to Amiens, to thende that by his nerenes he might giue courage & cõfort to thoſe that were beſieged, making great the difficultie to reskew them: he was very carefull to aſſemble his armie, which by true muſtering was ſuppoſed to conteine two thouſande fiue hundred launces, ten thouſand launceknights guided by the duke of Gueldres, and ten thouſand footemen leauied in the partes of his realme: The greateſt affliction within the town was feare to want vittels, for that (except of bread) they had not ſufficient prouſion of any one nature, A want which perhaps made them more bold & buſie then otherwiſe they would, & leaſt the ſame neceſſitie might grow to a deſperat extremitie, though they durſt not come to trial of their generall forces, yet they forbare not to make practiſe of ſeruice, & vexed continually the Engliſh camp with their artillerie, in which execution the great Chãberlaine of England was ſlayne, & one legge taken away from Talbot then capteine of Callice. The daunger of Torvvaine troubled much the king, but for that by cõmon negligence of Fraunce, & the difficulty to leauy laũceknights,

he was long ere he began to put order to his affayres, his whole army was not yet assembled: neither was he of mind (what aduersities soeuer fortune brought vpon him) to hazard the feight with thenemies, for that in loasing the battell, the whole realme and state of Fraunce had stand in manifest perill: he hoped also that the winter comming on which in those cold clymats beginneth betimes, thenemies would be driuē to dissolue, the ill oportunitie and season of the yere driuing them from thenterprise which the feare of thenemies could not make them to leaue: and yet his army being assembled & his owne person remaining still at Amyens, he sent it forth to Aire nere to Torvvaine vnder the gouernment of Monsr Longeuille, otherwise called the Marquis of Rottelyn Prince of the blood, and capteine of an hundred gentlemen of ordinaunce, ioyning with him in the charge of Monsr Palissa: their commission was, that eschuing all occasions to attempt the battell, they should see to the well reuittelling of the townes thereabouts, which till that time had bene ill furnished, being subiect to the same negligence that the whole seruice was, & withall to do what they could to put into Torvvaine a succour of men and releefe: A matter of it selfe very vneasie, and yet made more hard by the small agrement that was betwene the Generals, either of thē attributing seuerally to him self, the whole direction and gouernment, the one for his nobleneſſe and discending, and the other for his long experience in warre: Notwithstanding, what by the necessity of the time brooking no long delay, & what by thimportunity of thē within the towne, crying out for a succour of men, there was a strength of a thowsand fiue hūdred launces that aduētured to approach the towne on that side that was furtheſt remoued frō the Englisſh: And albeit there was a regiment of three thowsande Englisſhe bestowed at certaine passages to stoppe them, yet thartilleries of the towne executed so furiously vpon them, and the residue of tharmy being vnprofitable to their reskewing by reason of certeine ouerthwart trenches and ditches cast by the towne, that Capteine Frontaillas ouercomming the perill by his vertue, got to the gate, & put into the towne a supply of lxxx. men at armes without horses as they had required: And afterwards with the same felicity he retired with the residue of his companies, finding easie by experience the enterprise that was made hard by reaport, & ouercomming by his vertue the daunger that without practise was holden desperat: he might vnder the same aduenture, haue put vittells into the towne, if he had caried any with him, his fortune and the state of the perill being all one.

By this experience the french capteines were incoraged to make their approches an other day with a great quantity of vittells, hoping in the same felicity: But thEngliſh that tooke warning by the last example, had raised newe fortificacions on that side, to stoppe them, and on thother side, had sent out their horsemen and xv. thowsand Almain footemen to cut of their way: Insomuch that as they were vppon their returne, the fortune of the first aduenture taking from them all suspicion, and being remounted vppon their litle nagges of iorney that were led spare, as men beguiled with opinion of security, they were sodainly set vpon euen in the greatest coniecture of their assurance & sauetie, and as men being passed from a perill they feared most into a daunger they douted least, they suffred the terrour of thaccident to take from them al resolucion, & put themselues to flight without any resistance, loasing in that disorder three hūdred men at armes, with whom were taken prisoners the Marquis of Rottelyn, Capteines Bayard & Faiette with many others of marke & name: Monsr Palissa was also taken prisoner but escaped away by aduenture, his pollicie no lesse fauoring his sauetie, then his fortune: it was thought that if thEngliſhe had taken the oportunity & offer of that days fortune, they had in that action opened to them ſelues a way to be maſters of the whole realme of Fraunce: For that behinde, ſtoode a great battell of launceknightes which had followed the men at armes, who if they had bene ſhocked and ouerthrowen, it had bene with ſo great domage to the french army, that it is certeine that the french king vpon the firſt newes beleuing that they had bene broken in dede, would haue geuen ſo deſperat a ſentence of his owne ſafetie, that he would looke howe he might flee into Britaine: But there was difference betwene thintencion of thEngliſh and offer of their fortune, for, after they had giuen the chaſſe to the horſemen hauing nothing of more ſtudy & care in their mind then the conqueſt of the towne of Torvvaine, they preſented the frenche enſeignes and priſoners before the walls: a ſpectacle which moued not a litle the towne to diſpaire of ſuccour, and ioyning to it the viewe and conſideracion of their other calamities, and the launceknightes withall murmuring to endure without hope the laſt extremitie of vittells, they agreed to leaue the towne, the horſes and liues of the ſouldiours ſaued, if they were not reskewed within two dayes: And it is not to bee douted that their holding out by the ſpace of fiftie dayes, was not a thing that greatlie profited the realme of Fraunce, who by the benefite of the long ſuffering of Torvvaine, had reſpit to temporiſe and prepare againſt many other greater afflictions which otherwiſe ſo mightie an armie of enemies would haue brought vppon them euen to the ſhaking of the Crowne of Fraunce: A litle before, Maximilian Cæſar was come in perſone into the Engliſhe armie, reuiewinge and layinge out thoſe places wherein in his youth, he had with ſo great glorie ouerthrowne the armie of the French king Lovvys the eleuenth: Who whileſt he remayned in the campe, the affayres of the warre tooke their chiefeſt direction and gouernment from him.

Riſing of the Swizzers againſt the French king.

The Frenche king was not onely trauelled with thEngliſhe armies, but alſo with greater daunger, he had his vexacions by the Svvizzers: for the commonalties of thoſe regions deſiring with an vniuerſall minde that the king ſhould diſclaime from all titles and rights which he pretended to the Duchie of Millan, wherin for that he did nothing, their hatred redoubled towardes him, they had entred againſt him many actions of hoſtilitie, and ſette on fire many houſes of priuate perſons of Lucerna whome they ſuſpected to beare fauor to thaffaires of the Crowne of Fraunce: And proceeding continuallie againſt all men noted of like ſuſpicion, they had brought all the chiefetaines and principalls of them, to ſweare to ſuffer all the penſions to go in common, & ſo falling into armes by publike order, they entred almoſt by heapes into Burgondy, their numbers being xx. thowſand footmen, & a thowſand horſemen: In which action they had certeine proporcions of artillerie from Cæſar, who, either according to his inconſtancy, or for ielouſie he had of them, refuſed to go thither in perſon notwithſtanding he had promiſed both to the king of England, & to thē: Being drawne into this ſtrength & power of warre, they went & incamped affore Dyon the chiefe towne of Burgondy, wherin was Monſr Trimouille with a thowſand laūces & ſix thowſand footmē: Theſe natures of cōmons & popular peoples, hauing ſome dout of their Capteines who began already to communicate with the french, tooke vpon them the managing of thartilleries and fell to batter the towne, of whoſe defenſe Trimouille douting much, he had recourſe to the laſt remedies, & made with thē a ſodain accord without exſpecting any commiſſion from the king, on whoſe behalfe he made this contract to renounce all the rights & claimes he pretended to the Duchy of Millan, & to pay them ſix hundred thowſand crownes within a certeine tearme:

for thobseruation of which couenant he gaue him foure ostages, persons very honorable and of great condicion: And for the Svvyzzers they were bownd to no other promise then to returne to their houses, A matter which tyed them not to remeine for afterwards friendes to the french king, but left them at libertie to returne when they list to thinuasions of his kingdom: Assoone as they were possessed of thostages they brake vp and dissolued their army immediatly, alleaging for their excuse with the king of England for entring into this couenant without his consent, that they receyued not in tyme conuenient, the money he had promised them: It was thought that this capitulacion was the cause of the sauing of the whole Realme of Fraunce, for that the taking of Dyon, had put into the hands of the Svvyzzers a free power to ronne vp without resistance cuē to the wals of Paris: And it was not vnlikely that the king of England passing the riuer of Somme, would not haue taken the field to ioyne with thē: A matter which the french could not let for that neither the duke of Gueldres being thē come, nor in the armie aboue six thowsand launceknights, they were constrayned to keepe them selues inclosed within townes: But the king was not a litle discontented with the resolucion, complayning not a litle against Monsr Trymouille, both for the summe of money he had promised, and much more that he had bound him to the resignation of his titles & interests as an action of too great preiudice, & farre vnworthy his greatnes & the glory of the crowne of Fraunce: for which cause albeit the daūger had bene great if the Svvyzzers in their wrath had eftsoones returned to assaile him, yet reapposing much in the approch of the winter, and in the difficultie that they could not reassemble so soone, & being withall resolute to ronne all fortunes rather then to depriue him selfe of his rightes in that Duchie (which he loued dearely) he determined not to ratifie thaggreement: yea rather he beganne to propownd to them newe offers, which much lesse that they did harken vnto, seeing they did cōstantly reiect them, with these bluddy threats, that if the ratification came not within a certeine tyme, they would cut of the heades of thostages.

Torvvaine being taken, whereunto th Archduke aspyred by pretence of his auncient right, and the king of England chalenged it to be his by the iust prerogatiue of conquest and warre: Cæsar and he fell to this point for thauoiding of discord, to cast downe the wals to the ground, notwithstanding such violence was forbidden by the capitulacions made with them of Torvvaine: immediatly after, Cæsar went from tharmy, giuing this iudgement vpon thexperience & trial he had seene, that in matters of warre thenglish were more resolute then wel aduised, & lesse suttle & politike then wel disciplined & trained. From Torvvain the king of England went to incamp before Tornay, A towne very stronge and riche and of great deuocion of long tyme to the crowne of Fraunce, but so inuironed with the contreyes of th Archduke, that it was impossible to the french to reskewe it so long as they were not maisters of the fielde: The french king was not a litle glad of this enterprise, fearing least the ennemie caried with victorie and wealth, would not transferre his forces into the body and partes of his Realme of more importance: A feare which put him into no small perplexities: for, notwithstanding he had now areared a mighty armie, wherein (besides the fiue hundred launces which he had bestowed in garrison in S. Quyntyn) were two thowsand launces, eight thowsand light horsemen Albanois, ten thowsand laūceknights, a thowsand Svvyzzers, & eight thowsand footemen of his owne nation: yet it was farre inferior to the power and multitudes of thenglish armie, which, by the continuall flocking of souldiours, was (as the reaport went) resupplyed to the number of foure skore thowsande fighting men: By the consideracion of which inequalitie of forces, the french king who had no great hope to be able to defende Bolleyne and those partes of the contrey that are beyonde the riuer of Somme which he feared thEnglish would oppresse, looked how to defend Abeuille and Amyens, & the other townes that are vppon the riuer of Somme: his deuise was also to let them for passing the riuer, and so to temporise either vntill the cold season came, or els that the Skottish king in whom he hoped much, were ready to aduaunce and draw them from that warre: his armie marched all the meane while along the riuer of Somme, to let thennemies from winning passage: It was beleeued that the perswasions of Cæsar were the cause of this enterprise of thEnglish, for hope that if the towne of Tornay were taken, it might either then or at some other tyme diuolue into the power of his Nephew to whome it was thought it did apperteyne: perhappes it moued vpon a feare the armie had to be afflicted with want of vittels if they had bene in an other place, or happly other places whereunto they might haue gonne, had borne a more facilitie to be succored by thennemies: But the towne of Tornay which was not manned but with bandes of straungers and forreyners, and therefore of lesse expectacion to bee succored, was so battred with artilleries in many seuerall places; that after it had made a small resistance, it yelded, vnder lauetie of goods and lines: & to aduaunce an hundred thowsand duckats towards the defrayment of the warre and to defend them from pillage.

Tornay taken by thEnglish.

The fortune of the frenchmen was no more gracious in other places, for that the Skottish king comming to battell with the English armie vpon the riuer of Twede, where the Lady Katthren then Queene of England was in person, was ouerthrowen with a very great slaughter, the kings person being then slaine with one of his owne sonnes who was Archbishop of S. Andrew with many other Prelats and Nobles of that Realme, and of the common soldiours more then twelue thowsand bodies. After these victories about the ende of October, the king of England leauing a stronge garrison within Tornay, dismissed his horsemen and footemen of th Almains, and so disposed him selfe to returne into England, reaping the great towne of Tornay as a frute of his warres and great exspenses: for, touching Torvvaine whose wals he had thrown downe to the earthe, the naked seate and resemblance remeyned in the power of the french king. One cause that made the king of England repasse the seas, was, that the season of the yeare taking away all oportunities to continue the warre in those cold regions, he held it a matter vnprofitable to nourish an armie there with so great charges: And an other was that he thought to take order for the institucion and gouernment of the young king of Skots who was in minoritie and the sonne of his owne sister, the Duke of Albanie being gonne thether who was also of the blood of the same king.

By the returne of the king of England, the feare of the french men beeing taken away, their king dismissed all his armie except the regiments of launceknights: he saw him selfe deliuered of the care of daungers present, but not of feare to fall into them againe the next yeare with farre greater difficulties: he gathered this iudgement by the behauiors of the king of England at his going away, who vsed many high threatnings against the crowne of Fraunce, promising that he would giue it a greater shake the next sommer: Wherein, he began already to make new preparacions to auoid the discommodities of his former delayes, & with more readines to open the warre assoone as the season of the yeare would suffer: Besides, the french king knewe that Cæsar had the same intencion to annoy him, and feared withall least the king Catholike, who with sundrye suttleties had excused him selfe of the truce made least he

shoulde wholly alien them from him, woulde not also take armes with them: of this suspicion he had great tokens by the discourse of a letter intercepted, wherein the king Catholike writing to his Embassador resident with Cæsar, and expressing an intention quite contrarie to his manyfest speeches, which testified an earnest desire to make warre agaynst the infidels and to go in person to recouer Ierusalem, he perswaded him to deuise diligently by what meanes the duchie of Millan mighte be brought to Ferdinand their common Nephew, younger brother to tharchduke. In this perswasion he occupied this maner of encouragement, that that estate beeing raunged it would not be hard to reduce the residue of the regions of Italie to their deuotion, and with the same facilitie ioyned with his succours, Cæsar might make himselfe Pope, wherevnto he had alwayes aspired since the death of his wife, and being once possessed of that soueraigntie, he should resigne, to the vse and profite of tharchduke, the Crowne imperiall: Neuertheless he concluded that matters of so highe nature and weight could not be ledde to perfection but with tyme and with occasions. Besides all these, the Frenche king doubted nothing of the will of the Swizzers, whose obstinacies he coulde in no wise moderate, notwithstanding he made them offers aboue their merite: And they were of newe incensed more then before by the euasion of the ostages deliuered by Monsr Trimouille, who fearing the daunger of their lyues for want of obseruation in the king, were secretly stolne away and fledde into Germanie: So that it was not without cause that he feared leaste by thoccasion of so many other his aduersities, they would ryse to assayle presently, or at leaste the yere after, the countrey of Burgondy or Dauphine. These difficulties were partely thoccasion that made him fall to agreement with the Pope for causes spirituall: of which agreement the principal article conteined thabsolute rooting out of the councell of Pisa, which poynt was debated many monthes with very great difficulties, specially for the regarde of things done eyther with the authoritie of the same councell, or agaynst the maiestie of the Pope: suche as it seemed very vnworthy for the sea Apostolike to approue, and to cut them off there could not but happen right great confusion: So that there was a delegation of three Cardinalls to deuise of some meanes by the which suche a disorder might be met withall. This bred also one difficultie, that it seemed not conuenient to graunt to the king thabsolution of penalties vnlesse he sued for it: wherevnto the king woulde not consent, leaste by imputation his person and Crowne of Fraunce were noted of schisme: But at laste the king was made wearye with these perplexities, and no lesse ouerlabored with the importunities and willes of the people of his Realme, desiring with vniuersall affection to be reunited to the Church of Rome: but most of all he was stirred & moued by the deuotion of the Queene, to whō those controuersies were grieuous. In which respectes he determined to yelde to the will of the Pope, and not without some hope, that vpon the reappayesement of these quarrels the Pope woulde some way ioyne to his ayde, wherevnto with great arte he seemed to expresse to haue a good intention: And yet a newe complaint was added to the auncient iniuries, for that the Pope by a speciall writ, had commaunded the Scottish king to attempt no domage or greeuance to the crowne of Englande: Neuertheless in the viij. session of the councell of Latran, which fell in the latter end of the yere, the French Agents in the name of their king and protesting his commission, disclaymed from the councell of Pisa, and stucke to the councell of Latran: They promised besides, that six of those prelates that did assiste the councell of Pisa, should go to Rome to do the lyke in the name of the whole French Churche, and that others of the Cleargie should come to dispute vpon the pragmatike, with intention to referre themselues to the declaration of the councell, of which in the same session they obteined full absolution of all things committed agaynst the Church of Rome. These were the accidents and actions done in Italie, Fraunce, and Englande, in the yere a thousande fiue hundred and thirteene.

In the beginning of the yere following, Anne the French queene passed from this life to a better, hauing scarcely tasted the sweete fruite of the vnion with the church which she had so muche desired: She was a verye vertuous and catholike Queene, and for those partes her death was greatly sorowed of all the realme and of her naturall peoples of Brittaine. When the realme of Fraunce was thus reduced to thobedience of the Churche, and by that meane bothe the name and authoritie of the councell of Pisa vtterly remoued: some of those that had feare of the greatnesse of the French king, began to stirre and feare least his power were too much embased; But specially the Pope, who notwithstanding he continued in the same desire that the duchie of Millan shoulde not be recouered by him: yet fearing least the king, made amased with so great daungers, and remembring eftsoones the matters of the yere paste, would not giue him selfe sodenly to accorde with Cæsar (with whose wil was alwayes concurrant the minde of the king Catholike) & contract his daughter with one of the Nephewes of those two kings, induing her for a dowry with the duchie of Millan: He began to perswade with the Svvizzers, that for too great hatred agaynst the French king, they woulde not put him into necessitie to do a matter which should be no lesse preiudiciall to them then to him; He tolde them they were not ignoraunt of the yll minde that Cæsar and the king Catholike bare to them, who if they obteined the duchie of Millan by vertue of accorde with the Frenche king, it woulde be a matter no lesse to the daunger of their libertie and authoritie, then hurtefull to the prerogatiue of the Churche, and perill to the whole state of Italie: That they ought to perseuer in their resolution not to suffer the French king to recouer the duchie of Millan, yea they ought also to take heede, least (as it often hapneth in the doings of men) to auoyde too muche one extremitie, they fell not into an other extremitie more hurtefull and daungerous: That to assure themselues more then neede was, that that estate should not reuert to the French, they were not the cause to make it fall into the handes of others, with so muche the more perill & ruine to all, by howe muche lesse they should be founde hable to make resistance to a farre stronger power then the greatnesse of the Frenche king: That the common weale of Svvizzers hauing made notable their name and reputation in the actions of warre with so many glorious and worthy victories, was to make them selues no lesse famous and renowmed by the practises of peace: That they were to foresee presently the daungers that were to come, and to remedie them with wisedome and counsell, without suffring things to slyde and fall into places from whence they can not be drawen out and readressed but by armes and vallour of the hande: That according to the testimonie of dayly experience, it happned often in warre that the vallour of men was smothered by the too great power of fortune: That it was a better counsell for them, to moderate in some part thaccord of Dion, specially the king offring them greater paymentes, and promise to make truce for three yeeres with the state of Millan, so farrefoorth as they would not constrayne him to resigne his interestes: which resignation beeing of greater consequence in apparance then in effect (for when oportunitie shall returne to the king to reconquer it, the action of resignement shall be no other impediment to him then he liste) things for that difficultie cultie ought not to be reduced to so great a daunger. On the other side he aduysed the french king with many working reasons to make election of the lesser yll, and rather to dispose him selfe to ratifie thaccorde of Dyon, then to returne to the daunger of oppression by so many enemies in his realme the next sommer: That it was thoffice of a wise Prince, to auoyde the greater yll, and to embrace for good and profitable thelection of the lesser: That it was contrarie to the wise gouernment of a king, to take himselfe out of one daunger and disorder, to runne into an other of greater importance and greater infamie: That it could be no honor to him to graunte the duchie of Millan with so manyfest a note of cowardise to his naturall enemies, who had pursued him with so many deceites and suttleties: That it was neither reste nor securitie to him, by diminishing so much his owne reputation, to enlarge the power of suche as conspired altogether to pull downe the Crowne of Fraunce: That himselfe was a good witnesse that he could not be assured of any promise, of any fayth or othe that they make, A matter which he had well knowen by thexperience of other tymes to his great harmes: That truely it was a harde matter to resigne hys rightes, but thinfamie was so muche the lesse, by howemuch a little billet or writing made not his enemies more mightie: That since it had bene promised without his priuitie or consent, it might be sayde that it was not his deuise from the beginning, but in the execution he would be so muche the more excused, being as it were constrayned for the promise made by his people, to keepe somewhat his fayth: Besides, the world doth knowe from how great and desperate a state of daunger, that accord at that time had deliuered the realme of Fraunce: That he allowed well that by other meanes and offers he labored to induce the Svvizzers to his intention: And that touching his parte, as he desired for the suretie of his kingdome, that in some sorte there were made an agreement betweene them and him, so in that action he would omitte no good office of amitie and trauell to drawe the Svvizzers conformable to his will: But if they woulde be obstinate, he exhorted him in grauitie and fatherly deuotion to obey time and necessitie, though not for other regardes, yet not to take from him thexcuse to departe from thalliance he had with his enemies. The king knewe that those reasons were full of fidelitie and trueth, and yet he coulde not digest them without murmure, for that the Pope had cunningly mingled threats with perswasions: And albeit be confessed that his necessitie constrayned him to make some resolution that might diminishe the number of his enemies, yet he was at a poynt rather to giue him selfe vp to all daungers, then to resigne his rightes to the duchie of Millan: Wherevnto besides his owne inclination, he was incouraged by thimportunities and counsels of those of his Court, to whom albeit it was grieuous to followe the warres any more in Italie, yet respecting the dignitie of the Crowne of Fraunce, it was farre more intollerable to see their king so infamously constrayned to disclayme his properties in the duchie. There was discerned the same obstinacie in the Parliamentes and assemblies of the Svvizzers: To whome notwithstanding the king made offer to paye presently foure hundred thousande crownes, and eight hundred thousande at sundry tearmes: and albeit the Cardinall of Sion with many other of their rulers inclined to accept those conditions, waighing thestate of the daunger if the Frenche king should ioyne with Cæsar and with the king Catholike: yet the commons of that nation increased in their generall hatred to the name of Fraunce, and made prowde by so many victories, tooke to them selues a confidence to defende the duchie of Millan agaynst all princes knitte in one strength: The authoritie of the Cardinall of Syon was muche diminished amongest them, and their other chiefe rulers were ſuſpected by reaſon of the penſions which they were wont to receiue from the Frenche, Matters which made the Cantons with more obſtinacie to ſtand vpon the ratification of the accorde of Dyon: And beſides, giuing themſelues ouer to raſhnes and diſobedience to counſell, they debated to enter of newe into Burgondy, an action which the Cardinall and other chieftaynes amongeſt them labored to hinder, not onely with manyfeſt authoritie, but indirectly and with many ſleightes, deferring from one day to another, that reſolution. Therefore the French king ſtanding neither offended with them, nor aſſured of them, forbare not to continue with the king Catholike the practiſe of the mariage, in the whiche (as before) the principall difficultie was, whether the Damoſell ſhould remayne in the power of her father in lawe, tyll time had made her hable to the conſummation of the mariage: for that the father reteyning her, it ſeemed to Cæſar, that he could in no ſorte be aſſured of theffect. The king was content to enterteine the difficulties that happned in this action, for that he ſaw there was ſome hope that the brute of this match (which he diligently ſpread abroade) might to his profite mollifie the mindes of o-thers, by reaſon of thintereſts they had in it. The king Catholike ſent to him Quintaine his ſecretarie, whom in that negociation he had ſent to him the yere before: and he going afterwards by his conſent to Cæſar, returned eftſones to the Frenche king: At whoſe returne, to thende the difficulties of the peace might be reſolued with greater commoditie and reſpite, the king and Quintaine in the name of the king Catholike prolonged yet for an other yeare the truce that had bene made the yeare before: The prolongation was vnder the ſame conditions that were before, ſauing that they ſuffred a ſecret addition of this article, that during the truce the French king ſhoulde not moleſt theſtate of Millan: in which article Genes nor Aſt had no comprehenſion. This condition, whiche the king concealed as muche as he coulde, the king Catholike cauſed to proclayme it ſolemnly throwe all Spayne, a thing which made the world vncertayne which was moſt true, eyther the negatiue of the one, or the affirmatiue of the other. In the ſame couenaunt was reſerued to Cæſar and the king of Englande, a reſpite of three monethes, to enter into the agreement: which albeit Quintaine did aſſure on bothe their behalfes, yet touching the king of Englande there was no apparaunce, and in that he beguyled him ſelfe muche: But for Cæſar, the king of Aragon who alwayes ſtoode reſolued not to haue warre on the parte of Spayne, had perſwaded him that there was no better meane to compaſſe the mariage that was ſolicited. This prorogation of the truce aggrauated the Popes ſuſpicion, that betweene thoſe three Princes were eyther made already, or at a poynt to be made, ſome concluſion of greater things to the harme of Italie: And yet for all that not going from his firſte deliberation that it would be a matter very hurtefull to the common libertie to ſuffer the duchie of Millan to diuolue into the power of Cæſar and the king Catholike, and of no leſſe perill to haue it recouered by the French king, he founde it a harde matter ſo to temper and proceede in things, that the meanes which aided one of his intentiõs, ſhould not hurt the other, ſince one of the daungers came of the embaſing and the feare, & the other of the greatnes & ſuretie of the French king. Therfore to deliuer the king frõ neceſſitie to agree with them, he continued his perſwaſions to the Svvizzers (to whome the truce that was made was ſuſpected) that they had reaſon to compounde with him: And to thende to make to the king in all euentes the diſcending into Italie more harde, he tooke more paynes then euer he did to agree Cæſar with the Senate of Venice: who for their partes iudging that to make truce, would be to aſſure the matters

ters of Cæsar in the townes that remeyned to him, stoode resolued with a wonderfull constancie of mind eyther to make an absolute peace or to continue the warre, not retyring from so honorable a resolucion for any accident or ill aduenture whatsoeuer: for, besides so many aduersities hapned in the warre, and the dispaire, that, that yeare the french king would sende no armie into Italy, they had against them this token both of the anger of heauen, and ill disposicion of casuall accidents which are vainely surmised to depend vpon the power of fortune, that in the beginning of the yeare a great fire kindled in Venice, which, beginning in the night at the bridge Rialto, was caried by the violence of the North windes resisting all remedies of the diligence and trauell of men, and consumed the moste rich and populous part of the citie.

But because the Pope showed such forwardnes to haue them accorded, there was eftsoones made betweene them a new compromise in his owne person: which bare full power without lymitacion and was not restrayned to any tyme, and yet with a secret promisse vnder his hand, to pronownce nothing but by the consent of both parties: And after the arbytracion was giuen vp, he enioyned by writ both the one and the other to surceasse from armes, an order very slenderly obserued by the Spanyards, and Almains, for that those companies of the Spanyards which were in garrison at Polleſina and in Este, made pillage of the whole contry thereabout, & the Viceroy sent men to Vincensa to thende to be in possession at the tyme when the sentence should be giuen: Besides these insolencies, Capteine Frangipan did many harmes in the contry of Fryull, And the Venetians not standing carefully vpon their garde, the launceknights, by an intelligence with certein banished men, tooke Marano a towne in Fryull neare to Aquilea and hath his situacion vpon the sea: To encownter these doings, the Venetians sent thether by land Baltazar Scipion, with a certeine proporcion of souldiours, and Ierom Sauorgnano with many other bands of the contrey men, who being there incamped, and holding the towne strait by the armie at sea, there came to the succours of the towne, fiue hundred Almain horsemen, and a regiment of fiue thowsand footemen: for whose comming those that were within the towne, yssuing out to assaile the Venetian companies, They were put to flight with a great slaughter of men, and no lesse losse of artillerie, besides that with certaine ships, they tooke from them a gally with many other vessells: After this victorie the Almains tooke Monfalcon by force: and not many dayes after foure hundred horsemen & xij hundred launceknights that had bene at Vincensa, came as a strength to them of Marano, who ioyning with the other bands of horsemen and footemen newly come into Fryull, ouerronne the whole contry: By reason of which oppressions, Malatesta Sogliano gouernor of the contry with six hundred horsemen and two thowsand footemen, together with Ier. Sauorgnano and two thowsand of the contry men, who were now withdrawne into Vdino, seeing neither by their vallour nor by their fortune they were able to make resistance, passed on the other side of Lyuensa, giuing succours where they could: But the Almains being deuided, one part of them tooke Feltro & occupied the whole contrey thereabout with roades and incursions: Amyd which insolencies the Venetians that commaunded all the passages, charged certeine bands of them at Bassan where they kept no garde, And albeit they were lesse in number, yet they put them to flight and killed three hundred footemen of the fiue hundred that were there, and tooke prisoners two Capteines and many souldiours: The other part of th Almains was gonne to incampe at Osoff standing vppon the toppe of a sharpe Mounteine, And after they had executed vppon the castell with their artilleries, and giuen many vayne assaultes, they hoped to carrye it by besieging, hauing some assurance from them within of a want and necessitie of water: but the benefite of the heauen remedied that wante by the sodayne falling of sundry great showres, wherevpon they continued a fresh thassalt, but with so yll succesſe, that finding neither fruite in the assault, nor fauour in the siege, they leauyed their camp. These matters were not a litle grieuous to the Pope, but the thing that troubled him moste, was, that he coulde finde no meane of agreement to content both parties; for that becauſe of the continual variation of things, the hopes chaunging according to the succesſe of the same, it fell out that when Cæsar had consented to leaue Vincensa, keping still Verona, the Venetians refuſed vnleſſe they were repoſſeſſed of Verona: And when the Venetians muche embaſed by their calamities, would be contented with Vincensa onely, Cæsar on the other side, not satisfied with Verona, required also Vincensa. These difficulties made wearie the Pope, who though he suppoſed that his declaration would not be accepted, yet to showe that it was not long of him that they were not reconciled, he pronounced a peace betwene them, with this clauſe that armes should be presently layde aside on all sides: he reſerued to himſelfe this power, to expreſſe within one yere the conditions of the peace, wherein, as also in the surceaſſing of armes, the king Catholike should be comprehended: That Cæsar should depoſe out of his handes Vincensa, and all elſe that he and the Spaniards poſſeſſed in the countreys of Padoa and Treuisan: That the Venetians should do the lyke for Crema: And for other things, euery one vntill the publication, should hold what he poſſeſſed: That eyther partie should ratifie his sentence within a moneth, and vpon the ratification the Venetians to paye to Cæsar xxv. thousande ducketts, and as muche more within three monethes next: That if both parties did not ratifie, the sentence should be of none effect. He choſe this maner of arbitrating & iudgement not accuſtomed, as the moſt indifferent not to diſpleaſe neyther side: And becauſe there was no man had power to ratifie for the king Catholike, notwithſtanding his Embaſſador gaue assurance of his consenting, he reſerued to eyther partie ſo much time to ratifie, as the commiſſion and facultie to do it might conueniently require: But becauſe the Venetians were reſolute not to ratifie it at all, deſiring that at the same tyme the conditions of peace might be pronounced, the sentence tooke no effect.

In this tyme the affayres of the Venetians stoode in good caſe touching the defence of Crema, which was afflicted within with plague and penurie, and without was beſieged with the campe of thenemies: Proſpero Colonno was come on the one side to Eſeuanga with two hundred men at armes, two hundred and fyftie light horſmen, and a strength of two thouſande footemen: And on the other side was come to Vmbriana Siluio Sauello with his guydon of horſmen and a regiment of two thouſande footemen: Both the places were not aboue two myles diſtant from Crema, from whence the ſouldiors made many ſallyes to skirmiſhe with thenemies: who as they were in their lodgings at Vmbriana, neither making doubtes nor keeping garde, Ranſo de Cero with one parte of his companies that were within Crema, iſſued out one night, and gaue them a Camueſado in their lodging, when ſuffring the paynes of their owne ſecuritie and negligence, the moſte of them were put to flight, and many of their footemen paſte by the ſworde: This made Proſpero retyre with his companies, eſteeming it litle to his ſafetie to remayne there, where the negligence of his fellowes had opened ſo manyfeſt a gappe to his perill. A fewe dayes after, thoccaſion was offred to Ranſo to paſſe the ryuer of Adde by foarde, by reaſon of the lownes lownes and ſhalownes of the water: And hauing drawne ouer his companies at Chaſtillon Lodigiano, he ſtripped a regiment of fiftie men at armes that lay there, reaping no leſſe prayſes of theſe enterpriſes both happie and full of induſtrie, then were due to him by iuſte merite vppon the vniuerſall beginning: the reputation of hys vallour and celeritie made him to be eſteemed one of the principall Capteines in all the regions of Italie, wanting nothing to his worthynes that either nature or fortune could giue him. Theſe doings drewe the Venetians to a reſolute councell and courage to proceede to the reconquering of Friull, in which expedition they ſente thither Aluiano with two hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſemen, and ſeuen hundred footemen: as they marched along the high way of Portonouo, where lay part of the ſtrength of th Almains, his light horſmen that ſcoured before, encountred out of the towne with capteine Riſſan an Almain, accõpanied with two hundred men at armes and three hundred light horſmen, by whom at the firſt encounter they were repulſed, but Aluiano comming to the reskew with the reſidue of his companies, the skirmiſh was eftſones recontinued with greater fury & daunger, & no leſſe doubtfull thiſſue, till capteine Riſſan being wounded in the face, was taken priſoner by Malateſta Sogliano: The chaunce of the fight threw the next calamitie vpon the ſouldiors of Riſſan, who ſeeking their ſauety by diſorder and fleing, retyred in their calamitie to Portonouo: But fearing they ſhould fayle to defend the towne, that were not hable to kepe the feelde, in their feare they fledde from the place that earſt they ranne vnto for ſuccour, abandoning the towne which immediatly was put to ſacke, and many bodies of the contrey men ſlaughtred. After this Aluiano, in whom no one vertue was more cõmendable then his celeritie, tooke the way to Oſofo, which Frangipan had newly beſieged with the other part of the Almains, who hearing of the cõming of Aluiano, leauied their ſiege, notwithſtanding they loſt much of their baggage and artilleries, by a charge which the light horſemen gaue vpon their tayle. By the fame of theſe encounters, bringing alwayes with them their victories, almoſte the whole contrey of Italie became returned to thobedience of the Venetians: and Aluiano attempting a vayne enterpriſe vpon Goritia, retyred with his armie to Padoa, hauing by his owne certificate to Rome, ſubdued what by the ſworde and priſoners, two hundred men at armes, two hundred light horſmen, and two thouſande footemen: But by reaſon of his departing, the number of th Almains being encreaſed, they tooke of newe Cromonio and Monfalcon, and conſtrayned the Venetians to breake vp their ſiege from before Marano, where not manye dayes before, capteine Frangipan had bene taken by ambuſh & led priſoner to Venice: for the Venetians feeling ſupplies and ſuccors to flocke, brake vp from thence in diſorder and as it were diſcomfited: and a litle after their eſtradiots beeing put to flight, Iohn Vetturio their aſſiſtant was taken with an hundred horſemen. Theſe chaunges and alterations hapned oftentimes in Friull by the neighborhoode of th Almains, who were not ſerued in that quarter with other ſouldiors then trayned & diſciplined, and ſuch as after they had ouerronne & pilled thoſe quarters, and that they perceiued the comming of the Venetian regiments, with whom many of the contrey ioyned, they retired immediatly to their houſes, returning alwayes to the ſeruice as occaſion ſerued. The Venetians ſent thither a new ſupply of cõpanies, by reaſon wherof the Viceroy gaue order that Alarſon one of his Spaniſh capteins which lay betwene Eſte, Montagnano, & Cologno, ſhould go to Friull with two hũdred men at armes, an hundred light horſmen, & fiue hundred footmen: but vnderſtanding on the way that a truce was made in the contry by reaſon of the harueſt, he brake off his purpoſe & returned frõ whẽce he came.

The hopes of the Frenche king.

Thus as the warres of Italie proceeded mildly and in an easie course, so also the practises of peace and agreement were not discontinued: for the Frenche king being not altogether depriued of hope that the Svvizzers woulde consent to receiue recompense of money in place of resignation of his interestes and rightes, sent to solicite them in that poynt with great instance: But the Communalties were so farre estraunged from the king and his affayres, that after they had compelled with many threatninges the gouernour of Geneua (when thostages fled) to deliuer them as prisoner the president of Grenoble, whom the king had sent to that Citie to negociate with them: They examined him with many torments whether any of their nation receyued any increase of pensions, or interteined secret intelligence with the French king: wherein no humanitie nor iustification was sufficient to stoppe the course of their barbarous crueltie. Besides, the Frenche king was not without suspicion, that the Pope, who for the diuersitie of his plottes and intentions, was constrayned to sayle with great warynes amongst so many rockes, would secretly worke the Svvizzers not to couenaunt with the king without him: Not that he doubted he would stirre them vp to make warre, from which he disswaded them so muche as he coulde, but to remayne firme in thaccorde of Dyon, or else for feare that with this beginning they were not brought to be separate from him. In these regardes the king threatned that he would make hast to come to accord with the residue, for that he alone would not stande thrust out to the battery of the whole world: he was also weary of thintollerable expences and insolencies of souldiors, for that hauing called into Fraunce twentie thousande Launceknightes, whom he could not haue altogether but when the king of Englande laye before Tornay, he would not sende them backe agayne, but reteyned them in Fraunce, to haue them ready for employment in due time according to occasion and necessitie. These were they that did infinite harmes in his countrey, with whom his authoritie was litle respected, that by force was not hable to represse their insolencies. In these difficulties, and in so great confusion of affayres, the onely matter that began to open to the French king the waye to his surety and hope to repossesse his first power & reputation, was, the incredible discontentment that the king of Englande receyued of the renouation of the truce which his father in lawe had made: A matter contrary to his faith & promise many times reitterated, to make no couenant nor cõtract with the french king without his consent: he complayned so much the more publikely of this, by howmuch it was the thirde tyme that his father in lawe had dallyed with him, and therefore he began more and more to estraunge his minde from the renewing of the warre agaynst the French. The Pope was not negligent to take thoportunitie of the kings disposition, and began to worke with the Cardinal of Yorke to perswade his king, that contenting himselfe with the glorie he had gotten, and remembring what correspondancie of fayth he had founde in Cæsar, in the king Catholike, and the Svvizzers, he would forbeare to trauell any more with armes the realme of Fraunce: which the Cardinall tooke vpon him eyther for a feare he had that the Frenche king (in case the king of Englande would inuade him) would not make peace and parentage with Cæsar and the king Catholike as he alwayes threatned: or else he thoughte that peace ensuing betweene them, it were good for him to aduaunce him selfe as an actor, and winne some fauour with the Frenche king in an action whiche was not in his power to lette. It is moste certayne, that when the Pope was tolde that the Frenche king woulde take armes agaynst the duchie of Millan, being once assured of the king of Englande: he aunswered that he knewe well enough the estate of that daunger, but on the other side was to be considered the perill that might breede of the disunion of those kings: that in a matter of so greate importance it was harde to ballance things perfectly, and to finde a councell that were wholly cleare from those daungers: That in all euentes the Svvizzers woulde defende the duchie of Millan: And lastly he answered that it was necessarie in deliberations so vncertayne and difficulte, to referre one part to tharbitrement of aduenture and fortune. What soeuer was the cause, eyther for the authoritie of the Pope, or by the proper inclination of the parties, there began immediatly a practise of accorde betwene the king of Englande and the Frenche king: The mocions and forespeeches of it were begon by the Pope with the Bishop of Yorke, and were with diligence caryed into England, whither for that busines the king sent the generall of Normandy, but vnder culler to treate for the deliuery of the Marquis of Rhothelin: Assone as he was come there was proclaymed a surceassing of armes by lande onely betweene the two Realmes, so long as the generall remayned in Englande. The king of Englandes inclination to peace was encreased by the occasion of newe iniuries: for where Cæsar had promised not to ratifie without him, the truce made by the king Catholike, he sent notwithstanding to the same king thinstrumente of ratification, and by a letter whiche he wrote to the Frenche king, he ratified in the name of Cæsar, but reteyned thinstrument the better to vse his artificiall semblaunces and demonstrations: Assone as the negociation was begonne betweene the two kinges, the Pope desirous to purchase grace with them bothe, sente by poste into Fraunce the Byshoppe of Tricaro to offer him all his authoritie and facultie, and to that ende he arryued in Englande by the suffraunce of the sayde king: At the firste opening of this practise for peace, there fell out manye difficulties, for that the kinge of Englande demaunded Boleine in Pikardye, wyth a greate summe of money: But at laste all the differences fell vppon the towne of Tornaye, the kinge of Englande stryuing to reteyne it, and the French obiecting some difficultie: In so muche as the king of Englande dispatched in poste to the Frenche kinge the Bishop of Tricaro, whom he charged, without imparting in what nature of particularitie consisted the difficultie, to declare to the king from him, that in regarde of so greate a benefite, he shoulde not stande vppon so many suttle difficulties, but to consider that in a Prince reason shoulde beare more imperie then passion. The Frenche kinge, because he woulde neither do wrong to his Crowne, nor yll content hys people, the towne of Tornay beeing verie noble and loyall to the Crowne of Fraunce, caused the matter to be debated in full Councell, wherein was an assistaunce of the principalles of his Courte, who aduised him with one voyce to embrace peace, yea vnder the condition offred: And yet in that tyme the kinge Catholike dyd what he coulde to breake it, offering the king manye plottes and deuises, but specially to minister to hym all his meanes and fauours to conquer the duchie of Millan: But the aunswere beeing returned into Englande that the Frenche king stoode contented with the resolution of Tornaye, the peace succeeded and was concluded in the beginning of August betweene the two kings duryng theyr lyues and for one yeare after their death.

Treatie of peace betwene Englande and Fraunce.

In the capitulation it was expressed that Tornay should remayne to the kinge of Englande, to whome the Frenche kinge shoulde paye sixe hundred thowsande crownes, and that in suche sorte of distribution that the Frenche kinge shoulde make payment of an hundred thousande frankes euery yeare, till the full payment was satisfied: That they shoulde bee bounde to defende their estates mutually and reciprocally with tenne thousande footemen if the warre wente by lande, and with six thousande onely if the warre were made by sea: That the french king should be bounde to serue the king of Englande in all hys affayres with twelue hundred launces, and the king of Englande likewise to minister to his seruices with ten thousande footemen: The expences to be defrayed by either of them that should haue nede of the men: Both the one and other of them named the Skottishe king, tharchduke, and the Empire: But Cæsar and the king Catholike were not named: The Svvizzers had a nomination, but it bare a condition, that who soeuer woulde defende agaynst the French king, the estate of Millan, Genes, or Ast, should be excluded out of the nomination. This peace which was made with a wonderful readines, was confirmed by the mariage of the kings sister of Englande with the Frenche king, vnder condition that he should acknowledge to haue receiued foure hundred thousand crownes for her dowry: The contract or handfestings were made in Englande, where the king Catholikes embassador was not in presence, for the great hatred the king of Englande bare to the king his maister. And euen vpon the conclusion and resolution of this peace, came to the Courte of Fraunce thinstrument of ratification which Cæsar had made, together with his commission and the king Catholikes, for conclusion of the mariage that was solicited betwene Ferd. d'Austriche and the seconde daughter of Fraunce not yet foure yeares of age: But the practise of that mariage vanished presently by reason of the peace that was now established: And the Frenche king to satisfie better the king of England, gaue order that the Duke of Suffolke Capteine generall of the Launceknightes that were in his pay, should departe the dominions of Fraunce, in whom the honors & recompences that the king made to him ouercame all occasions of discontentment, the bountie and liberalitie of the one, being no greater then the affabilitie and disposition of the other.

The Pope had also in this time made new aliances, for that according to his dissimulations, he wished on the one side that the frēch king should not recouer the duchie of Millan, and on the other side he sought to enterteine the king and the other princes as much as he could with sundry meanes: And therfore he had delt with the king by the Cardinall S. Seuerin, who managed his affayres in the court of Rome, that seing the times suffred not to knit betwene them a more great and more discouered aliance, that at least there might be layed a beginning & fundation whervpon might be raysed a hope to accomplish at an other time a more straite intelligence: to those ends he sent him the particularities of articles: But the french king, notwithstanding he made demonstration to like well of the motion, did not answer so directly & spedily as was looked for: he was xv. dayes in resoluing, either for thimpedimēt of other affayres, or that he exspected some answere from an other place, to thende to proceede according to the trayne of affayres, By which delaying the Pope entred into newe capitulations for a yere with Cæsar and the king Catholike, which yet comprehended no other matter then the defence of their common estates: for the king Catholike was entred afore not without cause into suspicion that he aspired to the realme of Naples for Iulian his brother, and had already enterteyned in that action some practise with the Venetians. This newe confederation was scarcely established and concluded, when the French kings answere came: By it he approued all that the Pope had propounded, with this onely addition, that since he was to bynde hym selfe to the protection of the Florentins, of Iulio de Medicis hys brother, and Lavvrence hys nephew, whom the Pope had aduaunced to thadministration of thaffayres of Florence, that he woulde reciprocally be bounde to the defence of the Crowne of Fraunce: But the Pope excused him selfe touching the action of capitulation with Cæsar and the king Catholike, that seeing how long he deferred to make aunswere to a demaunde so reasonable, he coulde not but enter into some doubt: And yet the confederation was but for a short time, and conteined no matter preiudiciall to him, nor to hinder the perfection of the practise begonne betwene them. These iustifications were accepted by the king, and so they passed the couenaunt, not by instrument authentike, to hold it more secret, but by a priuate writing subsigned by both their handes.

The peace betwene the king of Englande and the French king was more sodayne and easie then was exspected, being vnlikely that so great hatreds redoubled by new iniuries, should with such facilitie be conuerted into amitie and aliance: happly the peace was not liking to the Pope, who aswell as others was perswaded that there might grow betwene them rather a truce then a peace, or at least if it resolued to the nature of a peace, it would eyther intangle the king with harder conditions, or at least with obligation not to assayle the duchie of Millan for a certayne tyme: But it brought incredible discontentment to Cæsar and the king Catholike, who, as there is none euill in humaine actions which hath not ioyned with it some good, so he assured notwithstanding that he receiued by it in his minde two contentmentes: The one for that tharchduke his nephewe beeing out of hope to giue his sister for wife to the Frenche king, and entring withall into distruste of the king of Englande, would be nowe compelled to do nothing without his counsell and authoritie: The other for that the Frenche king standing nowe in good possibilitie of children, the succession of Monsr de Angonlesme was put in doubt, to whome he bare no little hatred, for that he norished a great desire to restore the king of Nauarre to his estate; Onely the Svvizzers gaue it out that they reioyced all at that accorde, notwithstanding they reteyned agaynst the French king the same hatred they did before: The reason of their gladnes grew of an opinion they had, that the french king being now at libertie, would take occasion to recontinue the warre in the duchy of Millan, by which meane they should eftsones begin to declare to all the world their vertue and their fayth: And truely it was not to be doubted, that the french king, being now deliuered almost of al feare to haue warre beyond the Mountes, would not be touched with his old desire to reconquer the duchy of Millan: only it could not be discerned whether he would presently dispose him selfe to armes, or deferre it tyll the yeare following, for that the facilitie of thenterprise appeared to all men, but there was none that discerned any signe of preparations: In whiche vncertayntie the Pope, notwithstanding that conqueste was grieuous to him, stirred him vp not to deferre nor corrupt the present occasions: wherein he gaue him to vnderstande that all thinges were yll prepared to make resistance, both for that the Spanishe armie was diminished and yll payed, the peoples of Millan reduced to great pouertie & straitnesse, and also none was hable to aduaunce money to make the Svvizzers march. These perswasions caryed so muche the greater force and authoritie, by how much a litle before the peace with the king of Englande, the Pope expressing a desire that the Frenche king should recouer Genes, had giuen him a certayne hope to induce Octauian Fregoso to compound with him. Assuredly the Pope in this action proceded not with sinceritie & good meaning, which disposition moued in him as was supposed, for that seeing euery one yll furnished, and no lesse doubting least the French king woulde make that expedition without his councell since he had his men at armes in readynes and many leauyes of Launceknightes at his deuotion:

thought by that meane to preuent and winne his frendship: perhappes (and in this he proceeded with greater suttletie) he was enduced by the knowledge he had that the Emperour and the king Catholike were of opinion, that it was not lawfull to the French king to inuade the Duchie of Millan: An opinion which though they supposed to be true, yet the Frenche king denied it, aduowing that it was good in him, & he was not forbidden to take armes against the estate of Millan during the truce: By reason whereof the Pope perswading him selfe that the king would not enter into thenterprise, thought he would expresse to him a good disposicion of will which also should serue him for excuse if an other time he required succours of him: And the matter succeded according to his opinion: for, the king being resolued, either for that cause, or for his present necessitie of money, or lastly for the nearenes of the winter, not to enter into armes affore the spring time, and making show that he had confidence that euen in that time the Popes fauor woulde not faile him: he wrote aunswere to him alleaging many excuses touching his deferring, but concelled the excuse of the truce which yet endured, and perhappes was the principall: Neuertheless he had desire to attempt the reconquering of Genes, or at least to succour the lantern, which the same yere by his direction, had bene reuittelled many times with certaine proporcions of vittels by the aduenture of sundry smal vessels, who making as though they woulde enter the porte of Genes, dissembled with the warders, and were profitable to them of the lantern: But at last the extremitie of vittells growing aboue all remedie, and no lesse diligence of the enemie to keepe them suppressed in that want, & their calamitie not able to temporise and expect any longer after succours, the garrison within, was driuen to yeelde it vp to the Genouvais, who in their spite rased it from the fundacions: A matter not a litle displeasing to the king: And albeit the losse of this fortresse tooke wholly from the king all cogitacions to vrge a present warre against the Genouvaies, yet it diminished nothinge his disposicion to the action of Millan, whereunto he turned all his preparacions, to inuade the yeare following that state with maine armies: he hoped that the Pope, both for the deuout intencion he protested, and for the good disposicion he had shewed in the negociacions with th English and the Svvizzers, and lastly for that he had prouoked him to thenterprise, would ioyne with him and fauor thaction, the rather for that he had made him many generall offers, and perticularly had promised to aide him to reconquer the realme of Naples, either to the vse of the Church, or to the benefit of Iulio his brother: But there hapned new occasions for the which the king beganne to enter into some distrust of him: The Pope would neuer put ende to the affaires that the Duke of Ferrara had with him, notwithstanding at his first aspiring to the Popedom, he had giuen him many faire hopes, promising to rēder to him Reggia at such time as his brother the Cardinal should be returned from Hungria: But he was more liberall to promise, then readie to performe, for that after the returne of his brother, he went alwayes in deferring with many excuses: And yet he forbare not to confirme to him the selfe same promises not onely with wordes, which might be vaine and vnassured, but by wryting sette out vnder thauthoritie and testimonie of his name, in which he consented that he should take the reuenues of Reggia as a degree to the whole which was to returne vnder his dominion: it was wel knowen that the Popes intencion was farre otherwise, dissembling in meaning the thinges he had simplie spoken with his mouth: his inclination and desire to occupie Ferrara were stronger then his promise and true meaning, whereunto happily he was caried by Albert de Carpy Cæsars Embassador and great enemy to the Duke, and also by the

reasons of many others, setting before his eies the glorie of Iulio which was perpetuall, for that he had so greatly aduaunced & augmented the dominion of the church: And sometimes they preferred thoccasion to bestow an honorable estate vpon Iulio his brother, who thirsting after too great thinges, and nourishing him selfe with hopes immoderat, had voluntarily consented that his Nephewe Lavvrance, should reteyne at Florence the authoritie of the house of Medicis: so that the Pope being entred into these thoughts, obteyned of Cæsar who was alwayes needy of money, to deliuer to him in morgage the citie of Modona for xl. thowsand duckats according to the capitulacion made with him a litle affore the death of the late Pope: he made his reckoning to vnite that citie with Reggia, Parma, and Pleisanca, and to giue them in patronage or perpetual gouernmēt to Iulio, adding to them Ferrara, if euer thoccasion serued him to get it: he sought to doe a thing by authoritie and fauor of tymes, which he could not doe by equitie or lawefull course of iustice: But that manner of morgaging put the french king into great suspicion, for that in his conceit it caried a manifest signe of straight alliance with Cæsar, being also no lesse discontented that the Pope had giuen him money: Whereof notwithstanding, the Pope excused him selfe, alleaging that Cæsar had deliuered Modena to him for assurance of the money which he had receiued of him affore: The king on the other side augmented his suspicion, for that vppon a victory which the Turke gotte vpon the Sophy king of Persia, the Pope construing it to the vniuersall daunger of Christendom, wrote letters to all Princes, aduising them to depose armes amongst them selues, to resist or inuade the common enemies of the faith: he protested one thing vnder his letters, and practised an other by operacions secret, proceeding alwayes with faire apparances, and yet holding his intencions dissembled: But the matter that almost altogether disclosed his purposes, was, that he sent vnder the same shadowe and pretence, to Venice, Peter Bembo his Secretorye, and afterwards Cardinall, to dispose that state to agree with Cæsar, towards whom the same difficulties continuing that had bene before, the Venetians would not be wrought, but manifested to the french king thoccasion of his comming: A dealing that did so much discontent the king, that the rather for that the Pope sought to depriue him of his succours at a time when he was ready to aduaunce armes, he renewed eftsoones with the king Catholike the auncient practises, and that either to thende the Pope should be touched with that feare, or at least if he were careless, to conclude absolutely: so hot he was aboue all other thinges in the expedicion of Myllan.

Emocions against the Venetians and of the Venetians.

In those tymes there were not in any quarter of Italy other stirrs or emocions, thē against the Venetians, against whom were raysed many secret ambushes and conspiracies: for, according to the testimonie of their Cronicles, certeine spanish footemen feyning to be fugitiues from thennemies campe, entred Padoa with mindes to kill Aluiano by direction of their Capteines, who hoped by the trouble and disorder of the people for the death of such a Capteine, they should be able with their campe to cary the towne: So different at this day are the stratagemes of warre from the vertue of thauncients, who much lesse that they would subborne an instrument to so great a trayson, but of the contrary hauing knowledge of it, they would lay it open to thennemies, to thende that by their vertue they might vanquish thinfidelitie pretended: but the conspiracie being detected, the Magistrates committed the traytors to the due paynes of their offence.

The spanish armie, being now wel diminished in numbers, lay incamped betwene Montagnano Cologno, and Este: And the Venetians, to thend to constraine them to returne to the kingdome of Naples, leauyed an armie at sea, and made their Admirall or capteine generall Andrea Gritti, whom they thought to sende to inuade Povvilla: But for many difficulties that happned, that expedition went no further, beeing assone discontinued as it was thought vpon. Afterwards the Spaniardes came to the towre neare Vincensa by the perswasion of th Almains that were within Verona, to thende to ioyne with them in an enterprise to waste and ouerronne the corne of the Padoans: But after the Spaniards had taryed in that place in vayne many dayes, being both reduced to a very small number, and not hable to accomplishe the promisses vnder the which they had called them, they left there their enterprise to spoyle their corne, forbearing in suche rashnes to do a violence which would draw with it a greater reuenge then was the iniurie: And after they had gotte of the Almains xv. hundred footmen, they marched with seuen hundred men at armes, seuen hundred light horsemen, and three thousande fiue hundred Spanishe footemen, to incampe before Citadella, wherein were three hundred light horsemen: they marched with great diligence all the night, and came to the place within two howres in the moatning, and falling to batter it with their artilleries, they caryed the towne the same day at the seconde assault: they made prisoners all the lighte horsemen that were there, and so returned to their campe lying within three myles of Vincensa, Aluiano making no resistance: He had receyued speciall commaundement from the Senate not to feight, and lay incamped vpon Brenta with seuen hundred men at armes, a thousande light horsemen, and seuen thousande footemen, And the place beeing strong by situation and defence, gaue him great oportunitie to vex thenemies with his light horsemen: Neuertheless a litle after, he retyred to Barsillon almost afore the gates of Padoa, to thend to drawe his armie into a place of suretie: But the whole countrey beeing turned into spoyle and waste, by the pillages that were made by both the Armies, the Spaniards hauing great want of vittells, retyred to their first lodgings from whence they were come, leauing abandoned the citie of Vincensa and the rocke of Brendola, which is about seuen myles from it: They releeued themselues with no other subsidies or payments then with the taxations which they imposed vpon Verona, Bressia, Bergama, and other places thereaboutes. Vpon the retyring of the Spaniards, Aluiano bestowed himselfe with tharmie betwene Batallo and Padoa, the place being strong and proper: and there vnderstanding that there was within Este a very small and negligent garrison, he sent thither by night foure hundred horsemen and a thousande footemen, who being entred afore they were descerned, tooke fourescore light horsemen of capteine Coruero, who saued himselfe in the Castell, and with that pray retyred to tharmie. But the Venetians hauing sent to tharmie freshe bandes of souldiors, Aluiano drewe neare to Montagnano, and presented the battell to the Viceroy, who refused to accept it beeing farre inferior in forces, and so retyred to Polesina de Rouigno: An oportunitie agreeing to the courage of Aluiano, who hauing nowe no more impedimentes beyonde Adice, made dayly incursions euen to the gates of Verona: the same so touching the Viceroy with the daunger of that Citie, that leauing within Polesina, three hundred men at armes and a thousande footemen, himselfe with the residue of tharmie went to the defence of that Citie, disposing his forces not sufficiently according to the state of his perills, but aswell as he was hable according to the necessitie of the time.

Farre greater difficulties began to kindle towards Crema, which was almoste besieged by the companies of the duke of Millan bestowed in the townes and villages thereabouts: for the towne suffred great affliction of famine, great stroke of plague,

great disorder of souldiors for want of pay, vniuersall lacke of munitions, with other particular prouisions which had bene many times demaunded: Aduersities which Ranso distrusting to be hable no longer to susteine, had made him almost to protest to the Venetians: And yet the same fortune following him with some fauor & countenaunce, he set vpon Siluio Sauello, whose strength was two hundred men at armes, an hundred light horsemen, and xv. hundred footemen, and charging him vpon the sodayne, he so put him to discomfiture that he fledde to Lode onely with fiftie men at armes, seeking safetie rather at aduenture and by chaunce, then by confidence in his vallour and proweſſe. After this the Venetians reuitteled Crema the second time, and the Count Nicholas Scot put into it xv. hundred footemen: In so much as both the forces and courage of Ranso rising increased, he entred a fewe dayes after the Citie of Bergamo, being called in by the townesmen, and the Spaniards fleing to the Chappell. At the same time also Mercurio and Malatesta Baillon tooke three hundred horsmen that were stragling without: but not long after, as Nicholas Scot went from Bergamo to Crema with fiue hundred Italian footmen, he was encountred with two hundred Swvizzers, who ouerthrewe his companies, and tooke him prisoner, and ledde him to the duke of Millan, who caused his head to be striken of. This losse of Bergamo awaked the Viceroy and Prospero Colonno, who went and incamped there with fiue thousande footemen ioyned to the regiments of the Spaniards, and to the bands of the duke of Millan: They planted their artilleries agaynst S. Katherins gate, whiche though it made valiaunt resistance, yet Ranso beeing within, and seeing no possibilitie of long defence, left the towne to discression, compounding to departe with the lyues and goods of all his souldiors, but without sounding of trompet, and with their ensignes wrapped vp: The Viceroy taxed thinhabitantes of Bergamo at iiij. score thousande duckets. But amidde these actions and seruices at Crema and Bergamo, an other exployte of greater worthines and more full of industry and celeritie, was executed by Aluiano in the towne of Rouigno, wherein was a garrison of two hundred men at armes spanish, who thought them selues to stand in suretie for that they had the ryuer of Adice betwene them and the Venetian bandes: Aluiano when was least doubt of him, cast a bridge neare the towne of Anguillaro, and by his industrie and diligence made him a passage ouer the ryuer, with a company of souldiers resolute and trayned, and no impediment of stuffe or baggage to hinder thenterprise, which was to be executed as muche with celeritie as with vallour: And as he was arriued at the towne, and had possessed the gate by the stratageame of a hundred footemen attyred like paysantes whom he had sent before vnder the cullor and occasion of the market that was kept there that day, he easily made him selfe Lorde of the whole, and tooke prisoners all the men at armes that he founde there: In this enterprise he preuayled as muche by pollicie as by vertue, which two properties in a man of warre are equally required: and turning neither the one nor the other into rigour nor blood, he accompanied his vallour with clemencie, and spared the liues of those whom his fortune & the course of armes offred to the edge of his sworde: By reason of this aduenture, the residue of the Spaniardes that were lodged at Polisena, retyred into thabbay, as to the strongest place in the countrey, and afterwards leauing abandoned all Polisena and Leguagua, they fledde towards Ferrara, carrying with them more feare then hope of safety. Immediatly after the taking of Rouigno, Aluiano marched with tharmie to Oppiano neare to Leguaguo, whither he caused to be brought by the ryuer certayne armed barkes: and so he went on to Villacero neare to Verona, with this resolution, that if from that place he should not be hable to take

Verona, wherein was a ſtrength of two thowſande ſpaniſh footemen and a thowſand launceknightes, at leaſt he would kepe it in vexacion & torment all the winter long: But being aduertiſed that an armie of three hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and ſix thowſande footemen of thenemies, were gone vp towardes Leguaguo, he came out of that place fearing leaſt they would either ſtoppe his vittels, or conſtraine him to feight: he came within the view of them going towards Adice, which they paſſed at Albaretto, with no ſmall difficulty of vittells by reaſon of thimpedimentes which the light horſemen and the armed barkes gaue them: And hearing there that the ſpaniſh army after the recouery of Bergama, returned towards Verona, he determined to abide them no longer, for which cauſe he ſent the companies of men at armes by land to Padoa, and paſſed in perſon by night by the riuer of Adice, with the footemen: he caried with him by water, thartilleries and baggage of tharmy, both to auoide the raines and myers which were great, and alſo for feare to be charged by thenemies to whome the waters that were then riſen very high, gaue great impediments: And aſſoone as he had taken land, he retired with his accuſtomed celerity to Padoa, where the men at armes were entred two daies before: Afterwardes he diſtributed his army betwene Padoa and Treuiſa: And the Viceroy and Proſpero Colonno, after they had ſent their men to lye in garriſon at Poliſena de Rouigno, went vp to Iſpruch to conſult with Cæſar vpon theſtate of thaffaires.

This yeare the countrey of Friull remeined in tranquillitie more then was wont for the taking of Capteine Frangipan, the only man that afflicted it more then any other: And therfore the Venetians, knowing how much it imported them to reteine it, had refuſed to render it in exchaunge of Iohn Pavvle Baillon: He, for that ſolicitacion had bene made at Rome to exchaunge him for Caruaiall, had got leaue of the Spaniardes to goe to Rome, giuing his faith to returne priſoner, if the permutacion could not be agreed vppon: But for that during the treaty, it hapned that Caruaiall dyed, Iohn Pavvle affirmed that by the benefit of thaccident, he was at libertie, and ſo holding him ſelfe acquited he would no more returne to him whoſe priſoner he was: About theſe times and towardes the latter end of the yeare, the families of the Adorney & Fyeſquey entred Genes by night by a ſecret fauor and working of the Duke of Millan as was ſuppoſed: And albeit by conſpiracie and intelligence they were come as farre as the pallace greene, yet their fortune being ſomwhat inferior to the vallor of their enemies, they were chaſed out againe by Octauian Fregoſo, who going out againſt them euen vntill beyonde the barriers accompanied with the footemen of his garde, fought valliantly in his owne perſon, and put them to fleight: he was not otherwiſe wounded then in the hand, being recompenſed (beſides the honor of the victorie) with the perſons of Sy. Fyeſquo, Ier. Adorno, and Io. Camilla of Naples, as his priſoners.

Two Elephãts preſented to the Pope.

Amidde theſe affaires of warre and ſeruice, it is not vnworthy of memorie, to report that this yeare there were ſeene at Rome two Elephantes, a nature of creatures which happily had not bene ſeene in Italie ſince the triumphes & publike playes of the Romaines: Emanuell king of Portugall ſent to the Pope a very honorable Embaſſage, and withall, preſented him with two huge and ſtately Elephantes which his ſhippes had brought by ſea from India, their entring into Rome was celebrated with a very great concourſſe of people, ſome wondring at the ſtraunge forme and ſtature of the beaſtes, ſome marueiling to what vſes their nature inclined them, and ſome coniecturing the reſpectes and purpoſes of ſuch a preſent, their ignorance making their wonder farre greater then their reaſon.

But about thoſe times the frenche king, who had other cares in his minde then pompes and ſpectacles, ſolicited all ſortes of prouiſions for the warre: And albeit he was determined reſolutely to proſecute thenterpriſe of Myllan, yet, deſiring to be aſſured of the Popes will, he prayed him to declare him ſelfe in his fauor: Wherein to draw him on the rather, he confirmed to him the offers he had made to him affore, aſſuring him for ende, that if he were diſappoynted of his amitie and thexſpectacion of it, he would eſtſoones ioyne him ſelfe to thoſe condicions of Cæſar and the king Catholike, which he had already refuſed: In this demaund he debated with him the power of his kingdom, the ſtrength of his confederacions, & the proporcion of ſuccours promiſed by the Venetians: how at that time the forces of Cæſar and king Catholike were ſmall in Italy, and how both the one and other were very needy of money, and hauing no meane to pay their owne ſouldiours, much leſſe that they were able to defraie the Svvyzzers, who would not deſcend from their Mounteines without good certeinty of pay: That the popularitie of Myllan hauing proued the hard yoke of others, exſpected with an vniuerſall deſire the returne of the french iuriſdiction: That the victory of Myllan ought not to giue cauſe to the Pope to arme and band againſt him, both for that the greatnes of the kings of Fraunce in Italy, and his owne authoritie, had bene in all ſeaſons profitable to the ſea Apoſtolike, And alſo ſtanding alwayes contented with the things that of right apperteyned to them, they roſe not higher into humors of ambicion, nor once lifted vp their mindes to aſpyre to the reſidue of Italy, A matter well teſtified by ſo many experiences: That thintencion of Cæſar and the king Catholike was farre other, hauing aboue all other thinges thirſted after the whole Empire of Italy, and to ſubiect the regions thereof, either by armes, by alliances, or by pollicies: That they haue nouriſhed a perpetuall diſpoſicion of mind, to reduce into thraldom, no leſſe then other ſtates, the ſea Apoſtolike & the Popes of Rome, A deſire which all the world knew to be very auncient and reſolute in Cæſar: That therefore, he would at one time prouide for the ſewertie of the Church, defend the common libertie of Italy, reeſtabliſh the greatnes of the famulie of Medicis, and that he ſhould not be curious to employ the preſent occaſion, which would not be eſtſoones preſented neither with the fauor of a better time, nor with the oportunitie of better alliance then his. On the contrary for Cæſar & the king Catholike there wanted no perſwaſions ful of affection & efficacie that he would ioyne with them for the defence of Italy: Wherein was not forgotten to be alleaged, that if they conioyned al together, they were able to chaſſe the french king out of the duchie of Myllan, and their power was no leſſe ſufficient to defend it againſt him: That he was to remember the wronge that he had done to the king the yeare paſt, ſending money to the armie of the Svvyzzers at ſuch time as the french campe marched into Italy: Laſtly that he had to conſider that if the french king obteyned the victorie of Myllan, he would not be vnmindfull to reuenge all the wronges he had receyued, and to aſſure him ſelfe of all daungers and ſuſpicions to come: But the Pope was much more moued with the authority and offers of the Svvyzzers, who, continuing in their firſt obſtinacies, offered to commaund and defend with ſix thowſand footemen the paſſages of the Mount Senis, of the Mount Geneure, & Finalo, receiuing onely by the moneth ſix thowſand florince of Rhein: And in caſe their payes might be aduaunced to forty thowſand florince by the moneth, they offered to inuade Burgondy with twenty thowſand footemen: Theſe perplexities made the Pope doubtfull in him ſelfe, & as feare withdrew him from the thing whereunto his will did driue him, ſo, amyd ſo many variacions of mind, he deferred as much as he could, to declare his intencion, giuing to euery one, words and aunſweres generall: But being continually importuned by the Frenche king, at laſt he made him this aunſwere, that there was no perſon that knew better then him ſelfe, how much he was inclined to his affaires, being not ignoraunt with what affection he perſwaded him to paſſe into Italy at a time when he might haue victorie without daunger or great effuſion of blood: That his perſwaſions, for that thinges were not kept ſecret as he had oftentimes required him, were now come to the knowledge of others, to the common detriment of them both: for that for his parte, he ſaw him ſelfe in daunger to be aſſailed by others, & that the difficulties were become the greater for the enterpriſe of the king, ſince others had giuen ſuch order to their affaires that he could no more enter into the victorie but with manifeſt perill and lamentable ſlaughter of men: That the power and glory of the Turkes being newly increaſed by ſo great a victorie & ſucceſſe, it was neither conuenient to his condicion, nor conformable to thoffice of a Pope, either to giue fauor or counſel to Princes chriſtened, to make warre amongeſt them ſelues: And that therefore he could not otherwiſe aduiſe him, then to temporiſe & ſurceaſe, exſpecting ſome other facilitie & better occaſion, which when it hapned, he ſhoulde finde in him the ſame diſpoſition to his glory & greatnes which he hath ſo well diſcerned certaine monethes paſſed: An anſwere, which (albeit it did not in other ſorte expreſſe his conception) if it had come to the knowledge of the king, it had not onely depriued him of all hope of the Popes fauor, but alſo haue certified him that the Pope would haue ioyned and banded againſt him both with counſel & with armes: Theſe were the accidents of the yeare 1514.

The death of king Lowys the twelfth 1515.

But death, who bringeth with him this law & authority, to cut of the vaine councells of men euen in their greateſt hopes, was the cauſe that the warre ſo forward in apparaunce, burſt not out to action with that ſpeede that was exſpected: for, whileſt the French king gaue him ſelfe ouer to behold too much the excellent bewty of his new wife, bearing then but eighteene yeres of age, nothing conſidering the proporcion of his owne yeares, nor his decayed complexion, he fell into the rage of a feauer, which drawing to it a ſuddeine flux, ouercame in one inſtant the life, that nature gaue ouer to preſerue any longer: he dyed the firſt day of the yeare 1515. a day of memorie for the death of ſo great a Prince: he was a king iuſt & much beloued of his peoples, but touching his condicion, neither affore he was king, nor after he had the crowne, he neuer found conſtancy or ſtability in either fortune: for, riſing from a ſmall Duke of Orleance with great happines to the crowne, and that by the death of Charles younger then he, and two of his ſonnes, he conquered with a very great facility the Duchie of Millan and the kingdom of Naples, and almoſt all the reſidue of the regions of Italy, being gouerned for many yeares by his direction: he recouered with a very great proſperity, the ſtate of Genes that was in rebellion: & vanquiſhed with no leſſe glory the armies of the Venetians, being in perſon at both thoſe victories: But on the other ſide, euen when he was in youth and beſt diſpoſicion of body, he was conſtrained by king Lowys the eleuenth to mary his daughter that was both barren & deformed, and yet could neuer get the good will nor countenaunce of his father in law: And after his death, ſuch was the greatnes of the Lady of Burbon, that he could neuer get the inſtitucion of the newe king being then in minoritie, being almoſt compelled to retyre him ſelfe into Brittaine: where being taken in the battell of S. Aubyn, he liued two yeares in the calamity of a priſoner: To theſe afflictions may be added the ſiege and famin of Nouaro, the many diſcomfits he had in the realme of Naples, the loſſe of the ſtate of Millan, Genes, and all the townes

which he had taken from the Venctians: And laſtely the grieuous warre he had in Fraunce agaynſt very mightie enemies, his eyes beholding into what lamentable perils his realme was brought: Neuertheleſſe afore he died it ſemed he had conquered al his aduerſities, & fortune ſhewed good tokens of her reconcilement, both for that he had defended his kingdome agaynſt mighty enemies, & alſo eſtabliſhed a perpetuall peace & alliance with the king of Englande, with whom by how muche his amitie was great and aſſured, by ſo muche it gaue him hope to be hable to reconquer the duchie of Millan.

Frauncis the firſt comes to the crowne.

After Lovvis the xij. aſcended to the Crowne Frauncis d'Angouleſme, who was the next heire male of the blood royall & of the ſame line of the Dukes of Orleance: he was preferred to the ſucceſſiō of the kingdom before the daughters of the dead king by the vertue & diſpoſition of the lawe Salike, a lawe very auncient in the realme of Fraunce, which excludeth from the royall dignitie all women, ſo long as there is any iſſue male of the ſame line. The world had ſuch a hope in his vertues, and ſuche an opinion of his magnanimitie, & ſuch a conceite of his iudgement & wit, that euery one confeſſed that of very long time there was none rayſed vp to the Crowne with a greater exſpectation: he was made the more agreable to the fancies of men, by the conſideration of his age bearing then but xxij. yeres, his excellent feiture & proporcion of body, his great liberality, & general humanity, together with the rype knowledge he had in many things: But ſpecially he pleaſed greatly the nobilitie, to whom he transferred many ſinguler & great fauors. He tooke vpon him together with the title of the french king, the name of the duke of Millan: A dignitie which he ſayd apperteined to him not only by the auncient rights of the dukes of Orleance, but alſo as cōprehended in the inueſtiture that was made by Cæſar in the treaty of Cambray: Beſides there liued in him the ſame deſire to recouer it that dyed with his predeceſſor; whervnto not only the working of his owne inclination, but the perſwaſions of al the noble yong gentlemē of Fraunce did induce him, no leſſe by the memory of the glory of Gaſton de Foix, thē for the monumēt of ſo many victories as the kings raigning next afore had obteined in Italie: And yet (not to warne others afore the time not to prepare to reſiſt him) he diſſembled his deſires by thaduiſe of his graue counſelors, & in the meane while fell to practiſe the amities of other princes: frō whom were ſent to congratulate with him many embaſſadors, whō he receiued with countenaunce affable & gracious, but ſpecially the embaſſadors of the king of England, who deſired to continue with him thamity begon with his predeceſſor, the iniuries he had receiued frō the king Catholik being yet freſh in memory. There came at the ſame tyme an embaſſage frō the duke of Auſtrich, wherof the lord of Nauſan was chief, & in this embaſſage, for the regard of therle of Flaūders, wherof the kings of Fraūce are ſoueraignes, were diſcerned demonſtrations of great ſubmiſſion in acknowledging of ſuperiority: Both the one & the other of theſe embaſſages had a ready & happy expedition: for touching the king of England, the confederation betwene him & the late king, was cōfirmed vnder the ſame conditions ſo long as either of thē ſhould liue, reſeruing a reſpite of iij. yeres for the Skottiſh king to enter in it: And for tharchduke, many differences ceaſſed, which many men ſuppoſed would haue giuē great impediments to the action of the peace: But the archduke being now in full maiority, & newly taken vpon him the gouernment of his eſtates, was drawne to the peace for many cauſes: firſt for thinſtance of the peoples of Flaunders, who would in no wiſe haue warre with the realme of Fraunce: Secondly for a deſire he had to be aſſured of ſuch impediments as might be oppoſed againſt him by the French in the ſucceſſion of the realme of Spayne, when the death of his grandfather ſhould happen: And laſtly for that he thought it to great a daunger, to dwell without any league of amitie in the middeſt of the powers of England and Fraunce being conioyned together: And on the other ſide, the king deſired greatly to take awaye all occaſions that might reſtrayne him to be gouerned by thauthoritie & counſell of his grandfather, eyther by the fathers or mothers ſide: So that at laſt there was enacted betwene them in the towne of Paris, a perpetuall peace & confederation, reſeruing facultie to Cæſar & the king Catholike (without whoſe authorities tharchduke contracted) to take their place in this peace within three monethes. In this capitulation was promiſed thaccompliſhment of the mariage betwene the Archduke and Lady Renee daughter to king Lowvis, ſolicited ſo many times before: and that the king ſhould endue the mariage of Lady Renee with ſix hundred thouſande crownes and the duchy of Berry in perpetuitie aſwell for her children as for her: This dowry, in reſpect of her inſufficient age at that time, ſhould be aſſigned to her aſlone as ſhe ſhould come to the age of ix. yeres, vnder this condition notwithſtāding, that ſhe ſhould renounce al rights of inheritance either by the father or mother, & namely ſuch as might apperteine to her of the duchy of Millan & Britaine: That the king ſhould be bounde to ayde the archduke with men & ſhips to go to the kingdome of Spayne, after the death of the king Catholike: At the requeſt of the king, the duke of Gueldres was alſo named: and as ſome write, beſides the matters afore rehearſed, it was agreed that in bothe their names ioyntly, embaſſadors ſhould be ſent to the king of Aragon, to require him to publiſh tharchduke prince of the realmes of Spayne, ſuch is the title of him to whom the ſucceſſion apperteineth: That he would render the kingdome of Nauarre, & abſteine from the defence of the duchie of Millan. Here it is not to be doubted, that both theſe two Princes making this confederation, looked not more to the preſent cōmoditie that appeared, then to thobſeruatiō of the ſame in time to come: for what fundation could be layde vpon the mariage that was promiſed, the Lady Renee bearing as yet ſcarcely foure yeres: And how could it pleaſe the Frenche king that that damſell ſhould be the wife of tharchduke, who (her eldeſt ſiſter being the kings wife) had her action prepared vpō the duchy of Britaine? for that the Britons deſiring once to haue a particular duke, at ſuch time as Anne their Ducheſſe maryed the ſeconde time, agreed that the dukedome ſhould apperteine to the youngeſt of the children and diſcendantes of her, if the eldeſt were preferred to the Crowne of Fraunce. In like ſort the French king treated with the king Catholike to prolong the truce made with his predeceſſor, but to leaue out this condition not to moleſt the duchie of Millan during the truce: he hoped he ſhould afterwards compounde eaſily with Cæſar: By which reaſon he kept in ſuſpence the Venetians, who offred to renewe the league made with his predeceſſor, wiſhing that he were in his liberty to accord with Cæſar agaynſt them: But the king Catholike, notwithſtanding he ſtoode ſtill poſſeſſed of his deſire not to haue warre in the frontiers of Spayne, conſidering how great ſuſpicion the prolongation of the truce might giue to the Svvizzers, which mighte alſo be the cauſe that the Pope, who till then had bene in doubt, might turne to the french amity, refuſed at laſt to prolong the truce, but vnder the ſame conditions it had bene renued with the laſt king: So that the Pope, ſhut out of that hope, and leſſe exſpecting to contract with Cæſar agaynſt the will and councelles of that king, reconfirmed with the Senate of Venice the league, in the ſame fourme it had bene made with his predeceſſor. Nowe there remayned the Pope and the Svvizzers: Touching the Svvizzers he required that they woulde admitte his Embaſſadors,

but they refuſed to giue them ſaffe conduit, vſing the ſame rudenes they had done before: And for the Pope, vpon whoſe will depended wholly the Florentyns, he required no other thing of him, then that he would kepe him out of all bond, to thend that when by the trayne of affaires he ſhould be councelled to reſolue, it might be in his power to make choice of the better, perſwading him that he ſhould neuer finde in any, either for his owne perticular or for the aduauncement of his houſe, a greater amitie, A more aſſured faith or more honorable condicions.

After the king had layd theſe foundacions for his affayres, he beganne with great care to leauie prouiſions of money, and to encreaſe the bandes of his men at armes to the number of foure thowſand: he publiſhed that he made thoſe preparacions, not of intencion to make warre for that yeare, but onely to make head againſt the Svvyzzers, who threatned him to inuade Burgondy or Dauphine, if he would not accompliſh the couenants made at Dyon in the name of the late king: Many beleeued him in the ſemblāces he made, the rather for the example of the kings of Fraunce, who haue alwaies forborne to intangle the firſt yeare of their raigne, with newe warres: But that coniecture caried not ſuch impreſſion in the mindes of Cæſar and the king of Aragon, to whome the kinges youth was ſuſpected and the facilitie he had (more then other kinges) to commaund all the forces of the kingdom of Fraunce, and the loue of his people opening a way and readines to all that he would deſire: Beſides, they were not ignorant of the great preparacions that king Lovvys had left, the ſame making demonſtracion that ſeeing he was aſſured of the king of England, he did not of new determine to make warre, but rather did enterteyne and recontinue the plot that was layed before: Therefore becauſe they would not be taken vnprouided, they fell to ſolicit a confederacion with the Pope and with the Svvyzzers: But the Pope enterteyning both parties with wordes gracious, and ſtudying to nouriſh them all with diuers hopes, deferred ſtil to make any certaine declaracion: And touching the Svvyzzers, their former hatreds did not onely ſtill continue, but by time were made greater by increaſe of occaſions, for that the cauſes that had taken their beginning of grieſes publike, bothe for the deniall of augmentacion of their penſions, for the calling of launceknightes to the kinges paye, and for the diſdaynefull and iniurious wordes deliuered againſt their nation: were redoubled and reincreaſed of priuate ſorowes, diſpleaſures, and ambicious deſires: The ſame riſing both vppon an enuie which the Commons bare to many perticulars receiuing giftes and penſions of the king, & alſo for that thoſe factions that moſt hotly obiected them ſelues againſt ſuch as followed the french amities which commonly were called at that time Gallizzanti, being by that meane aduaunced with the fauor of the Commons, into reputacion and greatnes, feared a diminucion of their authoritie, if the common weale were of new reallied with the french: In ſo much that the councell & diſputacion of affaires paſſing, not in a courſſe of publike zeale, but with ambicion and diſſentions ciuill, & theſe bearing more credit then the Gallizanti, it was obteyned that they ſhould refuſe the vnreaſonable offers of the french king.

In this diſpoſicion of mindes and affayres th Embaſſadors of Cæſar, king of Aragon, & Duke of Myllan, aſſembled and met affore the Svvyzzers, & contracted with them in the name of their Princes, a confederacion for the defence of Italy, reſeruing a reſpit for the Pope to enter, vntil the Monday of the lent following: In this capitulacion it was agreed that to compell the french king to diſclaime all his rights & intereſts in the Duchie of Myllan, the Svvyzzers receiuing monethly of the other cōfederats xxx. thowſand duckats, ſhould inuade either Burgondy or Dauphyne, And the king Catholike with a mightie army, ſhould make ſtrong warre vpon the realme of Fraunce either vpon the ſide of Parpignan or Fonterabye: By theſe inuaſions the confederats pretended, that the french king cõpelled to apply to the defenſe of his own realme, ſhould haue no oportunitie to moleſt the Duchy of Millan, though he had made a reſolucion agreable to his will: this deliberacion of the king was kept ſecret vntill the moneth of Iune, but at laſt, ſuch was the greatnes and care of the ſeuerall preparacions, that they could no longer diſſemble ſo great and apparant ſtirres: The prouiſions of money were great & vniuerſally reached to all the parts in the realme, he leauied many bandes of launceknightes, he cauſed to be drawne towardes Lyon great ſtoare of artilleries: And had lately ſent into Guyhen to leauy tenne thowſande footemen from the marches of Nauarro, vnder Peter of Nauarro who was newly entred into his pay: This was the reaſon that he ioyned him ſelfe to the french ſeruice, the king of Aragon was diſcontented with him, and charged him moſt of all others with the ill ſucceſſe of the battell of Rauenna: he would not pay his ranſom that was rated at twentie thowſand duckats, which the late king had giuen to the Marquis of Rottelyn to recompenſe in ſome parte the hundred thowſand crownes which he had paid in England for his ranſom: but the new king electing him to his ſeruice, defraied his ranſom at his firſt comming to the crowne, & tooke him into his pay: which yet the ſayed Peter of Nauarro would not accept till, for the ſafetie of his honor, he had ſent to the king of Aragon to excuſe himſelfe, that being abandoned of him, he gaue place to neceſſitie, renouncing notwithſtanding the eſtates which he had giuen him in the kingdome of Naples: By this time it was manifeſt to all the worlde, that thoſe preparacions tended to make warre vpon the Duchie of Millan, & that the king determined to goe thether in perſon: So that the kinge beganne in demaundes and ſpeaches diſcloaſed, to require the Pope to ioyne with him, wherein he vſed beſides, many other inſtrumentes and perſwaſions, by the meane of Iulian his brother, who had newly taken for wife Philiberta ſiſter to Charles Duke of Sauoye, and aunt to the king by the mothers ſide, his dowrie being aſſigned to him vpon the hundred thowſande crownes which the Pope gaue him: This gaue the kinge ſome hope that the Pope, reſpecting the alliance, would be readily inclined to embraſe his amity, & the rather for that he hauing before treated with the king Catholike to mary Iuliã with one of his parentes which was of the houſe of Cardoua, it ſeemed he had preferred that alliance to the other more for his owne regard, then for other reaſon: he douted not alſo that Iulian would not willingly help forward for deſire to get by that meane, ſome eſtate by the which he might furniſh thexpenſes conuenient to ſo great a mariage, & with all, the better to eſtabliſh the perpetuall gouernment which the Pope had newly giuen him of the cities of Modona, Reggia, Parma, and Plaiſance: which being not ſupported by the fauor of mightie Princes, he had litle hope to be hable to keepe them after the death of his brother: But the king began euen now to fall from his hope, both for that the Pope had transferred to the king of Aragon for two yeres the moneys and collections called the Croiſſards of the realme of Spaine: whereof it was thought, he would draw by way of contribucion aboue a million of duckattes: And alſo for that he heard with great inclinacion, Alberto Carpy & Ier. Vich Embaſſadors of Cæſar and the king Catholike, who did not only keepe almoſt alwayes about him, but alſo it ſeemed the Pope did communicate with them all his councells: Neuertheleſſe the Pope interteined the king in ſuſpence, both giuing good wordes and ſhowing ſounde intencion to thoſe that negociated for the king, but alwayes without any reſolucion: as one that deſired aboue all other thinges that the Duchie of Preparacions of the frenche king againſt the Duke of Millan.

Millan

Millan shoulde not bee possessed by forreyne Princes: Therefore the king whom it imported to bee better assured of his intencion, addressed to him newe Embassadours, amongest whome was William Buda of Paris, a man in science of humanitie eyther Greeke or Latin, of most absolute and onely erudicion of all the learned men of our time: Afterwardes he sent to him in the same legacion, Antho. Maria Paluoisino, A man verie acceptable to the Pope, seeking to omitte no meane wherein might bee any oportunitie to aduaunce his purpose: But all was labour loste, for that before his comminge euen from the moneth of Iulie he had verie secretlie contracted with the others for the defense of the estate of Myllan.

Notwithstandinge seekinge to keepe couered that resolucion vntill the necessitie of affayres constrayned him to declare him selfe, and desiringe withall to publishe it with some excuse: Sometimes he required the kinge to consent that the Churche might reteyne Parma and Plaisance, and sometimes he preferred other demaundes, to the ende that any one of the thinges which he demaunded beinge refused, it might appeare that necessitie more then will, had caried him to knitte with the kinges enemies: And at that time, distrusting not to be denyed of some one of those thinges which altogether he woulde not preferre without some honest colour, he made diuerse aunsweres, doubtfull, suttle, and irresolute.

But as for the doinges of mortall men there is reserued in the infallible iustice of God, an equall measure and like proporcion of recompence, so there were others that vsed towardes him the same sleightes and suttleties wherewith he abused the kinge: For Octauian Fregosa Duke of Genes, fearinge on the one side the great preparacions of the Frenche Kinge, and on the other side holdinge for suspected the victorie of the confederates for thinclination of the Duke of Myllan and the Swvizzers to their aduersaries, had made a verie secrete contracte with the Frenche Kinge by the meane of the Duke of Burbon, and yet verie firmelye assured the contrarie to the Pope, bothe in the time of the action, and after it was resolued: Yea, because Octauian was one of the auncient frendes of the Pope, and of his brother Iulian, to whome they had borne no small fauours at suche time as he was created Duke of Genes, the Pope did so simplie beleue him, that the Duke of Myllan suspecting thinges for the rumors and brutes that went, and determined to inuade him with foure thowsande Swvizzers alreadie come to Nouarro, together with the faction of the Adorney and the Fiesquey, the Pope was the cause that thenterprise brake and passed no further.

This was the capitulacion of Octauian Fregosa: That the towne and iurisdiction of Genes shoulde bee rendered to the kinge, together with the castell: That Octauian shoulde beare no more the name of Duke, but take vppon him the name of perpetuall Gouernor of Genes for the kinge, with power to dispose the offices of Genes: That the kinge shoulde geue vnto him an hundred men at armes, the order of Sainct Michaell, And a yearelye pension duringe his life: That the king should not reedifie the fortresse of Codisa very hatefull to the Genovvais, and shoulde also recontinue and graunt to the Citie all those capitulacions and priuileages which had beene reuersed and burned by king Lovvys: That he should geue a certeyne proporcion of ecclesiastike reuenues to Federyke Archbishop of Salerno & brother to Octauian, and to himselfe certeine places in Prouence,

if euer it hapned that he were chaſſed out of Genes: When theſe matters were ſpred abroade, it was not hard for Octauian to iuſtifie his reſolucion; for that it was diſcerned of all men, that he had great reaſon to feare the Duke of Myllan and the Swyzzers: The onely thing that was noted ill in him, was, that he had ſo many tymes denied the truth to the Pope, of whom he had receiued ſo many benefits, and had broken hys promiſſe and faith, in entring into couenants without his priuitie: And yet in a long letter which he wroate to him afterwards for his iuſtificacion, he diſcourſed at large with great care and humilitie, the cauſes that had moued him; together with all the excuſes wherein he might reaſonably defend his honor and the propertie of thaction: he tolde him nothing was done in deſpiſing the reſpect and deuocion which he ought him, acknowledging in his perſon the full maieſtie of Pope and his chiefe rayſer and aduauncer: his concluſion was that it would be more hard for him to be iuſtified, if he wroate to perſons priuate, or to any Prince that meaſured thaffayres of eſtate, according to regardes priuate: But writing to a Prince wiſer aboue all others of that tyme, and to whoſe wiſedom it was ſeene he could not otherwaies ſaue his eſtate, That it was matter ſuperfluous to offer excuſes to him that ſo well vnderſtoode and knewe what was lawefull to Princes, or at leaſt what they were wont to doe, not onely when they were reduced to thoſe neceſſities, but alſo when they went about to encreaſe or make better the condicions of their eſtate.

But by this tyme, matters were wrought from wordes and councells to deedes and execucion: for, the king that was nowe come to Lyons accompanied with the whole preſence of the Nobles of Fraunce and Dukes of Lorraine and Gueldres, cauſed to marche towards Italy his power, which was the moſt mighty and floriſhing armie that had bene ſeene of long tyme: he ſtoode aſſured to haue no troubles beyond the Mountes, for that the king of Aragon, who fearing at firſt leaſt ſo great preparacions might bee turned againſt him, had armed his frontyers and perpetually vnited the Realme of Naples to the kingdom of Caſtillo, to make thoſe peoples more ready to defende it: And aſſoone as he had credible vnderſtanding, that the warre ſhould be made in Italy, he diſmiſſed all the companies he had leauyed, holding no more reckoning of his promiſſe made that yeare to the confederats to make warre vpon Fraunce, then he had done of al other couenants and contractes made to them the yeres before: So ready he was to be caried by occaſions, and ſo light to laye downe his faith and word more to the profit of his affayres, then preſeruacion of his reputacion and honor.

At the brute of the deſcending of the french king, the Viceroy of Naples, who, hauing bene many moneths as it were in truce with the Venetians, & now come to the contrey of Vincenſa to draw neare to thennemies that lay incamped in a very ſtronge place neare Vincenſa: remoued his armie to Verona, to go as he ſayd, to the ſuccours of the Duke of Myllan: And the Pope diſpatched into Lombardye his companies of men at armes with the regiments of the Florentyns vnder the gouernment of his brother choſſen Capteine of the Church, to miniſter likewiſe to the ayde of Myllan according to his reſolucion not many dayes before with the other confederats: Neuertheleſſe he forbare not to perſeuer in his fayre ſhowes and ſemblances, making the worlde to beleeue that he ſent out that ſtrength onely for the garde of Plaiſanca, Parma, & Reggia: Wherein he had ſo cunningly proceeded with thEmbaſſadors of Fraunce: That the kinge nowe doubting no more to fall to agreement with him, had diſpatched from Lyons to his Embaſſadors, A new commiſſion with authority to conclude, conſenting that the church ſhould remeine poſſeſſed of Plaisanta and Parma, vntill he had satisfied it with suche a recompence as the Pope should holde him selfe contented. But all these remedies were but cures vnperfect whose sores burst out after agayne: they were shadowes whose bodies were farre of, yea they serued for nothing, for those causes that hereafter shall be expressed: for it was a destinie set downe that the defence or losse of the Duchie of Millan should be executed onely with the daunger and blood of the Svvizzers, who not staying for any impediment or small quantitie of money in prest, discended by such heapes and trowpes into the duchie of Millan, that their armie there, was aboue twentie thousande, of whome ten thousande were drawne neare to the mountaynes. It was a councell taken amongest them, to keepe agaynst the French, the strayte passages of those valleys which beeing at the foote of the Alpes that deuide Italie from Fraunce, come to open them selues vpon the playnes of Lombardie.

The Swizzers seeke to stoppe the passage of the Frenchemen.

This councel of the Svvizzers troubled greatly the minde of the king, who afore had promised to himselfe an assured victorie by the greatnes of his forces, not remēbring that the succesſe of warre respecteth other considerations then the multitudes of souldiors: he had in his armie two thousande fiue hundred launces, xxij. thousande launceknightes ledde by the duke of Gueldres, ten thousande footemen of Peter Navarre, eight thousande Frenchemen, and three thousande laborers that were payed according to the rate of the other footemen. The king considered with hys capteines, that in regarde of the vallour of the Svvizzers, it was impossible to driue them from those strayte and strong passages, but with a farre greater number. And yet, considering the nature of those straites, so great numbers could not be but hurtfull to the seruice: and muche lesse in so litle tyme could they do any thing of consequence, and least of all be hable to nourishe any long season, so great an army in a contrey so barreine, notwithstanding there was continuall traffike of vittels to the mountaynes. Amid these difficulties, some of the capteines that were of opinion rather to diuert and drawe them away then to set vpon them, gaue counsell to sende out eight hundred launces through Prouince, and Peter Navarre by sea with his ten thousande contrey men, which should all ioyne together at Saluzine. Others were of aduise that to go so farre about were to loase too muche time, that it would weaken tharmie, and increase too muche the reputation of the enemies, who woulde not doubt to boast that they had not the corage to encounter with them: So that it was resolued, that not retyring so muche from that straite, they should assay to passe by some other way, that eyther was not kept by the enemies, or at least not so strongly defended: And that Emard de Prio with foure hundred launces and fiue thousande footemen should take the waye to Genes, not in hope to drawe them downe from their mountaynes, but to make warre vpon Alexandria and the other townes beyonde Pavy.

The French armie.

There be two wayes in the Alpes that leade ordinarily from Lyons into Italie, the one is called Monsane (a mountayne within the iurisdiction of the duke of Sauoy:) it is the shortest way, the straightest way, and most beaten way: The other is called the mounte Geneure within the gouernment of Dauphine, a way longer then the other, and leades by crookings and turnings to Grenoble: both the one and the other falleth into the way of Susa where the playne beginneth to enlarge: But the French armies are alwaies wont to passe by the Mount Geneure, notwithstanding it be a way somewhat longer, because it hath a facilitie of passage, & more conuenient to draw thartillerie: The Svvizzers that were carefull to keepe those two passages & the other pathes thereaboutes, were lodged at Susa, the cause was, that the passages which be lower drawing towards the sea, were so streate and steepe, that it seemed impossible to drawe any artillerie, being verye harde to passe thither the horses of so great an armie. On the other side Triuulco, to whom the king had giuen that charge, being followed with very many pyoners, and hauing about him men paynefull and experienced to drawe artilleries, whom he sent to searche the places that were there: went sounding the passages if he could finde libertie of way without impediment of the Swyzzers: By which occasion, the armie that for the moste parte was dispersed betweene Grenoble and Brianson, marched slowely, exspecting what should be determined, wherevnto there was a constraynt by a necessitie to abyde the prouisions of vittells.

About this time the king of Englande sent a gentleman to the French king, who was nowe departed from Lyons, to tell him on the behalfe of his king, that he ought not to passe into Italie for feare to trouble the vniuersall peace of Christendome: The cause of so great variation and chaunge of that king was, that he was ielouse of the alliance betwene Fraunce and the Archduke, fearing least the affayres of that Crowne would take a course too happy: In which considerations he began afterwards to giue willing eare to thembassadors of the king Catholike, who with continuall reasons put into his minde, howe hurtefull the greatnes of the Frenche king would be to him, in whom he coulde not hope for anye other affection then of an enemie, aswell for the naturall hatred of that nation, as for his late actions of warre and hostilitie done agaynst him: But the thing that most moued him, was the emulation and enuy of his glorie which he thought would be raysed to too high degrees if he wonne the victorie in the state of Millan: he thought in himselfe, that notwithstanding he found his kingdome in rest, and very populous for the long peace it had lyued in, together with a great masse of treasor which his father had gathered, yet he neuer had the corage tyll within certayne yeres, to inuade the realme of Fraunce, alone and enuironed with so many enemies, and broken with so many aduersities: That nowe the Frenche king, somewhat younger then he was, at suche time as he came to the crowne, albeit he founde his kingdome ouerwearyed and made poore with so many warres, durst yet in the first monethes of his raigne, go to an enterprise for the whiche so many princes were banded against him: That touching him, with all his huge preparations, and so many occasions, he had not brought into England any other profite then the citie of Tornay, and that with expences intollerable and infinite: But the Frenche king would returne with great glory into his kingdome, bringing with him the conquest of so braue a duchie, and would open the waye, and happly take the occasion affore he retyred his armie out of Italie, to inuade the realme of Naples. These were the motions that easily renewed in his minde his auncient and naturall hatred: But for that he was not at that time prepared to giue impediment to the Frenche king with armes (wherein happly he sought some occasion and cooller) he thought good to sende him this message. The king nor his armie forbare not for all that to marche, taking their waye from Lyon to Dauphine, where met with the armie the Launceknightes otherwise called the blacke bandes guided by Robert de la Marche, together with all the regimentes of lowe Almains so greatly esteemed for their vallour, their fayth, and loyaltie which they had alwayes shewed in the French seruices.

At this time Iohn Ia. Triuulco aduertised the king that his artilleries might be caryed ouer the Mountes neare the Alpes of the sea discending towards the Marquisdome of Saluzze: he wrote that the passage was full of many difficulties, but yet the ſtrength of men and inſtruments would make that eaſie which by nature was harde: And becauſe on that ſide, neither on the toppes of the Mountaynes, nor in the entry of the vallies, there was no garde, he perſwaded the king that it was better to aſſaye to ouercome the difficulties of mountaynes and the ſtraitnes of vallyes (an action with payne, but not with daunger of men) then to aduenture to winne the paſſages from the Svvyzzers whoſe vallour was not more terrible then their obſtinacie, beeing deſperate eyther to vanquiſhe or dye: Beſides, the army coulde not ſtaye there many dayes if any reſiſtance were made, for that no power or preparation was able to bring through places ſo impaſſible and barreine, ſufficient prouiſion of vittells to feede ſo many mouthes. This counſell was allowed and followed, and immediatly thartillerie that laye in a place conuenient to be turned on all partes, began to marche that way. And as Triuulco had aduertiſed the king that the difficultie to paſſe the artilleries was very great, ſo alſo he ſayde thexperience would be found harder, when it was put to action and triall: for firſt they muſt of neceſſitie mount vpon very high and ſharpe mountaynes, and that not without extreme difficultie, bothe for that there was no oportunitie of pathes or wayes, nor yet ſo muche largeneſſe of rometh as the artilleries conteined, but ſuche as was made by the ayde of the pyoners from hande to hande. There were many of thoſe laborers that marched before, whoſe ſeruice was ready, ſometimes to breake downe and enlarge the ſtraites and ſometimes to digge vp the hillockes and lumpes of earth that gaue impedimēt to the paſſage of thartilleries: from the toppes of thoſe mountaynes they diſcended by broken cliffes whoſe onely aſpect gaue feare to the beholders, into moſte deepe vallies of the ryuer of Argentiero: By the difficultie of theſe cliffes oftentimes thartilleries could not be ſuſteined, neither with the horſes that drew them whoſe number was great, nor with the ſhoulders of the laborers that guyded them, and therefore very often they were driuen to diſmount them, and in faſtning them to greate cables, they founde a waye to make them diſcende by the handes of the footemen whoſe readynes in theſe paynefull actions, was nothing inferior to the greatnes of their trauell: The labour ceaſſed not when they had ouercome the firſt mountaynes and the firſt vallies, for that they founde others which of neceſſitie they muſte paſſe with the ſame difficulties: At the laſt, about the ende of fiue dayes, the pollicie of the leaders and paynes of the labourers opened a waye for thartillerie through the mountaynes into the enlarged places of the Marquiſdome of Saluſſa: but with ſuch hardnes and importunitie of trauell, that if eyther they had encountred anye reſiſtance, or the Mountaynes had bene couered with ſnowes as they were wont to be the moſte parte of the yere, it is moſt certayne that they had taken in vayne ſo great trauell: The matter that deliuered them from the reſiſtance and impedimentes of men, was thopinion and perſwaſion of the troubleſome and impaſſible mountaines, which abuſing the Svvizzers with ſecuritie, made them to lodge without ſuſpicion at Suſa, carefully garding and watching the places which of neceſſitie muſt be paſſed by ſuche as diſcende the mount Seni or Geneura, or the mountaynes adioyning to them: And the ſeaſon of the yeare, being then vpon the tenth of Auguſt, had taken from them thimpediment of ſnowes which were already melted. At the ſame time paſſed the men at armes and bandes of footemen not without the ſame difficulties, ſome by that way, and ſome by the paſſage called la Dragoniera, & the reſidue by the high toppes of the rocke Perotta and Cuny, paſſages more lower towards Prouence. By theſe paſſages Monſr Paliſſa paſſed, to whome an occaſion was offred to do an acte worthy of memory: He departed from Singlaro with foure cornetts of lighte horſemen, and after he had marched long with great diligence by the guiding of the countrey men, he arriued without any ſuſpicion at Villafranco, a towne ſeuen myles from Saluſſa, and of the which goeth a greater fame and reputation then the qualitie of the towne requireth, for that the head of that notable ryuer of Pavv riſeth out of a place very neare it: In that towne laye lodged with his companies, Proſpero Colonno, doubting no daunger by the farre diſtance of the enemies, in whom he feared not that diligence and celeritie which him ſelfe beeing of nature ſlowe and heauy, had not wont to vſe: ſome ſuppoſe that he ment the ſame day to depart and ioyne his ſtrength with the Svvizzers, A matter wherein he might in ſome ſort abuſe his carefulneſſe: But what propertie of deſtinie ſoeuer did guyde him, it is ſure that as he was ſet at the table at dinner, the bands of ſouldiors of Paliſſa arriued, being not diſcerned of any, till the certentie of the perill tooke away all their pollicie to auoide it: They were vpon the counterskarſes of his lodging, affore he could be perſwaded that they were come: ſo profitable is celeritie in an enterpriſe, and ſo effectuall is ſodayne feare agaynſt enemies ſurpriſed: He was holpen in this action (beſides his induſtrie and ſpeede) by the towneſmen, with whom Paliſſa thirſting after ſo goodly a pray, had firſt ſecretly conſpired, and by their aydes was ſeaſed vpon their skowtes and ſentynells: So that Proſpero Colonno a capteine of ſo great name, and in whome aſwell for his authoritie in gouerning an armie, as for the credite he had in the duchie of Millan, reſted no ſmall importance for this warre, was made priſoner the xv. day of Auguſt, farre otherwyſe then apperteyned to his auncient glory: Peter Margano a Romayne was companion with him in this fortune, together with parte of his companies, and the reſidue at the firſte brute fledde in their feare to diuerſe places.

The diſcending of the Frenche armie ouer thoſe inuincible paſſages, together with the calamitie of Proſpero Colonno, chaunged the counſels of euery one, and confuſed wholly the ſtate of all affayres, kindling new diſpoſitions in the mindes of the Pope, the Viceroy, and the Svvizzers: for the Pope, who was conſtantly perſwaded that the French king coulde not paſſe the Mountes for the impedimentes of the Svvizzers, and reappoſing no leſſe in the vertue of Proſpero Colonno, was nowe galled and greeued in courage, commaunding his nephew Laurence capteine generall of the Florentins to marche but ſlowely: To him he had giuen charge to leade the armie into Lombardie, for that Iulian his brother was conſtrayned to abyde at Florence by the occaſion of a long and paynefull feuer: This Laurence beeing come to Modena three dayes after the aduenture of Proſpero, tooke occaſion to recouer the rocke of Rubiero that had bene occupied by Guido Rangon, for the which he payed him at laſte two thouſande duckets, and conſumed many dayes in the countrey of Modena and Reggia. Moreouer, the Pope hauing recourſe to his accuſtomed practiſes, diſpatched very ſecretly to the French king, Cintio his familiar friend, both to excuſe himſelfe of things that had bene paſſed tyll that day, and alſo to begin, by the meane of the duke of Sauoy, to ſolicite to compounde with him, to thende that by that beginning he might haue more facilitie to paſſe further, if the defence of the duchie of Millan fell not out well: But the Cardinall of Bibbieno with certayne others, carryed more by their priuate paſſions, then by the reſpectes and intereſtes of their prince, induced him to take a counſell more conſtrayned and ſuddayne: for they tolde him there was daunger, for the reputation of the ſucceſſe and fortunes of the Frenche, and happly by the perſwaſions and ayde of the king, the duke of Ferrara would not nowe ſtirre to recouer Modena and Reggia, and alſo the

Bentyuoleys, to repoſſeſſe their eſtate in Bologna: And therefore as amyd ſo many other trauells and perplexities, he ſhould find it a very hard matter to contend againſt ſo great a number of enemies: ſo, it imported him much more both in ſauetie and diſcreſſion of councel, to labor to winne them with ſome propertie of benefit, and in all chaunces and chaunges, to make them his aſſured friendes, diſſembling the remembrance of iniuries paſt till time brought about a better oportunitie to reuenge. They aduiſed him to reeſtabliſh the famulie of the Bentyuoleys within Bologna, and to reſtore to the Duke of Ferrara, Modena & Reggia: A councell which he had preſently put in execucion, had it not bene for the contrary working of Iulio de Medicis Cardinall and Legat of Bologna, whome the Pope had ſent thether to thende that in ſo great accidents, he might ſuſteine thinges on that ſide, and remeine as it were a moderator and counſellor of the youth of Lavvrance: he was touched with the diſpleaſure of thinfamie that would haue falne vppon the Pope by a councell ſo full of cowardiſſe, which no doubt would haue bene greater then had bene the glory of Iulio in getting to the Church, ſo great a iuriſdiction: he was alſo moued with griefe, that it would make infamous the memorie of his legacion, wherein being skarcely in the firſt action, he ſhould reſtore Bologna the principall citie of the whole Eccleſiaſtyke ſtate, into the power of her auncient tyrants, abandoning to pray and ſpoyle, ſo great a nobilitie which in fauor of the Apoſtolike ſea had openly conſpyred againſt them: In theſe reſpects he diſpatched an expreſſe Meſſenger to the Pope whom with reaſons and with requeſts he brought againe to a councell more honorable and ſafe: Notwithſtanding this Iulio was a baſtard, yet he was made Cardinall by Leo in the firſt moneths of his pontificacie, following thexample of Alexander the ſixt in the effect, but not in the manner: for, Alexander at ſuch time as he created Cardinall, Cæſar Borgia his ſonne, made to be proued by witneſſes that depoſed the truth, that his mother at the time that ſhe was conceiued of him, had a husband, inferring therevpon according to the opinion of the lawes, that the ſonne was to be iudged to bee begotten rather of the husband then of thadulterer: But touching Iulio, the witneſſes preferred the grace and fauor of men affore the truth, for that it was depoſed that the mother of whom he was begotten, being yet a maide and not maried and affore ſhe deuided her body to the deuocion of Iuliano, had of him a ſecrete conſent to be his wife.

Theſe newe accidents were likewiſe the cauſe that the Viceroy behaued him ſelfe farre otherwayes then he would haue done: for, being not yet departed from Verona, both for that he could not make his ſouldiers marche without money, and alſo exſpected newe companies promiſed by Cæſar who was nowe come to Yſpruch, to thend to leaue ſufficient garriſon within Verona and Breſſa as neede required: he begaune with theſe and other excuſes to temporiſe and deferre, to ſee what might afterwards happen to the Duchie of Myllan.

Theſe matters alſo moued the Svvyzzers, who retyred to Pignorolo immediatly after the diſcending of the french armie: And albeit vnderſtanding afterwards that the king who was paſſed the mounts, mooſtred his people at Thuryn, they were gon to Cyuas and had taken it and ſackt it, onely for that they were refuſed vittells, doing the like at Vercelli almoſt affore the kinges eyes beeing at Thuryn: yet beeing at laſte drawne into Nouaro, & thoſe factions of them that were not ſo farre eſtraunged from the french amities, taking courage and diſcloſing themſelues more and more in their aduerſities, they began to treate of compoſicion with the king.

About this time, thoſe regiments of the french which marched by the waye of

Genes, with whom were ioyned foure thousande footmen waged by the Genovvaies by the working of Octauian Fregosa, became lords on the whole contrey on this side Pavv, seazing first vpon the towne of Castellaccio, Alexandria, & Tortona: And the king that by this time was come to Vertilly, and had there the first aduertisement that the Pope was declared agaynst him, which the duke of Sauoye signified in his name, A matter which albeit did muche vexe and discontent the king: yet not suffring counsell and iudgement to be troubled with anger or disdayne, and becawse he would not kindle him to thuttermost, he caused to be proclaymed publikely aswell through his army, as amongst the regiments that had taken Alexandria, that no man should molest or inuade in any sort the lands of the Church. The king remained many dayes at Vercilly exspecting the issue of the parley with the Svvyzzers, who though they enterteined the practise, yet on the other side they shewed thēselues full of varietie and confusion: for at Nouaro where they were, they began to fall into tumult, taking their occasion vpon the breach of the king of Aragon, for that the payes he had promised were not yet come: They tooke also by force from the officers of the Pope, the money he had sent to be orderly distributed amongst them, & in the same fury they departed from Nouaro, with intention to returne into their contries: A matter whiche many sortes of them did require, who hauing spent three monethes in the spoyles of Italy, & now laden with money & booty, desired to conuey in safety to their houses, the riches they had gotten: They were no sooner gone out of Nouaro then the mony which was due for the king of Aragons porcion, was sent: And albeit they rauished it from the officers, & by violence made them selues possessed of it, yet wayghing the infamies that followed for the most part suche insolent and rashe dealings, they eftsones turned their furie into discression, and restored both the one & the other sums to receiue them orderly at the hands of the officers: Afterwards they went to Galero, expecting an other strength of xx. thousand footmen which was said to be newly ariued, and three thousande went with the Cardinall of Syon to be imployed for the gard of Pauia. By which occasion the king (whose hope of agreement did diminishe for these variations) departed frō Vercelly to go towards Millan, leauing within Vercelly with the duke of Sauoy, his bastard brother, Monsr Lavvtrech, & the generall of Myllan, to continue negociations begon with the Svvizzers: And becawse after the departing of the Svvizzers out of Nouaro, he had got the town, he left the castell besieged, which feling the execution of thartilleries, yelded within fewe dayes, reseruing the liues & goods of those that kept it: Afterwards the king to whom Pauia yelded, passed the riuer of Thesin, & the same day Ioh. Ia. Triuulco ranne vp with a parte of his companies to Saint Christophers neare to Millan: Afterwards the confidence of his vallor caried him vp euen to the suburbs of the gate of Thesin, hoping to be receiued by them of the towne, who il contented with the pillages & raunsoms of the Svvizzers, desired to returne vnder the iurisdiction of the French: he saw also a more facilitie in this enterprise, for that the towne was naked of souldiors. The people of Millan had a great feare of the Svvizzers, and the memorie was yet grene of the afflictions they had suffred the yere before, when they mutined in fauor of the king, the Svvizzers being retired frō Nouaro: the same restraining them now to better coūsel, & to temporise & exspect the issue of things, notwithstāding they wished the victorie to fall vpon the king: Therfore they sent to Triuulco to desire him to passe no further, & the next day dispatched embassadors to the king being at Buffaloro, to besech him, that resting contented with the disposition of the people of Millan well inclined to his crowne, & ready to giue vittells to his army, he would not demaunde of them

a more manifeſt declaration: A matter which would aduaunce nothing for the ſubſtance of the warre, no more then it had ſerued or ayded the yere before his predeceſſor, but brought vpon them great domages: They wiſhed him to match & ſtand aſſured that the towne of Millan ſhould be ready to open their gates to receiue him, at ſuch time as he ſhould be maiſter of the field. The king receiued them with good countenance and affability, and albeit at the firſt he was diſpleaſed that they had not receiued Triuulco, yet he anſwered now that he was contented to be conformable to their demaundes. From Bufaloro the king marched with his army to Biagreſſa, and whileſt he remayned there, the duke of Sauoy, after he had giuen audience to xx. Embaſſadors of the Svvizzers ſent to him at Vercelly, and going afterwards to Galero accompanied with the baſtard & other deputies for the king, contracted a peace with the Svvizzers in the kings name vnder theſe conditions: That there ſhould be betwene the crowne of Fraunce & nation of Svvizzers a perpetuall peace during the kings life and ten yeres after his death: That the Svvizzers and the Griſons ſhould make reſtitution of thoſe vallies apperteyning to the duchie of Millan whiche they had occupied: That they ſhould acquite that eſtate of a bonde to paye yerely a penſion of xl. thouſande duckets: That the king ſhould indue Maximilian Sforce with the duchie of Nemors with a yerely penſion of xij. thouſande frankes, a company of fiftie launces, & a wife of the blood royall: That he ſhould reſtore to the Svvizzers the yerely penſion of xl. thouſande frankes, and defraye the paye of three monethes to all the bandes of Svvizzers that were already in Lombardie or on the waye to come thither: That he ſhould pay to the Cantons (at tearmes and times) the ſixe hundred thouſande crownes promiſed in thaccorde of Dyon, and three hundred thouſande for the reſtitution of the vallies: That he ſhould enterteine continually in his pay foure thouſande of them. In this peace they named by common conſent the Pope, ſo farforth as he would render Parma & Plaiſanca: Alſo they comprehended the Emperor, the duke of Sauoy, and the Marquis of Montferat, without making any mention at all of the king Catholike, the Venetians, nor any other Italian. But this peace was made and broken almoſt in one day, by the comming of new bandes of Svvizzers, in whom for the memorie of their victories paſt, was a ſettled hope to carie from that warre no leſſe quantities of ſpoyles and riches, then the welth which they ſaw their other contreymen loaden withall: And for that cauſe much leſſe that they would heare ſpeake of the peace, but of the contrarie, to diſſolue and breake it, they refuſed to reſtore the vallies: In ſo muche as the firſt bandes beeing not able to retyre them from theſe furies, fiue and thirtie thouſande drewe to Monſo to lye in the ſuburbes of Millan; Alberto Petro a notable capteine being gone from them with many enſignes along the way of Coma, which way the king altogether leſte free and open. Thus the peace being no ſooner made then broken, things returned to the ſame difficulties they ſuffred before, yea they brought with them farre greater doubtes for the newe armies and forces that were approched neare the duchie of Millan: for, the Viceroy leauing for the garde of Verona, Mark. Anth. Colonno with an hundred men at armes and ſix hundred light horſmen, and within Breſsia xij. hũdred launceknightes, was come at laſt to lodge vpon Pavv neare to Plaiſanca, hauing in his army ſeuen hundred men at armes, ſix hundred light horſmen, and ſix thouſande footmen, with a bridge ready prepared to paſſe the riuer: And to leaue him no occaſion to complaine, Laurence de Medicis hauing with great watch and gard remayned many dayes at Parma with tharmie, was come from thence to Plaiſanca: Tharmie conteined at that time ſeuen hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, and foure thousande footemen: he had sent affore a trowpe of foure hundred light horsemen to the Svvizzers during the negociation of thaccord: A band which he appoynted at their requeſt to serue them to fetch in vittels, and were guided by Mucio Colonno & Lodovvike Count de Petillano, the one a capteine of the Church, and the other a commander for the Florentins: He aduaunced that expedition not so much for any desire he had to ayde the cõmon cause, as to giue to the Svvizzers no occasion to cõprehend the Pope within the peace if they accorded with the french king. On the other side Bartlemevv Aluiano, who had sent word to the king that he would so intangle the Spanish army that they should haue no meane to hurt him, assone as he vnderstoode the Viceroy was departed from Verona, went from Polesina, & passing the riuer of Adice, he marched all along Pavv with ix. hundred men at armes, xiiij. hundred light horsmen, and ix. thousand footmen: he drew with him sufficient prouisions of artillery, and was vpon the walles of Cremona with a speede and diligence contrary to the custome of the capteines of our time, and wherein Aluiano him selfe tooke such glory, that in his vaunting he would oftentimes lay it in comparison with the celeritie of Claudius Nero, when, to make head agaynst Asdruball, he led the swiftest part of his army vpon the riuer of Metauro: Great is the moment of celeritie and speede in enterprise, and oftentimes is more effectuall to the benefite of the seruice and reputation of the leaders, then eyther the multitude or courage of souldiors.

But in this sort the state of the warre was not only diuerse & variable, but also confused & intangled: On the one side was vpon the confines of Millan the french king with an army appoynted and furnished, and by this time was come to Marignan to giue facilitie to Aluiano to ioyne with him, and to let the vniting of the ecclesiastike and Spanish companies with the enemies: And on the other side lay a gallant army of xxxv. thousand Svvizzers, which was a force of footmen full of vallor, and neuer yet had passed vnder the victorie of the French. The Viceroy kept along the shores of Pavv neare to Plaisanca, and vpon the high way that leades to Loda, hauing a bridge ready dressed to passe the ryuer and to ioyne with the Svvizzers: Laurence de Medicis was within Plaisanca with the regiments of the Pope & the Florentins, & all to ioyne with the Viceroy to the same ends: And Aluiano a circumspect & resolute Capteine, lay with the Venetian army vpon the territories of Cremona, almost vpon the banke of Pavv: his purpose was to ayde the French king, either by ioyning his strength with him, or in drawing away the Church & spanish regiments. The citie of Loda which standeth in the midst betwene Millan & Plaisanca, & of an equall distance frõ them both, stoode abandoned of all partes: only it had bin sacked before by Ranse de Cere entring as a souldior to the Venetiãs, who for quarrels rising betwene him & Aluiano, had affore, what with protestations & what with threates, got leaue of the senat, and was entred into the Popes pay with two hundred men at armes & two hũdred light horsmen: But for that his souldiors could not folow him with that speede, by reason the Venetians would not suffer many of them to depart frõ Padoa where they laye, he went from Loda to fill vp his numbers with those companies with the which he had serued. The cardinall of Syon also amazed with the practises which his nation helde with the french king, & no lesse douting the state of the citie of Millan, was fled from Plaisanca with a thousand Svvizzers and with part of the regiments of the duke of Millan: Afterwards he went to Cremona to solicite the Viceroy to march on: he tooke the way of Millan before that side was occupied by the french king, & left certain of his cõpanies for the gard of Loda, who assone as they heard that the french king was come to Marignan, abãdoned the place, their feare being greater thẽ their perill. But

whileſt the Viceroy lay vpon the ryuer of Pavv, & before Lavvrence de Medicis came to Plaiſanca, Cintio whō the Pope ſent to the french king, was taken by the ſouldiors of the Viceroy: And albeit he found about him letters & breefes of credite, yet he let him go aſſone as he was taken, for the reuerēce he bare to him that ſent him, entring notwithſtanding into doubt that the hope was vaine that had bene giuen him, that the Church army ioyning with him, would paſſe the riuer of Pavv: This doubt was increaſed by this occaſion, that at the ſame time, Lavv. de Medicis was detected to haue ſent ſecretly to the french king one of his men: which he did either of his own councell, or by cōmaundement of the Pope, to be excuſed in that he led the army againſt him: wherin he proteſted that albeit he was conſtrained by a neceſſitie to obey the Pope, yet without incenſing his vncle, or ſtayning his owne honor, the king ſhould finde in him a ready deuotion to labor to ſatisfie him, A thing which he had alwayes ſought, and now more then euer did deſire to expreſſe it.

Aſſone as Lavvrence was come to Plaiſanca, there began a diſputatiō betwene the Viceroy & him with others that ſat with them in coūcel, whether it were beſt to paſſe ouer the riuer of Pavv in one ſtrength to ioyne with the Svvizzers: Amongſt them were occupied diuerſe reaſons according to the diuerſitie of their affections, there being litle conformity of councel where was ſo great variety of will and diſpoſition: Such as perſwaded to paſſe the riuer, ſayd there was no reaſon to diſſwade them frō going into Loda, for that being there, both they ſhould let Aluiano for ioyning with the french armie, & for their owne parts, they ſhould haue good oportunitie to knit with the Svvizzers, either in going to Millan to ſeke them, or els the Svvizzers drawing to mete them: And if their lingring left time to the french men to get it (as the brute went they would) being already vpon the waye betwene Loda and Millan, the french ſhould haue vpon their backes, their armies ioyned together, A matter which would put them in payne & daunger: euen ſo perhaps it would not be hard to finde meane to ioyne with the Svvizzers, notwithſtanding they ſhould be driuen to make a greater circuit: They reaſoned that this reſolutiō was profitable to thenterpriſe, & neceſſarie to take from the Svvizzers al occaſions of new practiſes of accord, & no leſſe conuenient to encreaſe their forces againſt ſo great an army as they had neede, and namely of horſmen: That beſides theſe reſpects the fayth & honor of the Pope and the king Catholike required it ſo, both for that the capitulations bound them to ſuccor theſtate of Millan, & alſo they had often promiſed no leſſe to the Svvizzers, who being diſapoynted, might perhaps of aſſured friends, take occaſion to become daungerous enemies: Laſtly that neceſſitie would it ſo for thintereſt and regarde of their owne eſtates, for that the Svvizzers either loaſing the battell, or making accord with the french king, there would remaine no force in Italie able to ſtād againſt his victorie, or to let him frō ſpreding the wings of his fortune ouer the whole eſtate of the Churche euen to the poſterns of Rome. To the contrary of this opinion was reaſoned by others, that it was not credible that the French king had not already ſent a ſtrength of ſouldiors to Loda, and if it were ſo, theſtate of the perill would dryue their companies to retyre with ſhame, and happly not without loſſe of blood, ſince they ſtood ſubiect to haue at one time the french on their backes, and the Venetians in flanke: withall they could not repaſſe the bridge without confuſion & long tract of time, which would bring great infamie to their vallour, and by the propertie of thaction transferre to the aduerſary the glory they ſought to appropriate to themſelues: That in matters of enterpriſe it importes capteines to make cōference of the perill and the price, of the time and the place, and of the neceſſitie and their proper willes, to whom by all lawes, examples, and experience of men of warre, it can be no infamie to refuse the attempt that bringes not with it thoportunitie of tyme, place, neceſſitie, and recompence. But be it that Loda were abandoned, and that there were libertie for them to take it, what profite coulde growe by thenterpriſe, howe coulde they laye their plotte eyther to meete with the Svvizzers, or the Svvizzers to ioyne with them, ſo mightie an armie lying obiected agaynſt them betweene Millan and Loda: Beſides, it mighte fall out not to bee a counſell aſſured, to put into the handes of a nation ſo raſhe and vnreaſonable, all the forces of the Pope and the king Catholike, ſeeing there were factions amongeſt them, the greateſt parte hauing made peace with the Frenche men, and ſtoode in diuiſion with their fellowes. At laſte it was reſolued, that the firſte daye both the armies ſhoulde paſſe ouer Pavv without any baggage or cariage, leauing ſufficient garriſon within Parma and Plaiſanca, for feare of the Venetian armie, whoſe light horſmen euen at that tyme had made incurſions and pillages through the countrey: But as in all actions are founde many impedimentes where eyther is emulation of men, or varietie of will, ſo this reſolution was not ſincerely executed by eyther of the parties, for that in particular, bothe ſeeming to haue an equall will to paſſe, they labored to lay the fault one of an other, and neither of them to touch the daunger: for the Viceroy that was already entred into ſuſpicion for the gooing awaye of Cintio, and no leſſe acquaynted with what cunning the Pope proceeded in hys affayres, was of opinion, that his wyll was that Lavvrence ſhould paſſe no further: And on the other ſide, Lavvrence conſidering howe hardly the Viceroy was drawne to commit his armie to the power of fortune, gaue of an other the ſame iudgement that others gaue of him: In the after noone the Spaniſhe bandes beganne to paſſe the bridge, whom the Churche armie was appoynted to followe with ſpeede: but by reaſon of the night that came vpon them, they deferred by neceſſitie vntill the moarning following, when they dyd not onely not paſſe, but alſo the Viceroy retyred with his armie on this ſide the ryuer, beeing aduertiſed by a skowte of foure hundred light horſemen ſent out from bothe the armies to eſpie the enemies and their doinges, that an hundred Frenche launces were entred into Loda the daye before: This made the Viceroy and Lavvrence to returne to their firſt lodginges, whiche gaue oportunitie to Aluiano to marche with his armie to Loda.

Euen about this tyme the Frenche king diſlodged from Marignan to lodge at S. Donato, and the Svvizzers retyred to Millan, one parte whereof not willing to heare of warre, and the others nothing inclined to peace, there aroſe oftentymes amongeſt them ſelues councells and tumultes: And beeing one daye drawen into an aſſemblie and vniuerſall preſence, the Cardinall of Syon no leſſe great for his authoritie and place, then agreable to the people for his affabilitie and eaſines, began with wordes full of affection and vehemencie, to encourage them to iſſue out the ſame daye and ſet vppon the French king: He willed them to conſider what harmes delayes drew with them, ſpecially when was cõcurrance of oportunitie & occaſion: He willed them not to ſtande ſo muche vpon the number of horſemen and artilleries of thenemie, as by ſo baſe a feare, to diminiſhe the memorie of the auncient vallour of the Svvizzers, and the perpetuall victories which they had obteyned agaynſt the French men. It is (ſayth he) farre from the glory & merite of our nation, who hath paſſed through ſo many paines, vanquiſhed ſo many perils, made ſacrifice of ſo much blood, and triumphed in ſo many victories, to loaſe in one day ſo great a glorie, glory,& leaue to the enemies whom we haue so often vanquished,the reputation of so many our former merits. These be the same frēchmen who being ioyned with vs, haue obteined so many victories,but going seperat to the warres without our armes & forces,haue become a miserable pray to others:when there was societie & felowship betwene vs,their name ranne gloriously thorow the world, & that much more by our vallor then by their owne fortune,they were the shadowes,& we the bodies, they the birdes and we the Aygles,through whose power peoples and regions were subiected to them: But without vs,what haue they done worthy of memory? what haue bene their fortunes?where are erected their pillors of perpetuall prayses? what are shadowes when they are seperate from their bodies? They are the same whome a small armie of ours ouerthrewe the laste yeare at Nouaro with so great name and glorie: They be the same to whom our vertue brought so much astonishment, and their owne cowardise so greate confusion, that euen in their ouerthrowe and calamitie,they areared vp to the heauens the name and reputation of the Svvizzers: Suffer not your selues to forget that those small companies of ours that preuayled at Nouaro, had neyther horsemen nor artilleries, and yet not esteeming the perill present, and lesse exspecting the succours that were to come, they ranne with Capteine Motin (the glory of our nation) to charge the Frenche men euen in their tentes and lodginges, and winning with incredible vallour their artilleries, they slue of them and the Launceknightes, so many bodies as they had weapons and armes to vse them: An example sufficient to perswade you, that now they will not haue the courage to abyde an armie of fourtie thousande Svvizzers, A power able to mete in the field with the whole residue of the world ioyned in one strength. The remēbraunce of calamities past makes fearfull alwayes after the minds of those that were vanquished,and though amongst men there is a naturall emulation and desire of reuenge, yet to hartes once daunted it is a peculiar condition to settle in dispayre, and not to aduenture to recouer remedie where they receyued their harmes, as we reade they do that are wounded by scorpions. Doubt you not but thexamples paste of your prowes, and thexperience of your euerlasting vallour, will make them nowe flee affore you, euen at the first noyse of your comming, as the selly fowles that make a verye faynte and weake wing when they heare the belles of the Falcon: They haue not drawne so neare Millan by any confidence they had in their owne vertue, but onely through a hope they haue in your diuisions: The person and presence of their king can not gouerne them, for that by howe muche his lyfe and estate shall be in daunger,by so muche it will import him to be the first to looke to his safetie, by whose example the residue wyll seeke to eschewe the hazarde that makes their king affrayde: if with this armie that conteyneth the vallour and forces of the whole countrey of Svvizzerlande, you haue not the courage to sette vpon them, with what power, with what fortune, with what mindes can you hope to bee hable to make resistance agaynst them? To what ende are we discended into Lombardie? why haue we taken into our protection the walles of Millan, if we haue feare to go charge our enemies? To what infamie will be interpreted the braue wordes, and prowde threates which we haue vsed all this yere, both vaunting that we would discende into Burgondy,and reioysing of thaccord of thEnglish king,& the Popes inclination to confederate with the french king,wherin we estemed our glory would be so much the greater,by how much al those great Princes were ioyned in conspiracie agaynst the state of Millan: It had ben better we had rested cōtented with the termes of our auncient renowme,

" and neither enioyed the yeres before ſo many honorable victories, nor chaſed the more time to aduaunce our enseignes and satisfie our thirst with the blood of those who by their ambicion and pride seeke to subiect the whole worlde, but by their cowardise are left alwayes an infamous pray to many.

These speaches gaue great incouragement to the Svvizzers, who, ioyning to thexhortacion the remembraunce of their auncient vallour & felicitie, armed themselues: And assoone as they were issued out of the gate towardes Rome, they fell into aray and order, & albeit the day was almost spent, yet they marched with their squadrons towards the French army, vsing such showtes and cries, that to such as knewe not the cause, it was a reasonable perswasion that they had obteined some glorious victory: The Capteines encoraged the souldiours to marche, and the resolucion of the souldiours was suche that they put their leaders in remembraunce that at what hower soeuer they came neare the campe of thenemies, they should giue the signe of the battell, assuring them that that was the day wherein they woulde couer the fieldes with dead bodies & vtterly rase out the name of the launceknights, & namely of such, who prophecying of their death, bare blacke enseignes: And as in this estate of furie and resolucion of minde, they were come neare the place where the Frenchmen lay, albeit there remeined not two howers of day, yet they beganne the battell, and with a desperate corage charged thartilleries and fortifications of thenemies, breaking and dispersing at this first charge, the bandes that made head against them, and with their incredible vallour wonne one parte of thartilleries: But what with the horsemen bringing on a great parte of tharmy, & the presence of the king inuironed with squadrōs of valliant gentlemē, their great furie was somwhat abated: Neuertheless a cruell feight began betwene them, which, with diuerse chaunces, and to the grieuous losses of the men at armes of Fraunce, who were broken, continued till iiij. howers within night, diuerse french Captaines lay dead on the ground, and the king him selfe receiued many wounds with a pyke: Such aygernes of mind remeined in both partes, that their bodies being no more hable to manage the weapons which the reuenge of their hartes put into their hands, they separated and fell of from the feight both without sounding of trompet, & commaundement of their Capteines: The Svvizzers remeined incamped in the same place exspecting the next sunne or day light, neither partie offending the other, as if there had bene a secret truce betwene them: The Cardinall caused the campe of Svvizzers to be reuittelled from Millan whilest their bodies tooke rest, adding such propertie of help as he could, being the author of the enterprise: And to this first felicity of theirs, was ioyned a generall brute throughout all Italie, that the Svvizzers had put to flight the armie of the Frenchemen with many other rumors giuen out to discorage the Frenche, and confirme their owne side: The French king consumed not vnprofitably the residue of the night, for, knowing the greatnesse of the perill, he labored to raunge his artilleries into places conuenient, to reassemble his horsemen, and put in order his squadrons of launceknights & Gascoyns: he performed in his owne person, all things that could be required of a king, of a Capteine, of a man of warre, and of a minde whose resolucion was greater then thestate of the daunger: By this time it was day, and at the beginning of the sunne, the Svvizzers, who did not only despise the French army, but also (in thopinion of their vallor) seemed to dishable the whole forces of Italie knit together, recontinued their charge vppon thenemies with the same furie and rashenes they went to it ouer night: But they were receiued of the French with greater vallour, with better order, and with more discression, they were subiect to a bloody charge of the horsemen, and suffred slaughter both a front and in

flanke: Beſides, at the riſing of the Sunne came Aluiano, whom the king had ſent for ouer night, bringing with him his light horſemen and the moſt ſpeedieſt part of his armie: he arriued at ſuch time as the fight was moſt cloaſe and furious and all things reduced into greateſt trauell and daunger: And hauing the reſidue of his regiment marching to good purpoſe and time, he entred furiouſly vppon the backes of the Svvyzzers, who, notwithſtanding they mainteyned alwayes the fight with one vallour and reſolucion, yet ſeeing the deſperat reſiſtance that was made, and the Venetian armie that was now ioyned, they began ſo to doubt of the victorie, that after the Sunne had ſhined many howers vpon the earth, they ſownded the retrait, and charging vpon their ſhowlders the artilleries they had brought with them, they caſt about their ſquadrons, and retyred: They obſerued their accuſtomed order in their retyring, and ſo ordered their marche towards Myllan with ſo great terror and aſtoniſhment of the frenche, that of the whole armie there was neither horſemen nor footemen that durſt breake out to follow them: Onely there were two companies of their ſouldiers who beeing fled into a graunge, were burned within the houſe by the Venetian light horſemen: The reſidue of the armie returned to Myllan, not breaking one ioate of their order, and reteyning in their apparance and countenance, one conſtant and perpetuall aſſurance: ſome ſay that they cloyed fifteene peeces of great artilleries which they wonne at the firſt charge, for that they had no oportunitie to cary them to their campe.

All men are of opinion, that there hath not bene ſeene in Italy of long time a battell of more furie and greater terror, for that, what by the deſperat vallour with the which the Svvyzzers began the charge, and alſo for the darknes of the night which led all men in errour, the order of the whole armie beeing confuſed and the fight ſo mixed that there could not be ſeene or obſerued any ſigne or commaundement, All thinges were wholly referred and ſubiected to fortune: The king, whoſe perſon was not without many and manifeſt daungers, was able to diſcerne that his preſeruacion and ſafetie came more by his owne vertue and by chaunce, then by the ſuccours and ayde of his people, from whom he was oftentimes ſeparat ſometymes by the confuſion of the battell, and ſometymes by the troubles and obſcurities of the night: ſuch was the diſcourſe and ſtate of this conflict, that Trynulco (A Captaine of great tryall and experience of thinges) affirmed that this battell was fought by Gyants and not by men, and that eighteene battells wherein he had bene an execucioner, were but combats of litle children, in compariſon of this: It is not to be doubted that (without the ayde of the artilleries) the victorie had not remeyned to the Svvyzzers, who, entring at the firſt charge into the fortificacions of the french, and recouering from them the moſt parte of thartilleries, had alwayes wonne further into their campe: Beſides, the comming of Aluiano was to great purpoſe for the french, for that comming freſh to the fight when the battell was moſt doubtfull, he redoubled the courage of the french, and gaue terror to the Svvyzzers, ſuppoſing that the whole Venetian armie was with him: Touching the number of the deade bodies, if euer it was vncerteine in a battell (as it hapneth almoſt alwayes) it fell out moſt vncerteyne in this, men ſpeaking diuerſly, ſome by paſſion, and ſome by error: ſome make reckoning of foureteene thowſand Svvyzzers to be ſlayne, ſome ſet downe but ten thowſand, and others that haue a more moderat iudgement, affirme there were but eight thowſand left on the ground, yea ſome woulde haue them reduced to a number of three thouſand, and all bodies of baſe place: on the french part in the encounter that was giuen ouer night, were ſlayne Frauncis brother to the Duke of Burbon, Monſr D'imbercourt

D'imbercourt, the Prince of Tallemount sonne to Monsr Trimouille, Monsr de Boysi nephew to the Cardinall of Amboyse, the Count of Sancerre, Catelarth of Sauoye, Bussy of Amboyse, and Mouy enseigne bearer to the kings bande: All personages of marke either for their nobleneſſe and greatnes of eſtates, or for the honorable places they managed in the army: And touching the general numbers of dead bodies, some referre them to six thousand, & some reckon them to three thousand, amõgest whom were certeine Capteines of the launceknightes, sundry men making sundry accõpts for the causes and respects aforesayd.

When the Svvizzers were retired to Millan, they fell into great disagreement & controuersie, some willing to accomplish an accord with the French king, & others perswading to continue the defense of Millan: wherein as there was amongest them partialitie and faction, so euerie one had his particular reason and opinion: Those Capteines that affore had solicited thaccorde, sought nowe a cause lesse dishoneſt to breake vp, requiring money of Maximilian Sforce which they knewe he was not hable to aduaunce: But all the bandes of footemen at the perswasion of Rost their Generall, departed the day following to returne to their countrey by the way of Coma: They left in the castell fifteene hundred Svvizzers and fiue hundred Italians, and gaue hope to the Duke that the same bands and regiments, would returne speedely to his seruice, and giue reskew to the castell: with this property of hope, Maximilian Sforce accompanied with Iohn Gonzago, & Ierom Morono with other gentlemen of Millan, incloſed him selfe in the castell, after he had with great difficultie consented that his brother Frauncis Duke of Bary should go into Germanie: The Cardinall of Syon tooke his iorney towardes Cæsar to solicite for succours, giuing his faith to returne to the seruice with expedicion.

Thus was the city of Millan abandoned and giuen vp to the French king, neither their vallour nor their fortune being able to minister any further protection amid so many hard aduersities: And as it is a course ordinary in humane chaunces, that one infelicity neuer comes alone, so, besides their subiection, they suffered this propertie of calamity, to pay to the king such quantities of treasor and money, as it pleased him to impose vpon them: only his person forbare to enter the towne so long as the castell helde good for the enemies, holding it a matter vnworthie the maiestie of a king, to make his entrie into a towne which was not wholly and absolutly in his power: In the place where he had wonne the battell, he caused Masses to be song solemnly for three dayes: the first was to thanke God for his victorie: the seconde to pray for the soules of those that were slaughtered in the battell: and in the third he made supplication for peace, and in perpetuall memorie of his victorie, he built in the same place a chappell of deuocion: immediatly vpon the brute of this battell all the townes and castells of the Duchie of Millan followed the fortune of the victory, except the castells of Cremona and Millan, to the which was appointed Peter of Nauarre, who assured that he would carie it in lesse then a moneth: A matter that seemed vnreasonable in thopinion of wise men, both for that the castell bare good fortificacions, and also for the plentifull proportion of all things necessary for defence, yea hauing within it a resolute garrison of two thowsand men of warre.

The Viceroy receiuing aduertisement of the french victorie, remeined a very few dayes in the place where he was incamped, and that more by necessity then by will, hauing no reason nor oportunitie to remoue his armie for want of money: But being at last refurnished with some litle proporcion, and borowing besides of Lavvrence de Medicis six thowsand duckats, he brake vp and withdrewe to Ponto de Nuro with intencion to goe to the Realme of Naples: for, albeit the Pope vnderstanding what was hapned, had in the beginning represented to the world the constancie of his predecessor, hauing withal, the Embassadors of the confederats to perswade him to make head against fortune, and to labor either to hold the Swyzzers in good disposicion, or at least vpon their reuolting, to take in their places the launceknightes: yet he discerned that it could not be but that the remedies and prouisions would fall out too slow for his perills, and that he should be the first that should suffer: for that though the respect and reuerence of the Church held the king from molesting the state Ecclesiastyke, yet he could not beleeue that it was able to conteyne him from assailing Parma and Plaisanca as members depending of the Duchie of Myllan; and much lesse hold him frō molesting the state of Florence, A matter wherein al regards did cease, and for the which he would thinke him selfe as deepely offended as if violence were directly offered to the state of the Church: It was not without cause that he feared these inuasions, for that the king had already giuen order to cast a bridge ouer the riuer of Pavv neare to Pauia, to send to take Parma and Plaisanca, and afterwards, if the Pope refused his amitie, to proceede by the way of Pontresmo to chasse the Medicis from the towne of Florence. But amyd these deuises and preparacions, The Duke of Sauoye and Bishop of Tricaro the Popes Nuncio, by commission of the Pope, treated with the king, who was not without vehement desires to be accorded with him, fearing perhaps new allyances to be made against him, & bearing a wonderfull reuerence and inclinacion to the sea Apostolike for the terrour that was throw the whole Realme of Fraunce by reason of the persecutions receiued by Pope Iulio: In these respects there was concluded betweene them a present confederacion for the defense of the states of Italy, wherein was particularly expressed that the king shoulde take vppon him the protection of the person of the Pope, the state of the Church, Iulian and Lavvrence de Medicis, and the estate of Florence: That the king should giue an estate in Fraunce and pension to Iulian, and to Lavvrence a pension & a companye of fifty launces: That he should consent that the Pope might giue passage to the Viceroy thorow the states and iurisdiction of the Church, to returne with his armie to the kingdom of Naples: That the Pope should be bound to make depart out of Verona, the souldiers he had there, and withall, to countermaund the companies sent to the succours of Cæsar against the Venetians: That he should giue vp to the french king the cities of Farma and Plaisanca, and in recompense thereof, the king to agree that from thence forward the Duchie of Myllan should be bound to leauy for his vse the salts of Cerui, A matter of great profit to the church, and wherein the Pope had already agreed with the Duke of Myllan in the confederacion he made with him: That there should be made an arbytracion and compromisse in the person of the Duke of Sauoye, to iudge whether the Florentyns had broken the confederacion made with king Lovvys, and if they haue offended that way, then he to haue power to impose such penaltie as they haue deserued: This the king sayde he demaunded more for satisfying of his honor, then for other respect.

Assoone as this conclusion was made, the Bishop of Tricaro went to Rome in post to perswade the Pope to ratifie it, And Lavvrence de Medicis to giue occasion to the Viceroy to depart the sooner, withdrew to Parma & Reggia the companies that were within Plaisanca: touching him selfe, he went to the king to obteyne his good grace and fauor, and to perswade him that in all estates of tymes and chaunces of thinges, he would depend vpon him, vsing in that office or offer of Court, the aduises of his Vncle which were more full of suttletie then of good meaning: It was much a doe,

to induce the Pope to this ratification, for that it brought no litle displeasure to him to loase Parma and Plaisanca: He coulde willingly haue temporised to see what the Svvizzers woulde first determine, who hauing called a Parliament at Surich (the principall Canton of the whole nation, and most enemie to the French) debated to giue reskew to the Castell of Millan, notwithstanding they had abandoned the vallies and the townes of Bellinzone & Lugarno, but not the Castles. Neuertheleſſe the king obteined the Castell of Lugarno in corrupting the capteine with six thousande crownes: onely the Grisons would not abandon Chiauanna: At laste the Bishop of Tricaro laying afore him the daunger leaſt the king would inuade Parma and Plaisanca, and sende men of warre into Tuskane, and making great terror of the harmes that the Svvizzers had receyued at the battell of Marignan: the Pope was content to ratifie the peace, albeit vnder this moderation, that neyther he nor his Agentes should be bound to giue vp into the kings handes Parma and Plaisanca; but by leauing them voyde of men and officers, to giue libertie to the king to enter vppon them: That the Pope shoulde not be bounde to leauie his people from Verona, for that he woulde not commit suche a propertie of iniurie agaynst Cæsar: and yet he promised to do it vpon the next conuenient occasion: Lastely that the Florentins should be holden absolued of the pretended breaking of the league. The accorde bare also that the king shoulde not take vpon him the protection of any vassall or subiect of the estate of the Church, and that not onely he should not hinder the Pope as their supreme lorde, to procede agaynst them with correction, but also he should be bounde to minister ayde to him in that action when necessitie required. Moreouer it was debated that the Pope and the French king should haue an enterview together in some place conuenient, A matter offred by the king particularly, but desired indifferently by them both: The king sought it, the better to establish that amity, to assure the estates of such his friends as he had in Italie: and lastly for that he hoped with his presence, and offring great aduauncementes to the Popes brother & nephew, to winne of him his consent to inuade the realme of Naples: A matter which was one of his greateſt desires: The Pope wished this enteruiew, to thend that with that office and obseruance very proper to winne grace & amitie with euery one, to enterteine the king whileſt he stoode in so great fortune and prosperitie. Manye thought not well of this deliberation, as an action vnworthy of the maiestie of a Pope, and that it more apperteined to the king, desiring to haue conference with him, to go seeke him and do reuerence to him at Rome: but the Pope gaue it out that he was so muche the more ready to condiscende to this meeting, by how much he was desirous to induce the king not to molest the realme of Naples during the life of the king Catholik, who to the iudgement of man could not liue long, for that it was more then a yere since he was yll disposed.

Pe. Nauarre afore the Castell of Mill.

In this meane while Peter of Nauarre was labouring to cary the Castel of Millan, and hauing wonne a mordring house vpon the castell ditche whiche on the flanke side had his prospect vpon the gate of Coma, and afterwards approching nearer the ditch and the castell wall by the helpe of pauisses and engines of wood, be began to worke a myne within the sayd ditche: And when he had remoued the defences, he began to labor more mynes, taking away with the helpe of his engines a great paue or space of the wall on the flanke of the Castell, and applyed his hookes and Rammes to make it fall at the same instaunt that he put fyre to hys mynes: Matters which albeit in cõmon iudgement seemed not sufficient to cary the castell but with great difficultie & long time, & that there was good intelligence that the Svvizzers

by the resolucion of Zurich, prepared to succour it: yet a practise being begon betwene Iohn Gonsago the duke of Millans capteine which was within the castel, & the Duke of Burbon his parent, Ierome Morono, with two other Svvizzer Capteines interposing also in the action, the resolucion was concluded the fourth day of October not without a wonderfull maruell of all men: Ierome Morono was specially blamed for this conclusion for that either through feare, which was naturall in him, or for want of faith which was neuer imputed to him, he had vsed his authority to perswade the Duke to agreement: Neuertheless he excused him selfe vppon certeine controuersies and mutinies hapned betwene the footmen of the Svvizzers and the Italians: Tharticles of thaccord were, that Maximilian Sforce should immediatly giue vp into the hands of the french king, the castells of Millan and Cremona: That he should depose him selfe of all rights & interests which he had in that estate: That he should receiue of the king, a certeine proporcion of money to pay his dets: That he should go into Fraunce where the king should indue him with a yearely pension of thirtie thowsande duckats, or procure him to be made Cardinall with the same reuenue: That the king should pardon Galeas Viscont with certeine other gentlemen of that Duchie who had followed the seruice of Maximilian: That he should distribute amongst the Svvizzers that were within the castel, six thousand crownes: That he should confirme to Iohn Gonzago the goods that he held in the state of Millan by the gift of the Duke, and enlarge his liuing with some yearely pension: That he should in like sorte ratifie to Morono, as well the goods that apperteined to him in property, as others that he had of the Dukes gift, together with the offices he exercised, and should make him Maister of requests of the court of Fraunce: vpon the publicacion of this accord, Maximilian surnamed the More according to the name of his father, departed out of the castell and went into Fraunce: he sayed it was a sweete aduersity that brought with it prosperitie, for that by that exchaunge of fortune, he was drawne out of the seruitude of the Svvizzers, the ill dealings of Cæsar, and the deceits of the Spanyards: In this alteracion also men seemed more to allowe of the working of fortune that she had so speedily deposed him from such a degree, then that affore she had exalted a man, who, for his incapacity, inconstant thoughts, and most fowle maners of life, was vnworthy of all greatnes.

Affore the castell of Millan was restored there were sent to the king as Embassadors from Venice these foure of the most principal and honorable of the Senate Antho. Grimani, Dominike Treuisan, George Cornaro, & Andrevv Gritti: Their comming was to congratulat with the king of his victorie, and to beseech him by the vertue of the capitulacions of the league, to ayde them to recouer their townes: An enterprise wherein they had no other impediments then the forces of Cæsar, & the Popes regiments that were within Verona vnder the charge of Marke Antho. Colonno: for, the Viceroy after he was gone from of the marches of Plaisanca, and had reposed some fewe dayes vpon the frontiers of Modona exspecting the Popes ratification to thaccord with the french king, he withdrew with all diligence to the realme of Naples by the way of Romagnia: vpon the relacion of these Embassadors, the king gaue speedy order that the bastard of Sauoye and Theoder Triuulco should go to their succour with six hundred launces and vij. thowsand launceknightes: who, whilest they deferred to march and depart, either that they temporised to see what would come of the castel of Millan, or that the king had a meaning to send out the same bands against the castell of Cremona, Aluiano drew with his army towards Bressa, for, the Venetians would not consent that he should follow the Viceroy, for that they desired to

recouer Breßia and Verona (if it were poſſible) without forreine ſuccors: But becauſe that Citie was newly reſupplyed with a thouſand Launceknights, and Bergamo alſo rendred to the Venetians many dayes before, Aluiano reſolued to go firſt to beſiege Verona, as being the leaſt fortified, and hauing there greateſt commoditie of vittels, and withall for that Verona being taken, the action of Breßia would be eaſie, the ſituation bearing no oportunitie of ſuccours by the Almains: onely he forbare to giue beginning to his enterpriſe for feare leaſt the Viceroy and the Popes bandes that were in the countreys of Reggia and Modena ſhould not repaſſe ouer Pavv at Oſtia, to reskew Verona: But beeing deliuered of that ſuſpicion by the going awaye of the Viceroy, he fell into an other impediment of ſickneſſe, whereof he dyed in the beginning of October at Gueda in the countrey of Breßia, hauing not yet threeſcore yeres of age: The Venetians receiued great diſpleaſure for his death, but greater was the ſorowe of the ſouldiors, who beeing not ſatisfied with the remembraunce of him, kept publikely in tharmie his bodye by the ſpace of xxv. dayes, carying it aboute with them with very great pompe, at ſuche time as they marched: And when he ſhould be conueyed to Venice, Theodor Triuulco would not ſuffer that as he was caried by the marches of Verona, they ſhould demaund ſafeconduit of Marke Antho. Colonno, ſaying, it was not conuenient that he who in his life had neuer feare of his ennemies ſhould now in his death demaunde the thing by petition which affore they durſt not denie him of duetie: he was buryed at Venice by publike order and with great ceremonies in S. Stephens Churche, where yet remayneth the monument of his ſepulcher, and in perpetuall remembraunce of the merites and vertues of hys lyfe, was pronounced by a very eloquent young Gentleman, a funerall oration: he was a Capteine in all mens opinion of greate reſolution and courage, and an aſſured executioner of things determined: and yet eyther by the malice of fortune, who hath no ſmall imperie ouer enterpriſes, or for that he was ſodayne in counſayle, a principall ennemie to the vallour of men, he receyued manye foyles by his ennemies, yea it is thought he neuer obteyned victorie when he was generall of an armie.

Death of Aluiano.

By reaſon of the death of Aluiano, the Frenche king (not beeing required by the Venetians) gaue to them for gouernour of their armie, Triuulco, whom they ſo much deſyred, aſwell for his experience wherein he was well confirmed, as for his reputation in the ſcience of warre, for the whiche they had him in no ſmall opinion: but moſt of all for that by the common inclination of the faction of the Guelffes, there had beene alwayes a ſettled amitie and good wyll betweene him and that common weale. Whyleſt he wente to the armie to take hys charge, the Venetian bandes tooke Peſquiero, and ouerthrewe a little before thenterpriſe, certeine trowpes of horſemen, and three hundred Spaniſhe footemen that wente to their reskew, recouering alſo Aſolo and Louo, whiche the Marquis of Mantua had abandoned. Aſſoone as Triuulco was come to the armie they beſieged Breßia at thinſtaunce of the Senate, notwithſtanding it ſeemed a matter of great difficultie to carye it without the Frenche armie, bothe for that the towne was ſtrong and well manned with a crewe of two thouſande footemen aſwell Launceknightes as Spaniardes, and alſo for that a great number of the Guelffes had bene conſtrayned to go awaye, the wynter alſo drawing on, and the ſeaſon muche diſpoſed to rayne and ſtormes: Neyther dyd the iſſue and ſucceſſe of the matter beguyle the iudgemente that the Capteine gaue of it: for as they had begonne to do execution vppon the walles with their artilleries which they had planted vppon the brinke of the ditche on that ſide where iſſueth the ſmall ryuer of Garzetto: ſo they that were within making many ſallies, brake foorth at laſte with fifteene hundred Launceknightes and Spaniardes, to charge the garde of thartillerie, whiche was an hundred men at armes and ſix thouſande footemen: and beating them alſo with the ſhot that for that ende was araunged vpon the towne wall, they put them eaſily to flight, notwithſtanding that Iohn Paule Manfron with thirtie men at armes ſuſteyned ſomewhat their furie: In this action they ſlewe two hundred bodies, burnt the powders, and drewe into Breſcia ten peeces of artilleries: For the harmes of this diſorder, Triuulco thought good to retyre and incampe more at large, exſpecting the comming of the Frenche men: In which minde he withdrew to Coccaio, which is ten miles from Breſcia, the Venetians looking in the meane while to make new prouiſions of artillerie & municions: But aſſone as the frenchmen were come the camp returned to beſiege the towne, & began to batter it in two ſundry places on that ſide of the gate of Piles towards the Caſtell, and alſo on that ſide of the gate of S. Iohn: in one of whiche quarters the Frenche men were incamped, and after they had giuen leaue to the Launceknights, for that they refuſed to do ſeruice agaynſt the townes of Cæſars obedience, Peter of Nauarre arriued at the campe with fiue thouſande Gaſcons and Frenchemen: And in the other quarter lay with the Venetian regimentes, Triuulco, in whom reſted almoſte the whole ſuperintendencie of thoſe affayres, for that the baſtard of Sauoy being falne into ſickneſſe, was gone from tharmie: When they had battred the wall, they followed not with thaſſault for the ſundrie rampiers and fortifications whiche the vallour of the defendauntes had made to reſiſte their violence: Onely Peter of Nauarre hauing recourſe to his accuſtomed remedies, began to vndermine and ſinke the walles. About this time Marke Antho. Colonno iſſuing out of Verona with ſix hundred horſmen & fiue hundred footmen, encountred in the playne Iohn Paule Manfron and Mark. Antho. Buo, who were beſtowed in garriſon within Valeggio with foure hundred men at armes & foure hundred light horſemen, he ouerthrew them, & in the skirmiſh was taken the ſonne of Iohn Paule, his horſe beeing killed vnder him, and his father fledde for his ſafetie to Goieto: Immediately after which expedition, Marke Antho. occupied Leguaguo, where were taken priſoners certayne Gentlemen of Venice. At laſte the difficulties to take Breſcia beeing more and more redoubled, bothe for that the mynes employed by Peter of Nauarre did not aunſwere the hopes that had bene giuen, and alſo for an exſpectation of eyght thouſande footemen to come out of Germanie, whiche the Capteines that laye about Breſcia had no confidence to be hable to hinder: The Venetians to couer ſomeway thignominie of their retrait, were contented to agree with the defendauntes of Breſcia, that if they were not ſuccoured within thirtie dayes, they would abandon the Citie and go out of it with their enſignes diſplayed, their artilleries, and what elſe apperteined to them: A promiſe whiche euery one knewe would ſerue to no purpoſe for thaſſurance they had of ſuccours: only it was a thing profitable to them of Breſcia to be deliuered in the meane whyle from aduerſities and afflictions. Afterwardes the Venetians put eyght thouſand footmen within Bre, a towne ſubect to the Counts of Lodrono, but aſſone as they heard the launceknights marched (to whom the Caſtell of Auſo was rendred) they retyred cowardly to tharmie: The capteins themſelues ſhowed no greater reſolution & corage, who fearing to be charged at one time both by thoſe bands, & the defendantes of Breſcia, and alſo by Mark Antho. Colonno with the regiments that were within Verona, retired to Gueda, whither they had ſent afore (being aſſured of that accident) their greateſt ſortes of

artillerie and almost all their baggage: And the launceknights that entred into Verona without impediment, returned into Germanie, after they had refurnished it of vittells, and reenforced the garrison.

During these accidents and enterchaunge of affayres, the Pope and the French king had agreed vppon an enteruiewe at Bolognia: A place which the king accepted affore Florence, because he would not be farre remoued from the Duchie of Millan, And chiefly for that the Duke of Sauoye managed continually the negociacion of accord betweene him and the Sivyzzers: But some thought he made election of that place, for that in passing into Tuskane he should be constrayned to leade with him a great trayne of souldiours, to thende he should not enter into Florence with a lesse pompe then did the late king Charles before him: for dressing of which pomp, it behoued him to spend certeine daies in deferring a matter by so much more grieuous and intollerable to the king, by how much (besides generall respects) it would breede occasion to make him reteyne yet longer the whole armie, whereof albeit the exspenses were great, yet made he no reckoning nor resolucion to send away any parte of it, so long as his person remeyned in Italy: Thus the Pope entred into Bolognia the eyght daye of December, and after him the king made his entry within two dayes, and to receiue him, were gone to the confyns of the contry of Reggia, the Cardinalls Fiesquo and Medicis, Legats Apostolyke: The king entred without many bandes of souldiers, and with no great trayne of Court and Courtyers, And beeing conueyed according to the manner of kinges into the publike Consistorie affore the Popes presence, he offered in his owne person (his great Chauncellor deliuering the speech for him) the obedience which till then he had not protested: They were lodged three dayes together in one pallace, showing one to an other right great and manifest tokens of good will and amitie: They confirmed at this meeting with wordes and promisses, the obligacions and contracts passed affore, and debated besides, of many thinges touching the Realme of Naples, which for that the king was in no readines to assayle at that tyme, he contented him selfe with the great hope and assurances which the Pope gaue to fauor him in that enterprise, eyther assoone as the king of Aragon should dye, who in reasonable iudgement coulde not longe liue, or when the confederacion which he had with him should be ended, which yet had continuance of sixteene monethes: The king also besought the Pope to render to the Duke of Ferrara Modono and Reggia, whereunto he condiscended so farre forth as the Duke repaied xl. thowsand duckats which he had giuen to Cæsar for Modona, & withall, make recompense for such summes of money as he had disbursed in exspenses for both the cities: Lastly the king was a sutor for Frauncis Maria Duke of Vrbyn, who beeing waged and interteyned by the Church with two hundred men at armes and appoynted with Iulian de Medicis to goe to tharmie, and afterwards that charge beeing transferred to Lavvrence, by reason Iulian was sicke: he refused to go thether, alleaging he would not accord to Lavvrence that which against his dignitie he had suffered for friendships sake in Iulian, to beare the place of a simple Capteine and subiect to thauthoritie of an other and that in the armie of the Church, wherein he had ruled so oftentymes as generall and soueraigne Commaunder of all: Moreouer he reuoked those souldiours in his paye that were on the way notwithstanding his promisse to sende them on to the seruice: he had also secretly compownded or at least was in action of composicion with the french king, like as also euer since the kinges victorie, he had not ceassed by speciall working to kindle him against the Pope: who taking the occasion of those

iniuries, and casting by all his deuises to make fall to his house that Duchie, refused to the kinge his demaunde, reducinge to his remembraunce by sweete wordes, of what consequence it woulde be for thaffaires of the Churche, to giue boldnesse to his subiectes, to rebell by so hurtefull an example: These reasons induced the king to conforme him selfe to the Popes will, notwithstandinge in regard of his honor, he would gladly haue purchassed safetie for him that was falne into daunger for being faithfull to his seruice: Wherunto he was perswaded by many of his councell and most of his Courte, who vnder the example of the late king, proued howe vnwise a councell it was to giue harte and countenaunce to the Duke Valentynois to oppresse the inferior Lordes of Italie, a matter that made him rise into that estate of greatnesse, that if God had giuen longer life to his father Pope Alexander, his ambicion coulde not but haue bene verie preiudiciall to the affayres of Fraunce: The Pope promised to giue the king power to leauie the tenth parte of the Churche reuenues of the realme of Fraunce for the arearing of an armie: And gaue also his consent that the king should haue the nomination of benefices which alwayes affore hath apperteyned to colledges and Chapters of Churches, a matter that fell out muche to the profitte and purpose of the kings of Fraunce, not only hauing by that meane the facultie to dispose at their owne arbitracion and will many riche benefices, but also the annates of the frenche Churches, shoulde afterwardes be payed to the Pope according to the true vallue, and not as the auncient taxacions being farre lesse required: Wherein the Pope found him selfe deceiued: for, when his Deputies and commissaries, for the realme of Fraunce, sought to proceede against those that conceiled the true vallue, they coulde finde no proofe nor testimonie, and muche lesse haue meane to execute against the parties, so that dispatches went out according to the olde rates: The king for his parte promised not to take into his protection any of the Cities of Tuskane: And albeit afterwardes he required to haue libertie to protect the people of Lucqua who offered him fiue and twentie thowsande duckats, saying he was bounde to that protection by thobligacion of his predecessor, yet the Pope would giue no consent, but promised for his parte that he woulde forbeare to molest them in any sorte: Lastly they agreed by indifferent consent of them both to sende frear Giles Generall of the Augustins and an excellent preacher, to Cæsar in the Popes name to dispose him to render to the Venetians Bressa and Verona, taking a recompense of money: And so vppon the expedicion of these matters, but not sette downe by wryting, except thartiele for nominacion of benefices and payment of the Annats according to the true vallue: the Pope in fauour of the king pronounced Cardinall Adrian de Boisy, brother to the great Maister of Fraunce and of the greatest authoritie with the king and in the generall gouernment: That the enteruiewe brake vppe, the king departing from the Pope verie well contented and in great hope to haue him his perpetuall frende, who for his parte expressed no lesse with all reasonable demonstracions: but in his minde he nouriished other impressions: for that bothe it was a matter no lesse greeuous to him then affore, that the Duchie of Myllan shoulde be possessed by the Frenche king, and Parma and Plaisanca restored, and also that the Duke of Ferrara should be eftsoones reinuested in Modena and Reggia: And yet all these not long after turned to vanitie and smoake, for that the Pope being gone from Bolognia to Florence, & remeining there about a moneth, had receiued of the Duke promises of the money that should be payd assoone as he should enter into possession, & being there set down in writing by common consent thin-thinstrumentes that were to passe betwene them, the Pope neither denying nor accomplishing, but interposing many delayes and excuses, refused to giue perfection to things.

The king being returned to Myllan, dismissed his armie except seuen hundred launces, six thowsand launceknightes and foure thowsand frenchmen such as they cal aduenturers, whom he left for the gard of that estate: And for his owne person he returned into Fraunce with great speede about the first beginning of the yeare 1516. leauing behinde him as his Lieftenaunt, Charles Duke of Burbon: he thought he had left his affayres in Italie in good estate of sewertie, both for the allyance newlie contracted with the Pope, and also for that about that time, he was newly compounded with the Suvyzzers, who, notwithstanding the perswasions of the king of England to haue them to reenter into armes against the frenche king renewed with him thalliance by the which they bound them selues to furnishe alwayes for his seruice and at his paye, both in Italie and out of Italie, for defense and offence, and against all nations, suche numbers of footemen as he would require, and that vnder their vniuersall name and publike enseignes: onely they excepted to beare armes against the Pope, the Empire, and the Emperour: And on the other side, the king confirmed to them of newe their auncient pensions, with promisse to paye them within a certaine time the six hundred thowsand duckats agreed vpon at Dyon, with three hundred thowsande if they gaue vp to him the villages and vallies apperteyning to his Duchy of Myllan: A matter which the fiue Cantons that possessed those places, refusing to do, as also to ratifie the accord, the king began to pay to the other eight Cantons that parte and porcion of the money that apperteined to them: who accepted it, but vnder this expresse condition that they should not be bound to take his pay against the fiue Cantons. 1516.

The french king returneth into Fraunce.

About the beginning of this yeare the Bishoppe Petruccio an auncient seruant to the Pope, chassed out of Siena by the Popes aide and some helpe from the Florentins, Borgueso sonne to Pandolffe Petruccio his cossing, and impatronised him selfe vpon the place, the authority and gouernment remeining by equity in the possession of his said cossing: the Pope had two respects inducing him to this actiō, the one for that that citie standing betwene the estate of the Church, and the dominion of the Florentins, was gouerned by a man wholly at his deuocion: the other was & much more particular and mouing, for that he hoped with the fauor of some good occasion, to make it fall into the gouernment of his brother or his nephew, wherein he douted nothing of the Bishops consent, hauing already framed him tractable to all his desires and ambicions.

The warre continued kindeled betwene Cæsar and the Venetians, who for their partes desired to recouer by the aide of the frenche king, Bressa and Verona: But for other places and regions of Italie, things seemed to stand in a peasible estate: onely there beganne to burst out mocions of new stirres that were pushed on by the king of Aragon, who fearing least the greatnesse of the frenche king would bring some aduersities to the realme of Naples, delt with Cæsar and the king of Englande, to recontinewe the warre: A matter not onely of no great difficultie and hardnesse to drawe Cæsar vnto, being both desirous of innouacion and newe thinges, and also was not able easily to kepe the townes which he had take from the Venetians: But also it was fullie concluded and agreed vnto by the king of England: The remembraunce of the late infidelitie and breache of promise of his father in lawe, being of lesse power in him, then either his present emulacion or auncient hatred against the crowne of Fraunce: beſides, he was enuious, that the Skottish king being in minoritie, ſhould be gouerned by people of his appoyntment, or any waye depending on him.

Death of the king Catholike.

Theſe matters had bene followed both with better councell, and greater forces, if during the negociacion, the death of the king of Aragon had not hapned, who, after he had bene vexed with a long indiſpoſicion, died in an inferior village called Madrigalege, as he went to Seuile with his Court: he was a king excellent in councell and ſo furniſhed with al other properties of vertue, that he bare no occaſion or matter of reprehenſion, if he had bene conſtant to keepe his promiſſes: for, touching thimputacion of nigardnes or the reapport that went of him to be ſtraite in exſpenſes, it was proued vntrue by the teſtimonie and diſcouerie of his eſtate after his death, leauing behinde him no amaſſe of treaſor, notwithſtanding he had reigned xlij. yeares: But it hapneth oftentymes by the corrupt iudgement of men, that in a king prodigalitie is more prayſed though the raking and oppreſſion of ſubiects be ioyned to it, then a ſparing ſtraitnes wherin is nouriſhed an orderly abſteyning from taxing the goods of others: To thexcellent vertues of this Prince, was ioyned a moſt rare, and perpetuall felicitie during the whole courſſe of his life, excepting onely the death of his onely ſonne: for, the accidents of his wiues and his ſonne in lawe, were the cauſe that he kept his greatnes vntill his death, and the neceſſitie to depart with Caſtillo after his wiues death, was rather a ſport then a blowe of fortune: In all other thinges he was right happy: for, being ſecond ſonne to Iohn king of Aragon, he came to the crowne by the death of his elder brother: he aſpyred to the kingdom of Caſtillo by Iſſabell his wife: he ſubdued the Competytors of the ſame kingdome, and expulſed them: he made a conqueſt of the Realme of Granado, which the ennemies of Chriſtian faith had vſurped almoſt eight hundred yeares: he annexed to his Empire, the Realmes of Naples, and Nauarre, and the principallitie of Orano, with many other places of importance vpon the coaſt of Affriqua: he bare alwayes the victorie and vpperhand of his ennemies: he almoſt cloaked his ambicions and couetouſnes with an honeſt zeale to religion, and an holy affection to the common weale wherein fortune appeared manifeſtly conioyned with induſtrie. About a moneth affore his deathe, dyed the Great Capteine, both abſent from the Court, and ill contented of the king: And yet the king gaue order, that in remembrance of his vallour, there ſhoulde bee done to him both in the Court and through the whole partes of the Realme, thoſe honors that haue not beene vſed to bee done, but at the death of kinges: A matter plauſiblie accepted and executed by all his ſubiectes, who omitted no ſorte of reuerence or celebracion to the name of the Great Capteyne, making him ſinguler in liberalitie, in councell, in diſcreſſion, and for knowledge in warres and martiall ſcience, excelling all the Capteines of his time.

Death of the Great Capceine.

By the death of this king, the french king entred into a newe courage to addreſſe an enterpriſe againſt the realme of Naples, to the which he was in mind to ſend forthwith the Duke of Burbon with an armie of eight hundred launces, & tenne thowſand footemen: he ſeemed to reappoſe much in thopportunitie of the time, for that the kingdome beeing in ſome tumult vppon the death of the king, and ill prepared for defenſe, he perſwaded a facilitie of conqueſt, ſpeciallye the Archduke hauing no reſpitte or tyme to ſuccour it: And he doubted nothinge of the Popes fauour, bothe for the hopes he had giuen him at the enteruiewe of Bolognia, and in regarde of thalliance contracted with him, and alſo in conſideracion of his proper intereſt, as though he ſhoulde bee ielouſe of the wonderfull height and great-

nes of tharchduke heire presēt to so many kingdomes by the death of the king Catholike, and exspected successor of Cæsar: he hoped besides, that tharchduke would giue him no great impediment, knowing howe harmefull might be to him his ill will touching the Realmes of Spayne, but specially for the regarde of the kingdome of Aragon, wherevnto many of the same famulie had aspired, if their power had bene as great as their right: for albeit in the life of the late king and Isabell his wife, it was interpreted in an open & generall Parliament, that the ancient constitutions of that kingdome which admit not women to the succession of the Crowne, were not preiudiciall agaynst the issue males borne of them, when in the lyne masculine was to be founde neither brother, vncle, nor nephew of the dead king, nor any other that was more nearer to him then they that were discended of the womans side, or at least in equall degree: and that for that reason it was declared, that after the death of Ferdinand, the succession apperteined to tharchduke Charles, wherin was brought for example, that after the death of Martin king of Aragon dying without issue males, the sentence of the Iudges deputed to that matter through the whole kingdome, preferred Ferdinand graundfather to this Ferdinand, notwithstanding he came of the womens side, affore Count Vrgello and others ioyned to Martin by masculine lyne, but in degree and propertie of discending, further off then Ferdinand: yet the people nourished amongest them selues a secret complaynt and controuersie, that in that interpretation and declaration, the power of Ferdinand and Isabell had more force, then the lawe of iustice and equitie: In this did thinterpretation seeme vniust to many, that the women beeing excluded, suche as discended of them might be admitted, and withall that in the sentence giuen to the behoofe of tholde Ferdinand, the feare of his armes ruled more then reason. These matters beeing layde open to the French king, and withall that the peoples of the prouince of Aragon, Valence, and Earledome of Catelonia (all these are comprehended vnder the kingdome of Aragon) stoode desirous to enioye a king proper and particular: He hoped that tharchduke, not to endaunger so great a succession and so many estates, would not at laste be straunge or harde to leaue to him that kingdome vnder some reasonable cōposition. And for the better preparing of this enterprise, because he would insinuate by benefites, aswell as preuayle by forces, he sought at that time to set at libertie Prospero Colonno, vpon whom was imposed a raunsome of xxxv. thousande duckettes, whereof the king procured him to be pardoned of the one moytie: By whiche propertie of fauor the worlde beleeued that Prospero had made secrete promise not to beare armes agaynst him, yea happly to ayde him in the warre of Naples, albeit with some limitation or reseruing of his honor.

Albeit the king was occupied with these thoughtes, and had now determined to deferre no longer the action of armes and forreine warre, yet he was driuen by new accidentes to turne his minde wholly to his owne defence: for that Cæsar hauing receiued a hundred and twentie thousande duckets according to the former negociation begon with the king of Aragon, made preparation to inuade the duchie of Millan, after he had once giuen succours to Verona and Bressia: for the Venetian armie (commaunded by Theoder Triuulco, for that the other Triuulco was returned to Millan) lying encamped within six myles of Bressia, suffred their estradiots to make incursions thorowe the whole contrey: And one daye beeing charged by those that were within the towne, and either partie ronning to the reskew and succour of their friendes, they repulsed them and draue them beaten into Bressia, hauing long fought for the victorie, in which conflict they slue many, and tooke prisoner the gouernors brother of the Citie. Not many dayes after Monsr de Lavvtrech generall of the French armie, and Theodore Trivulco having espiall that a strength of three thousand Launceknightes came to Bressia to conduct the money sent for the paye of the souldiors, sent out to hinder their passage at the Castell of Asso, Ianus Fregoso and John Conrado Vrsin with certayne bandes of both the armies: they put the launceknights to flight, and made slaughter of eight hundred of them, the residue carying awaye the money, founde safety by flying to Lodrono. Afterwardes the Venetians sent a regiment of two thousande fiue hundred footemen into Sandualley to fortifie the castell of Anso, who brunt Lodrono and Astoro. Thus were they in Bressia maruelously trauelled, whose aduersities and straitnes bearing suspicion least they would giue vp, compelled Cæsar to aduance and marche: he tooke his way by Trent to Verona, hauing in his armye fiue thousande horsemen, fifteene thousande Swvizzers sent to him by the fiue Cantons, and ten thousande footemen aswell Spanish as launceknightes: By reason of which marching comming on both in a maner, in a number, and by a way contrarie to exspectation, the Frenche armie and the Venetians, leauing sufficient garrisons within Vincensa and Padoa, went to Pesquiero, carying a minde to stoppe Cæsars passage at the ryuer of Mince: But (as it often happneth in matters of enterprise) the execution did nothing answere the counsell: for that when they sawe the enemies approache and come on, they wanted the courage to performe in the fielde the thing which they had so brauely promised vnder counsell in their pauillions, but, hauing passed Oglia, they retyred to Cremona, omitting thopportunitie with the losse of reputation, which in the enemie encreased together with a newe courage and resolution: But Cæsar, eyther caried by an vndiscret counsell, or pushed on by an euill fortune, encamped before Asolo, which was garded by a hundred men at armes and foure hundred footmen of the Venetians: there he consumed vnprofitably many dayes, wherein it was thought that the respite whiche he gaue to the enemies in that delay, tooke from him thopportunitie of the victorie. Assone as he brake vp from before Asolo, he passed the ryuer of Oglio at Orcinouo, and the enemies leauing in Cremona three hundred launces and three thousand footmen, retyred on the other side the ryuer of Addo, with intention to stoppe his passage: By whose retyring leauing the peeces there abandoned, all the countrey betwene Oglio, Pavv, and Addo, was at the deuotion of Cæsar, except Cremona & Crema, wherof the one was garded by the French, & the other kept by the Venetians: The Cardinall of Syon with many of the banished people of the duchie of Millan, folowed Cæsar together with Mark. Antho. Colonno who marched with two hundred men at armes of the Popes pay: A matter which gaue so muche the more feare to the Frenchmen, by howe muche their greateste hopes were reduced thither, if ten thousande Swvizzers who had bene payed for ten monethes made any more tarying to marche. After Cæsar had passed the ryuer of Oglio, he drewe neare to the ryuer of Addo to make his passage at Pisquetono, but finding many difficulties to passe in that place, he came to Riuolo, the Frenchmen lying at Casciano on the other side the ryuer, who for that the Swvizzers were not come, and that the ryuer of Addo had many foardes that yeelded facilitie of passage, retyred the daye after to Millan, not without matter of infamie to Monsr Lavvtrech, who had written to the king that he would stoppe Cæsars passage at that ryuer: But Cæsar finding no impediment to resiste his passage there, ioyned diligence to his fortune, and finding mens mindes inclined to his victorie, he had the Citie of Loda rendred to him forthwith: And being within a fewe myles of Millan, he sent an Herald to sommon the towne, threatning thinhabitants, that if within three dayes they expulsed not the Frenche armie, he woulde deale worse with them then did Federike Barberosso his predecessor, who not satisfied to waste and burne Millan, caused salte to be sowed and strawed about in memorie of his anger and their rebellion.

The French men that in great feare were retyred to Millan, fell amongest themselues into great debates and diuersitie of councells: some were of opinion to abandon Millan, both for that in them selues was no possibilitie of resistaunce agaynst so mightie enemies, and withall they had no great confidence in the comming of the Svvizzers, notwithstanding they knewe they were already vpon the way: Besides, they had aduertisement that the Cantons eyther had already ordred, or were at poynt to commaunde, that the souldiors of the Svvizzers shoulde depart from the seruice of both the one & the other, which direction it was thought credible & likely that those bands that were vpon the way, would be more ready to obey then they that were in the seruice of thenemie: Others gaue aduise not to leaue the seruice, esteeming it too great infamie to leaue forsaken in perill and aduersitie, those friends that had reappосed and layde vp in them the whole confidence of their safetie and protection: They alleaged a better hope in the reskew of the Svvizzers, and their owne habilitie to defende Millan, giuing a resolute counsell to sticke to the defence of the towne, and for their better suretie they willed to keepe reteyned in Millan all the footemen, and eight hundred launces, making distribution of the others together with the Venetians and the light horsemen, into places adioyning, to keepe and cutte off vittells from thenemies. The varietie of opinions was no small impediment to the present seruice, their daunger and necessitie being more importunat, then their councells resolute, or their confidence assured: Neuertheless the firste councell had bene followed, had it not bene for the contratie working and perswasion of Andrevv Gritti and Andrevv Treuisan, Venetian commissioners, who obteined by their authoritie (for otherwise they could winne nothing) that a cowardly haste should not carry them further then the reputation of vallour and counsell apperteining to men of warre and seruice: In the action of which perswasions newes came that the day following Alberto Peter would be in Millan with ten thousande Svvizzers and Grisons: A matter that breathed newe minds and courages in them, and yet hauing no confidence to be hable to defende the suburbes, they burnt them by the counsell of the Venetian commissioners, who aduised them to that violence, eyther for that they supposed it necessarie to the sauetie of the towne, or else vnder that occasion they sought to satisfie the auncient hatred remaining of long time betwene them of Millan and Venice. They both expulsed out of the Citie, and also reteined vnder good garde, many of the chieftaynes of the Gebelin faction, as inclined to the name of thempire by the care and labour of those houses, and for that there were in the armie many of the same parcialitie. In this meane while Cæsar encamped with his armie at Lambra two myles from Millan, where he had no sooner setled his campe to the terror of the towne, then thexspected supply of Svvizzers entred for the defence of it: Besides the sodennes of their comming, which in cases of reskew is of no small importance, their readines and disposition to feight, amazed not a litle euen those that affore seemed to stande in assuraunce of the victorie: They gaue a newe life to the discouraged mindes of the French men, and no lesse feare & terror to Cæsar, who looking into thauncient hatred of that nation to the house of Austrich, and comparing with his present estate, the accident happned to Lodovvike Sforce hauing Svvizzers in his armie, and in the French armie his enemies, began to feare leaſt they would ioyne him to that lamentable example: he ſawe it was likely that they would ſooner practiſe infidelitie and treaſon agaynſt him for the difficultie he had to paye them, then agaynſt the French men, to whom was wanting no money to paye their wages, nor to corrupt their mindes: wherein this was one matter that confirmed him in his doubt, that Iames Stafflier generall of the Svvizzers, had asked him his paye with great arrogancie: Which neuertheleſſe was deferred, beſides many other difficulties, becauſe the treaſor that was ſent to him out of Germanie, was reſtrayned by the Spaniſh regimentes that were within Breſſia, to ſatisfie ſo muche of their payes as were due: So that in the conſideration of theſe obiections and doubtes, together that the daunger was nothing inferior to the feare, Cæſar brake vp his campe and retyred towards the ryuer of Adda, his negligence taking from him the glorie of the victory which fortune and oportunitie ſeemed to prepare for him: for, if he had made his approches to Millan but three dayes affore (a time which he vaynely conſumed affore Aſola) the French men that lyued in great doubt and incertentie of the comming of the Svvizzers, had returned beyonde the Mountes: Beſides, if he had not ſo ſoone diſcamped, eyther the Frenche men, not reappoſing fully in the Svvizzers for the reſpectes of their contrey men that ſerued in Cæſars campe, had followed their firſt councell, or elſe the Svvizzers taking their excuſe vpon the commaundement of their ſuperiors, would haue abandoned the French men. Cæſar paſſed the ryuer of Adda, and was not followed of the Svvizzers, who remayned at Loda, proteſting that if their payes came not within foure dayes they would depart and leaue his ſeruice: But Cæſar making his aboade vpon the territories of Bergama, gaue them continuall hopes to be ſatisfied, for that he exſpected a newe ſupply of money to be ſent him out of Englande: he threatned to drawe backe his forces agayne to Millan, which eſtſones recontinued the doubts of the French men, who nowe more then euer ſtoode incertayne of the fidelitie of the Svvizzers, for that beſides they had willingly forſlowed their comming, with proteſtation that they would neuer lift vp their weapons agaynſt their contrey men in the other campe, there was come to them a commaundement from the Cantons to forſake the paye of the French men: In ſo much as there were two thouſande of them that went away, leauing behind them great feare leaſt the others would follow their example, notwithſtanding the Cantons had aſſured the king that they had giuen ſecret commaundement to their footemen to the contrarie. At laſte Cæſar, after he had leauyed vpon the towne of Bergama an impoſt of xvj thouſande duckets, and was gone towardes Crema vnder hope of an intelligence, returned eſtſones vpon the territories of Bergama without doing any thing, and determined to withdrawe him ſelfe to Trenta: He communicated with the Capteines of the army his deliberation, aſſuring them that his principall intention was to giue order for money whiche he ment to leauie of men, with the which and with the treaſor of Englande that was vpon the way, he would make a ſhort returne, deſiring them to temporiſe & exſpect with him ſo good preparation: And they hauing ſacked Loda, and forced the caſtell without artillerie, retyred to Guiaradada for want of vittells, after they had alſo made pillage of the towne of S. Angè. After the departing of Cæſar, there was ſome hope that the Svvizzers with whom was ioyned the whole army at Romano, would eſtſones paſſe the ryuer of Adda, the rather for that the Marquis of Brandebourg was come to the campe, and the Cardinall of Syon to Bergama with thirtie thouſande duckets which the king of Englande had ſent: for feare whereof the duke of Burbon whom almoſte all the Svvizzers and the Venetian ſouldiors had forſaken, was come

vpon the shoares on the other side the ryuer to make resistaunce: but the thoughtes of thenemies were sodenly chaunged, for that the Svvizzers, the money not suffising to satisfie their whole pay, disperſed and returned into their contrey by the vallie of Voltolina: And for the same cause a regiment of three thousande footemen, parte Spanishe and parte Dutche, came and rendred them selues to the campe of the French men and the Venetians, who being passed the ryuer of Adda, had not ceassed to trauell thenemies with sundrie incursions, and to skirmishe with them with diuerse fortunes and accidentes: sometimes the French men had the worse, who in a hoat skirmishe made neare Bergama loste about two hundred men at armes: and sometimes the aduersitie fell vpon the contrarie parte, of whom in a like encounter fell into the fortune of a prisoner Cæsar Fiermosquo: The residue of tharmie drewe neare to Brèssia, hauing receyued in prest a ducket for euery man: but for the impedimentes that the light horsemen gaue them, Mark Antho. Colonno entred into Verona with the Launceknightes and certayne bandes of Spanishe footemen, and all the others seperated themselues.

This was the ende of the mouing and marching of Cæsar, wherein the Frenche king had no small suspicion of the Pope, for that hauing summoned him according to the bonde of the league made betweene them, that he should send to the defence of the state of Millan, fiue hundred men at armes, or at least drawe them neare the confines, and withall to wage three thousande Svvizzers according to his offer made to Antho. Maria Palvoisin whiche the king charged him withall: The Pope made but colde aunswers touching the waging of Svvizzers, and taking an occasion to excuse himselfe that his men were in yll appoyntment, he promised to sende him bandes of the Florentins, who with certeine of his souldiors marched very slowly towardes Bologna and Reggia: The king suspected more and more that he dyd communicate with the comming of Cæsar, both for that assone as he knewe he was entred into Italy, he created Legate with him Barnerd Bibiena Cardinall of S. Maria in Portico, who bare alwayes a setled emulation to the French, and was accustomed to impugne the proceding of their affayres with the Pope: And also for that he suffred Mark. Antho. Colonno with his regimentes to folowe Cæsars armie. But howe so euer the king was ielouse of the Popes priuitie in this action, or by what humors he ranne in coniecture agaynst him for his consent to the emotion, it is moste true that touching his proper interest, the Pope was not a little aggreeued with the discending of Cæsar with so great forces, fearing that if he caryed the victorie, he woulde aduenture to oppresse all Italie, according to his auncient inclination: Neuertheless, what for thimpression of feare, and that suche maner of proceeding was conformable to his nature, he dissembled his thoughtes, labouring to make himselfe as litle hatefull as he coulde to eyther parties: That was the cause why he was bold to call home agayne Marke Antho. and durst not sende to the king the succours he had promised: That he had created a Legate with Cæsar, and on the other side, Cæsar being departed from Millan, the Legate vnder a fayned cooller of sickneſse, stayed at Rubiera to see affore he passed further, what would be the issue of such an enterprise: And afterwards, to settle & quiet the kings mind, he thought good that his nephew Lavvrence (continuing in the same demonstration to depende of the king that he showed when he went to him at Millan) should giue him money by the Florentins to paye three thousande Svvizzers for one moneth: But albeit the king accepted this money, yet (discloſing by tokens that he knewe the Popes driftes) he sayd, that since he was alwayes agaynst him in warre, and the alliaunce made with him serued him to no vſe in times of daunger, he would eſtſoones make a new confederacion wherein he would be bownd but in peace and in ſeaſons of ſuertie.

Aſſoone as the armie of Cæſar was diſperſed and ſeparat, the Venetians (without tarying for the french men) approached Breſcia by night thinking to skale the wals: They had confidence in this enterpriſe by the ſmal ſtrength of men that was within, ſince there remained no more but ſix hundred footemen ſpaniſh, and foure hundred horſemen, but both their ladders being ſhorter then was neceſſary to that ſeruice, & the vallour of the defendants beguiling their exſpectacion, their attempt drew with it no ſucceſſe: Afterwardes arriued the frenche armie vnder the charge of Odet de Foix whom the king had newly created his Lieuetenant in place of Monſr Burbon, who of his owne mocion had willingly reſigned that gouernment into the kinges handes: Theſe armies aſſailed Breſcia with artilleries in foure places to take from the defendants all reaſonable poſſibilitie to make reſiſtance againſt ſo ſeuerall executions: and albeit the vallour of the defendants contending againſt their fortune, made good reſiſtance ſo long as they had hope, that a regiment of ſeuen thowſand footemen of the contry of Tyroll, beeing come by Cæſars commaundement to Montagnia, ſhould paſſe further: yet, both that reskewe beeing diſapointed for thimpediments which the Venetians beſtowed in the caſtell of Auſo and other paſſages, and alſo the defendants not willing to abide thaſſalt which was to be giuen the next yeare, (a great pane of the wal being already beaten downe to the ground) the ſouldiours couenanted to leaue the towne and caſtell onely with their goods ſaued, if they were not reskewed within a day.

About theſe times the Pope preparing to take by armes from Frauncis Maria de la Rovvero, the Duchie of Vrbyn, began to proceede againſt him with cenſures and Church paines, cauſing to be publiſhed an admonition wherein was expreſſed, that being in the pay and wages of the Church, he had refuſed thoſe regiments of men for the which he had receiued pay, and was ſecretly compownded with thennemies: That long time before, he had killed the Cardinall of Pauia of the which he was abſolued by grace and not by iuſtice, and had executed many other morders: That in the greateſt heate of the warre betweene Pope Iulio to whom he was Nephewe, ſubiect, and Capteine, he had ſent Baltaſar de Chaſtillion to take the kings pay: And that at the ſame time he had denied paſſage to certein bands that marched to ioyne with the armie of the Church, and in the iuriſdiction which he poſſeſſed as freeholder to the ſea Apoſtolike, he had purſued the ſouldiours of the Church that fled from the battell of Rauenna: The Pope was determined many moneths before to make warre vpon him, whereunto, beſides all late and greene iniuries, he was puſhed on by a diſdaine in that he refuſed to ayde him ſelfe and his brother to returne to Florence: And yet he was ſomewhat reteyned by a ſhame that he had to perſecute the Nephew of him, by whoſe meane the Church was riſen to ſuch a greatnes, but much more at the contemplacion of his brother Iulian, who, in the time of their exile hauing remeyned many yeares in the Court of Vrbyn both with Duke Guido & after his death, with the Duke raigning, could not endure to ſee him depriued of the duchie wherein he had receiued enterteinment, fauor, and honor: But Iulian was no ſooner dead of a conſuming diſeaſe at Florence, and the great ſtirrs of Cæſar beeing vaniſhed and turned into ſmoke: then the Pope at the perſwaſion of his Nephew Lavvrence and his mother Alfonſina thirſting after that eſtate, reſolued to deferre no longer the oppreſſion which he had determined with no leſſe iniurie then infamie: he was not aſhamed to alleage for excuſe of his ingratitude (which many imputed to him for reproach proache and ſlaunder) not onely the treſpaſſes he had receyued by him, and the penalties whiche the rygour of the lawes impoſe vppon a ſubiect that offendes in contumacie agaynſt his Lorde, or a Capteine who contrarie to his bonde denyeth to leade the men for the whiche he is waged and enterteyned: But alſo he brought in this conſideration, that it was to him a matter very ielouſe and daungerous, to endure in thintralls of his eſtate, a man, who by howe muche more he had begonne alreadye to offende him without all regarde to fayth and honor, by ſo muche more it was certayne that when ſo euer a greater occaſion did offer, he would not be leſſe ready or apte to doo the lyke hereafter confirming his firſt ylles with other examples of lyke nature. The diſcourſe of that warre was this: Aſſone as Lavvrence ſhewed him ſelfe vppon the frontiers of the Duchie, and diſplayed his armie compounded vppon the ſouldiors and ſubiectes of the Church and theſtate of Florence, The Citie of Vrbin with other townes of that iuriſdiction, made a voluntarie rendring to the Pope, the Duke that was then retyred to Peſera, giuing them election to ſaue them ſelues, ſince he had no habilitie to defende them: And aſſoone as tharmie drewe neare, Peſera followed thexample of Vrbin, the cowardiſe of the Duke concurring with his infelicities: for notwithſtanding there was a garriſon of three thouſande footemen, the towne mightie in fortifications, and had the ſea at deuotion, yet the Duke leauing within the Caſtell Tranquillo Mandolfo in whom he muche reapoſed, tooke his way to Mantua, whither he had ſent before, his wife and ſonnes: ſome ſuppoſed that his retyring thither came vpon a ſuſpected confidence he had in the ſouldiors, of whom the greateſt parte was vnpayed: but ſome are of opinion that his impacience for the abſence of his wife, was the cauſe of his going thither, vnder which pollicie he excuſed his feare with loue. It is a true ſaying that aduerſities haue a ſwifte courſe, and fortune to make her mutabilitie wonderfull, can heape in one day all the chances of a world: for except the caſtles of Sinigalo, Peſero, S. Leo, and Maiuolo, the whole duchie of Vrbin and Peſero was reduced in foure dayes to the obedience of the Church: But the Caſtell of Sinigalo made no delay to folow the courſe of the victorie, as alſo the ſtrong Caſtell of Peſero after it had bene two dayes executed with artilleries, compounded to giue vp if within twentie dayes it were not reskewed, ſo farfoorth as during this time of truce or exſpectation of ſuccours, there were no caſting of rampiers nor other ſort of fortifications: which condition being yll performed, was the cauſe that Tranquillo receiuing no reskew within the tyme appoynted, refuſed to deliuer it vp: and beginning a freſh to recontinue the warre, he made new ſallies and actions vpon thenemy without, which made his deſtinie the harder, for that the batterie beginning to play with greater furie, the ſouldiors within the Caſtell preferring their owne ſafetie affore the wyll of Tranquillo, drewe into mutinie agaynſt him, and deliuered him vp into the hands of the capteines, who condemned him to be hanged for his promiſe breaking: Not many dayes after was rendred the caſtell of Maiuola, a place very neceſſarie to beſiege S. Leo, for that it is but a myle diſtance, and hath his ſituation directly oppoſite: And they beſtowed about S. Leo two thouſande men to thend to keepe it beſieged: And albeit for the ſtrong ſituation there was no hope to carie it but by the laſte neceſſitie, whiche is hunger: yet it was ſurpriſed within three monethes by an inuention of a maiſter Capenter, who clymbing by nighte by the benefite of a very long Ladder vp to a clyffe or dependant ſuppoſed to be moſt inacceſſible of all that mountayne, he tooke away his ladder, and remayning there all the reſidue of the night, he began at the firſte appearing of the day, to clyme higher with certayne faſtning inſtrumentes of yron, and got at laſte with greate aduenture to the top of the mountayne, and ſo diſcending agayne, and with his yron inſtrumentes making eaſie certaine of the places that were of moſt difficultie, he returned the night folowing to the campe by the helpe of the ſame ladder that caryed him vp: he declared to the capteines that the mountayne was acceſſible, and that in the enterpriſe the danger was greater in opinion then in aduenturing, in ſo much as a night was appoynted when he was ſent thither with the ſame ladder that he firſt vſed: And as it was reaſonable that he ſhould be guyde of thaction, that was the firſt author of thinuention, ſo there were committed to him a hundred and fiftie footmen of choyſe, with whome ſtaying vpon the ſayde cliffe or dependant, they began at the opening of the day (for it was impoſſible to climbe higher by night) to mount vp thoſe very harde and ſtraite places, eſteeming nothing of the perill when they conſidered what glorie was in the aduenture: with this labour about thirtie of them ouercame the difficultie of the place, and gotte vp to the toppe of the mountayne with a drumme and ſix enſignes: and hiding them ſelues vpon the ground to exſpect their companions that were a climing, when the watch being then releued eſpyed them as they laye in ambuſhe vpon the earth: The watche gaue the alarme when the ſouldiors being now diſcloſed not tarying for their felows, gaue the ſigne to the army in the camp, who according to good direction tooke knowledge of the ſucceſſe of the climers, and with great ſtore of ladders offred a preſent aſſault to the mountayne in many places: Their chiefeſt reaſon in this aſſault was to drawe away thoſe that were within, who after they had ſomewhat ſerued the places they were apponted vnto, and diſcrying already vpon the playne of the mountaine ſix enſignes aduaunced, they ranne to encloſe themſelues within the Caſtell that was hewed out of the mountayne, hauing now more feare of their lyues, then confidence in the inuincible ſtrength of the place: The reſidue by this time beeing clymed vp to the top of the mountaine, they began to commaunde the whole place opening the way to others that as yet with great payne & difficultie were labouring to winne the top of the hill: But the reſolution of the clymers beeing farre aboue the vallour of the defendantes, in whom alſo the ſodenneſſe of the fortune redoubled their feare, the mountayne became a rewarde to the labours of thoſe that had aduentured to clymbe it, when the Caſtell alſo well prouided of all thinges to holde out ſauing of vallour and fidelitie, yelded the ſeconde day: In ſo much as vpon the conquering of this eſtate, which together with Peſera & Siuigalo ſeperat members from the Duchie of Vrbin, was not worth in reuenue aboue xxv. thouſande duckets. The Pope purſuing the proceſſe he had begon, publiſhed ſentence & depriued Frauncis Maria, and in the conſiſtory inueſted his nephew Lavvrence: wherin for a more hable and ſufficient cõfirmation of his doings, he annexed to the Bull which he diſpatched for that action, the ſubſcribing of the proper hands of all the Cardinalls, ſauing of Dominike Grimani Biſhop of Vrbin and an auncient frend to the Duke, who would not be concurrant in ſo manifeſt a wrong, & for that cauſe fearing the Popes indignatiõ, he departed afterwards from Rome whether he neuer returned ſo long as he liued.

The french king was diſcõtented with thoppreſſion of the duke of Vrbin, the rather for that he ſuffred priuation of his eſtate for being cõfederat with him: But he ſtood much more diſpleaſed for many other things that the Pope did: for Proſpero Colonno abiding at Baſeta a town of the Paluoiſins, at ſuch time as he was returned frõ Fraũce, & afterwards being come to Modona for feare of the frẽchmen, whither likewiſe was retired Ier. Morono, who alſo ſtood in dout of thẽ, for that contrary to their promiſes

they had cõmanded him to go into Fraunce: There was conſpiracie whileſt Proſpero lay at Modona & afterwards at Bologna, to ſurpriſe ſecretly ſome place of importance in the duchie of Millan by the working of ſome of the baniſhed men: In this practiſe was alſo concurrant Mucio Colonno, to whom the Pope hauing priuity in theſe actions, had graunted harbour for his bandes of ſouldiors vpon the territories of Modena: Moreouer the Pope had perſwaded the king Catholike (for ſo was tharchduke called ſince the death of his grandfather by the mother ſide) to make no newe conuentions with the Frenche king: And on the behalfe of the Svvizzers, Emius Biſhop of Verulo and the Popes Nuncio, to whom afterwards euen in his lateſt yeares, was transferred the creation and dignitie of Cardinall, ſtirred vp the fiue Cantons to folow the amitie of Cæſar, beſides many other offices diſpleaſing to the king: So that concurring alſo at the ſame time a practiſe betweene Cæſar (who remayning betwene Trent and Iſpurch, terrified the French men more with demonſtrations then with effects) and the king of Englande, and the Svvizzers to make a newe inuaſion vppon the Duchie of Millan: The Frenche king ſuſpected that theſe matters were wrought with the will and priuitie of the Pope, whoſe euill affection alſo appeared in other actions, making many exceptions and difficulties to confirme vnto him the tenth of the benefices of the realme of Fraunce which he had promiſed him at Bologna: And yet (ſo great is the reſpect and maieſtie of a Pope) the king ſo labored to appeaſe him with offers & offices, that albeit after the departure of Cæſar he had determined to moleſt Mirandula, Carpy, and Correge, as townes imperiall, to thende to make ſome leauyes of money of them, yet he forbare from all action, in regarde of the complaynings of the Pope, who had receyued affore into his protection the Lordes of thoſe townes. Moreouer the Mores of Affrica commaunding the ſea inferior with many veſſels, he offred to ſende him for the ſuretie of thoſe ſeas, his nauie of ſhips which Peter of Nauarre armed at Marſeilles by his conſent for thinuaſion of the ſtreames and creekes of Barbarie with a ſtrength of ſix thouſande footemen: But notwithſtanding all theſe offers & obſeruances, the Pope perſeuered in his opinion, and as ſometimes he would vſe deniall, & ſometimes occupie excuſes, yet he would neuer ſo muche as conſent to that demaunde the king had made to him with great inſtance to call out of Svvizzerlande the Biſhop of Verulo, and much leſſe would he remoue Mucio Colonno from the territories of Modona (where he fained he remained of his owne authoritie) vntill, by the departure of Proſpero from Bologna and all that practiſe diſſolued into ſmoke, there was no more neceſſitie of his abiding there: Only the breaking vp from thence was a matter of great aduerſitie to Mutio, for that entring afterwardes by night into the towne of Ferma with the forces of the Colonnois and with certayne bandes of footemen Spaniſh, as he was buſie in ſacking the Citie, he receyued a blowe whereof he dyed within fewe dayes after.

In this eſtate of affayres, and the Senate of Venice making inſtance for the recouerie of Verona, Monſr Lavvtrech with his armie of ſixe thouſand Launceknightes whome the Venetians agreed to paye for that enterpriſe, came to the riuer of Adice, to thende to paſſe to Vſolinguo, and ſo to encampe affore Verona together with the Venetian armie: But what by the rumour of the comming of the Svvizzers nowe redoubled, and the ſuſpicion recontinued of the being of Proſpero Colonno at Modona, where alſo remayned the Cardinall of S. Maria in Portico, he retyred to Peſquiero, not without the complaintes of the Venetians, making diſtribution of his bandes both on this ſide & beyond the riuer of Mincia: And notwithſtanding the ſaid ſuſpicions were ceaſſed, and that from a regiment of two thouſand footmen both Spaniſh and Launceknightes were gone to the paye of the Venetians, and more did go dayly: yet he remayned in that place more then a moneth, exſpecting (as was ſayde) bothe a newe prouiſion of money out of Fraunce, and a greater proportion of artillerie, munitions and money from the Venetians: But the true cauſe of his temporiſing was, to obſerue what would be the iſſue of the treatie betwene his king and the king Catholike: for the Frenche king knowing howe muche and howe neceſſarily his amitie did import the king Catholike, both to remoue the difficulties of his paſſage into Spayne, and to aſſure him of thobedience and iuriſdiction of his kingdomes, he ſeemed not content with the matters that had bene agreed vpon affore at Paris, but deuiſed both to impoſe vpon him more harder conditions, and by his working to haue peace with Cæſar, which he could not bring to paſſe without rendring Verona to the Venetians. And touching the Spaniſhe king, whoſe minoritie hauing not aboue fyfteene yeares, was wholly gouerned by Monſr de Cheures, he refuſed not to applye his deliberations to the preſent time and neceſſitie of thinges: By reaſon whereof, on the parte of the Frenche king were ſent to Noyon the Biſhoppe of Paris, the greate maiſter of Fraunce, and the Preſident of the Parliament of Paris: And for the king Catholike were Monſr de Cheures, and the great Chauncellor of Cæſar: In whiche reſpite or intermiſſion, the rigour of armes and hoſtilitie (as is the cuſtome of warfaring of our tyme) was continually imployed agaynſt the poore paiſantes and countrey men, Monſr de Lavvtrech lying ſtill to ſee what woulde come of the negociation: for, by the benefite of a bridge which he had buylded at the village of Monzarban, he beganne to cutte downe the corne of the countrey of Verona, and gaue libertie to his light horſemen to make incurſions in all places: He ſent alſo one parte of his armie to incampe vppon the landes of the Mantuans, making hauocke of the commodities of that countrey with ſo vniuerſall and generall domage, that to redeeme their harmes together with the retyring of ſo daungerous an enemie, the Marquis of Mantua was contented to contribute to him twelue thouſande crownes: And the ſouldiors of Verona executing dayly hoſtilities vppon the territories of Vincenſa and Padoa, put to ſacke the wretched Citie of Vincenſa. Afterwardes Monſr de Lavvtrech bearing compaſſion to the great complayntes of the Venetians, paſſed the ryuer of Adice by a bridge whiche he cauſed to be ſette vp at Vſolingua: and afterwardes hauing made a greate praye of the countrey (for it was neuer thought that tharmie would paſſe on that ſide) he drewe neare to Verona to beſiege it, winning Chiuſa in the meane whyle by the ayde of the countrey men, to make more harde the paſſage of ſuccours that were to come out of Germanie: Neuertheleſſe the ſame daye that he approched to Verona, the regimentes of Launceknightes beeing nowe three monethes ſince they had bene enterteined with the money of the Venetians, eyther of their voluntarie will and motion, or by the ſecrete ſubornation of Cæſar, proteſted openly that they woulde not ſerue at the ſiege of a towne poſſeſſed by Cæſar, and wherein the Frenche kinge had no principall intereſt: By whiche mutinie drawing with it a ſuſpicion of greater conſpiracies, Monſr de Lavvtrech repaſſed Adice, and incamped a myle from the walles of Verona, to whome the Venetian armie wente to ioyne with him, not ſuppoſing it ſufficient for their ſuretie to remayne on the other ſide the ryuer, thoughe their armie conteyned a ſtrength of fiue hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and foure thouſande footemen.

About this tyme the deputies of thoſe two kinges paſſed capitulations in this

sorte in the towne of Noyon: That there shoulde be a perpetuall peace betweene the French king and the king of Spayne, with the like confederation for the defence of their estates agaynst all the worlde: That the French king should giue in mariage to the king Catholike, his daughter being then but one yeare of age, and he to indue her for dowry with the rightes whiche he pretended to apperteine to him in the kingdome of Naples according to the partition made afforetime betwene their predecessors: but vnder this couenaunt, that vntyll she bare an age hable to be maried, the king Catholike shoulde paye to the French king an hundred thousand crownes yerely to helpe to defray his exspences: That if she dyed before the mariage, and the king should haue an other daughter, then he to bestowe her likewise vpon the king Catholike with the same conditions: and in case he had no other daughter, then to giue him to wife Madame Renea, who had bene promised to him in the capitulation made at Paris: That in case any of those wiues died in mariage without children, then that part of the kingdome of Naples to reuert to the Crowne of Fraunce: That the king Catholike within a certaine time should restore the realme of Nauarre to his auncient king, and in not performing it, it should be lawfull to the french king to ayde him to recouer it: but vnder this charge (as the Spaniardes affirmed afterwards) that the king of that state should first cõmunicate with him his rightes: That Cæsar might enter into the peace within the tearme of two monethes, and if he dyd enter into it, it should be lawfull to the French king to ayde the Venetians to recouer Verona: which citie, if Cæsar deliuered vp into the hands of the king Catholike with power to giue it frankly and absolutely to the French king within six weekes, to dispose of it as he thought good: that he should pay him an hũdred thousand crownes, and the Venetians as much, wherof the one part to be payed vpon the consignation, and the other within six monethes, and also to remaine acquited of three hundred thousande crownes which he had receiued of the king Lovvis whyleste they were in confederation together: That in that case there should be truce for xviij. monethes betwene Cæsar and the Venetians: That to Cæsar should remayne Riua de Trenta and Rouera with all that he possessed then in the contrey of Friull: and that the Venetians should continue to holde the places whiche at that time they helde of Cæsar vntill the French and Spanish kings had determined the differences that had bene enterteined betwene them for their confines & limits: for resoluing wherof both the one and the other of the parties named the Pope. Notwithstanding thaccorde made at Noyon, the Venetians ceassed not to stirre vp Monsr de Lavvtrech to besiege Verona, desiring to recouer it by armes, both for that they were vncertayne whether Cæsar would accept the peace, and also to cut off the proporcion of money whiche they were to paye. But touching the French king, the waye of concorde and peace was more agreable to him then the meane of armes and force, his desire to haue vnitie with Cæsar drawing him aboue all other respectes: And yet Monsr de Lavvtrech refused not to consent to their will, hauing now no more reason of excuse, bothe for that the Venetians had made great leauyes of souldiors, and fulfilled all other prouisions demaunded by him, and also for that the Launceknightes refused no more to go thither together with the others: So that the armies passed seuerally ouer the riuer of Adice, the one by the bridge that was buylded aboue the Citie, the other by the benefite of an other bridge set vp for the time beneath the Citie: One parte of thartillerie of the Frenche armie that laye incamped at Tomba, was planted before the gate Santa Luce, and the other with the Launceknights was bestowed at the gate S. Maßina: They made choyse of those places for their artilleries, to thende

to do execution all together on that parte where the wall betwene the City & Citadell meeteth conioyned with the wall of the towne, by whiche deuise hauing meane at one tyme to make entrie into the Citie and the Citadell, the defendantes within should be constrayned to deuide them selues into two partes for the regarde of the wall in the middest. The Venetian armie passed beneath Verona in the fielde of Mars, and remayned incamped at S. Michaels betweene the ryuer and Cannell, bothe to leauie and remoue the defences of that place, and also to beate the gate called the Bishops gate, which was a place of most weaknes & least armed: The two first daies the defences which were of great strength and beat flanking, were beaten downe by thartilleries, but with greater difficulties on the quarter of the Venetians, to whom it was no small labor to batter the defences of the three bastillions: But assone as they were battred both parts began to execute the wall with xviij. peeces of great artilleries, and xv. smaller peces of battery, either army hauing throwen down by the third daye twenty fadomes of the wall, not forbearing to batter still to make the breache and entry the larger: And yet the Venetians on whose side the wall was most weake, notwithstanding they had almost reuersed all the bastillions & rampiers, had not yet wholly remoued all the defences within that played in flanke, because they laye so lowe and almoste within the ditche, that eyther the boollet went ouer them, or else was grazed in the earth affore it came there. Moreouer at the same time they vndermined the wall, which though they had vnderset & stayed with props, yet it beguyled the deuise of the doers, and fell downe before the time appoynted by the Capteines. There was within Verona a strength of eight hundred horsmen, fiue thousand launceknightes, and xv. hundred Spaniards vnder the gouernment of M. Antho. Colonno, who had now exchaunged the wages of the Pope for the paye of Cæsar: This garrison omitted nothing that might tende to the strengthning and repayring of the rampiers, and standing carefull to do all other thinges for the valiaunt defending of the place, they expressed vniuersally a wonderfull resolution and courage of minde, and particulerly was performed an honorable example and office of M. Antho. who receyuing a sleight hurte in his shoulder by a shotte, forbare not for all that to offer his body both day and night to all paynes and daungers. By this time thartilleries planted by the French men in foure places agaynst the towers betwene the gate of the Citadell and the gate of Santa Luce, had made so greate and many ruins, that euery breach was hable to receyue souldiours in order: The artilleries of the Venetians had aduaunced so muche, and almoste done no lesse execution, and yet Monsr de Lavvtrech demaunded newe artilleries to make the breache the greater, embrasing readily all occasions that offred to deferre the action contrarie to the wyll of the Venetians, who cryed to giue thassault: He made helping to his delayes this accident, there came to tharmie by the playnes of Verona, eyghte hundred barrels of powder together with many other natures of munitions drawne by Cartes, and what by the straiteneſſe and importunitie of the place, and emulation of the dryuers stryuing to enter one affore another, the chafing and violent mouing of the wheeles bredde to a fyre, whose heate embrased the powder and so consumed the Cartes with the cattell that drewe them: Moreouer there was this increase of difficultie to those that were besieged, that in the Citie so many monthes afflicted by thennemies that kepte it alwayes straytely enuironed, the stoare of vittells beganne to diminishe, and no hope to be resupplyed but in very small quantitie, and that by stealth, vsing the pathes of the mountaynes for the commoditie of that poore releefe.

But as the affaires of Verona ſtoode in theſe tearmes, there came to the reskew of that Citie a regiment of nine thowſand launceknightes ſent by Cæſar, who ariuing at Chiuſa tooke it by compoſition, and made them ſelues Lords of the caſtell of Coruaro, which is a peece ſtanding vpon the next hill to Adice drawing towards Trenta and cõmaunded many times by both the parties in the warre betwene Cæſar & the Venetians: Monſr Lavvtrech either fearing in deede, or diſſembling to be amazed at the new ſupply of launceknights, leauied his campe againſt the mindes of the Venetians, and retyred his armie to Villefranche carying with him one parte of the Venetian regiments, and the other parte vnder Iohn Pavvle Manfron withdrew to Boſeto beyond the riuer of Adice by a bridge prepared for their paſſage: Inſomuch as the Venetians hauing nowe no further confidence to carie Verona, ſent all their great artilleries to Breſſa: And the launceknights without any impediment incamped at Tomba, where the french army was lodged affore, one part of them entring into the City, & the other parte remeyning without, which returned after Verona was reuitteled: There remeyned for the gard of Verona a ſtrength of ſeuen or eight thowſand launceknights, for that the moſt parte of the ſpaniſhe bandes that could holde no agreement with them, were paſſed to the Venetian campe vnder Cronell Maldonato: And in common iudgement, that reskew or ſuccours was of ſmall momẽt for that they brought not with them other ſtoare of money then xx. thowſand Florins of the Rhein which the king of England had ſent, & during the time of their tarying there, they cõſumed ſo much vittells that it was almoſt equall to that quantitie which they had brought with them.

By reaſon of thoſe bands that were retired to Villefranche from whence they committed manifeſt hauoke and ſpoyle vpon the partes of Verona and Mantua, the Venetians were compelled leaſt the frenchemen, whome no commaundement that was made to them on the kings behalfe could make to ſtay, ſhould departe to their garriſons, to take order that the Citie of Breſſa ſhould wholly furniſh them of neceſſary vittells, an exſpence riſing to aboue a thowſand crownes a day.

At laſt things beganne to incline manifeſtly to peace, for that it was knowen that Cæſar (notwithſtanding his former ſolicitacion to his ſonne in law not to compound with the frenche king) preferring the couetouſnes of money affore the hate he bare naturally to the french, & alſo affore his auncient ambicion to make him ſelfe Lord of Italie, had not only accepted and ratified the peace, but alſo determined to render Verona according to the forme of thoſe conuencions: from this ſucceeded an other matter to the benefit of the frenche king, that all the Cantons of Svvizzers ſeeing armes & hoſtilitie depoſed betwene Cæſar & the king, were contented to compound with him as the Griſons had done before, in which action Galeas Viſconte did what he could, who being baniſhed and a rebell proteſted by the king, wonne of him by this meane, libertie to returne into his countrey, reſtitucion to all his goods, and recompenſe of many graces and honors: The compoſicion was, that the king ſhould pay to the Svvizzers within three monethes an hundred & fifty thowſand duckats, and from thence forwarde an indument of perpetuall yearely penſions: That the Svvizzers ſhould be bounde to deliuer to his pay by publike decree ſo often as he ſhould demaund, a certaine number of footemen, wherin notwithſtanding the proceeding was diuerſe, for that the eight Cantons were bounde to furniſhe that proporcion whenſoeuer he ſhould enter into any enterpriſe to offende the eſtates of an other, and to the fiue Cantons the couenant bare no other obligacion then for the defence of his proper eſtates: That it ſhoulde be in the power of the Svvizzers to render to the french king the castells of Lugan and Lugarno, which bee passages of great strength and of no lesse importance for the sewertie of the Duchie of Myllan: And in case they would make restitucion, the king to paye to them three hundred thowsand duckats: But they rased them to the ground immediatly vpon the making of the composicion: This was the discourse of thinges in Italy in the yeare a thowsand fiue hundred and sixteene: But in the beginning of the yeare following, the Bishop of Trente who was come to Verona, made offer to Monsr Lavvtrech to deliuer vp that citie to the french king within six moneths according to the contents of the capitulacion, seeing he held it in the name of the king of Spaine: But there remeyned this difficultie whether the tearme should begin from the day of the ratificacion of Cæsar, or from the time it was acknowledged that Verona was holden by the king catholike: And vpon this albeit there passed a disputacion for certeine dayes: yet for that the garrison of footemen that were within Verona drewe to mutinies vpon the demaund of money, the Bishop of Trente was constrained to followe those affayres with a greater haste: And therefore taking the beginning from the day that he had receiued commission from Cæsar, he agreed to deliuer vp Verona the fifteene daye of Ianuary: At which daye he passed the assignement to Monsr de Lavvtrech who receiued it in the name of the french king, the said Bishop receiuing of the Venetians the first fifty thowsand duckats, together with the fifteene thowsand which by the capitulacion they were bound to pay to the garrison in Verona, and also assured fidelitie and promisse of Monsr de Lavvtrech to see drawne to Trente the artilleries that were within Verona: Monsr Lavvtrech at the same instant redeliuered the citie ouer in his kinges name to the Senat of Venice, Andrevv Gritty standing then as Deputie and assigney to that state: great was the gladnes of the nobilitie and whole communaltie of Venice, for that after so long and daungerous a warre, drawing with it so many calamities and exspenses, they had reclaymed to the general body of their dominion, so principal a member, esteeming the reward of the warre farre aboue the burden and charges of the same, although by the reapport of such as haue written of their doinges, they consumed during all the warres they made since the league of Cambray, fiue myllions of duckats whereof they leauyed fiue hundred thowsand of the sale of offices: lastly the inhabitants of Verona reioysed no lesse then the residue together with all other cities and iurisdictions subiect to their common weale, hoping now to be deliuered and dispensed withall from so many afflictions, which so long a warre had throwen vpon them, sometymes by the one armie and sometymes by the other.

The Duke of Vrbin makes an enterprise to recouer his estate out of the hands of Pope Leo: the french king makes a league with the Pope: The conspiracie of Cardinall Petrucci against the Pope is discouered: Charles king of Spaine is chosen Emperour: Martine Luther wryteth against the Pope: The Pope puts Iohn Pawle Baillon to death.

THE THIRTEENTH BOOKE OF THE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

FOrasmuch as all armes and hostilities were now surceassed betwene Cæsar and the Venetians, and in the french king all occasiõs restrained to make warre against Cæsar or the king Catholike, it seemed that to the regions of Italie, afflicted with so many calamities and trauells of warre, was now appointed a time of rest and tranquillitie: wherein these were the reasons that the Svvizzers (a mighty instrument to any that sought to innouate and trouble things) seemed now reclaimed to their auncient amity with the french king, and yet bare no mindes estraunged from other Princes: that in thaccord made at Noyon, was declared such a hope, that, to establish a greater alliance betwene the two kings, there was working to draw them to an enteruiew at Cambray, whether were gone to that end, Monsr de Cheures, the great Maister of Fraunce, and Robertet: Lastly there was expressed no lesse readines on the parte of Cæsar, who, besides the rendring of Verona, sent two Embassadors to the frenche king, to solemnise and confirme the peace: so that it was a iudgement accompanied with his iust cause & reasons, that by the benefit of peace & concord betwene so mightie Princes, would be dissolued the seedes of all quarrels and disagreements in Italie: But as there is no certainty in the councells of mortall men, so is there lesse exspectacion of their worldly euentes: for, men and their doings standing subiect to the law of nature and destiny, haue no other libertie then to deeme and debate, and to God alone is referred all power of disposicion and execucion since he is able to gouerne and commaund all things by the same power wherewith he hath created them of nothing: Insomuch as in this action of Italie, either for thinfelicity or destinie of the countrey, or for that the vniuersall iurisdiction was deuided into so many seueral principalities and states, it was almost impossible that it should suffer any dispensacion of miseries, by reason of the diuersity of wills and interests of such as had it in hand: for, scarcely were layd aside armes and hostility betwene Cæsar and the Venetians, yea the Citie of Verona not yet resigned, when were disclosed tokens and beginnings of new tumults: And of these was the breeder and conspirator Franciscomaria, who had practised and drawne to his faction such bands of Spanishe footemen as had serued both within Verona and

affore Verona: he perſwaded them to follow him to the reconquering of his eſtates, out of the which the Pope had expulſed him the ſame ſommer: A matter wherein he found ſmall difficulties, for that to ſouldiours forreiners and marcenary accuſtomed in the time of warres, to ſacke townes and to make pray and ſpoyle of contreys, there was nothing more contrary then peace, whereunto they ſaw all the affayres & inclinacions of Italy diſpoſed at that inſtant.

There drew to him about fiue thowſand ſpaniſh footemen, whereof was chiefe, one Maldonato, A man of the ſame nation, and of long experience in many warres: And to this regiment was ioyned a ſtrength of eight hundred light horſemen, led by Federyk Boſſolo, Gaiozo a Spanyard, Succhar a Burgonion, Andrevv Bue, & Conſtantyn Boccalo Albanoeſies, al Capteines of name & marke, & eſpecially eſtemed for their knowledge in warres: Amongeſt them he that bare the greateſt reputacion, whether it were for the noblenes of his houſe, or for the honorable degrees in warre which he had borne from his youth, was Federyk Gonſagno Lord of Boſſolo, who happly was one of the greateſt parties to perſwade this enterpriſe, being no leſſe moued by an ambicion to make greater his merits & prayſes by newe warres, concurring alſo thamity which he had with Franciſco Maria, then through an auncient & ſetled hatred which he bare to Lavvrence de Medicis, chiefly for that at ſuch time as was transferred to Lavvrence, the charge of all the armies of the Church & the Florentyns, by reaſon of the ſicknes of Iulian his Vncle, he had denied to make him Capteine generall of the footemen, an eſtate which Iulian had aſſigned to him affore: This army ſtanding only vpon bodies & numbers, was lame in all other proporcions & prouiſions: for, they had neither reſort of money, aſſiſtance of artilleries, nor any ſtrengh of municions, & except their horſes and armor, they wanted all furnitures accuſtomed to followe armies. Onely they bare eſtimation more by their vertue then through any other abilitie or meanes to ſuſteine the warre: They departed to go to the ſtate of Vrbyn, the ſame day that the citie of Verona was giuen vppe to the Venetians: A matter which troubled not a litle the Pope after he had receiued aduertiſement: for, he conſidered the qualitie of tharmy, which was to be feared, both for the hatred of the Capteines, & vertue & reputacion of the ſpaniſh footemen: And he was not ignorant with what inclinacion the peoples of that Duchie fauored Franciſco Maria, hauing long liued vnder the eaſie gouernment of the houſe of Montfeltro, the affection whereof they had transferred to him as to one that had bene trained & nouriſhed in that Duchie, & bred of a ſiſter of the Duke Guido: Beſides it greeued him not a litle that he was to menteine warre againſt an armie, which hauing nothing to loſe, could leaue nō reward to his victory, And marching onely vpon deſire of pray and pillage, drew with them a miſerable exſpectacion of profit, bringing nothing to the warre, but what they hoped to get by the chaunce and fortune of the warre: he doubted alſo leaſt the ſweete deſire of gayne (which for the moſt parte carieth marcenory ſouldiours to the fight) would draw ſuch others to ioyne to their faction, as by the meane of the peace, were vtterly excluded from action: But the matter that moſte troubled his minde, was a fearefull ſuſpicion that the French king did communicat in this conſpiracie: for, bothe he knewe that the king was diſpleaſed with the warre made againſt Franciſco Maria, and was no leſſe touched in his conſcience with the conſideracion of cauſes that he had giuen him to be ill contented of him: he knewe alſo he had not obſerued the confederacion made after the conqueſt of Myllan, at the tyme when Cæſar diſcended into Lombardye: he conſidered that after he was returned to Rome, he ſent him a bul touching the collacion of benefices in the Realme of Fraunce,

and Myllan, muche different from the conuencion made at Bolognia, which for the ſhortneſſe of the time was not then ſubſigned: This Bull the king would not accept, both for that it bare contradiction agaynſt the agreement, and alſo for the intereſt of his proper dignitie: he remembred the ſecrete negociations interteyned agaynſt him with other Princes, and with the Svvizzers: he was not ignoraunt that a litle before, puſhed on by a deſire directly to hinder the recouery of Verona, he had ſuffred the regimentes of Spaniſhe footemen comming from Naples to the reskew of it, to paſſe in ſeuerall trowpes through the dominions of the Churche, excuſing himſelfe that he would not giue them occaſion to paſſe in one ioynt ſtrength, beeing in that caſe not hable to ſtoppe them: Laſtely he founde in his conſcience that he had not performed his promiſes touching the donation of the tenthes but vnder conditions ſuttle and intangled, nor had obſerued the rendring of the townes to the Duke of Ferrara, abuſing the kings exſpectation, and his owne fidelitie. Theſe were right iuſt cauſes to make him doubt of the kings will, whereof alſo his ſuſpicions made him ſeeme to ſee certayne tokens, for that this conſpiracie and leauie of men being bred in the partes of Verona, it could not be that Monſr de Lavvtrech coulde be without knowledge of it many dayes before, and ſeeing he was ſecret and ſilent in it, it was a manyfeſt preſumption of his priuitie and conſent. To this alſo was added a ielouſie of Federike Boſſolo, hauing till then followed the paye of the king, and it was doubtful whether that was true that Monſr de Lavvtrech alleaged for his excuſe, that the time of his enterteinment was finiſhed. Moreouer the Pope ſtoode doubtfull of thinclination of the Venetians, hauing an opinion that their Cõmiſſioners had made them ſelues parties to this vnion, for that the Senate ſtoode verye muche diſcontented with him aſwell in regarde of things paſte, as for ielouſie of his preſent greatnes, which was ſuche that being ſucceſſor of ſo great a power and reputation of a Popedome, he diſpoſed abſolutely at his deuotion the whole eſtate of the Florentins. Theſe conſiderations brought no ſmall amaze to the Pope, to whom alſo was no leſſe reaſon of exſpectation or hope in the confidence or alliance with other Princes, for that, beſides that they were of newe reconciled and confedered with the French king, not one of them helde for acceptable his maner of proceeding with ſecrete councells and ſuttleties, wherein albeit he diſſembled ſometimes to incline on their ſide, yet what betweene the detections that burſt out agaynſt him, & the ſlow execution of his intentions and promiſes, he gaue little or none ſatisfaction to any of them: yea diſcloſing oftentimes a manyfeſt doubt agaynſt them all, he had diſpatched a little before to the king Catholike Freare Nicholao an Almain, and ſecretorie to the Cardinall Medicis to drawe him from thenteruiew and parley whiche was ſolicited with the French king, fearing a contract of greater alliance betweene them, to his preiudice. Thus the Pope waued indifferently betwene doubt & dread betwene feare and ſuſpicion, exſpecting all things to happen to him which his tymerous conſcience did ſuggeſt or faſhion, the ſame being a paſſion that oftentymes tormentes the myndes of yll men, agaynſt whom Salomon pronounceth this vexation: that what ſo euer their guyltie mindes do feare in yll, the ſame ſhall aſſuredly happen vnto them: Neuertheleſſe amidde theſe confuſions and ſuſpenſions of minde, he and his nephew Lavvrence ceaſſed not to ſende bandes of ſouldiors into Romagnia, ſuche as for the moſt parte were leauyed of newe, and the reſidue drawne out of the ſquadrons of the Florentins penſioners: his reaſon was in ſending out of this force, that ioyning with Ranſo de Cero and Vitelli, who laye at Rauenna with the regimentes of men at armes, they might giue impediment to the paſſage of thene-mies: But this expedition was in vayne and theffect thereof, for that tharmie of thenemie, hauing already paſſed the ryuer of Pavv at Oſtia, and preuenting with their celeritie the preparations of their aduerſaries, were by that time entred vpon the landes of the duke of Ferrara, taking the waye to Cento and Burio, and marching thorowe the countrey of Bolognia: In this iourney they ſacked Granarola, which is a borowe vpon the territories of Fauentia, and from thence they drewe neare to Faenza, to proue if they could conſpire any mutation there by the helpe of a young gentleman of the familie of Manfroy, who was in that armie: But the inhabitauntes of Faenza diſauowing al mutinies, the armie paſſed further, not trying to get any other of the townes of Romagnia, for that they were all ſtrong in garriſon eyther of men at armes or of footemen, and for the better ſuretie of Rimini, Ranſo & Vitelli were gone thither by ſea. Lavvrence came to Ceſena to aſſemble his companies there, and at Rimini: but for that thenemies were already paſſed, he ceaſſed not in the meane while to leauie ſouldiors in many places, whereof there flocked to him both more then he needed, and more then he required: for a regiment of two thouſande fiue hundred launceknights that were diſmiſſed by Monſr de Lavvtrech to returne into their houſes, and likewiſe certaine colonels of iij. thouſand Gaſcons, were reteyned by Iohn Poppy ſecretory to Lavvrence: wherin he vſed his owne authoritie, being perſwaded that that army of footemen would folowe Franciſco Maria if they were not waged by others, or happly he beleeued lightly that with theſe forces there might be opened an eaſie waye to the victorie: In this action he imployed alſo thauthoritie of Monſr Lavvtrech (with whom he had remayned many monethes) to perſwade the Capteines, whom with their ſeuerall bandes and regimentes he conuerted immediatly towardes Bolognia: But his diligence brought foorth an effect contrarie to his exſpectation and the merite of his trauell, ſince the Pope and Lavvrence were diſcontented with that maner of doing, ſuſpecting the kings indignation, and yet they could not refuſe them, for feare leaſt they would ioyne to thenemie being marched ſo farre with mindes and promiſes to be imployed: In the meane while Franciſco Maria aduaunced more and more, accompanying his fortune with that diligence and celeritie which leades men of action to the ſucceſſe and felicitie of thenterpriſes they followe: he was no ſooner entred into the Duchie of Vrbin, then he was receyued in euery place with great ioye and gladneſſe, he founde no ſouldiors in the townes, for that Lavvrence hauing no leyſure to refurniſhe ſo many places, had onely care to defende the Citie of Vrbin, the ſanctuarie and capitall place of that Duchie: And for that cauſe was ſent thither by the counſell of Vitelly, a ſtrength of two thouſande footemen from Citta di Caſtello, and in place of Vitelly that refuſed to go to that ſeruice, that charge was committed to Iacques Roſſetto of Citta di Caſtello, who notwithſtanding he was aduiſed, by reaſon the people of Vrbin were holden ſuſpected, to chaſe out of the towne all ſuche bodies as were vnhable to beare armes, yet he forbare to execute any ſuche violence, thinking he ſhould better aſſure himſelfe by clemencie then by crueltie. But Franciſco Maria not conuerting his time to the ſeruice of any other place, drew directly to Vrbin, where albeit he could do litle at the firſt approche, yet at the ſeconde, Iacques Roffetto agreed to deliuer the towne into his handes, his infidelitie being greater then his feare, both for that there were no mutinies nor vproares amongſt the people, and alſo he had no reaſon to be tymerous of the forces of thenemies, hauing neyther artilleries nor other prouiſions ſeruing to the taking of townes: The ſouldiors according to the compoſition went out of the towne, their goods and lyues ſaued, but the Biſhoppe of Vitelly remayned

ned prisoner, who had bene regent of that estate for the new Duke, and vnder whose gouernment it seemed that nothing had happly succeeded: All the other townes and places of the duchie folowed the example of Vrbin, except S. Leon, which for the qualitie of his situation, and propertie of the munitions that were there, was easie to be defended, yea with a very small garrison: The citie of Agobbio that in the beginning was declared for Franciscomaria, and eftsoones returned to the obedience of Lavvrence, did nowe as the rest did, beeing caryed not by respect to fayth and alleageance, but by the euent and obseruation of thinges: onely Pesero, Sinigalo, Gradaro and Mondano, townes seperate from the Duchie, remayned in the iurisdiction and deuotion of Lavvrence. Franciscomaria hauing thus recouered Vrbin, entred into deuise to make him selfe lorde of some place vpon the sea shoare: And making shewes as though he woulde go to Pesero, whither were gone already many bands of souldiors, and to Sinigalo, he dissembled his intention & drewe towards Fano, a Citie which in all times had caryed more facilitie to be taken, and wherof the aduersary douted least, for that it had bene neuer as yet subiected to his iurisdiction, Ranso de Cere that lay at Pesero, either douting of the danger which in reason of warre he foresaw, or seeing into his intention, which he could not hide, dispatched thither Troylo Sauello, with an hundred men at armes, & six hundred footemen: Neuertheless thenemie made his approches with fiue peces of artillery not great, which they had founde in Vrbin, and hauing also wante of powder, they coulde not make so great execution as they would, only they brought downe to the earth xx. fadoms of wall, which notwithstanding was not done without great difficulty, yet they folowed it with an assalt, at which they lost more then an hundred & fifty men: But neyther being amased with that slaughter (for their minds were resolute) nor stāding to exspect and temporise (though they were weake in munitions) they recontinued the charge the day folowing, whē with their vallor they so far vanquished the peril, that they made the breach almost abādoned, yea they had no dout entred the wall, had it not ben for Fabian de Galleso liestenant to Troylo, who being left vpon the wall with a very smal company of men of warre, made a wonderfull defence, and susteined the charge: The day after they were prepared to giue the third assalt, but vnderstanding by espiall that a strength of fiue hundred men sent from Pesero, were entred by night by sea, they leauyed the siege, & retyred to the borow & castell of the mount Baroco, which standing vpon a high hill, beareth a very strong situation, his discending being easie towardes Fossambrun, and most harde and sharpe towards Pesero: They remained in that place, where hauing no further conuenient occasion, they garded the duchie of Vrbin which lay vpon their backes. On the other side, those regiments of Launceknightes and Gascons that were come to Rimini to Lavvrence de Medicis, prepared them to march, together with many bands of Italian footmen, & an other regiment of xv. hundred Launceknightes, of those that had bene at the seruice of Verona: with which strength ioyned to the horsmen of the Popedome and Florence, Lavvrence marched with his men at armes to Pesera: And being wholly gouerned by the counsell of his capteins for the small experience he had to manage an enterprise, he sent his footemen to incampe vppon the mountaynes opposite to thennemies. The Citie of Pesera standeth at the entrie of a little valley which comes from Vrbin, out of which issueth a ryuer whiche thinhabitantes call Porto, for that by thoportunitie of his deepenes the vesselles are broughte vp euen to that place: this ryuer ronnes neare to the Citie on that syde whiche is towardes Rimini: The Castell hath his standing towardes the sea, and betwene the riuer and the Citie

be many ſtore houſes which Ranſo cauſed to be reuerſed for the ſurety of the towne: A great part of the citie is enuironed with mountaynes on all partes, which ſtretche not out ſo farre as the ſea, but betwene them and the ſea remayneth a certayne pece of the playne conteyning two myles in largenes on that ſide towardes Fano, and vpon the banke riſe two hilles the one right ouer agaynſt the other: that towards the ſea is called Candelaro, and Nugalaro that which hath his proſpect towardes Vrbin: and in the toppe of euery of them is a borowe and a caſtell bearing the ſame name. The Italian footemen were lodged at the caſtell of Candelaro, and to the Launce-knights and Gaſcons was appoynted Nugalaro which lay neareſt to thenemie: which diſpoſing of tharmy in this ſort, was not of intẽtion to fight with thẽ otherwiſe, then by light skirmiſhes to cut them off from ouerrunning the contrey, or to amuſe them for reſoluing to any enterpriſe: for the Popes counſell was not to hazard the battell with thenemies, vnleſſe there were almoſt an aſſured hope of the victory, for that he ſawe what perill it was to fight againſt reſolute men, who by how much greater was thinequalitie of the reward of the victory, by ſo much leſſe would they feare the hazard of their liues: & the battel ſwaying on their ſide, he ſaw the eſtate of the church and the Florentins would be abandoned into manifeſt danger: That it were far more aſſured to temporiſe, ſpecially the apparance being great, that for want of mony and vittels, thenemy would draw to ſome diſorder, the pouerty & ſterility of the contrey compelling them thervnto: That his army with reſpite would become better & better, aſwel through experience which much helpeth to the perfection of ſouldiors, as alſo that from moneth to moneth it was refurniſhed with braue & reſolute bodies: Laſtly he had exſpectation that his affaires would dayly take better courſe, ſince that frõ the beginning of this ſtir & action, he had vehemently ſolicited the ſuccors of all Princes, both complayning to their Embaſſadors that laye at Rome, and by ſpeciall meſſengers and letters imploring the Princes them ſelues: wherin he wrought not with all in one maner, for, ſignifying to Cæſar and the king of Spayne that the conſpiracie of Franciſcomaria and the Spaniſh footemen, was contriued in the camp of the French king, and with the priuity of his lieftenant: he obiected ſo farre in thoſe particular clauſes of his letters, that it might be eaſily comprehended how farre he ſuſpected the king in the action: And to the french king him himſelfe he alleaged only a ielouſie of Monſr de Lavvtrech, and forbare to execute his complaints any further. The matter was diuerſly taken by thoſe Princes, for to Cæſar and his nephew it was no ſmall gladnes to heare that the Pope interpreted that iniurie to the French king: Beſides, the auncient hatred of Cæſar ioyned to his naturall inconſtancie, had made him already eſtraunged from the French king, and newly become confederate with the king of England: He alſo had communed with his nephew neare Antvvarpe, and diſſwaded him from hauing conference with the Frenche king, whiche accordingly was at laſt accompliſhed by the conſent of both the one and the other king: And in the king Catholike the confederation that he had with him, did not ſuffice to deface his emulation, ielouſie, and ſuſpicion: So that they made a readie offer to the Pope to ayde him, giuing preſent commaundement to all their ſubiectes to departe from the warre that was made agaynſt the Pope: The kinge Catholike ſente the Count Potenſo to the Realme of Naples, to thende that vpon the view and mooſter of his men at armes, he ſhoulde leade to his ſuccours foure hundred launces: and for a more full teſtomonie of his will, he depoſed Franciſcomaria as diſobedient, from the Duchie of Sora, an eſtate lying vppon the confines of Terra Lauoro and had bene purchaſed by hys father: but for other reſpectes, were

agreable the perplexities of the Pope to the Frenche king, as a Prince that had a mind eſtraunged from him:& therefore following his example from the beginning, he determined to enterteine him with vaine hopes, & anſwering that his diſcõtentments brought no litle griefe to him,he promiſed ſo to worke that Monſr Lavvtrech ſhould miniſter to his affaires: And yet he forbare not to ſay that the Pope him ſelfe had bene the cauſer of his proper afflictions,for that the Spaniards would neuer haue taken that boldneſſe, if their numbers had not bene increaſed by ſuch as vnder his licence,were paſſed from Naples to Verona: This was the kings intencion at the beginning: But conſidering afterwards that the Pope being left abandoned of him and of his ſuccours,would run with a ready will into the amities of the king Catholike,he determined to aide & fauor him,& according to the eſtate of the time,to draw ſome frute of his neceſſity:Inſomuch as the Pope ſending eſtſoones to demaund ſuccours of him,he tooke order to refurniſh him from Millan with three hundred launces,requiring withall to haue a newe league to paſſe betwene thẽ,ſince that that was contracted affore at Bolognia, was of no more conſideracion, hauing ſuffred many violacions by the Pope in ſundrie maners:he added many complaints to the offers which he made him:ſomtimes he ſayd he ſuffred wrong in matters wherein the Pope charged him to other Princes: & ſomtimes he held himſelfe iniuried,for that he had excõmunicated George Sopreſſan ſoliciting for him with the Svvizzers,an actiõ wherin the deſpite of his iniury was ſo much the greater,by how much in the doing of it he expreſſed a deſire to gratifie the Cardinall of Syon: Moreouer the Lady Regent mother to the king & of no ſmall authority with him,reprehended without reſpect,the impiety of the Pope, for that not ſatisfied to haue chaſed a Prince out of his proper eſtates and dominions,he had alſo ſubiected him to the cenſures of the Church,and with a mind full of inhumanity, had denied to the old Ducheſſe,the property of her dowrie due vpon thoſe Patrimonies, and alſo had withdrawne from the young Ducheſſe his wife,all ſortes of reliefe & meanes to preſerue & nouriſh her: theſe words finding paſſage euen to the eares and hearing of the Pope, brought matter to redouble the ſuſpicion: Neuertheleſſe the Pope, who in thoſe difficulties deſired the kinges ſuccours not ſo much for theffect and meaning, as for the name and reputacion of them, being not able to diſſemble his ſuſpicion,made ſtay for many dayes of the iij.hundred launces that went from Millan,vpon the territories of Modona & Bolognia:& afterwards Lavvrence beſtowed them within Rimini,as hauing leſſe meane to annoy him by lying there, for that that city bare a farre diſtance from thenemies. The Pope could not be drawne from his ieloſies and ſuſpicions, notwithſtanding at the ſame time was ſet downe in Rome, a concluſion of cõfederacion betwene him & the french king: & albeit before it was ratified,the king obiected many new difficulties for the which the matter remeined many dayes in ſuſpence, yet at laſt the Pope yeelding to many thinges, the king paſt the ratificacion: By the articles of ratificacion the Pope and the king were reciprocally bounde to the defenſe of their eſtates with an equall proporcion of men and ſouldiours, and a charge of twelue thowſand duckats for euery moneth: The ſame bonde was betwene the Frenche king and the Florentins, with whome was conioyned the authority of Lavvrence de Medicis, and in that article was comprehended the Duchie of Vrbin, but with a leſſer number of men, and pay of ſix thowſande duckats monthly: The king was bounde to ayde the Pope whenſoeuer he had any action vpon the ſubiectes and vaſſalls of the Church: The Pope confirmed to the king the nominacion of the benefices, and the tenth, according to his promiſes made at Bolognia, vnder this condicion that the moneys

ſhoulde bee put into the handes of a third man to be employed agaynſt the Turkes: This was the cooller of graũting the tenth, but there was ſecretly hope giuen to the king, that after the collection of the whole quantitie, the condicion ſhoulde bee chaunged by an other writ, & his maieſtie to haue libertie to conuert them to what vſe he would: The Pope paſſed a ſeuerall promiſſe to the king vnder his ſignature, neuer to demaunde of him any ayde or ſuccours againſt the Duke of Ferrara, and conſented withall, that the kinge might take him into his protection: There was long diſpute vppon the rendring of Reggia, Modona, and Rubiero, which albeit the king demaunded with no ſmall inſtance according to the Popes promiſſes at Bologna, and the Pope altogether not refuſed it, yet he reſerued the reſtitucion till an other tyme, alleaging that it would bee an action farre vnworthy of him and almoſt a confeſſion of his extreme neceſſitie and compulſion, to redeliuer them at a tyme when he ſtoode oppreſſed with the warre: The king ſtoode ſtill vppon it to haue them rendred preſently, Inſomuch that the Pope making manifeſt ſhowes that he would vtterly eſtraunge him ſelfe from the king if he ſought to conſtrayne him any further, the kinge hauing for declared ennemies thengliſh, and no leſſe ſuſpicion of Cæſar, the Spanyards and the Svvyzzers, accepted the Popes promiſſe vnder his hande, that within ſeuen monethes next following, he woulde put into the handes of the Duke of Ferrara, Modona, Reggia, and Rubiero: The Pope had this intencion that if the daungers wherein he was, ceaſſed affore, he woulde make no more accompt of his acte vnder his ſignature then of his promiſſe ſimply made at Bolognia: And touching the king, ſince he coulde wynne no further of him without the hazarde of his extreame indignation, helde him ſelfe contented, eſteeming it ſomewhat ſufficient, that he had appearing in writing thaſſurance and teſtimony of his word and faith.

During the diſcourſe and action of theſe matters, Lavvrence had much increaſed his armie both by many regiments of Italians leauyed of newe, and alſo by a thowſand footemen ſpaniſh and a thowſand launceknightes waged by the Pope at Rome: with which ſtrength ioyned to thopportunitie and rypenes of the time, he ſawe he ſtood in good eſtate to aſſay to deliuer him ſelfe of ſuch a warre, wherein his onely hope was by the ſtrength & ſituacion of the place where thennemies lay, to compell them to diſcampe for want of vittells: for which cauſe was diſpatched Camylla Vrſin with ſeuen hũdred light horſemen, to ouerronne all that contrey which is called the vicariage from whence came the greateſt traffike of their vittells: At this tyme was ſent to Peſera from the campe of thennemie, A trompet who required of Lavvrence ſaffeconduit for Capteine Svvaro a Spanyard appoynted by Franciſcomaria to come to him: his demaunde was eaſily accepted by Lavvrence for that he thought it had bene a Capteine with whome he had interteyned very ſecret intelligence: But there came to him an other Capteine of the ſame name, and with him one Oracio de Ferma Secretorie to Franciſcomaria, who after they were brought into publike audience, declared, (according to thinſtructions of Franciſcomaria) that ſince the quarrells that were betwene them might be decided by ſingular combate of their owne perſons, or with a determinate number of men indifferently agreed vpon by them both, it were better to chuſe the one of thoſe two meanes, then to perſeuere in that courſſe whereby might bee brought to deſtruction ſo many numbers of people on both ſides, no leſſe contrary to all pietie, then euen to the preiudice of whoſoeuer ſhould cary the victory: In which good reſpects, Franciſcomaria offred him to make election of whether of theſe ij waies he would: & after he had deliuered this meſſage by mouth, he would haue red a wryting that he had in his hand, ſauing that he was forbidden: Lavvrence aunſwered by the councell of his Capteines, that he willingly accepted this offer, ſo farre forth as Franciſcomaria would firſt leaue thoſe peeces which he occupied by force: After which aunſwere (by thincenſing of Ranſo de Cero) he cauſed them both to be apprehended priſoners, Ranſo mainteyning that they had deſerued puniſhement for performing an action too inſolent: But the other Capteines ſhewing him howe farre he tranſgreſſed the law of armes and the reputacion of his faith and word, he let goe Svvaro, & reteined only Oratio, excuſing, with falſe colours, thinfamy of his faith breaking, as though it had bene neceſſary in the ſafe-conduit to haue expreſſed ſpecially Oratio, who, for his birth & countrey, was a ſubiect of the Church, and for his place, a ſecretary to the enemy: But his reſtraint was chiefly to draw from him the ſecrets of Franciſcomaria, but ſpecially by whoſe councell and authoritie he had begonne the warre: Whereuppon being examined with torments, it was publiſhed that in his confeſſion was matter to augment the ſuſpicion conceiued againſt the french king: To the deſire of Lavvrence, to cut of from the Spanyards the traffike of vittels out of the countrey of the vicariage, was neede to be applied greater forces, both for that by the incurſions of his light horſemen, was done no matter of importance, and withall, his armie was in that eſtate of ſtrength & furniture, that he might boldly make head againſt thenemies: for, beſide a thowſand men at armes and a thowſand light horſemen, he had leauied fiftene thowſand footemen of diuers nations, amongeſt whom was a regiment of two thowſand Spanyards muſtered at Rome: An armie of footemen of ſpeciall choiſe and ſorte, and of great exerciſe and training in armes for that the warre being in no other place in Italie, the Capteines had good meane to exchaunge for better, all ſuch bands of Italian footemen as were leauied in haſt: And ſo compounded their whole army vpon the glory and flower of the ſouldiours of all Italie: He determined at laſt to goe incampe at Sorbolonguo, a borow in the countrey of Fano fiue miles from Foſſambrono, from whence it was eaſie to him to reſtraine from thenemy all releefe comming out of the Vicariage: The city of Foſſambrono ſtands vpon the riuer of Mettro, which is a riuer of name, by reaſon of a victory which the Romaines had againſt Aſdruball of Carthage, and running thither by a channell reſtrained betwene the mounteynes, it paſſeth Foſſambrono, and beginnes to runne thorowe a litle vallie more large, which makes it ſelfe ſo much the larger by how much it approacheth the ſea that is fiftene miles beyond Foſſambrono, and there it falleth into Mettro neare to Fano, but on that ſide towardes Sinigalo: On the right hand following the courſe of the riuer, is the countrey which they call the Vicariage full of fertill hills, and borowes, and lyeth ſtretched out in great length towardes the ſea: and on the left hand of the riuer are alſo hills, but paſſing further, there are found mounteynes very high and ſharpe, the plaine or vallie whereof extending towards Fano, conteyneth more then three miles in largenes: At ſuch time as Lavvrence determined to incampe at Sorbolonguo, fearing leaſt his enemies, knowing of his remouing would preuent him: he ſent on the morow, affore day Iohn de Medicis, Ioh. Baptiſta Stabbio, & Brumalt de Furly with foure hundred horſemen, to ſurpriſe Sorbolongo, and gaue order to the footemen that were at Candelaro and Nugularo, to croſſe the mounteynes and draw towardes Mettro, to ioyne with the others: him ſelfe with the reſidue of tharmie, leauing for the gard of Peſero, Guido Rangon with an hundred and fifty men at armes, tooke his way at ſunne riſing, from Peſero towards Fano along the ſea ſhoare, & afterwards turning towards Foſſambrono where the vally beginneth, he arriued about noone at a place called our Scituacion of Foſſambrono.

Ladies myll buylt vppon the ryuer: All the horſemen and the regiments of Italian footemen, paſſed the riuer by ford, but the bands of Gaſcons and launceknights, were ſo long in paſſing the bridge prepared to that ende, that the armie was not able that day to fetche Sorbolongo according to the direction: and therefore they thought it conuenient to incampe at S. Georges, Orciano, & Mondano, borowes bearing diſtance one from an other halfe a myle: The direction that was layd out for the light horſemen, ſucceeded not with much better fortune: for, as they marched, Ioh. de Medicis, (in whom in this firſt tryall of ſeruice, appeared thoſe ſignes of vallour that appertained to one of his diſcending) ſeeming by errour to take the longer way, left the reſidue that contemned his councel & entred within Sorbolongo long time before night: & the other two Capteines, after they had fetched a long compaſſe, returned at laſt to tharmie, being abuſed (as they ſayd) by their guide: Neither could Iohn de Medicis (who had with him onely his regiment) abyde that night within Sorbolongo, for that the ſame morning Franciſcomaria, had with great celeritie taken the fielde with all his armie, doubting belike of the diſcamping of his enemies, and no leſſe imagining which way they would draw: he found no impediment to paſſe the riuer, but vſing the fauor of a ſtone bridge at Foſſombrono, he wonne Sorbolongo affore night, & bringing with him matter of feare and aſtoniſhment to Iohn, being then of ſufficient abilitie to reſiſt him, he compelled Iohn to retyre towardes Orciano, whether he was followed in chaſſe by the horſemen of thennemie, who made pray of many of his people and caried them backe in the ſtate and fortune of priſoners: At Orciano he went to find Lavvrence in his lodging, to whom he complayned with a minde much diſcontented, that either the negligence, or the cowardiſe of Brunault & Iohn Baptiſta Stabbia, ſtanding then in his preſence, had that day taken out of his hand, the victorie of the warre: he eſteemed the iniury ſo much the greater, by how much the vertue & celeritie of his owne people were leſſe forward to aduaunce his glory, then fortune her ſelfe, who for the moſt part vſeth to hold backe the merit of mens vallour in ſuch actions: But albeit this was the firſt, yet it was not the onely occaſion of good lucke, that the armie of Lavvrence did loſe, ſeing afterwards he did not onely omit the honor of enterpriſes of great importāce, but alſo he was followed cōtinually with farre more daungerous diſorders, his ill fortune being alwaies accompanied with ill councels: The borowes of Orciano & Sorbolongo haue their ſituacion in a place eminent & high, & are diſtant one from the other, ſomwhat more then two miles: the myd way betwene them is ful of litle mounteines and hils, and hath a borow in it called Barty, wherein were incamped part of the bands of Franciſcomaria; & for that neighbourhood and nearenes of tharmies, all the day following was ſpent in skirmiſhing: Amongeſt the Capteines of Lavvrence armie, the councells and opinions were diuers: for, ſome and chiefly they who bare leaſt ſwaigh in the reſolucion of thinges, perſwaded to giue a charge of thennemies, thinking perhaps, by aduauncing vainely valiant councells, they ſhould get the name of valiant men, not waighing in their glorious moodes, how farre the daunger exceeded the attempt: But this councell was impugned by Ranſo and Vitelli, vpon whoſe aduiſes Lavvrence with great confidence, founded all his directions, for, ſayd they, thennemies being lodged in a place of ſtrength and aduauntage, and hauing on their backe the fauour of the borowe, there was no poſſibilitie to execute that enterpriſe, but by a waye troubleſome and too full of annoyance: yea they thought it not good that tharmie ſhoulde continue in thoſe places, beeing a matter no leſſe vnprofitable, then hindering the purpoſſe for the which they were remoued from Peſero, for that Sorbolongo beeing

at the deuotion of Franciscomaria, it woulde bee harde to restraine the resorte of vittells from the countrey of the Vicareage. These reasons made reiected all other counsels, obteyning what by the authoritie of the same, and by the necessitie of things, that the army should returne: And to thende their retyring should not seeme a manifest flying, their direction was that tharmie should not onely returne to their first lodging place, but also to go sease vpon Monte Baroccio and other places left abandoned by thenemies, from whence they might drawe towards Vrbin: With this resolution the armie departed the moarning folowing at the appearing of the day: But the maner of their going away helde more of a fleing then of a retraite, whiche growing to an opinion thorow out the campe, it happned that Franciscomaria was aduertised by two men at armes, that thenemies were filled full of feare, and were broken vp almoste in disorder and fleing: In so muche as seeming to be almost possessed of the certayne victorie, he aduaunced his armie and marched with great speede, by the waye that leades athwart the mountaynes: he hoped to encounter them at their discending into the playne, beleeuing that they would take the waye that was moste shorte and passible, which if they had taken, neyther the one nor the other armie could haue auoyded the battell: But as oftentimes in warres, effectes and euentes of greatest consequence are both hindred and chaunged by light causes and accidentes: so fortune would, that by the occasion of a Canon left behinde the daye before, for that one of his mounting wheeles was broken, the army of Lavvrence went to repasse the ryuer of Metro at our Ladyes myll, whiche is foure myles lower then the place wherevnto his short and easie way would haue brought him: All the horsemen and footemen of Lavvrence armie passed ouer at the foarde, and as both for their numbers and other impedimentes they made a long passage, so assone as they were ouer, they caste them selues with great celeritie into order, keeping along the playne that draweth towards Fossambrono: The army of footmen being passed, and the men at armes and light horsmen marching in the later warde of the campe being vpon their passing, the light horsemen of thenemies, both many in number, & of the most resolute, began to skirmish with them: In which encounter was taken prisoner Constantin the sonne of Iohn Paule Baillon, whom we might aswell call his nephew as his sonne, since he begat him of one of his owne sisters: not many dayes before the same Iohn Paule was come to the armie, and led the vantgarde, but by the yll chaunce of his sonne, striuing to do his best to recouer him, he stayde so long deuising, that from thauauntgarde he became in the areareward, and Lavvrence that ledde the battell stepped into the forewarde, as also Troylus Sauelo that gouerned the arearegard was set to guyde the battell, for that Ranso and Vitelli marched before with the footemen: But Franciscomaria and his capteines, discerning well that thenemies, by the same measure and numbers wherewith they passed the riuer, turned towards Fossambrono, sawe that they remoued not like men that fledde, but with intention to surprise Montebaroccio: for which consideration, they forgate their former furie and dispositon to feight, which happly was grounded vpon an imagined feare of thenemies, and leauing abandoned their baggage, they ranne in great haste, and with no lesse disorder, yea casting their ensignes wrapped vpon their shoulders, to get a very strong passage of the ryuer called the passage of Tauernelle: At this passage it seemed that nature had made a confused trenche full of cliffes which runneth all along through a plaine place euen vntill the mountaine, which gaue no libertie of passage but by one way which was made for ease and sufferance: To this passage if their bandes had come, who turned from that side alwayes as they passed ouer, the Spaniards had bene reduced into manifest daunger: And albeit Lavvrence and his capteines were aduertised of this by Lodovvike the sonne of Oliuer de Fermo, who the same day was come to the army with a thousand footmen together with a Spanish sergeant that could well discouer the countrey, yet their espiall was of litle profite, fortune and destinie being stronger then counsell: for notwithstanding in the regimentes of Launceknights and Gascons was expressed a wonderfull readinesse and disposition to feight, and the same desired with an vniuersall crye throughout the whole campe, and withall, the will of Lavvrence beeing fully concurrant: yet that resolute deuotion of the campe was not executed by the aduise of Ranso de Cere and Vitelly, who counselled him not to go meete his enemies, but to drawe hit armie to a little hill faste by, from whence in great safetie he might do many greeuances to his enemies with his light horsemen if they attempted to passe the ryuer: And so leauing that place of strength, Ranso turned towardes the mountayne, which assone as the Spaniards had brought to their deuotion, they began to salute with the bollet those bandes of launceknightes that laye neareste them, and signified with cryings & other tokens full of reioysing, how out of a danger manifest and desperate, their vallour had made them a way into absolute safety: Thus eyther by indiscression or by cowardise (if we may not allowe destinie to partake in it) did Lavvrence loase that day in the iudgement of all men thoccasion of the victorie: The difference of counsells amongst his capteines were very preiudiciall to the glory and successe of this expedition, for they stoode there to consult and debate, where occasion called them on to execute the thing which their fortune had offred them, and then were they leaste fetled in resolution, when they sawe most necessitie of action: That night the armie was lodged in a burrow neare that place called Saltaro: but such was the diligence of Franciscomaria, that marching with his camp till well of the night, he gate Montebaroccio, preuenting a regiment of two thousande footemen which Lavvrence sent thither to surprise it: The day after he went and incamped aboue Saltaro towards the mountayne, taking a place for the bestowing of his army, that had his prospect vpon Montebaroccio, but standing somewhat lower & had his situation vpon the sea shore: These were the places wherin the two armies incamped, bearing no more distance then a myle one from an other, onely there fell to Lavvrence greater discommodities by the often want of vittels, for that the traffike lying by sea from Pesera to Fano, they were driuen vppon the alteration of the winds, to vse the seruice of cariages ouerlande, to the which the light horsemen of Franciscomaria gaue no smal impediments by their continuall roades and incursions ouer the whole contrey, hauing espiall by the peisants of euery litle mouing of thennemies. About this time Franciscomaria sent a trompet to communicate with the Gascons certaine pacquets of letters found amongst the writings of the secretories of Lavvrence and taken from him with other of his trashe by the horsemen of thenemie the same day that he departed from the borowe of Saltaro: By these letters was discerned that the Pope beeing wearie of the great payes of the Gascons, and yet stoode to make immoderate augmentation of them euery moneth, wished that trauell might be made to induce them to returne into Fraunce: By whiche occasion there had bene great perill of a tumult the selfe same daye, if Carbono their capteine and Lavvrence de Medicis had not by good perswasions reclaymed them, making them beleeue that the exhibition of those letters, was but a subborned and fallible stratageme of thennemie: Neuertheless, what by the suspicion of that daunger, the necessitie of vittelles, and the difficulties of the place bearing more mad nyfeſt ſignes to loaſe, then any hope at all to wynne, they determined to breake vppe from thence, and to enter into the countrey of the Viccareage on that ſide that is neareſt the ſea, and ſo to marche on, tyll they approched Foſſambrono: And albeit it was not without ſhame to retyre ſo often from thenemies, yet the reſolution to departe was allowed through the whole campe, but not without the infamy of Ranſo and Vitelli, agaynſt whom exclaymed all the regimentes of ſouldiors, charging him that if in the beginning they had put execution to that deuiſe, they had brought vpon thenemies no ſmall wantes and difficulties of vittells: Lavvrence him ſelfe reprehended them no leſſe then the others, who accompanying his complaints with reprochefull ſuſpicions, impoſed vpon them, that, eyther to make the warre long for their particular profite, or to hinder his reputation and glorie by armes, fearing happly to their perſons the like effects by his greatnes, which theſtate and ambicion of Valentinois had wrought agaynſt their houſes, they had brought ſo many difficulties and ſo many daungers vpon an army ſo mightie and appoynted, and ſo farre aboue thenemies, in force, in fortune, and in diſcipline: But the army marched and incamped before S. Conſtance, a borowe apperteining to the countrey of the viccareage, the walles whereof they began with no leſſe ſpeede then violence to batter and execute with their artilleries: And albeit the inhabitantes ſued for parley, and offred to ſubmitte and render it, yet knowing the facilitie to force it, there was giuen to the Gaſcons onely a full libertie to aſſaulte it, retyring from the walles all the other ſortes of ſouldiors: ſuche was the deſire to reappeaſe the angry minds of the Gaſcons by the ſpoyle and ſacke of that place, whereof the whole profite and riches was transferred to them. From thence the campe marched two myles further, and went the ſame day to Mandolffe the beſte and ſtrongeſt borowe of all the Viccareage, and hauing his ſituation vpon a hill and a high place thereof, is alſo inuironed with walls and trenches conuenient, to the which the ſituation of the place ſerueth as a rampier, hauing withall two hundred ſouldiors in garriſon: That night they planted thartilleries on that ſide towards the South, but eyther by negligence or by indiſcreſſion of Ranſo de Cere, to whome was appoynted the managing of that charge, they were planted in a place diſcouered and not defended by rampiers: by whiche falte, before the ſunne had diſperſed his brightnes one howre vpon the earth, there were ſlayne by the artilleries from within, eight Cannoniers with many pyoners, and Antho. Santcroſſe the capteine of their artillerie, wounded: by reaſon of whiche accident, Lavvrence riſing into ſome perturbation of minde, went in perſon to cauſe thartilleries to be rampiered and defended, notwithſtanding all his capteines aduiſed him to forbeare in his owne perſon thexecution of a daunger which he might well recommende to the charge of an other: After he had ſet in hande that labor and well refurniſhed the worke with all things neceſſarie, about the midde of the day he retyred behinde the place to reapoſe him ſelfe vnder the ſhade of certaine trees, thinking the height of the hill to be a ſufficient couer to him agaynſt all daungers: But as he labored in climbing, and the height of the hill diminiſhing by his labor, he diſcouered a ſidelong, the rocke ſituate on that ſide towards the weſt, which he had no ſooner diſcloſed then he had in his eye (ſuche is the ſwiftneſſe of deſtinie) a fyre giuen to a harquebuze layde with full leauill agaynſt him: And as he threwe himſelfe flat on his face to deceyue the blowe, the ſwiftneſſe of the bollet was farre greater then his ſpeede in falling, in ſomuch as before he could fall to the earth, the bollet that otherwiſe had ronne through his body, tooke the toppe of his head, and raſing vppon the boane, paſſed along the brayne panne to-wardes the necke: This wounding of the generall brought no ſmall greefe to the capteines and vniuerſall multitude of the armie, in whom was kindled a greater deſire of reuenge, by howmuche leſſe worthy were the people by whom they had receiued the deſpite, and that euen in the perſon of the greateſt amongeſt them: And therefore redoubling their reſolution by the remembraunce of the iniurie, and finding that notwithſtanding the battring they had made of the wall, the earth was yet too high behinde, they began to caſte a myne, wherewith entring vnder a towre that leaned to the wall which they had battred, they put fyre to it the v. daye: The powder and other matter vſed in the myne beeing embraſed of the fyre, threwe out ſuche a violence and ſtrength that it brought the tower down to the earth, together with a quarter of the wall ioyning to it: which furious execution of the fyre was followed of the campe with an aſſalte, but with litle order and (as it were) at aduenture, the ſame yeelding no other frute then ſuche as is wont to growe vpon enterpriſes yll diſpoſed and directed: Neuertheleſſe (fortune in ſome actions doth more then eyther power or pollicie) the night drawing on, the ſouldiors that had no exſpectation of ſuccours, for that Franciſcomaria had not ſtirred from Montebaroccio, eyther not to loaſe the aduauntage of the ſituation of the place, or for other occaſion, yeelded vp the place vnder condition of goodes and lyfe ſaued, leauing in vyle maner the people of the towne as a wretched praye to thenemies: But by reaſon of the hurt of Lavvrence, which brought his life in daunger, the Pope ſent as Legate to tharmie, the Cardinall S. Maria in Portico, who, yll fortune being already ioyned to yll gouernment, began with very yll ſignes to exerciſe his Legation: for, the daye after he came to tharmie, there happned a quarrell by chaunce betweene an Italian and a Launceknight, when ſuche as were neareſt ronning to the fray, and euery one calling vppon the name of his nation, the tumult ſo increaſed through the whole campe, that neyther exſpecting any information of the cauſe, nor ſeeking the due redreſſe and remedie of the ſame, all the bandes of footemen ranne in great mutinie to the lodgings of their fellowes and companions, to arme themſelues: The violence of their diſorder caryed them ſo farre, that whoſoeuer they encountred in the waye of an other language or nation, payed with their lyues the price of their fury: And as ſuche generall calamities drawe with them many diuerſities of diſorders, ſo in this vniuerſall confuſion, whyleſt the bandes of Italian footemen were gone in good order towards the place where the tumult began, their lodgings and houſes were ſacked by the Gaſcons: No nation, no regiment, no companie was free from this outrage: and in whom was greateſt care to cure the euyll, in him was moſte poſſibilitie of perill and daunger: The innocent found leaſt ſafetie in abſteining moſt from violence: there was no diſpenſation of harmes where was no reſpect to perſon, and leſſe exſpectation of ſafetie where the ſworde bare moſte ſwaye, and that guyded by handes fierie and bloudy: The principall capteines after they had bene in councell to remedie the diſorder, ranne to the fray, to ſee if by their preſence they might do the thing which they were not hable to do by counſell: But finding the daunger of the tumult to be greater then their authoritie, euery one caſt from him the thoughtes and care of the common buſines, and began to looke to their particular ſafetie: they ranne to their lodginges and houſes, and putting in order their men at armes, they retyred for their ſafetie a myle from the campe, drawing with them their particular companies to defende them from the furie of the popular ſouldiors: onely the Legate Bibieno, vſing the conſtancie and readines that apperteined to his office and honor, would neuer abandon the common cauſe, but putting

ting him selfe oftentimes with the daũger of his life, amid the presse of their bloody swords and weapons, he did so much with the diligence & labor of other Capteines of the footebandes, that the tumult was at last reappeased, during the furie whereof were slaine in many partes of the campe, more then an hundred launceknights, xx. Italians, and some Spanyards: This accident was the cause that they determined for the present to enter into no enterprise, but for a time to keepe the armie separat: for, it was feared, that if the army should keepe together, the souldiers not yet reconciled for the harmes receiued, would recontinue the mutiny for euery light occasion, knowing that by so much greater is the despite of an iniury, and the desire of ruenge more violent, by how much are remeining in presence & memorie the first authors and doers: Therefore the companies of men at armes of the Church, & of the Florentins were bestowed in the Citie of Pesera together with the regimentes of Italian footemen: for, touching the frenche launces, they had not stirred from Rimini by reason the difficulties that were betweene the Pope and their king were not yet resolued: The footebands of the Gascons were incamped vpon the plaine within halfe a myle of that Citie, and the other companies of footemen were dispersed vppon the mount Imperialo aboue Pesero and on that side towardes Rimini: And suche was the seuerall distribucion of them, that the Spanyards were placed vpon the toppe of the mounteine, the launceknights somewhat lower according to the descending of the mounteine, and the Corsikans at the foote of the hill: vpon this mounteine called Imperialo standeth a pallace which the auncestors of the familie of Maletestey had builded: They continued in this order three and twentie dayes executing no other thing in that respit and intermission of time then certeyne skirmishes of the light horsemen: for, Franciscomaria, stirred not what with desire to hold that he had gotten, and that he sawe no hope to breake so great an armie in the plaine fielde, or to take any place so neare thennemies: Neuertheless at last which was the foure and twentie day, departing by night from Montebaroccio, he came by the peepe of the morning to the toppe of the mounteine, where the Spanyards lay incamped, with whome either generally or seuerally it was beleued he had some secret intelligence according to the relacion and testimony of the succesſe that followed: for, assoone as he was come thither, his Spanyards beganne to crie vpon the others of their nation, that if they would make care of their owne sauety, they should follow them, a voyce which most parte of them did accept euerie one putting vppon his heade a bough of greene leaues according to the example of the others: Onely their Capteines retyred to Pesera, and drew with them about eight hundred footemen: When the Spanyards were thus ioyned into one strength, they went all together to the tents of the launceknights, who kept no great gard on that side for the surety of the neighbourhoode of the Spanyards, and taking the aduantage of their securitie, they fell to execucion and slaughter, in which medley they killed and hurt more then six hundred of them, the residue fled to the campe of the Corsikaies, and with them retyred in one strength, towards Pesera: The Gascons might well discerne the bickering and putting them selues in order, they kept their ground not once mouing from the place where they stoode: Franciscomaria, after this slaughter of the launceknightes, and the most parte of the spanishe footebandes allured to his side, went to incampe betwene Vrbin and Pesera not without great hope to haue to come ioyne with him those Gascons and launceknights, who, leauied at that time in the campe of Monsr de Lavvtretch, had alwayes marched together, and were for the most parte lodged together, and neuer did any action separate or a parte: There was amongest the

Gascons a Capteine called Ambro who bare enuie to the vertue & glory of Capteine Carbono: This Ambro was young and well disposed, of noble place and discending, kinsman to Monsr de Lavvtrech, and with the souldiours bare a greater credit and authoritie then did Carbono: he had secretly practised many dayes to passe with his regiment of footemen to the part of Franciscomaria, wherein he tooke this occasion, that not satisfied with thimmoderat augmentacion of their payes, they redemaunded insolently greater condicions: Which when they were denied by the Popes ministers, there interposed betwene them Carbo and the capteines of the french horsemen, who for the same cause were come from Rymyny to Pesero, to reduce them to accorde: but fiue or sixe dayes after the discomfiture of the Spanyards and Germanes in the imperiall hill, Franciscomaria, with his whole armie disclosed him selfe neare vnto them: of whome one parte together with Ambro beeing saine into araye of battell with sixe peeces of ordinaunce called Sagors, the Germanes followed & ioyned them selues also vnto him: Carbo in vaine endeuoring to stay them with prayers and most vehement perswasions: with Carbo abode seuen Capteines with 1300. footemen, all the reste together with the Germanes forsooke him: And as in warlike matters alwaies one mischiefe breeds another: so the Italian footemen, perceiuing what need there was of them, the next morning stirred vp a tumult: And to reappease it, when neither greater shamefastnes nor lesser gredines was in the Capteines then in the souldiours, it was necessary in their payes to promisse them more immoderat condicions: And truely it was a matter to be marueled at, that in the armie of Franciscomaria in the which no pay was distributed to the souldiours, was so great agreement, discipline, and concord, which no doubt proceeded not (as is sayd of the Carthaginian Haniball to his high commendation) so much of the vertue or authoritie of the gouernour, as of the exceeding affection and constancie of the soldiours: But of the contrary, in the armie of the Church, where in times due were not wanting excessiue payes, was seene an vniuersall confusion, disorder, and desire of the souldiours to passe to thennemies campe. The same prouing that oftentimes, concord and discipline in armies are not so easily conserued by money as by other causes: The Legat and others who were present at the councell beeing made astonished with so many accidents, after they had long time debated by what meanes & remedies they might relieue the afflicted estate of thinges: neither were they more discreete or abundant in councells, to forsee that those disorders fell not, then apt to applye due remedies to the mischieues hapned: And therefore beeing moued also with their owne couetous desires & interest perticular, they concluded to perswade the Pope to restore Bolognia to the Bentiuolians before they beeing imboldened by the late declinacion of thinges, or pushed on by the incitacion of others, they should make some commotion: A matter which howe vnable they were to resist was well expressed in the difficulties they had to sustaine the warres in one onely place: And therefore to giue the greater authoritie to this councell, and for the more iustificacion of all partes in all euents: They sent the same to the Pope by Robert Buschet A gentleman of Modona set downe in writing, subscribed with the hands of all the capteines and of the Legat and the Archbishop of Vrsin, of whom the one was linked to the Bentiuolians in auncient amitie, the other ioyned to them in parentage: which aduise the Pope did not onely despise, but also complayned in most bitter tearmes that his owne ministers, and such as had bene enriched by him with many benefits, with daily exspectacion to receiue more, had sette before him with so litle faith and loue a councell or election no lesse pernicious then the very euills which the ennemies

mies did: But chiefly he cryed out agaynſt the Archbiſhop of Vrſin, whom happly he iudged to be the chiefe author and inducer of the others to this counſell: vnder thoccaſion of which diſpleaſure it was beleeued that he depriued him of the purple hatte or Cardinalls dignitie which was promiſed in the beginning with an vniuerſall conſent to be transferred to him in the firſt promotion that happned: But Franciſcomaria ſeeing his ſtrength ſo increaſed and his enemies forces abated, & making his aduauntage alſo vpon the neceſſitie, rayſed his thoughtes to greater attemptes: for both the footmen which came with him, had bene three whole monethes without pay, and he had no likelyhoode of meane or habilitie to wage thoſe that lately reuolted to him: and alſo the duchie being ſore pilled and harried, and almoſt vtterly ſpoyled, the ſouldiors had not onely no meane of praye and bootie, but alſo with great difficultie could they finde out ſufficient vittells to ſuſteine them: But in chooſing this newe expedition, he was to followe other mens wils, ſo that for the better eſtabliſhing of his eſtate before he would attempt any other matter, he ſought to aſſault afreſhe Fano or ſome other peece on the ſea coaſt: Neuertheleſſe by thinclination of the ſouldiors greedie of praye and bootie, he determined to turne into Tuskane, where becauſe the region was plentifull of all things, without ſuſpect, and vnredy for defence, he hoped to rayſe ſome great ſpoyle: Furthermore he was caried with a hope to make ſome mutation in Perugia and Siena, by the meane of Charles Baglion and the Burgoes of Petruccio, by whiche deuiſe his owne things had bene ſufficiently augmented, together with the moleſtations and perills of the Pope and his nephew: therefore the next day, after he had aſſembled the Gaſcons, he remoued his campe towards Peruſia: but when he was come to the playne of Agobina, he determined to make manyfeſt his ſuſpicion, yea rather the certayne apprehenſion which he had of the treaſon of the Colonell Maldonato and others ioyned with him in the ſame cauſe: The matter was bred and brought foorth in this ſort: When the armie marched by Romagnia, Snares one of the capteines of the Spaniardes, vnder diſſimulation of ſickneſſe dragged behind, and of purpoſe ſuffred himſelf to be taken of his enemies, & being in the ſtate of a priſoner he was cõueyed to Ceſena to Lavvrence, to whom he declared in the name of Maldonato and the two other capteines of the Spaniards, that not for any other cauſe were they conioyned with Franciſcomaria, then to haue occaſion to do ſome notable ſeruice to the Pope and to him, ſeeing it was not in their power to let the accident of this commotion, promiſing in all their names, that they would not omit the execution aſſone as thoportunitie was offred: which deuice whereas it was vtterly kept vnknowne from Franciſcomaria, yet he quickly tooke ſuſpicion by certayne wordes vnaduiſedly ſpoken of Ranſo de Cere to a dromme of the Spaniards: of whom taking occaſion to ieſt with him, he demaunded when thoſe Spaniards would giue vp their Duke priſoner: which voyce making deepe impreſſion in the heart of Franciſcomaria, gaue him cauſe diligently to obſerue whether there were any infidelitie or treaſon in the armie, whiche at the length by letters intercepted with the cariages of Lavvrence, he did not onely diſcerne, but perceiued that Maldonato was the author of ſome dangerous ſtratageame: A matter which hauing diſſimuled vntill then, he thought not good any longer to conceale it: and therefore calling together all the Spaniſhe footemen, ſetting him ſelfe in the middeſt of them, he began to giue them great thankes, with wordes of moſt vehement inſinuation for thoſe things which for his ſake they had vndertaken with ſo great inclination of minde, confeſſing openly that neither in the memorie of theſe latter tymes, nor in hiſtories of auncient writers, had bene any Prince or

Capteine owing ſo great obligations to men of warre, as he acknowledged to owe to them: for that neyther hauing money, nor any meane to rewarde their great merites and ſeruices, and him ſelfe a Prince but of ſmall eſtate though he ſhoulde recouer all his patrimonies, not beeing of their nation and language, nor hauing ſerued with them in the fielde, yet they had with ſo ready a diſpoſition followed him agaynſt ſo mightie a Prince and of ſo great authoritie, and that not for hope or greedynes of ſpoyle, ſince they knewe they were ledde into a barreine and poore region: Which vallour and good ſeruices, as he had no meane to recompence to them but with goodwill and gratification of minde, ſo yet this was his comfort, that not onely amongeſt the regions of Italie, but alſo through all the prouinces of Europe they had purchaſed perpetuall fame and reputation vnder him: they being but very few in nũber, without money, without artillery, without any warlike furniture, had ſo often conſtrayned to turne their backes an army moſt riche in treaſor and all other prouiſions, with whom were ioyned ſo many warlike people, agaynſt the forces of the Pope and the power of the Florentins, with whom the name and authority of the kings of Fraunce and Spayne was concurrant: and that in regarde to ſupport and preſerue the fayth and honor of men of ſeruice, they had neglected the ſolemne commaundement of their proper princes: Of which things like as he did take exceding pleaſure becauſe of the name and glory of them, ſo on the other ſide, all matters which might obſcure ſo glorious a renowme, would bring vpon him a burden of intollerable greefes: That as he endured with manifeſt dolor the opening of matters which ſhould draw to hurt them or any of that company, to euery particular of whom he had vowed whileſt he drew breath for euer to be dedicated in al affection, in all ſeruice, in all fidelitie, and all office whatſoeuer: So neuertheleſſe, leaſt this euill begonne ſhoulde be increaſed with his ſilence, and leaſt the malice of ſome ſhoulde blemiſhe ſo great a glory gotten by this armie: and beeing alſo conuenient that he ſhould holde a more deare accompt of the fame and honor of them all, then particularly reſpecte the amitie of a fewe: he coulde not conceale longer from them, that there were foure in that armie who went about to betray the glorye and the ſafetie of them all: Touching his owne priuate caſe, neither would he make mention, nor inferre complayntes, ſince hauing bene trauelled in ſo many accidents, and paſſed the rage of fortune for innocencie, he was nowe reduced to this temperaunce and ſtaye of minde, that it was all one with him the deſyre of death or lyfe: But for their parts, neither thobligacions and offices which he ought to them, nor the ſettled affection whiche with ſo greate merite he bare to them, would ſuffer him to keepe longer from them the information and knowledge of their preſent daunger, which was that Colonell Maldonato, in whom for his place ought to haue bene a greater care of the ſafetie and glorie of them all, and Capteine Snares the firſt contriuer of this fraude by yeelding vnder a counterfeit ſickneſſe to be taken of his enemies in Romagnia, together with two other Capteines, had conſpired and promiſed vnder wicked counſels, to betray the lyues of them all to Lavvrence de Medicis: And as the effect of thoſe counſels was diſappoynted by his vigilancie, for whiche cauſe he would no ſooner reueale ſo great a treaſon: ſo nowe not thinking to holde any longer eyther the perſon of him ſelfe, or the lyues of others vnder ſo great a daunger, he hath opened vnto them, the thing whiche longe before was knowne to him ſelfe: And the better to induce their mindes, he ſayde that the diſcourſe of thys treaſon was ſette downe in credible fourme in certayne letters autentike founde amongeſt the writings of Lavvrence

and intercepted by him,beſides many apparant ſignes & coniectures: All which he thought good to lay afore thē,to thend they might be the iudges of ſuch a hainous conſpiracy,and ſo hearing aſwell the crime detected as the iuſtifications of thoffendors,they might procede to iuſtice according to that counſell which ſhould ſtande beſt with equity & order,and eſtabliſh a due ſafety to the whole army: When he had made an end of ſpeaking,he commaunded to be read and interpreted the euidences of the crime obiected agaynſt thē,which being heard with very great attentiō, Maldonato,Snares, & the other two capteins not being ſuffred to anſwere,were condēned by the common iudgement of the army as of a matter moſt manifeſtly proued, and forthwith being committed to paſſe the pikes, they were executed after the maner of ſouldiors. Thus the army being purged (as they ſayde) by this puniſhment of all treaſon,they folowed on their iourney towards Perugia: into the which was already entred Iohn Paule Baillon, being departed from Peſero aſſone as he had knowledge of their intention: and there arming his friends with many companies of peiſants leauied in the contrey and confines there,he prepared himſelfe to defende it: to whom the Legate had ſent for ſuccor,Camillo Vrſin his ſonne in law,leader of the Florentins together with the men at armes of his conduct, and two hundred and fiftie light horſmen: with the which forces it was thought he might ſuſteine the inuaſion of his enemies, the rather for that many deuiſes were made to hinder their proceedings: for Vitello with his regiment of men at armes,and Syſe with the French launces,who ſtoode now no more ſuſpected,for that betwene the Pope and the French king:was eſtabliſhed a confederation, were marched to the citie of Caſtell, & Lavvrence de Medicis, who being newly recured of his wound, and alſo lately come from Ancona to Peſero, was gone in poſt to Florence to prepare there things neceſſarie to the conſeruation of that gouernment & the cities adioyning: There he tooke order that the Legate with the reſt of the army, ſhould marche towards the dukedome of Vrbin, to thend to counſell Franciſcomaria to abandon thexpedicion of Tuskane, for the gard wherof was left no other regiments of ſouldiors, then a defence of thinhabitants: Franſ. not without the hope of ſome intelligence or conſpiracie,did remoue his army to Perugia, where Ioh.Paule riding about the city to take view,he was aſſailed in the middeſt of the ſtreete by a peiſant or ſouldior of the countrey, and fayling at that time to ſtrike him to the death, he was ſodenly ſet vpon and ſlayne by the concourſe of thoſe that accompanied Iohn Paule: who taking thoportunitie of this tumult,cauſed certayne others whom he ſuſpected to be murdred,and ſo being deliuered from ſnares of conſpiracie,he ſeemed alſo to be deliuered from all perill: for that thenemies who had now many dayes lyen about Perugia, had no meane to take it by force: And yet Iohn Paule at a tyme when the Pope leaſt exſpected ſuche a matter, alleaging in his iuſtification, that the people of Perugia (whoſe furie he had no power to reſiſte) would no longer endure the ſpoyling of their countrey, couenanted with tharmie to paye ten thouſande duckets, to graunt vittels for foure dayes, not to take armes agaynſt Franciſcomaria in that warre, and they to iſſue preſently out of the territories of Perugia: A matter very greeuous and of no little diſcontentment to the Pope, for that it confyrmed the opinion conceyued of him from the beginning of this warre, in going ſo ſlowely to the armie with the ſuccours he promiſed, and holding for ſuſpected the power of Lavvrence, he wyſhed that Franciſcomaria ſhould conſerue the Dukedome of Vrbin: This alſo aggrauated the greeſe and diſcontentment of Baillon, that whileſt he was in the campe with Lavvrence,Ranſo and Vitello bare greater authoritie then he: the memory of which things was happly the chiefeſt cauſe of his owne calamities in times following: Franciſcomaria hauing made condicionall agreement with the Perugians, marched towardes the citie of Caſtello, where when he had made certeine incurſions with intention to enter the towne of Sanſepulcro in the ſtate of Florence, the daunger of his owne ſtate conſtrained him to take other counſel, for that the legate Bibiena hauing eftſones leuied certaine bands of footmē Italians, folowing the deliberation made at Peſero, was remoued with the reſt of his army to Foſſombrono, which city being battred with the artillery, the third day was taken and ſacked: This done he led his army to Pergola, where the day folowing the erle of Potenza with 400. Spaniſh launces ſent from the king of Spayne to the ayde of the Pope, did ioyne with the army: within Pergola there was not one ſouldior, but only a Spaniſh capteine & many inhabitants of the regiō, who being ſore aſtoniſhed begā to cōmon of yelding, but while they were in parley, the capteine who ſtood vpon the wal being wounded in the face, the ſouldiors made aſſalt, without any order or cōmaundement of their capteins, & wonne the town by force: From Pergola they conſulted to bring their army to Cagli, but being aduertiſed that Franciſcomaria hauing heard of the loſſe of Foſſombrono, was returned into that region with moſt great celerity, they determined to retyre themſelues: wherfore the ſame night in the which the Legate receiued that intelligence, they departed from Pergola, & hauing traueled to Montlion, when knowing that there they might lodge, they began to lay out the ground according to incāping, being aduertiſed by other meſſengers that the celerity of the enemy was far aboue perſwaſion, and that he ſent before him 1000. horſmen, euery one carying a footeman in croope, to thende that they being conſtrained to trauel with more leiſure, time might be giuen to the army to ouertake them: they marched vij. miles to a place called Boſco, from whēce departing the morning folowing before day, they came in the euening to Fano, hauing almoſt vpon their backes the horſmen of thenemies which came with ſo great celeritie, that if they had onely departed foure houres later, they had hardly eſcaped the neceſſitie of the fight.

At this time the affayres of the Pope in other actions, proceeded with no better felicitie, then in the accidentes and euentes of the warre: for that Alphonſo the Cardinall of Sienna diſdayning much the life of the Pope, lay in wayte to betray him, the rather for that the Pope hauing forgotten the trauels and daungers which Pandolpho Petruccio his father had endured to reſtore him and his brethren to the gouernment of Florence, together with the operations whiche he with other young Cardinalls had wrought in the conſiſtory to aduaunce him to the Popedome: In recompence of ſo many benefits he had cauſed to be thruſt out of Sienna, Borgheſe his brother and him: By which occaſion, beeing alſo ſpoyled of his fathers eſtates, he coulde not maynteine the dignitie of the purple hatte with that glorie which he was accuſtomed: and therefore being caried with hatred, and reduced almoſt to diſpayre, he began to deuiſe by a young counſell to murder him with violent handes, whom his hatefull hart coulde not brooke to loue: but reſtrayned with the perill and difficulty of the fact, more then with the example and common infamie that throughout all Chriſtendome would ronne, if any Cardinall ſhould with his owne hands take away the life of a Pope, he chaunged aduiſe, and turned all his thoughts to take him away with poyſon, by the miniſtration of Baptiſta Vercelly a famous Surgion, and very familiar with him: of which counſayle (if ſo wicked a furie be worthy ſuch name) this ſhould haue bene the order, that ſith that he could not finde any other meane, the Surgion ſhould by ſetting foorth with ſinguler prayſes his vertues, make ſuche in-

ſinuation into him, that the Pope hauing a Fiſtula vnder his fundiment, for the which he vſed dayly the trauell of men of his profeſſion, would by ſuche impreſſion call him to his cure: But the impatience of Alfonſo reduced the action of this deuiſe to a deſperate hope, ſince as thexecution drewe with it ſome long tract of tyme depending vpon many obſeruations and circumſtances, ſo Alfonſo who could not conteine himſelfe from cõplayning agaynſt thingratitude of the Pope, being euery day more hatefull, and ſuſpecting leaſt he would conſpire ſome thing againſt his eſtate, was at laſt as it were conſtrained for his own ſafety to depart from Rome, leauing neuertheles behind him Antho. Nino his ſecretorie: Betwene them there was a continuall paſſage of letters, whereof certaine being intercepted, the Pope diſcerned manifeſt treaſon to be practiſed agaynſt his life: therefore vnder coolor to make ſome prouiſion for thaffaires of Alfonſo, he called him to Rome, ſending him ſafeconduit, ioyned to his worde & fayth giuen beſides to the Spaniſh embaſſador, not to touch him preiudicially: Vnder which aſſurance, notwithſtanding the priuity & teſtimony of his conſcience to ſo apparant treaſon, he went vnwiſely to the Pope, who immediatly cauſed him to be apprehended together with Badinello Cardinall Savvily a Genovvay, a great furtherer of Leo to the Popedome, but ſo conioyned with Alfonſo in ſtraite friendſhip & familiaritie, that he was thought partaker with him in all things: Their firſt apprehending was in the Popes chamber and in his preſence, and from thence were conueyed as priſoners to the Caſtell S. Angelo: There was alſo preſent direction giuen that Baptiſta Vercelli, who then was following his arte at Florence, ſhould be made priſoner and ſent to Rome. The Spaniſhe Embaſſador labored with vehement complaints and proteſtations, to haue Alfonſo ſet at liberty, alleaging that the Popes fayth giuen to him as the kings Embaſſador, ought to be obſerued with the ſame fidelitie as if it had bene giuen to the king him ſelfe: But the Pope aunſwered that there was no ſafeconduit howe ample ſoeuer it was with clauſes ſtrong and ſpeciall, that caryed anye ſewertie in crymes conſpired agaynſt the lyfe of the Pope, without peculiar and ſpeciall nomination: And that the ſame exception and prerogatiue followed alſo the cryme of poyſoning, an offence ſo greatly abhorred by the diuine and humaine lawes, and ſo hatefull to the ſences of all men, that they haue reſerued no ſafeconduit or aſſurance for thoffendors that waye, but vnder particular and ſpeciall mencion. The Pope preferred to examine them, Mario Peruſco the procurer of the fiske, who following the matter vpon them with ſeueritie and rigour, they confeſſed the treaſon conſpired with the priuitie of Bandinello: The confeſſion was verified by the Surgion, and confirmed by Po. Bagnacanallo, who vnder Pandolfo his father, and Borgheſe his brother, had long bene capteine of the garriſon of Sienna, and for this offence were nowe publikely quartered: After this confeſſion, in the next ſitting of the conſiſtorie, was apprehended and caryed to the Caſtell, Raphael Riario Cardinall Saint George chiefe chamberleine to the ſea Apoſtolike, who for his wealth and riches, for the magnificencie of his Court, and for his long time and continuaunce in that dignitie, was become bothe in truthe and name, the principall Cardinall of all the Colleage: he confeſſed that albeit neyther the treaſon nor the counſayle thereof had beene imparted to him, by the whiche he iuſtified his innocencie, yet he had heard oftentymes the Cardinall of Sienna bothe lament and vſe threates to the Pope vnder ſuche wordes and ſpeeches, as he coulde not but comprehende that he bare in him a mynde to doo ſome violence agaynſt hys perſonne when occaſion offered: The Pope after thys contynued hys complayntes in an other Conſiſtorie, wherein the Cardinalls not accuſtomed to be violated, fell into no ſmall aſtoniſhment and greefe of minde, that with ſuche crueltie and iniquitie, the Popes life ſhould be betrayed by thoſe, who for their place and dignitie which made them principall members of the ſea Apoſtolike, ſtoode more then all others iuſtly bounde to defende it: He complayned with great compaſſion agaynſt thaccident and thunthankfulneſſe thereof, to returne to him ſuche a recompence for his infinite benefites and liberalities beſtowed vpon all ſortes, yea not without blame and imputation of ſome: But the thing that made him burſt out into more vehemencie of paſſion, was that other Cardinals were intangled with conſpiracie, who neuertheles, if afore the conſiſtorie were diſſolued, they would frankly confeſſe their offence, they ſhould finde him prepared to clemencie & to giue pardon, but if they deferred tyll the Conſiſtorie were broken vp, he would turne his clemencie into ſeueritie of iuſtice, and call into proſcription aſwell the acceſſories as chiefe offendors: Which wordes working bothe pietie and ſubmiſſion in the mindes of Adriano Cardinall Cornetto, and Fran. Soderini Cardinall of Volterra, they humbled themſelues vpon their knees affore the feete of the Pope, confeſſing that the Cardinall of Sienna had vſed the ſame ſpeeches to them, which the Cardinal Saint George had expreſſed. Aſſone as theſe examinations and the euidences incident, were publiſhed in the conſiſtorie, Alfonſo and Bandinello by ſentence of the generall Conſiſtorie, were degraded of the dignitie of the purple hatte and holy orders, and deliuered ouer to the ſecular Court and Iudges of criminall offences: The night following Alfonſo was ſecretly ſtrangled in priſon, but the ſentence of Bandinello by the Popes grace, was chaunged into perpetuall impriſonment, from the which neuertheleſſe he was not long afterwards deliuered vnder a raunſome of money, and eftſones reſtored to the dignitie of Cardinall, notwithſtanding he had iuſter cauſe of indignation agaynſt him for the many benefites and graces he had beſtowed vpon him: And yet he was become eſtraunged from him for no other cauſe then for the amitie he had with Alfonſo, adding withall a diſdayne that the Cardinall Meditis was preferred affore him in the ſuites of certayne benefices: And there were not wanting malicious interpretors, who iudged that affore he was deliuered out of priſon there was giuen to him by the Popes commaundement, a pocion confected with that kinde of poyſon whiche killeth not ſodenly, but worketh by ſuttle operations vntill by times it hath waſted the life of him that receiueth it. And touching the Cardinall Saint George, albeit the lawes ordeined by Princes for the ſecuritie of their ſtates, commaunde that in the cryme of high treaſon aſwel the acceſſarie as the principall be paſt vnder extreme puniſhment: yet, what by the ſtate of his fal being in a cõdition inferior to the others, & what for the reſpect of his age and authoritie which tyme had made reuerent in him, and laſtely, what for the lawe of friendſhip which had indifferently ronne betwene them affore his aſcending to the Popedome, he proceeded with him with more clemencie and fauor: In ſo muche as like as for thauthoritie and reputation of iuſtice, he was by ſentence depriued of the Cardinalls dignitie, ſo he was immediatly by grace bought with a great ſumme of money, reſtored to his former condition in all things, ſauing in the authoritie and priuileage of his voyce actiue and paſſiue, which grace neuertheleſſe within the reuolution of a yeare was fully reſtored to him agayne. There was no other vexation impoſed vpon Adrian and Volterra, ſauing a ſecret exaction of great ſummes of money: But ſeeing there was no ſurety to eyther of them to abyde in Rome with conuenient dignity, Volterra with the Popes licence went to Fondy, where vnder the wings of Proſper Colonno he remayned tyll the Popes death: And Adrian

departed secretly out of Rome, but what destenie fell vpon him, it is hard to reapport, seeing there are none that euer coulde giue any informacion of him since his going away: The bitternes of this accident drewe the Pope to consider for the creacion of newe Cardinalls, knowing that the whole presence of the colledge, astonished by this punishment, and gelous of other occasions, were of mindes muche estraunged from him: In which action he proceded so immoderatly that in one morning in the consistorie, the colledge consenting more for feare then of will, he pronounced one and thirtie Cardinalls, and in that abundance & plentie of numbers, as he had good meane to satisfie many ends, and to make his election of euery quality of men, so he preferred two sonnes of his sister, with some others, who, sauing for the seruices they had done him, and had bene acceptable to the Cardinall Medicis by many offices, were in other reasons neither capable nor worthie so high dignities: In the calling of some, he obserued the humors of great Princes, creating them at their instance: some he raised by simonie and corruption of money, to relieue his treasor being much consumed: some he called were verie famous by thopinion and credit of their learning, amongest whome were three Generalls (that appellacion is of the highest degree) of the order of S. Augustin, S. Dominik, & S. Frauncis: And in this creation he left this most rare tradicion, that to one function, in one promocion, and at one time, he preferred two of the familie of Triuulco, taking his inducement for the one, to recompence his seruice for that he had bene his chamberlaine, & also vpon a desire to satisfie Iohn Iacques, and touching the other, he was caried with the fame of his learning accompanied with some quantitie of money: But that which bred matter of greatest admiracion, was the election of Francisco Vrsin, and Pompey Colonno with other fiue Romains of the principall houses, such as were followers of all factions with councells altogether contrary to the resolucion of his predecessor: Neuertheless it was reputed an action not the least discreete and yet it drewe no great happines in the end to his frendes and kindred: for whereas, the greatnes of the Barons of Rome being alwaies the suppression and vexacion of the Popes, and where in default of the auncient Cardinalls of those families, whome Alexander the sixt had bitterly persecuted to make a pray of their goodes, Iulio would neuer suffer that dignity to be reinuested in any of them: Leo, with great immoderacion did the contrarie, not that it could be sayd he was drawne with the merit of the men, for that as Francisco was taken from the profession of armes, and created Cardinall, so for Pompey the memorie of his doings past, ought to be obiected against his preferrement, for that though he was a Bishop, yet vsing thoccasion of Pope Iulioes sickenesse, he had labored to seduce to tumult, the people of Rome against the gouernment of Priests, for which cause Pope Iulio depriued him iustly of the dignity of Bishop: But in this time Franciscomaria, albeit by the retyring or rather manifest flying of thenemies, could haue no meane to fight, his army being made mightie in men and valour by the continuall resort of newe souldiers running after the fame of the Capteyne, & partely caried with hope of praye, entred into Marca, where Fabriano and many other townes compounded with him, redeeming with ready money, the perill of sacking and robbing their houses: But others standing destitute of that humanitie, he committed to the mercie of the souldiers, amongst the which the citie ranne a hard fortune, since during the parley and negociacion of accord, it was entred and spoyled in the vnbridled insolency of the souldiers: he drew from thence to Ancona for the defending of the which, the Legat had sent a crewe of souldiers: he remeyned about it many dayes, to the great hinderaunce of his affaires by the losse of time which he ſuffered,not in fighting with the defendants of the place, but in temporiſing to compownd with them: At laſt becauſe they would not with the harmes of the warre,ſuffer alſo the loſſe of their harueſt, they made him a raunſome of eyght thowſand duckats,not ſwaruing in other ſort from their accuſtomed fidelitie to the Church: afterwards he inuaded the citie of Oſim with very ill ſucceſſe: And at laſt he planted his campe affore the towne of Coriualdo, wherein were two hundred footemen forreyners,by whom together with the vallour of the towneſmen,it was ſo valiantly defended,that after he had conſumed xxij daies about it,he leauied his ſeege, his deſpaire being greater then his hope to cary it. This did greatly diminiſh the terror & feare that was had of that armie,the rather for that he had not made conqueſt of any thoſe townes that refuſed to compownd with him: A matter which no way could proceede of the vnskilfulnes of the Capteine to diſpoſe,nor of want of vallour in the ſouldiours to execute: but the true reaſon was,for that they had but very few and thoſe very ſmall field peeces, lacking withall many thinges to put them to ſeruice: Beſides,touching thoſe townes which would not yeeld to him,it was neceſſary they ſhould make demonſtracion of their conſtancy and vallour, for that the Capteines of the Church armie,amongeſt whom Count Potenza was chiefe, had ſent trowpes of their men of warre to bridle and make pillage of the contry euen to the walls of Vrbyn: And Siſe being returned from Citta de Caſtello in Romagnia,and afterwards entred into Montfeltro, and had ſubdued by force Secchiano with certeine other ſmall townes, was reduced to remeyne incamped within fiue myles of Pezero, with intencion not to miniſter ſuccors to any place, nor once to ſtirre onleſſe neceſſitie moued them to retyre: For,where,in the tymes when they were ſuperior in forces and ſtrength,their affayres had falne out ſo vnhappely, now,being made inferior in numbers by the diminucion of their footemen, they had not the courage to ſuſteine the fame of their enemies approching, and much leſſe to abide any other perill: In which reſolucion made according to the Popes mind, they were confirmed by a hope of the comming of ſix thowſand Svvizzers,whom the Pope by the councell of the french king,had ſent to leauy and wage: for,the french king after the confederacion made, deſired the victory of the Pope,and yet at the ſame tyme he reteined the ſame ſuſpicion of him that he did before: he was continued in this ſuſpicion by the relacions of Galeas Viſcount and Mark. Anth.Colonno, of whom the one being reuoked to his contry from baniſhment, and the other not thinking his ſeruices and merits well recompenſed by Cæſar,and both transferred with honorable condicions to the pay of the french king,they had reaported that the Pope had cõſpyred greatly with Cæſar and the Svvyzzers againſt him: But much more was the french king moued,for that the Pope had contracted ſecretly a newe confederacion with Cæſar, with the king of Spayne,and thEngliſh, which albeit was lawfull for him to doe, for that it bare only for their defenſe, yet both the matter & maner of it troubled not a litle the thoughts of his mind: he was induced through feare to be deliuered of the warres,leaſt the Pope not finding his aydes and ſuccours ready would not enter into a greater coniunction with other Princes againſt him: And beſides that,he beganne to take greefe & ſuſpicion of the armie of Vrbyn, whoſe ſtrength was compownded of footemen ſpaniſh and launceknightes: Therefore beſides that he had aduiſed the Pope to make him ſelfe ſtronge with the footemen of Svvyzzers, he offered to ſend him of new,three hundred launces vnder Thomas de Foix brother to Odet, alleaging that beſides the reputacion and vallour of the man,he would be a conuenient inſtrument to embeaſell from the armie of Franciſcomaria, the bandes of Gaſcoins, with whom thoſe brothers and race of Foix beeing diſcended of the nobleſt blood in Gaſcoigne, had great authoritie: The Pope accepted this offer, but with a minde very ſuſpicious, for that he ſtoode doubtfull as he did before, of the kings will, wherein he ſuffred his ſuſpicion to take encreaſing by the withdrawing of the Gaſcoins, fearing leaſt that action had priuily proceeded of the operation of Lavvtrech: And he that in thoſe times had made obſeruation of the dooings of Princes, might apparantly diſcerne, that no benefite, no office, no coniunction, was ſufficient to remoue out of their heartes the diſtruſtes and iealouſies which they had one of an other: for, the ſuſpicion was not onely reciprocall betwene the Pope and French king, but alſo the king of Spayne hearing of the leauyes of the Svvizzers, and the preparation of Thomas de Foix, was not without his feare that the Pope and the French ioyned together would not deuiſe to diſpoyle him of the kingdome of Naples: Theſe ſuſpicions were thought to profite thaffayres of the Pope, ſince both of them leaſt they ſhould giue him cauſe or matter to eſtraunge himſelfe from them, labored to confirme him and aſſure him with benefites and with aydes.

Nowe Franciſcomaria departing from Corinaldo, returned vpon the ſtate of Vrbin to giue defence and protection to his people for the getting in of their harueſt: and reteyning with an encreaſe of ambition his auncient deſire to get Peſero which was garded by the Count Potenza and his ſouldiors, he brought his armie to the borders thereof, and obiecting all impedimentes to cut off the reſort of vittels, he put to the ſea certayne ſhippes: But agaynſt that force they of Rimini rigged out ſixteene veſſells, ſome barkes, and ſome brigantins, and ſome of other nature agreable to the ſeruice of thoſe times, which being armed and manned, and ſent to accompanie and aſſure other ſhippes loaden with vittells for Peſero, they encountred the nauie of Franciſcomaria, of whom they ſunke to the bottome the Admirall, and tooke all the reſidue: by which accident diſpayring of the enterpriſe of Peſero, he leauied his forces and departed. In this meane while Monſr de Foix aduaunced with his three hundred launces, but the Svvizzers made ſlowe preparation, for that the Cantons denyed their conſent vnleſſe they were firſt ſatisfied of their olde penſions: from which obſtinacie the king being not hable to remoue them, and in the Pope no habilitie to make them ſatisfied for the intollerable defrayments he had exſpended, his Agentes hauing conſumed in that ſolicitation many dayes, enterteyned and waged without common priuitie, two thouſand particulars of that nation, and foure thouſande other Germains and Griſons: whiche leauyes beeing diſcended and beſtowed in the confines and ſuburbes of Rimini, and they being deuided by the riuer from the reſidue of the Citie, are enuironed and fetched in with walls, Franciſcomaria was entred by night by the valtes and arches of that notable bridge of Marble which tyeth the ſuburbes with the Citie, but he could not paſſe ouer, the ryuer being ſwelled by the inundation of the ſea: There grewe a ſtrong feight betweene his ſouldiors and the footebandes beſtowed in the ſuburbes, in whiche was ſlayne Iaſper Capteine of the Popes garde, who had conducted them thither: But greater was the loſſe of thenemies by the death of Balaſtichino and Vinea Spaniſhe capteines, and Federike Boſſolo and Franciſcomaria beeing wounded in the body with a bullet. After this encounter he turned his army towards Tuskane, being caryed more by neceſſitie then by hope, for that in a region ſo muche conſumed, ſo great an army coulde not be noriſhed: He remayned certayne dayes in Tuskane amongs the populars of S. Stephano, the borowe of S. Sepulchro, and Angbiari townes of the dominion of Florence, where he tooke Montedoglio, a place very weake and of little importance: he gaue a long assault to Anghiari, a towne more strong by the fidelity and vallour of the inhabitants, then by fortificacion of warres, or other kindes of munitions: But being not hable for his owne weakenes and wantes, to carie it, he retyred his armie vnder the Appenin, betwene S. Sepulchro and Ciuita di Castello, and causing to be drawne thither frō Mercatello foure peeces of artilleries he incamped within lesse then halfe a myle of the towne, vpon that way that leadeth to Vrbin: There he seemed to stand irresolute and doutfull what course to take, seeing that as his enemies were passed behind him into Tuskane, and many Italian bands entred into S. Sepulchro, and Vitello with a great strength was got into Citta di Castello: So within Anghiari, within the plaine of S. Stephano, & within the other townes conioyning, were entred the bands of footemen of the Germaines, the Grisons, and the Svvizzers: Lavvrence de Medicis came also from Florence but somwhtat late, to S. Sepulchro, where Franciscomaria had lyen with his campe many dayes idelly: And for that he beganne to finde in these places many discommodities of vittells, and lesse hope to be hable to bring forth any good effect, and withall for that the souldiours of his armie who were driuen to defende their liues, by praye and pillage, were now of equall terror to his frends and to his enemies, he began not to discerne any good expedicion or ende for his affaires: And the bands of footemen who had so long followed him, seeing no pay ministred, and no more hope remeyning to liue by discression becawse they had no munition of qualitie to force townes, and noting withall that to their calamitie of want of vittells, was ioyned an increase of the force & reputacion of their enemies by the grace of many Princes disclosed in their fauor, they beganne to be weary with the longnes of the warre, the rather also for that they could hope for no good issue or successe, neither by the oportunity of present battell, nor by the benefit of longer time: The Pope for his parte felt likewise the same perplexities and afflictions, for, he was both made naked of wealth and treasor, and no habilitie of him selfe to continue the prouisions of his campe, and also he stoode more doutfull then euer of the fidelity of other Princes, but chiefly of the french king, who with great slownes and negligence, did prouide for the reliefe of money which he was bound vnto by the capitulacion: And for that Monsr de Foix, hauing by the Popes direction remeyned in Romagna refused to send parte of his launces into Tuskane, alleaging that he would not deuide his strength, before the armies were passed the Appenin: there arose many arguments and perswasions of accord betwene the Legat and Franciscomaria & his Capteines: In which good inclinacion to peace, there interposed betwene them Monsr de Foix and Don Hugo da Moncado, and for that effect also the Viceroy of Sicilia was sent by the king Catholike: But vntill that day nothing succeded for the hard condicions which Franciscomaria vrged: At length, the bands of spanishe footemen, induced both by the difficulties that appeared, and also by the solicitacion & instance of Don Hugo, who ioyning threates to the authoritie of his place, and satisfying them that suche was precisely the will of the king of Spaine, they were brought to incline and embrace peace: which, with a very hard consent of Franciscomaria, and the negociacion of the Bishoppe of Auellino sent thither for the Pope by the Legat, was contracted in this sorte, concurring also the consent of the bands of Gascoine footemen by the interposing of Monsr de Foix: That the Pope should pay to the spanish footmen fiue and forty thowsand duckats for the full satisfying of foure monethes paye, and to the Gascoines, & Germaines ioyned with them, three score thowsand duckats: That they should all departe within eight dayes out of the state of the Churche, the iurisdiction of Florence, and the territories of Vrbin: That Franciscomaria leauing

abandoned all that he poſſeſſed in that ſtate, might paſſe in ſecuritie to Mantua: That he might cary with him his artilleries, his houſhold ſtuffe, and namely that famous librarye which with ſo greate charge and diligence had beene erected of Federik his grandfather by the mothers ſide: A Capteine for leading of an armie, of moſte renowme of all the Capteines of his time, but moſt famous amongeſt all other his vertues for his patronage of good learning: That the Pope ſhoulde abſolue him of all cenſures, and giue remiſſion to all the ſubiects of the gouernment of Vrbyn, and to all others that had riſen againſt him in this warre: But whileſt they were reducing the ſubſtance of theſe capitulacions into articles and writing, Franciſcomaria ſought to haue inſerted in ſpeciall wordes, that the Spanyards were they who promiſed to deliuer vp to the Pope, the ſtate of Vrbyn: A matter which they refuſed for the regard of their honor, whereuppon they came to contencion, when Franciſcomaria ſuſpecting leaſt they would ſell him to the Pope, went ſuddeinly to Seſtina leading with him part of the light horſemen, with the footemen Italyans, Gaſcons, & Germains, and foure peeces of artilleries: Aſſoone as perfection was giuen to the peace, & the Spanyards receiued their payes, they went into the Realme of Naples, conteining at their departure a ſtrength of ſix hundred horſemen, and foure thowſand footemen: by their example, the other bands of footemen departed after they had receiued the reward of their diſloyaltie: Onely to th Italians, nothing was neither giuen nor promiſed, And touching Franciſcomaria ouer whoſe ſauetie it ſeemed Monſr de Foix had a care particular, ſeeing him ſelfe now abandoned, challenged the benefit of the firſte peace, and went thorowe Romagnia and the country of Bolognia to Mantua, being accompanied with Federik de Boſſolo, an hundred horſe and ſix hundred footemen: In this ſort did ende the warre of Vrbyn, continued eyght monethes with great exſpenſes and ignominie to the Victors: on the Popes part were exſpended eyght hundred thowſand duckats, the greateſt maſſe whereof was drawne out of the common weale of Florence, for the authoritie he bare there at that time: And touching the Capteines to whom was referred the adminiſtracion of thoſe warres, there was heaped againſt them, great imputacion of cowardiſe, & of diſordered gouernment, adioyning to it want of ſinceritie or ſownd intencion: for that in the beginning of the warre when the forces of Lavvrence were mighty, and the power of thennemies in great weakenes, they neuer could vſe any occaſion, neither by apparant vallour, nor by their induſtrie, and much leſſe by their prouidence or forecaſt: To which beginnings drawing with them loſſe of their reputacion, negligence in diſcipline, and diſobedience of tharmie, were adioyned in the proceedings and further courſſe of the warre, want of many prouiſions in the campe: And at laſt fortune ſeeming to take her ſport and pleaſure vpon their errours, did by her working ſo heape calamities vppon their diſorders, that the affayres of the warres were reduced to theſe tearmes, that the Pope detecting the ſnares that were layd againſt his life, and being much ſhaked in the gouernment of the Church, and eftſoones fearing the eſtate of Florence, was conſtrained with peticions and new obligacions, to implore the aydes of all men: And yet he could not be deliuered from thoſe calamities, but by defraying of his owne treaſor vpon the armie of his enemies, And ſuch as either were the originall mouers of the warre, or els being enterteyned in his paye, had vilely reuolted againſt him, after they had vexed him with many extorcions.

In this yeare and almoſt in the end of the yeare, the king of Spayne, went with proſperous nauigacion, to take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms: he had obteyned before of the french king (betweene whome and him went many demonſtracions of amitie, both of them couering the ſecret intention of their minds) aſſurance that he would forbeare for ſix monethes, the firſt payment of an hundred thouſand duckets which he was bound to pay in by the articles of the laſte accord contracted betwene them: The Venetians alſo made a reconfirmation for two yeares, of the league defenſiue which they had with the French king, with whom as they ſtoode moſt firmely conioyned in the lawe of league and fidelitie, ſo in regarde of him they made ſmall accompt of the amitie of all other Princes: In ſo muche as they omitted to ſende Embaſſadors to preſent their obedience to the Pope, who hauing ſent Legat to Venice, Allobello Biſhop of Pola, it was imputed agaynſt him as a matter vnworthye his maieſtie.

There followeth nowe the yere a thouſande fiue hundred and eightene, in which the regions of Italie, contrarie the precedent of many yeares before, felt not the leaſt impreſſion or mocion of warre, yea there appeared the ſelfe ſame diſpoſition in all other Princes of Chriſtendome, betweene whome by the operation of the Pope, though happly more with fayre reaſons, then with ſubſtanciall counſels, was ſolicited an vniuerſall expedicion of all Chriſtendome agaynſt the pride of Selim prince of the Turkes, who the yeare before, had ſo enlarged and extended his greatnes, that comparing with his power, his ambicion to be greater, puſhed on with many helps of nature, it was worthily to be doubted that if he were not preuented by the inuaſions of the Chriſtians, he woulde in his pride lifte vp his victorious hande agaynſt them: For Selim diſcerning that Baiſeth his father, reduced to extreame olde age, ſought to eſtabliſhe the ſucceſſion of thempire in the perſon of Acomath his elder brother, drewe into rebellion agaynſt him, and by force of armes, concurring the corruption of the ſouldiors of his garde, conſtrayned him to reſigne vp to him the authoritie of the gouernment: And not ſuffring his ambition to ſtay there, it was beleeued of all men, that for his more abſolute aſſurance he tooke awaye his lyfe by poyſon: And afterwards giuing an ouerthrowe to his brother in an encounter of a battell, he confirmed fully the ſeate of his Empire, by depriuing him of his life in publike ſhowe, exerciſing the like rage of crueltie vpon Corcu the youngeſt brother of all: And being not ſatisfied according to the tyrannie of the houſe of Ottomanni, with the blood and ſlaughter of all his Nephewes, or any others that remayned of that line and ſtocke, he was in thought oftentimes (by the rage and furie of his diſpoſition) to take away the life of Solyman his onely ſonne. Of theſe beginnings breeding one warre vppon an other, after he had ſubdued the Aduliti a people of the Mountaynes, he paſſed ouer into Perſia agaynſt the Sophi, to whom he gaue battell and ouerthrewe him, and in that felicitie of warre he tooke the citie of Tauris the ſoueraigne ſeate of that ſtate, together with the greateſt parte of Perſia, whiche he was conſtrayned to abandon, not through the vallor of his enemies, who for their diſhabilitie to ſupport their army, were retyred into the mountaines and places deſert, but for the vniuerſall dearth and barennes of that yere, he fell into an extreame want of vittayles: He returned ſoone after this expedition to Conſtantinople, where after he had done execution vpon certayne ſouldiors ſedicious, and for certayne monethes had refreſhed his armie, he gaue out that he would eftſoones returne to make warre vppon Perſia, but in deede he turned his forces againſt the Soldan king of Soria and Egypt, a prince not onely of moſt auncient reuerence and dignitie for that religion, but moſte mightie for the amplitude of dominion, moſte riche in tributes, and very glorious by the diſcipline of the Mammeluckes, of whoſe armes and forces that ſtate was poſſeſſed with great reputation, three hundred yeares: for that

Empire

Empire,being ruled of the Soldans, they not by succeſſion but by election,aſcended to it, and to the ſupreme ſeate of gouernment were not preferred but men of manifeſt vertue, and confirmed by all the degrees of warre, in the adminiſtration of prouinces and armies,and alſo the ſinewes and ſtrength of their forces,ſtoode not vpon ſouldiors mercenarie and forreine, but of men elected, who taken of children in the prouinces adioyning, and trayned vp by ſucceſſion of yeares in hardnes of fare, in ſuffring of labour and toyle, and in thexerciſe of armes and all cuſtomes apperteining to the diſcipline and lawe of warre, they aſcribed and enrolled them in the order of the Mammelukes: There ſucceded from hand to hand in this order, not the ſonnes of the Mammelukes that were dead, but others, who beeing taken of children for ſlaues, had their ryſing by the ſame diſcipline, and by the ſame induſtrie and artes, by the which their predeceſſors had paſſed from hande to hande: Theſe not being in number aboue ſeuenteene or eighteene thouſande, helde ſubiected vnder a moſte heauy yoke,all the people of Egypt and Soria,whom they ſpoyled of the vſe of all armes, and practiſe to manage horſes: yea ſuche was their fierceneſſe and vallour, that oftentimes they made warre of them ſelues, for that of their numbers and by their election were choſen the Soldans, and in their power reſted all authoritie to diſtribute the honors, offices, and profites of that moſt riche Empire: By the oportunitie of which, hauing ſubdued many nations adioyning,and reduced to obedience the Arabians,and mainteined many warres with the Turkes,they were many times victorious, but very ſeldome or neuer vanquiſhed of others: Agaynſt theſe people did Selim conuert his forces,whō he ouerthrew in many battels fought in playne fielde, wherein was ſlayne the Soldane,and afterwards in an other battell was taken priſoner the other Soldane his ſucceſſor, whom he cauſed to be publikely murdered with an vnworthy kinde of torment: Thus hauing ſatisfied his bloody humor with theſe great ſlaughters,and almoſt waſted the name of the Mammelukes, he proceeded to the inuaſion of Cairo a moſt populous citie, wherein were reſident the Soldans, and in ſhort time ſubdued vnder his iuriſdiction all Soria and all Egypt: The ſame drawing vnto him ſo great an increaſe of imperie, ſuche amplification of tribute & reuenue,and remouing the impedimēts of ſo mightie enemies & of ſo great reputation, that with great reaſon he was to bee feared of the Chriſtians: A feare whiche tooke his degrees of increaſing by this conſideration, that to ſo greate a power and vallour was ioyned a ſettled impreſſion of ambicion to beare rule, and by many victories, to make glorious his name to all poſterities: wherein reading oftentimes the Legendes and actions of the great Alexander and Iulius Cæſar,he ſeemed to ſuffer griefe and perplexitie of mind,that his actions and exploytes of warre coulde in no wyſe holde compariſon with ſo many great triumphes and victories: In which humor,refuriſhing continually his armies, and buylding of newe a great number of ſhippes,and leauying all prouiſions neceſſarie for the warre,it was feared when his preparacions were accompliſhed, that he woulde inuade Rhodes, the bulwarke of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt partes, or els the kingdome of Hungaria made fearefull by the vallour of thinhabitantes to the nation of Turkes, whiche at that tyme was in diuiſion amongeſt them ſelues, and made weake by the minoritie of their king, who was gouerned by Prieſtes and the Barons of the Realme: Others were of opinion that he had addreſſed all his thoughtes to thinuaſion of Italie, taking his encouragement vpon the diſcord of the Potentates and naturall princes, whom he knewe to be muche ſhaken with the long warres of thoſe regions: To this was ioyned the memorie of Mahomet his grandfather, who with a power

farre leſſe then his, and with a ſmall Nauie ſente vppon the coaſtes of the Realme of Naples, had wonne by aſſault the Citie of Otronto: and, ſauing (he was preuented by death) had bothe opened the waye and eſtabliſhed the meane to perſecute the regions of Italie with continuall vexacions: So that the Pope together with the whole Courte of Rome beeing made aſtoniſhed with ſo greate ſucceſſe, and no leſſe prouident to eſchewe ſo great a daunger, making their firſte recourſe to the ayde and ſuccour of God, cauſed to bee celebrated through Rome moſte deuoute inuocations, whiche he dyd aſſiſte in preſence bare foote: And afterwardes calling vppon the helpe of men, he wroate letters to all Chriſtian Princes, bothe admoniſhing them of the perill, and perſwading them to laye aſyde all ciuill diſcordes and contentions, and attende ſpeedily to the defence of religion and their common ſafetie, whiche he affirmed woulde more and more take encreaſe of moſt grieuous daunger, if with the vnitie of mindes, and concordances of forces, they ſought not to transferre the warre into thempire of the Turkes, and inuade theyr enemie in his owne countrey: Vpon this aduiſe and admonition, was taken the examinacion and opinion of men of warre, and perſons skilfull in the diſcouerie of countreys, the diſpoſing of prouinces, and of the nature and vſage of the forces and weapons of that kingdome, and therevpon a reſolucion being ſet downe to make great leauyes of money by voluntarie contribucions of Princes, and vniuerſall impoſtes of all people of Chriſtendome, it was thought neceſſarie that Cæſar accompanied with the horſemen of Hungaria and Pollonia, Nations warlike, and practiſed in continuall warres agaynſt the Turke, and alſo with the footmen of Germanie, ſhould ſayle along Danubi into Boſsina called aunciently Miſia, and from thence to Thracia, and ſo to drawe neare Conſtantinople, the ſeate of the Empire of the Ottomanes: That the Frenche king with all the forces of his kingdome, the Venetians, and the other potentates of Italie, accompanied with the infanterie of Swvizzerlande, ſhould paſſe from the port of Brindiſi in Albania a paſſage very eaſie and ſhort, to inuade Greece, a contrey full of Chriſtian inhabitantes, and for the intollerable yoke of the Turkes, moſte ready to rebell: That the kings of Spayne, of Englande, and Portugall, aſſembling their forces together in Cartagenia and the portes thereaboutes, ſhould take their courſe with two hundred ſhippes full of Spaniſhe footemen and other ſouldiors, to the ſtraite of Galipoli, to make roades vp to Conſtantinople, hauing firſt ſubdued the Caſtles and fortes ſtanding vpon the mouth of the ſtraite: And the Pope to take the ſame courſe, embarking at Ancona with an hundred ſhippes armed: With theſe preparacions, ſeeming ſufficient to couer the lande and ouerſpread the ſea, it was thought that of a warre ſo full of deuocion and pyetie, there coulde not be but hoped a happie ende, ſpecially adding the inuocation of God, and ſo many ſeuerall inuaſions made at one tyme agaynſt the Turkes, who make their principall fundacion of defence, to fight in the playne fielde: Theſe matters were ſolicited with no ſmall induſtrie, and to ſtoppe all matter of imputacion agaynſt thoffice of the Pope, the mindes of Princes were throughly ſounded, and an vniuerſal truce for fiue yeres betwene all the Princes of Chriſtendome, publiſhed in the conſiſtory, vpon payne of moſt grieuous cenſure to ſuche as ſhould impugne it: So that the negociacion cõtinuing for all things apperteining to ſo great an enterpriſe, he aſſigned Embaſſadors to all Princes: to the Emperour he ſent the Cardinall S. Siſto, to the Frenche king he diſpatched the Cardinall of S. Maria in Portico, the Cardinall Giles to the king of Spayne, and the Cardinall Campeius to the king of Englande: All Cardinalles of authoritie, eyther for their experience in affayres, or for opinion of their doctrine, or for their familiaritie with the Pope: All which things albeit they were begonne with greate hope and exſpectacion, And the vniuerſall truce accepted of all men, And all men with no litle oſtentacion and brauerie of words, made ſhewe of their readines with their forces to aduaunce ſo good a cauſe: yet, what with the conſideracion of the perill eſteemed vncerteine and farre of, and extending more to one Prince then to an other, And what by the difficulties & long tract of time that appeared, to introduce a zeale and vnion ſo vniuerſall, priuat intereſts and reſpects perticular ſeemed to preuayle more, then the pietie of the expedicion: Inſomuch as the negociacion ſtoode not onely naked of all hope and yſſue, but alſo it was followed very lightly and as it were by ceremonie, this beeing one propertie in the nature of men, that thoſe things which in their beginnings appeare fearefull, doe daily take ſuch degrees of diminucion and vaniſhing, that onles the firſt feares be reuiued by new accidents, they leade men in proceſſe of tyme to ſecuritie: which propertie of negligence, both touching the affayres publike, & affection of priuate and perticular men, was well confirmed by the death that ſucceeded not longe after to Selym, who, hauing by a longe maladie ſuſpended the preparacions of the warre, was in the ende conſumed by the paſſions of his diſeaſe, and ſo paſſed into the other life, leauing ſo greate an Empire to Solyman his ſonne, young in yeares, and iudged to beare a witte and minde not ſo diſpoſed to the warres, although afterwardes theffectes declared the contrarie. At this tyme, appeared betweene the Pope and the Frenche kinge, A moſte greate and ſtrayght coniunction: for, the kinge gaue to wife to Lavvrence, his Nephewe, the Ladye Magdaleyne noblye deſcended of the bludde and houſe of Bolognia, with a yearely reuenue of tenne thowſande crownes, whereof parte was of the kinges gifte, and the reſidue riſing of her owne patrimonye: Beſides, the kinge hauing borne to him a ſonne, the Pope requyred that in his Baptiſme, he woulde impoſe vppon him his name: By which occaſion Lavvrence making preparacions to goe to marye his newe wife, for his more ſpeede, performed his iorney by poſte into Fraunce, where he was receiued with many amities and much honor of the king, to whom he became very gracious & of deare accompt, the rather for that beſides other general reſpects, he made a dedication of him ſelfe wholly to the king, with promiſe to follow in all accidents, his fortune: he brought alſo to the king a writ or warrant from the Pope, by the which he graunted to him, that till the moneyes collected of the tenthes and by other meanes of contribucion, were expended vppon the holy warre againſt the Turkes, he might diſpoſe it to his owne vſes, ſo farre forth as he would make promiſe to reſtore it whenſoeuer occaſion & neceſſitie would call him to defray it to that end it was gathered for: his warrant boare alſo to deliuer to Lavvrence of the ſame treaſure, fifty thouſand crownes: And whereas the king till that day had diſſembled not to execute the Popes promiſe made to him vnder writing for the reſtoring of Modena and Reggia to the Duke of Ferrara, notwithſtanding the tearme of ſeuen moneths were paſt, And knowing withall that he could not offer to the Pope a thing more greuous, then to vrge him to that reſtitucion, he redeliuered into the hands of Lavvrence, the ſaid writ of promiſe, making a greater reckoning (as it often hapneth amõgeſt mortall men) of the ſtronger then of the weaker. About the ſame time, the Venetians by the operacion of the French king, prolonged the truce they had with Cæſar for fiue yeares, with condicion to paye for euery one of the fiue yeares twentye thowſande crownes, and to euery one of the exiles that had followed Cæſar, the fourth parte of their goods yearely beeing rated at the value of fiue thowſande crownes: it was ſuppoſed that Cæſar would haue bene induced to haue made peace with them, if they would haue gratified him with a greater ſumme of money.

But this truce was not a litle agreeable to the french king, for that the Venetians not ſtanding fully aſſured, had the greater reaſon to make deare accompt of his amitie, and that to Cæſar was giuen no power, with the money he had of them, to dreſſe any innouacion: Inſomuch as matters on all ſides, tending to peace and concord, the differences betwene the French and Engliſh were alſo reconciled: And for the more ſtabilitie of which agreement, it was confirmed with a contract of parentage & allyance, wherein the king of England promiſed to giue his onely Daughter, to whom hauing no ſonnes, there was hope of the diſcending and ſucceſſion of the kingdom, to the Dolphyn the eldeſt ſonne of the crowne of Fraunce, Adding for a porcion foure hundred thowſand duckats: Both the one and the other boare yet ſo tender age, that infinit accidents might happen, before perfection of yeares woulde make them able to eſtabliſh matrimony: There was made betwene them a league defenſiue, wherein were comprehended Cæſar and the king of Spayne in caſe they would ratifie it in a certeine tyme: The king of England bownd him ſelfe to reſtore Tornay, receiuing preſently for defrayments exſpended vppon that towne, two hundred and lx. thowſande duckats, and three hundred thowſande to be defalked of the porcion, and to paye three hundred thowſand more in the ſpace of twelue yeares: The French king alſo was bownd that if the peace and the parentage followed not, to render vppe agayne into the handes of thEngliſh, the towne of Tornay: Many Embaſſadors were ſent from both the Realmes to negociat this league, and to receiue the ratificacions and othes, by whome in the Courts of both the kinges the actes of thaccorde were diſpatched with greate ſolemnitie and ceremonie, with a reſolucion of an enteruiewe of bothe the kinges betweene Callice and Bolleyne, immediatly after the reſtitucion of Tornay. About the ſame tyme, the Daughter of the French king appoynted to bee maryed to the king of Spayne, beeing deade, the former peace and capitulacion was eftſoones reconfirmed betweene them, wherein was promiſed the mariage of the ſeconde Daughter of Fraunce: Both the kinges celebrated this coniunction with moſte greate demonſtracions of perfect amitie: for, the king of Spayne, hauing payed in at Lyons an hundred thowſand duckats, ware publikely the order of Saint Michaell vppon the daye of the celebracion of the ſame, and in recompenſe of that honour, the Frenche kinge, vppon the daye dedicated to Saint Andrewe, was honorably attyred in the robes and couller of the golden fleeſe.

Thus the affayres of Italy ſtanding in good eſtate of tranquillitie, there remeyned onely diſcontented and in ill diſpoſicion, Iohn Ia. Triuulce, whom neither his olde age reduced almoſt to the laſt time, nor his vertue ſo oftentimes expreſſed in the ſeruice of the houſe of Fraunce, could any way aide or comfort: for, as in him ſelfe were bred ſome occaſions, partly by his ambicion, which was ſuſpected, and partly through his impaciencie, which the condicion of olde age might reaſonably excuſe: So he was croſſed by the ſuttle humors of ſuche as did enuye him, but chiefly and vehemently quarrelled withall in many thinges by Monſr Lawtrech, by whoſe inſtigacion, the king was drawne into ſuſpicion of him, that not onely his owne perſon but alſo the whole famulie and houſe, were too much agreeable to the Venetians: Wherein they tooke the conſideracion of their ſuſpicion, not onely for thintereſt of the faction of the Guelffes, and many other actions and tradicions of times paſt to kepe him enterteined in the grace of the Venetians, but alſo for that Theoder Triuulce was become their gouernor, and Rene a member of their family, was newly receiued into the pay of that ſtate: By reaſon of which, after Galeas Viſcount by the death of Fr. Barnardin Viſcount, was become chiefe of the Gebelin faction, the king indued him with thorder of S. Michaell and allowance of penſiõ, to thend to oppoſe him againſt Triuulce with a greater authority, hauing withall the ready hand of Lavvtrech to puſh on his reputacion & credit as often as occaſions occurred to doe any thing to the diſaduantage of Triuulce: The paſſage of which things as they brought no litle diminucion to the authority of the old Triuulce, ſo, hauing no pacience to diſſemble the wrongs which he knew he had not deſerued, he made his daily cõplaints, & was ſo much the more hated & ſuſpected: Lavvtrech with his other aduerſaries made this no litle occaſion to reproch him and accuſe him to the king, that he had made him ſelfe a burgeis inrolled with the Svvizzers, as though he woulde vſe their meane to be ſupported againſt the king, & happly aſpire to greater things: ſo apt is enuy to ſubborne ſuggeſtions, & ſo ready to enforce them daungerouſly to the ruine of thoſe againſt whom ſhe contendeth: and as Triuulce, notwithſtanding his old age which was now in theſtate decrepit, & thinfirmities of a body broken which draweth after it diſpenſacion from trauel, was gone into Fraunce to iuſtefie himſelfe: ſo, Monſr Lavvtrech after his departure, reſtrained vnder reaſonable gard by the kings directiõ at Vigeuena, his wife & grãdchild borne of the Count of Muſocque his only ſonne deceaſed, which degree of rigor or hard dealing, was wel expreſſed vpon himſelf at his cõming into Fraunce, for that muche leſſe that he was receiued of the king with the ſame aſpect, countenance, & honor that he was wont, ſeeing of the cõtrary he reproched to his face, his amity & correſpondency with the Svvizzers, aſſuring him that no other thing held him from puniſhing him as he had deſerued, then the conſideracion of thuniuerſall renowme that ran (though not true in many partes) of the merits & ſeruices he had done to the crowne of Fraunce: vpon the kings diſpleaſure which cõmonly worketh many daungerous impreſſions in the mindes of men, he renounced & diſclaimed al ſociety & introduction with the Svvizzers: and not many dayes after, following the court, he fell ſicke at Chartres, where he gaue vp to the king, his innocency and complaintes, and made to God the laſt reckoning of his aged daies: he was a man in the iudgement of many, & cõfirmed by ſundrie experiẽces, of ſingular vallour in the diſcipline of warre, & ran a race alwayes oppoſed to thinconſtancy of fortune, who according to her mutability, made him feele thoperaciõ of both her humors, ſomtimes reioiſing in her fauor, & earſt again finding her ſower & of bitter taſt: By his cõmaũdement were written vpon his tombe, theſe words not diſagreable to the condicion & courſe of his life: I find the reſt vvithin my graue, vvhich in my life I could not haue.

The death of Ioh. Ia. Triuulce.

About this time, Cæſar deſiring after his death to eſtabliſhe the ſucceſſion of the Romaine Empire in the perſon of one of his grandchildren, treated with the electors to chooſe one of them king of Romains, a dignity which draweth with it an immediat ſucceſſion to the Empire after thEmperours death, without other election or confirmacion: And bicauſe none can aſpire to ſuche election, vntill thEmperour elect haue obteyned the Crowne Imperiall, he made inſtance to the Pope that by a newe example, he woulde accompliſhe his Cronacion in Germanie by the handes and deputacion of certeyne Cardinalls Legats Apoſtolyke for that action: And albeit Cæſar had affore wiſhed that that dignitie might be transferred to Ferdinand his grandchilde as a degree to ſupporte him, the elder hauing diuolued to him ſo greate a puiſſance of eſtates, and albeit he iudged that for the better continuaunce of his houſe in fame and honor and to meete with all ill accidentes that

runne vpon the eldeſt,it were better that two perſonages were great then one alone: yet what by the operacion of many his Courtiers,and by the perpetuall labor of the Cardinall of Syon, and laſtly by the ſuborned importunities of ſuche as feared and hated the puiſance of Fraunce, he reiected the firſt councell, and diſpoſed all his meanes to haue the king of Spayne elected to that dignity: wherein he was perſwaded that it would be farre more profitable for the houſe of Auſtrich, to aſſemble and draw into one alone, all power and greatnes, then in canuaſing and deuiding it into many partes, to make that family leſſe mighty to obteine the iſſue of their purpoſes: That the fundacions of the greatnes of Charles were ſuche & ſo mighty, that adding the dignity Imperiall, there was great hope, that he might reduce into one monarchie all Italie and a great parte of Chriſtendom: An action not onely apperteyning to the greatnes of his progeny and deſcendants, but alſo agreable to the tranquilitie of his ſubiects, and for the regard of the infidells, moſt conformable to the benefite of the common weale of Chriſtendom: That it belonged to him in office & equity to lay for thaugmentacion & exaltacion of the dignity Imperiall which had bene ſo many yeares inueſted in his perſon and his houſe of Auſtrich, and which till that day, both by his weakenes and infirmitie of his predeceſſors, had bene greater in title and name then in ſubſtance and effects: That there was no hope of the riſing of that dignity, or to reinueſt in it his auncient renowme, then by tranſporting it into the perſon of Charles and annexing it to his power: That ſeeing the humor of the time preſented to him thoccaſion, wherein alſo did concurre the order of nature and of fortune, it ought to be farre from him to ſtop or hinder the courſe of ſo many helps, to aduaunce & lift vp the greatnes of his houſe: That it was ſeene by examples and tradicions of auncient Emperours, that Cæſar Auguſtus and many of his ſucceſſors, for want of ſonnes or other iſſue of their line, haue ſearched by meane of adoption for ſucceſſors very farre remoued from their alliance, yea ſuch as touched them nothng in blood and kinred wherin they were caried by a naturall gelouſie lineally diſcending from one to an other, that the dignitie which had bene ſo long reſident in their perſons, ſhould not be ſeparate or decline to diminucion: That the example was familiar of the king Catholike, who albeit he loued as his ſonne, Ferdinand who had bene alwayes trayned vp about him, and neuer ſeeing Charles, but found him in his laſt age, very diſobedient to his commaundements: yet without hauing compaſſion of the pouertie of him whom he loued as his ſonne, he neuer imparted with him any one of thoſe eſtates which he helde, nor of ſuch as he might diſpoſe by the right & prerogatiue of conqueſt, but left all to him whom he ſcarcely knew but as a ſtraũger: That he would remember how the ſame king would alwayes vrge him to purchaſe new eſtats for Ferdinand, but to leaue the dignity Imperiall to Charles: & that it was ſeene that for thaugmentacion of the greatnes of his ſucceſſor, he had, perhaps with a councel reproued of many & happily vniuſt, deueſted frõ the kingdom of Aragon, his proper houſe, & conſented againſt the common deſire of moſt men, that the name of his houſe ſo noble and renowned, ſhould fall into obſcurity & perdicion. Againſt this inſtance of Cæſar, the french king oppoſed him ſelfe with all induſtrie and meanes poſſible, taking not a litle diſpleaſure and enuie that to ſo many kingdoms and great eſtates holden by the ſpaniſh, there ſhould be added the dignitie Imperiall, which reſuming a certaine vigor and ſtrength for ſo great a puiſance, might ſubdue all others vnder his feare and iuriſdiction: he made ſecret ſolicitacion to all the electors, to ſtoppe the effect of ſuch an ambicion: he ſtoode vpon inſtance to the Pope not to ſend with an example new and daungerous, the Crowne to Maximilian:

The french aſpireth to be Emperour.

milian: And he sent Embassadors to the Venetians, to induce them to hinder it with the Pope, whom he admonished of the perills that might fall vpon them both by the course of suche a greatnes: But the Electors for the moste parte were already drawne to the opinion of Cæsar, and no lesse assured of the summes of money promised thē for that election by the king of Spayne, who for that purpose had sent into Germanie two hundred thousande duckets: Neither could they in reason, nor happly without daunger of slaunder in regarde of thexamples paste, denie him suche a demaunde: Besides, it was not to be beleeued that the Pope (notwithstanding it was discontenting to him) would refuse to agree that Cæsar should receiue in Germany by the ministration of Legates Apostolike, the Crowne imperiall in his name, seing that to make a voyage to Rome to be crowned, albeit it brought a greater authoritie to the sea Apostolike, yet in all other regardes, it was a matter rather ceremonious then substanciall. With these impressions and with these accidentes, ended the yere a thousande fiue hundred and eightene, and as the Electors had not yet resolued and established the deliberation, so it was made both more doubtfull and full of difficulties, by the death of Cæsar which happned in the first beginning of the yere following: he dyed at Liuz a towne vpon the marches of Austriche, where he remay- 1519 ned for the delight and pleasure in hunting the wilde Boare and other chases of the fielde: He liued alwayes vnder one condition of fortune, who many times fauored him in offring him many fayre occasions, and as often wrought agaynst him in not suffering him to take the fruite and effect of them: He was by nature inconstant and remouable, and had conceites and impressions very yll disposed and different from the iudgement of other men, ioyned to an excessiue prodigalitie and dissipacion of money: Matters which cut off from him theffects and successe of al occasions, being otherwise a prince most perfect and instructed in the ordering of warre, secrete to laye and dispose a plotte, diligent to followe it, of body hable and suffring, of minde affable and easie, and replenished with many other excellent giftes and ornaments. Assone as he was dead, the French king and the king of Spayne, began manifestly to aspire to thempire, the purchase whereof albeit was a matter of right great importance, and no lesse the emulacion ronning betwene two so mighty Princes, yet they ordered their ambicion with great modestie, neyther vsing wordes of iniurie nor threates of armes, but eyther one laboring by his authoritie and by his meanes, to drawe on his side the Electors: The Frenche king sundry times reasoned touching thelection with great comelynesse with the Spanishe Embassadors, to whome he sayde it was a matter both agreable and conuenient, that eyther of them seuerally should seke by honest meanes to encrease the honor of his house by so great a dignitie: which for that in tymes before had bene transferred into the famulies of their predecessors, there was now the lesse occasion to breede betwene them two, matter of iniurie, nor diminution of their amitie and goodwill: But rather he wished that in the action of thempire they might followe thexample and order of two young louers, who albeit they followe the queste of one Lady, and eyther one laboreth by his industrie to cary her, yet they forbeare to come to contention: The king of Spayne alluded with good right that thempire apperteined to him, as hauing continued by a long succession of time in the house of Austriche, and that it had not bene the custome of the Electors to depriue the issue of themperour without manifest cause of their dishabilitie, neither was there any in Germanie of that puissance and authoritie to make him equall to stande competitor with him in that election: And east of all did he holde it iuste or likely that the Electors would transport to a forreine or ſtraunge Prince, ſo great a dignitie continued by ſo many ages in the nation of Germanie: And albeit ſome particuler amongſt them, eyther through the inſinuation of money, or other propertie of corruption, might be allured to an other intention, yet he hoped to ſtoppe him with force prepared in time conuenient, not douting alſo but the other Electors would oppoſe agaynſt him, and the princes and free townes of Germanie would not endure ſo vniuerſall an infamie, ſpecially to ſuffer it to be layde vpon the perſon of the French king, which would be no other thing then to make great the puiſſance of a king enemie to their nation, and from whome there was no ſurety that thimperiall dignitie would euer returne into Germanie: he thought it would be an action eaſie to obteine and reduce to perfection, that which had bene ſolicited by his grandfather, who had already compounded for recompenſes and donations, and other diuidentes for euery of the Electors. On the other ſide, the deſire of the French king was as great, and no leſſe were his hopes, whiche tooke their principall fundation vpon an opinion he had to corrupt the voyces of the Electors with his huge ſummes of mony, eſpecially for that there were amongſt them both penſionaries to him, and otherwiſe aſſured by many good offices, who incouraging him with the facilitie of thenterpriſe, puſhed him on to embrace it: And for his parte, as mortall men are apt to beleeue the thing they deſire, ſo he noriſhed that hope with reaſons rather apparant then true: he knewe that commonly it was a matter grieuous to the Princes of Germanie to haue themperours mightie, being ielouſe that in ſo great a puiſſance, they would not eyther in part or in all, quarrell the iuriſdictions and authorities imperiall occupied by many of them: In which reaſon he perſwaded himſelfe, that they would in no ſort conſent to thelection of the Spaniard, and ſo of them ſelues to ſubiect themſelues to an Emperor more mightie then had bene ſince a long diſcent and race of Emperours: A matter which in his perſon ſeemed to be qualified, for that hauing neyther eſtates nor auncient alliances in Germanie, they had no occaſion of ſuſpicion of his greatnes: The ſame reaſon alſo made him beleue wel of the cõformitie of the free townes, in whõ much leſſe that the regarde of the glorie of the nation would carie it from him, ſeeing it would helpe to peize the ballance on his ſide, for that with moſte men the mocions of proper and priuate intereſt may do more, then the reſpect of publike and generall profite: He knewe it was not a little greeuous to many noble houſes of Germanie, pretending to be capable of ſuche a dignitie, to ſee thempire continue ſo long time in one houſe, but muche more did it diſcontent them to ſuffer that ſo great an eſtate which of right ought ſometimes to be giuen to one of them, and ſometimes to paſſe to an other, ſhould become a perpetuall diſcent and ſucceſſion in one line: In ſo muche as they might call inheritance and ſucceſſion that election, whiche durſt not leaue the lyne of themperours: That in that ſort thempire was tranſlated from Albert d'Auſtriche to Federike his brother, and from Federike to Maximilian his ſonne, and nowe there was deuiſe to paſſe it from Maximilian to the perſon of Charles his grandchilde. By theſe humors and indignations of the Princes of Germanie he tooke hope that the diſcordes and ielouſies amongeſt themſelues mighte helpe on his cauſe, the rather for that it often happneth in the contentions of men, that he that is excluded, or the partie whom he fauoreth, ronneth with a naturall raſhnes rather to call in and aduaunce a thirde, then to giue place to him that hath oppoſed agaynſt his intention: Moreouer the Frenche king was not without hys hopes in the fauor of the Pope, both in regarde of thamitie and alliance newly paſt betwene them, and alſo for that he was not ignorant howe inconuenient it woulde

be to the sea Apostolike to haue thimperiall Crowne inuested in Charles, nor so muche for his owne greatnes, as for that by the oportunitie and neighborhood of the realme of Naples to thestate of the Churche, and the adherencie of the Barons of the Gebelins, he had a playne and open passage to ronne vp to the gates of Rome: But in that discourse he considered not that the same reason whiche he iudged true agaynst Charles, was also agaynst himselfe, for that thempire being ioyned to his person, he was no lesse to be feared of the Pope and all others, then Charles, for that though the one of them possessed happly more realmes and states, yet the other was not to be lesse esteemed, hauing his power not dispersed nor seperate in many places, but was Prince of a realme entierly assembled and vnited, where the obedience and fidelitie of his subiectes was no lesse wonderfull, then his treasor and riches infinite: Neuertheless not knowing in himselfe that which he considered in an other, he had recourse to the Pope, and implored his fauor vnder the offer and protestation of his person and kingdomes, with all other deuotions of a louing sonne. The matter of this election pressed muche the Pope, to whom it was not a litle grieuous, both for the suretie of the sea Apostolike, and tranquillitie of Italie, that eyther of those two kings should be elected Emperor: And as his authoritie with the Electors was not suche as he might hope to drawe them muche to his purpose, so he iudged it necessarie to take a wyse course, and to vse industrie in a matter that drewe so great consequence: He perswaded him selfe that the French king being abused by some of the electors, would haue litle part in the election, and that the corruptions in men salable would not be sufficient to transport thempire from the Germaine nation to the house of Fraunce: But he supposed the action would be easie to the king of Spayne, both for the conformitie of language and nation, and for the practises and solicitations begon with Maximilian, and for many other regards, yea he thought he might easily leade on his intention, if he obiected no impediment: A matter which he sawe he could not worke in other sort, then to labor the Frenche king to turne vpon the person of one of the selfe electors the same fauors and distributions of money, which he aduaunced to procure his owne election: But he esteemed it a matter impossible to induce the kings minde to take that course, so long as he stoode caryed with the vehement humor of vayne hopes: And as he hoped that by howe muche more earnestly he should embarke him selfe into that practise, by so muche more easily should he drawe the French king to fauor the election of a third, with no lesse affection then he had sought to aduaunce his owne: so he doubted not that vnder that dealing he might not winne so muche with the king as to bring him to receyue and heare his authoritie and counsell, especially hauing insinuated in him a credence certayne to be his friend, and to haue with him the same desire to aduaunce his election: Besides, he thought that in fauoring at the beginning the affayres of the French king, the king of Spayne finding difficultie to obteine his desire, and fearing least the French would winne some aduauntage, woulde in like sorte dispose him selfe to elect a thirde: For which reasons he did not onely signifie to the French king with what affection he wished he were lifted to thempire, but he counselled him with many reasons to proceede resolutely in thenterprise, promising him vnder large wordes, to fauor him with the whole authoritie of the sea Apostolike: And as he thought he could not in better sort imprint in the kinges minde the sincerite of his intention, then to vse for that purpose an instrument whom the French king would thinke depended more vpon him then of any other, he gaue present direction to his Nuncio in Germanie called Robert Vrsin Archbishop of Reggia, and of great confidence with the king, that both seuerally and ioyntly with the French Agents there, he should make the best labor he could to solicite the electors: But he diminished the libertie of this commission by secrete aduertisement, that the Nuncio should proceede eyther more or lesse moderately, according as he founde in Germanie the Electors disposed, and the affayres aduaunced. These actions discretly discoursed by the Pope, and no lesse couered with a wonderful simulation, stoode in neede, aswell for the person of the king as in his Agents in Germanie, of a greater wisedome and secretie, and in the Popes ministers a more fidelitie and grauitie.

But whyleſt theſe matters tooke their proceedings by practiſes and by armes, the French king gaue direction to Peter of Nauarre to go to the sea with a Nauie of xx. gallies and other vessells fraughted with a thousande souldiors: his commission was to lye to impeache the piracies and inrodes of the Mores, who hauing with their foystes ronne into oure seas without impediment, became more harmefull this yeare then at anye time before: His commission bare also to inuade the Mores of Affrika if the Pope thought it so good: But the principall respect and intention of this expedition was, to take away from the Pope (who was wholly for him in the chalenge of thempire) all occasion not to feare the forces of the king Catholike, who more for feare to be troubled in his owne estates, then for desire to vex any other, leauyed with great preparations an army by sea, to sende it out for the garding of the realme of Naples. And yet notwithstanding, amidde these distrustes and suspicions, both the kings continuing in demonstrations and fayre semblances of amitie, there was sent from them seuerally and in particular, to Montpellier, the greate maister of Fraunce & the lorde of Cheures, in the seuerall persons of whom consisted almoste all the counsells and intentions of their kinges: Their negociation tended partly to confirme the mariage of the seconde daughter of Fraunce with the king of Spayne, and partly to resolue the affayres of the kingdome of Naples, the restitucion of which albeit being promised to thauncient king in thaccorde made at Noyon, though much solicited by the French king, was tyll that day deferred by the king of Spayne, with diuerse cunning excuses: But this entercouncell and meeting was dashed, by the accident of death happning to the great Maister, who was taken away affore they assembled.

In this time dyed Lavvrence Medicis, who had languished in a continuall sicknes euer since his returne from Fraunce, where he had consummated his mariage with a wretched prediction by the death of his wife, who not many dayes before, and after her deliuery of childe, was reuoked out of this worlde, leauing him behinde to take warning of his mortall ende by her going before to prepare his waye: By the death of Lavvrence, the Pope standing desirous to keepe conioyned so long as he lyued, the power of the Florentins with the estate of the Churche, woulde take no counsell of certayne his familiar friendes, who aduised him, that since of the line Masculine there remayned no more (except himselfe) of the lawfull descendantes of Cosmo de Medicis the first founder of that greatnes, he would reenlarge and restore the lybertie of his countrey: But with a counsell singular and particular, he preferred the Cardinall Medicis to thadministration of that estate, eyther in an ambicious humor to perpetuate the name of his house, or for a reuenging hatred norished by his exile agaynst the name of that common weale: And iudging that the Duchie of Vrbin, for the vniuersall loue which the people bare to their auncient Duke, would hardly be holden vnder the name of the onely daughter remayning of Lavvrence, who was

comprehended in the inueſtiture of her father, he rendred it together with Pezero & Sinigalo, to the ſea apoſtolike: which ſeeming not ſufficient to repreſſe the vehement affection of the peoples, he threw downe to the earth, the walls of the city of Vrbin & the other principal places of that Duchy, except Agobbio: a city which, for the geloufie it had ouer the city of Vrbin, bore no great inclination to Franciſcomaria, he fauored, & reſtored it to reputaciō, induing it with a chiefe iuriſdiction & principallity ouer all that Duchy: And to weaken it ſo much the more, he gaue to the Florentins in recompenſe of the money exſpended by him in the warre of Vrbin for the which he before had reduced the chamber Apoſtolike, as detter to the ſtate of Florence, the fortreſſe of S. Leo with all Montfeltro and the pariſhes of Seſtine which were alwaies of the demaine of Seſena: The Florentins were not wel contented with this maner of ſatisfaction, and yet they had no meane to oppoſe againſt his authoritie and will.

Let vs eftſones returne to the chalenge or ſute for the Empire, which holding all Chriſtendom in ſuſpenſe, was purſued by both the kings with more ambition then euer: The french king was beguiled more and more vnder the inducements & great promiſes of the Marquis of Branderburg, one of the electors, who was allured with no ſmall offers of money and happly ſome round ſumme in preſt, for the which he did not only bind him ſelfe with ſecret capitulacions, to giue him his voyce, but alſo to make for him and on his ſide his brother th Archbiſhoppe of Magence, one of the three prelate electors: The king in like ſorte promiſed him ſelfe muche of an other parte of the electors, and in caſe it came to an equalitie of voyces, he hoped not a litle in the voice of the king of Boheme, by the voice of whom the controuerſie was to be decided if the ſix electors whereof iij. be eccleſiaſtike & iij. ſecular, were diſcordant: Therefore the frenche king ſent to th Admirall, who was gone before into Germanie to ſolicite the action, a great quantity of money to be diſtributed amongeſt the electors: And as he vnderſtand that many of the free townes together with the Duke of VVittemberg gaue out threates againſt thoſe that ſought to tranſport the dignitie of the Empire into the perſon of ſtraungers, for the which they made leauies of men of warre: ſo he forgat not to collect great prouiſions of money and treaſor, to thende that both with corruption & armes, he might oppoſe againſt ſuch as put the electors in feare to make choice of him: But great was th inclination of the people of Germanie to keepe reteined the Imperial maieſty within the compaſſe of that nation, yea it concerned & ran euen amongſt the cōmunities of the Svvizzers, who for the loue they bare to their common contrie of Germanie, beſought the Pope, that in the election, he would not beare fauor to any that were not of the natural language of Germanie: Neuertheleſſe the Pope perſeuered to puſh on the french king, hoping that for thoſe degrees & demonſtracions of his affection towards him, he would at leaſt be brought to heare & take councel of him with greater credit & faith: vnder which councell followed with other reaſons, he labored in the ende to perſwade the king, that ſhaking of all hope from him ſelfe to be elected, he would worke with the ſame inſtance & importunity, to transferre the election to the perſon of ſome other of the Princes of Germanie: A councell that ſerued to ſmall purpoſe, for that th Admirall & Robert Vrſin, being cūningly caried ouer with the promiſes of ſuch, as, to make them ſelues rich with the money of Fraunce, fedde them with intencions very certeine and pleaſing, the one being of a french nature & the kings ſeruant, & the other bearing a light & vnſtayed condicion, and deſirous to win grace with the king: conſumed him dayly more and more with vaine aduertiſements increaſing his hope to cary the election: with theſe practiſes and operacions of money & ſiniſter meanes, the Princes, to whom not more by antiquitie of custome or well grounded reason, then through permission and priuileage, or rather dispensacion of Pope Gregorie the fift a Germain of nation, belongeth the power to elect themperor of Rome, went according to that auncient vsage, to Franckfort a towne of lowe Germanie, where, as they contended vpon many poyntes and differences touching the proceding to the election in time due, obseruing their ordinances: They were aduertised of an army put already to the fielde by the king of Spayne, who was more carefull to wage souldiours with money, then to exspende his treasor in symonie and corruption vppon the electors: This armie approching neare the towne of Franckfort, vnder title to bridle all such as should offer force to the action of election, brought no small encouragement to those Electors who fauoured his cause, reduced to his parte those that stoode doubtfull, and so astonished the Marquis of Brandenberg, who was for the French king, that both dispayring of the concurrance of other Electors, and also glad to auoyde the hatred and vniuersall infamie of the whole nation, he had no hart to discouer his intention: So that comming at last to the act of election Charles d'Austriche king of Spayne was elected Emperour the xxviij. of Iune by the full voyces of these foure electors, the Archbishop of Maience, tharchbishop of Colleine, the Count Palatine, and the duke of Saxon: The Archbishop of Treues chooseth the Marquis of Brandenberg, who was also concurrant in the election of him selfe: But touching Charles it is not to be doubted, that if by equalitie of voyces the election had bene passed ouer to the gratification of the seuenth elector, that he had not bene also called, for that Levvis the king of Boheme who was also king of Hungrie, had promised his voyce to Charles.

Charles the fift chosen Emperour.

This election pulled downe marueilously the hart of the French king, and no lesse abated the reputation of all those that in Italie had their exspectation and dependancie of him: And on the other side, it rayseth into courage and stomacke all such as were occupied with hopes and thoughtes contrarie, seeing transferred and conioyned so great a power, in the person of one onely prince, whose youth and other apparances made showe of great effectes of ambicion in him, besides that there was promised and propheseid vpon him by many predictions, a right great & large empire, together with many worldly fortunes and felicities: And albeit he was not so riche in treasor and money as was the French king, yet it was noted in him a matter of right great importance, to be hable to furnishe his armies with footemen of Svvizzers, Germains, and Spaniards, people for their vallour, of great glorie and reputation through the world: A matter wherein he had a singular aduantage of the French king, who for that he had not in his kingdome a strength of footmen to oppose agaynst the vertue of these, had no meane to make strong warre, but by drawing with great expences and intollerable difficulties, bandes of footemen out of forreine contreis: A necessity which cõstrained him to enterteine with great charge and diligence, the nation of Svvizzers, and to endure of them many iniuries, and yet he neuer stoode fully assured neyther of their constancie nor of their fidelitie. Moreouer it was not to be doubted that betwene these two Princes of equall youth and ambicion, and hauing indifferent reasons and occasions of ielousie and contencion, would not in the ende arise a great and daungerous warre: for the French king was not without a burning desire to recouer the kingdome of Naples, to the whiche he aspired and pretended iust title: and he tooke greatly to hart the restoring of king Iohn to the realme of Nauarre, touching the which he nowe discerned that he had bene fed with vaine hopes. It troubled the Emperour to pay the hundred thousande

duckets promiſed in the accord of Noyon, and he interpreted agaynſt the king that in reiecting thaccord made before at Paris, and vſing immoderatly thoccaſion when he was to paſſe into Spayne, he had almoſt forced him to make a new accorde: Beſides, the cauſe of the duke of Gueldres was greene and freſh betwene them, A matter of it ſelfe without any other concurrancie, ſufficient to ſtirre them vp to warre & armes, for that as the French king on the one ſide had taken him into his protection, ſo on the other ſide he was holden by the people of Flaunders, a ſeuere and bitter enemie: But aboue all other quarrels the Duchie of Burgondie wrought in the mind of themperour no ſmall emulacion: which duchie being poſſeſſed by Levvis the eleuenth by reaſon of the death of Charles duke of Burgondie grandfather by the mothers ſide to themperours father, hath euer ſince tormented the minds of his ſucceſſors: Laſtly there wanted no matter or occaſions of ſtrife and warre for the duchie of Millan, of which the king raigning had not ſince the death of Levvis the twelfth, neither demaunded nor obteined the inueſtiture: Beſides, there was pretended to the rightes which had bene gotten to him by the inueſtiture which had bene made to his predeceſſor, many chalenges & exceptions aſwell touching the inualiditie, as the loſſe of thoſe rights, which was matter ſufficient to ſtirre them vp to quarrell: Neuertheleſſe neither the time ronning, nor the oportunitie preſent (which are the guiders of actions) conſented as then that they ſhould enter into any innouacion: for, beſides that themperour of neceſſitie was to repaſſe firſt into Germanie, to receiue at Aix the crown of thempire according to the cuſtome of thoſe that are elected: yet they were either of them ſo puiſſant & mightie in their particular, that the difficultie to offend one another kept them reſtrayned from all inuaſion vntill they had perfect informacion of the intencion & diſpoſicion of other Princes, but ſpecially of the Pope, in caſe the warre were to begin in Italie: his intencions & inclinacion were ſo obſcured & couered with artificial & faire ſemblãces, that much leſſe that they were knowen to others, ſeing happly at ſometimes they held no reſolucion in himſelf, notwithſtãding he had diſpẽſed with Charles for thacceptatiõ of thelection made in his perſon, contrarie to the tenor of thinueſtiture of the realme of Naples, wherin (being made according to the auncient forme of inueſtitures) he was expreſly forbidden ſuche a matter: But what ſoeuer he did in that action, proceded not ſo much of good will, as for that he had no occaſion to refuſe it to him, without offending him greatly.

So that the regions of Italie, for theſe reaſons, ſtoode in good eſtate of peace and tranquilitie, notwithſtãding in the end of the ſame yere, the Pope ſought to poſſeſſe the citie of Ferrara, not with manifeſt armes, but by ſecret ambuſh and deuiſe: for albeit it might haue bene beleeued, that for the death of his Nephewe Lavvrence de Medicis, eſpecially for that there wanted in his houſe rather men then eſtates, he would haue ſhaked of all thoughtes & ambicion to occupie Ferrara to the which he had alwayes aſpired before: yet whether he was puſhed on by a hatred conceiued agaynſt that Duke, or by a deſire to make himſelfe equal, or at leaſt to come as neare as he could, to the glory of Iulio, he had not, neither for the death of his brother, nor for the loſing of his nephew, diminiſhed any part of that burning ambiciõ: by which experience it maye be eaſily diſcerned that the ambicion of Prieſtes taketh of nothing ſo great norriture, as of it ſelfe: But the qualitie of the time and the ſituacion and fortreſſe of that Citie whiche Alfonſo with great diligence had reduced to good rampiers & fortifications, would not agree that he ſhould make his enterpriſe with forces open and diſcouered, ſeing withal he had prouided an infinit quantity of faire artilleries & munitions, & improuing to thuttermoſt his reuenues, & limiting al his

exſpences, impoſing newe taxacions and tributes, and laſtely expreſſing in all things the minde of a marchant more then of a prince, it was beleeued he had gathered together a huge maſſe of money and treaſor: In ſo much that if the condicions of the time changed not, there remayned to the Pope no other hope to cary it, then by the way of ſecret conſpiracie and practiſe: wherof as he had in vayne made experience in times paſt with Nicho. d'Eſte and many others: And Alfonſo for that he knewe not that he followed any more thoſe practiſes, helde himſelfe almoſt aſſured, not of his will, but of his conſpiracies and ambuſhes: So it ſeemed to the Pope, for the meanes that were offred to him, and for that Alfonſo by thoppreſſion of a long maladie was reduced to thoſe deſperate tearmes that there was almoſt no hope of his recouerie, and withall for that his brother the Cardinall, becauſe he would not remayne in the Court of Rome with diſgrace, was gone into Hungrie, that the time conſented to execute ſome plot layde and preferred by ſome exiles of Ferrara, and by their working, by Alexander Fregoſo Biſhop of Vintemille who was then at Bolognia, for that aſpiring to be Duke as his father the Cardinall had bene, he was ſuſpected of Octauian Fregoſo: The ſame Biſhop hauing had ill ſpeede in the traffikes and practiſes whiche he managed to bring him agayne into his owne countrey, promiſed to him ſelfe a better courſe and more happie ſucceſſe in the driftes which he ſhould driue for an other in a ſtraunge countrey: So that after he had ſecretly receiued of the Pope ten thouſande duckets, he leauyed vnder cooller to reenter Genes by force, a power of two thouſand footemen partly in the countreys of Rome, and partly within the iuriſdiction of Lunigiane: By the brute and rumor of which muſtering, Octauian Fregoſa fearing to be ſurpriſed by him, made him ſelfe ſtrong both by ſea and lande: But the Biſhop making as though by the diſcloſing of his driftes, he were falne from all hope to be hable at that tyme to alter theſtate of Genes, gaue aduertiſement to Federike de Boſſolo with whoſe ayde the towne of Concorda was chiefly maynteined agaynſt Count Iohn Frauncis of Mirandola, that he might vſe the ſeruice of his forces vntill the expiracion of their paye which yet continued almoſt a moneth: And after he had paſſed the Appenin, he diſcended into the countrey of Corregio, taking the waye by ſlowe marchinges to Concorda: The fundacion of this treatiſe or ſolicitation was to paſſe the ryuer of Pavv, for which effect certayne ſeruauntes of Albert Carpi conſenting to thexpedicion, had vnder cooller to be marchauntes of corne, hyered many barkes ryding at the mouth of the ryuer of Secchio, and paſſing in them the ryuer of Pavv, the Biſhoppe layde hys pretence to approache vppon the ſuddayne neare to Ferrara, where for that he had beene not many monethes before, he had carefullye ſurueyed one parte of the towne vppon the ryuer ſide, where fortie faddomes of the wall were downe to the earth, whiche was a breach ſufficient enough to enter: This breache or ruine of wall, for that it was but lately falne, was not reenforced and made vp agayne ſo ſpeedily as apperteyned, both for that the neighborhood of the ryuer and the priuacion of feare, had noriſhed ſecuritie and negligence in ſuche as ought to haue prouided and repayred ſuche diſorders: But when the rumor ranne through the countrey that the Biſhoppe of Vintemille was paſſed the Appenin with his ſouldiours, the Marquis of Mantua, though for no particular ſuſpicion, yet following his aunciente cuſtome to take awaye all meanes from forreine bandes to paſſe the ryuers, retyred to Mantua all the barkes that laye in the mouth of Secchio: By whiche accident the Biſhoppe loſte the oportunitie and ſeruice of thoſe barkes whiche were hyered, and leſſe meane to recouer other ſo ſoone as the neceſſitie of the expedicion required, quired, for that the officers for the Churche that were neareſt that place, were not made priuie to the practiſe, or at leaſt if they had any ynkling, they were without Commiſſion to deale in it: In ſo muche that whyleſt he ſearcheth with the Agents of Albert ſome remedie, and reapoſeth his people about the confines of Corregia, where, by indiſcreſſion he diſcloſeth to ſome the particularities of his purpoſe: the Marquis of Mantua ſendeth one of his men to imparte the intencion and diſcourſe of the enterpriſe to the Duke of Ferrara, who doubted ſo litle of any ſuche matter, that he was hardly induced to beleeue it: Neuertheleſſe looking with better eyes into the ſtate of his daunger, that parte of the wall that was ruinate mouing him more then any other thing, he beganne to wage men of warre: And making as though he had no ſuſpicion of the Pope, he aduertiſed him of the ambuſhes dreſſed againſt him by the Biſhop of Vintemille, beſeeching him to giue direction to the gouernors thereaboutes to miniſter ſuccours to him if neede required: A requeſt which was readily graunted and executed by the Pope by writtes and letters in his fauour, notwithſtanding he diſpatched ſecretlye at the ſame tyme Commiſſions to the contrarie. The rumor that ranne of the preparacions whiche were made at Ferrara, ioyned to the difficulties to paſſe the ryuer of Pavv, tooke from the Biſhop all hope to accompliſhe his enterpriſe, by reaſon whereof he drewe with his armie towards Concorda: And whyleſt he treated with thoſe that were within (who were alreadie entred into ſuſpicion againſt him) to inuade Mirandola, he preſented him ſelfe ſodenly in the night before the walls of Concorda and gaue thaſſalt, to thend to induce a perſwaſion that he was come into thoſe places not to go to Ferrara, but to impatroniſe him ſelfe vpon Concorda: But this aſſault as it was in vayne, ſo the reſidue of the expedicion drewe with it a light effect, for that afterwards he diſmiſſed the moſte parte of his ſouldiors: he left many men in opinion, and euen Alfonſo him ſelfe, that if the meane to paſſe the ryuer of Pavv, had not bene taken from him, the breache or ruine of the wall that was reuerſed, had miniſtred to him a great commoditie to take Ferrara, wherein was not one bande nor regiment of men of warre, the Duke extreamely diſeaſed, and the vniuerſall people in ſuche diſcontentment of him, that in an accident ſo ſodayne and vnprouided, there were fewe that would haue ſought their remedie by armes, or offred their bodies to be oppoſed againſt ſuche a danger.

Nowe followeth the yere a thouſand fiue hundred and twentie, wherin the peace of Italie, for the ſame reaſons and occaſions by the which it had bene preſerued the yeare before, tooke continuacion and helde good: But newe doctrines beganne to ſpreade and increaſe, firſt againſt the authoritie of the Churche of Rome, and afterwardes againſt the courſe of Chriſtian religion: This doctrine tooke beginning in Germanie in the countrey of Saxonie, by the preachinges of Martin Luther ſometimes of the order of Saint Auguſtine, who renewed at the firſt for the moſte parte, the auncient errours of the Bohemiens, whiche beeing reproued by the vniuerſall councell of the Churche holden at Conſtance, by whoſe authoritie were burned Iohn Hus and Ierome a Prage two heades of thoſe hereſies, had lyen of long tyme conteyned within the limittes of Bohemia: The cauſe that newely ſtirred vp theſe opinions in Germanie was a contempte of the authoritie of the ſea Apoſtolike, which Pope Leo abuſed too licēciouſly: he folowing toomuch the counſel of Lavvrence Puccio cardinal of the title of foure Saints touching the adminiſtraciō of graces which the court of Rome diſtributeth vpō things ſpiritual & beneficiall, had diſperſed throughout the world without diſtinction of times or places, moſt ample indulgences, whervnto he had ioyned a power to helpe not onely thoſe that were yet in this life, but also to deliuer the soules of the dead out of the paynes of purgatorie: And because it was manifestly knowen that those indulgences were graunted onely to drawe money from men, and the same impudently demaunded by the Commissaries deputed for that exaction, who had bought of the Popes officers power to exercise and distribute by sale the sayde indulgences: they had bread in many places a great indignation and many slaunders, and especially in Germanie, where were detected many of his ministers selling for a small price, or set vpon a game at tables in a Tauerne, the power to redeeme the soules of dead men out of Purgatorie: This indignacion tooke also increasing by an other degree of abuse in the Pope, who for the facilitie of his nature managing in many things the office of Pope with verye litle maiestie, made donacion to his sister Magdalene, of the profite and exaction of the indulgences in many quarters of Germanie, and she assigned her commissarie Bishoppe Arembauld, a minister worthy suche a commission, which he executed with no litle auarice and extorcion: And forasmuche as it was knowne notoriously through all Germanie, that the money that was drawen by these indulgences, were not payed ouer to the Pope nor the Apostolike chamber, who happlye might haue exspended some parte of it in good vses, but was transferred indirectly to satisfie the infinite couetousnesse of a frayle woman, not onely the exaction became detestable and the officers of the same, but also the name and authoritie of him who with so little discression graunted it. Vnder this occasion Luther entred into his controuersie, and beganne not onely to contemne those indulgences, but also in them to taxe and reprehende the authoritie of the Pope: and drawing to him euery daye greate numbers of Auditors who ranne to heare a matter so well receyued of the eares of the people, he beganne to denie and quarrell more openly the authoritie of the Pope.

Of these beginninges happlye honest of them selues, or at least excusable in the greatest parte, he nourished his occasion and auowed it to be iuste: And beeing further caryed with ambicion and popular inclinacion ioyned to the speciall fauour of the Duke of Saxon, he went on not onely to taxe the power of the Popes and the authoritie of the Churche of Rome, but also standing styll vppon the errours of the Bohemiens, he beganne with tyme to batter the Images of Churches, to depriue places Ecclesiastike of their goodes, and to permit mariages to Monkes and Nunnes professed, confirming his opinion not onely with authoritie and with argumentes, but also with the example of him selfe: He denyed that the power of the Pope was extended out of the Bishopricke of Rome, and maynteined that euerye other Bishoppe had as muche authoritie and power in his particular Dioceese, as the Pope had within the Bishopricke of Rome: He reiected all matters determined in Councells, all traditions written by those that are called Doctors of the Church, and all Cannons and decrees of Popes, and reduced him selfe onely to the olde Testament, to the booke of the Gospels, to the Actes of the Apostles, to all that is comprehended vnder the name of the newe Testament, and to the Epistles of Saint Paule: Onely he gaue to all these a newe sence and interpretacion doubtfull, suche as neuer had beene hearde of before. But the follye of Luther and hys adherentes stayed not onely there, but beeing in effecte followed of all Germanie, and running dayly into errours more detestable and daungerous, he came at last to deale with the Sacramentes of the Church, and to despise fastings, penances, and confessions, yea some of his followers (suche as some waye differed from his opinion) spake matter of blasphemie agaynst the Eucharist: All which thinges being being originally reproued by the authoritie of councels and holy doctors, haue giuen an entry to all newe and peruerse inuencions and interpretations, and going on encreasing and amplifying in many places out of the bounds of Germanie, for that they conteine such propertie of doctrine, that deliuering men from many cõmaundementes established for their safety by the generall Councels of the Church, by the decrees of Popes, by thauthoritie of Cannons, and by the sound interpretations of holy doctors, they bring men backe to a maner of lyfe more full of libertie, yea euen according to their owne fancie and luste. The Pope laboured in the beginning to quench this pestiferous doctrine, and yet he forbare to vse remedies and medicines proper and conuenient to cure so great a maladie: for he cited to Rome Martin Luther, he forbad him to preache, and afterwardes for his disobedience, he imposed vpon him the censures of the Church: But he absteined not from the action of many things of yll example, and suche as beeing reasonably reproued and blamed by Luther, became very intollerable to all men: for proceding agaynst him in his intemperancie, with armes spirituall and ecclesiastike, muche lesse that he did diminishe, but did augment in the mindes of the people, the reputacion of Martin, as though those persecutions had taken their beginning of the innocencie of his lyfe and of his sounde doctrine, rather then vpon any other occasion: The Pope sent into Germanie many religious men to preache agaynst him, and countenanced them with many letters & writtes of credence to princes and prelates: But neither that course nor any other meanes which he vsed to represse him, serued to nothing, by reason of the vniuersall inclination of the people, and the speciall protection and fauor of the Duke of Saxon being within his iurisdiction: In so muche as the cause of Luther began to seeme euery day in the court of Rome to carye greater importaunce, and to augment a feare amongest them that there grewe not of it some great domage touching the greatnesse of Popes, the profites of the Court of Rome, and the vnion of Christian religion: for which occasion in that yere were sommoned many consistories at Rome, and many consultations assembled in the chamber of the Pope, and many disputacions amongest the Cardinalls and diuines specially deputed, to deuise a remedie for suche an euill whiche tooke increasing dayly: And albeit there were some amongst thē in this solemne Councell, that failed not to reduce to the Popes memorie, that the persecutions whiche had bene executed agaynst Luther, since they were not accompanied with a correction of things damnable in them selues, had increased his reputation and goodwill with the people, and that it had beene a lesse euill to dissemble the knowledge of suche a matter whiche perhaps woulde haue dissolued of it selfe, then by blowing at the brande to make the fyre burne more and caste a greater flame: yet (suche is the nature of mortall men to proceede with remedies fierce and violent) the persecutions were not only redoubled agaynst him and his followers commonly called Lutherans, but also a wonderfull writte of threatning monicion thundred oute agaynst the Duke of Saxon, by the whiche being so muche the more incensed and kindled, he became with a greater affection the protector of his cause: whiche, for the space of many yeares went multiplying so farre, that there was great daunger least the residue of Christendome were not infected with the contagion: But there is nothing that so muche hath restrayned his course, as the knowledge that men tooke that the followers of his doctrine, did no lesse impugne the imperie and power of Princes temporall, then were moste ennemies to the authoritie of the Popes of Rome, A reason whiche hath moued manye Princes, for their proper interestes, to labour wyth studie and seueritie to keepe out of their realmes and principalities, that contagion: And of the contrarie, albeit those errours haue beene many tymes at the poynt to confounde and fall, both for the immoderate intemperancie of their heades and chieftayns, and for the diuersitie & contrarietie of opinions amongest their disciples, yet there is no one thing that so much hath enterteined and continued the obstinacion of them, as the licencious libertie whiche the people haue gotten in their maner of liuing, together with the couetousnesse of great men, who would not suffer the depriuation of those porcions of goods which they occupied of the Churches.

There happned nothing this yeare worthy of memorie, sauing that Iohn Paule Baillon and Gentill one of the same famulie, beeing at Perousa, fell at quarrel betwene them selues, for that Iohn Paule being not content that he had the greatest parte and authoritie in the gouernment, sought to subiect the whole, in whiche ambicion he chased Gentill out of Perousa: for which violence the Pope being not a litle grieued, cited him to appeare personally at Rome, but fearing some daunger to his person, he forbare to go thither, but sent Malatesta his sonne with his iustifications and to protest his ready obedience to the Pope and all his commaundementes: Neuertheless the Pope insisting still vpon his personal appearance, after the passion of many douts and perplexities, he was resolued at last to go to Rome, being caried partly with confidence in his auncient merites and seruices done in all times to his house, and partly ouerruled by the perswasions of Camilla Vrsin his sonne in lawe with other his friends, who bothe extended their authoritie and applyed all other meanes they could to the Pope for his safety: of whom they obteined promise vnder his fidelitie and expresse assurance (though not set downe in writing, but pronounced with the Popes mouth with great arte) vnder confidence whereof he willed them to encourage him to appeare, which they accomplished vnder warrant of assurance from them that he might do it in safetie: But when he was come to Rome, he founde the Pope vnder coollur of his recreation according to his custome, gone a fewe dayes before, to the Castell S. Angelo, whither Iohn Paule going the morning following to present himselfe to him, he was before he came there, made prisoner by the capteine of the Castell: Afterwards he was rigorously examined by iudges assigned, to whom in this miserie he confessed that he had committed manye grieuous faultes aswell for the conseruation of tyrannie as to continue his disordered pleasures, and to obserue his other interesse particular: for the which, after he had bene prisoner more then two monethes, he was beheaded according to the ordinance and sentence of the lawe: it was beleeued that the Pope was induced to this punishment, for that he discerned in the warre of Vrbin by many signes, that Iohn Paule bare a minde estraunged from him, that he had enterteined conspiracies with Francisco maria, and that he coulde not in all accidentes assure him selfe of him, and consequently so long as he was at Perousa, he coulde make no fundacion of that estate. The children of Iohn Paule, assoone as they heard of the restrayning of their father, stedde from the malice of the Pope, who to readresse the gouernment of Perousa according to his fancie, gaue that Legacion to Siluio Cardinall of Cortono, his seruaunte and of his auncient bringing vppe: He restored Gentill into Perousa, to whome he gaue the goodes whiche Iohn Pavvle had possessed, and so resting vppon a foundacion and subiect verye weake, he conuerted into him all greateneesse and reputacion. In lyke sorte this yeare, the Pope, who attributed more to fortune or wante of discression then to any other operacion, the losse and miscarying of the Bishoppe of Vintemillo, began to enforce newe ambushes agaynst the

Duke

Duke of Ferrara, by the meane and working of Hubert Gambaro the Apostolike pronotory: To him, one Rodolphe Capteine of certeine bandes of launceknights which Alfonso held for his gard, had promised to put into his hāds at his pleasure, the entry of the gate of the castell Tialto, whether the souldiours that were to be sent from Bolognia and Modona, hauing meane to come without passing the riuer of Pavv but by the wodden bridge which is before that gate: direction was giuen to Guido Rangon and the gouernor of Modena to assemble a certeine crewe of souldiours vnder some other cooller, and to go make a surprise of that gate, and to defend it vntill were ariued the others that were to come from Bolognia and Modena: But the day to execute thenterprise was no sooner determined vppon, then it was discouered that Rodolphe to whom by the Popes ordenance were giuen about two thowsand duckats by Hubert Gambaro, had from the beginning communicated all the conspiracie to Alfonso, who, after he was well informed and assured of the Popes intencion & his purposes, stopped the further course and passage of things, and reuealed to all men the deceit of Rodolphe.

In this yeare thEmprour passed by sea out of Spaine into Flaunders, and making his course by the shoares of England, he discended and tooke land there, not by necessity as his father did, but voluntarily to haue conference with the king of England, with whom he found good agreement: from Flaunders he went into Germany, where he receiued in the moneth of October, at Aix being a citie of fame and renowme for the auncient residencie and sepulcher of Charlamaine, the first crowne, which is as men say the selfe same crowne with the which Charlamaine was celebrated: it was deliuered to him according to olde obseruacion, by the authoritie of the Princes of Germany: But that felicitie was troubled with new accidents hapning in Spaine which grew vpon this occasion: The populars and vniuersall multitudes of that kingdom, were not a litle agreeued with his promocion to thEmpire, as knowing that to the great incommoditie and harme of them all, he should for sundry occasions be constrayned to spend the most part of his tyme out of Spaine: But the principall cause of that discontentment and stirre, was the generall hatred they had conceiued against the couetousnes of such as gouerned him, especially against Monsr de Cheures, who expressing desires insatiable, had raked together by many meanes, A great masse of treasor: By whose example the other Flemmings were caried by humors couetous and getting to sell for ready mony to straungers, those offices & Magistracies which were wont to be bestowed vppon Spanyards, and made vendible all other graces, priuileages, fauors and expedicions of Court: Insomuch as all mens mindes being inflamed against the name of the Flemmings, the people of the vale of Olyt beganne to draw into rebellion, at such tyme as thEmprour departed: And immediatly after he was gonne out of Spaine, all the peoples of any prouince whatsoeuer gathered into commocion, not against their king as they protested, but to suppresse the couetousnes of his wicked gouernors: And after they had communicated together their councels, they would no more obey the kings Officers, but of them selues set downe a forme of gouernment dressed by the vniuersall councell of the multitude, which they called La santa ginuta: such is the name they giue to the vniuersall councell of the popular sort: The Capteines and kings Officers tooke armes against them, and so thinges being reduced to a manifest warre, the disorders encreased by so many degrees, that thEmprour held amongest them a very small authoritie: The same being the cause that aswell in Italy as out of Italie, the hope of those encreased who desired the diminucion of suche a greatnes: Neuertheless as his armie by sea had wonne vpon the Moares the Ile of Gerbes, so in Germanie the reputacion of the frenche king had bene somewhat embased: for, the king, to nourrish the troubles of Germanie, fauored in that prouince, the Duke of VVittemberg, who was disagreeing from the league of Suaue, which thing, his peoples finding and feeling to their damage and harme, they chassed him by force out of his estate, and after they had wonne his liuing vpon him, they sold it to thEmperour whom they knew to be desirous to pull downe the factioners of the frenche king: thEmperour bounde him selfe to defende them in all oppressions whatsoeuer, insomuch as the Duke seeing him selfe reduced to hope in the succours of the frenche, was constrained to haue his recourse to the clemencie of thEmperour, and to receiue of him such lawes as was his pleasure to assigne, not being for all that restored to the possession of his Dukedom.

Towards the end of this yeare, a regiment of three thowsand spanishe footemen hauing no mindes to returne into Spaine, according to a cõmaundment which they receiued of thEmperour, and litle esteeming thauthority of their Capteynes, passed to Reggia in Calabria: And from thence, committing many insolencies as they past, they drew towards the territories of the Church: A matter which put the Pope (in whose minde was fixed the memorie of thaccidents of Vrbin) in great feare, least being either stirred vp by other Princes, or ioyning them selues with Franciscomaria, or with the sonnes of Iohn Pavvle Baillon, or some other enemies of the Churche, they were not the cause of some great emocion: This feare was made greater in the Pope, for that the souldiers refused the offers made to them by him & the Viceroy of Naples to enterteyne parte of them in paye, and to distribute money to the residue: But these offers raised them so much the more into corage, & made them to march towards the riuer of Tronto, not keeping the straite way of Capinai, but spreading ouer the large way of Povvilla: The resorte of other souldiers ioyning with them daily, together with certeine companies of horsemen encreased more & more the humor of this feare: In men timerous feare is a readie impression, and for the time carieth the minde in contemplacions of perill and daunger: Neuertheless this emocion tooke ende both with more expedicion and more facilitie then was exspected, since assoone as they had passed Tronto to enter into the marke of Ancona whether the Pope had sent strength of souldiers, & incamping before Ripatransono, they were compelled to retire for the great losse of men they had susteined in a fierce assault they gaue to the souldiers within Ripatransono: an accident so preiudiciall to their vallour and reputacion, that they accepted willingly of thEmperours officers, condicions of farre lesser quality then such as they had reiected before.

ABout the beginning of the yeare 1521. was reappeaſed that former litle ſtirre, touching the which mens mindes ſuffered more feare by a freſhe recordacion and memorie of thoſe bands of ſpaniſh footemen that inuaded the ſtate of Vrbin, then for any other cauſe bearing either reaſon, likelihood, or probabilitie of terrour: But as one warre draweth on an other like to diſeaſes that redouble in bodies il diſpoſed, ſo, not many moneths after, Italy began eftſoones to be vexed with warres of greater perill, of longer continuance, and of more importance, then were all the other quarrells that had paſſed affore: Wherein the ambicion of two moſt mighty kings puffed vp with mutuall ielowſies, hatreds, and deepe ſuſpicions, drew them on to make exerciſe of all their power and forces in the partes and bowels of Italy, which hauing skarcely breathed three yeres in peace (and yet alwayes full of doubt and ſuſpicion) it ſeemed that in the powers of heauen, deſtinye, and fortune, was layed vp either a manifeſt enuie of their tranquillitie, or els a ſuperſticious feare that vnder the benefit of reſt and concorde, thoſe regions woulde eftſoones returne to their auncient felicitie and greatnes.

Such perſonages were the beginners of theſe new emotions, as albeit they had farre more intereſt then all others to procure the preſeruacion of the peace, yet generally and ſeuerally they troubled it more then any others, and by their induſtrie & authoritie, ſought to kindle the fire, which they ought to haue quenched with their propper blood, if other remedies had not ſufficed.

For, notwithſtanding the hard moodes and inclinacions betwene Cæſar and the French king grew increaſing continually, yet there was no cauſe at all to puſh them on ſo faſt to make preſent warre, neither did the one ſo farre exceede the other in Italy, either with force or friendes, or any other propertie of ayde, that they were able to offend one an other without the fauors, oportunities, and meanes of the Italian Princes: for that as the French king had no reaſon to feare any vexacion of Cæſar, neither touching the kingdom of Naples, nor for any quarrel of Germany, both hauing the Venetians conioyned with him for the defenſe of Myllan, and in the Svvizzers

remayning no more readynes to make warres in their owne names, but ſtoode only diſpoſed to ſerue as ſouldiors to who ſo euer would miniſter paye to them: ſo alſo he had no meane to offende Cæſar in the realme of Naples, vnleſſe the Pope were concurrant with him in the action, who ſtoode ſolicited by them both by many offers and meanes to be their friende: In ſo muche as it was beleeued, that if the Pope continuing indifferent betweene them, were carefull to temper and raunge with his high authoritie, and fidelitie of a newter, their diſdaynes and quarrells, and to cut of and ſtop the paſſage of their troubleſome councells, the peace would eaſily be preſerued without violacion: And there was not diſcerned any apparant cauſe why he ſhould ſeeke to incenſe the warre, both for that he had with yll ſpeede broken out into armes before, and withall, conſidering the greatneſſe of thoſe two Princes, it ſtoode him vpon to keepe an indifferent feare of the victorie of eyther of them, ſince it was euidently ſeene into that whether of them ſoeuer preuayled in that warre, could not be ſtayed from ſubduing and ſubiecting to his obedience all the regions of Italie: The Pope poſſeſſed in peace and great obedience the large eſtate of the Churche and of Rome, and his whole Court floriſhed wonderfully vnder him in plentifull happines and felicitie: He had full authoritie ouer the ſtate of Florence, which in thoſe times was a ſtate mightie in people, policie, and riches: He was naturally inclined to eaſe and pleaſures, and therefore made it an offence to his libertie and greatnes to heare ſpeake of ſutes and affayres: His cuſtome was to conſume the day in hearing of Muſike, in ſeeing ſtage playes, and trifling with ſkoffers and ieſters: ſo that being more effeminate then was eyther conuenient or comely, it ſeemed he ſhould be altogether eſtraunged from the warre: Beſides, as he was full of gracious liberalities and magnificencie, ſuche as might bee tearmed wonderfull though he had diſcended by long ſucceſſion from great kings, ſo he had not onely by his incredible prodigalities and diſtribucions without diſcreſſion or diſtinction conſumed the treaſors gathered by Iulio, but alſo hauing exacted an infinite quantitie of money of the expedicions of the Court and many newe ſortes of offices inuented to rayſe gayne, he had waſted all ſo exceſſiuely, that he was ſtill conſtrayned to ſtudie meanes and deuiſes to interteine thoſe immoderate exſpences which grewe increaſing with the vanitie of his diſpoſition: He had no deuocion to rayſe or make great any of his houſe or kinred: and though he was poſſeſſed with a vehement deſire to recouer Parma and Plaiſanca, and no leſſe ambicion to reduce to him the ſtate of Ferrara, yet he thought them not cauſes ſufficient to remoue him from his pleaſures, nor to reuerſe the peaſible condition of things, but in his delightes and ſecuritie he helde it better to temporiſe and exſpect oportunities and occaſions.

But right truely is it ſpoken, that there is no greater enemie to great men then too great proſperitie, for that it takes from them all rule of them ſelues, it makes them full of libertie, it giues them boldnes to do euill, aud it breedes in them a deſire and aptnes to trouble their proper weale and benefite by innouacions and newe things.

Leo being thus lifted to ſo high eſtate, ſuffred to be bred in him many conſiderations: ſometimes he ſawe what infamie it brought to him to loaſe Parma and Plaiſanca gotten by Iulio with ſo great glorie, and to that moode was ioyned his burning deſire to aduaunce thaction of Ferrara: ſometimes he ſeemed to ſee that if he dyed without doing ſome thing of importance, the memorie of his pontificacie woulde remayne diſhonored: ſometimes he feared leaſt thoſe two kings (they both beeing excluded out of hope to haue him on their ſide, and therefore leſſe hable to offende

one an other) would grow at last to contract betwene them selues some league preiudiciall tending to the ruine of the Church and the residue of Italie: sometimes he hoped(as I haue heard the Cardinal de Medicis say who knew all his secrets)that the frenchmen being chassed out of Genes and Millan,he might the more easely expulse Cæsar out of the kingdom of Naples, and so appropriate to him selfe the glorie of the libertie of Italie, to the which his predecessor had manifestly aspired: An enterprise which by howe muche lesse he thought he was hable to accomplishe by his proper forces, by so much more did he hope,by appeasing somwhat the mind of the french king, either by thelection of some Cardinall whom he would preferre,or by his readines to gratifie him in some other matters,to draw him to giue him succors against Cæsar, as though it were a satisfaction to the king to see that as muche was done to Cæsar as to him: These were his concepcions,such were the discourses of his mind, & in these variacions did he fashion the image of things: But which soeuer of these causes moued him, whether one,or more, or all together, he tooke vnto him newe impressions, and turned all his thoughtes to the warre, and to ioyne him selfe with one of these two Princes, to thende that being allied with the one, he might moue warre in Italie against the other: And for a declaracion of his readines to the matter, as also not to be oppressed in the meane while by either of them: whileſt he negociated with them both,but more straitly and particularly with the french king,he sent into Svvizzerland Antho.Puccio Bishop of Pistoyo and afterwards Cardinal,to leauie and lead to the seruice of the Church, six thowsand Svvizzers: An armie, which, being deliuered to him without difficultie by the Cantons vnder the fauor of the confederacion which since the warre of Vrbin he had renewed with them,& hauing likewise got libertie of passage through the estate of Millan, was conducted vppon the lands and dominions of the Church,where he enterteined them many moneths as well in Romagnia as in la Marqua: Many were vncerteine to what endes he made so great & chargeable a leauie of men and not to employ them, seeing there was no stirre or alteracion in Italie: And albeit he assured the regions and potentacies of the same that he had armed them for his proper suerty,for that he knewe well that the rebells of the Church conspired some violent action against him: yet, the murmure of the people being not satisfied, for that his reasons bare small resemblance with trueth, men discoursed seuerally vppon it according to their seuerall fancies: some supposed that he called in those forces for feare of the frenche king, others beleued that he would employ them against Ferrara, and some thought that he would turne them against Cæsar to chasse him out of the kingdom of Naples: But the practise that was secret betwene him & the frēch king,was,that they should with their ioynt forces inuade the kingdom of Naples, vnder this condicion that Caietta and all that stoode betwene the riuer of Garillan and the confines of theccleſiastike state, should be for the Church,& the residue of the realme to reuert to the second sonne of Fraunce, who, vntill he came to the age of maiority should be gouerned,together with the kingdom by a Legat Apostolicall that should lye resident at Naples: Moreouer, it was an article in the capitulacion that the king should aide him against the subiects and freholders of the sea Apostolike, which was a condicion affixed for the better assuring of that which the Church helde already, and no lesse tending to the desire which the Pope had to get Ferrara.

In these times and in very good season for those practises,the french king, no lesse taking thoccasion of the tumultes of Spaine, then obseruing the perswasions of the Pope (which he afterwards assured by complaintes)sent out an army into the kingdom of Nauarre vnder Monsr d'Asperot brother to Lavvtrech, to raunge that kingdom & reduce it to his auncient king, requiring at the same instant Robert de la Marche and the Duke of Gueldres, to breake out and vexe the confyns of Flaunders: The sedicions of Spaine were the cause that Monsr d'Asperot made an easie conquest of the kingdom of Nauarre, both beeing destitute of succours, and also not without a great memory and deuocion to their originall and auncient king: for, after he had forced with his artilleries the castel of Pampeluna, he entred the frontyers of the kingdom of Catelognia and tooke Fontarabye, ronning vp euen to Logrogma: of this enterprise it hapned, as oftentimes commeth to passe in humane thinges, that that which men thought would haue brought preiudice and harme to Cæsar, turned greatly to his seruice and benefit: for the matters of Spaine beeing trauelled till that time with diuers aduentures and fortunes, were nowe reduced into very great perplexities and troubles, for that on the one side, the multitude and popular sorte were bandyd together, and on the other side many Nobles and Barons had taken armes for the seruice of Cæsar: They, for thintereste of their estates, feared the popular libertie being nowe come to a manifest rebellion, and the rather to haue it gouerned by a head of authoritie, they had drawne out of the castell of Sciatyua the Duke of Calabria, whose fidelitie made him refuse to come out of prison because he woulde not beare armes against Cæsar: But such is the affection and conscience of men towards their naturall contrey, and such the perpetuall custome of contrey men when they see inuasions made by forreine forces, that ciuill quarrells can not take from them the feeling of common and forreine daungers: for, when the Spanyards sawe the armies of Fraunce make slaughter and hostilitie vpon their contrey, notwithstanding they had suffered the losse of the Realme of Nauarre beeing a member of their dominions by the vniting which the king Catholike made, they felt them selues so touched in conscience and affection, that partly for those regards, and partly for a happy encownter which the armie of Cæsar had made, they became men conuerted and returned to the obedience of their king, leauing suppressed and forgotten, their domesticall hatreds & contencions.

Fontarabye taken by the french.

After this easie conquest of the Realme of Nauarre, there happened to the king a farre greater successe if he could haue vsed thoccasion: for, as both he & Cæsar had their Embassadors with the Svvizzers, soliciting seuerally that nation to stand with them, so the Cantons did not onely refuse (contrary to thopinion of many, and against the hope that was giuen) the friendship and offers of Cæsar, but also embrased thallyance of the French king, binding them selues to furnish for his seruice so many footemen as he would, and for what enterprise it pleased him, and not to suffer any leauies of souldiers for any other against him.

There rested the execucion of the capitulacion made at Rome betwene the Pope and the king, who, when he was required to ratifie it, began to temporise and dwell in suspense, being aduertised by many that there was no exspectacion of sewertie in the Pope, in whom was no opinion of fidelity and confidence, and who, since he was possessed of the dignitie and place of Pope, had alwayes made declaration of small friendship towards the french: That it was to be feared that his doings were intangled with suttletie and deceite, since there was no congruencie of reason that the Pope should desire the diuoluing of the realme of Naples into his power or to thinheritance of his sonne, for that by howe muche more iurisdiction the french should haue in the kingdom of Naples and the Duchie of Myllan, by so much lesse would be the sewertie of the Pope amid a power so mighty and redowted: That so greate a

shewe of amitie breaking out vpon suche a sodayne, could not be without misterie: That the tokens of deceite that appeared warned him to take heede, that vnder the practise to conquer the kingdome of Naples, he fell not into the snares layde for him to loase the Duchie of Millan: for that to sende his armie into Naples was none other thing then to giue power and oportunitie to the Pope with his sixe thousande Svvizzers to breake it and put all to extreame hazarde, which beeing ouerthrowen there remayned no defence for the duchy of Millan: An estate which as he knew the Pope had fayled to take from him by armes and warre, so it was to be feared that he would assaye to depriue him of it by trecherie & deceit: These reasons so wrought with the king, that they made him doubtfull to ratifie the capitulation, and therfore exspecting happly an aunswere of some other practises, he sent no dispatche of the ratificacion to Rome, but left the Popes embassadors in suspēce. But for that the Pope eyther in deede (notwithstanding his shewes & semblances) had his mind estranged from the king, or (for that all the tearmes and dates to answere being past) he began to suspect a truthe: or happly for that he feared least the king woulde discouer to Cæsar his practises, & so some alliance to passe betwene them to his preiudice: or it might be he was pushed on by a vehement ambicion to recouer Parma & Plaisanca, and to do some thing worthy of memory: or lastly perhaps he might take to displeasure thinsolencie of Monsr de Lavvtrech and the Bishop of Tarba his minister, who contemning his commaundementes in the state of Millan, and reiecting some ecclesiasticall edictes, disdayned him with very prowde and insolent words: for some of these causes he determined to enter league agaynst the French king with Cæsar, who also for his parte, beeing kindled for the warre of Nauarre, and pushed on by many of the exiles of Millan, and lastly induced by some of his counsell desiring to embase the greatnes of Monsr de Cheures, who had alwayes perswaded him not to seperate him selfe from the French king, resolued to ioyne confederacion with the Pope agaynst the king: which he was thought to hasten the more, vnder a hope that with the Popes authoritie & his owne, he should eyther diminish or dissolue the alliance made with the Svvizzers, affore it were confirmed by bondes and other offices of gratification. Moreouer the Pope tooke greater occasion of confidence in this, that Cæsar, who had heard Martin Luther in the Parliament of VVormes, whither he was come vnder his safconduit, and hauing passed him to be examined by many diuines who made report that his doctrine was erroneous & dangerous for Christendome, had banished him to gratify the Pope: Only at last there was cōtracted betwene Cæsar & the Pope a confederacion for their cōmon defence, including also the famulie of Medicis and the state of Florence: This league was resolued without the priuitie of Monsr de Cheures, who til that time had borne with him right great place and authoritie, and dyed almost euen at the same time: There were also these addicions to the contract, that they should rayse warre agaynst the state of Millan at such time and in such maner as should be resolued vpon betwene them, and if it were subdued and conquered, then Parma and Plaisanca to reuert to the Church vnder the same rights and tytles with the which it had holden them before: That Frauncis Sforce who had beene chased out of Millan and remayned then at Trente, shoulde be eftsoones restored to the possession of that state, as hauing righte therevnto by thinuestiture of his father and by the renunciation of his brother: That the confederates shoulde bee bounde to defende hym in hys tytle: That the Duchie of Millan shoulde vse no other Saltes nor Saltpittes then those of Cerua: That it shoulde not onely bee lawfull to the Pope to proceede agaynst hys subiectes and freeholders, Confederation betwene the Pope and th Emperour agaynst the Fr. king.

but also Cæsar to be bound (after the conqueſt of Millan) to ioyne with him againſt them, and namely for the recouerie of Ferrara. The tribute of the realme of Naples was increaſed, and there was promiſed to the Cardinall of Medicis a penſion of ten thouſande duckets out of the Archbiſhoprike of Tolledo which was newly voyde: And to Alexander de Medicis baſtard ſonne to Lavvrence & lately duke of Vrbin, was promiſed an eſtate in the dominion of Naples of ten thouſande duckets of reuenue.

The titles of thempire to the duchie of Millan.

For the more playne informacion & opening of theſe things, it is not out of purpoſe to ſet downe in briefe what were the rightes that Cæsar pretended thempire to haue vpon the duchie of Millan in thoſe times: The Lawyers of thempire alleaged that the auncient rightes of the Dukes of Orleance were of no conſideracion, for that what ſoeuer had bene accorded touching the ſucceſſion of Madame Valentina, was not confirmed with thauthoritie imperiall: And that for the preſent, that Duchie apperteined immediatly to thempire, becauſe thinueſtiture made to Lodovvike Sforce for him and his ſonnes, was reuoked by Maximilian grandfather to Charles, & that with ſo many & ample clauſes that the reuocacion had iudicially his effecte to the preiudice chiefly of his ſonnes, who neuer poſſeſſing it, their right & title was in hope, and not in effect: Therfore thinueſtiture was auaylable that was made to king Lovvis, for him and for his daughter Clavvda, in caſe ſhe were maried to Charles, and with condition that the mariage not going forward without that there were fault in Charles, it ſhould be nothing, and that the Duchie of Millan ſhould paſſe directly to Charles, who in that caſe was inueſted of it in the preſence of his father Phillip: That it followed therevpon that the ſeconde inueſtiture made to the ſame king Lovvis, for him and for the ſame Lady Clavvda, and for Frauncis Lorde of Angouleſme, was nothing worthe, as being made to the preiudice of Charles then an infante and vnder the tutorſhip of Maximilian: So that as the king then reigning could make no fundacion of that, ſo he could leſſe alleage intereſt in that duchie by new rightes or titles, for that much leſſe that he had obteined inueſtiture from themperour, ſeeing he had not ſo muche as demaunded it, as alſo it was manyfeſt that the ceſſion made to him by Maximilian at ſuche time as he rendred to him the Caſtell of Millan, could not helpe him: for that a chiefe aliened of proper authoritie, reuerteth immediatly to the ſupreame Lorde: And laſtely, for that Maximilian Sforce, notwithſtanding he had bene admitted by the conſent of themperor, and dying in that eſtate without hauing euer receiued thinueſtiture, he coulde not tranſport to an other the rightes that apperteined not to him ſelfe. Thus aſſone as the confederation was paſſed betwene the Pope & Cæsar againſt the french king, & that as ſecretly as might be: they cõſulted together (afore they entred publikely into armes) to procede by ambuſhes & practiſes, & by the meane of the exiles, to aſſaile at one time by ſoden inuaſion, the duchie of Millan and Genes: In which coũcel it was ſet down, that Cæsars gallies which were at Naples, and the Popes gallies armed with 2000. Spaniſhe footemen, ſhould fal at vnwares into the port of Genes, & hauing with thẽ Iero. Adorno, by whoſe authority and traine of folowers thoſe of the riuers which were of their faction drawing into cõmocion, they hoped that that citie would eaſily fall into tumult. On the other ſide Frauncis Sforce & Ier. Moron who was with him at Trent with many of the beſt ſort of the exiles, had conſulted that the French bandes that were within Parma, Plaiſanca, & Cremona, ſhould be charged at vnwares: That the like inuaſion ſhould be made at Millan by Manfrei Paluoiſin & Matto de Brinzi a chief cõmander in thoſe moũtaines, who ſhould leade thither by the lake of Coma certein launceknights, & ſo to execute that city wher they were aſſured to haue ſecret intelligẽce:

Practiſes againſt the fr. king.

Moreouer if thoſe enterpriſes tooke good ſucceſſe, or any of them being of moſt importance, then thexiles of Myllan who were many gentlemē & they to be conueyed ſecretly to Reggia where ſhould meete them Ieronimo Moron at the day appoynted, ſhould draw into a ſtrength and riſe to enter into that ſtate, leauying with all poſſible diligence a campe of three thowſand footemen: for the better effect and expedicion of thoſe actions, the Pope ſent to Frauncis Guicciardin an auncient gouernor of Modona and Reggia, ten thowſand duckats, to be deliuered ouer to Moron for thinterteyning of footemen to be ready vpon the euent of thinges, to whom Guicciardin was commaunded to ſhew fauor, but ſecretly and in ſuch manner that the French king ſhould take no occaſion either to complayne of the actions of his Officers, or euill interpret the Pope.

Fraūcis Guicciardin the writer of this hiſtory.

But ſo vnperfect are the councells and deuiſes of man, and ſo naturally ſubiected to a prouidence infallible and immutable, that there is left no certeinty of their reſolucions and leſſe ſewertie in their mortall doings, them ſelues being no other thing then bodies compownded of imperfection, errour and frailtie: not one of theſe deuiſes ſucceded either to purpoſe or to profit: for, the army by ſea that went to Genes which was compownded of ſeuen gallies, foure Brigantyns and certein ſhippes of other nature, made a vaine ſhow affore the poart, for that Duke Fregoſa, doubting belike of their comming, had well manned and refurniſhed the towne: Inſomuch as they croſſed ſayle and retyred into the riuer of Leuant, after they found no mutinies nor any other thing well diſpoſed on their behalfe: And touching Lombardye, many of the exiles hauing ſpeciall priuitie with the negociacion there, together with the voice that Ierom Moron was to come to Reggia, Federyk de Boſſolo hauing intelligence of it, went to Myllan to giue ſignification to Monſr d'Eſcud, ſupplying the place of his brother who a litle before was gon into Fraunce: By reaſon of theſe aduertiſements, he mooſtered and drewe together the bands of men at armes that lay diſperſed in diuers places, and after he had giuen order that Federyk ſhould leade thether a thowſand footemen of his ſubiects, he went ſuddeinly to Parma with foure hundred launces: In the way he was from time to time made more certeine of thoſe thinges which Federyk had reaported to him, the rather for that the baniſhed men, not obſeruing the order that was giuen them to make their aſſemblies ſecret, were in an open force withdrawn to Reggia: They required in al places bands of ſouldiers, & gaue out in publike & manifeſt rumors that they would immediatly attēpt ſome new enterpriſe: in whoſe example & maner of proceding, cōtinued Ierom Moron that came after them, puſhed on perhaps with this reaſon, that by how much they did diſcloſe them ſelues and their enterpriſe, by ſo much would it breede hatred & enimitie betwene the Pope and the French king.

But the vanitie of theſe deuiſes and enterpriſes declared it ſelfe manifeſtly to all men: And yet Monſr de l'Eſcud being arriued at Parma, determined the morning following (a day ſolemne for the natiuitie of S. Iohn Baptiſt) to preſent him ſelf affore the gates of Reggia: he hoped in this manner of action to finde occaſion to take eyther all or parte of the exiles, and that eyther as they fled out of the towne through the feare and aſtoniſhment of his comming, or els there beeing no ſtrength of forreine ſouldiours, the feare of the gouernor (A perſonage eſtranged from the profeſſion of war) would put thē priſoners into his hands: or laſtly he hoped that vnder the terror which the townesmen would haue of his forces & ſuddein comming, the occaſion & fauor of the time would giue him leaue to enter without difficultye: The gouernor made ſome dout of the matter, & albeit (the aſſailing of Genes being not yet come to his knowledge) he thought it not likely, that Monsr d'Escud would giue beginning to the warre without the commaundement of his king, & enter in warlike maner vpon the lands of the Pope: yet looking into the ordinary furies and importunities of the french nation, as also to be somwhat armed against a mischief so apparantly threatned, he sent out his present directions to Guido Rangon lying vppon the confynes of Modena, to come the same night to Reggia, giuing the like order that those bands of footemen leauied by Moron & lodged neareſt that place, should likewise march thether: And lastly his precepts went out to the people of the towne in whom he knew was no property of affection to the french name, that at the sownding of the great bell, they should bee at the garde of the gates, where euery one shoulde receiue his charge: The morning following Monsr d'Escud arriued with foure hundred launces, Federyk de Bossolo marching a mile behind him with a thowsand footemen: Assoone as Monsr d'Escud approched the towne, he sent to the gouernor a capteine of his called Monsr Bonneuall, to tel him that he would speake with him: by whom it was agreed & assigned that Escud should come to the postern that entreth vpon the rauelin of the gate that loketh towards Parma, where the gouernor would meete him, either one assuring other of their faith: Monsr d'Escud according to thappointment came neare the gate accompanied with many gentlemen of his traine, & the gouernor issuing out of the wicket, they began to common together: The one complained that contrary to tharticles of confederacion, there was receiued & releued in the townes of the church, the exiles & banished peoples which were drawen into companies & bands, to trouble the states of the king: The other expressed a griefe and vnkindnes, that there was made suddein inuasion in manifest aray of warre and force, vppon the lands of the Church: But as they stoode debating those cõplaints, certein of thinhabitants (contrary to thorder set downe) opened suddeinly one of the gates, to let in a cart loden with meale: when Monsr Bonneuall standing right against the gate (for the traine of Escud dispersed about the wals enuironed a great part of it) aduaunced with certein mẽ at armes to enter the gate: But he was repulsed & the gate shut vpon him with a great crye, which pearsing euen to the place where Monsr Escud and the gouernor consulted together, it was the cause that they of the towne and certeine of thexiles standing by trowpes vpon the walls of the Arche, gaue the boollet to such as stoode neare to Monsr d'Escud, and in that violence so hurt Alexander Tryuulce that he dyed of the woundes within tenne dayes, although he had not deserued the stroake of suche a calamitye, for that he had disswaded thenterprise of Reggia: The terror of this suddeine violence made the others seeke sauetye by fleeing, and no other thinge preserued Monsr d'Escud, but a feare that he had who aymed and leuelled at him, least he should strike the gouernor: This astonished not a litle Monsr d'Escud, who tooke occasion of the violence, to complayne of infidelitie and faith breaking, and according to the face of his perill not knowing what resolucion to take whether to tary or to flee, the gouernor tooke him by the hande, and perswading him to followe him vppon his fayth, he ledde him vppon the Arche, being accompanied with none other of his trayne then Monsr la motte, a gentleman of Fraunce: It was a thing wonderfull that all the bands of men at armes vnderstanding that Monsr d'Escud was entred within the gate, were possessed forthwith with an opinion that he was made prisoner, A conceit which made them fal to fleing with such generall feare and confusion, that many of them cast a way their launces, refusing, to " make them more light and easie to flee, the weapons which they brought to defend " their liues: such a matter is feare, that oftentymes it makes men forsake the thinges

that

that they ought moſt to employ for their ſauetie: In this confuſed feare, there were fewe that either looked backe, or once taried for Monſr d'Eſcud, who finding after long reaſoning that the diſorder grewe vpon his owne people, was immediatly diſmiſſed of the gouernour, in whome was no intencion to keepe him reteyned, both for not defiling his faith giuen, and alſo to obſerue the commiſſions he had of the Pope to make no violent demonſtracion againſt the king: as alſo in regard that the effect of the rebelling of the ſtate of Millan did not follow, as many beleued at that time: for, notwithſtanding the trowpes of men at armes fell all to fleeing, yet ſeeing no man purſued the chaſſe for that there were then within Reggia verie fewe horſemen, and withall meeting vpon the limittes and confines of the countrey of Reggia, with Federyke Boſſole who haſted to marche on with his regiment of a thowſande footemen, they ſtayed and drewe them ſelues eftſoones into order: Neither had the feare continued that was begonne at Parma and at Millan by the firſt rumors that came that Eſcud was holden priſoner and the men at armes broken notwithſtanding it had bene knowen that the bandes of men at armes had bene hoale, for that neither was there neare at hande any armie or force to make any ſtirre, and withall many other Capteines of men at armes were there remeining. But aſſoone as Monſr d'Eſcud had reaſſembled his companies of horſemen and footemen, he retyred to Coriagne a village in the countrey of Reggia not ſix myles from the city: from thence within certeine dayes after, he withdrewe to the confines of Parma on thother ſide the riuer of Leuzo, and ſent la Motte to the Pope to tell him what moued him to goe to Reggia, and withall to ſolicite him in vertue of the capitulacions which were betwene the french king and him, to expulſe out of the dominions of the church, ſuch as were holden rebells againſt the king.

About this time there happened at Millan a matter of no leſſe wonder then feare, which brought to the frenchemen no ſmall aſtoniſhment as if the heauens by manifeſt ſignes had giuen them a forewarning of their calamities to come: For, vpon the day that is ſolemnly conſecrated to the memory of the death of the Prince of Apoſtles, the ſunne being ſette and the aire and firmament cleare, there fell downe from the vppermoſt regions as it were a fire, and light affore the gate of the caſtell, whether were brought many barrells of gunpowder drawne out of the caſtell to be ſent to certeine places of ſeruice: This flaſhe or fierie lightninge embraſed by and by the powder with a horrible noyſe, and by the violence of it the faire tower of marble builded ouer the gate and bearing vppon his toppe a goodly clocke, was caſt downe and raſed from the toppe to the fundacion: In which furie did communicate alſo the walls and chambers of the caſtell with other buildinges adioyning the tower: Yea in one inſtant all the whole bodie of the caſtell, together with the vniuerſall Citie of Millan trembled and ſhaked with the furie of ſo raging a tempeſt, which blewe into the aire from ſundrie places many huge and greate ſtones falling to the hurte of many perſons: And as in a generall calamitie euerie one hath his fortune, ſo there were many that being happie to eſcape the fall of the huge ſtoanes were made wretched by the ruines of the walles vnder the which they were ſmoothered and rammed to death: with which ruines, the caſtell greene was ſo ſpredde and couered that it was a terror to beholde ſuche an alteracion, but ſpecially it brought aſtoniſhment euen to the moſt aſſured to ſee the ſtones of incredible greatneſſe which the furie of the tempeſt had caſt more then fiue hundred paſes from the place: It happened in the verie hower wherein the people of all ſortes were gone for their recreacion to take the ayre vppon the greene, by which occasion were slaine more then fiue hundred footemen of the castell, and the Capteine of the rocke and the castell, together with others of principall place so amazed and desperat both in corage and councell, that if the people would haue taken the benefit of that accident and falne to armes, they might without difficultie that night, haue occupied the castell, specially so great a quantitie of the wall being reuersed.

After the Pope was aduertised howe Monsr d'Escum was come euen to the gates of Reggia, he serued his turne of that enterprise, and enforced it to the iustificacion of his owne actions, he complained greatly of that doing in the consistorie of Cardinalls, where, concelling the confederacion made secretly affore with Cæsar, and also the direction that both their gallies shoulde be armed to the assailing of Genes, he declared, that since Monsr d'Escum had attempted to take Reggia, it was to be supposed that the french king bare no good minde to the sea Apostolike: he concluded that for the defense of the Church and the rights of the same, he was constrained to ioyne with Cæsar, in whom had neuer bene discerned any action that was not worthie a Christian Prince, and the same expressed as well in his other operacions, as in his late zeale which he published at VVormes touching the protection of religion: Therefore he made semblance, and showe to contract then, with Don Iohn Emanuell Cæsars Embassador, the confederacion which had bene concluded affore, and for that matter he caused to be sent for to Rome, Prospero Colonno, vppon whom was determined the charge of the enterprise, and with whome they consulted in what manner and with what forces, they should enter into open warre, seeing they had found no successe in ambushes and assaultes suddeine, like as in deede the treatie of Coma did no more happely succeede then thenterprise of Genes: for, as Manfroy Paluoysin & M. de Brinzi were by night drawne neare the walls of Coma with eight hundred footemen, as well Italians as launceknights, hoping that Anthonie de Rusquo a citizen there would breake downe so much of the wall next ioyning to his house, as they should haue meane to enter, where, for the slender strength of frenchmen that were there, they supposed would be offered no resistaunce: And after they had expected some good space of time, the gouernor of the place, assembling together all the frenchmen with certeine of the townesmen whose fidelity he held most assured (& yet their numbers were lesse then they that were without) gaue the charge vpon them with a violence and suddeines so terrible, that they brake and fell easely into flight, not without suspicion that he had corrupted the Almaine Capteynes both with money and greater promises: In the chasse three barkes were sunke vpon the lake, & seuen taken: Many of the generall souldiers fell into the fortune of prisoners, and amongest the chieftaines were taken Matto and Manfroy as they fled by the way of the mounteines: The launceknights were suffred to goe away freely, and the residue were led to Millan, where Manfroy and Matto were publikely quartered: They confessed in their execucion, that Bartl. Ferrery of Millan a man of place and authoritie, was consenting to the practises of Moron: vpon which accusation he was imprisoned together with his sonne, & so committed to the same punishment for that he had not reuealed that Moron had induced him by secret messages, to practise innouations, and to raise enterprises against the king: About this time, the Pope knowing of what oportunity was the state of Mantua for the warres of Lombardy, tooke to his paye Federike Marquis of Mantua with two hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horsemen, and indued him with the title of Capteine generall of the Churche: But before he possessed him selfe of thinterteinment of the Pope, he renounced nounced the order of S. Michaell, and returned the coller and enseigne that the king had giuen him to him who first receiued him into that order.

This was the resolucion set downe at Rome betwene the Pope and Cæsars Embassador touching the order and maner of proceeding in this warre, and that according to the counsell and reasons of Prospero Colonno: First, that along the frontiers of the Church, inuasion should be made with all speede possible vpon the state of Millan, employing in that enterprise the companies of men at armes of the Pope and the Florentins: A regiment which (comprehending the bandes of the Marquis of Mantua) mounted to the full number of sixe hundred men at armes, and to them were to be adioyned all the bandes of men at armes which Cæsar had in the realme of Naples, being almost as many as the residue: That there should be leauyed sixe thousande footemen Italians: That the regiment of two thousande footemen Spanishe which were with Adorno in the ryuer of Genes should come to the armie, making their assembly betwene the countrey of Modena and Reggia: That the Marquis of Pesquiere should bring two thousande other footebands from Naples: That there should be leauyed of the common purse of the Pope and Cæsar foure thousande Launceknights and two thousand Grisons: That there should be also ioyned to tharmie the two thousande Svvizzers which remayned voluntarily in the Popes paye: for the residue of their countreymen both wearie with wandring so long time without any thing doing, and also the season of their haruest drawing on, were nowe returned to their countrey affore Monsr d'Escum came to Reggia, neither coulde the Pope retayne them any longer, notwithstanding he had vnprofitably consumed amongest them an hundred and fiftie thousande duckets. Besides these prouisions, it was determined that with the authoritie of the Pope and Cæsar, there should be instance made to the Svvizzer Cantons, both to aduaunce six thousande footemen according to the tenor of the contract whiche the Pope had made with them, and also to refuse to minister any succours of men to the French king: And the better to draw them to his demaund, the Pope alleaged that the cõfederacion which he had made with them, was affore that which they had contracted with the French king. If these demaundes were obteined, it was resolued in the generall order and resolucion of the warre, that the Duchie of Millan should be inuaded on that side towards Coma, in which quarter was hope that there would be made some insurrection, both for the great multitude of the banished men being the most part of honorable houses, and also for that the auncient reuerence and affection which the people were wont to beare to the name of king Lovvis, was conuerted into hatred, and that not litle: The reason was that the men at armes ordinarie for the garde of that estate, lyued in a great and vnbridled libertie, the rather for that they were yll payed through the yll order the king vsed in his affayres, wherein partly by necessitie and partly by will, he had couenanted to allowe huge exspences: The gouernours rising more insolent and hawty by the negligence of the king, did not minister that true and liuely iustice whiche they were wont to execute with integritie and roundnes in the time of the late king, who bearing a deare affection to the Duchie of Millan, had alwayes a particular care and regarde to thinteresses of the people and subiectes there: This was also one thing that went harde with them, that they were constrayned according to the custome of Fraunce, to lodge continually in their houses the officers and souldiors of the Frenche, which albeit was nothing of their exspences and charges, yet the trouble beeing perpetuall and generall, it was so muche the more intollerable and grieuous: And albeit it was a yoke which they bare during the time of the late king, who enforcing thexample of Paris, would neuer exempt the subiectes of Millan, yet the discommoditie drawing with it the other euills that we haue spoken of, it seemed to them for the present verye heauye and yrkesome: To this also was added the common nature of the people alwayes desyrous of newe things, together with a vehement thirste and inclinacion which mortall men haue to deliuer themselues from perplexities present, not considering what will be the euent and afterchaunce of things.

The rumor of this warre set downe by the Pope and Cæsar with so mightie preparacions, gaue warning to the Frenche king to looke to the defending of Millan with prouisions no lesse resolute and well appoynted: wherein, not to delaye the daunger that was so imminent and manifest, Monsr Lavvtrech who was vppon his waye to go to the Court for certayne his particular affayres, was eftsoones readiorned and remaunded to returne to Millan: And albeit, doubting of the kings varietie and negligence, and inconstancie of suche as gouerned, he refused the iorney, vnles they first deliuered him in prest three hundred thousande duckets which he assured to be no more then necessarie for the defence of that state: yet being no lesse ouerruled with thimportunities of the king and his mother, then beguyled with the promises and othes of such as had the charge of his treasor, assuring him that his person and the money he demaunded should arriue there with one speede: He embraced the iorney and returned thither with great diligence, putting carefully in order all things necessarie for the defence: This was the order which he set downe with the king, that to the kings men at armes which were then in Lombardie, shoulde be ioyned the six hundred men at armes, and six thousande footemen which the Venetians were bounde to contribute to the kings seruice, whom they offred to aduaunce spedily, making their men at armes to marche euen by the countrey of Verona & Bressia: That there should be leauyed ten thousande Svvizzers, which they helde for certayne would not be denyed by vertue and tenor of the newe confederacion: That they should cause to passe into Italie six thousande aduenturers, and to adioyne to the whole armie certayne bandes of Italian footemen: With these forces he hoped without great daunger to be hable to aduenture the fortune of a battell, or being to weake for suche an action, he should at least sufficiently strengthen his places with garrisons of men, and so temporise vpon the defending of them, that both thenemies in time would draw to be wearie: the one by his naturall prodigality and huge exspences disbursed in the warre of Vrbin, was drayned of all money and treasor, and for the other he stoode so abridged and restrayned at that time, that the tributes and reuenues which he leauyed of his kingdomes and dominions, could not suffice to furnishe for any long season the exspences of suche a warre: This was also considered, that Alfonso d'Este dispayring of his proper estates if the victorie fell to the Pope, would eyther ryse to recouer that which he had loste, or at least standing vpon his readinesse, would so holde the Pope in suspicion, that of necessitie he should employ many bandes of souldiors for the garde of townes and places adioyning his confines and limits. These were the counsels and preparacions of bothe partes, the king neuertheless labouring by all his meanes (but in vayne) to reappease the Pope.

At that time Prospero Colonno was at Bolognia, and from thence not tarying for the regimentes that were to come from the kingdome of Naples, nor the bandes of launceknightes, after he had mustred his other companies, and left sufficient garrisons within Modona, Reggia, Bolognia, Rauenna, and Ymola, for feare of the Duke of

Ferrara,

Ferrara, he marched and encamped vpon the ryuer of Lensa within fiue myles of Parma: he nouriſhed himſelfe with a full hope that the Frenchmen could drawe no ſtrength of footemen from the Sovizzers, and that aſwell for that diſappoyntment as for the yll diſpoſicion of the people, he ſuppoſed they would rather abandon then defend the Duchie of Millan: but it happned otherwiſe: for the Cantons, notwithſtanding the vehement labor to the contrarie made by the Cardinall of Sion and thembaſſadors of the Pope and Cæſar, determined to deliuer to the kinge, bandes of men ſuche as they were bounde to leauie by the laſte conuencions: And whyleſt thoſe leauyes were in preparing, George Sopreſſan was diſcended to Millan with foure thouſande footemen Valeſiens: by reaſon of whiche ſuccour, Monſr Lavvtrech deſirous to defende Parma, ſent thither Monſr d'Eſcud his brother with foure hundred launces and fiue thouſande Italian footemen, ouer whome Federike Boſſolo was capteine: Moreouer it was vnderſtanded that the Venetians made their mooſters at Pontvvicquo to ſende ſpeedily to the ayde of the Frenche king, and alſo that the Duke of Ferrara leauyed certen regiments of footemen: By reaſon of theſe preparacions, Proſpero ſeeing what neede he ſtoode of greater forces, kept himſelfe incamped vij. days in that place, during which time there ioyned to the armie foure hundred Spaniſh launces ledde by Antho. de Leua & drawne out of the kingdome of Naples: there came alſo to the armie the Marquis of Mantua with part of his regimentes, and yet for his comming being capteine generall of all the ſouldiors of the Church, was nothing altered the authoritie of Proſpero Colonno, in whoſe perſon according to the Popes will and Cæſars, reſted the gouernment of the whole armie, but without any ſupreme title, for that to Frauncis Guicciardin was giuen ſoueraigne and abſolute power to commaunde ouer the whole regimentes of the Church, and namely ouer the Marquis of Mantua, and did beare this title, Generall commaunder ouer the army, A place which he exerciſed with a right great authoritie, farre contrarie to the cuſtome of the generall cõmaunders before. After this Proſpero led the armie to S. Lazaro within a myle of Parma, taking the waye that goeth to Reggia: There he determined to paſſe no further tyll the Marquis of Peſquare were come, who was then vehemently exſpected to marche from Naples with three hundred launces and two thouſande Spaniſhe footemen: he looked alſo to receiue there the regiments of launceknights that were to come: And ſo long as the armie remayned there, there were no other violences done vpon the countrey men of Parma, then by common induſtrie, to turne the ſtreames and courſe of waters, and by breaking downe their mylnes, to take from them all meane and vſe of grinding: There was great exſpectation when and what way the launceknightes would come, and to hinder their paſſing, the Venetians at the inſtance of the French, ſent parte of their regimentes vpon the territories of Verona: for it was knowne by relacion, that beeing come to Iſpruch, they ſought to receiue at Trent their firſte monethes paye, and required that there might be ſent to meete them, certayne numbers of horſemen, to thend that being once deſcended to Montbalde, they might with more ſuretie paſſe on with their bandes: wherevpon Proſpero Colonno had diſpatched to Mantua two hundred light horſemen, to thend that ioyning with two thouſande footmen commaunded by the countrey of Mantua, they might aduaunce and marche together with thartilleries of the Marquis, who (to be the more acceptable to the Pope and Cæſar) proceeded in all things as in his owne action, and not in the condicion of one marcenarie or taking their paye. But it was a matter of farre greater difficultie to make payment of thinterteinmentes of the Launceknightes at Trente, for that the Pope did not onely make prouision of his parte, but also disburſed Cæſars porcion, neither could the money haue paſſage ouer the landes of the Venetians but with great difficultie and perill: In ſo muche as the Launceknightes hearing what impedimentes the Venetians would obiect againſt their comming, required for their ſuretie greater forces, and varyed at the ſame tyme touching the paſſage of the mountayne and the waye, notwithſtanding that the Marquis of Peſquaere turned his companies vpon the partes of Mantua, and was at that time arriued vpon the landes of Modona, and had ſent to him from the campe two hundred men at armes & three hundred Spaniſh footemen: At laſt the launceknights hauing no deuocion nor patience to attend the time they had ſet downe & ſignified, ſent a newe aduertiſement that they would eftſones cut of & leſſen v. days, with this reſolucion that they would not exſpect the horſemen more then one day at the foote of Montbaldo, and if they came not, they would returne back againe: At which time the Marquis of Peſquaere being not able to be there to hold appointment, they were conſtrained to ſend from the campe in great diligence, Guido Rangon & Levvis Gonſaguo, which neuertheleſſe ſerued to no purpoſe, for that (as Proſpero did alwaies warrant & aſſure) the Venetians were not able to ſtop the paſſage to 6000. footmen (that being their number aſwell launceknights as Griſons) A force able to haue encountred the bands of horſmen, & for th Italian footemen, they had no corage to oppoſe againſt them: For which reaſon, & alſo for that the ſenat (to whom was alwaies hatefull that the warre ſhould be managed vpon their proper eſtate) ſought to ſatisfie the frenchmen more with demonſtracions then with effects, they cauſed to retyre towards Verona all their bands and regimentes the day before the launceknightes ſhould paſſe: By which occaſion they found libertie of paſſage & went to Valegge without any impediment, & ſo the day after they drewe vpon the confines of Mantua: And aſſone as the Marquis of Peſquaero was come to the campe, the armie that had remayned three dayes at S. Lazaro, marched the day folowing to S. Martin, where did ioyne with them the ſame day the footemen of the launceknightes and Griſons.

The capteines of the league take counſell togesher.

Thus the forces ordeined for this warre, reduced and drawne into one army, the capteines began to conſult what was to be done: ſome gaue counſell to beſiege Parma, both for that it was the firſt and chiefe towne of the frontier, and alſo that it was no ſuretie to leaue it behinde for the armie that was to come on, in regarde of the incommodities of vittels and conduct of money and other prouiſions that might be neceſſarie, and muche leſſe was it profitable for the townes that ſhould remayne betweene Parma and Bolognia: They alleaged that the footemen that were within Parma were bodies of no vallour, both becauſe they were leauyed in haſte and at randon, and alſo they made continuall diſorders, ſtealinge to the campe by ſtealth, no leſſe for the difficultie and ſtrayteneſſe of their payes, then for wante of meale and prouiſion for foode: That the circuite of the towne was great and the people yll diſpoſed, who thoughe they were embaſed of courage, woulde yet take heart when they ſawe the armie neare the walles: ſo that executing batterie vppon the Citie in many places, it would be heard for the French men at one tyme both to reſiſte thenemie without, and alſo kepe garde vppon the people that were within. Others reaſoned of the contrarie, that the Citie was well fortified, that it was ſtrong in bands of men, that touching the footmen that wandred frō them, they were people vnprofitable, vnapt, & cowardly, but the bodies bearing habilitie, experience, & diſpoſition to the warre remained there, together with many bands of the french ſouldiors, all reſolutely prepared to defend their life: Laſtly that without this

good ſuretie and prouiſion, it ſtoode not with the experience and conduct of Monſr d'Eſcud, Federike de Boſſolo, and other right braue and worthy capteins, to ſuffer them ſelues to be enuironed: That it was well knowen (for that of late time the maner of warrefaring and to keepe and defende a place was chaunged) what difficulties were in the taking of townes: And that it belonged to them to conſider throwly, in what degree of reputacion the armie ſhould ſtande, if they did not accompliſhe the firſte enterpriſe: That as they helde it neceſſarie to plant before Parma their artilleries in two ſeuerall places, ſo they had to looke whether the campe were furniſhed with artilleries and other prouiſions fitte for the action: That ſuche a quantitie of artilleries could not be drawen thither without the loſſe of certayne dayes, which (beſides the conſuming of too muche time before) would be an intermiſſion preiudiciall, for that in ſuche reſpite the Venetian companies and the moſte part of the Svvizzers, would be ioyned with Monſr Lavvtrech, who was daylye exſpected at Cremona: That one part of the regiment of Svvizzers was already arriued, and the forerunners of the Frenche armie weare neare at hande: That whyleſt the armie was intangled with the ſiege of Parma, it would bring no ſmall preiudice if Monſr Lavvtrech came and planted his campe affore ſome place adioyning: And as it would be a hard matter to force him to feight, ſo he might and would eaſily vexe the skowtes of the forreagers, and giue impedimentes to the vittells which dayly were brought from Reggia, and they already in diuerſe ſortes diſtreſſed by ſuche as were within Parma: That it were a better counſell to make prouiſion of vittells for certayne dayes, and and leauing Parma behinde, to proceede to ſurpriſe Plaiſance, A citie of farre greater circuite, and of leſſe ſtrength and garriſon of ſouldiors, the place voyde of fortifications and artilleries, and the people of the ſame diſpoſicion with them of Parma: That theſe reaſons remoued áll doubt that making their approches they ſhould not forthwith carye it, wherein Proſpero Colonno being of the ſame aduiſe and counſell, aſſured the reſidue that he knewe a place which in no ſort could be poſſible to hinder their entring, being the ſame by the which Frauncis Sforce at that time capteine ouer the peoples of Millan, made his victorious entry agaynſt the Venetians, who had occupied it after the death of Phillip Maria Viſconto: That Plaiſanca was a Citie wonderfully abounding with great quantities of vittels, and ſtoode ſo apte to aſſayle Millan that the Frenchmen would be conſtrayned to retyre thither moſte of their forces, by which meane the cities adioyning to Parma ſhould ſtande in no eſtate of daunger: Laſtly Proſpero helde himſelfe aſſured, that paſſing the ryuer of Pavv only with light horſemen, and ſo marching with diligence to Millan, that Citie woulde drawe into tumult hearing of the rumor of his name: Suche was his opinion affore he parted from Bolognia, and in that regarde, not thinking it needefull to ſtaye about the taking of any particular place, he would not haue a plentifull prouiſion of artillerie nor municions.

In this varietie of councels & opinions, it was determined by ſuch as had authoritie to deliberate and reſolue, that aſſone as ſufficient prouiſion might be made of meale and breade to nouriſhe the armie for foure dayes, a regiment of fiue hundred men at armes, one parte of the light horſemen, the regimentes of Spaniſhe footemen, and fifteene hundred footemen Italians, ſhould marche with great ſpeede towards Plaiſanca, and the reſidue of tharmie to come after, which could not marche but with ſlowe paſe by reaſon of thartilleries, vittels, and many other impedimentes following ordinarily a campe: And it was aſſuredly beleeued, that vpon tharriuall of the firſt companies, eyther the Citie would riſe for the Churche, or at leaſt they ſhould be a reaſonable let for thentring of ſuccours, & ſo vpon the comming of the reſidue and full force of the army, they made no dout to cary it: But it happened the day before that the army ſhould remoue, that certeine trowpes of french horſemen hauing paſſed the riuer of Pavv, ran vp euen as farre as Boſſetto: a matter which made a brute that the whole frenche army was come ouer Pavv, and therefore that accident breaking the deliberacion that had bene made, the departing of the bands was deferred vntill the certeinty and truth were knowen, for the diſcouery whereof they diſpatched Iohn Medicis Capteine of the Popes light horſemen with a trowpe of iiij hundred horſes. But that which moſt troubled this deuiſe & the execucion of it, was the ambicion & controuerſie that fell betwene Proſpero & the Marquis of Piſquaire betwene whom was no great agrement before: Proſpero contended to lead the vawward and principall parte of the army, againſt whom the Marquis alleaged that it was not reaſonable that the regiments of ſpaniſh footmen ouer whom he was Captaine generall, ſhould go to any expedicion without him: In regard of which ambicion & gelouſie of the chiefe capteines daũgerous moſt cõmonly for the affaires of princes, notwithſtanding it was knowen within few howers after, that the bandes of frenchmen were eſtſoones returned beyonde Pavv, and that Monſr Lavvtrech ſtirred not, yet the firſt reſolucion was not followed: But what by the diuerſitie of opinions and for the naturall ſlownes of Proſpero, things had proceeded in greater delayes & longnes, if the Popes Agent had not ſtept in with them, and declared with diſcourſe full of reaſons and efficacie, how much and how iuſtly the Pope might take offence that they had temporiſed ſo long: wherein they could not in any reaſonable ſorte excuſe them ſelues towards his holynes of the delayes and reſpits they haue vſed tell then, firſt in exſpecting the Spanyards, and then in tarying for the launceknightes: vpon whoſe admonicion they drew all to a preſent reſolucion (but more in maner of tumult, then by maturity of councell) to plant the campe before Parma, wherein euen ſuch as the day before had aſſured the contrary, beganne to haue a wonderfull hope of the victory, the rather for that the numbers and bodies of footmen ceaſſed not to iſſue out of Parma for want of money and foode: Onely it was reaſonable to make ſome ſurceance for certeine dayes, both to tary for two other canons that were exſpected from Bolognia & to make prouiſion of many other things neceſſary for thexecuting of townes with artillerie, matters which Proſpero had refuſed before: This, whether it may be called negligence, or mutacion of councell, brought no litle preiudice to the ſtate of thenterpriſe, for that by howe muche more time was waſted in temporiſing, or in that property of controuerſie, by ſo much more leaſure and reſpit was giuen to Monſr Lavtrech to aſſemble his companies which he exſpected out of

In this meane while, the armie remeyning idle, there was executed nothing touching the ſeruice of Parma, but certeine very light skirmiſhes: neuertheleſſe the third day after the campe was reduced to S. Martin, the army paſſing beyond the riuer of Parma, was lodged vpon the way of Rome in the ſubburbes of the gate that leadeth to Plaiſanca called S. Croſſe: Which ſubburbes Monſr Eſcud had burned the day before, hauing dout of their comming.

The towne of Parma is deuided by a riuer that beareth the name of it, whoſe ſtreame & channell is neither ſo deepe nor violent, but it may be alwayes paſſed by foarde ſauing in ſeaſons waterie and rainie: The leſſer parte of the towne, peopled

by men of baſe condicion and yet conteyning the thirde part of the whole, called by the inhabitantes Codipont, haue their dwelling on that ſide towardes Plaiſanca: The capteines made choyſe of this place, to be the more apt and ready to ſtoppe the entry of ſuccours into Parma, but much more for that on that part the wall was weake, and bare ſuche ſituacion that it coulde not beate the campe in flanke: The Marquis, who the daye before went with certayne other Capteines to take knowledge and view of the place, made his reapport the ſame day that the battery might eaſily be begon: but becauſe it was neceſſarie (the better to remoue their defences) to batter firſt a tower vpon the toppe of the gate, giuing no ſmall ſtrength to the wall, all the daye was waſted in that action and a greate Coluerine broken in the execution: The night following thartillerie was planted againſt the wall vppon the left hande of the gate to ſuche as entred, their purpoſe beeing to do the lyke on the righte hande, and to leaue the gate in the middeſt: The reaſon was for that hauing no conueniencie to beſtowe thartilleries in two places ſeperate, for that there were as yet brought to the campe no more then ſixe Cannons, and two great Coluerines, it ſeemed that by conſtrayning the defendauntes to bee amuſed at that defence for a long ſpace, it woulde worke all one effecte: But that deuiſe was not put in execucion, for that there was on that ſide vppon the compaſſe of the trenche that enuironeth the walles, a ryſing or mounte ſo highe, that vnleſſe it were eyther made playne or layde open (a matter vnpoſſible in ſo ſhorte tyme) it woulde giue greate impediment to thartillerie to batter the wall: The wall, for that it was olde and weake, made no greate reſiſtaunce to thartillerie, whiche hauing eaſily made two ſufficient breaches, the Capteynes ſpake of giuing the aſſault the ſame daye, notwithſtanding without anye firme or aſſured reſolucion: Onely the Marquis, who with his bandes of Spaniardes had the whole charge of the batterie, ſent certayne companies of footemen to diſcouer the breache, and to diſcloſe if they coulde what fortificacions they had within: Who beeing mounted vppon the wall, began to make ſhowtes and ſignes to the armie to approache and enter, in ſo muche that the footebandes of Spaniardes and Italians ranne to the wall more by heapes and trowpes then by order: But by that tyme they were approched and began to clymbe the breache, vppon the whiche was ſlayne Ierome Guicciardin leader of the footemen, the Capteines ranne thither with the Alarme, and cauſed them immediatly to retyre, doubting there coulde no good fruite come of that charge, being rather a feeble and weake tumulte then aſſault well ordred: This retraite eyther made colde all their thoughtes to the charge, or at leaſt ſo ſerued for excuſe, that that daye they forbare to followe the aſſault in order: The daye after they continued to batter the wall whiche ſtoode whole in the middeſt of the two breaches, and alſo a flanke, whiche had beene made within vppon the tower of the gate: But for that there ranne through the armie a brute, that for the huge rampiers whiche the Frenche had made, it woulde be harde to carye it with a ſimple aſſault, the Capteines ſent out to diſcouer the batterie two footemen of bothe the languages, who, eyther by feare, or by their little diligence, or perhappes by ſubornacion (as was ſuppoſed) brought worde that there remayned of the wall whiche had bene battered to the ground, more then fiue faddomes on height: They reported alſo that the defendantes had caſte a very deepe ditche, and had made ſo many other ſortes of fortifications, that it was determined to make mynes neare to the wall that was battred and to open the wall faſte by, and ſo with the ruines of the ſame, to fill the ditche that was made within, thereby to make the entrie more easie: It was also agreed that assoone as those workes were brought to perfection, and that the artilleries of the armie were increased with two Cannons that came from Mantua, there should be made an other batterie in that place where the wall by turning makes an angle after it hath gone foorthright a long space, on the right side of the gate, on which side, after the wall was caste downe, they mighte beate the defendantes in flanke: But as they beganne to caste a trenche on that side which had bene battered, and within fewe dayes after, an other, the better to caste downe the wall with the working of the mynes: so neuertheleſſe those workes proceeded slowly, aswell for that the necessarie prouisions and instrumentes for suche actions, were not yet in the campe, because Prospero nourished endes and thoughtes diuerse, as also for that the earth where they digged was harde to open bearing a propertie of soyle resisting their labor and diligence.

Whyleſt theſe thinges were in dooing, and a generall intencion not to assaulte the towne vntyll they were fully accomplished, Monsr de Lavvtrech who had bene slowe to marche for the long tarying of suche as came to tharmie, hauing nowe assembled the most part of his men of warre, aduaunced and marched fiue miles, holding alwayes along the riuer: He had in his army fiue hundred launces, seuen thousand Svvizzers, foure thousand footemen brought the same day by Monsr S. Valier out of Fraunce, and foure hundred men at armes with foure thousande footmen vnder Theodor Triuulco commaunder of the Venetian bandes, and Andreas Gritti their Legate or commissarie: There followed this armie the Duke of Vrbin, and Marke Antho. Colonno, the one as souldior to the French king, but without title and charge, and the other folowing the cõmon hope of such as were banished: he exspected also a regiment of six thousand Svvizzers which the Cantons had made him graunt of, they were already vpon their way, but according to their custome, they marched slowly and with many difficulties: All which forces beeing ioyned to his armie, he would not haue refused for the reskew of Parma, to aduenture the fortune of battell: In which regarde, what in exspecting suche as were to come, and what in soliciting and laboring the bandes already arriued, he stayed on the waye and went not farre from the shores of the ryuer of Pavv: Onely he feared leaſt whyleſt he temporised vppon those good causes, his brother might compounde with thennemies, and therefore he sente to him to lette him vnderstande, that the cause whye he prolonged and lingered so muche, was that he taryed for a greater force of Svvizzers who were neare at hande, and withoute whome the regimentes that were alreadye with hym made difficultie to passe Pavv: Neuertheleſſe he woulde drawe neare to Parma, and woulde giue him a token of hys comming by shooting of certayne peeces of artilleries, and so the daye following he woulde affront thennemie and prouoke them to feight, sending out certayne trowpes of his horsmen to enterteine the skirmishe, to thende he mighte wyth better oportunitie issue out and ioyne with the armie: A matter whiche Monsr d'Escud dyd chiefly solicite, who assured hym that he was not hable to holde oute aboue two or three dayes in that parte of the towne, and not aboue two dayes more beyonde the ryuer, both for that the towne was large and weake, and his forces remayning not aboue two thousande footemen, for that many of them were stragled awaye, and also the men at armes beeing but three hundred, vppon whome laye the burden of the seruice, were not hable to make resistance, if the towne were assaulted in many places: Thus afterwardes the same daye he had promised, he accoasted thennemies in the borough of Zibelle which is about twentie myles from Parma,

and from thence dispatched foure hundred horsemen to runne vp euen to the tents of thennemies, who hauing brought their mynes euen to the wall, and afterwards turning them and dressing them in the place where the fyre shoulde bee putte, Count Guido Rangon wyth thItalian footebandes ouer whome he was Capteine generall, beganne to plante thartilleries on the other syde of the wall: But the French men hearing the brute that was made in executing the mynes, hauing for two howres affore abandoned the Codipont, retyred in order and without noyse on the other side the water, drawing with them their artilleries: which retraite being knowen to those that were without, they entred into the Codipont the morning following at the breake of the daye, some making their waye by the breache, and some vsed the seruice of skaling ladders: They were receyued with an vniuersall gladnes of the Parmesans, to whom nothing coulde be more acceptable then to returne vnder the dominion of the Churche: But it was a ioye that drewe with it a present sorrowe and heauynes, and a gladnes that was easily conuerted into dolour and lamentations, for that they sawe affore theyr eyes their houses sacked and spoyled, in no lesse rigour and furye then if they had bene mortall ennemies: And it was not to be doubted that if certayne dayes before, the artilleries had beene planted in the same place, the French men had not in the same maner abandoned the*Codipont*: After their entrie, they fell to breaking open the gates which affore had beene rammed vp with no small industrie, and so the artillerie hauing passage euen to the shoare of the ryuer, they beganne to batter the wall that defendeth the other banke of the ryuer: but the neare approache of the night hindred the benefite and effecte of their working that waye, and by the little tyme they had lefte, it was well knowen they coulde do no great execution for that daye.

The same daye Monsr Lavvtrech came and incamped vppon the ryuer of Taro within seuen myles of Parma: some supposed hys comming so neare was to bydde battell to thennemie, but others were of opinion, that he aduaunced the full showe of his armye, to thende that eyther he mighte be readye to receyue his brother and his companies if they issued out of Parma by night, beeing no longer hable to holde oute: or else to enterteine some treatie or parley with thennemie for the better deliuerie of his brother and his souldiours with safetie and without obligacion, according to thexample of Federike de Bossolo, who had begonne a conference by the solicitation of the Marquis, notwithstanding he had receiued a hurte in his shoulder with a shotte not many dayes before as he walked about the rampiers: But the parley was not so farre forwarde, as that there coulde be made anye certayne coniecture of the wyll of Monsr d'Esud: The truth was (by thexperience of things that happned afterwardes) that Monsr Lavvtrech was not determined to fight, vnlesse the regimentes of Svvizzers came to him: for notwithstanding he had somewhat the aduauntage, both for the numbers and vallour of men at armes, and also was more mightie in artillerie, yet the ennemie was stronger then he in footemen, conteyning (according to a iust computacion and accompt) nyne thousande Launceknightes and Spaniardes, two thousande Svvizzers, and more then foure thousande Italians. Let it here be considered howe often and how much vpon smal accidentes & momentes in warres, depend things of very great consequence: for the night after the armie entred the Codipont, it hapned iust at thinstant that by aduertisemēts comming from Modona & Bolognia, they vnderstood that Alfonso d'Este issuing out of Ferrara with 100. men at armes, 200. light horsmen, and two thousande footemen, amongest whom were a thousand aswell Corsegneis as

Italians whiche Lavvtrech had ſent him, and with twelue peeces of artillerie, had ſurpriſed the borowes of Finalo and S. Felix, with great feare that he would paſſe further: This bred no ſmall trouble and terror in the mindes of the Capteines, notwithſtanding they had feare of ſuche a leauye long time before, beeing not ignorant with what vehement inſtance the Frenche men ſolicited him to it: And yet had they not made at Modona ſuche a prouiſion as might ſuffice for the ſuretie of that Citie, for that Proſpero maynteining to thuttermoſte the contrarie opinion, would neuer conſent that ſouldiours ſhoulde bee drawne out of the armie to be ſent to Modona: his reaſon was, that eyther he reappoſed aſſured fayth in the promiſes of the Duke who was his right deare friend, and with whom euen vnder the Popes directions, he was interpoſed to ſolicite ſome accord: or elſe for that he had no will to diminiſhe the number of his men of warre in a tyme when they feared thennemie would approche: One principall reaſon mighte be alſo taken of hys naturall diſpoſicion alwayes inclined to do things ſurely, which made him for the moſt part to deſire to haue in his armie more men then the ſeruice needed: It may be he had other ends and conſideracions more ſecret and priuate to him ſelfe, then to be knowen of others by any coniecture or apparance: Onely aſſone as the aduertiſementes were throughly diſcloſed and vnderſtanded, the Capteines aſſembled in counſayle vpon thoſe affayres, determined that Guido Rangon ſhould preſently departe for Modona with two hundred light horſemen and eight hundred footmen, which being ioyned to the ſix hundred footmen that were left there before, they thought would be a ſufficient ſtrength & garriſon agaynſt the forces of Alphonſo: After they had ſet downe this order and reſolucion, there remayned yet certayne howres affore it was day: A little before alſo there came aduertiſement that Monſr Lavvtrech was incamped the night before vppon Taro, which aduertiſement was partly true and partly doutfull, for that it conteined that the Svvizzers were ioyned with him, and it was not knowne that thoſe which he had then in tharmie, notwithſtanding his infinite requeſtes, had made him no further promiſe then to come to Taro: The Capteines, though they were not aſſembled for that matter, yet ſeeing there yet remayned certayne howres of the night, and by that occaſion they had no neceſſitie to employe themſelues ſeuerally in other affayres, they beganne to reaſon amongſt them ſelues rather to beguyle the tyme, then by waye of counſell, into what eſtate things would be reduced nowe that Lavvtrech did approche: In which diſcourſing it ſeemed the wordes and reaſons of Proſpero, the Marquis, and Vitelli, tended to this end: That it would be harde to take Parma, if they planted not a battrie on the other ſide the Citie: for that though the wall beyonde the water ſhould be executed, which they had begon to batter the daye before, yet there woulde be a wonderfull difficultie to climbe vp from the bottome or lower part of the ryuer to the banke: Neither could they put that matter in practiſe without great daunger, for that thartilleries and ſhotts beſtowed vpon the three bridges ſtanding vpon the ſame ryuer, and in the howſes there adioyning, woulde be as flankers to the perill of ſuche as offred to clymbe the banke: They reaſoned that the neighborhood of Monſr Lavvtrech, who was to marche on and incampe in ſome place towards Pavv, though he would not attempt the fortune of the fielde, would be the cauſe that thaſſalt could not be giuen without great daunger: Moreouer it was to be conſidered that by reaſon of the pillage and ſacke which had bene lately made of part of Parma, there were many footemen gone away laden with ſpoyle, and the other that remayned were more carefull to ſaue the things they had gotten, then diſpoſed or apt to feight: That the

armie could not remayne there without many difficulties, discommodities, & dangers, for that as it should be necessarie for the seruice to sende out euery daye great trowpes and bandes, not onely to defende the forragers, but also for the suretie of vittels and money which came dayly, making a long circuit about the walles of Parma: So, whyleſt suche trowpes shoulde occupie the fieldes, it might come to passe that the residue of the campe should haue to do at one tyme with the Frenche men that were without, and such also as were within: They brought into discourse also, that if the Duke of Ferrara reenforced his armie with moe bands of souldiors, they should be driuen of necessitie to leauie from the campe farre greater forces for the suretie of Modona and Reggia: yea, if he ouerrunne the countrey with suche bandes as he had, he might so hinder the resorte of vittelles that they shoulde be dryuen to breake vp and dissolue the campe, extremities which brought with them manyfest apparances of moste great daungers: These reasons albeit they expressed an inclinacion to leauye the siege, yet they were so cloaked and dissembled, that it coulde not be discerned that suche was their counsayle and intencion: At laste after they had occupied many reasons and long discourses, the Marquis of Risquaire seeming to haue already comprehended thintention of the residue, sayde that he discerned well ynough that there was amongeſt them all one opinion and counsell, but euery one seuerally respecting his particular, was content to vse silence expecting that the mouth of an other should be the author of the thing which they conceiued in their hartes: But for my part, sayd he, depriuing my selfe of suche interest and respect, I can not but pronounce in the presence of you all, that as whyleſt we remayne about the confines of Parma our daungers are greater then our hopes, & our labors more then the fruites we shall reape, so, to auoyde greater euilles, I thinke it very necessarie we leauye and departe: Prospero iustifying the wordes of the Marquis, alleaged that he had expressed no lesse, had not the celeritie of the Marquis preuented his slownes to speake: Vitelli confirmed thopinion of them both: but Antho. de Leua well allowing of the breaking vp of the campe from thence, made this proposition, to consider whether it were not better to go seeke Monsr Lavvtrech and to giue the charge vpon him: Wherevnto it was aunswered, that as it would be very harde to constrayne the enemie to fight, so also to remayne there would be a matter so much the more impossible, by howmuche the difficulties that were to be brought into cõsideracion about their abyding there, would ryse farre greater, seeing it was not vnlikely to come to passe, that the regiment of two thousande Swvizzers would not followe them: Both for that many dayes before, they had receiued cõmaundement from the Cantons to depart out of the Popes pay: and also it was not likely that they would be drawne or disposed to feight agaynst an armie wherein were so many bodies of the same language and nation: Moreouer it could not be denied, but that by reason of the sacke and pillage made the daye before, it would be very hard to moue the footemen that were so disordered: So that this counsayle and the reasons of it beeing reiected, it seemed that the opinions and willes of all the Capteines drew to this, that it were best to breake vp the campe from before Parma: Vpon which resolucion no lesse settled then vniuersall, Prospero and the Marquis, withdrawing themselues a parte from the residue, after long conference in priuate, demaunded of the Popes Legate, what the Pope would saye if they leauyed the campe: The Legate aunswered the Marquis with this question: shall we not take Parma this daye, according as you assured vs yesternight? To whom the Marquis replied in his Spanish language, neither this day, nor to morow, nor after to morow: The Legate sayde it could not be doubted, that the Pope would not be right greatly discontented with the matter, for that it would altogether depriue him of the hope of the victory: Onely he sayde that the point of that deliberacion consisted in the truth or error of the suppoſicions and reasons by them set downe, for that if to surceasse and absteyne were a matter daungerous & without hope, it could not be doubted that to remeine there were great indiscression, but if it were otherwayes, to breake vp could not but bring slaunder of too great disorder. Therfore he willed them to cõsider with deepe councell and discression, both the state of the armie and importance of thinges, and to ballance indifferently whether was the greater, either the daunger or the hope: But Prospero and the Marquis stoode continually vpon this, that all reasons and rules of warre aduised them to retyre, against whome being Capteines of such name and authoritie, the Legat forbare to obiect any further: Insomuch as it was set downe the same daye that the campe should breake vp, and thartilleries should be retyred from the walls, which being published thorow the campe, it was blamed as a resolucion tymerous and fearefull by all those that were not present at the councell: And albeit it was a councell euen then disposed to execucion, yet by the murmure of the vniuersall body of the campe, the Legat and Moron ioyning together, labored to alter Prospero and retyre him from his opinion: They found him not much estraunged to consult againe & call a new councell, alleaging with wordes and reasons so much the more worthy & commendable, by howmuch was great or graue the personage that spake them, that he held it no shame to chaunge councell when he was encoũtred with better reasons, and therefore caused eftsoones to be summoned all such as were at the first resolucion: But the Marquis of Pesquare, being busie about retyring thartillerie, would not heare speake of chaunging the first conclusion, and refused to come to councell, Insomuch as the matter remeyning rather confused then resolued, they proceeded to execute the first determination: Thus the same daye which was the xij since their encamping, they returned to S. Lazaro, And at the departing, there wanted not much of a very great disorder: for that the footemen laũceknights, demaunding so vnreasonable condicions touching their payes that they could not be accorded, refused to follow the armie, And the old Capteines that impugned the councell, concurring with them in that tumult, had created amongest them selues, a Capteine & Author of that sedicion: In which disorder it was feared lest they would compownd and accord with the french men, neuertheless the army being already gone, and no hope that the sentence or resolucion woulde be altered, they prepared also to depart, and followed the armie: In this manner of perturbacion, the army being full of feare and faction both for so suddeine a breaking vp, and for the tumult of the launceknights, there is no doubt, if Lavvtrech had aduaunced and taken thoc-

" casion, that he had not easily put them all to flight: Such a thinge is disorder, that in " an armie deuided, it breedes more daunger then the multitude or sword of thenne-
" my: This suddeine discamping wonderfully afflicted the mind of the Pope, who expected from one day to an other, that newes would be brought to him that his soldiours were within Parma: he seemed to be depriued of his hope contrary to all reason and order, and that he was nowe entred into a most deepe subiection to a heauy and intollerable charge, for that (except the men at armes and the spanish footemen) he supported generally all the burden and expenses of the warre: But that which worse was, he was not without doubt of the Capteines imperials, whom many others held also suspected, perswading them selues that the retyring of the campe from before Parma, proceeded not of feare but of arte and cunning, as though they had had ſuſpected that after the Pope had recouered Parma and Plaiſanca (nothing elſe apperteining to him in theſtate of Millan) he would waxe wearie of the warre and the thoughtes thereof, forbearing any longer to ſuſteine ſo great a charge and trauell for thintereſtes of an other: he was induced to theſe ſuſpicions both by the long tracte and delaye that was vſed to plante the campe affore Parma, and alſo that they had beſtowed it in a place ſo vnapte and inconuenient, ſeeing the leſſer parte of the towne beeing taken, they were to deuiſe to take the other parte with the ſame difficulties: Laſtly they proceeded in the ſiege ſlowly and drawing things in delaye, as though they ment expreſly to giue time and reſpite to the ſuccours of the French: And being at laſte in poſſeſſion of one parte of the towne, they cowardly lefte it abandoned aſſone as they heard Lavvtrech approched, and yet he was not ſtronger then they: Some there were that ſuppoſed all this action might proceede (without the priuitie of Proſpero) of the arte and ſuttletie of the Marquis of Peſquairo, who as muche as he could was enuious and ielouſe of the glorie of Proſpero: Neuertheleſſe it might be that thoſe ſortes of men ſuppoſed the trueth, who beleeued that all was done with ſinceritie and good meaning, and that they were not puſhed on with other mocions then of a feare that Lavvtrech was at hande, wherein they were greatly beguyled by the firſt aduertiſements, by the which they were made to vnderſtand that his armie conteined farre greater forces: But it is moſt certayne that the french capteines maruelled more then all the reſidue, being reduced into a very ſmall hope to be hable to defende Parma, for that the Svvizzers, being gouerned more by their owne humors and nature, then obſeruing the neceſſities of thoſe that payed them their wages, were very long in comming: which made many amongeſt them (not attributing to feare ſo ſodayne a diſcamping) interprete rather that Proſpero, a wyſe and experienced capteine, knowing what diſorder the ſacking of Cities brings vpon armies, and conſidering howe harde it woulde be to reſtrayne the ſouldiours from ſpoyling of Parma, iudged it a matter of perill to take it, the enemies being ſo neare: What ſo euer was the cauſe, Monſr Lavvtrech after he had refurniſhed Parma with newe bandes, incamped at Fontanella, and within three dayes after he ſent one parte of the armie to take Roccabiangua, a borowe of the territories of Parma neare to Pavv, which after it had bene battred with artilleries, the borowe and the caſtell were rendred by Rolland Paluoiſin lorde of the place, himſelfe hauing liberty to departe: After this the army was diſperſed betwene S. Secondo and the ryuer of Taro, the better to be ready for imployment according to the proceedings of thenemies, and it was nowe become ſtrong & well reſolued, aſwell for the defence of Parma, as for that the newe regimentes of Svvizzers which were exſpected were nowe arriued at Cremona: The ſame being the cauſe that the armie of thenemies not ſeeming to be in ſufficient ſuretie at S. Lazaro, (notwithſtanding Monſr Lavvtrech had commaunded them not to ſtirre from thence) that they retyred to the ryuer of Lenſa on that ſide towards Reggia, with intencion to drawe yet further of, if the French men aduaunced: yea the capteines without further tarying, had made a greater retraite, if they had not bene conteined by the complaintes of the Pope and the Agentes of Cæſar, and touched with the murmure and blame of the whole armie. This was the behauiour and diſpoſicion of both the armies for many dayes, Lavvtrech notwithſtanding making diuerſe incurſions with his horſemen and the ſouldiors of Parma, euen vp to Reggia by the waye of the mounteine: wherein he gaue great impedimentes to the vittels which were brought to thenemies from Reggia, and that to the great diſcommendation of Proſpero, who woulde hardly ſuffer his light horsemen to do seruice,& very slowly prouided for the sauetie of such things, as he might haue remedied with good facilitie.

On the other side the mountes, the affayres of Cæsar ranne the same fortune, for that being entred into the dominions of the french king on Flaunders side, with a mighty armie, And holding Maisiers besieged with great hope to cary it, he was deceiued in his exspectacion, Insomuch as beeing not able to take it, for that a stronge succour of the french came to reskew it, he retyred with perill least his armie were broken and ouerthrowen.

The Popes Capteines and the Emprours take councell to passe further.

But in Italy, notwithstanding the successe of the warre was not happy nor acceptable, yet the thoughtes and councells of men, were nothing restrayned or forslowed; for, the enemies to the french, not deuising any more to take Parma or any other towne, determined to enter deeper into the Duchie of Myllan, ioyning to tharmie so many bands of Italians, that in all they conteyned six thowsand which were leauied from hand to hand: They were the more boldened to take this resolucion, by a hope they had that there would of new descend to the pay of the Pope, twelue thowsand Svvyzzers: who albeit had bene refused by the Cardinall of Syon soliciting openly in their parliaments against the french, and by Ennius Bishop of Verola the Popes Legat, and also by Cæsars embassadors, for that the Cantons would not deliuer such a regiment of their nation but for the defense of the dominions of the Church, and with expresse direction not to marche to offend the estates of the french king: yet for that they could not haue them with other reason, they were glad at last to accept them vnder the same condicion, hoping that being once discended into the regions of Italy, they might be induced to follow the armie against the Duchie of Myllan, and that either through their naturall inconstancie, or by their vniuersall couetousnes, or at least by the sleightes and corrupcions that might be ministred to their Capteines: In this deliberacion to passe further, there was no dout made into what quarter they would draw: for that, to continue the warre on this side the riuer of Pavv, could not be without manifest and right great difficulties, seeing it was a matter desperat to take Parma: And if they would leaue that citie behinde, they must of necessitie goe seeke out thennemies to fight with them, An action euidently daungerous for that they were lodged in a place of aduauntage and well fortefied with artilleries: To remeyne betwene Parma and them, or to passe further without fighting, there was no reason nor abilitie to doe so, for that standing betwene the townes that were possessed by them and tharmie, they should within few dayes be afflicted with penurie of vittells, the contry of thennemy denying all resort, and no possibilitie of traffike further of: All which difficulties would be auoyded in transferring the warre beyonde Pavv, for that in that contrey, naturally abounding in all thinges, and had not as yet tasted of the harmes of the warre, they made good warranty to find vittels sufficient, and to meete with no impediment vntill the riuer of Addo: Both for that, leauing Cremona on the left hand, and drawing neare to the riuer of Oglio, there were no places to make resistance, & also they were perswaded that the Senate of Venice would not (for thinteresta of others) deliuer vp their bandes of souldiours to the fortune of a battell: They beleued also that the french durst not oppose against them, but at the passage of the riuer of Addo: yea the vniuersall hope was, that the armie approching the Venetian frontyers, the Senat (for the sewertie of their owne estates) would call home the most parte of those souldiours which they had sent to the seruice of the french king: Lastly, ouer and besides all these consideracions, to passe beyond Pavv, fell out very aptly for the armie to ioyne with the Svvyzzers, A matter not of least

importance. But whileſt neceſſarie prouiſions were in preparing for this deliberacion, as artilleries, municions, pyonners, bridges, and vittells: And whileſt bandes of Italian footemen were leauied in Tuskane and Romagnia: Count Guido Rangon, vnder the Popes commaundement, marched towards the mountaine of Modena, with parte of the footemen that were alreadie leauied, and with thoſe bandes that were vnder his gouernment: This mounteine did neuer acknowledge other Lorde then the Duke of Ferrara, neither ſo long as Modena ſtoode vnder the iuriſdiction of Cæſar, nor afterwardes when it diuolued to the dominion of the Church: But the peoples of the contrie hearing howe armed men came to inuade them, made publike proteſtacion for the Churche, not tarying till they were aſſailed. At the ſame time fled from Millan Boniface Biſhoppe of Alexandria, and ſonne to the late Frauncis Barnardin Viſcounte: the cauſe of his euaſion, was, for that certeine conſpiracies which he had practiſed againſt the frenche, came to light: As alſo was diſcloſed a practiſe managed within Cremona by Nicolas Varola, one of the beſt ſort of the baniſhed men of that Citie, by reaſon of which conſpiracie, certeine inhabitantes in Cremona, partakers of the matter, were executed & made an example: a great number of thexiles of Millan followed tharmy, in whom I know not which was greater in thoſe ſeaſons, either their ill fortune, or their vndiſcreete behauior: for, beſides that all thenterpriſes that they tooke in hand drew very vntoward effects and ſucceſſe, yet being wholly giuen to pill and ſpoyle the contrie, they were the cauſe that there came not to the armie ſo great ſtoare of vittells as was neceſſarie, yea (except thinduſtry of Moron) they recompenſed not theſe euills by any diligence or intelligence of eſpialls: Laſtly, and which is of more importance then all the reſidue, Proſpero hauing ſent them long time before towards Plaiſanca, they executed great domages and hoſtilities indifferently both vpon their frends and enemies, and fell at laſt into ſuch ciuill contencion amongeſt them ſelues by reaſon of the booties, that Peter Scot of Plaiſainca a chieftaine amongeſt them, was ſlaine by Hector Viſcount and diuerſe others: Such deſtinie followeth vnlawfull pillage and ſpoyle, that being purchaſſed by vniuſt armes and violence, it either brings with it the ſeedes of ſedicion, hoſtilitie, and blood, or at leaſt leaues to the getters a miſerable vſe & fruicion. In this meane while Proſpero attempted to burne the barkes of the bridge which the frenchmen had retyred neare to Cremona with a very ſlēder gard, he ſet vpon this enterpriſe to this end, to winne ſo much the more time to enter the contrie, whileſt Lavvtrech ſhould reaſſemble the barkes neceſſarie to reedifie the bridge: But the expedicion being impoſed vpon Iohn de Medicis, ſent out to that ende with two hundred light horſemen and three hundred ſpaniſh footemen, the longnes of the way was the cauſe that he coulde not arriue there till after the night was paſſed: Inſomuche as the maryners iudging ſome violence by the noyſe or brutes that were made, retyred the barkes into the middeſt of the riuer of Pavv, where thennemie that lay planted vppon the ſhoare, had no way to offend them: At laſt when all thinges neceſſary to paſſe Pavv were prepared, the army marched to Breſſelle where was erected a bridge of barkes: But affore they paſſed ouer, for that to their purpoſe to offend an other, was ioyned a neceſſitie to ſee to the defending of them ſelues, there was ſent to the gard of the townes of the Church which ſhoulde remeine behinde, Vitello Vitelly with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, the like number of light horſemen, and two thowſand footemen of the penſion and pay of the Florentins: In like ſorte went thither the Biſhoppe of Piſtoya with the regiment of two thowſande Svvizzers, who were turned to that enterpriſe, for that it ſeemed to ſtand neither with ſurety nor pollicie to lead them against the frenche, in whose armie was so stronge a power of the same nation deliuered to them by vniuersall decree, and bearinge their publike ensceignes: Neither were they assured what the newe companies of Svvizzers would resolue, who being mustered and assembled at Coire, there was dayly exspectacion of assured aduertisements that they had taken the fieldes to marche: The Bishoppe and Vitelly had charge, not onely to defende Modena and other townes of the Church if any inuasion were made, but also to assaile the Duke of Ferrara, who attributing to him selfe the glorie to haue deliuered Parma, and occupied Finalo, and S. Felix, passed not further, for that the Pope (in whom was redoubled a hatred for that surprise) proceded against him with censures and excommunicacions of the Churche, to depriue him of the Duchie of Ferrara.

The armie of the league passeth the riuer of Pav.

Thus the army passed the riuer of Pavv the first of October, & went to incampe at Casalmaior: They consumed in passing not only all the day, but a great parte of the night, the multitudes of such as followed the campe giuing no lesse impedimentes then the baggage that was drawne and caried: In this the Capteines were muche deceiued, for that they made their reckoning to see the whole armie passed before noone, insomuch as what by the slownes and negligence of the straglers which are no small impediments to a campe marching, and what by the darkenes of the night, in which the vse of the eyes and hands is taken away, one parte of the artilleries and municions, with many bands of souldiours remeined dispersed the whole night betwene Pavv and Casalmaior, in daunger to be made a praye to euery small trowpe of enemies that would haue set vpon them in their disorder: yea it was not to be douted that if Monsr Lavvtrech, (who after he had assembled all his Svvizzers, came to incampe at Colorgne the same daye that the enemies incamped at Bresselle) had passed ouer his bridge at Casalmaior, which is but three myles from Colorgne, at thinstant that they made their passage, or at least at midday, had charged that parte of the armie whiche was not yet passed (for betwene Bresselle and Colorgne is but sixe myles) he had had good meane and oportunitie to bring his busines well to passe: „ But in warres many occasions are lost, for that the Capteines and leaders haue not „ alwaies knowledge of the disorders and difficulties that happen amongest thene- „ mies. The same night arriued at Casalmaior, Cardinall de Medicis whom the Pope sent as Legat into tharmy: This was the Popes reason to send him thither: That albeit he had very secretly begonne to giue eare to thEmbassador of the frenche king, yet for the feare he had least these aduersities and contrarie successes, together with the burden of the warre which was almost wholly reduced vpon him, shoulde giue occasion to Cæsar & his ministers to dout, that to shake of so many difficulties and doutes, he woulde chaunge his minde and turne his thoughtes to new deuises: he iudged there coulde be nothing more apt to assure them, and so by consequence to induce them to proceede more resolutely in the warre, then to send amongest them Cardinall de Medicis: Both for that by reason of his affinity and nearenes of kinred, he bare no litle authoritie with him, and also for that without his priuity and councell, they knew was done nothing of importance, notwithstanding he remeyned for the most parte at Florence: And besides that in him were concluded the verie councells and authoritie of the Pope, yet in sending him to tharmie, was thought to rest no small matter to hold vp the reputacion of thenterprise which was somewhat declined: And lastly it was likely that for the presence of so great a personage the Capteines would deliberate vpon thaffaires with a greater agreement and vnity: A matter of no litle necessity to be looked into & remedied, for that betwene Prospero and

the Marquis of Pisquairo, the quarrell roase more and more increasing, the rather for that the Marquis since the campe was leauyed from before Parma, seeking to lay vppon others thinfamie of that deliberacion, gaue aduertisementes to Rome that the resolucion had bene set downe without his counsell or priuitie. The armie rested one daye at Casalmaior, and from thence they marched along the territories of Cremona to drawe neare the ryuer of Oglia, where they arryued in foure remoues of marching: And in this whyle was nothing done of consequence, sauing that as the armie was lodged in a farme called la Corte de frati, there aroase a great fraye and mutinie betweene the footebandes of Spaniardes and Italians, in the which were slayne many of th Italian nacion, and yet more by the pollicie of the Spaniards then by their vallour, for that they knewe howe to vse thoportunitie of thoccasion: Neuertheless, by the authoritie and labor of the capteines, the matter was speedily reappeased. The daye before, Iohn de Medicis alwayes pursuing thennemies, who the same daye that the armie stayed at Casalmaior, were passed the ryuer of Pavv somewhat higher towardes Cremona, brake a bande of Venetian estradiottes ledde by Marcurie, with whome were certayne Frenche horsemen, who tooke prisoner Dom Lovvis Caiettan sonne to the Duke of Tracetta, whose estate neuertheles was holden by Prospero Colonno: But assone as they came to incampe vppon the ryuer of Oglia, fortune beholding wyth better eye the affayres of the Pope and Cæsar, brake the sinister counsayles of the Capteynes, who had determined that from the farme of the Frears or Monkes, the Armie shoulde go to lodge in the towne of Bordelano, a place about eyght myles from thence, and vppon the same ryuer of Oglia: for, beeing not possible to drawe thither thartilleries by reason of the yll wayes, it was necessarie to staye in the towne of Rebecca, beeing in the mydwaye, and a place whiche is onelye seperate by the ryuer of Oglia from Pontvvike a towne of the Venetians: And whyleſt they incamped there, they had aduertisement that Monsr de Lavvtrech, beeing followed with the Venetian regimentes, and had also left at Cremona all his baggage and impedimentes of campe, was come the same daye to S. Martin, within fiue myles of that place, with full resolucion to meete thennemies the daye after in the fielde, if they offred to passe anye further: This troubled not a little the mindes of the Cardinall and the Capteines, for that the Senate of Venice, at suche tyme as they sent their people into Lavvtreches army, had signified that deliberation to the Pope with suche wordes as seemed to haue some power to stirre and moue him, not for any desire of the French victory, but for that he had not iust cause not to obserue the confederacion: They were also perswaded affore, and the comming of the Cardinall did well confirme that opinion, that Andrea Gritti had secret commaundement not to suffer his bandes to come to the fight: Which perswasion or opinion falling out to be false, it was necessarie to leaue there all their former counsells, since it was confessed of all men, that the armie of thenemie was farre aboue them in forces, conteining besides the horsemen whiche was mightie and strong, and seuen thousand footmen French and Italians, a puissant strength of ten thousande Svvizzers: But in the army of the Pope and Cæsar, the numbers of launceknights were so diminished, and the bands of the Spaniards abated, that scarcely were they hable to bring to the musters seuen thousande bodies, and of sixe thousande Italians (for that the moste of them were newe supplies and leauyed in haste) their number was more in consideracion then by their vertue.

Thus Prospero with the others, determined to tary in that place for the comming of the Svvizzers, who beeing vppon their waye, and the Cardinall of Syon that

ledde them, hauing ſent worde not to lynger for them in any place, it was thought they coulde not tarye aboue three or foure dayes: And therefore the moarning following, after the Capteines had diligently conſidered the ſituacion of the place, they reduced into a better fourme the lodging whiche the night before had bene made almoſte in tumulte and mutinie: In whiche action they dyd not conſider in what perill they ſtoode to be offended with the artilleries of the towne of Pontovvike whiche ſtoode vppon the oppoſite: for, this was the perſwaſion of the Cardinall de Medicis reteyning ſtyll his firſt impreſſions, that the Venetians who ſtoode not bounde to the Frenche kinge in other condicions then to ayde hym with men for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, would neuer conſent nor ſuffer that oute of their places ſhoulde be drawne anye meane to vexe the armie of the Churche and Cæſar: The difficultie of vittells was one thing that ſeemed contrarie to the reſolucion to tarrie for the Svvizzers at Rebecca, for beſides that the quantities that were carryed with the armie were not ſufficient to feede them but for verye fewe dayes, yet by reaſon of the harmes done by the exiles of Millan, and the vniuerſall fleeing and abandoning that was made through the whole contrey, there was ſupplyed and brought very little, and yet that more and more diminiſhed dayly: In reſpect of theſe difficulties and wantes, Guicciardin their Agent gaue this counſayle, that ſeeing there was no abyding there for wante of vittells, and leſſe exſpectacion of the comming of the Svvizzers who mighte be ſtayed by manye occaſions, it coulde not be preiudiciall to retyre backe agayne fiue or ſixe myles vppon the ſame ryuer to the confines of Mantua, where hauing vpon their backes the countreys of their friendes, they ſhoulde not feare thaffliction of famine or wante of prouiſions: He enforced this counſell with this reaſonable allegacion, that the thing which preſently might be done with ſuretie, might perhaps ſtande intangled with greater perill when ſo euer thennemies ſhoulde approche: This counſayle happly was not diſpleaſing to the Capteines, but the late infamie of the retyring from before Parma kept many of them reſtrayned from the libertie of free ſpeaking: They were alſo not a little caryed with the hope that the Svvizzers could make no long tarying, for that within ſix dayes they might eaſily diſcend from Coire to the territorie of Bergamo, and from thence they had no great way to make to ioyne with tharmie: So that beeing thus determined to awayte their comming at Rebecca, the prouiſions of meale carryed with the armie, were diſtributed by meaſure to all the bandes: And becauſe there were in the campe no ouens portatiue, and the houſes wherein any were buylt were taken vp by the ſouldiours, euerye one for his particular feeding baked vppon ſtones and hotte coales, the parte that was deliuered to him for his prouiſion: whiche incommoditie ioyned to the ſmall diſtribuſions that were made of meale, was the cauſe that the bandes of Italian footemen, notwithſtanding they had plentie of wyne and fleſhe, fledde ſecretly from the campe: But the thirde day Monſr Lavvtrech remayning at Bordellane, cauſed about noonetide to paſſe ouer Oglia, one parte of thartilleries, and ſent them to Pontovvike vnder the ſuffrance and priuitie of the Venetian Agent, notwithſtanding he made ſemblance of the contrarie: And albeit it was almoſt night, yet they began the ſame daye to drawe towardes the lodgings of thennemies, whoſe Capteines ſeeing into the manifeſt daunger, notwithſtanding they mighte haue conueyed them ſelues into a place where they might haue founde defence in the couerte and ſhaddowes of certayne little hylles, yet what with the calamitie of want of vittels, and a redoubled feare that the Svvizzers would make long tarying: They cauſed

sed the armie to departe the morning following by breake of the daye, and as their going awaye was without brute or sounde of trumpet or drumme, and their baggage and trayne of campe drawne affore their companies, so there was no bande whiche did not marche in good order and well appoynted to feight: They incamped at Gabbionetta about fiue myles from thence vppon the confines of Mantua, confessing with one voyce that they were deliuered from a great daunger, partely by the benefite of fortune, and partly by the negligence and indiscression of thennemies: for if they had not stayed at Rebecca the very same day that they were appoynted to goe to Bordellano, there had remayned to them a very small hope of safetie, for that the selfe same or else greater necessities had constrayned them to retyre, by whiche aduersitie the retraite beeing longer and thennemies more neare, the perill was moste manifest. In like sorte it is moste certayne that the victorie had vndoubtedly falne vppon Monsr de Lavvtrech, if he had marched to incampe neare thennemies, the same daye he sent the artilleries to Pontvvike, wherevnto he was aduised by many of the Capteines, but chiefly by the Svvizzers: for by reason of his neareneſſe they had stande depriued of all meanes to retyre in safetie, bothe for that they coulde not raunge them selues into battell araye for thinpedimentes of thartilleries of Pontvvike, and also the rage of the famine woulde not giue them suffrance in that place aboue three or foure dayes: But suche are the ordinarie fruites of singularitie and selfe weening, that whyleſt by his nature and custome he despised the counsayles of all others, he layde open to thennemies the knowledge of the perill that was towardes them, and through his fault made them hable to preuent his threatninges by their suddayne departure: In so muche as it was not without reason that the Svvizzer Capteines tolde him, that they had well deserued the payes accustomed to be giuen to souldiors that had wonne the battell, seeing it was not long of them that they had not gotte the victorie. At Gabbionetta the army of the League fortified their campe with great industrie, and in their owne safetie remayned there manye dayes: Neuertheleſſe bothe for that the comming of the Svvizzers seemed dayly to linger and suspende, and also for feare of the neighborhood of the French, both mightie in strength and braue in demonstracions to sette vpon them, they passed the ryuer of Oglia, and went to incampe in the borowe of Ostiano apperteining to Lodovvike de Bossolo, with intention not to departe from thence till the Svvizzers were come: which resolucion made with wisedome and counsell, was also accompanied with good fortune, for that at Gabbionetta by reason of the lowe and shalowe situacion, the army had receiued great domages by the abundance of raynes and waters falling assone as the campe was gone.

A fault of Monsr de Lavvtrech.

But whyleſt in this sort the tyme ranne foorth ydely betweene both the armies, the one lying at Ostiano and the other at Rebecca: The Bishoppe of Pistoia and Vitelli hauing drawne into one strength the Svvizzers and the bandes of Italian footemen, gaue charge vppon the garrisons of the Duke of Ferrara that laye at Finalo, who albeit had for their aduauntage the oportunitie of the place, bothe strong by nature and well fortified by arte, yet the Svvizzers whose feare is alwayes least when the perill seemes moste, presented them selues with a braue resolucion to the daunger, and giuing an ouerthrowe to the whole, they slewe manye of them, amongest whome the knight Coriano passed by the sworde as he was feighting: This brought so greate feare and amaze to the Duke of Ferrara lying then at Bodena, that yeelding to thaduersitie which he could not ouercome, he abandoned foorthwith that towne, and fled to Ferrara, his feares beeing greater then his assurance: And to take from the ennemies all oportunities to followe him, he retyred with a present diligence all those barkes vppon the whiche he had buylded a bridge in the same place.

In this meane whyle the regimentes of Svvizzers that were exspected, were discended vppon the territories of Bergama: and yet their mindes beeing no lesse variable then their difficulties certayne, they stayed to passe further, hauing expresly refused to turne them selues to inuade the Duchie of Millan according to the instance of the Cardinall of Syon and the Agentes of the Pope and Cæsar: They also made difficultie to ioyne with the armie that exspected them at Ostiano, for that it was prepared to marche agaynst the Frenche king, offering to goe to the seruice of anye place that the Pope shoulde thinke good in the estate or dominion of the Churche, for the defending of whiche, they sayde they were entred into paye: And yet according to their barbarous interpretacion of things, they consented to marche to assayle Parma and Plaisanca as Cities manifestlye apperteyning to the Churche, or at least to the whiche the Frenche kinge had no certayne righte or interest: They required also that affore they should march, there shoulde bee sente to them from tharmie, three hundred lighte horsemen, the better with their ayde to leauye vittayles in those countreys and places through the whiche they shoulde passe: These were the difficulties they stoode vppon, bearing more vppon frowarde wilfulnesse, then vppon reason or necessitie of the present seruice: Neuertheless in the ende the light horsemen were sente, who passed at vnwares in greate diligence along the territories of the Venetians: They disposed their marching so, as they might come into some place moste neare the armie, to haue the more conueniencie and oportunitie to consulte and resolue what were to bee done: And in their waye they gaue the chase to certayne bandes of the Frenche and the Venetians whiche were bestowed at Pondovville or rather vpon the lake of Eupile to stoppe their passage: Assoone as they were drawen neare to the armie, there was present labour made to dispose them to ioyne agaynst the French, in which solicitacion were employed many messangers and Embassadours, and chiefly tharchbishop of Capua going to and fro in the name of the Cardinall de Medicis: At laste, the bandes that were leauyed of the Canton of Surich, who as they haue a greater authoritie, so they make profession to doo thinges with a greater grauitie, refused it constantly: The others after many doubtes and obiections, neither expresly denyed, nor manifestly accepted the offers that were made to them, for that as they refused not to followe the armie, so yet it was without declaracion that they woulde enter with them into the Duchie of Millan: So that, what by the counsayle of the Cardinall of Syon, and labour of the Capteynes into whose willes were made manye corrupte insinuacions by offers and promises, the armie determined to marche on vnder this hope, that since they refused not to followe, they woulde not bee harde to be drawne to any place where the armie went.

The bandes of Surich conteining foure thousande in number, brake of and returned towardes Reggia: and the armie after it had remayned about a moneth betwene Gabionetti and Ostiano, ioyned with the other Svvizzers at Gambaro: They caried marching in the middest of them the two Legates of Syon & Medicis with their crosses of siluer enuironed with infinit weapons, artilleries, blasphemers, mankillers, & robbers: so much at that time did they abuse the reuerence of religion: They went in three remouings of campe through the landes of the Venetians to Orchiueche a

towne of their obedience, making this excuse to the Senate that it was a passage necessarie, and that they had no intencion or desire to offende them: In the same sorte was it excused to them when Andrevve Gritty their Agent was constrayned to consent to Monsr Lavvtrech to sende artilleries to Pontvvyke. At Orchiueche arriued certeyne Corryers sent by the Lordes of the Cantons to commaunde the Svvyzzers to departe from the armie, sending also the like commaundement by other poastes to the bandes that were in the frenche campe, to whome was alleaged that it was a thinge vnworthie the reputacion of their name and countrey, to suffer the footemen of their nation to serue vnder publike enseignes in the armies of two ennemies: But these commaundementes brought foorth diuerse effectes, for, the poastes that were dispatched to the campe of the league were by comminge stayed in the waye, so that they came not so farre as to those bandes that were with the Cardinall of Syon: And touching the companies that followed the french campe, they dismissed them selues immediatly without bidding farewell, not that they were moued by the commaundementes that were sent, and much lesse for the longnes of the warre wherin they are wont to be most impacient aboue all other nations: But they saw into the dishability of Monsr de Lavvtrech to aunswer their payes, who as he had of long time receiued no money out of Fraunce, so thextreame exactions which he leauied vpon the Duchie of Millan were farre insufficient to satisfie his charge.

Here may be gathered a fitte experience how muche the enuie and indiscression of officers bringes preiudice and domage to Princes, who either through negligence haue no employment in affaires, or else by incapacitie, are not hable of them selues to discerne good councells from euill: for, where direction was giuen for the leauying of three hundred thowsande crownes to be sent to Lavvtrech according to the kings promise; The Ladie Regent being the kings mother bare so great emulacion to his greatnes, that vsing her enuie against the profit of her sonne, she procured the Treasorers and Receiuers without the kinges priuitie, to turne that summe to an other vse: The same being the cause that Monsr Lavvtrech suffered him selfe to runne into confusion and priuate griefe, since by the departing of the Svvizzers, the succesſe of the warres which affore he promised to be good & happy, was become full of doutes and dispaire: And therefore forbearing to contend against enuy, fortune and the time, he bestowed garrisons in Cremona & Pisqueton, and reduced him selfe with the residue of tharmie to Cassan, hoping to giue impediment to thennemies to passe Adda, both in respect of thordinary difficulties which follow armies that are to passe riuers when there stands resistance vpon the shoare opposit, and also for thoportunity of the place bearing his banke towardes Millan verie high and raised, & therfore the offence is greater that is done to the ennemies with thartilleries, then that which they can receiue.

On the other side the Legats Apostolike and the Capteines were broken vp from Orchiueche, and passing eftsoones the riuer of Oglio, were come in three remouinges to Riuolco, not feeling any more thincommoditie of vittells, for that they were plentifully relieued by the townes of Guiaradadde, which the frenchemen had left abandoned.

At this place, as both the armies were vppon tearmes, thone to winne, and the other to stoppe the passage of the riuer, Prospero and the other Capteynes made preparacion to build a bridge betwene Riuolco and Cassan, a matter very doutfull and hard for the stopping of the ennemies: Wherein hauing consumed two or three dayes in controuersies and councells, at last Prospero who would not communicate his thoughtes with the Marquis of Pisquairo to thende he should haue no interest in the glory of that action, and much lesse would vse the seruice of the Spanyards least they would disclose his deuise, caused secretly to be taken from the riuer of Bembe, two small barkes, and sent by night with great silence certeine bandes of Italian footemen to passe the riuer right against the towne of Vaury: Vaury is a towne open, discouered, and without walls, and hath his scituacion vppon the bankes of Adda fiue myles from Cassan: There is conuenient passage ouer the riuer, and in the middest of the towne is there a small circuit of wall raised in forme of a litle castell: There were for the gard of this place, certeine bandes of horsemen vnder the charge of Hugh de Popoly Lieutenaunt to the men at armes which the frenche king had giuen to Octauian Fregosa: vppon the hearing of the noyse that was made, he presented him selfe vppon the banke or shoare, from the which he was presently repulsed with force of shot, and yet it was thought that he might easely haue mainteined resista nce, if a certeine trowpe of harguebuziers had ioyned with those horsemen which he had with him, a matter which afterwardes he sayd he did require of Monsr Lavvtrech.

As the footemen passed in trowpes and numbers, so they assembled and drewe into strength in a place within the towne raised and somewhat fortified, exspecting there the succours which Prospero had appointed: who assoone as he was aduertised of that happie beginninge, caused to be turned that waye almost all the footebandes of the armie bestowed in diuerse boroughes of Guiaradadde, to whome he gaue this order that as they arriued they should passe successiuely vpon the same small barkes and vppon two others that were appointed to follow tharmie to serue for bridges ouer riuers, which by night were caried ouerlande to the same banke or shoare: Then he and the other Captaines with the Cardinall Medicis, tooke foorthwith the same way, leauing this commaundement to such as taried at Riuolto, that if the frenchemen retyred from thence, they shoulde immediatly sette vp the bridge: But at Vaury the succesſe of thenterprise was vncerteine for certeine howers, for, if Monsr Lavvtrech vppon his first aduertisement of the passing of his enemies, had conuerted thither one parte of tharmie, he had no dout giuen them the ouerthrowe: But after he had spent certeine howers in dout what he had to doe, he dispatched thither Monsr d'Escud with foure hundred launces and the bands of the frenche footemen, causing to be drawne afterwardes certeine peeces of artilleries: Monsr d'Escud and his regiments marched thither in great diligence, and beganne verie resolutely to charge the place where thenemies were retyred euen at the same time that the succours which were exspected, appeared vppon the other shoare: For whose comming together with the hope that they brought, thenemies made a valliant defense, notwithstanding that Monsr d'Escud discended on foote with all his men at armes and made so resolute a fight in the straightes of the streetes, that if thartilleries had come in time, his vallour no dout had giuen them the ouerthrowe: But on the other side the shoare, did make speede to passe as muche as the fraught of the barkes coulde carie, Iegane Capteine of the Grisons, and two enseignes of spanishe footemen, pushed on with the comfortes and speeches of Cardinall de Medicis and the other Capteines: And as in matters of execucion examples doe muche, so in this heate of vallour and valliant doinges, Iohn de Medicis, more moued of his naturall magnanimity and great desire of glory, then by any other mans incitacion, swame ouer the depenes of the water

vpon a turkish horse to the other side, giuing in that action both a present feare to thennemie, and a iust courage to his owne companies: At last notwithstanding the present arriuall of thartilleries, Monsr d'Escud finding the defence that was made to be so farre aboue his forces, and his fortune no lesse inferior, that he could not but dispayre of the victorie, retyred to Cassan with the losse of an enseigne, And by his example, Lavvtrech departed from Cassan and withdrew to Myllan with the whole armie: There, whether it was that he would not lose thoccasion to satisfie his hate conceyued affore, or whether he thought that by that spectacle he shoulde make him selfe more feared and redowted, he caused to be executed publikely, Christopher Paluoisin: An action of great pitie and compassion to beholde, no lesse for the noblenes of his house, greatnes and authoritie of his person, and flourishing estate of his age, then for that he was committed to prison many monethes affore the warre, in which poynt his iustice was not without extreme seueritie. By this passing ouer Adda, Prospero wonne a name and glorye aboue the sonne: he was affore, not onely infamous at Rome but contemned throughout the whole armye, not so much for his breaking vppe from before Parma, as for his custome in protracting the warre: But nowe, as it often hapneth that thinges done first, lose their memorie by the consideracion of such as followe and are done afterwardes, so thinfamie of his former vices was nowe defaced and the mindes of all men conuerted to prayse and extoll him, the rather for that without bloode and daunger, yea altogether with councell and industrie worthy of so well experienced a Capteine, he had stolne from thennemies the passage of that ryuer: A matter whiche Monsr Lavvtrech did not onely promise to him selfe and his whole armie to let and stoppe, but also assured it absolutely to the king vnder his writing and publike protestacions: And yet (such emulacion followeth vallour and the glorye thereof) there were some, who with reasons eyther true or apparant, labored to diminish the glorye of this action, wherein they alleaged that there was no vertue nor rare industrie neyther in the inuencion nor in thexecucion: for that nature and naturall prouidence doth teach all men finding impediments in riuers and straite passages, to search and sownd some other way to passe either higher or lower, where nothing is obiected to stoppe them: They could say also that the passage of Vaury was at hande, and by his ordinary frequentacion a passage very conuenient, and that Lavvtrech had bene so careless to garde it that his negligence had left no place to industrie: So that in no other thinge coulde bee recommended the prouidence of Prospero, then that with secrecie he had made prouision of the barkes, and managed the whole enterprise with necessary silence: There were other also, who perhappes eyther too diligent to iudge of thinges, or more readye to reprehende faultes that bee doubtfull, then apt to commend actions and doinges certeyne, were not contented to diminishe the renowme of his industrye, but with a spirite more enuyous, they iustified that there was in him neyther prouidence nor order conuenient: for, saye they, in not sending commaundement to those bandes to stirre that were appoynted for succours and lodged within Treuy, Carauagge and many other places, but when the footemen whome he had sent before were possessed of Vaury: It fell out that the first companyes coulde not arryue vppon the shoare of the ryuer vntyll noone, which was foureteene howers after the firste bandes of footemen were paste: So that if Monsr Lavvtrech had done presently vppon thaduertisement that was sent to him, the thinge whiche he did many howers after, there is no doubt that he had not reconquered Vaury, and giuen the ouerthrowe to those footebandes that were passed, for that the succours or reskewe were " too slowe and lingring: But suche interpretacions and fancies of men did no" thing at all deprave the glorye of Prospero, for that commonly in humane witts this " collection is made that they iudge the councells of men by the euent of things, and " so sometimes with praise and sometimes with dishonor according as the successe is " happy or contrary, they giue that to councell and prouidence, which for the most " part takes his proceeding of fortune.

Monsr Lavvtrech being departed from the shoares of Adda, it was to be doubted that thennemies who the day following builded a bridge betwene Riuolta and Cassan would draw neare to Myllan as fast as they could: yet Prospero, whose councell albeit was blamed by the popular sort, was yet approued by such as saw into the science of warre, was of mind that in taking a longer circuit, they should marche the first day to incampe at Marignan, A towne equally distant from Myllan and Pauya: for, being not possible for the hardnes of the time both cold and raynie, to keepe the fielde, he iudged it best to draw neare to Myllan on that side, by the which if he founde it harde to enter, he might immediatly turne to Pauia, where Lavvtrech had left no garrison, for that he sought to reduce all his forces to Myllan: In which citie both for the plenty of vittells, and many other oportunities, he thought to setle the seate of the warre. On the other side, Monsr Lavvtrech whose armie of footemen was reduced to a very small number, had from the beginning deuised to garde onely the citie of Myllan: But considering afterwards that if he abandoned the suburbes, he gaue meane to thennemie to lodge and incampe, and therewithall many ready opportunities to take the towne, he changed opinion, and determined as yet to defend the suburbes: This no doubt was a resolute & wise councell if it had bene accompanied with that vigilancie that apperteyned, for that by it, considering the vnlooked for accidents that fell within few dayes after, thinges had brought forth an other yssue then they did. But the armie of the league being lodged for the greatest part at Marignan, and the Svvyzzers more forward in thabbay of Cleruault, after they had remeyned there three dayes to exspect thartilleries which could not followe for thextremitie of the wayes: presented them selues the xix. day of Nouember before Myllan, hauing this intencion that if they could not enter the same day, they would depart the day after and draw to Pauia, whether was already dispatched part of the light horsemen to take possession of the towne: There hapned that morning this matter worthy of memory, as the Legats and Chieftaines of tharmie stoode in a medow neare to Cleruault to giue place to the Svvyzzers to passe, there came to them an olde man of aspect and habit popular, who telling them that he was sent by the parish of Saint Cir in Myllan, solicited and called vppon them with great exclamacions to passe further: for that sayth he, order was giuen, that not onely the parish of Saint Cir, but all the partes of Myllan vpon thapproching of tharmie would rise & take armes against the frenchmen at the vniuersall ringing of the bells of euery parish: This relacion was made more wonderfull by the consideracion of the man and his departure, for that notwithstanding all their diligence to find him againe, they could neuer learne what he was, nor by whom he was sent. The armie then marched in order towardes the gate of Rome, and the great artilleries stayed at the entry of a way which turneth to Pauia:

The taking of Myllan by the league.

The Marquis of Pisquaire who was in the former front of the battell with his bandes of spanish footemen, obseruing the comming on of the euening, drewe neare the trench that is betwene the gate of Rome and the port Thesin, And presenting his harquebuziers against a bastyllion made in a place called Vicentyn, neare the gate named med Lodovvikes gate, and that more to make a triall, then in hope to carye it: The Venetian footebandes that garded the place, after they had with muche ado endured the presence of thennemies, gaue their backes with an incredible baseneſſe of minde, by whoſe example the Svvizzers that laye neare them, put them selues to flight, their feare being greater then their fidelitie: By which yeelding the Spaniſhe footebandes that paſſed the trenche and the rampier without any impediment, entred with the ſame facilitie the ſuburbes, and in that hurleyburley of entring they tooke and hurt lightly Theoder Triuulce being all diſharmed vpon a litle nagge, who payed afterward to the Marquis of Piſquairo for his libertie twentie thouſande duckets: In this confuſion of feare and perill, Andrevv Gritti with many others made waye with great hardnes for their ſafetie, who after by the benefite of chaſe and fleing they were eftſones vnited with the Frenche, they retyred altogether into the towne by fetching a very long compaſſe: But both for that they had made no prouiſion for their defence, and alſo that they had no ſtrength of footemen, and therewithall the people diſpoſed to rebell, they ſtayed about the caſtell: On the other ſide, the Marquis of Piſquairo in whom wanted no diligence to followe his fortune, made his approche to the gate of Rome (the gates of the Citie and the ſuburbes beare all one name) and was receyued into the towne by the principall partners of the Gebelin faction, hauing the gate in garde: And not long after the Cardinall Medicis, the Marquis of Mantua, Proſpero, and one parte of the armie made their entrie in the ſame ſorte by the port Theſin, the victors them ſelues being almoſt ignoraunt in what maner or by what diſorder they had wonne ſo great a victorie: Onely the principall cauſe proceeded of the negligence of the Frenche men, for that (as was diſcerned afterwardes) Monſr Lavvtrech had no aduertiſement that thennemies were remoued that daye, yea it was beleeued that he aſſured him ſelfe, that for the diſaduauntage of the wayes being much diſordered and broken with the raynes that were falne, they woulde not that daye make their artilleries marche, without the which he neuer thought that they would aſſault the rampiers: yea ſuche was his ſecuritie, that at the ſame time that thennemie entred the rampiers, he was walking vnarmed in the Citie of Millan accompanied with other capteines without any cogitacion of enterpriſe, as alſo Monſr d'Eſcud being made wearie with watching the night before, was layde downe to ſleepe in his owne lodging: both of them beeing beguyled in the care which they ought to haue had of their proper ſafetie, honor and reputacion: And yet it ſeemed fortune reſerued for them a fauor which their deſtinie would not let them enioye: for if Monſr de Lavvtrech after his feare and fleing had reaſſembled his people vpon the Caſtell greene, it was beleeued that there was offred to him no little occaſion to offende thennemies, for that one parte were diſperſed diſorderly within Millan, an other parte ſtoode houering in the ſuburbes in confuſion, and the reſidue remayned without in a troubled exſpectation: But what through his feare whiche coulde not be reappeaſed, and what by the errour of the darke night to diſcerne in ſo little time theſtate of thennemies, he departed the ſame night to Coma, where leauing fiftie men at armes and ſix hundred footmen, he tooke the waye by the pariſhe of Iuzina, and ſo after he was paſſed Adda at Lecco, he drewe to the countrey of Bergama, the Caſtell of Millan remayning well garded and refurniſhed: Lody and Pauia followed the exemple of Millan: And at the ſame time the Biſhop of Piſtoya and Vitelli, who leauing Parma behinde them, had taken the waye of Plaiſanca, were willingly receyued into that Citie: The like ſucceſſe they had in Cremona, where vpon the newes not onely that Millan was taken, but alſo that the Frenche were ouerthrowen, the people ranne to armes and cryed vppon the name of thempire and Duke of Millan: Assoone as that commotion was vnderstanded by Monsr Lavvtrech, who was then arriued vppon the territories of Bergama, he dispatched thither Monsr d'Escud with one parte of tharmie to recouer it: he was repulsed by the people, by whiche occasion Lavvtrech notwithstanding he had very small hope of good succesſe, for that the Svvizzers that were within Parma, might easily succour it, went thither with the whole armie, hauing first geuen order that Federike de Bossolo shoulde abandon Parma, holding it a matter of too great difficultie to furnishe so many places: This enterprise drewe with it a good succesſe and issue: for, notwithstanding that Cardinall Medicis assoone as he vnderstoode of the rebellion of Cremona, had sente to the Bishop of Pistoye, that the better to assure such a conqueſt he should dispatche thither one part of the Svvizzers: yet becausе he would neither deuide them nor intangle him selfe with other affaytes, standing alwayes vppon a desire to goe with them to an enterprise determined vppon Genes, he lingred so long that he lefte sufficient tyme to Monsr Lavvtrech to recouer it, hauing bothe the Castell to holde for hym, and also knowing there was to bee obiected agaynst him no other defence then a confused resistance of the people, in whome he discerned already an inclinacion to yeelde, for that they sent Embassadours to solicite their pardon: This good euent ministred eftsoones some good courage and lyfe to Monsr Lavvtrech, who sent forthwith to Federike Bossolo not to abandon Parma: But he was departed affore the sommonce came, and had passed Pavv with his bandes and companies: At what tyme Vitelly who wente to Plaisanca with his companies and was not farre from Parma when Federike departed, was called in by an vniuersall consent of the people, and made his entrie. The Capteines and Assistantes of the League deuised howe to recouer the residue of the estate vnder this foundacion to make no more so greate expences: And accordingly they dispatched from Millan at the same tyme the Marquis of Pisquairo with his bandes of Spaniardes and the Launceknightes and Grisons, to laye siege to Coma: In whiche enterprise in maye be doubted whether was more forwarde his desire or his fortune, for he had no sooner begonne to enforce the terrour of his artilleries, then the defendantes dispayring of reskew, agreed to render vp the place vnder condicion of sauetie of life and goods aswell to the Frenche bandes as to thinhabitantes of the towne: And yet when the Frenche men were vppon their departure, the Spaniardes made their entrie and sacked it, to the greate infamie of the Marquis, who beeing afterwardes accused of fayth breaking by Iohn Chabannes chiefe of the Frenche bandes within Coma, was by him defyed and chalenged to the cambat.

At the same instant they of the League sent the Bishop of Verula to the Svvizzers to assure them of their willes, neuertheleſse assoone as he was come to Belinsone they committed hym to warde, for that standing yll contented that their regimentes of footemen had marched agaynst the French king, they did not onely complayne of the Cardinall of Syon and the Pope, but also of all their ministers and officers: But chiefly they inueyed agaynst the Bishoppe of Verula, for that being the Popes Nuncio with them at suche tyme as they leauyed their men, he laboured to induce them to goe agaynst thexception vnder the which they had bene accorded.

The estate and affayres of the warre was reduced into theſe tearmes with a wonderfull hope in the Pope and Cæsar to confirme the victorie, bothe for that the

French

French king had no meane to dispatche with expedicion newe companies into Italie, and also for them selues they thought the power of those who had wonne Millan vpon him with the moste parte of the Duchie, was sufficient not onely to preserue it, but also to runne through all the residue that remayned in the handes of thenemie: Yea suche a thing is terrour, that the Senate of Venice fearing least the warre begonne agaynst others would not fall vpon them, gaue hope to the Pope to cause the French bandes to depart out of their landes: But of thoughtes sodaine began to spring an accident vnlooked for: for, newes came that the Pope was dead sodenlye the first day of December: As he laye at the village of Magliana whither he went oftentimes for his recreation, he heard the first reapport of the taking of Millan, which stirred in him suche an extreme passion of ioye, that the same night he entred into a small feauer: and for his better remedie he caused himselfe the next daye to be remoued to Rome, where he dyed within very fewe dayes after, notwithstanding the Phisitions in the beginning made no great reckoning of his disease: There was great suspicion that he was poysoned by Barnabie Malespina his Chamberleine, whose office was alwayes to giue him drinke: And yet though he was made prisoner through the suspicion of the fact and the vehement reasons of the same, yet the matter was dashed and thexaminacion thereof, for that the Cardinall Medicis assone as he came to Rome, set him at libertie, fearing to fall further into the disgrace of the Frenche king, by whose practise it was supposed that Barnabie gaue him the fatall drinke: This was but whispred secretly, the author being no lesse doubtfull then the coniectures vncertayne: He dyed, if we consider the cõmon opinion of men, in very great glory & felicity, not so much for that by the surprising of Millan he saw himself deliuered of daungers and exspences intollerable, whiche hauing drayned him of all store of money and treasor, he was constrayned to aduaunce all meanes and maners for his supply and releeuing: But also that a very fewe dayes affore his death he receyued aduertisement of the taking of Plaisanca, and the very day he dyed, newes came to him of the winning of Parma: A matter so greatly desired by him, that at such time as he debated to moue warre agaynst the Frenche men, it is very well remembred that he sayde to the Cardinall de Medicis laboring to disswade him, that as he was in nothing more caryed to the desire of that warre then to recouer to the Churche those two Cities, so when so euer God should blesse him with theffect of that desire, it would not greue him to dye: He was a prince in whom were many thinges worthy to be commended and blamed, and in the estate and discourse of his life he deceyued greatly thexpectation that was had of him when he was created Pope, for that his gouernment was with a greater discression, but with farre lesse bountie then was looked for.

The death of Pope Leo the tenth.

The death of the Pope did greatly diminishe thaffayres of Cæsar in Italie, as also it was not vnlikely that suche an enemie beeing taken away with whose money the whole warre was both begon and continued, both the French king would enter into a newe sprite and dispatche a newe armie into Italie, and also the Venetians for the same causes would recontinue the confederacion they had with him: So that it seemed that by this accident the deuises to assayle Cremona and Genes, vanished & were dissolued: and the officers of Cæsar, who till then had payed the Spanishe bandes with great difficultie, were constrayned to dismisse a great part of them: A matter not without daunger since there were holden yet for the king Cremona, Genes, Alexandria, the Castell of Millan, the Castells of Nouaro and Tressa, Pisqueton, Domussolo, Arona, and all the Lake maior: Besides, the Rocke of Pontremo was eftsones returned to his deuocion, which being loſt before, was reconquered by Sinibaldo de Fieſquo and the Count Nocero: Neither had the affayres of the French king any good ſucceſſe beyonde the Mountes, for that Cæſar bringing warre vpon Flaunders, had taken from him the Citie of Tornay, and not long after the Caſtell, wherein were no ſmall quantities of artilleries and munitions: In ſo muche that by reaſon of the Popes death newe gouernmentes, newe counſells, and newe eſtates of affayres and doings were introduced into the Duchie of Millan. The Cardinalles of Syon and Medicis made foorthwith to Rome to communicate in the election of the newe Pope: The Imperials kept retayned with them fifteene hundred footemen Svvizzers, and diſmiſſed all the others, together with the Launceknightes who went their waye: The bandes of the Florentines tooke their way to returne into Tuskane: Touching the regimentes of the Church, Guido Rangon ledde one part of them to Modona, and the other remayned in the eſtate of Millan with the Marquis of Mantua, and that more of his proper reſolucion, then by the conſent of the College of Cardinalles, who ſtanding deuided amongeſt them ſelues, could bring foorth nothing in determinacion: In ſo muche as when Monſr Lavvtrech made his complayntes to them that the ſouldiours of the Church remayned vpon the Duchie of Millan to the preiudice of the French king, to whom for the charitable actions of his predeceſſors done to the Churche, was transferred the title of protector and eldeſt ſonne of the ſame, they could not agree to returne other aunſwere or reſolucion, then that they referred his remedy to the determination of the Pope to come. Of thoſe Svvizzers that were in Plaiſanca, one part went with the Biſhop of Piſtoye to Modena for the defence of that Citie and Reggia agaynſt the Duke of Ferrara, who immediatly vppon the death of the Pope had taken the fielde with an hundred men at armes, two thouſande footemen, and three hundred light horſemen, and ſo went to incampe before Cente after he had recouered by the will of thinhabitantes Bondene, Finale, the mountayne of Modena, and Garfagnano, and with the ſame facilitie had taken Lugo, Bagnacauall, with other townes of Romagnia. Thoſe Svvizzers that were of the Canton of Zurich continued at Plaiſanca, and for that they would not ſuffer them ſelues to be ſeparated, they would not giue leaue to a thouſande of them to go to the gard of Parma: which Citie remaining almoſt diſfurniſhed, Monſr Lavvtrech being then within Cremona with ſixe hundred launces and two thouſande fiue hundred footemen, tooke occaſion of the nakednes of the place, to attempt to reconquer it, being ſpecially induced to thaction by Federike Boſſolo, who caryed great credite in that matter for the peculiar knowledge he had in enterpriſes of like nature.

It was then determined that Monſr de Bonneuall with three hundred launces, and Federike and Marke Antho. Colonno, the one with the Frenche footemen, the other with the Venetian bands conteining in one ſtrength and generall number fiue thouſande bodies, ſhould be employed to ſurpriſe the citie of Parma, wherein were ſixe hundred footemen Italians and fiftie men at armes of the Marquis of Mantua, beſides that the people and inhabitantes were at the deuocion of the Churche, but ſlenderly armed, and no leſſe yll contented for the memorie of the French, and violences vſed by Federike: With theſe was alſo concurrant this aduauntage, that of that parte of the towne which had bene battred by the campe of the Churche the walles laye yet on the grounde without any reſtoring or repayring: Laſtely the ſea Apoſtolike was in vacacion, A matter which is alwayes wont to keepe the mindes of men in variacion, and make gouernors rather carefull of their proper ſafetie, then to looke to the defence of townes, as not knowing for whom they ſhould put them

ſelues into daunger: So that with theſe foundacions, the french footemen were ſent below along the riuer of Pavv euen vnto Toricelle where the bands of men at armes that were come from Cremona by land, ioyned with them: And many barkes beeing ſent thether from Cremona, they paſſed ouer Pavv by night to Toricelle which is within twelue myles of Parma, hauing to follow them by direction Mark Anth. Colonno with the Venetian footebands, that were lodged vpon Oglio: Frauncis Guicciardin was ſent thether for the gard of the towne by commiſſion of Cardinall de Medicis, and doubting of the daunger that was ſo apparant, he cauſed to call together by night, the whole people and inhabitants, whom he incouraged to ſtande valiantly to the defence of their liues and libertie; And bicauſe they ſhoulde fight againſt their peril more with weapons then with wordes, he cauſed to be beſtowed among them two thowſand pykes which two dayes before he had ſent for from Reggia: it imported him much to be carefull to make prouiſions neceſſary for defence, wherein by ſo much greater was his diligence and ſtudy, by how much both the time and the place miniſtred many difficulties, both for that the ſmal numbers of ſouldiours within the towne, were not ſufficient to defend it without the ayde of the people, vpon whome in thoſe ſuddeine and daungerous caſes can be layd no firme foundacion for the variablenes of their condicion: And alſo for that he ſaw it impoſſible to let thennemies for entring the Codipont, for which cauſe he retyred the ſouldiours & all the townesmen into the other part of the citie, but not without a wonderfull difficultie: for, hauing a vaine perſwaſion amongeſt them, that it might be defended, as alſo the inhabitants of that quarter, interpreting to rigour and hardnes, to leaue abandoned their owne houſes, They could not be diſpoſed to it neither with reaſons nor with authoritie vntill they ſaw thennemies approch: becauſe the inhabitants were ſo long afore they would be perſwaded to retyre, thennemy lacked not much to enter with them pelmell into the other part of the towne, where concurred at one time many difficulties, both neceſſitie of money, and inconueniencie of the time, being the ſelfe ſame day wherein they were to pay the footebands, who proteſted to goe out of the towne if they were not ſatisfied of their payes within xxiiij. howers. The firſt day Federyk Boſſolo with three thowſand footemen and certeine light horſemen, entred the Codipont which was left abandoned: The daye after arriued there, Monſr de Buneuall with the french launces, and Mark. Anth. with two thowſand footemen Venetians: They had not with them other artilleries then two ſakers, for that by thimpediment of the ill wayes all along Pavv, the places being low and apt to reteyne water, made it very hard for the vſe of carts to draw greater artilleries: which had not bene without loſſe of time, and that contrary to their hopes grounded altogether vpon celeritie and diligence, for that they feared in lingring much, leaſt Parma ſhoulde receiue ſome reskewe either from Modena or from Plaiſanca: Neuertheleſſe thinhabitants being abuſed with the fancies and feares of certeine peaſants of the contry that were fled, ſtoode poſſeſſed with an opinion that the great artilleries were comming: By which occaſion they were entred into a wonderfull terror, and the ſame redoubled by a deuiſe of Federyk, who hauing taken in the contrey, certeine Citizens he made them aſſuredly beleeue by certeine rebells of Parma which he had with him, that Mark Anth. and the french men came after with a great armie and artilleries: And after he had let them goe to Parma, they brought newes touching the forces of thennemies and other things, much againſt the truth, and ſo repleniſhed the people with terrour and amaze, that not onely the Commons through all the quarters of the towne, but euen their Magiſtrates and councel hauing charge of thaffayres publike, began with importunities to entreate the gouernour, that what for the safety of him selfe and his souldiors, and to deliuer the citie from seruitude and sacking, he would suffer them to compounde with thenemies: Agaynst which demaunde whyleſt the gouernour made resistance, sometimes with reasons and sometimes with requestes, and consumed the time in debating, there hapned this new difficultie, that the paye day being come, the souldiors that were drawne into insurrection, published in maner of tumult, that if they were not payde they woulde departe the towne: So little

" assurance is there in souldiors marcenarie, in whom in times of triall and daunger is " commonly founde lesse fidelitie then forwardnes, & more corruption then constan" cie, & seruing but for pay, they haue no regards aboue the desire of money & gayne: Neuertheles the Agent or treasorer obteined with many perswasions of thinhabitantes, to furnish one part of the mony, which though they had promised before, yet they became slow to performe, notwithstanding he declared to thē that in all euents and chaunges, that action would stande them in no small steade of iustification with the Popes to come: with this mony he reappeased the tumult aswell as he could, the same being the cause that the feare of the people augmented: And as the souldiors who for their smal numbers saw thēselues at the discression of the people, & had no surety of any one of the Citie, so they entred into present suspicion that the forces that were both within & without would set vpon them at one time: In so muche as they rather wished that the Citie woulde render by accorde vnder capitulacions of " their safety, then to continue & dwell in that daunger: So vnquiet a passion is feare,
" that whom it possesseth it makes thē in nothing lesse apt then to be resolute or con" stant, & kepeth them depriued of that reason & counsell which in other cases is the
" guide of mortal men & their doings: But in this estate of affaires reduced thus to extremities, it was necessary for the gouernor to show him selfe constant and absolute, and therfore he sometimes assured the souldiors that the perill was aswell common to him as to them, & sometimes he stirred vp the principalls of the towne assembled in counsell, with whom he reasoned that there was no occasion of feare, for that he was assured thenemies caused not to march their great artileries, without the which it was both childish & skornfull to doubt that by the benefite of skaling ladders they would offer to enter or force the towne, wherin was a sufficient strength of youth & souldiors to make resistance agaynst a farre greater violence: He tolde them he had sent to require succors at Modena, where were the Svvizzers, Vitelli, & Guido Rangon, with their bands, not douting but that the day following he should be supplied with such a strēgth as would be able to enforce thenemie to depart: That aswel in regard of their owne honor, as for feare least with the losing of Parma, there hapned not a greater disorder, those succors would make hast, and their reskew be almost as ready as their danger: That he had sent to Plaisanca for the same matter, and for the same reasons he had manifest hope to be releeued from thence: That they had to consider that the Pope being dead, who had honored him with the credit of that place wherin he was, there remayned to him no interest or bonde (if things stoode vpon suche tearmes as they imagined) to subiect himselfe to a perill so apparant: for that according to experience and common examples past, muche lesse that the officers of the Pope deceased can exspect of the Pope to come any degree of recompence, since it was moste likely that the Pope of the newe election would become enemie to Florence his naturall contrey: for which reasons he had no cause to desire the greatnes of the Church, respects publike being no lesse agaynst it then occasions priuate: Only suche might be the concurrance of accidentes, that the diminucion of the same

would be moſt acceptable to him: That touching his owne particular, he had not within Parma eyther wife, children, or any goodes, for the whiche he was to feare that by the tranſlation of the gouernment they might be made a praye to the luſtes, to the inſolencies, and rapines of the Frenche: That laſtely ſince he had no reaſon to hope for any profite by the defence of Parma, and leſſe feare (by rendring it) of the aduerſities they had proued vnder the harde yoke of the Frenche, and taking it by force, his perſon communicating in the ſame daungers that they did: They mighte be aſſured that no other thing moued him to remayne conſtant, then the manyfeſt knowlege he had that the enemies had no habilitie to force the towne without their great artilleries: of whiche as he was aſſured they had none at all, ſo if he ſtoode in doubt, it ſtoode him vpon not to ſtande agaynſt thaccord, hauing no leſſe care of his owne ſafetie, then all they had deſire to auoyde their common daunger: Seing withall, that by the vacacion of the ſea Apoſtolike, and he not hable in ſuche a towne as that was, to oppoſe him ſelfe agaynſt ſo great an inclinacion and wyll of the people, he could not be within daunger of imputacion, and muche leſſe ſtand charged with their reuolt. With theſe reaſons ſometimes dealing aparte and ſeuerall with manye particulars, and ſometimes diſputing with them all together, and ſometimes leading them along the walles, and eftſones reaſoning with them of other prouiſions, he robbed the time from them, and interteined them all the night: yea he was not ignorant that notwithſtanding they had vehemẽt imaginacions to compound with thenemies, & that not for other cauſe then for feare to be paſſed into captiuitie and ſpoyle, yet they reteyned this conſideracion, that in according without his conſent, they coulde not auoyde the note of rebelles and fayth breakers. But aſſoone as the day appeared, which was a day dedicated to Saint Thomas thapoſtle, they beganne to knowe by the bullets that were ſhotte from the two ſakers planted there the ſame night, that thennemies had no peeces for batterie: whiche made the gouernour to hope that returning to counſayle, he ſhoulde finde them chaunged and aſſured, but he founde them of diſpoſicion contrarie, their feares beeing by ſo muche augmented and redoubled, by howmuche by the light of the day making them hable to diſcerne, they eſteemed themſelues to be neare the perill: In ſo much as laying aſide al regards to fidelitie, and aptnes to heare reaſon, they began with manifeſt inſtance, with proteſtacions and threatnings, to compell him to aduaunce the compoſition: Suche is the rage of a multitude vnbridled, and ſo violently do they runne to recute the thing which in their feares they haue imagined, that their mindes beeing once made tymerous, there is nothing leſſe reſpected with them then the thing whiche ſhould moſte aſſure them. The gouernour made aunſwere with a liuely reſolucion and libertie of minde, that ſince he had no power to ſtoppe in them the courſe of thoſe ſpeches & thoughtes, which he would do if he had in Parma a greater ſtrength, there remayned to him no other ſatisfaction of the iniurie which they were determined to do to the ſea apoſtolike and to him being a miniſter of the ſame, then that they could not auoyd thinfamy of rebelliõ, & imputation of diſloyalty to their lords, if reaſon could not hold them from executing the reſolucion which their tymerous condition had ſtirred in them: he reproched to thẽ with vehement words the oth of homage & fidelity which a few dayes before they had ſolemnly made to him on the behalfe of the ſea apoſtolike: he told them, that though he ſaw affore his eyes their deſtruction and death manifeſt, yet they were not to draw from him any other concluſion then that he woulde continue to make good his fayth in that ſeruice, vntill eyther by ſupplies of newe bandes, or by the comming of great artilleries to the campe of thenemies, or ſome other accident happning, he were ſatisfied that the daunger was more manyfeſt to loaſe the towne, then the hope greater to defende it. He ſloong out of the councell immediatly vpon the deliuery of theſe ſpeeches, partly to leaue them ſounding in their eares and imprinted in their mindes with greater authoritie, and partly to giue order to many things neceſſary if thenemies ſhould offer to giue the aſſault that day, which was beleeued: But they remayned in ſuſpence, and ſtoode ſo muche the more confuſed, by howmuche their reaſon was leſſe then their feares: Whervnto yeelding at laſt to the thing that could leaſt aſſure them, and ſubduing in their fearefulneſſe all other good regards: They reſolued to ſende out at aduenture to ſolicite an accord, diſpatching withall certeine of them to the gouernor, to proteſt to him that if he continued obſtinate to conſent to their ſafety, they were determined in their owne meane, both to put away the perill that was towards them, and to preſerue the Citie from the ſpoyle that they ſaw pretended: But at the very inſtant that they were determined to addreſſe their embaſſage, there began to be heard on all ſides, the cryes of ſuche as garded the gates of the walles, together with the Alarme ſounded by the belles of the high tower of the citie, which gaue the ſigne that thenemies being iſſued out of the Codipont in order of battell, made their approches to the wals to giue thaſſalt: By which occaſion the gouernour returning to thoſe that he had not ſpoken to as yet, cryed vnto them, that though all men were willing, yet the tyme was nowe inconuenient to come to accorde: This is the election (ſayth he) you ſtande in, eyther to defende your liues honorably, or to ſee your citie put to ſhamefull ſacke, and your ſelues deliuered into captiuitie: your aduerſitie calleth you to be warned by the example of Rauenna and Capua, whoſe inhabitantes and the eyes of the naturall children borne in them, ſawe them miſerably ſacked euen as they were ſoliciting an accorde with thenemies that ſtoode vpon the walls: I haue done hithervnto as much as might be concluded in the habilitie of one alone: My will hath bin ſo much aboue my power, by howmuch my fortune hath bene leſſe then my meanes: I haue gouerned you thus long, not more to mine owne prayſe then to your profite, not leſſe to your vniuerſall ſafetie, then to the due ſatisfaction of the place I holde, and nowe haue I ledde you to this election whether you will vanquiſh or dye: I would of my ſelfe I could ſuffice to defend the thing which our fortune hath made not to be preſerued without your aide, then ſhould you ſee with what affection I deſire to defend or to dye. Be not the more diſcouraged for the nearenes of your perill, let not your confidence be ſo much abated, by howemuche your daunger is imminent: ſtriue not leſſe to vanquiſhe feare then to ouercome ſhame: And be not leſſe reſolute to defende your lyues, your goods, the honor of your wiues and doughters, then you haue bene importunate to deſire without any neceſſitie to runne into willing ſeruitude of the French, in whom you are not ignorant remaineth a naturall malice towards you. After theſe ſpeches, he turned his horſe away, and left them all poſſeſſed with contemplacions of feare: But as neceſſitie is mightie to make men reſolute, ſo for that their fortune had lefte them nowe no tyme to proue other remedies, they lette fall all parleys for accorde, for the preſent neceſſitie they had to defende them ſelues: for that one part of thenemies who the daye before had gathered in the countrey a greate quantitie of skaling ladders, made approche to the Baſtillion whiche Federike had buylded on that ſide towardes Pavv, and inuaded it valiauntly: And at the ſame tyme was a furious aſſault giuen to the gate that leades to Reggia, as alſo the feight was begon in two other places, with ſo much the more difficultie of defence to them within,

by how much thenemies were more braue and encouraged by the examples of the Capteines, and the men of the towne filled full of terror and cowardiſe, went not to the walles, but cloſed them ſelues within their houſes, as though euery moment they had exſpected the lateſt ruine of the Citie: Theſe aſſaultes being releued many times, continued the ſpace of foure houres, the daunger of the townesmen diminiſhing continually, not ſo much for the wearines of thenemies, who by the wounds and harmes they receyued in many places, began to loaſe hart, as alſo by the example of the gouernor, and vallor of the townesmen, who ſeing the defence to ſuccede well, tooke courage in their good fortune, and labored more and more at the wall: In ſo much that affore thaſſalt retyred, not onely the vniuerſall multitude of people was ronne thither together with the Churchmen to defend the breaches, but alſo in thaction was concurrant the vallour of many women, who deſpiſing the daunger were ſeene to cary wine and other refreſhings to their husbandes: By theſe, thenemies without diſpayring of the victorie, retyred with the loſſe of ſome and manye wounded, to the Codipont, from whence they diſlodged the morning following, and ſo returned beyonde Pavv, after they had remayned a day or two about the borders of Parma: Federike confeſſed that in this expedicion whereof he was the author, nothing did more beguyle him, then that he would neuer haue beleeued that in a gouernour, neither for his profeſſion a man of warre, nor for his time of any continuance in the city, would de found ſuch vallour, that the Pope being dead, he would rather throwe him ſelfe into daunger without any hope of profite, then ſeeke for his ſafetie which he might do without his diſhonor or infamie.

This defending of Parma hurt greatly thaffaytes of the Frenche, for that it put the people of Millan and other ſubiectes of that ſtate into greater hart to defende themſelues then they had before: But ſpecially they tooke corage when they knewe what weaknes of ſouldiors was within, & had receiued no ſuccors abrode, for that beſides that there came no reskew from Plaiſanca, neither the Svvizzers that were within Modena, nor Guido Rangon nor Vitelli, would once make out any men for the ſuccors of Parma: wherin Guido alleaged for his excuſe, that notwithſtanding the Duke of Ferrara becauſe he could not take Cente defended by the Bollonois, was retyred to Finalo at ſuch time as the Svvizzers arriued: yet he ſtoode afrayde leaſt he would attempt ſome violent action vpon Modona being made naked of the garriſon: And the Biſhop of Piſtoia ſo wauered and was troubled for the inſtant requeſtes which Guicciardin made to him, and for the perſwaſions of Vitelli, who for his owne intereſt ſtirred him vp to paſſe into Romagnia with the Svvizzers, to thende to ſtop the paſſage of the duke of Vrbin: That what for that he was irreſolute, & what through his naturall ſlownes, he did neither the one nor the other of thoſe matters, both for that Parma defended her ſelfe, & in Romagnia no impediment was giuen to the Duke of Vrbin, becauſe the Svvizzers would not march for wāt of their payes: Which duke of Vrbin and with him Malateſta and Horace of the famulie of the Baillons, paſſed, the one to recouer his eſtates loſt, & the other to returne to Perouſa, hauing aſſembled at Ferrara 200. men at armes, 300. light horſemen, and 3000. footemen: An armie which willingly followed them, partly for friendſhip, and partly for hope of ſpoyle: for neither of the frenchmen nor Venetians they could obteine no other fauor then a permiſſion to who ſoeuer had takē their pay, to folow thē, & that the Venetians were contented that Malateſta & Horace ſhould depart out of their pay: Thus they went from Ferrara to Lugo all along Pavv, and finding no impediments in the eſtate of the Church, they drew neare to the Duchie of Vrbin, where the duke being called in by the peoples, recouered presently his whole estate, except certaine peeces holden by the Florentins, and so turning towards Pesero, he tooke the towne with the same facilitie, and within fewe dayes after the castell: he ioyned diligence to his good fortune, and hauing chased out of Camerin, Iohn Maria de Varana the auncient lord, who for his greater dignitie and illustracion had obteined of Pope Leo the title of Duke, he bestowed within it Sigisinund a gentleman of the same famulie, by whome was pretended a better right in the same estate: And yet the Duke, who was withdrawne within Aquila, kept still the Castell: And so after thexpedicion of these matters, he turned with Malatesta and Horace Baillon, to Perousa, of which place the Florentins had taken the defence, not so muche of their owne counsell, as following the will of Cardinall de Medicis: wherein he was pushed on eyther by a kinde of hatred that he nourished agaynst the Duke of Vrbin and the Baillons, or by thimpediment of their neighborhood which he thought might put in daunger the authority he had in Florence, or lastly for that aspiring to the Popedome, he sought to cary the reputacion that he alone was the defendor of the Churche during the sea vacant, the College of Cardinals hauing no care to defende any part of the ecclesiastike dominion, neither in Lombardie, in Tuskane, nor elsewhere: The same proceding partly by the diuision of the Cardinalls, being no lesse full of ciuill factions, then wholly drowned in deepe ambicion to climbe to the Popedome: And partely for that it coulde not be founde neither in the treasorie Pontificall, nor in the Castell S. Angelo, that the late Pope had lefte any prouision of money: for suche were his prodigalities that he had not onely consumed the moneyes whiche his predecessor had left him, with an incredible quantitie of treasor which he had leauyed of the creacion of newe officers, with a yearely diminucion of fortie thousande duckets of reuenue: But also he had left the sea charged with huge debtes, and layde to pawne all the precious Iewelles of the holye treasorie: Vppon whiche occasion was published this subtill speeche, that other prelacies ended with the death of Popes, but the pontificacie of Leo was to continue many yeares after. Onely tharchbishop Vrsin was sent by the Colledge to Perousa, to accorde an vnitie and reconcilement with the Baillons, but that deuise was no lesse vayne then the labour fruitlesse, for that the man was suspected to Gentill for thalliance he had with the sonnes of Iohn Pavvle, and also for the condicions that were offred, bearing no suretie for him: In so muche as towardes the laste daye of the yeare, the Duke of Vrbin, Malatesta and Horace Baillons, with Camilla Vrsin, who being followed of certayne voluntaries was newly vnited with them, went to Pont. S. Iohn, and from thence running vp to other places thereaboutes, they dyd great domages aswell by night as by daye to the Citie of Perousa, where ouer and besides fiue hundred footemen whiche Gentill had leauyed, the Florentines had sent thither two thousande footemen and an hundred light horsemen vnder Guido Vaino, and 120. men at armes and an hundred light horsemen vnder Vitelli.

This time was quiet in the duchie of Millan, no other thing beeing done by eyther of the parties then certayne roades and pillages: And the better to execute those domages vppon places holden by the Church, those bandes of Frenche men which were remaining in Cremona being 2000. footemen, had set vp a bridge vpon Pavv, by thoportunity wherof passing oftentimes vpō the territories of Plaisanca & Parma, they did harmes to the whole contry: And notwithstanding Prospero by thincitacion of other capteins did publish that he would take Trezzo, & had already sent thither artilleries: yet he forbare to put the deuise to execution, alleaging that it was not conuenient that the armie ſhould be reſtrained to any one place, to thend to be the more hable to ſuccor theſtates of the Churche, if the Frenche ſhoulde begin to execute any action vppon them: But it ſeemed his thoughtes were farre different from his wordes, for that when he was tolde that the Frenche campe was planted before Parma, muche leſſe that he made any ſigne to ſuccour it, ſeeing he ſayde it was more conuenient to exſpect the euent and iſſue: yea that whiche more is, at ſuche tyme as Plaiſanca remayned disfurniſhed of garriſon, for that the Svvizzers of the Cantons of Zurich according to the ſommonce of their Lordes, were gone awaye in haſte, Proſpero dyd what he coulde to lette the Marquis of Mantua for going from Millan with his bandes: and he beeing put within Plaiſanca, ſuſteyned that Citie to his great prayſe with the footebandes of his eſtates, not ſparing oftentymes to releeue their neceſſities with money.

Amidde ſo many daungers and variacions, there was no prouiſion for thelection of the newe Pope: a matter which was deferred to the great preiudice of theſtate eccleſiaſtike, both to giue time to the abſent Cardinals to reſort to Rome, and alſo for that the Cardinall of Turea going from Thurin to Rome, was deteined in Millan by commaundement from Proſpero Colonno, to thende he ſhould not aſſiſt the aſſemblie in the conclaue for that he was a fauorer of the French: Vppon whoſe reſtrayning the College ſet down a decree that ſo many dayes would they tary to enter the conclaue, howe many the Cardinall Turea eyther had bene or ſhoulde be ſtopped from paſſing further: But aſſone as he was deliuered, the conclaue aſſembled the xxvij. of December, wherein were drawne together in ſolemne aſſemblie xxxix. Cardinalls: So muche was increaſed the number by the immoderate promocions of Leo, at whoſe creacion were not preſent aboue xxiiij. Cardinalls.

The firſt fact of the yere a thouſande fiue hundred two and twentie, was the mutation of theſtate of Perouſa, whiche according to the iudgement of men, happned no leſſe through the cowardiſe of the defendantes, then by the vallour of the aſſaylantes: who with their voluntaries and followers, were ryſen to a number of two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and fiue thouſand footmen: This armie after it had lodged in the ſuburbes of S. Peter which they within had abandoned, gaue the fourth daye of the yeare an aſſault with many numbers of ladders both at Saint Peters gate, Solions gate, and the gate Brognio, with many other places, hauing firſt remoued the defences of all theſe places with ſeuen fielde peeces whiche the Duke of Ferrara had lent them: The aſſault began about the breach of the daye, and being many times releued, it continued almoſt the whole day: And albeit entrie was made in two or three places of the towne, which onely was defended by the ſouldiors without the ayde of the people who ſtirred not, yet the aſſaylantes were alwayes repulſed with ſlaughter, which gaue no leſſe courage to Gentill, then hope to the Florentin Agent, to be hable to defende it ſtill with no leſſe felicity and ſucceſſe: But the timerouſnes of Vitelli was the cauſe that the matter drewe an other euent: for fearing leaſt the people bearing more inclinacion to the ſonnes of Iohn Pavvle then to Gentill, would ryſe in their fauours: And finding it withall a matter of no little importance that they were beſtowed in the ſuburbes betweene the two gates of Saint Peter: But principallye ſtanding feareſull to loaſe his life vppon the yll euent of thinges for the hatred whiche he knewe the Duke of Vrbin and the ſonnes of Iohn Pavvle bare to him: he ſignified in the nighte to the other Capteines that he woulde departe, alleaging that hys preſence woulde bee to little purpoſe for the ſeruice, for that the daye before he had receyued at the assalt a wounde in his foote with a bullet, the anguishe whereof constrayned him to keepe his bedde: Gentill and the other capteines labored him with many requestes to chaunge that intention, wherein albeit they layde before him howe hurtfull would be his departure to the whole seruice, and of no lesse yll example to the souldiors and people of the towne, yet they found him lesse apt to be remoued then belonged to a man of his place and vallour, and in that inclinacion they ioyned with him to follow him: And so the same night they departed to Citta de Castello, leauing Perousa to receiue the Baillons, not without an incredible wonder to all those, who beeing aduertised by letters written the same night what good successe they within had the day before, heard within fewe howres after howe Vitelli and the residue had cowardly left it abandoned.

The election of the new Pope was not yet accomplished, which had bene deferred by reason of the discorde that was amongest the Cardinalls, deriuing principally from the Cardinall de Medicis who aspired to the place, and who could do much for the reputacion of his greatnes, and for his reuenues: he had also by the glory of the late conquest of Millan corrupted the voyces of fifteene Cardinalls, pushed on eyther by their proper interests, or for thaffection they bare to him, or by the memory of the benefites they had receiued of Pope Leo: yea some of them were caryed with this hope, that though he shoulde not be hable to carye the soueraigne seate of the Popedome, yet he would at least beare fauour to those that had stand with him and for him: But many wayes his ambicion was suspected, and many things were contrarie to his desire: for to many of them it semed a matter most preiudiciall that one of the same famulie should succeede the dead Pope, and that in it would be concluded a president and example to dispose the Popedome by succession: All the elder sort of Cardinalles obiected themselues agaynst him, holding the dignitie of their time and grauitie muche depraued, to suffer the election to settle vpon one that had lesse then fiftie yeres of age: All those that were of the Frenche parte were agaynst him, with whom did ioyne also some of thimperiall faction: for notwithstanding in the beginning the Cardinal Colonno gaue it out that he would fauour him, yet afterwardes he opposed himselfe openly agaynst him: as also all those companies of Cardinalls that were yll contented with Pope Leo, declared thē selues his enemies: Neuertheless amid these difficulties, the thing that nourished him was, that he knewe that suche as were of his side, making more then a thirde parte of the Colledge, so long as they stoode vnited and constant, the election coulde not be accomplished without their consent: A matter which kept him delited in this hope, that with time his aduersaries would eyther be wearie or deuided, the rather for that there were of them who for their age and other infirmities, were not hable to beare out a long payne: And withall, though they stoode firme not to create him at all, yet he sawe their diuersitie would keepe them from concluding the creacion of an other, euery one striuing to transferre thelection to his friend, and most of them reteining a setled obstinacie not to giue place one to an other: But the chaunge of thestate of Perousa did somewhat staye thambicion of Cardinall de Medicis, by the instance of cardinall Petrucci, one of the Cardinalls of his faction: who beeing chiefe of thestate of Siena, and fearing least by his absence there might happen some mutacion in the citie wherevnto he vnderstoode the Duke of Vrbin would addresse his armie, did vehemently labor to aduaunce thelection of the newe Pope: his importunities together with thinterest and consideracion of the daunger which would fall vppon the state of Florence if Siena should happen to chaunge, drew the Cardinall de Medicis somewhat somewhat to incline and yeelde, and yet was not determined to whome to giue his voyce. At last they fell to the custome of lotting of voyces in the Conclaue, wherein Cardinall Adrian Bishop of Derchuso was preferred without any affection or partialitie of voyce: he was of nation a Flemming, & in his youth hauing bene schoolemaister to Cæsar and by his meane made Cardinall vnder Pope Leo, did at that time gouerne Spaine in the absence of Cæsar: And as there beganne some voyces to publish for him, so Cardinall Xisto one of that election, beganne vnder an oration special, to recompt and amplifie his vertues and knowledge, by whose example certeine other Cardinalls yeelded, and the residue from hand to hand followed, though more by compulsion then by councell: Thus was he chosen with the voyces of all the Cardinalls, and had his creacion perfected the same morning: wherein this was to be wondred at, that euen those that had elected him could giue no reason, why amidde so many troubles and daungers in the state Ecclesiastike, they had raised to the soueraigne sea, a straunger, a forrener, and of long absence out of the contrie, and wherein were helping no respects of fauor, no consideracion of former merits, nor any conuersacion had with any of the other Cardinalls: yea they scarcely knew his name, he had neuer bene in Italie, and had no hope nor cogitacion to see it: of which strauagant maner of dealing, being not hable to excuse them selues by any reason, they attributed all to the working of the holy Ghost, who is wont (so they alleaged) to inspire the hartes of the Cardinalls in the electing of Popes: he receiued newes of his election in the towne of Victoria in Biskay, and would not haue imposed vpon him any other name then his owne, which he caused to be published vnder Adrian the sixt.

Vpon the mutacion of Perousa, after the bands of souldiours had lingred certeine dayes to marche not without some litle preiudice to their other busines, they went (to thende to leauie money of their frendes) from Perousa and Tody, where Camylla Vrsin had restored the exiles: The Duke of Vrbin with the residue leauing Malatesta in Perousa, marched in great diligence towardes Sienna, hauing with them Lactance Petrucci whom Pope Leo had depriued of the Bishoprike of Sienna, for that th Emperours officers had stayed Bourgeso and Fabio the sonnes of Pandolffo Petrucci from going from Naples: Those that gouerned in Siena had no other hopes thē in the succors of the Florentins, & that by intelligence which they had with Cardinall de Medicis: At whose instance his faction ruling for him in his absence the state of Florence, vnderstanding that the Duke of Vrbin was gon from Perousa, dispatched presently to Sienna Guido Vaino with an hundred light horsemen & prouision of money, to ioyne with them certeine bandes of footemen which they of Sienna had leauied: But the principall fundacion was vppon the forces appointed many dayes before: for, when they were aduertised of the first mouing of the Duke of Vrbin and the Baillons, and withall, hauing feare of Tuskane, they had solicited to wage the Svvizzers of the Canton of Berne, who being in number almost a thowsand were remeining within Bologna with the Bishop of Pistoya, making no reckoning of the commaundementes sent to them by their Lordes to returne into Svvizzerlande: This practise albeit it drew a longer time then was needefull by many difficulties obiected by the Bishop of Pistoy, yet at last it was put in execucion, not without great expenses, besides the leauying of foure hundred Almaine footemen who were ioyned in Bolognia with the Svvizzers: They had also called out of Lombardy Iohn de Medicis, and with those forces arriuing in time, they made no dout to assure the affaires of Sienna, which were now reduced to verie ill tearmes, both for that the greatest parte of the people

enuyed the preſent gouernment, and alſo for an auncient hatred againſt the Florentyns, they could hardly endure that their bands of ſouldiours ſhould enter into Sienna: But the matter that redoubled the daunger preſent, was the abſence of Cardinal Petrucci, in whoſe place notwithſtanding his Nephew Frauncis did what he could to ſuſteine thinges, though his authoritie was not equall to the Cardinall: for this cauſe, being carefull either to auoid or to prolong the daunger preſent, (wherein the principalls and chiefetaines were concurrant) They had diſpatched Embaſſadors to the Duke of Vrbin aſſoone as he was entred vpon the territories of Syenna: who notwithſtanding required in the beginning a chaunge of the ſtate, and thirty thowſand duckats, yet afterwards his demaunds were reduced to a moderation, Inſomuch as it was to be feared greatly that there would grow betwene the Duke and the Siennoys ſome compoſicion, either by the conſent and priuitie of the gouernors, or by the mocion of the people againſt their wills: Neuertheleſſe as the bands of the Florentyns entred continually within Sienna, together with a brute ronning that Iohn de Medicis approched with the Svvyzzers, ſo ſuch as impugned the accord and the ſolicitacion of the ſame, tooke ſo much the more courage to hinder it from concluſion: So that the Duke being drawne neare to the walls with his armie which conteyned but ſeuen thowſand footemen the moſt parte leauied at randome, he eſtſoones left thenterpriſe of Sienna to retyre into his eſtate the hopes of thaccord diminiſhing, & the Svvyzzers being come within a dayes iorney.

The ſame companies that ſuccored Sienna turned towards Perouſa, And the Florentyns tooke occaſion to execute ſpedely the thing which they deſired, being therunto alſo ſolicited by the colleage of Cardinalls: vnder whoſe name and authoritie the ſtate of the Church was gouerned in the abſence of the Pope, and by that reaſon the Cardinall Cortona, who from the time of Pope Leo was Legat of the citie of Perouſa, was perſonally in tharmie. But ſince the creacion of the Pope, there was in the colleage no greater vnitie or reſolucion then had bene before in the conclaue, but the variacions were more apparant & their controuerſies not leſſe violent: for, they had ſet downe an order that euery moneth the affaires ſhould be gouerned by three Cardinalls bearing the title of Priours, whoſe office was to conuocate and aſſemble the reſidue and diſpatch cauſes: of which the firſt three that were newly entred, began to oppoſe againſt the Cardinall Medicis, who was immediatly returned to Florence after thelection of the Pope, and cryed out that the bandes of the Florentyns ſhould doe no harmes nor domage to the lands of the Church: Theſe bands hauing already ſacked the towne of Paſignian refuſing to lodge them, and afterwards being beſtowed within Olma three miles from Perouſa, vnder an aſſured hope almoſt to cary that citie, they had held ſmall reckoning of thoſe commaundements, had not ben the knowledge they had of the vanitie of their hopes: for the famulie of the Baillons had made to enter Perouſa many bands of ſouldiours, and bare beſides a greater authoritie with the people then Gentill who followed the armie: In which regarde no leſſe diſpairing of the victorie, then hauing proued in vaine to cary it by compoſicion, they retyred ſomewhat aboue the borders of Perouſa, as though they would not oppoſe againſt the will of the colleage. They entred into the contry of Montfeltro which except Saint Leo and the rocke of Maiuola, was wholly returned vnder thobedience of the Duke of Vrbin: And after they had recouered it with more facilitie then loſſe, armes were depoſed on that ſide as it were by a peaſible conuencion, both for that the Duke was not ſufficiently mighty to continue the warres with the Florentyns, nor they had not cauſe to hold him in warre, neither for their owne profit, nor to content others: for, the colleage wherein the aduersaries of Cardinall Medicis could do most, had at the same instant couenanted with him to reteine the estate which he had recouered vntill the Popes comming into Italie, and longer if it so pleased the Pope, and that he should not molest the Florentins nor the Siennois, nor enter into confederacy with any Prince, nor any way communicate with him or administer to him.

Hitherunto the matters of Lombardy had bene in peasible estate, the one parte hauing want of money, and the other no lesse necessitie of men: And therefore the souldiours of the Imperialls who were not payed, refusing to stirre out of their lodgings, there was dispatched into Alexandria, onely Iohn Sassetella with his regiment and other souldiours and subiects of the Duchy of Millan: This Capteine in the beginning of the warre chaunging a benefit certeine for hopes incerteine, left the pay of the Venetians to take the wages of the Duke of Millan, notwithstanding he was banished from his estate: In which disposicion of minde and with a fortune more readie then a councell stayed, he approched to Alexandria, where the rashnes of the Guelffes defending the Citie more then the force of the french souldiours, made easie to him the action which all men esteemed hard: for that being issued out to skirmish with thenemies and not hable to susteine the encounter, their dishabilitie gaue them occasion to enter pellmell into the Citie, which by that accident more then through their vallour, became a pray to the victors, & a reproch to the vanquished: And not many dayes after with the same facilitie, were chased out of Asst, certeine bands of the frenche being there entred, by the meane of certeine particulars of the Guelffes faction.

But of this short and suspected quietnes, there were already discerned to draw on beginninges of verie great troubles: for, notwithstanding in the parliaments of the Svvizzers, there were great contencions risen vpon the demaundes of the frenche king, wherein as the Cantons of Zurich and Zuicz stoode obstinate against him, and the Canton of Lucerna whollie with him, and the residue deuided amongest them selues, so also the publike affaires were troubled by the couetousnes of priuate persons, some demaunding of the king pension and enterteinment present, and some requiring their old payes and debts due in times past: Yet they accorded to him at last those proporcions of footemen which he required for the recouerie of the Duchie of Millan: which leauy making a number of more then tenne thousande bodies, descended into Lombardy by the mounteines of S. Barnard & S. Goddard, and were conducted by the bastard of Sauoye great Maister of Fraunce, & by Galeas S. Seuerin maister of the horse. About this time the king of England being estraunged from the amitie of the frenche, had lent to Cæsar a great quantitie of money, the better to furnish him against so great an emocion: And with that money th Emperour had sent Ierome Adorno to Trent, to leauie sixe thousande launceknightes, and to lead them to Millan, together with the person of Frauncis Sforce: his comming was then esteemed of great importance, both to kepe conteined & constant, Millan & the other places of that estate which greatly desired his presence, and also by his authoritie & fauors to make easie the exactions of money wherof there was extreame want. At the same time they of Millan not knowing the prouisions that Cæsar made, had sent money to Trent to wage foure thowsande footemen, and they being prepared by that time that Adorno came thither, he left the other six thowsand to be made readie, and with these foure thowsand drew towards Millan to descende to Coma by the vale of Voltolina: And albeit the Grisons denyed to giue him passage, yet his celeritie and vallour made his way, passing with so great diligence vppon the territories of Bergama, and from thence to Guiaradada, that the Venetian gouernors who were within Bergama, had no time to stoppe them: And after he had led these first companies of launce-knightes to Myllan, he returned with the same diligence to Trent, to guide thether Frauncis Sforce with the residue of that leauy. In Myllan there was no care omitted to make all sortes of prouisions, wherein this was chiefly obserued, to forget no meanes that might augment the hatred of the people against the french, to prepare them the better to defend them selues, and to releue the common necessities with money: To this action was much helping many counterfet letters and false messages, together with other cunning stratagemes proceeding from the diligence and art of Moron: But the thing that most of all aduaunced so great an inclinacion, was the preachings and sermons of Andrea Barbato a religious man of thorder of Saint Augustin, who drawing to him a wonderfull concurse and affluence of people, induced them with reasons and perswasions to take vpon them the defence of their liues, and the redeming of their free contry from the yoke of straungers, auncient enemies to that citie: he willed them not to be lesse forward to execute, then God was ready to raise them a meane to set them selues at libertie: he told them, the soueraigne care of mortall folkes was to care for their propper sauetie: he reduced to their memories the example of Parma a weake and small citie in comparison of Myllan, and left not vnrecorded thactions of their Elders whose names had caried reputacion and glorye throughout all Italy: he layed out by reasons and examples how farre mortall men were bownd to defende their contrey, for the which if the Gentiles who exspected no other recompense then glorye offered their liues willingly to death: then farre greater was the office and bond of Christians, to whome, dying in so iust and holy an enterprise, was prepared for recompense, not the glory of this world fraile and transitory, but the fruicion of thimmortall kingdom, infinite and euerlasting. They had to consider what vniuersall ruine would be brought vppon that citie by the victorie of the french men, whose yoke if it had seemed heauy and greeuous affore, their burdens now could not be lesse then extreame & intollerable, And by how much their rigour raged vppon them without any cause affore, by so muche had they to assure them selues of extreame oppression now vppon thoccasion of these offences: That one execucion of the people of Myllan would not suffice to quench the thirst of their crueltie and hatred: that all the goods of the citie could not satisfie their immoderat couetousnes: yea nothing could content them but the vtter defacing of the name & memorie of the inhabitants of Myllan, and by a horrible example to surpasse the vnnaturall crueltie of Federyk Barberousse: These speeches so redoubled the hatred of thinhabitants, and no lesse suppressed all feare of the victorie of the french men, that it seemed now more necessary to appease and reteyne them, then to moue or prouoke them, such is the power of speeches aptly deliuered and duely respecting time, place, and all other circumstances concurring with thinclinacion of the people to whom they are pronownced. But in this meane while Prospero was not idle to repaire and releue the bastyllions and rampiers of the trenches, with intencion to staye at Myllan, which he hoped to be able to defende for certeine monethes though the six thowsand Svvyzzers came not at all: And looking also to the defence of the other townes, he dispatched to Nouaro Phillippo Toriuello, and to Alexandria Monsr Visconte, the one with two thowsand, and the other with fifteene hundred Italian footemen, who liued vppon the people for that they were not payd: he sent also to Pauia Anth. de Leua with two thowsand launceknights and a thowsand Italians: And ouer and aboue

boue all these proporcions, he kept within Millan seuen hundred men at armes, seuen hundred light horsemen, and twelue thousande footemen: Onely the present daunger that remayned was, that the French men should not enter Millan by the castell, therefore aswell to remedie that, as by the same meane to stoppe them for putting vittels or other prouisions into the Castell, Prospero with an intencion highly esteemed, and in the iudgement of men supposed wonderfull, caused to cast without the Castell betwene the gates that leade to Verceill and to Coma, two trenches with a banke or rysing to eyther of the same of that earth that was throwne vppe: These two trenches were distant one from an other twentie passes, and in longitude they conteyned almost a myle, euen as long as is the trauerse of the gardeins behynd the Castell betweene the two wayes aforesayde: At eyther head of these two trenches he erected a fort both high and well manned, the better to annoy thenemies with shot if they made their approches on that side: This was the vse of these two trenches, being well defended with footemen that were placed in the middest of the same: They bothe kept that no succours shoulde enter into the Castell, and withall would not suffer any of the besieged to issue out: Fortune also expressed with a gladsome token that suche an inuencion should be no lesse happie, then it was full of witte and deuise: for she ministred to it this fauour, that it might be put in execution without any domage at all, for that Prospero seruing his turne of the benefite of a great snowe that fell, caused to be caste before daye two bankes or rysinges of snowe (and to their resemblance or example he caste also trenches) whiche shadowed and couered from the shot of the Castell the laborers that wrought: And that which also helped to aduaunce the worke to perfection, was thimpediment whiche the Svvizzers in passing the mountaynes receyued by the snowe, whiche was wonderfull deepe and thicke.

In this meane while Monsr Lavvtrech readressed and reassembled his companies, of whom he sent certayne bandes beyonde Pavv, and they entring Florenzola, stripped the guidon of horsemen of Levvis Gonzaguo whom they found sleeping in securitie and negligence: The companies also of the Venetians were moostred about the confines of Cremona vnder Andrea Gritti and Theodore Triuulco, and they ioyning at laste with the Svvizzers, passed the ryuer of Adda the first daye of Marche. Monsr Lavvtrech was general of tharmie, whose authoritie was nothing diminished by the comming of the great Maister nor the maister of the horse: And at the same tyme came to the armie Iohn de Medicis, who albeit he had solicited and almost resolued to enter into the paye of Frauncis Sforce, and was already vppon the waye to goe to Millan, where he was greatly desired for the good opinion that was of his vallour and conduit: yet he was caryed by the benefite of greater offers and more suretie of payment of the Frenche king, taking this excuse that there was not sent to him from Millan the summes of money that were promised him: In which respect and in which disposition he went from the territories of Parma, where he had sacked the towne of Bussette for that they had denyed him lodging, and passed to the campe of the Frenchmen, which laye within two miles of the Castell betwene the sayd wayes of Verceill and Coma: The thirde day after the Frenche men were incamped, they marched in order making as though they would set vpon the trenche and rampier, which notwithstanding they did not execute, eyther for that such was thintencion of Monsr Lavvtrech from the beginning, or else waighing together with the number of souldiors that were within, the disposicion of the people, and the readinesse that appeared in the defendantes, the manifest difficultie of thenterprise drewe him from it: The same day the stones that violently were driuen from a house within by the furie of the artilleries, slew Marke Anth. Colonno a Capteine of very great exspectacion: Camilla Triuulce bastard sonne to Iohn Iacques participated also in this lamentable desteny as they walked together along the house that was striken deuising to raise a mount to strike with thartilleries betwene the two trenches of thenemies: But Lavvtrech hauing no cõfidence to take Millan by assault, thought he should be hable to carie it with the longnes of time, for that with the multitude of his horsemen, and great bands of banisht men that followed his armie, with whom he ouerranne the whole contrie, he gaue great impediments to thentrie of vittells: he caused to be broken downe all the milnes, and turned away the course of suche waters as any way gaue releefe or commoditie to them of Millan: he was not also out of hope, that the payes woulde faile to the souldiours within, being hitherunto enterteined but with the money of the Millanois, for that Cæsar sent a very small quantity from the kingdom of Naples or other places: But such was the hatred of the people of Millan against the frenche, and so vniuersall their desire to haue their new Duke, that their affections therein did not onely make their pacience greater then all discommodities, but also muche lesse that those aduersities made them chaunge will, seeinge it was the thing that did more and more confirme them, yea the youth of their Citie ranne voluntarily to armes, of whome they created Capteines in euerie parish, insomuch that the gardes that with a readie diligence ranne day & night to the places furthest of remoued from the armie ministred no litle succour & comforte to the souldiours: And wanting the vse of milnes at that time for that they were ruined by thennemie, they releeued forthwith that aduersitie with the seruice of handmilnes.

Thus the hope of the speedie victory of the warre, being reduced into the labors and cares of a long seege, the Duke of Millan whose departure had bene many dayes foreslowed for want of money, and had yet lingred if the Cardinall Medicis had not succored him with nine thowsande duckats, departed at last from Trenta with sixe thowsand launceknights, and taking the rocke of Croara belonging to the Venetians, the better to open his passage, he marched without any impediment through the landes of Verona and Mantua: And passing the riuer of Pavv to Casallmaior, he arriued at Plaisanca, where the Marquis of Mantua came to him with three hũdred men at armes and accompanied him from thence to Pauia: There the Duke staied to exspect occasion to passe to Millan where he was wished with an vniuersall exspectacion, for that by the dayly diminucion of meanes to leauie money to enterteine the souldiours, it was thought necessarie to ioyne assoone as might be with the launceknightes, and so to take the field and seeke to put end to the warre: But the difficultie to passe was great, for that assoone as Lavvtrech vnderstoode they were in Flaisanca, he went to lodge at Casina siue myles from Millan vpon the way that leades to Pauia: he had also bestowed the Venetians within Binasquo which is vppon the same way, both the one and the other being in lodginges well rampiered and fortified: where after they had remeined certeine daies, & in that space had taken S. Ange and S. Colombano, Monsr Lavvtrech, vnderstanding that Monsr d'Escud his brother whom he had sent into Fraunce to relate to the king the estate of the affaires, was returned, and both with money and bandes of footemen which he had waged at Genes, was arriued in the estate of Millan: he sent to ioyne with him Federike Bossolo with foure hundred launces and vij. thowsande Svvizzers and Italians: Against whome albeit the Marquis of Mantua issued out of Pauia & went to Gambala to make head against them, them, yet he retyred eftſones to Pauia, hauing an opinion that his abode within Gambalo would be to little purpoſe, eyther for that (this was his ſaying) they made as though they woulde retyre towardes Theſin, or elſe (which was more credible) he ſtoode in ſome feare of them, for that their numbers were greater then had bene reapported to him: But they being come to Gambalo, and being ioyned with Monſr d'Eſcud, they went to Nouaro, which after they had battred with thartilleries of the Caſtell that held for them, they entred it by force at the third aſſalt with the ſlaughter of the greateſt parte of the footemen that were within, and Phillippe Toruiello remayning priſoner: For this accident together with the redoubled letters of Toruiello appealing to him for ſuccours, the Marquis of Mantua iſſued once agayne out of Pauia, returning eftſones thither aſſone as he had knowledge howe thinges went, retyring his companies from Vigeneua, and leauing onely garriſon within the Caſtell. The ioyning of forces with Monſr d'Eſcud and the taking of Nouaro, was preiudiciall to the French men in a matter of greateſt importance, for that it was ſo much the more eaſy for Frauncis Sforce to go with his armie of launceknights to Millan: It was agreed betwene Proſpero and him to depart one night in ſecrete from Pauia, leauing for the garde of the ſame two thouſande footemen and three hundred horſmen, vnder the charge of the Marquis of Mantua, who refuſed to paſſe any further for that he would not be ſo farre remoued from theſtate of the Church: Frauncis Sforce taking a ſtraunge and vncothe waye, was receyued at Seſto by Proſpero, who was gone to meete him with parte of his companies, and ſo to guyde him to Millan: Great was the ioye that the people of Millan made to receiue him, and euery one reducing to his memorie the felicitie wherein they had lyued in that eſtate vnder his father and other Dukes of that name, made their deſires ſo much the more infinite, by howe muche they doubted not that in a naturall and proper prince could want no affection to his people to reſpect and eſteeme them, and not to reiect or disfauour them for his immoderate greatnes.

Frauncis Sforce at Millan.

After the Duke was gone from Pauia, Lavvtrech entred into hope to be hable to take that Citie, and vppon fundacion of that confidence, he went to incampe there aſſone as he had reaſſembled his armie: And of the other ſide Proſpero, not ignoraunt in what daunger it was, diſpatched thither in great diligence a thouſande footemen Corſegnans, with certayne bandes of Spaniardes, who charging vppon the ſodayne the lodginges of the Frenche armie, paſſed through, partly marching and partly fighting: In whiche encounter making ſlaughter of many of the Frenche men, they made waye by their owne vallour, and arriued in ſafetie in Pauia, where were many incommodities, but ſpecially greate wante of gonne powder: Monſr Lavvtrech beganne to batter the walles in two partes, in the ſuburbes of Saint Marie in Pertico towardes Theſin, and in the Burget: And after he had brought to the earth thirtie faddomes of the wall, he gaue the aſſault but without anye iſſue or good ſucceſſe: In ſo muche as ſeeing into the vallour of the defendantes and their vniuerſall reſolucion to ſell their liues with the place, he began to diſpayre of thenterpriſe: Beſides, he was afflicted dayly with many other difficulties, both for the diminucion of the treaſor whiche his brother had brought out of Fraunce, and alſo by the generall neceſſitie of vittells through the armie, the ſame happning by thoccaſion of great raynes: by thimpedimentes whereof it was harde for tharmy to be reuittled by lande, and leſſe poſſibilitie of releeſe by the benefite of Theſin, for that the boates being driuen backe by the ſtreame of the ryuer whiche was greate and violent, could not holde courſe agaynſt the furie of the ſtreame.

Monſr Lavvtrech before Pauia.

About this time Prosspero was issued out of Millan with his whole armie to draw neare to Pauia, but by reason of the raynes and stormes that fell, he was constrayned to stay at Binasqua, a place in the halfe way betwene Millan & Pauia: And frō thence aduauncing as farre as the Charterhouse which is within the Parke about fiue miles from Pauia, and happly the fayrest monasterie in Italie, Lavvtrech dispayred to take Pauia, and therfore retyred his campe to Landriano without receiuing any other impediment of thenemies then certaine light skirmishes in the breaking vp: From Landriano he went to Monce, to receiue with more facilitie and readines the moneys that were sent to him out of Fraunce, which were stayed at Arona, for that Anchisa Viscount sent for that purpose from Millan to Busto which is neare to Arona, stopped thē that they could not passe further. This was the impediment that reduced thaffayres of the French into the extreme or laste disorder, for that the Svvizzers impacient by custome of all delayes, finding their payes deferred many dayes, sent their capteines to Monsr Lavvtrech to make their complayntes that their nation hauing ben in all times liberall of their blood and seruice for thaduauncement of the crowne of Fraunce, they were nowe restrayned of their dueties and paymentes contrarie to all equitie, order, and reason: That vnder this ingratitude and iniurie it was manifest to all the worlde what slender estimacion was made of their vertue and their fayth: That after a vayne exspectacion of so many dayes, they were nowe determined to reappose no more in promises, speaches, and tearmes which so many times had ben falsified, though muche to their hindrance and preiudice, yet not without dishonor and reproche to suche as did assure them: And therefore they were nowe absolutely determined to returne to their houses, after they had first made knowen to all the world, that the thing that induced them therevnto, was not anye feare they had of their enemies who had now taken the fielde, and muche lesse any desire to eschewe such daungers as men of warre are subiect vnto: A matter which alwayes had bene contemned by thē Svvizzers as many experiences and examples can witnes: They tolde him withall that they were ready to go to the battell the day folowing, with intention to depart the day after: That therefore he would leade them to the field, and vsing thoccasion of their readines, to bestow them in the first front of the whole armie: That they hoped that as with farre lesser forces they had vanquished the French armie in their owne tentes about the borders of Nouaro, so their vallour was no lesse hable to make them cary the victorie ouer the Spaniardes, who albeit were farre aboue the French men in deceites, suttleties, and ambushes, yet they esteemed them selues nothing inferior to them so long as they were to feight with valliancie and force of armes: But Monsr Lavvtrech considering in what perill he should assayle thenemies in their tentes, labored to moderate that furie of the Svvizzers, and by suffrance to seeke to staye those minds whom he sawe obstinate to be conteyned by reason: he tolde them that though the moneys were long in comming, yet the daunger of the wayes was more to be considered then the default of the king: he assured them that ere many dayes they should be possessed of the thing which their impacience made them to doubt of, and that their hopes should be no more prolonged, but their desires satisfied: But he could not winne nor reclayme them neither with authoritie, with peticions, with promises, nor with reasons, and therefore since they should be the first that should feele the daunger, he determined rather to aduenture the battel with a great disaduauntage, then to loase vtterly the warre, which manifestly was seene to be lost, for that if he consented not to feight, the Svvizzers were resolued to departe.

The Svvizzers woulde leaue the fr. armie for that they are not payde.

Monsr Lavvtrech determined to set vppon his enemies.

The

The armie of thennemie laye at Bicocque a towne within three myles of Myllan, where is a camping place verie romthie and large, inuironed with greate gardins and they inclosed with verie deepe ditches, hauing their fieldes about full of founteines and brookes deriued and conueyed according to the vsage of Lombardye, to water the medowes: Monsr Lavvtrech issuing out of Monce drewe towardes that place with his armie, and supposing that thennemies lying in a place of aduauntage woulde not come out of it, he raunged and ordered his bandes in this sorte: That the Svvizzers with thartilleries shoulde charge the front of the place and thartilleries of thennemie, which quarter was garded by the launceknightes commaunded by George Frondisperg: That on the left hande Monsr d'Escud with three hundred launces and a squadron of footemen frenche and Italians shoulde be vppon the way that goeth to Millan, and should drawe towardes the bridge by the which might be made an entrie into the lodginges of thennemies: And for his parte he would labor to enter vpon their place with an esquadron of horsemen: which enterprise he hoped to guide to good succes rather by art then by open force, for that to abuse them the more, he caused his people to put vppon their cassakins, the redde crosse which is the marke of the armie Imperiall, and pulled of the white crosse which is the signe of the frenche armie: On the other side Prospero Colonno who for the scituacion and strength of the place helde the victorie certeine, and therefore determined to abide the ennemies vppon the ditche: Caused all his companies to arme assoone as he heard of their comming: and hauing appointed to euery one his place, he sent foorthwith to Frauncis Sforce to come to the campe with that multitude of people that was armed: And hauing assembled at the ringing of the bell, foure hundred horsemen and sixe thowsande footemen, he was appointed by Prospero to the gard of the bridge: But assoone as the Svvizzers were approached neare the tentes of thennemies, notwithstanding that for the height of the ditches more rising thē they supposed, they could not assaile thartilleries according to their first hopes, yet those difficulties nothing diminishing their vallour, they gaue a charge vppon the ditche striuing with a wonderfull courage to enter and carie it: And at the same time Monsr d'Escud who was drawne towardes the bridge, finding so greate a gard contrarie to his opinion, was constrained to retyre: Prospero also discouered immediatly the deuise of Lavvtrech, and to meete with it commaunded his people to put vpon their heads bundells or handfulls of young corne and grasse, and so made vnprofitable the former suttelties: So that the whole swaigh or burden of the warre lay vpon the Svvizzers: who, as well for the great disaduantage they had, as for the vallour of the defendants were much trauelled without any profit or effect, they receiued many harmes not onely by suche as fought in the front, but also were galled by certeine harguebuziers spanishe: Who lying hidde and couered with the height of the corne almost ful ripe, flanked them & so played vpon them with assured aime, that in the ende after they were well payed for their rashnesse by the slaughter of many of their companies, the violence of the shotte compelled them to retyre: And ioyning in their retraite with the frenche, they returned all together in good order to Monce, both leading with them their artilleries, and receiuing no distresse in their retyring: The Marquis of Pisquairo with other Capteines importuned Prospero, to giue a signe to pursue thennemie seeinge they had alreadie giuen their backes: But he beleuing that which was, that they retyred in good order and not in flying, wherein he was confirmed by the relacion of certeine discouerers mounted by his direction vppon certeine high trees, made this aunswere that it was not reasonable to referre to tharbitrement of fortune the victorie which was assuredly gotten, and lesse councell to deface by his proper rashnesse the memorie and imputacion of other mens temeritie: Tomorow saith he will make manifest to you what hath bene done this day, for that thennemies comming to a better feeling of their woundes, and by their harme receiued being warned to auoyde worse hurtes to come, will seeke to returne ouer the mountes, by which honorable euasion we shall obteine with securitie that which this day we shoulde aduenture to get with perill: There were founde dead about the ditche three thowsand bodies of the Svvizzers, of suche as being more valliant and forward were moste resolute to vanquishe the daunger: of them were two and twentie Capteines: On the other side the slaughter was litle, and not one person of marke or qualitie except Iohn de Cardona Count Culisano striken with a small shotte thorowe his helmet. The day following Monsr de Lavvtrech being wholly depriued of the hope of the victorie, went to Monce to passe the riuer of Adda neare to Tresse: And from thence the Svvizzers taking their way through the territories of Bergama, returned into their mounteines, their numbers beinge no lesse diminished then their vallour, for that it is certeine that the harmes they receiued at Bicocqua so muche afflicted them, that in many yeares after they expressed not their accustomed vallour: The great Maister and Maister of the horse departed at the same time together with many french Capteines: Monsr Lavvtrech with his companies of men at armes went to Cremona to giue order for the defense of that Citie wherein he left his brother: And not many dayes after he passed the mountes, carying to the frenche king, not reapportes of victories or triumphes, but a iustificacion of him selfe with complaintes against others for the losse of such an estate, happening partely by his owne errours, partely by the negligence and indiscression of some about the king, and partly by the malice of fortune, if suche attribucion may be lawefull: Monsr Lavvtrech tooke order also affore his departure from Cremona that Bonneuall and Federike Bossolo with sixe companies of men at armes and sufficient garrison of footemen, shoulde enter the towne of Loda, which had bene holden for the king during the whole course of the warre: He did this for that the Imperiall Capteines were let to conuert thither foorthwith their forces by reason of a tumult hapned amongest those companies of launceknightes which Frauncis Sforce had brought from Trente: They required for a reward of the victory to haue a monthes pay, a demaunde which the Capteines sayd was no lesse vnreasonable then vniust, for that both there was a great difference betwene the defending of them selues from such as did assault them, and to vanquish those that did charge them, and also for that it could not be sayd that the ennemies were vanquished, who were retyred not in flying but in good order, carying with them their artilleries and traines: Neuertheless, thinsolencie of the launceknightes preuailing more then either necessarie reason or due authoritie of the Capteines, a consent was made more by compulsion & necessity of things then by iust cause arising, & so they were satisfied with a promise to be payed within a certeine time: After many dayes past in these affaires, it hapned that the same day that the french launces entred the City of Loda and the footebands following on thother side came the army Imperial and affore them all, the Marquis of Pisquairo with the spanishe footemen, who entred affore the frenche coulde deuide or distribute the quarters of the towne or bestowe their gardes, but were occupied in confusion and tumult as often happeneth when men of warre enter a towne to lodge in it: This occasion was obserued by the Marquis, and ioyning readie diligence to the present oportunitie he assaulted one

one of the ſuburbes of the towne which was enuyroned with a wall where he found no great reſiſtance: he was no ſooner entred, then all the french men within the towne no leſſe terrified with the ſodeinnes of thaccident then deſperat for that their footemen were not yet come, yeelded to their feares and drew into tumult, fleeing towards the bridge which they had built vpon Adda: The Spanyards entring at the ſame inſtant the citie, ſome by the walls and ſome by the rampiers, followed them euen to the riuer, and in the chaſe tooke many ſouldiors and almoſt all the Capteines except Federyk and Bonneuall: And vpon their returne, they forbare not in that furie to ſacke that vnfortunate citie, ſparing no more the goods then they had done the liues of men. From Loda the Marquis went to Piſqueton which he tooke by compoſicion: And not many dayes after, Proſpero with the whole armie paſſed the riuer of Adda to goe and incampe affore Cremona, which he had no ſooner approched then Monſr d'Eſcud beganne to harken to accorde: he had no other hope to ſuſteine the warre then vppon the comming of the Lord Admirall, whome the king (deſiring to preſerue that which yet helde good for him in that eſtate) ſent into Italy with foure hundred launces and tenne thowſande footemen: And therefore he thought he did good ſeruice to the preſent affayres if without daunger, he could temporiſe and enterteyne thinges in tranquillitie till he ſawe what would be the yſſue of his expectacion of th Admirall: And on the other ſide Proſpero deſired to ridde him ſelfe ſpeedely of thaffayres of Cremona, to haue the better oportunitie to reeſtabliſhe within Genes the brethren of the famulie of Adorna, and that affore Italy were poſſeſt of the newe ſuccours of thennemies: Inſomuche as the capitulacions bare that Monſr d'Eſcud ſhoulde departe out of Cremona within fortie dayes with all his ſouldiours, artilleries and enſeignes diſplayed, if within that tyme (which determined the xxvj. of Iune) there came not to him ſuche a reskewe as eyther might make him able by force to paſſe the riuer of Pavv, or els to take one of thoſe cities in the ſtate of Myllan which was poſſeſſed with garriſon: That likewiſe he ſhoulde procure that all thoſe places and holdes within the Duchie that were kept for the king, ſhoulde bee abandoned, except the caſtells of Myllan, Cremona, and Nouaro: That for thobſeruacion of theſe couenantes, he ſhoulde deliuer foure oſtages: That there ſhoulde bee reſtitucion of priſoners on bothe partes, and ſufferance to the frenche men to paſſe in ſewertie into Fraunce with their artilleries and traynes.

Vppon the concluſion of this accorde, and receiuing of thoſtages, the armie of Cæſar marched forthwith to Genes which they approched in two places: the Marquis of Piſquairo with his regiments of ſpaniſh footemen and Italyans, were incamped on that ſide of Godeſa, and Proſpero with the men at armes and launceknights, vppon the oppoſite of Biſagnia: At that time the citie of Genes was gouerned by Duke Octauyan Fregoſa, A Prince of excellent vertue, and no leſſe for his iuſtice then for his other good partes, as greatly beloued in that citie, as any Prince may be in townes full of factions, reteyning yet a memorie of their auncient libertie: he had waged two thowſande Italyan footemen in whoſe confidence he layed vppe all his hope of defence, for that the peoples of the towne beeing deuyded by factions, and hauing about him ſo mightye an armye compownded vppon ſo greate diuerſitie of languages and nations, forbare to take armes, but ſtoode to beholde thinges in the ſame manner and with the ſame eyes wherewith in other tymes he was wont to beholde his other trauells, Wherein without the daunger or domage of ſuche as tooke no armes, the publike authoritie beeing tranſported from one famulie to an other, there was ſeene no other mutacion, then that in the pallayce of the Duke were beſtowed other inhabitants, other Capteines, and other bands of ſouldiours for the gard of the place. Aſſoone as tharmie was approched the towne, the Duke began to ſolicit compoſicion by the meane of Bennet Vualdi A Genovvay whom he ſent to the Capteines: But this ſolicitacion began to grow cold by the cõming of Peter of Nouaro, who being ſent by the french king with two light gallies for the ſewertie of Genes, entred the hauen at the ſame inſtant: Neuertheleſſe the Marquis beginning to execute his artilleries and batter the walls, they began more then before, to recontinue the parley for accord: Wherein all difficulties beeing debated and reſolued, and the matter vpon tearmes of concluſion, ſuddeinly the Spanyards who all that day had battered a tower neare to the gate, wonne the ſame, finding no gard nor order by the defendants who were abuſed through their hope of compoſicion: Inſomuch as following more their fortune then regarding their fidelitie, they ioyned diligence to thoccaſion and began to enter the citie aſwell by that tower as by the wall that was reuerſed and ruined: By their example all that parte of tharmie ranne to the action, and after the Marquis had ſet his bands in order and ſignified to Proſpero the ſtate of thaccident, they cauſed the trumpets to be ſownded and entred the citie by whole numbers: the calamitie of the defendants tooke awaye all reſiſtance, the ſouldiours giuing them ſelues to flee, and the Citizens to ſeeke ſewertie in ſhutting them ſelues in their houſes: Tharchbiſhop of Salerne, the Capteine of the gard, and many other Capteines and ſouldiours found ſauetie in certeine veſſells with the which they hoyſed ſaile into the ſea: The Duke for his diſeaſe not hable to ſtirre, cauſed to ſhut the pallaice and ſent to the Marquis of Piſquairo that he would yeeld to him, in whoſe houſe he died within few monethes after: Peter Nauare was taken: All the goods of the citie became a pray to the victors, many rich famulies binding them ſelues ſome to one band of ſouldiours and ſome to another, to buye the ſauetie of their liues with great ſummes of money, which they aſſured either with pawnes and gages, or with bills of marchants, & ſo with their money defended their bodies from blud, and redeemed their houſes from ſacking: In the ſame maner was preſerued, the plot ſo famous which they call Catina, & is kept with great reuerence in the Cathedrall Church: It is harde to recompt what quantities of ſiluer veſſell, iewells, money, and moſt riche wares were made pillage, that citie by the great traffike of marchandiſe being repleniſhed with infinit wealth: And yet ſo great a calamitie was ſo much the more eaſie and tollerable, by how much was aptly expreſſed a compaſſion by the brethren of the famulie of Adorna, who both of a naturall affection to the citie, and for that thinhabitants had ſhewed no token of grudge or hatred, and for that alſo they were almoſt vpon the point of accord, procured ſuch order to be ſet downe by the Captaines, that not one Genovvay was made priſoner, nor the body of one woman put to violacion. Immediatly vppon the appeaſing of the ſouldiers Anth. Adorno was elected Duke, who after the armie was gonne, encamped before the caſtellet with ſuch artilleries as the Florentyns lent him: The third day he tooke the Citadell and Saint Frauncis Churche, and the daye after, the caſtellet was rendred to him by the Capteine vnder articles of compoſicion.

The mutacion of Genes tooke from the french king, all hope to be able to ſuccour the affayres of Lombardy: for, both the armie that he ſent and by this time atiued vpon the territories of Aſt, returned backe againe, And alſo Monſr d'Eſcud paſſed into Fraunce, with his companies, hauing ſtayed certaine dayes in Cremona aboue the tearme appointed for the reſoluing of certeine difficulties hapning about the caſtels of Treſſa, Lecqua, and Domuſſolo: In his departure he had not onely faith & promiſſe kept with him, but also was honorably receyued where so euer he passed.

But amidde these broyles and alterations in Lombardie, Bolognia stoode not altogether in quiet, aswell for the warre that was in Lombardie, as for the absence of the Pope: And muche lesse did Tuskane reioyce in any great tranquillitie: for touching Bolognia, Hanniball Bentiuoglia ioyning with him Hanniball Rangon, leauyed secretly an armie of foure thousande footemen, with whom and with three peeces of artilleries, one morning vppon the first appearing of the day, they made their approches on that side to the Mountaines: and for that they in the towne made no brute, some of them passed the ditche and fastned their ladders to the wall: But thinhabitantes within, who had knowledge of their comming the daye before, began to make a noyse and to stirre when they sawe time, and to giue fire to thartilleries, and sending out also many trowpes to begin the skirmish, the armie foorthwith fell to flight, leauing their artilleries behinde, and in the chase Hanniball Rangon was hurte in the backe. It was assuredly iudged that this enterprise was attempted by the procurement and priuitie of Cardinall Medicis, who fearing least the Pope at his comming into Italie, eyther of his owne counsell, or by thincitacion of others, would diminish his greatnes: sought first to trouble him for so great a losse of thestate ecclesiastike, and so by that meane not onely to conuert his thoughtes to other matters then to persecute him, but also he shoulde be constrayned to haue recourse to his ayde and counsell.

Emocions in Tuskane.

But farre more tedious and great were the trauells of Tuskane, for that skarcely was thestate of Siena assured of the Duke of Vrbin, and thaffayres of Perousa and Montfeltre ceassed, then the French king by the suggestion of Cardinal Voltero, gaue order of newe that Ranso de Cero lying at Rome and not employed, should practise to chaunge thestate of Florence, and to reestablish in that Citie, the brothers and Nephewes of Cardinall Voltero, who was manifestly declared agaynst the house of Medicis with all his friendes and confederates of the king: But because the king at that time was in great necessitie, the Cardinall was to aduaunce for this enterprise all necessarie summes of money, receyuing the kings promise to repay them within a certayne time. Whileste Ranso was making his preparacions, these matters came to the knowledge of the Cardinall Medicis, the consideracion wherof, fearing also least the duke of Vrbin should stirre, compelled him to make this accord, that without preiudice to the rightes which the Florentins and the Duke pretended to the townes in Montfeltre, the duke should be capteine generall of the common weale for one yere complete, and for an other yere at pleasure, and the time of his pay to begin the first day of the next moneth of September: For the same cause he reteyned in the paye of the Florentins, Horacio Baillon, but with this condicion that the tyme of his paye should not begin vntill Iune, for that he was enterteined and bound to the Venetians for so long: And albeit this contract was likewise made in the name of his brother Maleteste, yet he would not ratifie it, hauing affore receyued money to be ioyned with Ranso de Cere with a charge of two thousande footemen and an hundred light horsemen: On the one side he would openly blemish his proper honor: and on the other side he was loath to prouoke the Cardinall and the Florentins by newe occasions: Therefore to wade in a meane betwene both, he fayned him selfe to be sicke, and sent to Ranso being then come to the borowe of Pieua two thousande footemen, an hundred light horsemen, and foure falconettes, making excuse by the rage of his sickneesse that he was not hable to goe in person: And to the Cardinall he gaue hope that he would take no more new payes of thenemie: and that assone as the tearme were finiſhed for the which he was payed, he would ratifie the contract made in his name, and in the meane time would proceede with as great moderacion as he could in ſuch actions as he could not refuſe for the payes he had receiued. After this Ranſo entred into the territorie of Siena with fiue hundred horſe and ſeuen thouſande footemen, with intention to practiſe the mutation of that gouernment with the trayne of the ſelfe ſame exiles which had followed the Duke of Vrbin: wherein if thenterpriſe had drawne to good iſſue, it was not to be doubted that hauing power by that meane to enter on that ſide into the bowels of the Florentin dominion, that the like ſucceſſe had not followed him touching the particular of Florence. But the Florentins no leſſe foreſeeing that daunger then deſyring that thenemies ſhould not approche to Siena, had ſent to that ſtate all their regimentes of men of warre vnder the conduit of Guido Rangon elected for that emotion generall of tharmie: he had this ſpeciall intention, both to temporiſe with thenemies, to make them loſe tyme, for that he was not ignorant that without expedicion they would fall into wante of money: and alſo vnder one tyme to vſe all thimpedimentes he could to cut off and ſtoppe their vittells: So that gouerning him ſelfe according to the proceedinges of thenemies, he labored to put ſeuerall garriſons into thoſe townes that were neareſt the eſtate of the Sienois and the Florentins. In which remouing of ſouldiors from one place to an other, it hapned that the guydon of horſemen of Vitelli going from Torrito to Aſinolongo, encountred on the way with three hundred horſemen of thennemies and were ouerthrowne, Ieronimo de Peppoli lieftenant to Vitelli being taken priſoner with fiftie men at armes and two enſignes: Ranſo addreſſed him ſelfe firſte to the Citie of Chiuſa, a Citie more noble for the memorie of his antiquitie and the renowmed actes of Porſene their king, then for his fortunes and condicions preſent: his hope was deceyued to carye it, bringing with him no other ſortes of artilleries then foure falconetts, A force farre to weake to take townes that are defended with ſouldiors: He marched further betwene Torrito and Aſinolongo, to drawe neare to Siena, but hauing no commoditie of vittels amidde ſo many townes of thennemies, and ſeeking to get ſome by force, he aſſayled the borowe of Torrito, where was in garriſon an hundred men at armes of Guido Rangon and fiue hundred footemen: But he leauyed his campe from thence without dooing any thing to aduaunce his purpoſe, and keeping his way, he went to Monteliſte, and from thence to Bagno de Rapolano within twelue myles of Siena, in which Citie the Florentins in the beginning had beſtowed the Count Petillano: But the Count Guido by whoſe diligence and celeritie all theſe deuiſes were preuented, entred the ſame daye into Siena with two hundred light horſemen, leauing his armie behinde to followe after: So that what for the ſuccours that approched, and the reputacion of Ranſo which was greatly diminiſhed in this expedicion aſwell with his owne companies as amongeſt thenemies, together with the knowledge they had that he was reduced to a great neceſſitie of vittells, brought no little diſcourage to them of Siena, to whom could haue bene acceptable a chaunge or alteracion: Neuertheleſſe he preſented himſelfe within halfe a myle of the walles, and ſeeing no inſurrection made in his fauour, he retyred hauing remayned there xxiiij. howres: The ſame daye he retyred (but after he was gone) the bands of the Florentins entred within Siena, who albeit were put in readineſſe to purſue him, yet they made no great labour when they ſawe he was to farre gone: they ſuffred certayne light horſemen to purſue the chaſe and certeine bandes of footemen which were before at Siena, of whom he receyued no great domage: onely his retrayte being haſtie, and happly no leſſe for famine then for feare, he lefte

his artilleries by the way which to his great dishonor fell into the power of thennemies: he stayed at Ayguepante to readresse his companies which were muche diminished, a place so muche the more assured to him, by howmuche he knewe that the Florentin bands would be curious to enter vpon the landes of the Churche: But falling into wantes of money and other prouisions, and the Cardinalls of Voltero, of Monte, and of Come, with whom by the French kings direction he communicated touching his affayres, beginning nowe to reiect him, he conuerted those few bands of souldiors that his fortune had left him, to pill and robbe the shoares or watersides of Siena, and in vayne gaue assault to Orbatella: for which cause the Florentins hauing made their armie to marche towardes the bridge of Centino, whiche is the confine & limit betwene thestate of Siena and the dominion of the Church, threatned to make inuasion of the lands of the Church, for that they sawe Ranso did not wholly dissolue his companies, In which respect the Colledge of Cardinalles, who stoode iealouse to suffer suche an action vpon thestate of the Churche, interposed to accorde them, A matter indifferently agreable to them both: It was acceptable to the Florentins, for that by it they were drawne out of a burden of exspences whiche they made without any frute: And to Ranso it was no lesse welcome, for that both he was yll furnished for the present, and also had no hope to increase his forces, specially the French affayres suffring yll tearmes in Lombardie: The accorde conteined no other matter then a bare promise not to offende one an other, whiche promise ranne betwene the Florentins and Sienois on thone parte, and Ranso de Cero on the other parte putting in pledge in Rome of fitie thousande duckets for the suretie of obseruation: And touching the things that had bene made pillage and spoyle, they referred them to tharbitracion of the Pope when he should come into Italie.

This winter there happned in the towne of Lucquay this daungerous accident: one Vincent Poggio of a noble discending and famulie, and Lavvrence Totti, vnder cooller of particular discords, but more likely pushed on by ambicion and pouertie, tooke armes, and in the publike pallace slewe the chiefe Magistrate of that Citie: And as one furie draweth on an other, and in an vprore is seldome seene any moderacion, so they ranne with their armed weapons throughout the towne and made slaughter of diuerse other Citisens their aduersaries, with suche an vniuersall terror and feare, that not one durst oppose agaynst them: Neuertheless assone as the first violence was somewhat ceassed, the same feare that had amased others, beganne to terrifie themselues by the remorse and greatnes of the offences they had done: In which oportunitie certayne wise Citisens, thrusting in to solicite and appease, the murderers issued out of the Citie vnder certayne condicions, and afterwardes were sharpely persecuted by thinhabitantes of Lucquay. An accident in the towne of Lucquay.

Thus were the matters of Lombardie and Tuskane brought to some appeasement, but the College of Cardinalls taking no care of thestates of the Church, partly for the Popes absence, but more for the ambicion and disagreementes that were betwene them: Sigismond the sonne of Pandolfo Malateste an auncient Lorde of Rimini, tooke almost wholly into his handes the gouernment of that City, hauing therin but a very small intelligence: And albeit Cardinall Medicis at thinstance of the Colledge, went to Bolognia as Legate of that Citie, both to recouer Rimini and to reorder the other affayres of Romagnia, whiche were muche troubled and altered, to whom the Colledge had promised to sende to his succours the Marquis of Mantua capteine generall of the Churche: yet nothing sorted to effect, no lesse by the wantes and impedimentes of money, then through the iealousie and emulacion of the Cardinalls his aduersaries, who obiected themselues agaynst all counsells and actions that any waye might aduaunce his reputacion or greatnes.

THE ARGVMENT OF THE FIFTENTH BOOKE.

POpe Adrian comes to Rome: The Venetians make league vvith themperour: The Frenchmen besiege Millan, and are constrayned afterwardes to returne from it: Cardinall Medicis is created Pope: King Frauncis discendeth into Italie, he taketh Millan, and besiegeth Pauia: Themperour Charles sendeth out an armie to the succours of Pauia, vvhere a battell is fought, and the French king taken prisoner.

THE FYFTEENTH BOOKE OF THE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

ALBEIT the late victorie agaynst the Frenche men had somewhat reduced the matters of Lombardie into an estate peasible and setled: yet it had nothing diminished the vniuersal suspicion that the king would eftsones recontinue the warre, and in short time bring new inuasions vpon the Duchie of Millan: for both his owne kingdome stoode quiet and acquited from ciuill troubles, his Capteines and bandes of men of warre whom he had sent into Italie, were returned in safetie, the Svvizzers well disposed and prepared to take his paye as before: and lastely the Senate of Venice stoode firme with him in the auncient league and confederacion: Whiche argumentes ioyned to the remembrance and passion of his harmes receyued, and no lesse concurring the violent inclinacion of his youth naturally caryed with moodes of reuenge, were sufficient to arme his minde with bloody desires, and to make him by his vallour to seeke to recompence the displeasures whiche the malice and enuie of his fortune had lately heaped vpon him. By the consideracion of which daunger, the Capteines of thimperialls were driuen to enterteine and paye tharmie, A compulsion very harde and grieuous, for that they receiued no supplies of money neither from Cæsar, nor from the kingdome of Naples: And touching thestate of Millan, it was so narrowly raked and gleaned, that of their proper treasor and habilitie they were not able to susteine so great a proporcion of exspences as were distributed to the feeding of so many souldiors: And therefore for the releeuing of so great burdens, they sent the greatest parte of their companies to be bestowed vppon the estates of the Churche, notwithstanding the popular voyces and College of Cardinalls obiected many impedimentes and vayne exclamacions: Also other prouinces of Italie were taxed for the

the conseruacion of the Duchie of Millan, and that by the labour and solicitacion chiefly of Don Charles de Lanoy lately made Viceroy of Naples by the death of Don Reimond de Cardona, and Don Iohn Manuell: The rate of thimposition was, that monthly for three monthes next folowing, thestate of Millan should contribute a thousande duckets, the Florentins fyfteene thousande, the Genovvayes eight thousande, Siena fiue thousande, and Lucqua foure thousand: And albeit many murmured agaynst this taxacion, yet the feare of so great an armie made it to be both executed and suffred: So mightie is necessitie, that in cases of extremitie it makes tollerable those things, which in all other condicions are ful of inconueniencie and difficultie: Onely they of Millan iustified the taxacion to be necessarie, for that the defence of all Italie depended vppon the continuacion of that armie: Neither dyd it cease after the ende of three monthes, for that the same necessitie continuing, the imposicion was eftsones renewed though in a farre lesse rate and taxacion.

The prouinces of Italie are taxed for the conseruation of the duchie of Millan.

In this estate of affayres, Italie stoode oppressed with continuall aduersities, and no lesse terrified with the feare of greater euills that threatned the vniuersall regions thereof: for the remedie whereof muche was attributed to the comming of the Pope, as an apt and conuenient instrument by reason of his supreme authoritie, to appease and reorder all disorders: And albeit Cæsar passing at the same time by sea into Spayne, and in his way did cõmunicate with the king of Englande, had besought him to tarye for him at Barcelona, whither he would come in person to honor him as Pope: yet ye forbare to abyde themperours comming, eyther fearing least for the great distance of themperour, who as yet was in thextreme confines of Spayne, he should let slippe the commoditie of his good tyme which after his nauigacion began to be rough and daungerous: or else he suspected least themperour would solicite him to deferre his voyage: or lastly (which was more credible) he feared to aggrauate thopinion conceiued of him from the beginning, that themperour dyd so muche gouerne him, as to be hable to lette him to treate of the vniuersall peace betwene Christians: An action wherein he was determined to employe all his studies and labours: So that ouerruling by his wisdome all these suspicions, he passed at last by sea to Rome, where he made his entry the xxix. of August, with a great concourse of the commons and the whole Court: of whom albeit his comming was desired with an vniuersall gladnes, for that without the presence of the Popes, Rome beareth more a resemblance of a sauage deserte then of a Citie, yet that spectacle wrought sundrie impressions and diuersitie of thoughtes in the mindes of all men, when they considered that they had a Pope for nation & language a straunger, and for thaffayres of Italie and the Court altogether vnexperienced, and also for that he was not of those regions and countreys who by long conuersacion were already made familiar with the customes of Italie: The enuie that stirred vp in men this consideracion was redoubled by the accident of the plague, which beginning in Rome at his arriuall, afflicted the Citie during the whole season of Autumne, to the great calamitie and losse of the people: A matter which in the fancies of men was construed to an euill prognostication of his Pontificacie.

Pope Adrian the vi. cõmeth to Rome.

The first councell that this Pope tooke, was to aduaunce the recouering of Rimini, and to put ende to the controuersies which the Duke of Ferrara had continued with two of his lateste predecessors: And for the better succeeding of that expedition, he sent into Romagnia that regiment of fifteene hundred Spanishe footemen which he had brought with him for the more suretie of his passage by sea.

Whyleste the Pope was in these actions and preparacions in Italie, themperour caſt in his mind howe muche it would import to the ſucceſſe and ſewertie of his affayres in Italy, to ſeperat the Venetians from the French king: To which deuiſe was much helping an opinion that he had, that the hopes of the french matters being diminiſhed, the Senat would not be without manifeſt inclinacion to peace, and that they would not for thintereſts of others, laye them ſelues downe to the daungers which ſuch a warre might bring vpon their eſtates: In this practiſe he communicated with the king of England, who affore had lent him money ſecretly againſt the French king and began openly to take part againſt him: They ſent thether their Embaſſadors to require the Senate to confederat with thEmprour for the defenſe of Italy, Ierom Adorna being for thEmprour, & Richard Paſe for the king of Englād: There was alſo exſpectacion of an Embaſſador from Ferdinand Archduke of Auſtria Cæſars brother, who enterteyning many quarrells with the Venetians, it was iudged neceſſary that he ſhould interpoſe and communicat in all accords: Beſides, the king of England ſent a Herald to pronownce warre againſt the French king, in caſe he would not come to a generall truce with thEmprour for three yeares in all partes of the world, and therein ſhould be comprehended the Church, the Duke of Myllan, and the Florentyns: he complained alſo in this diffiance that the French king had forborne to pay him thanuitie of fiftie thowſand crownes which he was bound to aunſwer yearly: But the French king whoſe youth made him more apt to truſt in fortune, then to looke into things by counſell, refuſed to make truce, And touching the demaund of the fifty thowſand crownes he proteſted openly that it was not conuenient for him to pay money to him that ayded his enemies with money: An aunſwer which ſo aggrauated the diſdaines & hartburnings betwene them that thEmbaſſadors on both ſides were reuoked.

The king of England for thEmprour. & ſendeth Embaſſadors to the Venetians to draw them from thalliāce of the french.

This yeare departed out of Italy Don Iohn Manuell who had bene Cæſars Embaſſador at Rome with very great authoritie, And at his departure, he deliuered to the Florentyns a ſcedule ſubſigned by his hande, declaring that Cæſar by a ſcedule publiſhed in September 1520. promiſed to Pope Leo to reconfirme and eſtſoones to reaccord to the Florentyns the priuileges of eſtate, of authority, & of the townes which they held within ſix moneths after the firſt dyot vppon his coronation at Aix: This was a reitteracion of a former promiſſe made by him to accompliſh the ſame within foure monethes after his election, within which time he ſayde he could not diſpatch it for many iuſt cauſes: So that vnder proteſtacion of that reaſonable excuſe, Don Iohn promiſed it eſtſoones in the name of Cæſar, who ratified the ſcedule in March 1523. and deliuered the expedicion of it in writing in a moſt ample forme.

VVhat thEmprour did in Spaine.

As hath bene ſet downe before, Cæſar paſſed this yeare into Spaine, where he proceeded ſeuerely againſt many that were noted the Authors of the ſedicion, and to others, he remitted all puniſhments and pardoned their goods: In which action, to ioyne with iuſtice and clemencie examples of recompenſe and remuneracion, he called to the Court in great honor, Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, who refuſing to be Capteine of the commons that rebelled, he rewarded his fidelitie with the mariage of Madame Germania ſometimes wife to the king of Spaine: ſhe was riche, but barreine, to thend that houſe ſhould determine in him who was the laſt of the deſcendants of olde Alfonſo king of Aragon, two of his younger brothers being dead before, the one in Fraunce and the other in Italy.

But the ende of this yeare was made no leſſe wretched and vnhappy, then ſlaunderous to all Chriſtian Princes for the loſſe of the Ile of Rhodes: which Solyman Ottoman tooke by violence, notwithſtanding it was defended by the Knightes of Rhodes, called called in other times more auncient the knightes of Saint Iohn of Ieruſalem: And abiding in that place ſince they were chaſed out of Ieruſalem, notwithſtanding they laye betweene two ſo mightie princes as the Turke and the Soldan, yet their vallour had preſerued it of long tyme, and to the right worthy glorie of their order, they had remayned as an aſſured rampier of Chriſtian religion in thoſe ſeas: And yet they were not without their imputacions and notes of infamie, for that hauing a continuall cuſtome for the better defending of thoſe ſhoares, to ſpoyle the veſſells of the infidells, they were thought ſometymes to make pillage of Chriſtian ſhipps: The Turke ſente into thilande a wonderfull greate armie, which remayning there manye monethes with no leſſe horrour to good men for their cruelties, then terrour to all men for their huge numbers, at laſte he came thither in perſon: And drawing to his deſire of conqueſt and glorie, the reſpect of profite and ryches which the victorie woulde yeelde, he loſte not one minute of tyme to vexe them, wherein his induſtrie was nothing inferiour to his vallour, for ſometimes he caſte monſtrous mynes and trenches, ſometymes he rayſed platfourmes of earth and wood whoſe height ouertopped the walles of the towne, and ſometymes he afflicted them with moſte furious and bloudy aſſaultes: In ſo muche that as theſe workes and engines were not perfourmed without a wonderfull boocherie and ſlaughter of his ſouldiours, ſo alſo the defence of them was ſo daungerous to the lyues of them within, that manye numbers were diminiſhed, manye bodyes maymed and made vnſeruiceable, and the reſidue made terrified by the calamities of their companions and friendes, to whome they coulde giue no other propertie of compaſſion then to mourne with them their common miſerie: Their aduerſitie was ſo muche the more intollerable, by howe muche theyr trauelles were without fruite, their wordes withoute comforte, and their vallour diſfauoured of fortune, and laſtely their ſtoare of gonne powder was conſumed, whiche is not the leaſt neceſſitie for the defence of a place: They ſawe affore their eyes huge breaches made into their walles with thartilleries of thennemies: They decerned ſeuerall mynes wrought into many partes of the towne, and they founde by lamentable experience that the leſſe good they did, the more paynefully they laboured, for that their fortune had reduced them to theſe tearmes of extremitie, that in abandoning one place to releeue an other, they putte bothe in daunger, not hauing numbers ſufficient to furniſhe the ſeruice, and leſſe exſpectation of reskewe amydde perilles ſo raging and deſperate: So that, what for that their neceſſities were greater then their hopes, and their defence leſſe hable by the continuall diminucion of their numbers, and laſtely holding it no breache of honour to preſerue by wiſedome and compoſicion, that they coulde no longer defende by their vallour and prowes, they gaue place to theyr deſtinie, and capitulated with the Turke: That the greate Maiſter of their order ſhoulde leaue the towne to him: That aſwell he as all hys knightes ſhoulde departe in ſafetie, wyth libertie to carie wyth them as muche of their goodes as they coulde: And for aſſurance of this capitulacion, the Turke ſhoulde withdrawe oute of thoſe ſeas, his fleete or Nauie, and retyre hys armye by lande fyue myles from Rhodes: By vertue of whiche capitulacion Rhodes remayned to the Turkes, and the Chriſtians paſſed into Scicilie, and ſo into Italie, keepinge theyr faythe and profeſſion vnuiolated: They founde in Scicilye an Armye by ſea compounded of a certayne number of veſſelles, wyth greate releeſe of vittayles and munitions, and readye to hoyſe ſayle at the nexte wynde to reuittle Rhodes. The ſlowneſſe of this reskewe was layde to the Popes faulte: After they were departed, Soliman for a more contempte of Christian religion, made his entrie into the Citie vpon the daye of the birthe of the sonne of God: whiche daye beeing celebrated in the Churches of Christians with noyse of musike and holy inuocations, he conuerted all the Churches of Rhodes dedicated to the seruice of Iesu Christ, into Mosqueis (so they call their temples) which after all the Christian rites and ceremonies were abolished, they made dedicated to Mahomet. This was the ende of the yeare 1522. infamous for the name and tytle of Christendome, and this was the fruite drawne of the discordes of our Princes, whiche yet mighte be somewhat tollerable, if at least thexamples of harmes past might make them better tempered in tyme to come.

As the discordes of Princes continued, so increased also the trauels & perplexities of the yere 1523. In the beginning of which the famulie of the Malatestes knowing howe vnhable they were to resist the Popes forces, were in thende contented by the mediacion of the Duke of Vrbin, to leaue Rimini and the Castell, albeit vnder this vncertayne hope, that there shoulde be reserued for Pandolfe some reasonable estate and meane to lyue, wherein nothing was done. Afterwardes the Duke of Vrbin wente to the Pope, with whome and with the moste parte of the Court, the glorious memorie of Pope Iulio working muche for him, he obteined absolucion from all paynes and impositions, and was eftsones reinuested in the Duchie of Vrbin, but with this exception, not to preiudice the rightes and application that had bene made of the countrey of Montfeltre to the Florentins, who sayde they had lent to Pope Leo three hundred and fiftie thousande duckets for the defence of that Duchie, and had exspended since his death in diuerse places for the preseruation of thestate of the Churche, more then threescore and tenne thousande: The Pope receyued also into grace the Duke of Ferrara, whome he dyd not onely inuest of newe in the imperie of Ferrara, and of all that he possessed apperteyning to the Churche affore the warre of Pope Leo agaynst the Frenche men, but also he lefte to him (not without a note of infamie bothe to him selfe and ministers that abused his ignoraunce) the iurisdiction of the borowes of Saint Felix and Finale: Which townes as he gotte at suche tyme as he began the warre agaynst Pope Leo, and afterwardes loste them before his death, so he had eftsones taken them of newe by thoccasion of the vacancie of the sea: For recompence of this grace and inuestiture, the Duke was bounde to ayde and succour the Churche in times of neede with certayne numbers of men, for so muche as belonged to the defence of hys imperie and estate: And in case hereafter he shoulde fall agayne and transgresse or offende the sea Apostolike, besides his submission to great fines and amarciamentes, he consented to haue this inuestiture made nothing, and to the priuacion of all his rightes: Moreouer the Pope gaue him great hopes to restore to him Modena and Reggia, notwithstanding afterwardes he estraunged his minde from hys promise, aswell for the importance of suche an indument whiche was afterwardes tolde him, as also for thinfamie of thexamples of his predecessors which coulde not but redounde vpon him.

About this tyme the Castell of Millan suffring no lesse wantes of all prouisions except bread, then being vniuersally afflicted with sicknes and diseases, agreed to deliuer vp their charge vnder condicion of life and goods saued, if they were not succored by the xiiij. day of Aprill: at which day the composicion being accomplished, the most part of the souldiors were found dead: Cæsar was contented to deliuer it

ouer into the poſſeſſion of Duke Frauncis Sforce, wherein he wonne no little reputation and prayſe amongeſt thItalians: And albeit there was no other peece in Italie that helde for the French men, except the Caſtell of Cremona whiche had as yet a plentyfull prouiſion of all thinges: yet theſe ſucceſſes did nothing qualifie thinfelicities and aduerſities of the peoples of that Duchie, who were wonderfully oppreſſed by the armie of Cæſar for that it was not payed: In which diſcontentment beeing gone to lodge within Aſt and the confines about it, and falling into tumult for the ſame cauſe, their diſorder led them to make pillage of the whole cõtrey euen as farre as Vigeneua: for regarde of which vniuerſall waſting, as alſo to auoyde the harmes and daungers of the countrey, thinhabitantes of Millan were driuen to make promiſe of their payes amounting to an hundred thouſande duckets: And yet the feeling of ſo many aduerſities and rigours, could nothing abate the hatreds of that people agaynſt the French, wherein the thinges that ſuſteined them were partly a feare through the memory of olde iniuries done agaynſt them by that nation, and partly a hope leaſt vpon ceaſing of the daunger the French king would eftſones aſſayle that ſtate, and alſo that they ſhould be deliuered from thoſe great burdens, for that it ſhould be no more neceſſarie for themperour to interteine in that Duchie any regimentes of ſouldiors.

The negociacion of the peace betwene Cæſar and the Venetians continued ſtill, and as for many difficulties that hapned, and diuerſe ſortes of delayes interpoſed by the Venetians, the mindes of men were holden in great ſuſpence what ſucceſſe or effect it would drawe: So one chiefe matter that made that action dilatorie and augmented the difficulties, was the death of Ierome Adorno, whoſe yeares albeit were not many, yet his experience was rare, and his witte rayſed to the comprehenſion of high thinges, whiche he well expreſſed in this treatie wherein his authoritie was greate and his capacitie ſingular: In his place was ſente from Millan for Cæſar, Martin Caracciolo pronotorie to the ſea Apoſtolike, who many yeares after was created Cardinall by Pope Pavvle the thirde: Manye monethes were ſpent in this negociation at Venice, where the Frenche kinge became no ſmall impediment to the reſolucion by the importunate labour and diligence of hys Embaſſadours, by whome he promiſed ſometymes by letters, and ſometymes by meſſaungers eſpeciall, that he woulde diſcende ſpeedilye into Italie with a right puiſſant armye: Theſe offers and promiſes bredde greate diuerſitie of opinions amongeſt the Senators, and continuall argumentes and diſputacions: for manye gaue counſayle not to abandon thalliance of the Frenche king, and reappoſed altogether vppon hys promiſe to ſende preſentlye an armye into Italie: Whiche hope the Frenche king labouring to feede with a wonderfull diligence, he had newely ſent to Venice Ranſo de Cere, not onely to enterteine and confirme his promiſe, but alſo to publiſhe the manyfeſt preparacion of thinges: Others remembring howe in the hope of many things paſt, the king had behaued himſelfe negligently, could not now exſpect any confidence in his promiſe to paſſe into Italie: wherein that opinion was confirmed in them by certaine aduertiſementes from Iohn Baduere their Embaſſador in Fraunce, who aſſured them that for that yere the French king woulde neyther paſſe in perſon nor ſende anye armye into Italie: An intelligence whiche he had from rhe Duke of Burbon, who was already very ſecretly conioyned with Cæſar, and wiſhed the Venetians to enterteine vnitie with him: An other ſort of the Senators wauering in minde, ſtoode terrified no leſſe by the yll ſucceſſe of the king, then by the good fortunes of Cæſar, wherevnto they ioyned this consideracion that in Italie the Duke of Millan, the Genovvayes, the Florentins, together with all Tuskane followed the faction of Cæsar, and doubted also least the Pope woulde likewise concurre in that inclinacion: And out of Italie were for him his brother the Archeduke confining vppon the Venetian estates, and the king of Englande making continuall warre in Pickardie: In whiche diuersitie of opinions running no lesse amongest the principalls of the Senate, then the vniuersall multitude, the deliberacion could not long suspende, aswell for the forwardnes of things, as for thimportunities of Cæsars Embassadors, by whose continuall solicitacion the councel of the Pregati was assembled to pronounce the resolucion: In this Councell spake Andrevv Gritti in this sort, a personage of very high authoritie in that common weale: for the great offices he had administred, and of especiall reputacion throughout all Italie and with forreine princes, for the merite of his witte and dealing.

The oracion of Andrevv Gritti touching thalliance vvith Cæsar.

There is nothing more hurtefull in Counsellors then the passion of ielousie and suspicion, which drawing with it diuersitie and seperacion of willes, is so much the more preiudiciall, by howe muche it stoppeth oftentimes the libertie and freedome of well counselling: And for my parte albeit I am not ignoraunt that in giuing counsell at this present not to departe from the confederacion of the Frenche king, "some will interpret me to parcialitie, as though in me bare more respect and authoritie the long custome and conuersacion I haue had with the French, then the care "and affection which in nature and equitie I ought to expresse to the benefite of the "common weale: Yet I will rather laye my selfe downe to the imputations of men, "then kepe suppressed that fidelitie of counselling which in good office apperteineth "to euery good Citisen, in whom can not be exspected anye good propertie eyther "of a Citisen or a Senator that for anye occasion forbeareth to perswade to others "that whiche in him selfe he decerneth to be good for the common weale: And yet "I doubte not that amongest men of discression and wisedome this interpretacion "will finde no place, bothe for the consideracion of my customes and actions in all "tymes paste, and also for that I neuer negociated with the Frenche king nor his "counsell, but as your Agent, your Creature, your Commissioner, and your Deputie limited and regulated: But touching the present matter, I doubt not to accompanie my opinion and counsell with suche force of reasons and examples as shall "be hable to make me iustified euen with such as holde me suspected. We are assembled heare to dispute whether we oughte to make a new confederacion with themperour, both contrarie to the fayth we haue giuen, and agaynst the couenantes of "the league which we haue with the house of Fraunce: Whiche in my iudgement is "no other thing then to go about so to assure and confirme the power of themproure "already vniuersally redouted, that being without further remedie to moderate and "embase it, it rise not continually encreasing to our right great and apparant preiudice: We haue no cause wherein maye be taken any reason to iustifie that deliberacion, if we looke into the fidelitie and equitie of the French king: for that as he hath "for the most part fulfilled thalliance that he hath made with vs, and carefully restrained himselfe to the reasonable obseruacion of amitie & league, so though theffects "haue not followed so readily to renew the warre in Italie, yet in regarde of his proper "interestes therein concurring, that hath not proceeded of other matter then of "thimpedimentes growing vppon him in the kingdome of Fraunce: whiche albeit "maye for a tyme prolong or deferre hys counselles, yet lette vs not looke that "they wyll vtterly dissolue hys enterprise, for that he liues possessed with so great a desire a desire to recouer the duchie of Millan, and hath his forces so mightie and readye, " that hauing once susteined the first bruntes of his enemies, there will nothing lette " him to renewe his armie and recontinue the warre in Italie: Wherin I maye aptlye " vse for example the experience and memorie of king Lovvis, who hauing his coun- " trey inuaded with armies farre more mightie then those that now vex him, for that " almost all the nations and regions rounde about him rose into conspiracie agaynst " him, yet did he so easily defende his estates by the greatnes of his forces, by the mu- " nicion and defence of his frontiers and places confining, and with the fidelity & rea- " dines of his peoples, that when in all reasonable consideracion it was thought that " necessitie would driue him to retyre himselfe for a time and restrayne his minde to " rest and tranquillitie, he raysed his thoughtes to the warres of Italie, and in that vni- " uersall coniecture of his weaknes, sent thither so denly right huge & mightie armies: "

The king raigning dyd the like in the first yeare of his raigne, and euen then entred " into the renouacion of the warre, when, both by his new ascending to the crowne, " and also finding his treasors consumed by the infinite exspences of his predecessor, " euery man looked that he would put of the warre till another yeare: Let vs not in- " terprete sinisterly of his delayes and deferring, and muche lesse let vs laye them for " an excuse of our variacions, seeing that confederate that is slowe not of will but by " impedimentes, giues to his companion no iust cause to complayne, nor any honest " cooller to depart from his confederacion: We ought in this case to iudge of the " French king as in matters of amitie good men vse to measure friendship, that he that " maketh a promise, albeit he performe late, yet he breakes not the law of promise, for " that although he disappoynteth, yet he fayleth not: It is a great vnthankfulnes when " we forget what we haue receiued of our friends: and when they are slowe to per- " forme but small things, we are ready to rayse great complayntes agaynst them. But " touching this deliberacion, if we looke well into the state of our affayres, we shall " finde that if common honestie ioyned with the dignitie of our Senate, call vs to it, " no lesse are we iustely prouoked by the regarde of our profite and proper safetie: it " is easie to be discerned from howe many daungers, from how many suspicions, and " from how many afflictions we shal be deliuered, if the French king recouer the state " of Millan: and wise men with the same facilitie may finde out into what tranquility, " into what assurance, and into what freedome of estate, our affayres will fall for many " yeres, if he preuayle in that action wherin he hath cõcurring with his forces reason, " conscience, and equitie: Of this we are warned by the examples of the yeres before, " for at suche time as the king that nowe is went about to recouer it, it came to passe " that we, who affore with many daungers & very great exspences, were skarce hable " to defende Padoa and Treuisa, were made hable by his occasion, to reconquer Bressia " and Verona: yea so long as he enioyed that Duchie in quietnes, we possessed in peace " and suretie all our dominions and iurisdictions, and what else was of our imperie " or our obedience: Which are examples that muche more ought to moue vs then " the auncient memorie of the league of Cambray, for that the kings of Fraunce haue " learned by experience that which they could neuer cõprehend by reason, how pre- " iudiciall it hath bene to them to depart out of our alliance: A matter which without " all comparison they may best discerne in the time present, wherin this king hath for " his aduersary & competitor, an emperour, a prince whose amplitude of kingdomes, " and whose redoubted power will keepe him in necessitie to esteeme dearly our alli- " ance. But of the contrary, who seeth not into what daungerous tearmes our affayres " will be reduced, when the French king shall finde him selfe merely excluded out of "

" the enterprises of Italie: for who can let themperour to appropriate to him selfe or
" to his brother the Duchie of Millan, of the whiche he woulde neuer to this daye
" transferre thinuestiture to Frauncis Sforce? And if he haue power to do so, what is
" he that can assure his will? who can staye the streame driuen by so violent a winde?
" yea, since the Duchie of Millan is so apte a ladder to lifte him to the Empire of all
" Italie, who will take vpon him to promise, that in themperour iustice and consci" ence will beare more swaigh, then ambicion and couetousnes, inclinacions naturall
" to all great Princes: If any man take any suretie by the moderacion and temperance
" of his officers which he hath in Italie, let him be aunswered that the moste of them
" are Spaniardes, a nation vnfaythfull, rauishing, and aboue all others moste insatia-
" ble: So that if themperour or his brother Ferdinand, make Millan their owne and
" possesse it, in what degree shall remayne our estate being enuironed by them bothe,
" on the confines of Italie and Germanie? what suretie, what succours, what exspecta-
" cion of remedie amidde so many daungers? The kingdome of Naples is in his posses" sion, the Pope with all the other Potentates of Italie are at his deuocion, and all our " friendes being made naked of money and forces, there remaynes to vs no hope of " ayde or comfort, and lesse possibilitie to finde fauour where fortune and so great di" uision of minds contende agaynst vs. But if the French king were lorde of the du" chie of Millan, then should things stande so euenly balanced betweene two so great
" Princes, that who so euer stoode in feare of the power of the one of them, shoulde
" finde peace and suretie by the might of the other, for that bothe pollicie and their " proper ambicion would make them iealouse one of an others greatnes: yea the on" ly feare of his comming assureth all his neighbours, for that by it the Imperialles
" are restrayned from entring into armes, or to intangle them selues with any enter" prise: By whiche reason is made more ridiculous then terrible the vanitie of their " threatninges to turne tharmie agaynst vs if we confederate with themperour, as " though it were an easie enterprise to moue warre agaynst the state of Venice, and
" as thoughe there were present suretie of the victorie, and lastely as thoughe that " were the onely meane and remedie to keepe the Frenche king from passing, and " not rather the cause of the contrarie: for who doubteth that beeing prouoked by " them, we would propound to the king by necessitie such conditions, that though he
" bare no inclination to them, yet they would induce him to passe? The same hapned
" in the tyme of king Levvis, when the iniuries and treasons that were done vnto
" vs by that nation, enforced vs so to incense and stirre vp that king (when of his " prisoner I became your Embassadour) that euen when he stoode in the greatest
" feare to be mightily inuaded in his kingdome of Fraunce, euen then did he dispatch
" a strong armie into Italie, though with very yll succesSe: Let vs not beleeue that " if thimperialls thought the waye to drawe vs to their amitie, or to assure them-
" selues of the Frenche king, were to sette vppon vs, that they had tyll this daye de" ferred thexecution: Perhappes their Capteines haue no desire to enriche them" selues with the profites and spoyles of warre, perhaps they haue had no necessitie,
" in disburdening those countreys that were friendes to them to drawe money from
" them, to nourishe tharmie in the countrey of an other: No rather they haue well
" founde oute, that by reason of our power it is too harde a matter to force vs:
" And muche lesse standes it with them hauing a continuall feare of the descen" ding of the Frenche, to intangle them selues with an other warre, nor to giue
" occasion to a state so mightie in men, money, and opinion, to allure with the " greatnesse of offers the Frenche kinge to marche: So longe as they are hol-

den in these suspicions and in these doubtes, they will not intrude for them selues vppon the Duchie of Myllan, neither will they seeke to offende vs but with vaine threatninges: Where if we assure them of that feare, they will haue in their power to doe both the one and other: And if they doe it as it is likely they will, where is our remedie, where are become our hopes, our councells, and our exspectacions, yea of whome maye we complayne more then of our selues: our owne feares willbreede our common daungers, our fraile suspicions will drawe on our propper calamities, and as a destinie we shall be driuen into warre by our immoderat desires to peace: which then is most holy and most to be embraced, when it puts men out of suspicion, when it encreaseth no daunger, & when it bringes a meane to sit downe in tranquillitie, and to cut of great exspenses: But when it appeareth in an other habit and forme & begetteth effects contrary, it abuseth then the name, the property, and the nature of peace, and vnder a corrupt resemblance of peace it taketh iustly the title of a daungerous warre, and vnder the show of a holsom medicine, it expresseth thoperacion of a mortall poyson: So that, as in confederating with thEmprour, we turne the French king from his enterprise of Italy, & leade thEmprour as it were by a lyne, to occupy at his will the Duchie of Myllan, and so to embase vs and our iurisdiction: so it followeth that by that action (with a right great infamie of our name and hazard of the faith of this common weale) we buy the greatnes of a Prince who hath giuen no lesse tokens of his ambicion then proofe of his power, and who (ioyning with him his brother) hath set downe this pretence, that all that we possesse in the firme land, apperteineth vnto them: And on the other side, we reiect and exclude out of Italy, A king who vnder his equitie and greatnes assureth the libertie of vs all, and is induced by a great necessitie and constraint to remeine straitly allied and conioyned with vs: These reasons so euident and sensible auoyd all matter of imputacion that I am not pushed on more by affection then by truth, nor more caried by any interest particular then with the loue I beare to the common weale, The sauetie and preseruacion of which we neede not doubt if God giue so great grace and felicitie to your councells, as he hath plentifully imparted amongest you the spirit of wisedom and forecast.

But against this speech, did oppose one George Cornaro a gentleman of equall authority, and of no lesse reputacion for grauitie and stayed condicion.

The oratiō of George Cornaro.

Right ielous were the office of Magistrates, if in matters of councell it were lesse lawfull to confute then to obiect, And no lesse doth it offend the estate and credit of their place, where it is not thought as greate a fidelitie to aunswer as to propone: Since such hath beene alwayes the law and libertie of councell giuing, to assure the truth against all sinister insinuacions: And albeit I am not ignorant that in nothing is more suspicion then to giue councell in matters of state, yet for myne owne parte, considering the equitie of this Senate affore whom I speake, I doubt not but the reasons I shall giue will suffice to assure myne innocencie against all imputacions. Assuredly the matter we haue in hand, is great and full of difficulties, both for the consideracion of the time & nature of many accidents concurring: And yet when I looke into thinfidelitie and ambicion of the Princes of this time, and howe much they differ from the nature of common weales, whose gouernment beeing not subiected to thappetit of one alone, but disposed by the consents of many, vse to proceede with more moderacion and regard, and obserue with great ceremonie (contrary to thexamples of Princes) not to depart from any thing that beareth apparance of iustice, honestie, or reason: I can not but conclude, that it is most hurtfull for vs and our af-

" fayres, to haue the Duchie of Millan poſſeſſed by a Prince more mightie then our " ſelues, ſeeing that neceſſarily ſuche a neighborhood will ſo holde vs ſuſpected and
" afflicted, that thoughe we enioye peace, yet we ſhall alwayes liue in continuall
" thoughtes of warre, notwithſtanding all leagues of alliance or confederacion what
" ſo euer. Of this auncient ſtories giue vs many examples, which for good reſpectes
" I paſſe ouer for the preſent, leauing you onely to the lamentable experience of king
" Lovvis the xij. of whoſe doings I doubt not remayneth imprinted in the heartes of " vs all a bitter remembraunce: This Senate brought him into the Duchie of Millan,
" and to that vnhappie reſolucion many of vs heare gaue aſſiſtance: we kepte with " him iuſtly our fayth in all Capitulacions, notwithſtanding (vnder great offers and " goodly occaſions) we were aduiſed by the Spaniardes and Launceknightes to leaue
" his alliance, as alſo his infidelitie gaue no ſmall cauſe to drawe vs therevnto, for that " he ſolicited many practiſes agaynſt vs: But neyther the memorie of ſo many bene-
" fites receyued, nor the merite of our fidelitie ſo iuſtely obſerued, nor the conſidera-
" tion of ſo many perpetuall offices exhibited, could moderate in him his great de-" ſire to vex vs: In ſo muche as in that ambicion, and for that cauſe, he made a wil" ling reconcilement with his auncient and greateſt enemies, and laſtly contracted a" gaynſt vs that moſt perillous confederacie of Cambray: If it be daungerous for the " riche and poore to dwell neare together, for that in the wealth of the rich are ſowen
" the ſeedes of enuie to the poore, and by the wantes of the poore are bred humors
" of couetouſnes in the riche man to conſume him: farre greater harmes muſt growe
" by the neighborhood of great kings and princes, whoſe ambicion caryed on the " wings of authoritie, runneth without limitte, and is no more repulſed by the reſi-
" ſtance of men, then a ſwift running ſtreame blowen by a violent winde to ouerflow
" his channell: And therefore to eſcape thoſe daungers that would alwayes hang o-
" uer vs by ſo yll aſſured neighborhood of great Princes, the neceſſitie of our affayres
" driues vs to addreſſe all our counſells to this ende, that neyther the French king nor " themperour haue anye footing in the Duchie of Millan, but that it remayne to " Frauncis Sforce or ſuche an other of his equalitie who were not borne vp with king-
" domes or large dominions: Vppon ſuch a choyſe dependes our ſuretie for the pre-
" ſent, and hereafter (if the condicion of tymes do chaunge) may depende a great en-" creaſing and exaltacion of our eſtate. We conſult nowe, whether we ſhould con" tinue amitie with the French king, or confederate our ſelues with themperour: By
" the one of theſe two deliberacions Frauncis Sforce is excluded abſolutely from the " Duchie of Millan, and an entrie left open to the French king, who is a prince farre
" mightie aboue vs: the other tendeth to aſſure and confirme in the ſame Duchie, " Frauncis Sforce whom themperour offreth to comprehend as principall in our con-
" federacion, and hath made promiſe to the king of Englande to protect him: So that " though he would ſeeke to depriue him of that eſtate, he ſhould not offende vs onely
" and the other potentates of Italie (to whom he ſhould giue cauſe to turne eſtſones
" to the Frenche) but alſo in that action he is both to diſpleaſe the king of Englande
" whom it behoueth him greatly to reſpect, and alſo to prouoke agaynſt him all thin-
" habitantes of the Duchie of Millan, who beare an vniuerſall inclinacion to Frauncis
" Sforce: And ſo laying him ſelfe downe to many difficulties and daungers, and to no
" leſſe infamie, he ſhould alſo go agaynſt his fayth, whiche till this daye we haue not " founde by any token that he hath defiled, A matter which we can not proteſt on the " behalfe of the French: yea he can not be touched with any demonſtration or ſigne
" contrarie to his fidelitie, hauing ſince the death of Pope Leo repoſſeſſed Frauncis Sforce

Sforce of that eſtate, and redeliuered vp the ſtrong holdes in ſorte as they were conquered, and laſtly reeſtabliſhed him in the caſtell of Millan contrarie to the beleuing of many: why therefore ſhould we not rather embraſe that councell wherein is diſcerned an apparant hope to come to the end of our intencions, then to follow that which manifeſtly tendeth to an end contrarie to our affaires? Perhappes there are that will obiect againſt this, that this common weale would ſuffer greater daunger, if the Duchie of Millan were in the power of thEmperour, then if it ſhould diuolue into the handes of the french, for that neceſſitie would draw that king, both for the greatnes of Cæſar, and for themulacion and gelouſie he hath of him, to perſeuere in our alliance: But in thEmperour, all the contrarie, as well for his power & might, as for the claimes and rights which he and his brother pretende agaynſt our eſtate: Sure I beleue that who hath that opinion of the Emperour, is not beguiled, conſidering the nature and cuſtome of Princes which are mightie and great: But God graunt that he be not deceiued that holdeth not the ſame opinion of the frenche king: Many of the ſame reaſons made for his predeceſſor, yet ambicion and couetouſnes bare more dominion in him, then either common honeſtie, or his proper profit: And beſides, the cauſes that might keepe him conteined in league with vs, are not perpetuall, but ſubiect to chaunge from one time to an other according to the nature of humane things: for, bothe thEmperour hath his mortality as other men haue, and withall, ſtandes ſubiect to infinite accidentes of fortune, according to theexample of many Princes as mightie in greatnes as he: it is not long ſince, that all Spaine conſpiring againſt him, he ſeemed more needefull of pitie then of ſpite: And at the leaſtwiſe there is not ſo great difference betwene the one daunger & the other, as there is oddes betwene a councell that wholly excludes vs from our purpoſe, and a reſolucion which in ſimilitude of trueth and reaſon leades vs to the full accompliſhment of the ſame: Beſides, thoſe reaſons conſider only the time to come and farre of: But if we looke into the preſent eſtate of thinges, we ſhall diſcerne that to reiect thalliance of thEmperour, doth put vs for the preſent into greater perplexities and daungers: for, if we ſeparate our ſelues from the french king, it is credible that he will deferre the warre vntill better times and fitter occaſions, but if we continue conioyned with him, it may be that thEmperour will preſently make warre againſt vs, a matter which neceſſarily will heape vpon vs many troubles & exſpenſes: And in whether of theſe elections ſhall the iſſue of the warre be more daungerous to vs? If we ioyne with thEmperour it is not almoſt to be douted that the victorie will not fall on that ſide, which we can not ſo aſſuredly promiſe to our ſelues if we ſtand conioyned with the frenche king: And in confederating vs with thEmperour the victory of the french can not be ſo daungerous to vs, as it would be in the contrarie, for that in that caſe, all the forces of the victor would be turned againſt vs, and thEmperour would not only haue a leſſe bridle and weaker impedimentes, but alſo he woulde ſtande almoſt in an abſolute neceſſitie to occupie the Duchie of Millan: Touching thobiection made againſt the bond of confederacion it is eaſely aunſwered by the ſame reaſon that is vſed to ſatisfie queſtions of equitie, ſince our promiſe to the frenche king ſtretcheth only to aide him to defend his eſtates that he poſſeſſed in Italie, but not to recouer them if he ſhoulde loaſe them: The articles of the capitulacions beare not that, and the ſame reaſons make for vs that are brought in againſt vs: we accompliſhed the bonde of all duetie and office, when, after the loſſe of Millan hapning through the default of their prouiſions, our ſouldiours and men of ſeruice receiued more harmes then the frenchemen: We were acquited of our

" promisse,when Monsr Lavvtrech returning to the warre with the Svvyzzers, we " sent him our bands of souldiours for his succours: yea we haue done more then rea" sonably might be required of vs, when, in exspecting so many monethes the com-
" ming of his armie, we receiued nothing from him but vaine hopes and dissembled " promisses:if he were stayed by his owne will,why seeke we to support the imputaci-
" on of his faultes? if he were holden by necessitie, is not the same a sufficient reason " to iustifie vs,though we stood bownd? I know not why we should be kept bownd a" ny longer to the French king,seeing he hath first abandoned vs: it can be no iniustice
" to retyre from the league,since we take our liberty by his example:how can we stand
" giltie in bond and office towards him,when he hath first broken the lawe of fidelitie
" and contract with vs? In matters of league and confederacion betwene parties, the " breach of the one giues liberty to the other, and the bond that is once broken by the " one,forbeareth afterwards to compell the other: I will not assure that thEmprours
" Capteines intend to moue warre at this time against vs, no more will I warrant the " contrary,considering with what necessitie they are pressed to interteyne their armie
" in the estates of others,and the hope they may conceiue to draw vs by that meane to " their allyance,specially if the french doe not marche: Of which who dowteth,dow-
" teth not without reason,both for their naturall inclinacions, for their necessitie and " want of money,and for thimpediments of the warres which they haue on the other " side the Mounts with two so mighty Princes,and of these impediments our Embas-
" sador hath already made credible relacion: Lastly, my replye conteyneth one selfe
" matter that we ought to foresee with all studie, that the Duchie of Myllan be trans" ferred to Frauncis Sforce,and consequently I menteyne that the councell that guides " vs to that effect is more profitable,then that which makes reasons and arguments to " exclude vs from it.

Thauthoritie of two such personages, together with the force of their reasons, did rather make doubtfull,then assure the mindes of the Senators, whose perplexities kept them so farre of from resoluing,that the Senat deferred to determine absolutely,inducing them thereunto their custom and nature, the greatnes of the cause, and their desire to see further aduaunced the preparacions of the french king: The many difficulties also that by necessitie hapned in thaccorde with the Archeduke, were some causes helping to their deferring: But the matter that most encreased the suspence of their mindes,was,that the French king,who with great industrie prepared him selfe to the warre,had sent the Bishop of Bayeulx to desire them to deferre to resolue any thing till the next moneth, by whome he assured them that before that terme,he would marche with a greater armie then had bene seene in Italy in the age of man: And as they stoode in this doubt and perplexitie of minde, Anthony Gryman Duke of the same citie dyed,and Andrevv Gritty was chosen into his place: An election rather preiudiciall to the French affayres then otherwaies: for,assoone as he was raysed to that dignitie,he referred wholly to the Senat the deliberacion & councell of that matter,and would neuer afterwards either in word or deede, showe him selfe enclyned to either part.But at last,because the king continued to send fresh corriers to the Senate, and was importunat in offers and promisses, And for that there was speciall aduertisement,that,to assure thexpectacion of the warre, Anne Montmoransy afterwards Constable of Fraunce,and Federyk Bossolo, were vppon their way to Venice: ThEmbassadors of thEmprour and the king of England (to whome this deferring was much suspected) began to protest to the Senate, that they would departe within three dayes, and leaue all thinges in their imperfection: By reason of

which protestaciõ imploying a maner of thretning, & also that the fidelity that was gathered in the french promises, began to diminish finding nothing but vaine hopes, but chiefly by the aduertisement of their Embassador resident in Fraunce, they were cõstrained to determine to embrace the amity of thEmperour, with whom they entred into contract vnder these condicions: That betwene thEmperour, Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, and Frauncis Sforce Duke of Millan on the one partie, and the Senate of Venice on thother partie, should be a perpetuall peace & confederacion: That the Senate, in times of neede, shoulde sende for the defense of the Duchie of Millan, six hundred men at armes, sixe hundred light horsemen, and six thowsande footemen: That they should administer the like proporcion for the defense of the kingdom of Naples, but in case it should be inuaded by the Christians: for, the Venetians refused to be bound generally, because they would not stirre vp the Turke against them: That thEmperour should be bound to defend against all men, all that the Venetians possessed in Italie, and that with the like number and proporcion of men: That the Venetians should pay in eight yeares to th Archduke for appaisement of their auncient controuersies & for thaccord made at VVormes, two hundred thowsand duckats: vpon the end of this agreement, the Senate hauing dismissed Theoder Triuulce, chose Frauncis Maria Duke of Vrbin for gouernor generall of their men of warre with the same condicions.

Confederacion betwene Cæsar and the Venetians.

It was a common iudgement of most of the wisemen in Italie, that the frenche king finding those aides to be turned against him which affore had bene of his side, would put of the enterprise of Millan for that yere: Neuertheless, when they heard that the preparacions did not onely continue, but that the armie began to marche, such as stoode in feare of his victorie, fell (the better to resist him) to make a newe confederacion, wherein they perswaded the Pope to be chiefe and principall.

Here is to be remembred, that where the Pope, at his first descending into Italie stoode desirous to haue an vniuersall peace, and looking with great compassion into the harmes which grewe vppon Christendom by the victories of the Turkes, he sent to thEmperour, to the frenche king and the king of England, to depose for the time, their armes so hurtfull for the common weale of Christendom, and euery of them seuerally to sende Embassadors to Rome with fulnes of power to consult of the necessary remedies and releuing of the lamentable afflictions of the Christians: This was performed by them all in apparance, but beginning to treate more particularly of things, it was presently discerned that those labors were vaine for the infinite difficulties that fell out when they came to the point of peacemaking: so many impedimentes do follow the deliberacion of great causes, and so hard it is to reconcile controuersies of estate, which ordinarily draw with them their infinite suspicions and differences: for, a truse for a short time, was nothing agreable to thEmperour, neither did it in any sorte serue thexspectacion of his purposes: And the frenche king refused to make it for a longer time, (so hurtfull was it for him to protract or temporise) that had all his prouisions for the warre aduaunced: In which separacion of minde betwene these two great Princes, the Pope either for the auncient affection which eftsoones beganne to reuiue in him towards thEmperour, or for that he discerned the thoughts of the french king to be estraunged from peace and concord, discouered his inclinacion, and began more then he was wont, to harken to those that encoraged him not to suffer the french to possesse againe the Duchie of Millan: This oportunitie was obserued by the Cardinall Medicis, who, hauing remeyned at Florence for feare of the persecutions of his enemies, but chiefly of the Cardinall of Volterro who ſtoode very great and gracious with the Pope, tooke to him a new corage, and came to Rome where he was receiued of moſt of the Court with great honor and reſpect: There, ioyning him ſelfe with the Duke of Seſſo thEmprours Embaſſador, and with thEmbaſſadors of the king of England, he fauored that cauſe, and furthered it all that he could with the Pope. It is ſeene often in the courſe and practiſe of worldly things, that the falling of one man is the riſing of an other, by which propertie of reuolucion is apparantly proued that mortal men are ſubiect to the law of nature and fortune: for, in this aduauntage of variacion and chaunge, the ill hap of Cardinall Volterro which almoſt alwayes troubled his wit, his pollicie, and all his drifts, heaped vpon him a great domage and daunger: And in that oportunitie was giuen to the Cardinall Medicis, a notable meane to enter into greater grace and authoritie with the Pope, who affore bare a conſtant inclination to the Cardinall Volterro, for that both by his induſtrie and apt inſinuacion of wordes, he had brought him to beleeue that he deſired nothing more then an vniuerſall peace throughout all Chriſtendom: This was thaccident: One Frauncis Imperiale, being baniſhed from Sicile, went into Fraunce, And being ſtaied at Caſtelnoua neare Rome by the deuiſe of the Duke of Seſſo, there was found about him a packet of letters written by the Cardinall Volterro, to his Nephew the Biſhop of Xaintes: By theſe letters he gaue councell to the French king, to inuade the Ile of Sicile with an armie by ſea, by which inuaſion thEmprours forces ſhould neceſſarily be turned to the defenſe of it, and ſo the enterpriſe of Myllan would become more eaſie to the French: The detection of this man troubled not a litle the Pope, who was ſo much the more aggreued againſt him, by howe much his diſſembled demonſtracions had beguiled him: And in that iuſt diſcontentment, he was vehemently furthered by the incitacion of the Duke of Seſſo and Cardinall Medicis, by whoſe induſtries he was committed to the caſtell S. Ange and afterwards examined by Iudges delegate as guiltie in the crime of violacion of the Popes maieſtie, for that he had incenſed the french king to inuade with hoſtilitie, the Iland of Sicile, A free hold of the ſea Apoſtolike: Wherein albeit they proceeded with lenitie and fauor, and after the actes of interogatories, he had libertie of councell to pleade for him, yet they proceeded not with the ſame moderacion againſt his goods, ſince the ſame day he was apprehended, the Pope ſent to make ſeaſure of all the moueables and riches that were in his houſe: And as one conſpiracie reuealeth an other, ſo by thimpriſonment of the ſayd Imperialo there was diſcouered an other detection for the French king in Sicile, for the which were executed by iuſtice the Count Camerato, the maiſter of the ports, and the Treaſorer: The veritie & conſideracion of theſe matters, inſinuated in the Pope a great diſpleaſure againſt the French king, in which ill diſpoſed inclinacion, he began to conſult more and more with Cardinall Medicis, And laſtly the rumor of the diſcending of the french armies redoubling daily, the Pope publiſhed manifeſtly his intencion to oppoſe againſt them: for which cauſe he ſummoned the aſſembly of the Cardinalls to whom after his accuſtomed proteſtacions of the preſent feares and daungers of the great Turke, he declared that as onely the French king was the cauſe why ſo great perills were not remoued from Chriſtendom, for that he refuſed with great obſtinacy to conſent to the peace that was negociated: So, ſeeing it apperteyned to him as the Viccaire of Ieſus Chriſt and ſucceſſor to Peter, to be carefull ouer the preſeruacion of Chriſtian peace, he was compelled by that zeale which he oweth to their vniuerſall ſafetie, to confederat him ſelfe with ſuch Princes as did what they could to defend Italy from troubles, for that of the quiet or trouble of that region, depended the tranquil-

litie or vexacion of the whole Christian parte of the worlde: According to this declaracion concurring with the industrie of the Viceroy of Naples beeing come to Rome for that purpose, a league was concluded for the defence of Italie the thirde daye of August, betweene the Pope, themperour, the king of Englande, tharchduke of Austria, the Duke of Millan, the Genovvaies, and the Cardinal Medicis and the state of Florence ioyntly: The publication bare also that it should continue all the time of the confederates lyues, and a yere after the death of euery of them: There was reseruacion of place and tyme for any other to come in, so that the Pope, themprour, and the king of Englande thought good, with this prouision, that in matters of quarrell and controuersie, they should vse iustice, and not armes: That they shoulde erect an armie to be opposed agaynst whom so euer would inuade any of the confederates, to which armie the Pope shoulde sende two hundred men at armes, themperour eight hundred, the Florentins two hundred, the Duke of Millan two hundred, and two hundred light horsemen: That the Pope, the Emprour, and the Duke of Millan should make all the prouisions of artilleries & munitions together with al exspences and charges apperteining: That to leauy the bands of footmen necessary for tharmy, & to furnish al other exspences requisite for the warre, the Pope should pay euery moneth xx. thousand duckets, the duke of Millan as much, & the Florētins the like summe: That the Emperour should pay xxx. thousand, the Genovvaies, Lucquois, and Siennois together, ten thousand, and the Genovvaies notwithstanding to remaine bound to the army by sea and other defraimentes necessary for their defence: To this contribucion they should be all bounde for three monethes, and so muche tyme ouer the three monethes as should be set downe by the Pope, themprour, and the king of Englande: That it should be in the power of the Pope and themprour to name the capteine generall of the whole warre, who it was sayde should fall vppon the person of the Viceroy of Naples, for whom the Cardinall Medicis, whose authoritie was great with thimperialls, labored what he coulde, chiefly for the hatred he bare to Prosper Colonno: The Marquis of Mantua was ioyned to this confederacion by an indirect meane, for that the Pope and the Florentins interteyned him for their Capteine generall at their common pay.

But neither the league made by the Venetians with themperour, nor the vnion of so many great Princes contracted with so ample contribucions and great prouisions, could alter the resolucion of the French king, who being come to Lyons, prepared to passe in person with a strong army into Italie: where the brute of his comming was no sooner spred, then newe tumultes began to appeare: for Lionell the brother of Albert Pio, recouered by surprise the towne of Carpy being negligently garded by Iohn Coscia, whom Prosper had created gouernor there, which he might do of good authoritie, for that thempror had giuen that towne to him after he had deposed Albert for his offence of rebellion to thempire: But in the duchie of Millan there was like to haue chaunced a greater accident, both more terrible for the property, & for the person of greater preiudice: This is the discourse of it: Frauncis Sforce riding frō Monce to Millan vpon a litle Mulet, & causing the horsemen that were for his gard to ride farre frō him to auoyd the trouble of the dust that in sommer time the traine of horses makes to rise in great abundance through all the playnes of Lombardie: Boniface Visconto a yong gentleman, better knowne by the noblenes of his house, then for his wealth, estates, or other condicions, offred him selfe onely to accompany the Duke being well mounted vpon a Turkishe horse: and as they came riding together vpon a partición of a way, Boniface being somewhat slipt behind, obseruing the oportunitie of the place and the diſtance of the Dukes trayne, ſpurred his horſe, and ranne in a mayne race with his dagger drawne to ſtrike the Duke on the head: But what with the feare of the Mulet ſhrinking with the noyſe of his horſe, and the fierceneſſe of his horſe whom he could not ſtoppe, together with the difference of the height of his horſe from the Dukes mulet, the blowe that he made at the Dukes head ſwarued and fell vppon his ſhoulders, and afterwardes drawing his ſworde to accompliſhe the execution, the ſame impedimentes made it vayne, or at leaſt the hurt was light, beeing but a blowe ſlentwiſe: By this tyme manye of the horſemen making in to the Dukes reskewe, he fell to flying, hoping to ſhake off by hys fortune, the daunger that by his vallour he was falne into: Many of the horſemen of the Dukes garde had him in chaſe, amongeſt whom was a generall emulacion of hazarde and perill to kyll him that in ſo manyfeſt treaſon ſought the lyfe of their maiſter, but he founde more ſafetie in the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe, then his followers founde remedie in their reuengefull deſires: And if fortune had aunſwered the vallour and induſtrie of the man, it might haue bene called one of the rareſt & moſt ſingular aduentures that euer was, that one man without armor, at noneday, in a plaine way, durſt ſet vpon a great prince in the middeſt of his eſtate, and enuironed with ſo great a ſtrength of ſouldiors and men armed, and yet to flee awaye in ſafetie: The cauſe of this deſperate reſolucion of this gentleman, was a malice that he had conceyued for the murder of Monſeig. Viſconte, who a fewe monthes affore, had bene ſlayne in Millan by one Ierome Moron, not without the Dukes will and priuitie as many ſuppoſed: The Duke vpon his hurte withdrewe him ſelfe to Monce, and for that he was ielouſe that there were of the conſpiracie within Millan, the Biſhoppe of Alexandria brother to Monſeig. that was ſlayne, was apprehended by Moron and Proſpero: At the firſt rumor of the facte, eyther to preuent the ſuſpicion that might goe on him, or to make his fauour the greater, he put himſelfe willingly into the handes of Proſpero vppon his fayth, and after he was ſounded by examinacion, they ſent him priſoner to the Caſtell of Cremona, ſome holding him guyltie, and ſome ſpeaking muche of his innocencie, as the iudgementes of men were diuerſe. It happned almoſte in the ſame ſeaſons, that Galeas Biraguo accompanied with thexiles of Millan, and with the ayde of certayne French ſouldiors which were already in the countrey of Piemont, was receiued into the towne of Valence by the capteine of the Caſtell who was a Sauoye man: But Antho. de Leua lying within Aſt with one part of the light horſmen and Spaniſh footemen, being aduertiſed of thaccident, went immediatly to incampe before it, and taking the vauntage of the weaknes of the towne which thenemies had no time to reduce to fortification, he planted his artilleries, and tooke it the ſeconde daye, and with the ſame ſucceſſe battred the caſtell: There died about foure hundred bodies aſwel in the action of the towne, as in thexecution of the Caſtell, beſides many made priſoners, amongeſt whom was Galeas principall leader of thenterpriſe.

The French armie marcheth.

According to the great preparations made in Fraunce for the warre, the armie marched at laſte, and bandes of ſouldiors paſſed continually ouer the mountes: After whome the perſon of the king prepared to paſſe whiche he had effectually accompliſhed, had not the conſpiracie of the Duke of Burbon which nowe beganne to come to lighte, giuen impediment to his going: he was of the blood royall, and therfore his reputation more great & generall: for the dignitie of his office beeing great conſtable, his authoritie was abſolute & ample: by his large eſtates & riches, his credite was currant in Fraunce: and by his naturall vallour, he was mightie and ſtronge in the opinions of men: But he had not bene of longe time in the grace and fauor of the king, and in that abiection, was not admitted to the ſecret affayres of the Realme, nor reſpected according to the merit of his place and greatnes: he was diſcontented with the oppreſſion of the kinges mother, who reuiuing certeine auncient rights, made open clayme to the greateſt part of his lands and dominions in the open parliament at Paris; And for that he found in the king no diſpoſicion to doe remedy to that griefe, he ſuffred indignacion to enter into his hart, & in that diſcontentment admitted confederacion with thEmprour & with the king of England ſolicited by Monſr de Beaurin of great confidēce with thEmprour & his chief chamberlaine: Betwene whom, to aſſure things with a more faſter and faithful knot, it was agreed, that thEmprour ſhould giue him in mariage his ſiſter Elenor the late widow of Emanuell king of the Portugalls: The execucion of their councels was grounded vpon the french kings determinacion to goe in perſon to the warre: In which reſolucion to nouriſh him the more, the king of England had giuen him conning hopes, that he would not moleſt the realme of Fraunce for that yeare: That the Duke of Burbon, aſſoone as the king ſhould be ouer the Mountes, ſhould enter Burgondy with an army of twelue thowſand footemen that were ſecretly leauied with the moneyes of thEmprour & the king of England: Wherein he doubted not well to acquite him ſelf in that ſeruice, both for the abſence of the king, & for the vniuerſall grace and opinion which he had through all the Realme of Fraunce: And touching thoſe thinges that ſhould be conquered, the Earledom of Prouence ſhould remeine to him, and in place of Earle, he ſhould put on the name & title of king of Prouence, chalenging that ſtate to apperteine to him by the rights of the houſe of Aniovv: And all the reſidue gotten by this warre to diſcend to the king of England: The Duke of Burbon then abiding at Monlyns a principal towne of the Duchie of Burbon, feyned him ſelfe to be ſicke, to haue the better excuſe not to follow the king into Italy: The king in his iorney to Lyons, made Monlyns in his way, where being already poſſeſſed of certeine light tokens of the Dukes conſpiracie, he gaue him an inkling that albeit many went about to bring him in diſtruſt & ſuſpicion with him, yet for his part, he beleued leſſe in the rumors & informacions which might be full of incerteinty and errour, then in his faith & vallour, whereof he had ſo good experience: But the diſſimulacion of the Duke exceded the roundnes & plainnes of the king, for, keeping his intencions ſmothered, he gaue thankes to God that had appointed him to liue vnder ſuch a king, afore whoſe equity & grauity could not ſtand the falſe accuſations & imputacions of malicious men: And in that cōpaſſion he promiſed the king to follow him whereſoeuer he would go ſo ſoone as he was deliuered of his malady, which he ſaid could not cōtinue long, for that it drew with it no daūgerous accidēts: But the king was no ſoner come to Lyons then he had aduertiſement that many bands of laūceknights were moſtred vpon the frōtiers of Burgondy, which confirming the tokēs of ſuſpicion that he had before, together with certein letters ſurpriſed detecting more plainly the conſpiracy, he cōmitted to priſon forthwith Monſr de S. Valier, Monſr de Boiſy brother to Monſr la Paliſſe, the poſtmaſter, & the Biſhop of Autun, all pertenors of the practiſe: And thinking to make the action perfect by apprehēding the head, he diſpatched in great diligence to Monlyns, the great maiſter with fiue hundred horſe & foure thowſand footemē, to take the Duke of Burbon: But his ſuſpicion was ſwifter then their celerity, for, dowting no leſſe the detectiō of things, then fearing leſt the paſſages would be ſtopped, by his forecaſt he preuented the perill that the kings indignacion prepared for him, & eſcaped ſecretly into Franche counte in diſguiſed attyre: ſo ſuttle in man, Confederacie betwene thēprour, the k. of England and the Duke of Burbon.

The french army in Italy.

By reaſon of this euaſion, and thimportance of the conſpiracie that depended of it, the king thought it beſt not to purſue in perſon the warres of Italy: And yet would he not wholly giue ouer thexpedicion, but reteining with him ſelfe one part of the ſouldiours prepared for this new warre, he committed to Monſr. Boniuet then Admiral of Fraunce, the cõduction of his army, which conteined a thowſand eight hũdred launces, ſix thowſand Svvizzers, two thowſand Gaſcoins, two thowſand Valeſiens, ſix thowſand launceknights, twelue thowſand French men, & three thowſand Italyans: with which army aſſoone as the Admiral was paſt the mounts, & drawing neare the confines of the ſtate of Millan, he made ſhow that he would deale firſt with Nouaro: And by that demonſtracion, the citie being not tenable, both for the want of ſouldiours, & inſufficiencie of the rampiers, it yelded by the conſent of the Duke of Millan, who reteined the caſtel, Vigeneua did the like ſuffring the ſame wants & impedimẽts, & by their examples all that part of the contry which is beyond the riuer of Theſin, fell into the power of the French men: Proſpero Colonno lying ſicke of a long malady, would neuer beleue that the French king would ſtande firme in his reſolucion to inuade the Duchie of Millan for that yeare, both for the confederacion that the Venetians had made againſt him, and for the detection of the conſpiracie of the Duke of Burbon: And therfore he had not with that diligence & ſpeede that was neceſſary, aſſembled the ſouldiours & men of warre that lay diſperſed in diuers places, & much leſſe had made cõpotẽt prouiſions for ſo great a reſiſtance: But now that thenemies were vpon the way & approching, he ſent to mooſter his cõpanies in all haſt, the oportunitie of the time being againſt the ſpede he made, & his diligence as litle auailable as the ſeaſon was contrary: he thought aboue all things to ſtoppe their paſſage at Theſin, not remembring what hapned to him at the riuer of Adda againſt Monſr. Lavvtrech, And of that he made him ſelf ſo aſſured promiſe, that he tooke no care to reedify the baſtilliõs & rampiers of the ſubburbs of Millan, of which the greateſt part lay already on the ground, ſo ſmal was the care that was had of them: he aſſembled his army vpon the riuer betwene Biagraſſo, Bulfaloro, & Turbiguo, A place very apt for that purpoſe, & no leſſe conuenient for Pauia and Millan: But the French men who were now come to Vigeneua, finding the water of the riuer lower then Proſpero beleued, began foure myles from thImperiall campe to paſſe ouer, part by the foard, and ſome in boates & barkes, building a bridge for their artilleries in a place where they found nether gard nor other impediment: By the neceſſitie of this vnexſpected accident, Proſpero was driuen to chaunge all the councells of the warre, and therefore diſpatched forthwith Antho. de Leua with an hundred men at armes & three thowſand footemen, to the garde of Pauya, him ſelfe with the reſidue of tharmie, drewe to Myllan, where after he had called the Capteines to councell, they were all of this minde, that if the French made their approches forthwith, there was no poſſibilitie to defend Myllan, for the ruine of the rampiers of the ſubburbs whereof there had bene made no reckoning ſince the laſt warres: The confidence that Proſpero had to defende the paſſage of Theſin, was the cauſe that they were not repaired, neyther coulde they be made defendable in the ſpace of three dayes: And that they had to make a reſolucion aſwell for the one as the other of theſe two accidents: both to labor with vniuerſall diligence at the rampyers, and alſo to ſtande vppon a prepared readines to departe, if the Frenche men came eyther the firſte, the ſeconde, or the thirde daye, And to retyre to Coma if they tooke the way of Pauya,

or else to goe to Pauia if they marched by Coma: But the siniſter deſtinie of the frenche, both blinding their eyes that they coulde not ſee, and bindig their handes that they coulde not execute, woulde not ſuffer them to vſe ſo great and happie an occaſion: for, either through their negligence, which is a chiefe ennemie to enterpriſes, or to exſpect the whole armie, whereof a greate parte was behinde, they wandered three dayes along the riuer of Theſin: And being all aſſembled into one ſtrength betwene Myllan, Pauya, and Binaſquo, they marched afterwardes to Saint Chriſtopher within a myle of Myllan betwene the gate of Theſin and Rome gate: There, after they had made the waye euen to paſſe their artilleries into the vauntgard, they made as though they woulde aſſault the towne: But without doing any other enterpriſe, they incamped in that place, and leauying their ſeege from thence within few dayes after, they went to lodge in the Abbay of Clereuault, from whence they founde meanes to deface the mylnes and cut the water from Myllan: And ſo they thought rather to beſeege then aſſault Myllan, for that there was within the walls eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, foure thowſand ſpaniſh footemen, ſix thowſande fiue hundred launceknightes, and three thowſand Italians (beſides the popular ſorte which were well furniſhed with weapon and reſolute in their auncient diſpoſicion againſt the french.)

In this eſtate of affaires, paſſed into the other life the foureteenth of September, Pope Adrian: His death was not without great diſcommoditie and domage to the confederates, for that there did not onely faile in them, the authoritie pontificall, but alſo the contribucion of money, whereunto he was bounde by the capitulacions of the league: he dyed leauing behind him a very ſmall opinion and eſtimacion, either for the litle time he raigned, or for his want of experience in affaires: But his death was not a litle plawſible to the whole court, for the deſire they had to liue vnder a Pope naturall of Italie, or at leaſt ſuche one as had had his traininge there.

By the death of the Pope, many troubles began to kindle in the townes of the Churches iuriſdiction, and in them as appeared ſmoaking before his ſickeneſſe, many ſmall ſparkes of a fire to come, ſo in the time of his life, they had eaſely burſt out to a flame, if they had not bene quenched, partely by chaunce, and partely by the diligence of others: for, where before the Popes paſſing into Italie, the colleadge of Cardinalls had giuen to Albert Pyo the keeping of Reggia and Rubiero: The ſayd Albert helde ſtill for him ſelfe the caſtells, making ſmall accompt of the inſtance that was made to him to render them, wherein he had no leſſe readie his colours and excuſes, then he was apt to take occaſion by the ſlender experience of Pope Adrian: Beſides, he had ſolicited that as ſoone as the beginning of the warre appeared, Ranſe de Cere with certeine horſemen and footemen ſhoulde enter within Rubiero, to gouerne vnder thoportunitie of that place, the waye of Rome that paſſeth betwene Modena and Reggia: His intencion was both to giue impedimentes to the money and other diſpatches that ſhoulde be ſent from Rome, Naples, and Florence, to Myllan, and to proceede to other greater enterpriſes as occaſion ſerued: But Frauncis Guicciardin gouernour of the ſame Cities, diſcouering in good time this plot, and communicating with the Pope to what end tended the ſweete words and requeſts of Albert, together with the daungers that would fall on theſtate eccleſiaſtike on that ſide, induced the Pope to make demonſtracion by threatninges, that he woulde vſe force, and ſo conſtrayned Albert, to reſtore to him the caſtells: Neither durſte he oppoſe him ſelfe againſt the Popes will, for that the Frauncis Guicciardin.

French were not as yet very ſtrong in Italie. Since the faction of Pio had recouered the towne of Carpi, Proſpero in whom was no ſmall deſire to haue it agayne, procured to be retayned in the name of the confederates, Guido Rangon with an hundred men at armes, an hundred light horſemen, and a thouſande footemen, ordeyning withall that a thouſande Spaniſhe footemen whom the Duke of Seſſo had leauyed at Rome to ioyne with the reſidue at Millan, ſhould remayne for the ſame cauſe at Modena. And whileſt theſe things were in preparing, Ranſe de Cere (to whom reſorted dayly both horſemen and footemen, caryed no leſſe by hope of pillage then for the authoritie of his name) began to commaunde the wayes, and trouble the whole countrey: Beſides, loſing no tyme to the libertie he had, he began one night to aſſalt vpon the ſodeine the towne of Rubiero, with two thouſande footemen, but his vndiſcrete attempt being reſiſted both by the vallour of the defendantes, and the difficulties of the place, he was repulſed, leauing as priſoner behinde him, Triſtram Corſo one of the capteines of his footemen.

Theſe forces aſſembled in theſe places for diuerſe cauſes, were thoccaſion of greater things: for after the death of the Pope, the Duke of Ferrara beeing made wearie with the hopes that were giuen him touching the reſtitucion of Reggia and Modena, began to conſider that in reſpect of thabſolucion which he had obteined of Adrian, it would be leſſe harde to get pardon for things taken away, then reſtitucion of things loſte: and therefore being of the vniuerſall perſwaſion with all men, that it would be a long time affore they would chooſe a newe Pope, both for the ordinary tract of time vſed in that election, and alſo for the diſcordes of the Cardinals which were by many degrees increaſed euer ſince the death of Pope Leo: he determined to deuiſe by what meanes he might recouer Modena & Reggia: and in that inclinacion he was puſhed on (amongſt other oportunities) with the commodity & offer to knit with him Ranſe de Cere, who had already leauied a ſtrength of two hūdred horſemen and more then two thouſande footemen: So that after the Duke had waged three thouſande footemen, and ſent to Ranſo three thouſande duckets, he marched towardes Modena, In which Citie was no other ſtrength of men of warre then the regiment of the Count Guido Rangon who had bene reteyned by the league: And albeit the people bare no affection to the iuriſdiction of the houſe of Ferrara, yet both by the weakneſſe of the walles which were not flanked after the auncient manner, and the filling vp of the diches ſuffring of long time no reparacion, it ſeemed there was neede of a greater garriſon: And therefore the gouernour and the Count diſpenſing with their priuate quarrels that had bene betwene them, began to proceede with a ioynt diligence to aduaunce the former reſolucion, to let into Modena the Spaniſhe footemen, who beeing arryued already in Tuskane, marched ſlowly, and made diuerſe and doubtfull aunſweres when they were asked whether they woulde remayne at Modena or paſſe further: Neuertheleſſe after many intreatings, they were at laſte content to enter: When this matter was related to the Duke of Ferrara being then come to Finalo with two hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſemen, and three thouſande footemen, it ſtayed him almoſt for paſſing further: And yet becauſe the matter was not abſolute, and hoping at leaſt that knitting with Ranſe de Cere, he might happly take Reggia: And nothing diſpayring that by the difficultie of paymentes, ſome diſorder might fall amongeſt the footemen of thenemies, he confirmed his firſt intencion, and determined to paſſe on: Thoſe hopes were not lightly conceyued by the Duke, for that the Colledge of Cardinalles, to whom the gouernor had ſignified with great diligence the perills that were toward,

were

were so careleſſe to make prouiſion, yea not vouchſafing to giue aunſwere to the letters and meſſages that were ſent, that there was no meane to paye the ſouldiors, of the publike purſe: And where happly the daye was come wherein the Spaniſhe ſouldiors ſhould receyue the paye of the ſeconde moneth, yet if they had bene all payed, there was no hope to wage a greater number: And beſtowing part of them within Modena and the reſidue in Reggia, that ſeparacion would take away the ſuretie from both the Cities, beſides that there were no ſouldiors within Reggia, and the diſpoſicion of the people farre other then they of Modena: Amidde which difficulties, the gouernor and the Count Guido determining eſpecially to preſerue Modena, as a towne of greateſt importance both for the neighborhood of Bolognia, and neareſt affinitie with theſtate of the Churche, bearing alſo the apteſt oportunitie to carye to it ſuccours and other prouiſions: They ſent to Reggia fiue hundred footemen vnder the leading of Vincent Maiato of Bolognia and one of the Count Guidoes ſouldiors, charging him, that if he were not hable to defende the towne, to retyre into the Citadell: which for that they hoped would holde out at leaſt for certayne dayes, they ſent money to Iohn Baptiſta Smeraldo of Parma, who was capteine there, to leauie three hundred footemen, and made requeſt (though in vayne) to them of Reggia to contribute ſome proporcion of money for waging of the like number, ſeing there was no leſſe queſtion of their ſuretie, then of the ſafetie of the Church eſtate: Touching the daunger of Modena, the gouernour hauing no meane to defende it for want of money, called affore him many of the Citiſens, declaring to them that things were drawne into that ſtraite, that if the Spaniſh bandes were not payed, and a rate of money rayſed to furniſh other exſpences, there would be compulſion to let the towne fall into the handes of the Duke of Ferrara: He ſayde he could yet defende it if there were prouiſion of money, which could not otherwiſe be leauyed but by taxing and rating themſelues for the preſent, aſſuring them that eyther the newe Pope, or the College of Cardinalls, woulde make prouiſion for that that might happen afterwardes: That there was not one amongeſt them who had not proued the yoke of the Duke of Ferrara, and the gouernment of the Churche, and therefore it were too ſuperfluous to debate by argumentes whiche of the two were moſt heauie or light, and no leſſe vayne to perſwade by diſcourſe of reaſon the thing that their owne experience and memorie were agaynſt: Laſtely he deſyred them not to ſtande muche vppon that trifling ſumme of money that was demaunded by waye of loane, for that both touching publike intereſt or profite priuate, it was a matter of ſmall conſideration in regarde to haue a lorde to their more lyking and contentment. Theſe wordes ſlyding eaſily into the mindes of them that had the ſame inclination, did the rather induce them to fall to taxing and rating themſelues, and ſo leauyed the money that was demaunded: So eaſie were they to beare a light burden amongeſt them all, to thende to auoyde a heauyer yoke which laye ready to be layde vpon them: With this money were payed the ſouldiors, and other prouiſions accompliſhed for the better bearing out of the warre: A comfort both for the qualitie and oportunitie of it, which tooke from them all feare of the armes of the Duke of Ferrara: who preſuming no further of his forces then was conuenient, forſooke thenterpriſe of Modena and left it on the left hande, and ioyning with him Ranſo de Cere by the way, he drewe neare to the towne of Reggia, which did not only receiue him, but the day following the Capteine put into his handes the Citadell, ſuffring but a ſmall ſummãce of the Cannon. Touching which action the Capteine alleaged for his iuſtification, that both Vincent Maiato being called by him, refuſed to enter, and the money sent to him by the gouernour, was taken away neare Parma, whither he had sent to leauy bandes of footemen: This iustification was accepted, though not for the equitie of it, yet for the necessitie of the time not seruing to further examinacion. Assone as the Duke had taken Reggia, Ranso de Cere being sente for by thadmirall of Fraunce, went to him: and the Duke, being followed but with a slender strength of footemen, wandred certayne dayes along the ryuer of Secchia, and from thence went to incampe before the towne of Rubiere, to the keeping wherof the Count Guido had vsed in confidence the olde man Couiano with two hundred footemen: And albeit the Duke had no great hope to take the towne, both for his harde scituacion of place and good fortification of large and deepe diches, together with great rampiers all along the walles: yet beginning the daye following to execute the wall ioyning with the gate, the capteine of the footemen, eyther by secrete intelligence, or for feare of the townesmen who began to ryse, lept ouer the walles and presented himselfe before the Duke, offring to his discression both himselfe and the towne: An offer so muche the more precious and welcome, by howe muche it came vnexspected, holding more of fortune then of vallour: But this being a line to leade the Duke into the towne, and taking further courage vppon that felicitie, he planted his artilleries before the Castell, which so terrified the capteine named Titus Iailleser of Parma, that notwithstanding the Castell was strong and fully furnished of men, munition, and all other prouisions necessarie, yet being made feareful by the fortune of the towne, he yeelded it vp before night, not abyding one bullet of thartilleries: Wherein when the Duke was possessed and established, he aboade there with his armie, hoping that for the long vacation of the sea Apostolike, the regiment of footemen within Modena would eyther dissolue or disorder: He fed him selfe also at the same time with hope of other things, which in their place shall be declared.

About this time Monsr Bonniuet, who laye incamped at S. Christopher betweene the gates of Thesin and Rome, a place inuironed with waters and diches, beganne to dispayre to take Millan by force: And therefore after the taking of Monce, he sent capteine Bayard and Federike Bossolo with three hundred launces and eight thousand footemen, to take Loda, whither was come the Marquis of Mantua with fiue hundred horse and fiue hundred footemen, which was the regiment with the which the Church and the Florentins had interteined him into their paye: But hauing feare of his person, he retyred to Pontuique, by which occasion the Citie being abandoned, receyued the French men. After the taking of Loda, Federike builded a bridge vppon the ryuer of Adda, and passed with his companies vpon the lands of Cremona to succour the Castell of Cremona, which the defendantes the same day that thadmirall approched Millan, had compounded to render, if they were not reskewed by the xxvj. of September: to which composicion they were compelled both by thextremitie of hunger, and not knowing that the Frenche armie was past into Italie: Federike drewe neare to the Castell without any resistance or difficultie, and after he had refreshed it with vittells and other releefes, he determined to assault the towne vpon this confidence, that Prospero Colonno had left a very slender garrison, notwithstanding to helpe that feare, the Marquis of Mantua had sent thither an hundred men at armes, an hundred light horsemen, and foure hundred footemen: But he finding the difficulties to great to enter the Citie on that side towardes the Castell, for the fortifications which the defendantes had made, the same deuiding the Citie frō the Castell: he turned on the right hande, & determined to batter the wall in places

where he founde it moſt weake: And after he had played a while with thartilleries, he prepared his ſouldiours to the aſſault, but without effect, which was the cauſe that he began againe the batterie, to beate wider the breache, though with no better ſucceſſe then the firſt, the ſame driuing him to retyre to S. Martins, there to tary for Ranſe de Gere, who was to come from Reggia with two hundred horſemen and two thowſand footemen: And when he was come, they incamped eftſoones affore Cremona, doing great execucion vppon the walls for many howers to great effect, neuertheleſſe what by the impedimentes of the great raines that fell, and diſcerning by the preſent difficulties how hardly they ſhould preuaile, they forbare to doe any further execucion: for that the ſame day, Mercurio with the light horſemen of the Venetians (whoſe bands were muſtered at Pontuique) paſſed ouer the riuer of Oglio, and made incurſions euen to their tents: After the vaine triall of this exployt, Federike and Ranſe brake vp their ſeege from before Cremona, as well for lacke of vittells, as for the breaking away of the footemen which Ranſe brought thither, picking this quarrell that they had receiued no other money then that which the Duke of Ferrara had giuen: From Cremona they marched to incampe affore Sonzin, where they found no better ſucceſſe in their affaires: Afterwards they fell to ſacking the towne of Carauagge where they abode certeine dayes, of which lingring was bred this excuſe or impediment to the Senate of Venice for not ſending to Millan thoſe proporcions of men which they were bound vnto: for that, taking their excuſe in temporiſing ſo long, vpon the common opinion that the Imperiall Capteines had, that in reſpect of their ſeparacion with the french king, the french armie would not march that yere, they aſſured to ſend them aſſoone as the companies that lay vpon the territories of Cremona ſhould be repaſſed the riuer of Adda.

In this condicion of affaires, both the parties diſtruſting not to be hable to put a ſpeedie end to the warre, either partie dwelt in his ſecurity, and would offer nothing to hazard: The Admirall who neuer looked to take Millan by force, exſpected, either that thennemies would diſſolue for want of money, or at leaſt that neceſſitie of vittells would compell them to abandon Millan: Where notwithſtanding there was corne in great plentie, yet the multitude of mouthes to eate it was more innumerable, beſides that he had cut from them their water, and the vſe of their milnes: for this cauſe the Admirall called home thoſe bandes that lay along the riuer of Adda, and beſtowed them betwene Monce and Millan, to thend that the people of Millan from whom was ſtopped the trafficke of vttells by the wayes of Loda & Pauia, ſhould alſo remeyne depriued of all ſuch releefe as was wont to paſſe from the hill of Brianſo: But theſe experiences were not ſufficient to accompliſh theffect that th Admirall deſired: On the other parte, albeit Proſpero Colonno (as touching his bodie, was vehemently oppreſſed with a great ſickenes, and no leſſe trauelled with emulacion in minde, as not brooking the comming of the Viceroy of Naples, for that he had deſire to be the principall man: Yet, by his councell was done what coulde be done, to ſtoppe the paſſage of vittells that came to the ennemies from the partes beyond the riuer of Theſin, the rather for that the fortificacion of the place where they were incamped, gaue no hope to driue them away by force: Therefore Proſperos care was that the Marquis of Mantua ſhoulde enter into Pauya, whoſe comming putting the frenche into feare leaſt he woulde winne their bridge, they builded an other at Torglien within fiue and twentie myles of Pauya: Beſides, he ſolicited Vitelly to paſſe the riuer, who, with the companies of men of warre which the Florentins had geuen him (and by them was ſent to Genes in the beginning of the warre,) together with three thousande footemen payde by the Genovvayes, had commaunded all the contrey beyonde Pavv, except Alexandria: That was to giue impediment to the vittels which came to the Frenchmen from the contrey of Lomellina: But the Duke of Genes would not consent to it for the feare he had of tharchbishop of Fregosa who laye in Alexandria neare to Genes: And because the Venetians whose bands were passed Oglio, refused so long as that part of the Frenchmen which was gone from Caravage remayned neare Monce, to passe Adda for the perill of Bergamo, Prospero wonne them to sende foure hundred horsemen, and fiue hundred footemen to Treffa, to stoppe the course of vittels wherewith they liued.

Whilest both partes were in the action of these matters, there was performed no exployte of warre other then light skirmishes, incursions, and pillages, wherein alwayes the French men had the worse, and so returned eftsones with great losse and domage. It hapned one day amongst others, that as Iohn de Medicis issued out with two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, and a thousande footemen, he met with fourescore French launces, being moste parte of the companies of Barnabie Visconte, and offring to chase them, he sodenly fell to retyre, and by that stratageme cunningly drewe them vppon an ambushe of fiue hundred harquebuziers which he had layde, and there made slaughter of the moste of them, and tooke the residue prisoners. In like sort in an other encounter Socchor Burguignon brake a trowpe of threescore men at armes of the company of the maister of the horse: Besides, the bandes of Spanishe footemen, had many conflictes with the French footmen that warded at those trenches which were made to goe in couert euen to the rampiers, where they slew many of them that garded the trenches. And at the same tyme Paule Lusasquo who remained at Pisqueton with an hundred and fifty light horsmen, ouerranne the countrey all about, and distressed not a little those that were in Cremona. Neither did the ambushes succeede more happly to the Admirall, then his other exployes: for hauing conspired secretly with one Morgant of Parma a commaunder vnder Iohn de Medicis, that when it shoulde fall to his turne to warde at a Bastillion of a gate which was caste out of the rampiers, he shoulde receyue in his souldiors: When the night appoynted came, Morgant thinking it necessarie to communicate the matter with some other of his companions for the better execution, brake it with one especiall souldior of his bande, who making as though he consented to the treason, gaue him counsell to goe and commaunde the Sentinells in the name of Prospero not to stirre what brute or noyse so euer they heard, as not to let him whom he would sende to call the souldiors of the campe to come to the bastillion, for that thadmirall had that night drawne neare to that side, fiue thousande soldiers to be ready at the signe giuen, and had set in order the whole armie: But " such is the infirmitie of treason, that it hath no further assurance then the party hath
" confidence: For, whilest Morgant went to execute the deuise, the other who coulde not be faythfull in conspiracie, reuealeth the whole practise to Iohn de Medicis, who making speede to the Bastillion, taketh the offendors, and after iudiciall examination had, he maketh them to passe the pikes according to the iustice of warre.

It seemed nowe that the affayres of the French began to decline on all sides, both for the fertillitie of the countrey about Millan, which ministred some releese to the wantes of the towne: and for the deuise of the townesmen inuenting handemilnes to supplie the vse of grinding, by which engin was taken away the Admiralls hope that thinhabitantes would fall into wante of meale: It was beleeued also that the French had lost in those encounters more then fifteene hundred horse aswell of seruice uice as of common sort: Whiche brought them into that astonishment, that they forbare to issue out of their tentes, but in times of neede to garde the vittellers and forragers, and that alwayes in strong trowpes: The infamie whereof the Admirall conuerting to his speciall honor, he would often say, that touching the managing of the warre, he would rather obserue the moderacion and temperaunce of thItalians, then be gouerned by the furious importunities of the Frenche capteines: and yet when so euer any encounter was giuen eyther by their footemen or horsemen, they shewed more readines to flee then to feight. So that the capteines of themperour beeing nowe assured of the feare of hunger, and the forces of thennemie, yea hoping to giue impedimentes to the vittels of thennemie, there was nothing remayning to trouble them but want of money, without the which if it were a harde matter to conteine the souldiors within Millan, it could not almost but be impossible to leade them out of the towne howe so euer the affayres and occurrances of the warre required: So harde is it to leade souldiors to seruice where is no assurance of money, and more daungerous to minister discipline where no paye is performed: But to remedie these difficulties, many meanes were sought out, and amongest others, Prospero Colonno by the priuitie of the Viceroy of Naples and Duke of Sessa, had immediatly vpon the Popes death begon to treate with the Duke of Ferrara: who after he had refused many offers made to him by thadmirall since the action of Reggia, to goe affore Cremona, couenanted at laste with Prospero, that if he reconquered Modena by his meanes, he would paye him immediatly thirtie thousande duckets, and twentie thousand more within two monethes: That conquest seemed a matter of easie execution, since Prospero commaunding to depart from Modena Guido Rangon souldior of the league, and also the regiment of Spanishe footemen, what other remedie remayned to that Citie so abandoned, then to compounde with the Duke, and laye themselues downe to his order: The benefite of the army was one consideracion that drewe Prospero to this practise, but the thing that more violently ouerruled him to it, was his priuate affection, the auncient amitie he had with the Duke of Ferrara, a desire common also to all the other Barons of Rome, to embase the greatnes of the Popes, and a hope that Modena and Reggia remayning no more to the Church, Parma and Plaisanca would with more facilitie diuolue to the Duke of Millan: This matter albeit was labored with great secrecie, yet beeing discloséd by the Count Guido to Guicciardin, he sawe there was no other meane to stoppe it, but to perswade the Spanishe capteines who were well vsed and largely payed, and had good will to continue in that citie, that where they were not subiect to thauthoritie of Prospero Colonno, they should of themselues refuse to go from Modena but by the commaundement of the Duke of Sessa, by whose appoyntment they came thither: And albeit Guicciardin was not ignorant that the whole deuise was wrought by the consent of the sayde Duke of Sessa, yet he considered that the Duke being themperours Embassador at Rome, and the College making instance to him of the contrarie, would not onely not giue out suche a commission, but also would refuse at the requeste of the Cardinalls to giue open order to the contrarie: This deuise drewe a succesSe according to the plot that was layde: for when Prospero sent to commaund Count Guido and the Spaniardes to goe to Millan for the necessitie of the warres, the Count excused him with many reasons, and alleaged that he was subiect to the Churche and to them of Modena: as also the Spanishe capteines being perswaded by him and the gouernor, made aunswere that in that case, they were to obey none but the Duke of Sessa: Which matters being signified by the gouernor to the Col-

leadge of Cardinalls, they ſummoned forthwith into the conclaue the Duke of Seſſo, who, to auoyde ſuſpicion as well in him ſelfe as in th Emperour, could not refuſe their demaunde to wryte to the Capteines that they ſhould not ſtirre: And moreouer, as it often hapneth that in worldly dealings thinges oftentimes ſucceede farre otherwiſe then men thinke, ſo in this was diſcerned this accident, that certeine letters of Proſpero intercepted by the gouernor, were red in the colleadge, by the which as was diſcloſed how all things went, ſo the Cardinalls that were for the frenich king by thimpediment of whom the prouiſions of money were lingred which by Cardinall Medicis working was begon to be ſent to Modena, knowing how daungerous it would be for the king that that matter ſhould come to effect, began with open hand to help forward the ſending of the money to Modena: wherein the Cardinall Colonno ioyned with them, to declare to the reſidue that he preferred the vtility of the ſea Apoſtolike affore all other things: But notwithſtanding this ſhow of diligence was ſufficient to deferre the execucion of the couenauntes made with the Duke of Ferrara, yet the fundacion of thoſe thoughts being remoued, they reteyned this in deuiſe that the Viceroy of Naples, who (though with ſlow remouinges) was come to Millan with foure hundred launces & two thowſand footemen, ſhould lead away with him the regiment of ſpaniſh footemen as he paſſed by Modena.

In this time at Millan did increaſe the plentie and abundance of vittells, for that th Admirall fearing leaſt the ſouldiors within Pauia, would occupy the bridge which he had made vpon Theſin, by the which were conueyed neceſſary prouiſions to tharmie, he drewe from Monce the armie that was there being the leſſer parte: And of them he ſent three thowſand to the gard of the bridge, called ſome of them to him ſelfe, and diſtributed the reſidue, parte within Marignan, and parte within Biagraſſo, places verie neare neighbours to the bridge: By which meane thimperialls that recouered Monce, had a farre greater commoditie of vittells. The french campe ſtretched from the Abbay of Clereualt vntill the way of Pauia, and was towards that way, within gunſhotte of Millan: And at that time there was in the frenche armie eight hundred light horſemen, ſix thowſand Swvizzers, two thowſande Italian footemen and tenne thowſand as well frenche as Gaſcoyns: They had at the bridge of Theſin, a thowſand launceknightes, and a thowſande Italians: The like numbers at Biagreſſa where was Ranſe de Cere: two hundred launces within Nouaro: and two thowſande footemen as well in Alexandria as in Loda: And within Millan were eight hundred launces, eight hundred light horſemen, fiue thowſand ſpaniſh footemen, ſix thowſand launceknightes, and foure thowſand Italians, beſides the multitude of the people who were very violent againſt the french both in hart and action: The Marquis of Mantua was within Pauia with fiue hundred launces, ſix hundred light horſemen, two thowſande footemen Spanyards, and three thowſand Italians: Laſtly there were in newe caſtell in Tortoneſe, three thowſand footemen with Vitelli, who, as certeine frenche bandes were paſſed into Alexandria, retyred notwithſtanding a litle after to ſeruella, fearing leaſt the way of Genes woulde be ſhut vp from him: The Venetians alſo had ſix hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and fiue thowſand footemen, of whom they ſent a thowſande to Millan at the requeſt of Proſpero, who deſired to ſerue his turne with the fame & reputacion of their ſuccours: And ſoone after they diſpatched an other parte of their forces to Cremona by reaſon of a ſuſpicion of ſome intelligence.

At laſt th Admirall, what by the difficultie of vittells which grewe extreame, the compulſion of the time, which was colde, the vehemencie of ſnowes, which were violent, violent, and the important instance of the Svvizzers, whose impaciencie could not suffer so many incommodities, determined to breake vp and go further from Millan: Notwithstanding before he published his resolucion, he procured Galeas Visconte to obteine leaue to go see & to do reuerence to Madame Clara, of great name for her singuler beauty, but of greater fame for the loue that Prospero Colonno bare to her: And being within Millan, he preferred the parley of truce, whervpon did assemble the day following vpon the rampiers, capteine Alarcon, Paule Vettory the Florentine Commissioner, and Ierome Moron: And for the Admirall, Galeas Viscounto and the generall of Normandy: They commoned of a surceasing of armes vntill thende of May, and both partes to be bound to distribute their armies in the townes, and in the end they had consented to reduce all their forces beyonde Thesin, had it not bin for thimpedimentes of themprours capteines, who obiecting matter of reprofe that with the truce they went about to take from them the hope they had of the victory, made aunswere that they had no power to deliberate any thing without the will of the Viceroy: So that thadmirall within two dayes after caused his artilleries to march before day, towards Thesin, him selfe following with the whole armie at the full appearing of the day: he marched in so good order, as though he would not (vppon occasion) refuse the battell: And on the other side, thinhabitants of the towne seeing his discamping, together with the souldiors, made sute with vniuersall voyce that they might be ledde to the fielde to charge them: In this demaunde were also concurrant the capteines and personages of greatest authoritie, who redoubling thinstance to Prospero Colonno, layde before him the facilitie of the victorie, both by thaduauntage of their disorder, which caste vpon them an vnappeasible feare, the comparison of their forces nothing inferior to theirs, and their courage & resoluciō farre aboue them, & also thoportunitie of their retract wherein lurked some secrete terror to the most part of the armie, the same being confirmed at that instant by the relation of certaine Italians that stragled from tharmy: They put him in remēbrance of the infinit glory & perpetuall memory of his name, if he would with his last reputacion confirme the renowme & triumph of so many victories gotten by him: Lastly they persuaded him that a noble leader of warre caried as great fame by his readines to embrace good occasions, as by his resolucion to execute when necessitie called him: But Prospero in whom was fixed a setled minde to forbeare as muche as he could, to commit the credite of his vallour to the arbitracion of fortune, tolde them howe farre it was from the office of a discrete capteine, to be caryed with popular voyces, and how vnworthy the name of a generall, to leade men to the fight, where was no other hope thē in the force of their armes: That though many other worldly matters might be put to aduenture and hazard, yet the life and honor of men required counsell, forecast, and depest prouidence: That they had won glory enough in compelling thenemy to go his way without bloud: That the desire of men ought not to be infinit, and lesse exspectacion in the suretie of fortune, whose mutabilitie worketh most in matters of warre: That that army is ill guided, where in the euent and issue of the field the losses are greater then the benefites: That he knew by experience, that thinfamy that fell vpon the generall by his rashnes, did make a greater wound in his name & credite, then the glory of the victory made him rich or renowmed, for that as no man would haue interest in the infamy but the leader, so almost euery particular would cōmunicat in the cōmendacion: That such were the humors of men, that they would lay the losse of a field vpon the general only: That as he had hithervnto with tēperance guided al his enterprises to an honorable end, so now that he was vppon the lateſt yeare of his age, he woulde not enter into newe courſe and newe councelles, and deliuer vp to fortune ſo many valiant bodyes as reappoſed theyr lyues on him, nor exchaunge thoſe rules which from the beginning, had led him to that eſtate of glorie, reputacion, and greatnes, wherein he nowe ſtandeth: The Frenche men deuided themſelues into two partes, the Admirall with the greateſt entred Biagraſſo within fourteene miles of the towne of Millan, and ſent the reſidue to Roſa which is within ſeuen miles.

Almoſt aſſoone as the Admirall was gone from before Millan, the Cardinalles created a newe Pope hauing alreadie conſumed in the conclaue more then fiftie dayes: At the beginning, there was in the conclaue but a preſence of xxxvj. Cardinalles, and being afterwardes increaſed with three more, they ſpent much tyme in ſundrie contencions: For they ſtoode deuided amongeſt themſelues not only for the different wills of Themprour and Frenche King, but alſo for the greatnes of the Cardinall de Medicis: Who being puſhed on by all ſuche as followed the Kinges authoritie, and ſome others that depended of Themprour, had at his deuocion, the full voyces of ſixteene Cardinalles: They were determined either to chuſe him, or at leaſt to name no other without his conſent: Beſides, he was ſecretly aſſured of fyue other Cardinalles and their voyces, together with the fauour of Themprours Embaſſadour with all the reſidue that folowed his authoritie: Of all which furtherances and foundacions albeit he was aſſured almoſt at the death of Pope Leo, yet he entred nowe into the conclaue with a more conſtant reſolucion not to abandon his hopes, neyther for the tract or length of tyme, nor for any accident what ſo euer, making this his chiefeſt piller and grounde, that in the election of the Pope, it was neceſſarie that of that preſence of Cardinals that was there aſſiſtant, a third part of voices ſhould bee concurrant: But ſo obſtinate were the controuerſies of the Cardinalles, that they could not diſſolue theyr diuiſions, neither for the common daunger of Italie, nor for the perticular eſtate of the Church, but according as the affaires of the warre proceeded, both the partes ſought to prolong and deferre the election for the ſupportacion they hoped in the victorie of their fauorers: And it had bene yet longer deferred, both if there had bene amongeſt the olde Cardinalls of the College (aduerſaries to the Cardinal Medicis) one agreement to chuſe an other, and alſo, ſhaking of their couetouſnes perticular, they had ſtande vpon this point, not to ſuffer the cardinal Medicis to riſe to the ſoueraign ſeat: But it is a hard matter for mē by concord to aſpire to the end they ſeeke for, when their concord is intangled with diſcord or ambicion: The cardinal Colōno, an ancient enemy of the cardinal Medicis, and of a nature proud & hautie, fel into indignation againſt the other Cardinals that were ioyned with him, becauſe they refuſed to elect for Pope, Cardinall Iaccobaccio, a Romaine, a mā of the ſame factiō & wholy at his deuociō: In which deſpite of mind, he made a willing offer to the Cardinal Medicis to ioyne with him in the electiō, & for recōpēce, he receiued of him a very ſecret promiſe of the office of Vicechauncellor which he held, & of his Pallace being very ſumptuous, builded by cardinal. S. George, and giuen to him by Pope Leo: a matter which aptly agreing with the couetouſnes of Cardinal Colonno, ſo puſhed him on, that he drew to him cardinall Cornare & two others, betwene whō was made a reſolute cōſent to chuſe Cardinal Medicis for Pope: And as it often hapneth that in electiō exāple doth much, ſo aſſone as their inclinaciō was knowē, many others, either for wāt of ſtomake, or by too much ambiciō begā to preſſe on with the formeſt, to ſpeak in his fauor: Inſomuch as the ſame night, he was honored as Pope by the vniuerſal agrement of thē al, & the next morning being the

the ninetienth of Nouember, thelection was made perfect by ſolemne lott according to the cuſtome: This dignitie hapned to him the ſame day two yeares that he entred victorious into Millan: It was thought that amongeſt other things, his great reuenues of benefices and eccleſiaſtike offices, did muche to make him Pope: For that the Cardinalles, when they entred the conclaue, ſet downe this conſtitucion, that the reuenues of him that ſhould bee elected Pope, ſhould bee ſhared by equal diſtribucion amongeſt the others: A foule cuſtome of couetouſnes in a Cleargie, whoſe handes ſhould bee no leſſe innocent to take, then their hartes naked of fraude and guile, and in whoſe preferment ſhould bee moſt reſpected their ſinceritie of lyfe and doctrine: He would haue continued ſtill his name of Iulio, but beeing caryed with this ſuperſticious obſeruation of ſome of the Cardinals, that ſuch as after their election refuſing to chaunge their name, dyed within the yeare, he tooke vppon him the name of Clement the ſeuenth, eyther for the nearenes of that idolatrous feſtiuall, or els by alluſion, that immediatly after his election he had pardoned and receyued into grace the Cardinall Volterro and reconciled all his faction: And albeit Pope Adrian in his latter dayes, had declared this Cardinall to bee vnable to aſſiſt or enter the conclaue, yet he had his place there by the permiſſion of the Colledge, and was euen to the laſt houre, altogether agaynſt thelection of Iulio: Great was thopinion of this newe Pope throughout all the worlde, and as it hath not bene ſeene of long tyme that the Conclaue hath ſo long temporiſed and ſtand vppon the naming of one, ſo yet they thought the tract and exſpectacion well recompenſed in that they had raiſed to that ſupreame ſeate, a perſon of ſo great authoritie and vallour, both for that he had confounded and conioyned by his arbitrement the power of theſtate of Florence with the iuriſdiction of the Church, and had in the tyme of Pope Leo, gouerned many yeares the whole pontificacie, and was iudged a man graue and conſtant in his deliberations, and alſo for that many thinges being by ſiniſter imputacion impoſed vppon him that proceeded from Leo, many affirmed that Leo was full of ambicion, full of pryde, full of trouble, and full of deſire of innouacion and newe thinges: To which good partes that were founde in him, adioyning his modeſtie and abſtinence from pleaſures, and full of care and ſtudie to attende affaires, there were fewe who did not exſpect of him verie great and extraordinary matters: His election euen in the beginning put the eſtate of the Church in great ſuertie: For, the Duke of Ferrara, not a litle aſtoniſhed that ſuche a Pope was mounted into the holye ſeate, and hoping no longer to get Modena for the comming of the Viceroy of Naples, and leſſe exſpectation in the Frenche, who affore, by the ſolicitacion of Theoder Tryvulce newly come to his Campp, made him great offers ſo that he would ioyne with them: Returned to Ferrara after he had left ſufficient garriſon within Reggia and Rubiero: In lyke ſort all controuerſies were reappeaſed in Romagnia, where Iohn de Saßatella who had bene expulſed by the power of the Gebelins during the raigne of Adrian, was eſtſones reentred with a traine of Guelffes vnder couller to oppreſſe the contrary faction, but in trueth at the incenſing of the French.

But ſithens the Frenche armie was diſtributed to Biagraſſo and Roſa, the Admiral, with whom were remeining but foure thouſand Svvyzzers, diſmiſſed (as vnprofitable for ſeruice) all the footmen of Dauphine & Languedocke: He ſent alſo his great artilleries beyonde Theſin, with intencion to tary there for the ſupplies which the King prepared for his ſuccours, not fearing that thenemie would make any inuaſion vppō him in a place ſo ſtrong, and conteyning ſuche plentie of vittelles: And yet becauſe

he woulde not enterteine the tyme idelie, he ſent Ranſe de Cere with ſeuen thouſande Italian footemen to take Arona, a towne of great ſtrength, and hath his ſcituacion in the confins of the Lake Maior: This towne was poſſeſſed by Anchiſes Viſcounte, and to the reskew of it, Proſpero Colonno ſent from Myllan a regiment of twelue hundred footemen: But becauſe the Caſtle of Arona doth ſo muche commaunde the towne, that who holdeth not the Caſtle doeth vnprofitably poſſeſſe the towne, Ranſe layde his plott to winne the Caſtle, but his fortune being inferior to the difficulties he founde, after he had giuen many aſſaltes wherein he loſt many men conſuming almoſt a moneth in that enterpryſe, at laſt he leauied his ſeege and went away, confirming the vniuerſall opinion that had bene conceyued of him for many yeares, that his actions helde no compariſon with the reputation he had got in the defence of Crema.

The death of Proſpero Colonno, and his qualities.

About this time, Proſpero Colonno, hauing lyen ſicke eight moneths, began to draw to his lateſt houre, not without ſuſpicion of poyſon, or els ſome amarous potion: He was carefull by his lateſt end, to confirme the credit he had gotten in the race of ſo many yeares paſt, and therefore where affore he could not wel brooke the comming of the Viceroy, he now ſolicited it with great affection, as knowing that he was no more able to manage the affaires of the warre: So agreeable was the modeſtie and temperance of his laſt dayes, with the vallour and courage of his younger tyme: No leſſe honorable was the behauior of the Viceroy, who aſſoone as he came neare to Myllan, ſtaied without and would not enter for certeine dayes, to ſhowe what reuerence he bare to the vertue and reputacion of ſuche a Capteine: And yet when he vnderſtoode he was reduced to the laſt action of lyfe and had loſt all ſenſe and knowledge, he entred the towne for a deſire he had to ſee him, notwithſtanding ſome hold that he would not enter till he was dead, which was the laſt daie ſauing one of that yeare: He was a Capteine of great name & merit during the whole time of his life, and in his lateſt yeares, had wonne ſinguler reputacion and authoritie: He was a father of ſoldiours, a director of their councelles, a framer of their diſpoſicions, an example of vertue, and a guide to true glorie and fame: He was not apte to embrace lightly all occaſions that the diſorders of thennemies might offer, for, this propertie was ioyned to his wit, rather to doubt too much, then beleue too haſtely: And ſo ielous was he ouer the ſafetie and ſuertie of his people, that he would not eaſily giue any aduauntage to thennemy to oppreſſe him: He would alwayes ſaye that in a Generall, the glorie was greater to feare a miſchiefe and foreſee it, then to runne with occaſions which can not bee without their hazardes: He was by nature eaſie & ſlow in his actions, and ſeeking alwayes to adminiſter warres more with councelles then with the ſword, he left to others this propertie of example, to defend eſtates by temporiſing, and not without great neceſſitie, to commit the euent of battelles to fortune: For, in our tyme, the managing and gouernment of warres hath farre differed, ſince that affore Charles the eight paſt into Italy. The brunt of the warre being more borne out with horſemen armed at all partes, then with footemen, and no leſſe inconuenient and troubleſome the engines wherwith they were wont to take townes, notwithſtanding the armies came oftentymes to the ſhock of battell, yet the ſlaughter was litle, & very rare the bloud that was ſpilt: And townes alſo that were beſeged defended themſelues with ſuche facilitie, not for that they had more knowledge in defenſe, but through ignorance to take them, that there was not ſo litle or weake a towne, which was not able for many dayes to reſiſt great armies of enemies: At that tyme Princes did not intrude vppon theſtates of others without very great great difficulties: But when King Charles made his first discending into Italy, the regions of that nation were so repleniſhed with terror & astoniſhment, what through the feare of new nations, and the vallour of the footemen whose feight was in an other manner, but most of all through the furie of thartilleries, by whose vnacquainted roaring noyse the ignorant people feared no lesse then if the frame of the world had falne, that there was no hope for any Prince to be able to defende himselfe, that were not strong enough to keepe the fielde: For, men that had no knowledge to defende townes yelded at the first approach of thenemies, and if happly any towne stoode to her defence, it was taken within fewe dayes, suche was the furie of thartilleries, and suche the ignorance of men that had yet no custome nor familiaritie with them: By that meane the realme of Naples and the Duchie of Millan, were no sooner inuaded then they were conquered: In that sort the Venetians being vanquiſhed in one battell only, left abandoned immediatly all their iuriſdiction in the firme land: And in that sort the Frenche men hauing skarcely seene thenemyes, left the Duchie of Myllan: But since, the witte of man comprehending better the furie of batteries, began to oppose engine and induſtrie for their defence, and fortefied townes with mountes, trenches, flankes, rampiers, and Baſtillions, which they made apte to bestow artilleries vppon: And being planted in a place which men seeke to defend, doe farre more hurt, then that that is braked without: So that at this daye it is verie harde to take a towne where is any reſiſtance made: And happlie those inuentions began in Italy in the dayes of our fathers, when the towne of Ottranto was reconquered vppon the Turkes, wherin when Alfonso Duke of Calabria entred afterwardes, he founde that the Turkes had made many rampiers and fortifications, suche as were vnknowen to the Italians, but yet those sortes of fortificatiõs remeined rather as images in the myndes of men, then that they were folowed: Proſpero either was the only man, or the first man of all other that with greateſt reputacion, hath twise by those meanes defended the Duchie of Myllan: And aswel in offending as in defending, and cutting of thenemies from vittelles, as also in prolonging the warre with suche cunning that pouertie, disorders, and other extremities consumed them, he hath borne out the warre and vanquiſhed without once aduenturing the battell, without breaking of a Launce, yea almost without drawing a sworde: So that he standing in example to others that haue come after, many warres (continued for many moneths,) haue bene ouercome more with induſtrie, with ſtratageame, and with temporiſing, then with the force or fortune of armes.

These thinges were done in Italy in the yeare 1523. And the yeare folowing were made beyond the mounts preparacions of right great exſpectation and yet brought forth no effectes worthy of so mightie Princes: For, where the Emprour & the King of Englande had cõtracted & promiſed the Duke of Burbon to enter with a strong armie, the one into Piccardy, & the other into Guyen: The mouing of the King of Englãd was to smal purpose, & thẽterpriſe of the Duke of Burbon to inuade Burgõdy was turned into a moũteine of smoke: For that wanting mony to paie his Laũceknights, besides the diminuciõ of their nombers by the practiſe of certein Capteins that stoale away to the Frẽch king, he diſpaired to do any thing in Fraũce, & in that mind wẽt to Millan: There themprour hauing no mind that he thold paſſe into Spain, perhaps because he wold not haue the mariage of his ſiſter go forward which the Duke of Burbon desired, sẽt to hĩ Mõſr de Beaurain to perſuade hĩ to staie there, & gaue him thauthority & title of his lieftenãt general in Italy, to induce him with better wil to abide there: Neither did things happẽ more happily to Thẽprour on the coast of Spaine, for that albeit in a burning desire to the warres he was come to Pampeluna to passe in person into Fraunce, and had already sent his armie beyond the Mountes Pireney, where he had taken Saueterra, which is not farre from S. Iohn de pied de Port, yet drawing with him many other imperfections, he founde at last that his readines was farre greater then his power, for that as for the want of money, he was not hable to enterteine so great forces as were necessarie for so great an enterprise, so for that want also he was not able to assemble his armie vntill the latter ende of the yere, when the nature of the season doubled vpon him his difficulties, and tooke from him the libertie of the wayes: These impediments compelled him to dissolue his armie erected almost agaynst the counsell of all his capteines, which made the Duke of Albe a prince of great authoritie say in the heate of the warre, that themprour who in many things resembled king Ferdinand his grandfather by the mother side, did in this deliberacion beare moste similitude and likenesse with his grandfather by the father side.

Nowe came on the yere a thousande fiue hundred twentie and foure, when the difficulties of the Frenche men stirring vp themperours capteines to looke to put ende to the warre: They called to Millan the Duke of Vrbin and Peter Pesero treasorer of Venice to consult of the maner of proceeding in the warre: In whiche counsell they were all of opinion, that assone as the six thousande launceknightes which the Viceroy had sent to leauye, were arriued at Millan, the Emperours armie ioyning with it the Venetian forces, should affront thennemies to thende to chase them out of the Duchie of Millan, eyther by force or by famine: And albeit they thought themselues strong ynough to performe it, yet there was one thing that hindred thexecution of the counsell, which was want of mony, of which for that there were great summes due to the men of warre for their payes paste, they thought they should not be hable to get them to issue out of Millan or any other towne vnlesse their payes were first satisfied: And for that tharmie was to continue in the fielde, it was no lesse necessarie to set downe order hereafter for the payes of the souldiours to be performed in their due tyme, and safely to bee conueyed to the campe to aunswere the dayes of payment: But the inhabitantes of Millan desirous to be discharged of the burden of the warre, offred to remoue these difficulties in lending to the Duke fourescore and ten thousande duckets, an action wherevnto they were the more easily induced by example of the laste good dealing, when the money which they had lent at suche time as Monsr Lavvtrech laye affore Millan, was readily repayed vpon the Dukes reuenues: In like sort the Pope, who by the remembrance of things past, helde muche suspected the victorie of the French, put to his hande, notwithstanding with a wonderfull conning he made demonstracion of the contrarie to suche as the king had sent to him: he caused to be deliuered with great secrecie to themprours embassador twentie thousande duckets, and solicited also the Florentins (on whom the Viceroy required a newe contribucion by vertue of the league made in the time of Pope Adrian) to paye as their last rest, thirty thousande duckets: And yet the Pope had no meaning hereafter to showe more propertie of fauour to the one then to the other: But where immediatly vppon his election the one of them had sent to him Monsr Beaurain, and the other Monsr Saint Maixan, to drawe him particularly to them, yet his intention was, assone as the present daungers should cease, to beare betwene them that moderacion and temperance which orderly apperteineth to thoffice of Popes when Christian Princes be in discord, and laying aside all parcialitie and suspected inclinacion, to be a worker for peace and

vnitie betwene them: A resolucion which was so muche the more agreable to the French king, who feared least the Pope was of the same disposicion towardes hym that he was when he was Cardinall, by howmuche it was contrarie and disagreable to themperour, who helde it not reasonable that he should seperate him selfe from him, both for the last alliance that was past, and also for that by his ayde he mounted to the Popedome: In which regarde it brought no litle griefe to him to be certified from the Pope, that notwithstanding he willed him as muche good as he dyd before, yet for that he was nowe no more a person priuate, but a father indifferent to all, he was bound by the respect and office of his place, to do nothing whiche were not for the common profite of all.

But whyleſt the Viceroy prepared himselfe to go finde thenemies, he sent Iohn de Medicis before Marignan, which towne yeelded to him together with the Castell: And where the Marquis of Pisquairo disdayning to followe the warre vnder Prospero Colonno, would not come to the campe but when he was aduertised that he drewe towardes his lateſt howre, and hearing nowe that capteine Bayard was within Rebecca with three hundred horse and many bands of footemen, he ioyned himselfe with Iohn de Medicis, and marching with no lesse diligence then resolucion of minde, he founde them of Rebecca so ouersleeping in their securitie, and so litle doubting of his comming, that he tooke the most parte of the footemen, and gaue the chase to the residue, returning immediatly to Millan as not to giue leasure to the enemies within Biagrasse to pursue them: In this enterprise he was muche esteemed for his industrie and for his vallour, but muche more for his celeritie and diligence, for that Rebecca which is not past two myles from Biagrassa, is from Millan from whence they went, more then seuenteene myles.

But as the affayres of the warre were reduced to this degree, that to the Frenche were left no other hopes then that wantes of money would fall vpon their enemies: And thimperialls were fedde onely with this exspectation, that the Frenche would suffer great skarcitie of vittels, and yet neyther of them were without their hopes of succours, the one of Launceknightes, and the other of Svvizzers: So the Admirall loasing no oportunitie wherein occasion was offred, set fyre vpon Rosa, and retyred to Biagrassa those bandes that were within it, disposing his forces to distresse thennemies, and make incursions and burnings ouer all the countrey. But by this time were the Launceknightes arriued at the emprours campe, which conteined in the whole six hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horsemen, seuen thowsande footemen Spanish, twelue thousande Launceknightes, and fifteene hundred Italians, vnder the leading of the Duke of Millan, the Duke of Burbon, the Viceroy of Naples, and the Marquis of Pisquaira: They left within Millan for the garde of the place, foure thousande footemen, and marched with the residue to incampe at Binasqua, where not many dayes after the Duke of Vrbin ioyned with them, with fixe hundred men at armes, six hundred light horsemen, and seuen thousande footemen of the Venetians: At what time the Castell of cremona being no more hable to beare out the rage of hunger, and Federike Bossolo that was within Loda, hauing in vayne aduentured to succour it, yeelded vp to the Imperialls. Afterwardes the armie marched to Cæsera, a towne within fiue myles of Biagrassa, there the Admirall had distributed within Loda, Nouaro, and Alexandria, two hundred launces and fiue thousand footmen, and kept himselfe incamped with eight hundred launces, and eight thousande Svvizzers, to whom were ioyned within few dayes after, a regiment of three thousande others, together with foure thousand Italians and two thousand launceknightes: And notwithstanding all this multitude of companies, he felt no necessitie of vittells, hauing a full prouision for two monethes as well in the armie as in the places thereaboutes: It was not possible to assaile them in a place so strong without their manifest daunger: By reason whereof, the Imperialls who many times had assayed to passe the riuer of Thesin to stoppe vittells from the frenche on that side and to get into those townes which they held beyonde Thesin, and also to giue impediment to the succours that were to come out of Fraunce, determined at last to passe, iudging, by the confidence they had in the people of Millan, that there was no necessitie to kepe there a great garrison: So that the Duke, accompanied with Ihon de Medicis, returned to Millan where was remeining a strength of six thowsand footemen: Thus they passed the seconde daye of May, the riuer of Thesin, vppon three bridges beneath Pauia, the battell lodging at Gambala, and the residue of tharmie in the villages thereaboutes: But the Admirall, when he knew they were passed Thesin, dispatched speedily Ranse de Cere to gard Vigeua, and fearing to lose that towne, with other peeces in the countrey of Lomellina, whiche being taken from him, he should stand as it were besieged, he drewe thither within fiue dayes with the whole armie, leauing within Biagrassa, an hundred horsemen and a thowsande footemen: he bestowed his vauntgard about the partes of Vigeua, and sent the battell to Mortaro, a towne within two myles of Gambalo where the Viceroy was: That place was full of many commodities, since besides the strength and scituacion, it ministred vittells at commaundement, both for the suretie of the wayes of Mountferat of Verceill, and Nouaro, and also for the continuall oportunitie and assistance of other places, yeelding course and trafficke from one towne to an other as if it had bene a streame of water: The Admirall offered two dayes together, the battell to thennemies, who refused to accept it, not that they were lesse in numbers, or inferiour in vallour and resolucion of souldiours, but bicause they would not put in daunger the hope of the victorie which they helde almost certeine, for that by the surprising of certeine letters, they had intelligence that thennemie began to feele want of money and pay.

The imperials passe the riuer of Thesin.

After thEmperours army was passed Thesin, the Duke of Vrbin leading the Venetian regiments, went to incampe before Garlasquo, a towne strong by scituacion, and well enuironned with ditches and rampiers: There was within it, a strength of foure hundred footemen Italians: And standing betwene Pauia and Trumella beyond Thesin where he had an intencion to bestowe him selfe, it did not only cut the course of vittells from him, but also depriued the whole residue of tharmie: he had in short space made a breache, and the same day followed on with thassault, and being almost repulsed, many of his souldiours, holding all peril lesse then their vallour, tooke the water and swamme ouer the ditches, by whose example certaine bands of footemen of Iohn de Medicis did the like, with whom in one resolute aduenture they beganne to assaile it with suche furie, that their vertue vanquishing all resistance, they entred it by force making great slaughter of such as they founde within: afterwards the army approched S. Georges, and drew towards the parish of Cairo to goe to Sartirano, a towne of good strength and hath his scituacion vppon the hither shoares of Pavv in a place verie apt to hinder their vittells, and for the keeping whereof, were Hugh de Popoly and Iohn Biraguo with certeine horsemen, and six hundred footemen: Iohn of Vrbin who was sent thither with thartilleries, & a regiment of two thowsand footemen Spanyards, tooke first the towne, and then the rocke, making slaughter of the most part of the men that were within, & committing the Capteines prisoners.

The

The French men remoued their campe to ſuccour Sartirano, but beeing preuented by the diligence of their enemies, they ſtayed al their armie at Monce, after they were aduertiſed by the way what was hapned.

Neither had the affayres of the French men, better ſucceſſe in other places of the Duchie of Myllan: for, thoſe regiments of ſouldiours that were left within Millan, compelled to render the towne of Saint George which ſtandes aboue Monce, whoſe inhabitants conſtrained by the extorſion of the ſouldiers, had called home thoſe bands of footemen that were in Loda: Pavvle Luſaſquo, encowntring with certeine light horſemē of the French, put them to flight: And Federyk Boſſolo, being departed from Loda to ſet vppon Piſqueton, in place of the victorie, brought home wounds & hurts, beſides the loſſe of many of his men: Onely there were certeine light horſemen of the French who running vppe betwene Plaiſanca and Tortone, ſurpriſed a treaſor of foureteene thowſand duckats which was ſent to th Emprours armie.

Amyd theſe difficulties, th Admirall had two hopes, the one to haue the warre diuerted, and the other to be ſuccoured: for, the king had already cauſed to marche, foure hundred launces by the Mount Geuenera, to whome were to be ioyned tenne thowſand Svvizzers: Beſides, Ranſo de Cere led to the territorie of Bergama by the way of Valdeſaſina, fiue thowſand Griſons, who were to paſſe from thence to Loda to ioyne with Federyk Boſſolo, with whome were already many bands of Italian footemen: And laſtly th Admirall ſtoode firme in this perſwaſion, that th Emprour would be conſtrained for the ſewertie of Millan, to repaſſe the riuer of Theſin: Againſt theſe companies, the Duke of Millan ſent out Iohn de Medicis with fiftie men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and three thowſand footemen, And taking to him alſo a ſtrength of three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, & foure thowſand footemen of the Venetians, he drew neare the ennemies who were nowe come to the village of Crauina betweene the riuers of Adda and Brembo eight myles from Bergama: he ronne with one part of his people euen vp to the places where the Griſons were incamped, who the third daye after, complayning that they had not found at Crauina neither money for their payes, nor horſemen for their ſtrength, nor other bands of footemen promiſed by Ranſo de Cere, ſet them ſelues at libertie and returned to their contrey.

The diſcending of the Griſons being thus turned into a mounteine of ſmoke, Iohn de Medicis vſing thoccaſion of their retyring tooke Carauago, and afterwards paſſing Adda, he bet downe with his artilleries the bridge which the french had made at Bufaloro vppon Theſin: And thoſe townes that are betwene Millan and Theſin there was but Biagraſſa left in the power of the French: It was plentifully prouided of vittells, and garded with a ſtronge garriſon of a thowſand footemen vnder Ieronimo Caraciollo: But becauſe it hath his ſituacion vppon the great channell, & by that meane ſtoppeth the courſe of vittells which that channell is wont to bring in great plentie to Myllan, Frauncis Sforce ſent for Iohn de Medicis to come to him being followed with all the youth of Millan beſides his ordinarie bandes of ſouldiers: They ioyned their forces together, and went to beſeege it, And playing with their artilleries from Sunne riſing vntill Noone, he ſent the ſouldiours to thaſſalt, whoſe vallour being no leſſe to enter then the artilleries were furious to make breaches, they tooke it the ſame day with a ſinguler commendacion of Iohn de Medicis: In whom that day was not onely diſcerned a vertue excelling all the other ſouldiers, but alſo a grauitie, readines, and gouernment worthy of a right noble Capteine: ſo needefull is the preſence of a generall in any action of importance, and ſo conducible his example to carie the mindes of his ſouldiours to contemne all perill, and leaue nothing vndone that vallour, or reſolucion can finde out: Capteine Caraciollo was taken, and many of the footemen committed to the ſworde, beſides certeine companies which Iohn de Medicis put to the gibbet, for that they had run from him a litle before: The conqueſt of the towne, tooke from the caſtell all hope of ſuretie, and yeelding to the fortune of the towne, it was rendred, reſeruing the liues of them that were within: The people of Millan were vniuerſally glad for this ſucceſſe, but as there is no worldly bliſſe without his bale, & no proſperitie ſo abſolute which is not intangled with alteracion, ſo the aduerſitie that hapned by it was farre greater without compariſon, then their ioy, for that by tranſporting to Millan the ſpoyles and booties of Biagraſſa where the plague was, they brought wrapt vp in the packes of their welth & riches, the ſeedes of that peſtilent contagion, which ſpredde it ſelfe ſo vniuerſally ouer all complexions, that within few monethes, there dyed only in Millan, more then fiftie thowſand bodies.

But the force and ſtrength of the warre was on the other ſide Theſin, where th Admirall after the loſſe of Sartirano, and diſcerning thenemies to approch him of new, abandonned Mortaro, and retyred in two remoues, to Nouaro: his numbers were much diminiſhed, for that not onely many of his footemen, but alſo certeine of his men at armes, were ſtolen from the campe and returned into Fraunce: By which weakenes, the Admirall was driuen to temporiſe vntill the ſupplies of the Svvizzers were come, who were alreadie neare to Yurea and almoſt eight thowſand fighting bodies. On the other ſide, th Emperours Capteines ſtudying to ſtoppe their comming, and to reduce thennemies into difficultie of vittells, made them ſelues Lordes of the townes neare to Nouaro, making ſlaughter of thoſe vnhappie frenchmen which they found in garriſon: And after they had beſtowed within Verceil, certeine bands of ſouldiours, to defende the Svvizzers for entring there, they went to encampe at Biandra betwene Verceil and Nouaro in a place inuironned on all partes with ditches, trees, and waters, matters of great importance to the fortificacion of a place.

At laſt the Admirall vnderſtanding that the Svvizzers that had paſſed Yurea, were ſtayed a long the riuer of Steſia which they could not paſſe ouer for the great abundance of waters there, and deſirous to ioyne them to his armie, more to goe away in ſuretie, then to fight with thennemie, he went from Nouaro to lodge at Romagnia vpon the ſhoares of the ſame riuer: where, what by the want and neceſſitie of vittells, and the continuall diminucion of his men, he was driuen to build a bridge betwene Romagnia and Catinara: And on the other ſide, the ennemies, being come from Biandra to Briona, went to incampe within two myles of Romagnia: The frenchmen diſcerning vpon what ſtraite tearmes they ſtoode, brake vp and paſſed the riuer the daye following, when it was beleued, that if thennemies had bene carefull to watch their diſcamping, they had caried that day a moſt glorious and full victorie: But the Capteines being deuided in opinion and councell, ſome bearing a forward deſire to fight, and others to let them goe without charging them, their emulacions woulde not ſuffer them to vſe thoccaſion that was offered: It ſeemed alſo that the armie was not gouerned as apperteyned, for that as the Marquis of Piſquara onely, proceeding in all his actions with his accuſtomed vallour, ſeemed worthy in whom ſhoulde be reapoſed the whole direction of affaires, ſo there were others that bare enuie to his vertue, and they ſeeking to darken his glorie by detracting his doings, were content to put to hazard the whole eſtate of the warre, rather then to ioyne

them selues to his councels. But albeit the armie Imperiall was not in sufficient time aduertised of the discamping of the French men, yet after it was once knowen many light horsemen and many bands of footemen that passed the foard of the riuer without order, and without ensignes, following them with such diligence, that they ouertooke the rearegard and began to skirmish with it: And albeit the French men, somtimes fighting, and sometimes marching, receiued the charge and susteined it a long time, yet in the end being not able to flee with the same vallour wherwith they were followed, they were constrained to leaue on the place seuen peeces of their artilleries, a great proporcion of their municiõs, with no smal quantitie of vittels, & many of their horsemen & footemen put to the sword, besides the losing of many of their enseignes. The french men made as though they would incampe at Cattinaro which is within a mile of Romagnia, and vnder that semblance, they caused secretly to passe on their artilleries & baggage: But as thenemies who beleued they would incampe there, had begonne to retyre them selues, so they drewe to Rauisingua towards Yurea which is six miles further: The Imperialls without any impediment, incamped the same night vppon the riuer, which they passed immediatly vppon the rising of the Moone: But they were not followed of the Venetians, for that being entred vppon the lands of the Duke of Sauoye, they thought they had passed the bonds of confederacion, by the which they were bownd to no further matter then to the defence of the Duchie of Myllan: The French men marched with slow pase in battell aray, and had bestowed in the arearegard, the bands of Svvyzzers, by whome were repulsed the first horsemen and footemen that came in disorder to charge them: And albeit the French by this time were gon from Rauisingua about two miles, yet the Marquis of Pisquaira, ariuing with his light horsemen, they were eftsoones recharged, Not that they forbare notwithstanding to march, although Capteine Chabanes was slain, and Capteine Bayard made prisoner hauing a wound with a shot whereof he dyed within fewe dayes after: But the Marquis looking into the good order thennemies kept, and no lesse carefull not to follow his fortune further then good councell called him, notwithstanding many bands of souldiers were come to him, yet he thought not good to pursue thennemies further, both for that he was vnfurnished of artilleries, & had not with him but one part of tharmie: By which meane the French were deliuered of further troubles, & returned together with the Svvizzers to their houses, hauing left at Baury beyond Yurea, fiftene peeces of artilleries in the gard of three hundred Svvizzers and one of the Lordes of the contry: But those artilleries were no better preserued then the others, for that thEmprours Capteines hauing aduertisement of them, sent out to take them. After this the Victors deuided them selues into diuerse partes: The Duke of Vrbin was sent to Loda, and the Marquis of Pisquara to Alexandria, which two cities onely were holden for the king, for that Nouaro was rendred being fearefull of the Duke of Millan and Iohn de Medicis drawing thether with their forces: The Viceroy was appointed to goe against the Marquis of Rothelin who was come ouer the Mounts with foure hundred launces, Neuertheles assoone as he vnderstood of the fortune of the Admirall, and that he was retyred, he returned also into Fraunce, holding it vaine for him to followe further thenterprise when the principall forces were dispersed: Besides, Monsr de Boysy and Iulio Saint Seuerin to whom was committed the gard of Alexandria, made no resistance: In like sort Federyk, after he had demaũded respit of a fewe dayes to know if the Admirall were passed the Mountes, compownded to yeeld vp Loda, vppon the condicion that was accorded to them of Alexandria, to leade into Fraunce the bands of Italian foote-

men, who conteining a regiment of fiue thousande men, did speciall seruice to the King afterwardes: This was the end of the warre that was managed against the Duchie of Myllan vnder the gouernment of the Admiral of Fraunce: By the which, neither the kings power being much weakened, nor the rootes of harmes remooued, much lesse that so many calamities were cleane taken away, seeing they were but deferred to an other season, and Italy in the meane while remeining discharged of troubles present, but not of suspicion of further aduersities to come: And yet Themprour no lesse by the incitacion of the Duke of Burbon, then by the hope that the authoritie and name of that man might serue him to speciall purpose: Was of minde to transferre the warre into Fraunce, to the which also the King of Englande showed a readines and dispositicion.

In the beginning of this yeare, Themprour had sent his Camp to Fontarabie, a towne of verie smal circuit, standing vppon the debatable lands that deuide Fraunce from Spaine: And albeit the towne was very wel manned, and furnished with artilleries and vittelles, and leasure sufficient to them within to make it fortefied, yet the fortifications being ill made through the ignorance of the Frenche men, the towne laye open to the fury of thenemies, who heaping vppon the defendants one necessitie after an other, constrained them at last to giue it vp only with the safetie of their lyues. He was not satisfied with the recouerie of this place, but stretching his thoughtes further, he made his ambicion no lesse then his fortune, and in those conceites being raised to further enterprise, he kept no reckoning of the comfortes and authoritie of the Pope, who hauing sent in the beginning of the yeare, to Themprour, the Frenche King, and to the King of Englande to solicit a peace or a truse, he found their mindes very ill disposed to giue ouer the warre: For, the French king, consenting to a truse for two yeares, refused to make peace for the small hope he had to obteine thereby suche condicions as he desired: And the Emprour reiecting the truse, by the which was giuen good tyme to the Frenche King to reordeine his forces to folow a new warre, desired to haue peace. And touching the King of Englande, any sort of composicion that was offred to be made by the Popes meanes, was displeasing to him, as in whom was alwayes a desire that the treatie of thaccorde might bee wholly referred to him: To this he was induced by the ambicious counselles of the Cardinall of Yorke, who (seruing as a true example in our dayes of an immoderate pride) notwithstanding he was of very base condicion, and no lesse abiect for his parentes and discending, yet he was risen to suche an estate of authoritie and grace with the King, that in most of the actions of the realme, the kings wil seemed nothing without thapprobacion of the Cardinall: as of the contrary, what so euer the Cardinall did deliberate, was either absolute, or at least had very great force: But both the King and his Cardinall kept dissembled with the Emprour that thought, & by apparances showed a very forward inclination to moue warre against the realme of Fraunce which the King of Englande pretended lawfully to apperteyne to him: He grounded his claime vppon these reasons: King Edvvard the thirde, after the death of the Frenche King Charles the fourth called the faire, who dyed without issue male in the yeare of our saluacion 1328. and of whose sister the sayde King Edvvarde the third was borne: Made instance to be declared King of Fraunce as next heire male to the French king deceassed: Neuertheles he was put by by the generall Parliament of the realme wherein it was set downe, that by vertue of the lawe Salyke an auncient lawe of that kingdome, not only the persons of women were made vnable to the succession of the Crowne, but also all suche as discended and came of the women women line were excluded: But he not satisfied with this order brought in to take away his right, armed him selfe soone after, and taking vpon him the title of the king of Fraunce, he inuaded the realme with a mightie armie: And as in that action he obteined many victories both agaynst Phillip de Valois published by vniuersall consent lawfull succesor to Charles the fayre, and also agaynst king Iohn his sonne, who being ouerthrowne in battell, was ledde prisoner into England: So after long warres he forbare further to vex the realme, and making peace with the sayde Iohn, he reteined many prouinces and estates of the kingdome, and renounced the title of king of Fraunce: But after this composicion which was neither of long continuance, nor of great effect, the quarrell was eftsones renewed, and sometimes followed with long warres, and semetimes discontinued with tedious truces: vntill at laste king Henry the fift entring confederacie with Phillip Duke of Burgondy, who bare a minde estraunged from the Crowne of Fraunce for the murder done vpon Duke Iohn hys father, preuayled so muche agaynst Charles the sixt somewhat simple of vnderstanding, that he commaunded almost the whole kingdome together with the towne of Paris: And finding in that Citie the French king accompanied with his wife and the Lady Katherine his daughter, he tooke to wife the sayde Lady, and brought the king to consent (hauing no great vse of witte) that after his death the kingdome shoulde apperteine to him and to his heires, notwithstanding his sonne Charles did suruiue him: By vertue of which title, assone as he was dead, his sonne king Henry the sixte was solemnly crowned at Paris, and proclaymed king of Englande and Fraunce: And albeit, after the death of Charles the sixte, his sonne Charles the seuenth, by reason of great warres happning in Englande betweene the Lordes of the blood royall, had chased thEnglishe out of all that they helde in Fraunce except the towne and territories of Callice, yet the kinges of Englande dyd not leaue for all that to continue and vse the title of King of Fraunce. These causes might happly moue king Henry the eyght to the warre, the rather also for that he stoode more assured in his Realme then anye of his predecessours had done: for that the kinges of the house of Yorke (that was the name of one faction) hauing suppressed the kinges of the house of Lancaster (whiche was the other faction) and the partakers with the house of Lancaster seeing there was no more remayning of that house, raysed to the kingdome Henrye of Richemont for his proximitie and nearenes with them: Who after he had subdued hys aduersaries, to thende he might raigne with more suretie and with more authoritie, tooke to wyfe one of the daughters of Edvvarde the laste king but one of the house of Yorke: by whiche coniunction of houses, all the rightes and claymes of bothe the one and the other houses, were absolutelye and lawfully transferred into the person of king Henry the eyghte borne of that maryage: These houses for the enseignes and cognizanses that they bare, were called commonly the Redde rose and the VVhite rose.

But touching the mouing of the king of Englande to make warres in Fraunce, he was not so muche caryed by hope to winne the Realme of Fraunce by armes, for that he was not ignoraunt of the innumerable difficulties that woulde contende agaynst him, as he was importunatelye pushed on by the ambicious desire of the Cardinall of Yorke, who layde this plotte, that the long and tedious trauells and infinite necessities of the warre, woulde in the ende bring his king to be the onely arbitrator and appoynter of the peace: And knowing that the negociacion of it shoulde depende muche of his authoritie, he thought in one time both to make his name great through all the worlde, and also to enterteine hym-ſelfe in the good grace and lyking of the French king, to whom he ſhowed ſecretly to beare ſome good inclinacion: And therefore the king of Englande ſought not to binde him ſelfe to thoſe condicions whervnto it was neceſſarie he ſhould be bound if he had had a forwarde minde to ſo great a warre.

Thus Themperour was ſtirred vp to the warre by that occaſion, but much more by a hope, that through the fauour, authoritie, and popular opinion whiche the Duke of Burbon caryed in that kingdome, the commons of the realme would draw to commotion: And therfore notwithſtanding he was aduiſed by many of his firme and aſſured friends, that both for his want of money, which brings no ſmall impedimentes to enterpriſes, and for the doubt of his confederates whoſe fidelitie was vncertayne, he would giue ouer to beginne a warre ſo harde and intricate, and conſent that the Pope mighte treate vpon the ſurceaſing of armes: yet he capitulated with the king of Englande and Duke of Burbon in this ſorte: That the Duke ſhould enter the Realme of Fraunce with that parte of tharmie that was in Italie: And aſſone as he ſhould be ouer the Mountes, the king of Englande to paye an hundred thouſande duckets for the defraymentes of the firſt monthe of the warre: That it ſhould be in the election of the ſayd king eyther to continue this contribucion from monthe to monthe, or elſe to paſſe into Fraunce with a ſtrong armie to make warre from the firſte daye of Iulie vntill the ende of December: And in that caſe the countreys of Flaunders to furniſhe him of three thouſande horſe, a thouſande footmen, and ſufficient artilleries and munitions: That if the victorie fell to them, there ſhould be rendred to the Duke of Burbon all thoſe landes which the Frenche king had taken from him: That Prouence ſhould be transferred to him, to the which he already pretended by the reſignacion that was made after the death of Charles the eight, by the Duke of Lorreine, to Anne Ducheſſe of Burbon: That he ſhoulde holde it by the title of king of Prouence: That firſt he ſhould make an othe to the king of Englande as to the king of Fraunce, and do him homage, whiche if he did not perfourme, then this capitulacion to bee voyde: That the Duke of Burbon ſhoulde not treate nor practiſe nothing with the Frenche kinge withoute the conſent of them bothe: That thEmperour at the ſame tyme ſhoulde make warre on that ſyde towardes Spayne: Laſtely that thEmbaſſadours of thEmperour and the king of Englande ſhoulde procure the Potentates of Italie to bee concurrant with their money in this enterpriſe, to thende to be for euer aſſured agaynſt the warre of the Frenche: A matter whiche neuer ſorted to effect, for that the Pope did not onely refuſe to contribute, but blamed expreſly thenterpriſe, propheſying that not onely it would haue an yll ſucceſſe in Fraunce, but alſo it would be the cauſe to returne the warre agayne vpon Italie, and that with a greater puiſſance and perill then before.

The Duke of Burbon refuſed conſtantlye to acknowledge the king of Englande for kinge of Fraunce: And albeit after the confederacion was made, he gaue counſayle to marche with the armie towardes Lyon, to thende to drawe neare hys owne landes and Countreys: yet it was reſolutely determined, that he ſhoulde paſſe into Prouence, both for that Themperour ſhoulde with more facilitie ſende him ſuccours out of Spayne, and alſo to bee more apte to take the ſeruice and oportunitie of the armie by ſea which was in preparing at Genes by the commaundement and with the money of Themperour. The Marquis of Piſquairo was declared capteine generall for Themperour in this warre, for that he coulde not be brought to obey the Duke of Burbon: The plotte and proceedinges of this expedi-

expedicion were, that the Duke of Burbon and with him the Marquis, shoulde passe to Nice, and yet with forces farre lesse then such as were appoynted, for that where, to the forces they had already with them which was fiue hundred men at armes, eyght hundred light horsemen, foure thowsande footemen Spanyardes, three thowsande Italyans, and fiue thowsande launceknightes, there shoulde haue bene ioyned three hundred men at armes of the armie in Italy, and fiue thowsande other launceknightes: these laste companies fayled to come for want of money, And the Viceroy kept reteyned the men at armes for the garde of the contrey, hauing no meane to wage newe companies of footemen according to the resolucion sette downe in the firste councells, to thende to make heade agaynst Michaell Angeo Marquis of Salusse, who beeing departed from his estate, kept vppon the Mounteines with a thowsande footemen: There was added to this that thEmprours armye at sea (one of their principall hopes) beeing guyded by Don Hugo de Mocado, A man of muche malice and wickednes of life and a creature of the Duke Valentynois, appeared farre inferior to the nauie of the Frenche king, which beeing parted from Marseilles, was stayed in the port of Villefrancho. Neuertheless thEmperours armye entred into Prouence where were Monsr de la Palissa, Capteyne Fayetto, Ranso de Cere, and Pederyk Bossolo, All Capteynes of the French kinge, and were nowe withdrawen into townes, for that they were not stronge enoughe to make heade in the fielde: One parte of the armye drewe alonge the sea side, and tooke the tower that commaundeth the port of Tovvlon, where were taken two Canons that were drawen to the armye: Besides, the towne of Aix, whiche for his authoritie and for that the parlyament is there resident, is one of the chiefe townes of Prouence, was rendred, whose example drewe with it many other townes of the contreye: The Duke of Burbon in whome was no lesse emulacion then vallour, desiered that from Aix, the armye might marche further leauing the sea side, Wherein he perswaded that seeking to passe the ryuer of Rhosne, there might bee loste no tyme to enter deeper into the bodye and intralls of Fraunce, whileste the kinges prouisions were yet but weake and not confirmed: for, by reason the kinge was consumed of treasor and money, the men at armes of Fraunce had suffered muche and were very ill payed, and also not expecting that his ennemies would passe out of Lombardye into Fraunce, his forces and companyes of men of warre were falne into that disorder that they coulde not bee readdressed with suche speede: Besides, the kinge hauing no confidence in the vallour of the footemen of his owne kingdome, was constrayned before he coulde marche into the fielde, to tarye for the comming of certeyne footebandes of the Svvyzzers and launceknightes: during which exspectacion, as the Duke of Burbon thought he shoulde be able to doe some matter of importance in passing ouer Rhosne, so the Marquis of Pisquairo with the other Spanishe Capteines were of an other aduise: They desiered that bothe for the oportunitie of the sea, and to satisfie thintencion of thEmprour, Marseilles might bee conquered, A hauen moste conuenient to vexe the Realme of Fraunce with sea armyes, and also no lesse apt to passe in sauetye out of Spayne into Italie: These Capteynes what by thauthoritye of their multitude, and thefficacye of their reasons, so preuayled agaynste the will of the Duke of Burbon, that they pytched their campe before Marseilles, wherein was newely entred Ranse de Cere with those bandes of footemen which had beene ledde into Fraunce from Alexandria and Loda: They laye fortye dayes before Marseilles without dooinge anye exployte of marke or memorie: And albeit they executed the walles in many places with their artilleries, and not preuayling with batteries labored to worke their entrie by myning, yet they founde obiected many difficulties, and their great labors resisted bothe by the fortune and fortification of the towne: they had contending agaynst their industrie, the strength of the wall bearing an auncient forme and building: The vallour of the defendants moste resolute in the quarrell of their libertie: The disposicion of the people, bearing greate deuocion to the name of the Frenche king, and very hatefull to the glorye of the Spanyardes: And lastely the hope of succours aswell by sea as lande, for that the Frenche kinge was comen to Auignon, (A citye of the Popes, standing vppon the riuer of Rhosne) where he assembled with greate diligence, A mightie armie: Moreouer want of money beganne to fall vppon thEmprours Capteines, and their hopes no lesse diminished that the Frenche king beeing inuaded in other places woulde bee letted to conuert to one onely part, all his forces and prouisions: for that the king of England notwithstanding he had sent to the Duke of Burbon Maister Richard Pase, did both refuse to paye the hundred thowsande duckats for the seconde moneth, And also made slender showes to moue warre in Piccardye: No, hauing receiued into Englande Iohn Ioachin de Spetio whome the Frenche king had sent to him, and also the Cardinall of Yorke making straunge aunswers to thEmprours Embassadors, he gaue the Duke greate occasion bothe to doubt and distrust him: And touching Spaine and thexspectacion there, the powers and forces did not aunswer the willes of men nor the promisses that were made: The reason was, for that the Courtes of Castillo (so are called the congregacions of the Deputies assembled in the name of the whole kingdom) had refused to ayde thEmprour with foure hundred thowsand duckats, A contribucion which they are wont to make both in the great neede of their king, and vppon any action of importance: by which occasion there could no money be sent to the armie that was in Prouence, & much lesse any leauie of men made against the french king in the frontyers of Spaine, other then very weake, and not worthy to beare reckoning: So that the imperiall Capteines, bothe dispairing to sacke Marseilles, and also fearing to ronne into some greater daunger when the king shoulde approche, brake vppe their campe the same daye that the king sette from Auignon with his whole armie, hauing also marching with him a regiment of six thowsand Swvizzers.

The same reasons that moued thimperiall Capteines to leauie their seege from before Marseilles, caried them also to turne their faces towards Italy: And as in men there is nothing more violent then the passion of feare, whose mocions are swifter then the winges of the winde, so in thimperialls was seene no lesse diligence to hasten into Italie: then to breake vp their seege, showing one care to preuent the perill that might fall vppon them, if either all or parte of the French kinges armie, should encownter them in the contry of thennemie: And on the other side, the king saw a faire occasion offered to recouer his Duchie of Millan, what by the puissance of the armie he had leauied, by the fidelitie of his Capteines, by the plentie of his prouicions, by thintelligence he had of the weakenes of his ennemies, and lastly by his hope that taking the neareste waye he shoulde bringe his armie into Italye affore those that went from Marseilles: In which estate and aduauntage of thinges, he determined to ioyne industrie to the present oportunitie, and to followe the benefit that fortune presented to him: he imparted this resolucion with all the Capteines of tharmie, to whome he declared that as he had vowed in him

selfe an irreuocable promise to passe in person into Italie, so whosoeuer woulde rise vp to councell him the contrarie, muche lesse that he would graunt him audience, seeing he would not forbeare to holde him in ill opinion and affection: That therefore euerie one shoulde goe to his charge, and shewe the same will to execute thenterprise, which they had done to consult and to conclude it: That God who was a louer of iustice, and thinsolencie and rashinesse of thennemies, had at last layed open a meane to reconquer that that had bene violentlie rauished from him against lawe, equitie, and reason: That they had to doubt no more of the victorie, then for his parte, he distrusted their vallours, for that God doth alwayes accompanie an innocent cause with a happie successe: To these wordes was correspondent, both his constancie in deliberacion, and his celeritie in execucion, for that he commaunded immediatlie his armie to marche, wherein were two thowsande launces and twentie thowsande footemen: He tooke a contrarie waye because he woulde not meete with the Ladie Regent his mother, who was come from Auignion to debate with him not to passe the mountes in person, but to performe the warre in Italie by his Capteynes: He gaue order to Ranso de Cero to furnishe his gallies with those bandes of footemen which he had at Marceilles: And to auoyde all practises and negociacions of peace, or at least that he somewhat distrusted the Pope, he forbad to passe further thArchbishoppe of Capua that was dispatched to him and so to goe to thEmperour: He sent him worde to tarie for him at Auignon in the Court of his mother and negociate with him by letters, or else to returne againe to the Pope: So firmelie had he fixed his minde vppon the warre, that nothing was more hatefull to him then to heare speake of peace, against the which he had cloased his eares and shutte vp all inclinacion: And in that resolucion he followed the ennemies in the meane while with the greatest diligence he coulde: But they making small reckoning of the harmes and domages which the peasantes did to them, marched alwayes in good order along the sea side: At last they gotte to Monaco, and there they brake into peeces their artilleries, which for more facilitie of cariage, they laded their Mulets withall: As soone as they came to Finalo they vnderstoode with what haste the king marched after, which made them double their pase to thende to bee hable in good season to defende the Duchie of Myllan, wherein were not remeyning forces sufficient to make resistance.

The frenche king determineth to passe the mountes and to follow the ennemie.

Thus both the one and thother armie drawing towardes Italie, the same daye that the frenche king came to Verceill, the Marquis of Pisquairo arriued at Albo with the horsemen and bandes of Spanishe footemen, beinge followed one dayes iorney behinde by the Duke of Burbon and the Launceknightes: The Marquis not takinge leasure to pawse, or scarcelie to breathe, went the daye followinge from Albo to Voginero being fortie myles distant, to the ende he might the next daye gette into Pauya: And there he ioyned his forces with the Viceroy who was come thither from Alexandria, for the garde of which towne he had lefte a strength of two thowsande footemen: This was in a tyme when the frenche armie beganne to drawe fast vppon the shoares of the riuer Thesin, their diligence in marching being farre swifter then was the opinion of thenemies: In this place they consulted with Ieronimo Moron of the estate of their common affaires wherein their first deuise was, that leauing sufficient garrison within Pauia, they should dispose all their forces to the defense of Millan, according to the obseruacion and custome of the other warres: In this councell, it was set downe that Moron should goe thither forthwith to make prouision for things necessarie, and the Duke of Millan to follow him whome they had sent for: And they with their companies marched the right way to Millan, after they had left within Pauia, Anthonie de Leua with three hundred men at armes, fiue thowsand footemen being all Spanyards except certeine launce-knights: But such was the desolacion within Millan, that being still afflicted with the great plague that had runne thorowe the towne all the sommer, the Citie was sore shaken and litle remeyning of the former apparance and countenaunce: The sickenes had consumed infinite numbers of the people and bodies of good seruice, and many had abandonned the Citie to auoyde that mortall perill of their liues: it conteyned suche prouisions of vittells as it was wont to doe: The meanes to taxe and leauie money beganne to growe hard and desperate: And touching the fortificacions, the aduersity of the sickenes had taken away all care and remembrance of them, yea through the negligence of that time, al the bulwarkes and rampiers lay reuersed to the grounde: Suche are the domages of an vniuersall negligence, which euen amidde perills that be manifest and apparaunt, takes awaye the studie of thinges that most concerne sauetie and defense: And yet albeit the townes men and popular inhabitauntes, expressed no want of readinesse to laye them selues downe to all daunger and suffer all trauell whatsoeuer: Yet Moron iudging by the present estate and desolacion of the towne, that to enter with an armie, woulde be more to the ruine then to the defense of the Citie, tooke an other councell, which he published in the presence of a greate assemblie of the townesmen in this manner of speaches: We may say nowe and with the same perturbacion of minde, the like wordes which our Sauiour Christ powred out in the middest of his perplexities: Truely the spirite is readie, but the flesh is weake: I knowe that in you wanteth not the same affection which hath alwayes caried you to honor, obey, and defende your Lorde Frauncis Sforce: And I am not ignoraunt, that in him doe make right deepe impressions the calamities and daungers of his deare people, for whose sauetie as I knowe he wanteth no inclinacion to offer vp his life and all his mortall estate, so in your faces I discerne an vniuersall readinesse to recompense him with the same compassion: But what anayleth it to be resolute where fortune hath made greater the perills and daungers, then either reason or nature can make assured the hope, and howe vainely is employed that fidelitie which is not accompanied with his due respectes to time, place, and propertie of thinges: I see your forces are nothinge aunswerable to your good willes and inclinacions, for that your towne is made naked of people, your treasories drayned of money, your stoare houses consumed of vittells, and your fortificacions reduced to extreame ruine, matters that of them selues doe offer the frenche men to enter without that you shall neede to beate open your gates or posternes: It brings no litle greefe to the Duke to be cõstrayned to leaue you abandonned, but it woulde bee more greeuous to him then death, if in seeking to defende you he should leade you to your last ruine and desolacion: In so great a face and multitude of euills, it is holden for good discression to make election of the least, & not to doubt of better seeing it is geuen to mortall men to hope for all things and to dispaire in nothing: In matters of perill it is no shame to flee, when the fleeing profiteth him that giueth place to his aduersarie, for this reason the Duke aduiseth you to obey necessitie and giue place to the fortune of the frenche king, reseruing your remedies for a better time which we can not but hope will happen for your speedie restoring: To giue place to necessitie and followe the lawe of tyme, is an office duly apperteining to wise men: For the present, the Duke will neither abandon him ſelfe,nor giue you ouer in tyme to come: Make your ſorowes no greater then is the qualitie of your loſſe, and frame your myndes apte to receiue this conſolacion,that tyme triumpheth ouer all the aduerſities of the world: You ſee your cauſe is iuſt, the power of Themprour mightie,his fortune incredible, and your enemies no other men then ſuche againſt whom your vallours haue ſo oftentymes preuailed: God will beholde your pietie towards the Duke, and his compaſſion towardes his countrey: With him are layde vp the iſſues of warres, & in his ſight is farre more acceptable the innocencie of your cauſe, then the might of your aduerſarie: Laſtly I wiſh you all to remeine thus reſolute, that ſuffring for a good end that which our preſent neceſſitie doeth conſtraine vs vnto, that mightie God whoſe rule goeth thorow all, will take to him ſelfe the reuenge of our proude enemies, & by a glorious victorie,redeeme vs from thoſe afflictions which we haue ſuffred ſo long in his ſight.

After theſe wordes,he diſmiſſed the aſſembly, and cauſing vittells to be put within the Caſtle,he iſſued out of the towne.

The Duke not knowing any thing of that which Moron had done at Millan,tooke his way to go thether: But immediatly after he was come out of Pauya, he met with Ferrand Caſtriot hauing the conduit of thartillerie, who ſignifying to him that part of thenemies were paſſed Theſin, and that they had ouerthrowen Capteine Succhar a Burgougnon with his light horſmen vppon the ſhoares of the Ryuer, he returned to Pauya fearing to finde ambuſhes and impediments in the way: And albeit the Duke and Moron had proceeded with ſinceritie in theſe cauſes, yet the Emprours Capteines who were with the armie at Binaſquo, being ielous leaſt they had ſecretly contracted with the Frenche King, ſent to Myllan Capteine Alarcon with two hundred Launces, either to folowe him or to lye ſtill according to thaduertiſementes that ſhould bee giuen: He was no ſooner aryued there, then the people who were alreadie compounded with certeine exiles that negociated in the kings name, began to take hart and to publiſhe the name of Themprour and Frauncis Sforce: But Captein Alarcon, waighing with the litle hope that remeined of defence, the nearenes of the French Vawwarde which was then at hande, iſſued out of the gate called Rome gate and tooke the way to Loda, whether was alſo marched the whole armie: This was at the ſame tyme that thenemies began to enter by the gates of Theſin and Verceill, who,if they had not turned towards Millan, but put vppon them the chaſe and purſuing of Themprours armie both being weary with marching, and hauing loſt many of their men at armes and horſſes, it was beleeued for certeine that they had put the armie to the ſhocke and defeated with facilitie the forces which affore they feared: And moreouer, if after they were approched to Myllan,t hey had with the ſame diligence drawne towardes Loda,either Themprours Capteines would not haue dared to ſtaye there, or at leaſt paſſing with diligence the Ryuer of Adda,they had with the ſame fortune and facilitie,put to diſorder the reſidue of thenemies: But the king who happlie ſuppoſed it a matter of great importance to eſtabliſh and aſſure at his deuocion, Myllan a towne which had made the moſt principall reſiſtance agaynſt him, or happlie being caryed with ſome other cauſe, he did not only draw to the citie of Myllan wherein he would not enter nor ſuffer the armie to enter, but ſtaied to beſtow in it ſufficient garriſon,and to giue direction for beſeeging the Caſtle wherein were ſeuen hundred Spaniſhe footemen: He forbadde, to the great praiſe of his modeſtie and clemencie, that no diſpleaſures ſhould be done to thinhabitants, ſeeking by that inſinuacion to reduce a people whome he ſawe vntractable by all other meanes after he had publiſhed his directions at Millan, he turned his armie towards Pauia, not holding it conuenient for the eſtate of his affayres, to leaue behinde his backe a Citie wherein were ſo many ſouldiors: The king had in his armie (reckning thoſe that remayned at Millan) two thouſande launces, eight thouſande launce-knightes, ſix thouſand Svvizzers, ſixe thouſand forerīders or aduenturers, and foure thouſand Italians: The number of theſe laſt encreaſed muche afterwardes.

About this time, the Marquis of Piſquaro was got within Loda with two thouſand footemen: And the Viceroy hauing reuitteled the townes of Alexandria, Coma, and Treſſa, was entred into Sonzin: with him entred Frauncis Sforce and Charles Burbon, who amidde ſo many difficulties and diſtreſſes drewe to them ſome courage by the going of the king to Pauia: They thought to readdreſſe their companies if the defence of that Citie would giue them libertie: and to that purpoſe they ſent into Germanie to leauie ſixe thouſand footemen, with the payes of whom and other expenſes neceſſarie, there was prouiſion made with the fiftie thouſande duckets whiche themperour had ſent to Genes, to employe them in the warres of Prouence: But the thing that gaue chiefe impediment to their counſells, was the neceſſitie and wante of money which they ſuffred: For, neyther had they meane to drawe any out of the Duchie of Millan, and leſſe hope to obteine of the Emperour for his diſhabilitie, any other matter then a commiſſion to offer to be ſolde at Naples the moſte of the reuenues of the kingdome: And touching their auncient confederates, they exſpected none at all or very little relieſe neyther of money nor men: for that as the Pope and Florentins ioyntly being ſued vnto for ſome contribucion of money, gaue them nothing but generall wordes and hopes more hurting then curing their calamities: So the Pope alone, who after the Admirall was gone out of Italie, ſtoode reſolutely fixed not to intangle himſelfe further in the warres betweene themperour and the French king, would neuer renew the confederacion made with his predeceſſor, nor contract newe leagues with any prince: And whiche more is, notwithſtanding he declared himſelfe inclined to themperour and the king of England, yet he had made a ſecrete promiſe affore to the French king, not to be any impediment to him in the recouery of his duchie of Millan: Moreouer when the Venetians were required by the Viceroy to furniſhe thoſe bandes of ſouldiors which they were bounde vnto by the capitulacions of the league, albeit they did not flatly refuſe them, yet their aunſwers were but colde and conteyned ſmall hope: Their intencion was to accommodate their counſells according to the trayne and proceeding of things, wherein they were caryed by one of theſe reaſons: eyther for that in many of them was renewed the memorie of their auncient alliance with the French king, or elſe they iudged that he could not but remayne victorious in regarde of his vallour, his fortune, but ſpecially the mightie forces he brought into Italie agaynſt enemies of ſo ſlender preparacion and worſe prouiſion: or laſtely for that themperours ambicion was more ſuſpected to them then before, for that he had not inueſted Fraūcis Sforce in the Duchie of Millan, A matter which the ſtates of Italie did no leſſe maruell at then grieuouſly complayne vpon: In this maner of doing alſo they were muche caryed by the authoritie of the Pope, to whoſe counſells and example they bare no ſmall reſpect in thoſe tymes.

The French king made his approach to Pauia on the lower ſide betwene the ryuer of Theſin, and the waye that leadeth to Millan: And after he had incamped his vauntgarde within the ſuburbes of S. Anthonie beyonde Theſin vpon the waye that goeth to Genes, he beſtowed himſelfe in the Abbey of S. Lanfrank which is within a myle myle of the walles: There he drewe into consideracion all the wayes that could be deuised for the exployte of the towne, eyther howmuche the situacion did helpe, or what might be hoped for by the industrie of men, whiche partes were weakest for want of fortification, and howe to leauye the difficulties where were showes of resistance, yea he made a counsell with his Capteines of all things tending to suche a seruice: and after resolucion set downe, he aduaunced his artilleries, with the which for two dayes together he battred the walles in two places, and afterwardes raunging his armie into araye of battell, he began to giue thassault: But in the very firste charge he caused eftsones to sounde the retraite, both finding the rampiers within very strong and furnished, and the assurance and vallour of the defendantes resolute and singuler, and also discerning in his owne souldiors manyfest signes of feare by the spectacle of their felowes slayne in the charge: With this also he considered howe harde it would be to take by assalt, a towne that had for her defence so many braue men of warre, so many naturall impedimentes, so many artificiall difficulties, and lastely so plentifully prepared of all those things which eyther experience, industrie, or counsell could prouide, that there was nothing wanting which might be made for the helpe of their daunger, nor nothing vsed to their helpe which was not hurtfull to thenemie: Therefore he deuised to cast trenches and plotformes, wherin he employed the labor of a great nũber of pyeners, by whose working he sought to cut of the flanks, to giue more suretie to his souldiors when they should approch: And as to his desire to cary the towne, there was wanting no will to followe thexployte with charges and exspences, so albeit the worke was long and harde, yet he caused to make mynes in many places, hoping to preuayle by that engine, though in all other wayes should fall out imperfection or errour: The ryuer there about two myles aboue Pauya separates it selfe into two armes or hornes, and carying his streame of one violence and swiftnes somewhat belowe the towne, he meeteth in one agayne affore he fall into Pavv: The king deuiseth to take the oportunitie of this ryuer, wherein vsing the counsell of diuerse engenistes and water workemen skilfull in the course of the streame, he determined to turne that arme of the ryuer that passeth on that side to Pauia, and to make it fall into the lesser whiche they call Graualone: his hope was to preuayle with greater facilitie on that side, for that the wall by reason of his suretie which the depth of the water did giue, was not any way rampiered: The number of the defendantes was so great aboue his exspectacion, and their mindes so resolute in vallour and fidelitie, that he had no confidence of the victorie by any other meane then this: which made him consume many dayes in that worke, no lesse great for the labour employing multitudes of men, then grieuous for thexspences, drawing with it many extraordinary charges. The townesmen could not but be fearefull to see such a worke raysed to do them harme, and yet subduing through a setled confidence those mocions that made them tymerous, the vertue of their mindes brought them to contemne the thing that their nature and flesshe made them to distrust and doubt: But suche was the violent working of the water being muche encreased by certayne great raynes and landfluddes that were falne, that it began to reuerse the trenches and sluces which were made in the channell where the ryuer was deuided to force the course of the water to enter into the lesser arme: And albeit the kings hopes made him both to recontinue the worke, and to thinke to be hable to surmount the violence of the streame with the force of men and money, yet in the ende experience gaue him to knowe, that the force of a water carying a violent course can do more then eyther the trauell of men, orinduſtrie of engeniſtes: The priuacion of this hope, together with the difficulties that were deſerned to carie the towne by force, dryue the king to a newe counſell, wherin he determined to continue the ſiege, with the long tract and continuance wherof, he was not without hope to reduce the defendantes into neceſſitie of rendring.

During theſe preparacions and actions, the Pope hearing of the taking of Millan, was not a litle moued with the fortunes and happie beginnings of the Frenche: And therefore amidde ſuche alteracion of things, he ſtudied to aſſure his proper affayres, diſpatching for the ſame occaſion to the French king, Gianniatteo Giberto Biſhop of Verona, who was of no leſſe fidelitie and confidence with the Pope, then gracious and acceptable to the French king: he had in charge to go firſt to Sonzin to induce the Viceroy and the other capteines to peace, cõmunicating with them his legacion to the king for the ſame cauſe: But finding them recomforted by the reſiſtance of Pauia, and no leſſe aſſured in the hope of their proper vallour, they made him a braue anſwere, that they had no deuocion to any compoſicion which ſhould giue to the king any one foote of lande in the Duchie of Millan: He founde in the king a like, or happly a more hard diſpoſicion, rayſing his hart into high hopes both by the greatnes of his armie, and alſo for the good meanes he had to continue it and encreaſe it, A fundacion wherevppon he aſſured principally his paſſage into Italie, & not vnder a ſimple hope to preuent his enemies, notwithſtanding he would ſay, that in effect it was already ſucceeded to him: The king noriſhed in himſelfe an aſſured hope to carie Pauia, which he battred with a continuall fury and execution of his artilleries: This hope was eſpecially grounded vpon the workes which he caſt about the walles, ſuche as he was aſſured coulde not be troubled by thenemies for the want which they had of munitions, A matter eaſie to be deſerned by the little number of ſhottes which they made: He ſawe alſo into their penurie of vittells and breade, and was not without hope alſo to be hable in time to turne the ſtreame of Theſin, an action ſpecially importing thaduauncement of his victorie: And eſteming the conqueſt of Millan and Genes a recompence farre vnworthy thexſpenſes he had made, and a rewarde too ſimple for ſo great a glory, he rayſed his minde to higher thoughts, & in that ambiciõ deuiſed to inuade the kingdome of Naples, holding nothing the hardnes of thenterpriſe in regard of his fortune & glory, & more contemning the perill then well examining the partes and circumſtances of it: But after all this, the principall cauſe of the Biſhops legacion was debated betweene them, and brought foorth effect with very litle difficultie: both for that the Pope bounde himſelfe not to giue agaynſt the king any ſuccours eyther ſecret or manifeſt, in whiche couenant the Florentins did alſo communicate: And alſo the king receiued into his protection the Pope and the Florentins, comprehending eſpecially thauthoritie which the famulie of Medicis had within Florence: It was agreed that this accorde ſhould not be publiſhed but at ſuche time as ſhould ſeeme beſt to the Pope: Neuertheleſſe, albeit it came not for the preſent to the knowledge of themprours Capteines, yet they entred dayly more and more into ielouſie of the Pope: and therfore to be fully made aſſured of the certentie of his intention, they diſpatched to hym Martin Abbot of Nagero Commiſſary of the campe: his commiſſion was to propounde to the Pope at one time, both hope and feare: for of the one part they made him offer of very great'things, and of the other they gaue him to vnderſtande, that if themperour and the king came to the vttermoſt contencion, themperour coulde not but holde for enemies and agaynſt him, ſuche as ſtoode in ſhowe of newters and indifferent: But the Pope anſwered, that nothing could be leſſe ſeeming to him,

his eſtate, and place, then to giue ouer newtralitie in a time when warres ranne betwene Chriſtian Princes, both for that the office of a paſtour did ſo require it, and alſo ſtanding a newter, he might with a greater authoritie interpoſe in the action of peace: of the parts and couenants whereof, he treated at the ſame time with th Emperour, at whoſe Court ſince the taking of Millan, was arriued th Archbiſhoppe of Capua, to whom the Ladie Regent had giuen paſſeport to go from Lyon into Spayne: Where, after he had with the ſame reaſons excuſed the Pope in that he would not renue the league, a matter wherein th Emperour did inſtantly require him when he vnderſtoode the king drewe towardes Italie, he tolde him that in making peace or truſe, he ought to lay aſide armes: But that which wrought in th Emperour an inclinacion to accord, was the difficulties wherein he ſaw his armie reduced, the ſlender meanes he had to make leauies of money to releeue the affaires of Italie, the full felicitie which followed the frenche king, and the ſuſpicion that he had leaſt the king of England had ſecretly contracted with his ennemie: he grounded that icalouſie vpon this reaſon, that not only he refuſed to ſende to tharmie that was in Lombardye the fiftie thowſand duckats, for the which notwithſtanding he had giuen order, and prouided at Rome for the warre of Prouence: But alſo he demaunded of th Emperour (ſuffering ſo great neceſſitie) both reſtitucion of the money he had lent him, and alſo preſent payment of all ſuch ſummes as he was bound vnto: for, th Emperour ſince his paſſing into Spaine hauing a great deſire of coniunction with the king of England, and the better to remoue al difficulties that might hold him in ſuſpence, bound him ſelfe to pay him that penſion which he had yearely of the frenche king, and to aunſwere twentie thowſande duckats for the penſions which the frenche king payed to the Cardinall of Yorke and others, together with thirtie thowſande duckats payable to Queene Blanche the widow of king Levvis: of all which ſummes he had made no payment till that day: Neuertheleſſe th Emperour amidde ſo many aduerſities, made anſwere that it was not a matter agreeing with his dignitie, to make any conuencion ſo long as the french king lay vexing with armes and hoſtilitie the Duchie of Millan: This was his aunſwere no leſſe reſolute then worthie ſuche a greatnes of minde, being notwithſtanding no leſſe afflicted in thought and ſpirite, then verie ill diſpoſed of his perſon and bodie, being falne into a feuer quartine, either for the diſpleaſure he had conceiued when the difficulties to take Marceilles began to appeare, or for that his minde ill diſpoſed to giue place to thennemie, was not naturally made tractable by any difficulties, or for that he had a firme confidence in the vertue of his armie if once they came to the battell, or laſtly for that he promiſed to him ſelfe, that hereafter the fauors of fortune would follow him with as full a gale, as they had done in times paſt.

The fr. king ſendeth the Duke of Albanie into the realme of Naples.

The frenche king during theſe actions, had determined to inuade the realme of Naples, hoping that the importance of that kingdom would moue the Viceroy either to abandon Millan, or at leaſt ſurceſſe armes vpon ill condicions: a thing which the king began to deſire for the difficulties he ſaw to obteyne Pauia, and for that expedicion it was ſette downe, that Iohn Stuard Duke d'Albanie, iſſued of the blood of the kings of Scotland, ſhould marche to the realme of Naples with two hundred launces, ſix hundred light horſemen, and foure thowſand footemen: Theſe to be drawne out of tharmie, the one halfe to be Italians, foure hundred Svvizzers, and the reſidue launceknightes: And for the more glorie of the expedicion and ſurety of the victory, Ranſo de Cere was appointed to ioyne with them, and to deſcende at Lyuorna with thoſe bandes of footemen that were leauied for the armie at ſea, which for the difficultie of neceſſary prouiſions, was yet within the baye of Villefranco: he had alſo ſent directions to the ſame Ranſo and the Vrſins, to wage foure thouſande footemen in the countrey of Rome: This deliberation the French king ſignified to the Pope by his Embaſſador Alberto Earle of Carpy, by whom he required the Pope of ſuffrance to leauye bands of footemen at Rome, and to conſent to paſſage for his army through the Church dominion: This demaund brought no litle griefe to the Pope, to whom it could not but be intollerable that together with the Duchie of Millan, the crowne of Naples ſhould diuolue to the French king: But looking into the ſtate of the tyme, and leſſe hardie to make open refuſall of the kinges demaunde, he aduiſed him only by waye of counſell, not to embrace as yet that enterpriſe, and not to driue him to that neceſſitie not to accorde to him that which for many iuſt regardes he could not conſent vnto: Wherein he occupied with him this wiſe diſcourſe to proue the action to be agaynſt his proper weale and profite: That if in tymes paſt the deſire to reconquer the Duchie of Millan had ſtirred vp ſo many enemies, muche more would it moue in thoſe dayes, and in that eſtate of affayres, when the world diſcerned that he aſpired manifeſtly to the kingdome of Naples: That there was great peril leaſt ſuche an ambicion would drawe the Venetians to take armes for themprour, and to paſſe the bondes of their confederacion: That he had to conſider, that if hys affayres founde any difficultie in Lombardie, the warre would procede with ſmall reputation in the realme of Naples: That if his warres and armies ſuffred declinacion in eyther of theſe two places, it would be a materiall cauſe to bring foorth diminucion to both: That laſtely he ſhould remember what offices he had commended in him in putting vpon him a minde requiſite in a Pope, and that therefore it was not conuenient to compell him nowe to doe the contrarie. But this diſcourſe was made in vayne, for that the Duke d'Albanie, not attending for other aunſwere, and withall halfe aſſured of the Popes conſent, paſſed the ryuer of Pavv at the paſſage of Stellato which is in the duchie of Millan: And yet the fifte day after, he turned backe agayne by direction from the king, who vnderſtanding that the launceknightes began already to ariue, and that the duke of Burbon was gone to wage more, thought beſt to reſerue with him ſelfe his whole armie vntill his campe were poſſeſſed of the newe ſupply of Svvizzers and Griſons which he had ſent to leauye. In this meane while were made many ſhowes and demonſtrations of armes, though no action of importance was performed by neyther partie. The king continued the ſiege before Pauia working continually at the trenches, and watching to vexe them within with his artilleries: And the Imperialls ſtoode quiet, exſpecting the returne of the Duke of Burbon: Onely the Marquis of Piſquairo, vpon whoſe prouidence and vallour depended for the moſt part the counſels and executions of the whole affayres, iſſued one night out of Loda with two hundred horſmen and two thouſand footmen: with which ſtrength he ſurpriſed the towne of Melzo being negligently garded by Ieronimo and Iohn Fermo Triuulco with two hundred horſemen, and in the action tooke priſoners all the capteins with the moſt part of their ſouldiors, of whom Ieronimo died not many dayes after of a blow which he receiued in fight. By this were ariued in the kings campe the bands of Svvizzers and Griſons, by reaſon of whoſe comming the Duke d'Albanie repaſſed agayne the ryuer of Pavv at Stradello vpon the contrey of Plaiſanca: from which inclinacion the Pope was not hable to turne the king, not that he did what he could, but happly ſolicited it with very colde inſtance, for feare to make him enter into ſuſpicion: And therefore he thought it nowe time both to manifeſt to thimperialls the couenantes he had made with him before, and alſo to renew the mention of thaccord; hoping that no lesse the difficultie to obteine Pauia, then the daunger of the kingdome of Naples would make eyther partie lesse obstinate and lesse hard to embrase thaccord: To those endes he sent Paule Vettorio to the Viceroy to signifie to him, that notwithstanding the meanes and mediations he had vsed, yet he could neuer diuert the french king frō his purpose to inuade the realme of Naples: and that (as touching his owne particular, least he should pull vpon himselfe the warre which he could not resist) he had no reason to giue impedimēt to his passage: Neuertheless albeit he was constrayned by vehement compulsion to seeke his suretie with him by new contracts, yet he would neuer accord to any condicion which might be preiudiciall to themprour: for whom, like as amid so many difficulties, he saw nothing more profitable nor reasonable then to embrace peace: So to thend the negociacion of peace might be aduaunced afore the disorders grew greater or more immoderate, he perswaded the Viceroy to consent to a surceassing of armes, and to put into the hands of a person not suspected all those peces in the duchie of Millan which as yet were holden in the name of themperour and the Duke: Vpon which doings and their ful accomplishments, he hoped there would be found out some conuenient meane for peace, wherin he proponed this deuise, that the duchy of Millan being wholly seperate from the crowne of Fraunce, the kings seconde sonne should be inuested therin by themprour, to whom in recompence should be transferred some competent summe of money: That there should be ordeined some reasonable estate and assignation for the Dukes of Millan and Burbon: And lastly that the Pope, the Venetians, and the Florentins shoulde be bounde to confederate with themprour agaynst the French king, in case he would not obserue things promised. The Emprours capteins discerned well of the difficulties and daungers wherin they stoode, hauing at one time to support so great a warre in Lombardie in suche an vniuersall want & necessitie of money, and also to prouide for the safety of the kingdom of Naples, being no lesse desperate of ayde from the Pope & Florentins, then very certeine that the Venetians would abandon them: who, albeit they waged new bands of footmen, and studied to enterteine thimperials in hope to obserue tharticles of the league, yet they deferred thexecution with diuers excuses: In so much as the Viceroy being for his particular nothing estraunged from thaccorde, inclined to drawe with tharmy to the kingdome of Naples for the surety of the same: But the councel being assembled vpon the matter, the reasons & authoritie of the Marquis of Pisquaro preuailed, who expressing an equall correspondencie of wisdome and courage, proued how necessary it was to passe ouer the accompt of al other daungers, and to fix only vpon the warre of Lombardy, vpon whose victory al other things had their exspectation and depending: he sayd it was not the kings intention to inuade the realme of Naples with those armies and forces which coulde not so speedily be ledde into the kingdome, where both were multitudes of strong townes, and an absolute resolution & certentie of resistance by those bodies whom it cōcerned (for their proper safety) to defend it: By whiche occasion as it might be susteined for certeine monthes, So, in that respite and time, it was likely that the warre of Millan woulde be determined, of which if they obteined the victory, there could not but follow the speedy deliuering or rendring of Naples, yea though themprour had no other holdes or peces there, then one only tower: That holding good in Lombardy, it were easie to be victorious ouer Millan and Naples: where in marching to Naples were the only waye to lose Millan, and yet the kingdome not the more deliuered from daunger, for that the whole body of the warre would be trāsported thither: And being once reduced to a ſtate of men vanquiſhed, with what hopes can we returne thither agayne? where, of the contrary the enemies would enter with ſuch a reputation and inclination of the people, who naturally eyther for feare or hatred, ronne before the fortune of the victor, that in the kingdom of Naples would be found no more defence then in the duchy of Millan: That no other thing moued the french king ſtanding as yet in dout of the ſucceſſe of Lombardy: both to deuide his army & begin a new warre (the firſt ſtill hanging & continuing) then the hope he had, that for the ouermuch care & ielouſy of the kingdom of Naples, they would at laſt leaue vnto him as a pray the eſtate of Millan: According to whoſe counſels & appetites, if the army ſhould moue that ſo oftē had triumphed in victory, it were no other thing then with eternal infamy to ſubiect to the vanquiſhed by compulſion of their threatnings, that honor, that reputation, and that eſtate of glory which ſo many times we haue won vpon thē by our armes, by our vallour, & by our weapons. This aduiſe was embraced, and as a ſentence ſet downe & folowed by the Viceroy, who accordingly diſpatched to Naples the duke of Tracetta, with direction to make as great leauies of money as was poſſible, and recōmend ouer the care & defenſe of the kingdom to Askanio Colonno & the other barons of the realme: And albeit he had modeſtly giuen anſwere to thembaſſage preſented to him frō the Pope, yet he wrote to Rome letters full of feuerity & bitternes, ſuch as gaue manyfeſt ſignification that he would not heare ſpeake of thaccord: By reaſon of this, the Pope declaring howe he was puſhed on by neceſſitie, for that the Duke d'Albanie aduaunced dayly, publiſhed (not as a thing done before) that he had contracted with the french king vnder a ſimple promiſe not to offend one another: This he ſignified by writing to themprours agents, alleging the cauſes that induced him, but ſpecially his neceſſities & perils increaſing: And when the ſayd writing was preſented by Iohn Corſi embaſſador of Florence with wordes conuenient in ſuche a caſe, themprour, who afore could not be perſuaded that the Pope would abandon him in ſo great a danger, fell into no litle emotion & trouble of mind: he ſet before his eyes the ſundry hopes he had giuen him, confirmed by many good offices and oblations, he conferred together the ſeuerall demonſtrations of amity, accompanied with no leſſe tokens of conſtancy & firmnes: laſtly making a iudgement betwene the former promiſes of the Pope, & his preſent effects, he burſt out into publike paſſion againſt him, accuſing with exclamation his frayltie & light condition: and in that heate of nature he anſwered thembaſſador, that neither hatred, nor ambition, nor any intereſt particular had ſtirred him vp to begin warre with the french king, but onely the perſwaſions, the ſuggeſtions, and the authoritie of Pope Leo, who (as he ſayd) was drawē vnto it by the Pope raigning, being at that time cardinall of Medicis, and perſwaded him with great vehemency of reaſons, that it was a matter of great importance for the publike ſafety & vniuerſall benefite, not to ſuffer the french king to poſſeſſe any thing in Italy: That the ſame Cardinall was the author of the confederacion made for that cauſe before the death of Pope Adrian: In which reſpects he pronounced with great griefe how much it troubled him, to ſee the Pope who aboue all others was bound not to be ſeperate from him in thoſe daungers wherin by his meanes he was entred, had made a chaunge no leſſe hurtfull to him, then without all neceſſity: That ſuch reuolt and ſeperation for the time, the place, and the whole manner and propertie of it, could be attributed to no other thing, then to a certayne ſeruile feare and tymerous impreſſion, ſuch as hath falne vpon him ſince they within Pauia haue holden out: In this humor he forgot not to debate the meanes and fauors he had vſed to encreace his greatnes alwayes ſince the death of Pope Leo, and ſpeci-

ally his authoritie in two Conclaues together with his perpetuall desire to transferre vppon him the soueraigne election, onely for this opinion that by his meane mighte be reestablished the common libertie of Italie: And on the other side, he made collection howe little the Pope might assure him selfe of the French king, and howe farre he was eyther to feare or to hope of his victorie: Lastelye he stoode vppon this conclusion, that neyther for the Popes resolution whiche was agaynst all good office and exspectation, nor for anye other accident or fortune of what condition soeuer, he would not forget nor abandon him selfe: Wherein he protested, and therewithall wished that no man shoulde exspect that for wante of money he would chaunge or vary from his purpose, seeing he had vowed to set vp as a laste reast all his Crownes and kingdomes and hys life withall, desiring of God that his irreuocable deliberacion in the matter mighte not be preiudiciall to the health of his soule. To these complayntes thembassadour of Florence replied: That the Pope, since he was raysed to the soueraigne dignitie, was bounde to proceede no more as Cardinall of Medicis, but to put on the personne of Pope of Rome, whose office was to be carefull ouer the peace of Christendome: for whiche reason he had often debated with him the necessitie of peace and quietnesse, and for better negociation of it he had sent to him at two seuerall tymes the Archbishop of Capua, by whome he protested that by the othe and ceremonie of his office, he was bounde not to bee particular, but indifferent: That he had also admonished him thereof at suche tyme as the Admirall Bonninet departed oute of Italie, hauing no better season and oportunitie to treate of peace for him and more for his honour, wherevnto neuertheless he made him no other aunswere then that he coulde conclude no peace without the consent of the kinge of Englande: He desyred the Emperour to remember howe often the Pope had disswaded the passage and iourney into Prouence, bothe for that it troubled altogether the hope of the peace: and also (herein he seemed a diuine prophete of thinges to come) the necessitie wherein it woulde put the Frenche king to enter into armes, mighte bee the occasion to stirre vp in Italie a more daungerous combustion: That the Pope, by the negociacion of the Bishoppe of Verona, had declared to the French king then possessor of Millan, and also to the Viceroye, howe farre it concerned them to harken to peace, but neyther of them bare anye inclination therevnto: That since that tyme he had with manye reasons, and verye greate efficacie, refused to giue passage through thestate Ecclesiastike, to the bandes of menne of warre that marched agaynste the Realme of Naples: And yet neuertheless the kinge dyd not onely denie to heare his reasons, but also made his forces to march along the countrey of Plaisanca, withoute tarrying for hys aunswere: That for that cause he had lastely sente Pavvle Vittorio to induce the Viceroye to a surceassing of armes vnder condicions conformable to the tyme, and withall to certifie him by howe many reasons of necessitie he was to assure him selfe of the daunger imminent, seeing withall that both the Venetians stoode in suspence, and also the kinge of Englande woulde not be concurrante in the defence of the Duchie of Millan, if at the same tyme both by Themperour and by him, the warre were not moued beyonde the Mountes: But seeing the Viceroye made no reckoning of anye offers or condicions he propounded, and that the kinges men of warre and armed bandes aduaunced daylye, he was constrayned to take fayth and suretie of the kinge without beeing bounde to anye other thing then not to offende hym. The Emperour complayned of the hardnesse of the condicion offered to the Viceroy;

for that it restrayned and bounde hym to leaue that which he helde, not expressing any mention that the Frenche king should do the lyke: And lastely he sayde, that albeit the Marquis of Pisquairo in counselling him to agreement, had signified to him that in the campe were manye disorders, and no lesse daunger to hys affayres, yet he coulde not frame his minde to peace, suche was his hope that through the vallour of his men he should carye the victorie, if the armies came once to the triall of a battell.

All this whyle continued the siege of Pauia: And yet for want of munitions they had somewhat ceassed to molest it with their artilleries: But to remedie that difficultie, the king hauing newely receyued into his protection the Duke of Ferrara with obligacion to paye him threescore and tenne thousande duckets in ready money, was content to accept twenty thousande of that summe in price and vallue of munitions, whiche he caused to be conueyed by Parma and Plaisanca, vsing the seruice of the horses and cariages of the contrey men: wherein the king was readily holpen by the commission and direction of the Pope, not without the complayning of the Viceroy, as though in that action he had ministred manyfestly to the ayde and succours of the king: Who, to thende the munitions might arriue in suretie, had sent affore Iohn de Medicis with two hundred horse and fifteene hundred footemen: This Medicis complayning in the beginning of the warre, both of the seueritie of the Viceroy giuing him discountenance, and also of his penurie of money, not hauing sufficient to make the souldiors to marche, was passed out of themperours paye, to the interteinment of the Frenche kinge: It seemed that these forces were sufficient to assure the munitions, the rather because the Duke of Albanie was at hande, hauing passed at the same tyme the ryuer of Pavv: And albeit the Viceroy and the Marquis of Pisquairo to stoppe their passage, caste a bridge neare to Cremona, and made their waye ouer Pavv with sixe hundred men at armes and eight thousande footemen, lodging the first daye at Monticello: yet they gaue ouer the enterprise, and returned agayne ouer the ryuer, beeing aduertised by credible espiall, that the king had giuen charge to the Lord Thomas de Foix, to go seeke them with one part of tharmie. Assoone as they were retyred the Duke of Albania passed thAppenine along the territories of Reggia and Garfagnana, onely he marched slowely, the same confirming thoppinion that was conceyued that the kinge embraced that enterprise, more to induce with suche feare thEmperours Capteines eyther to accorde, or at least to abandon thaffayres of Lombardie, then through hope to make anye greate aduauncement: Ranse de Cere ioyned with him neare to Lucqua with a regiment of three thousande footemen who were come with the armie at sea: This armie as they passed, tooke by composicion Sauona and Varagina: And the Nauie beeing eftsoones returned to the west ryuer of Genes, helde in feare and bridle that Citie.

1525. In the beginning of the yere a thousand fiue hundred twentie and fiue, Dom Hugo de Moncado departing from Genes with the Nauie, descended and tooke lande with three thousande footemen at Varagina, where were left in garrison, certayne bandes of French footmen: But the French nauie that was then at sea, being commaunded by the Marquis Salusse making to the succours of that place, the other fleete retyred being naked of footemen: when also the French regimentes of footemen discended and left their shippes, and so fiersly charged their enemies, that the whole armie being broken, diuerse were miserably put to the sworde, and the person of Dom Hugo vnfortunately taken prisoner.

In

In the beginning of the same yere, the Duke of Albanie compelled the people of Lucqua to contribute to him twelue thousand duckets,& to lend him certeine peces of artilleries:with which munitions and prouisions he marched further through the lands of the Florentins,by whom he was receiued in amitie & friendship: And in that sort did he stay with his army neare to Siena at the Popes requeſt, who for that neyther by authority,nor with armes, he could not meete with all things that troubled him,resorted to his naturall condicion, & began to manage his purposes with art & industry: It nothing displeased him that the french should get the duchy of Millan, for that he made this coniecture,that whileſt themprour & the french king abode in Italy,both the sea apostolike & his pontificacy should stand assured frō the ambicion & greatnes of eyther of them, because they would kepe ielous eyes the one ouer the other: And yet by the same reason it was grieuous to him to see the French make a conqueſt of the kingdome of Naples, for feare that at one time that kingdome & the duchye of Millan were not reduced vnder the power & commaundement of one so puiſſant a prince: wherin to caſt impediments againſt the doings & fortunes of the king,he sought occasions to stay the Duke of Albanie, & made instance to the king, that as he passed he would readresse & reorder the gouernment of Siena, which the Pope (for the oportunity & seate of that citie standing in the midway betwene Rome and Florence) desired greatly might fall into the hands of some of his friends, like as was hapned not many monthes before by his meane & working: for as the cardinall Petruccio dying during the pontificacy of Adrian, his nephew Frauncis pretended to succede him in the gouernmēt: so by reason of his insolency,the chieftayns of Montenouo being neuertheles of the same faction,oppoſed vehemently agaynſt him, and made solicitacion to the Duke of Seſſe themprours Embaſſadour, and to Cardinall Medicis,to giue them an other forme of gouernment, as eyther to reduce it into libertie, or elſe to referre the whole authoritie into the handes of Fabio sonne of Pandolffe Petruccio, notwithstanding somewhat before he was secretely stolne away to Naples: This matter was long debated, and at laſte when Clement was elected Pope, the common consent of him and themperour concurring, Fabio was eftesones reeſtabliſhed in the place of his father: But both for that he had not the full authoritie of his father, and for the preſent inclination of the Citie bearing vniuersally to libertie, and also becauſe the famulie and faction of Montenouo, was neyther firmely knitte with him, nor of no assured agreement amongeſt them selues, the eſtate of thinges drewe to other effectes then aunswered thexspectation: for, by the debilitie that was discerned to be in the power of one onely,both hauing no fundacion vpon the affections and good willes of the Citisens, and also holding no gouernment absolute and without regard to the courſe and maner of tyrantes,there hapned one day by the incensing of his aduersaries,a popular tumult, by the which without the ayde of any forreiners,he was easily driuen out of the city,notwithstanding he had alwayes in the place a garde depending vpon him: The Pope making his aduauntage of this diuision, and reapoſing no confidence neyther in the populars, nor in any other faction, determined to put the authoritie into the handes of the Montenouaes, to thende afterwardes to create chiefe Ruler eyther Fabio, or anye other of them that shoulde bee beſte agreable to hym: A matter which as when men bee entered into suſpicion, they are wonte for the moſte parte to take all thinges in the worſte parte, so the manner of that dealinge increaſed this opinion in the Imperiall Capteines, that the capitulation made betwene the Pope and the french king,conteyned on all sides some matter of more aduauntage, and a greater obligation then the bande of newtralitie: It happned by the ſtaying of the Duke of Albania vpon the confines of Siena, that thinhabitantes there, to redeeme their domages which they receiued of tharmie, gaue a moſt ample voyce & authoritie touching the gouernment, to thoſe Citiſens who were moſt of the Popes confidence and faction: And afterwardes the Siennois ſent certaine quantities of munition & money to the Duke of Albania, who paſſed on marching notwithſtanding as ſlowly as he was wont: He went from Mountfiaſco to Rome to ſpeake with the Pope, and afterwards paſſing Tiber to Fiano, he abode vpon the landes of the Vrſins, where did aſſemble the bands of footemen that were leauyed at Rome by the permiſſion of the Pope, who gaue ſemblable ſuffrance to the Colonnois muſtring at Marina for the defence of the realme of Naples, to wage regimentes of footmen at Rome: But bothe for that they aduaunced not muche, and that vniuerſally they were yll prouided of money, there was no great accompt made of thoſe leauyes or muſtrings, ſince the eyes, the eares, the exſpectation, the ſpirites and contemplacions of all men were altogether ſetled vpon the affayres of Lombardie: which pretending to one end and by diuers accidents, increaſed in both parties indifferently the humor of hope & feare.

The defendantes of Pauya in neceſsitie.

They that were within Pauia ſuffred no ſmal neceſſitie of money and munitions, the ſtore of wine beginning alſo to fayle and all other ſortes of vittels, except bread: By reaſon whereof the launceknightes aſſembled, and almoſt in maner of a tumult demaunded their payes, wherevnto, beſides their owne inſolent diſpoſitions, they were puſhed on by the incitacion of their capteine, who was feared to haue made ſome ſecret contract with the French king. On the other ſide, the Duke of Burbon approched and ledde with him from Germany 500. men at armes Burgognions, and 6000. launceknights payed vpon the treaſor of the king of Romains: The Viceroy alſo was gone to Loda, where they ment to aſſemble the whole armie, pretending that it ſhould be nothing inferior to that of thenemies: But as there was no preſent ſtore of money and leſſe exſpectation to get ſo much as would make march the ſouldiors and enterteine them: So alſo they were deſtitute of al hope to be ayded by the Pope or by the Florentins: Neither had they confidence in the Venetians, who after many excuſes and delayes, had at laſt aunſwered Caraccioll the pronotory and themprours Embaſſador at Venice, that they would procede according to thexãple of the Pope, by whoſe meane & working it was ſuppoſed that they had ſecretly made a contract of newtrality with the french king: yea it was thought that they priuily ſolicited the Pope, to procure to diſcende into Italie at their common charges, an army of tenne thouſand Svvizzers, to thend they ſhould not nede to feare the victory of eyther of tharmies: This was well allowed by the Pope, but both for want of money, & by the cuſtome and propertie of his nature, ſo ſlowly executed, that he ſent to late into Svvizzerlande the Biſhop of Verulo to diſpoſe the mindes of the Svvizzers.

The neceſſities & wants of Pauia were ſomewhat releeued by the induſtrie of the Viceroy and other capteines: for, ſending certayne vittelers of wine into the French campe, Antho. de Leua hauing a ſigne made, ſent out certayne trowpes to offer the ſkirmiſh on that ſide, by which occaſion the brute & alarme following, the vittelers breaking their greateſt veſſell, ranne into Pauia with a litle veſſell incloſed in the great, and wherin were beſtowed 3000. duckets: which though it did not to the full remedy their wants, yet it wrought ſuch an operacion of comfort amongſt thẽ, that the launceknights ſeing by that litle ſumme the difficulty to ſend them money, bare afterwards with more patiẽce their other extremities, wherin alſo the death of their capteine did conueniently concurre at the ſame inſtant. It was beleued that Anthony de Leua de Leua procured him to be poysoned,to thende to take awaye both the matter and occasions of tumults: In this tyme the Marquis of Pisquaro went to incampe before Casciano, where were in garrison fiftie horsemen and foure hundred Italian footmen whom he compelled to render them selues to discression.

After the Duke of Burbon was ariued with his launceknights, there was nothing that more reteyned the Capteines (being very carefull ouer the daunger of Pauia) then the want of money,such as they had not onely wherewith to pay the regimēts of the men of warre,but also there was not to defraye necessarily the conduction of the municions and artilleries: In this necessitie, they were driuen to haue recourse to perswasions, wherein they forgot not to recommend to the bands of footemen, the glory & riches which the victorie would cast vpon them, And reducing to their memorie the reputacion of their conquests past, they labored also to inflame their mindes with the fire of enuie and hatred against the French men: By which commemoracion of glory and profit, they brought the spanish footemen to make promisse that they would follow the armie one whole moneth more without receiuing any money: And the launceknights were contented with that which should suffice for the prouision of their nurriture and necessary vittells. But they found many difficulties to winne the men at armes and light horsemen being lodged in the townes of Cremona and Guiaradada: They alleaged,that hauing receiued no money of longe time,it would be greuous to them to follow the armie where of necessitie they must be driuen to buy vittells to nourish them selues, and forrage to feede their horses: They brought also into complaint this iniury, that their paines and seruice was holden lesse acceptable and recommended,then the infanterie,to whome neuertheless had bene made many distribucions of money, without releeuing of them with one penny of long time: In which griefe they forgot not to insinuate their many merits, and making comparison of their reputacion and vallour,much lesse that they yelded to be inferior to thinfanterie either in vallour or fidelitie,but they challenged place aboue them both by their nobilitie and for their deseruings past: it was necessary for thexpedicion of the seruice to reappease this murmure, and by some present industrie to reassure the mindes that began so manifestly to shake,which office the Marquis of Pisquaro tooke vppon him, who trauelling to their particular lodgings, vsed those meanes that best agreed with the state of the matter he had in hand, taking his obseruacion of the wise Phisicion,who hauing found out the humor that offendeth, prepareth that ministracion and medicin that is most apt to cure and remedie: somtimes he serued his turne with excuses, which in suche cases haue their operacion, And sometimes he whetted them on with wordes of comfort, which to mindes wauering giue no litle edge and reuiuing: sometimes he reprehended them, which according to the persons might worke some notable office,And sometimes he confessed the equitie of their complaints,wherein he ouercame their generall griefe with his proper compassion: And hauing thus by the singularitie of his wit and industrie, reduced to moderacion their present murmures and discontentments, he followed his purpose with new incoragements,that by how much more they stoode to make their vertue apparant,and their vallour manifest,by so much more were they bound not to suffer so noble hartes,to be ouercome by an estate of infanterie or footemen either in fidellitie or affection to thEmprour: And as the present quarrell did not concerne the glory and honor of thEmprour alone,but also the succesſe of the condicion and whole estate of Italy was concurrant, so if they expressed not their readines and vallour equall with the greatnes of the occasion offered, they could hardly acquite thexſpectacion that was conceiued of them, but ſitting downe with diſhonor and infamie, they would leaue to thEmperour an vnthankefull recompenſe for his benefits paſt: Laſtly he tolde them, that ſeeing they had ſo many times offered their liues to hazard in thEmperours quarrells, and no leſſe often had made waye by their vertue thorow all perills of warre and fortune for his ſake, it coulde not but intangle with ſhame and infamie the memorie of their merites paſt, if nowe they ſhoulde refuſe to goe to the warre for ſo vile a thing as a ſmall quantitie of money: What by theſe perſwaſions, and thauthoritie of the Marquis, they conſented to receiue for one moneth a ſmall allowance of pay: Inſomuch that the whole armie being thus aſſembled, which was ſuppoſed to conteyne ſeuen hundred men at armes, as many light horſemen, a thowſand Italian footemen, & more then ſixteene thowſand ſpaniſh and launceknightes: They brake vp from Loda the fiue and twentie of Ianuarie, and marched the ſame day to Marignan, making as though they woulde draw towardes Millan, either to make the king, being touched with the daunger of that Citie, to leauie his ſeege from before Pauia, or elſe to giue cauſe to the ſouldiours to go from Millan that were there in garriſon: Neuertheleſſe hauing afterwards paſſed the riuer of Lambra neare to Vidigolffo, they tooke manifeſtly the waye to Pauia: The king payed in his armie xiij. hundred launces, ten thowſande Svvizzers, foure thowſand launceknightes, fiue thowſand frenchmen, and ſeuen thowſand Italians: And yet what thorow the abuſes and robberies of his Capteines, and corruption and negligence of his officers, the numbers of the footemen were farre leſſe: Theodor Triuulſo lay in garriſon within Millan with three hundred launces, ſix thowſand footemen Griſons and Valeſiens, and three thowſand frenchmen: But aſſoone as the king diſcerned that the Imperialls turned towards Pauia, he reuoked to the army all the regiments of footemen, except two thowſand.

Aſſoone as the armie of thimperialls had taken the field, the french king began to deuiſe what was beſt to be done: And calling to councell his Capteines, Trymouille, Paliſſa, and Monſr de Foix with many others, aduiſed him to retyre his armie from before Pauia, and to go incampe either in the monaſterie of Charterhouſe, or at Binaſquo, which are places of good ſtrength, and likewiſe are found many ſuche in the contrie there, for the oportunitie of the channells deriuing, and do ſerue for the watering of medowes: They told him that in taking this courſe, he ſhould ſpeedily carie the victory without blood or daunger, the wantes and neceſſities of his enemies not ſuffering them to holde out many dayes, but woulde conſtraine them either to diſſolue, or diſperſe their companies into ſeuerall villages: That the launceknightes that were within Pauia, to thende to cut of all imputacion that they ſought to couer their feare and timerouſnes, with the excuſe that they were not payed, were content to beare with pacience the prolonging of their payes for many moneths: But aſſone as they ſaw the ſeege remoued, they would in inſolencie demaunde their payes, and not finding in their Capteines any aſſured meanes to ſatisfie them, and leſſe exſpectacion to enterteine them with credible hopes, it was to be feared they would draw to ſome daungerous tumult: That thenemies with no other thing kept them ſelues ſo orderly together, but with hope to giue ſpeedily the battell, but when they ſhould ſee the warre drawne out into longnes, and the commodity of offring the battell not preſented, then their exſpectacion would be fruſtrate, and the whole armie repleniſhed with difficulties & confuſion: That it could not be but daungerous to remeine betwene a towne wherein were fiue thowſande footemen of a moſt warlike nation, and an army that came to reskew it, which was no leſſe mightie in numbers of men,

vallour and experience of Capteines and ſouldiours, then braue and reſolute by the glorie of their victories obteyned in times paſt, And who nowe had reappoſed all their hopes in the battell: That in warres it was no ſhame to flee, when the fleeing profiteth him that giueth place to his aduerſarie: That there could be no infamie in a retraite that was made by diſcreſſion and not by tymerouſnes, when it is done vpon this conſideracion not to put in doubt things that be certeine, And when in the yſſue and ſucceſſe of the warre is to be expreſſed to all the world the maturitie of the councell: That there is no victorie more profitable, more honorable, nor more glorious, then that which is obteyned without the domage, the ſpoile, and blud of ſouldiers: Laſtly that the firſt and chiefe commendacion of the diſcipline of warre conſiſted in this, that a generall ſhoulde not oppoſe his armie to daungers without neceſſitie, and rather with induſtrie and pacience to reuerſe and make vaine thenterpriſes of his aduerſaries, then through vallour & corage, to hazard the battell, which fortune and accidents may make doubtfull: The Pope concurred in the ſame councell and ſignified no leſſe to the French king though not ſo much for the kings intereſts, yet for the neceſſitie of his owne affaires, for that the Marquis of Piſquaro being not without his feare, in ſo great a neceſſitie had aduertiſed affore hand the difficulties of th Emprours army to be ſuch, as they almoſt cut from him all hopes of happy ſucceſſe: Neuertheleſſe the king (A deſtinie ineuitable can not be auoyded) who in his deliberacions followed only the councells of th Admiral, ſeemed to ſet before his eyes rather the rumors of men and brutes varying for euery light accident, then the firme and aſſured ſubſtance of theffects of thinges: he interpreted it to a great ſhame and infamie, that an armie royall led by his owne perſon, ſhould ſhowe more feare then vallour, and baſely giue place to the comming of thennemies, wherein he was alſo puſhed on by this vaine ſuggeſtion that he was bownd to followe and performe with deedes, the wordes that his raſh tongue had vainely promiſed, A reſolucion moſt vndiſcreete and diſhonorable to a Capteine: for, both he had vnder proteſtacion aſſured all the world, and many times ſignified by Meſſengers into Fraunce and all the partes of Italy, that he would ſooner chuſe to ſacrifice him ſelfe to death, then to retyre from before Pauya without the victorie: he ſtoode fixed vppon theſe hopes, that in the place where he incamped, he might eaſily fortefie him ſelfe to auoid all inconueniences by ſurpriſe: That through want of money euery ſmall delay, or the leaſt neceſſitie that might driue thennemies to temporiſe, would put them into diſorder, And hauing no meane to get vittells but by rauyne and pillage, they could not remaine long in one lodging: Laſtly he hoped to giue impediment to the vittells that were to come to their campe, whereof he knew the greateſt parte was appoynted from Cremona, wherein he was furthered by this helpe, that he had newly taken into his pay Iohn Lodovvyk Paluoyſin, either to thende he ſhoulde impatronize him ſelfe vppon Cremona where was a very ſlender garriſon, or at leaſt to lye to cut of the ſewertie of vittels that had an ordinary traffike from that citie to their campe.

The french king will not follow the counſells of his Capteines.

For theſe reaſons the king ſtoode reſolute not to leaue the ſeege of Pauya, And to haue the better way to empeach that thennemies ſhould not enter, he diſlodged in other manner, and gaue an other forme to the incamping of his armie: for, the king was lodged before in th Abbay of S. Lanfrank ſituated about a mile and an halfe beyond Pauya, beyond the way that leadeth from Pauya to Myllan, And vppon the riuer of Theſin neare to that place where was proued the diuerſion of the waters: Monſr Paliſſa with the vauntgard & the Svvyzzers lay within the ſubburbs neare S. Iuſtynes gate, hauing fortefied him ſelfe in the Churches of S. Peter, S. Apolyne, and S. Ierome:

And Iohn de Medicis with his horſemen and regimentes of footemen, was beſtowed in the Church of S. Sauior: But now, the king hauing informacion that thennemies were departed from Loda, he went & incamped within the parke in the right ſumptuous and ſtately houſe of Mirabell ſcituate on this ſide Pauia, leuing at S. Lanfranke the Griſons footemen, and yet chaunged not the lodging of the Vauntgard: At laſt the perſon of the king was lodged in the monaſteries of S. Pavvle & S. Iames, places beſides other commodities, very eminent and neare Pauia, & commaund the champion, but are ſomewhat without the ring of the parke: In the kinges place Monſr d'Alenſon with the Arearegard went to incampe at Myrabell: And as for their more conuenient ſuccoring one an other, they brake downe on that ſide the parke wall, ſo they helde and commaunded betwene them all that ſpace or circuit that ſtretcheth towards Theſin on that ſide below, and vntill the way that leadeth to Millan towards aboue: So that holding Pauia enuironned on all ſides, and hauing alſo at their deuocion the riuers of Grabalon, Theſin, and Touretta, which is right againſt Darſina, the Imperialls could not enter Pauia, onleſſe they paſſed the riuer of Theſin, or elſe made their entrie by the parke. The king for the managing of the armie, reappoſed him ſelfe wholly vpon the councells of th Admirall: he had ſingular confidence in his fidelitie, and ſo abſolutely referred things to his direction, that he diſpenſed with him ſelfe and paſſed the moſt parte of his howers in idlenes and vaine pleaſures without any ſtudy or care of his affaires or once to thinke vpon expedicions of importance: wherin ſuch was either his wilfull negligence or willing partiality, that if at any time he ſat in councell amongeſt them, he would referre the ſentence & reſolucion of all things to th Admiral, without accepting the aduiſe of other experienced Capteines: By him were ordered all the kinges deliberacions, though at times he ſuffered his eares to be gouerned by Anne Montmerancy and Philip Chabot Lord of Bryon, perſonages verie agreable to him in his ſportes, but of ſlender experience touching matters of warre: Moreouer the eſtate and numbers of his armie were not according to his deſire and opinion, and muche leſſe aunſwering to the brute that went: for, one parte of his horſemen being gone with the Duke of Albanie, and an other parte left for the garde of Millan with Theodor Triuulce, and many alſo being diſperſed into ſeuerall villages and borowes thereabouts, there was not found in the campe aboue eight hundred launces, and touching the footemen, the numbers were farre leſſe then was ſuppoſed as wel by the negligence of the kings officers, as through the deceit of the Capteines: of whom the greateſt abuſers were the Italians, who notwithſtanding they receiued payes for great numbers of footemen, yet their bandes were farre from their full cooplements: many of the french Capteines tooke counſell alſo by their corrupcions: And laſtly the regiment of two thowſande Valeſiens that were beſtowed at S. Sauior betwene S. Lanfranke & Pauia being ſodainly aſſaulted by thoſe that were within, were diſperſed and broken.

The Imperialls take the caſtell S. Angeo.

In this eſtate of affaires, the Capteines Imperiall hauing paſſed Lambray, made their approches to the Caſtell S. Angeo, which hauing his ſcituacion betwene Loda and Pauia, would haue giuen great impediments to the courſe of vittels that were brought from Loda to their campe, if it had not bene at their deuocion and in their power: Pirrhus, the brother of Federike de Boſſolo laye there in garriſon with two hundred horſe, and eight hundred footemen, and the king not many dayes before, to thend he woulde not raſhly commit his people to daunger, had ſent to viſite and conſider the place the ſame Federike & Iames Chabanes, who brought reapport that that ſtrength and garriſon ſufficed for the defenſe of the place: But experience made

it knowen immediatly after, how farre they were deceiued in their reckoning, for, assoone as Ferdinand d'Aualo made his approches with the regiments of spanish footmen, and had cut of with his artilleries, certeine defenses and resistances, the feare of the defendants became greater then their vallour, and in those humors of timerous cowardise, they retyred the same day into the castell: And not many howers after (feare hath a vehement operacion in the mindes it possesseth) they compownded that Pirrhus, Emylio Coriano, and the three sonnes of Phebus Gonsanguo, should remein prisoners, and all the residue depart the place, without armor and horse, And beeing sworne not to beare armes for one moneth against the Emprour: In this time the king sent for from Sauona a regiment of two thowsand Italian footemen, parcell of those companies that had bene at the seege of Marseilles: But being come vpon the territories of Alexandria neare the riuer of Yrba: Gaspar Mayne lying there in garrison with a regiment of seuen hundred footemen, yssued out of Alexandria with a very slender strength and set vpon them: he found them very wearie with the longe way they had made, and without garde, for that they doubted no daunger by reason of which aduauntages he disordered and brake them easily, and in their feare being fled within the castell, they rendred them selues immediatly with seuenteene enseignes: There hapned no better succesſe to the enterprise that was committed to the charge of Iohn Lovvys Paluoisin: who, after he was entred with foure hundred horse & two thowsand footemen within Casalmaior, where was no wall, but ramparts which he had made, And hauing afterwards wonne S. Iohn in Croce, he began from that place to make incursions into the contrey, laboring with all the meanes he could to cut of their vittells: By reason of which violences, Frauncis Sforce lying then within Cremona, leauied with great celeritie foureteene hundred footemen, and sent them to Casalmaior with certeine trowpes of horsemen of the band of Rodolffo Camerino and the horsemen of his gard, vnder the leading of Alexander Bentyuole: As they were drawn neare to that place, Paluoysin reappoſing confidence in the aduauntage of his numbers without tarying for certeine succours of Frauncis Rangon, issued out the eyghteene of February and occupied skirmish with them: But he payed a deare price of his rashnes, and fell by equitie into the punishment of his hastie rashnes, for that in laboring to susteine his trowpes that fought and beganne to draw to retraite, he was striken from his horse and made prisoner, & all his souldiours broken and dispersed: There was also added to thaffayres of the French king, this further difficultie of great consequence: Iohn Ia. Medicis of Myllan Capteine of the castell of Mus whether the Duke of Myllan had sent him for the murder he had done of the person of Monsr Viscounte, hauing placed by night an ambushe on the side of the rocke of Chiauenna standing vppon a hil side at the head of the lake, and somewhat distant from the houses of the borough: tooke the Capteine prisoner as he walked without his castell & led him presently before the gate of the rocke, where threatning to kill him if he put not the rocke into his handes, his wife in whose presence his life was threatned to death, deliuered vp the rocke: After this first fortune, he caused to discouer an other ambushe with three hundred footemen with whom he tooke the towne making his entry by the castell: Whereuppon it hapned that the Cantons of the Grisons, taking suspicion vppon that accident, reuoked a litle before the battell, the regiment of sixe thowsand Grisons that were in the kings armie.

About this time, ariued in thimperiall armie, the knight Gasalo, whom the king of England sent thether with great promisses: That king beginning to be ielous ouer the prosperitie of the French king, and pushed on also with a certeine despite that in the Skottiſhe ſeas the Frenche had taken certayne veſſells of thEngliſhe, threatned manifeſtly to make warre vpon Fraunce, and in that humor deſired the well aduauncing of thImperiall armie: In which forwardnes of diſpoſicion, he ſent to his Embaſſador Pace remayning at Trente, to go to Venice and proteſt in his name thobſeruation of the League, to the which his Maieſtie hoped they would be ſo muche the more eaſily induced, by howmuch themperour had ſent to the Viceroy thinueſtiture of Frauncis Sforce, with authoritie to diſpoſe of it by his diſcreſſion and according to the neceſſitie and reſpect of his affayres: The king of Englande alſo ſolicited the Pope by his Embaſſador, to miniſter ayde to themperour in his affayres: But the Pope excuſed him vpon the capitulacion made with the French king for his owne ſuretie, and not offending themprour, whervnto he added this complaint, that ſince the army was returned from Prouence, he was not able in the ſpace of twenty dayes to vnderſtande their purpoſes, nor whether they pretended to defende or abandon theſtate of Millan.

But now, litle auayled the trayties and intelligences of Princes, and of leſſe ſeruice were the negociations and labors of Embaſſadors, for that by the affronting and approching of the armies, the whole eſtate of the warre together with the difficulties and daungers ſuſteined for many monthes, were reduced to the fortune and hazard of a very fewe howres: for the armie imperiall paſſing further ſince the taking of S. Angeo, marched and lodged the firſt daye of Februarie at Viſtarino, and the ſecond day at Lardiragno and S. Alexis beyond the litle riuer of Lolono: a lodging diſtant frō Pauia foure miles, and from the French campe three miles: The thirde of February they marched towardes the gate of S. Iuſtine, the place of their incamping beeing ſtretched out betwene Prati, Treleuero, la Motto, and a wood on the ſide of S. Lazarus, places within two miles and an halfe of Pauia, within halfe a mile of the Frenche Vauntgarde, and not halfe a myle from the rampiers and trenches of their campe: By reaſon they were ſo neare affronted one to the other, they eſcaped not without their ſeuerall domages by the artilleries: The Imperialls commaunded Belioyenſe, with all the villages and countrey that laye vpon their backes, except Saint Colombin where lay a garriſon of French, but ſo ſtraytly beſieged as no perſon could iſſue out. They founde within Saint Angeo and Saint Belioyenſe great quantities of vittells, and to haue more plenty and abundance, they labored to commaund Theſin as they did Pavv, by the cōmoditie of which they gaue impediment to the french vittells: They helde S. Croce, and albeit the french king at that time when he went to incampe at Mirabell had abandoned the Charterhouſe, yet they forbare to go thither, leaſt their market of vittels ſhould be cut off: The french men kept S. Lazarus, but the furie of thartilleries of thenemies put them in feare to abide there: There was betwene the two campes a litle brooke or ryuer of running water called Vernacula: his head or ſpring was within the parke, and from thence making his courſe in the middeſt betwene S. Lazarus and S. Peter in Verge, hath his fal afterwards into the riuer of Theſin: This brooke the imperials to thend they might come on with leſſe difficulty, labored to paſſe as a matter of great importance: But they found a valiant defence made by the frenchmen, hauing both the ayde of the channell which was very deepe, and the commodity of the ſhores or bankes that were very high: By which impedimentes there was no poſſibilitie of paſſage without great difficultie: euery one with that art and care that the peril required, fortified their lodging & quarter: The kings lodging had in front, in backe, and in the left flanke, thicke & huge ramparts, enuironed with diches & fortified with baſtillions: and on the right flanke was the wall of the parke

of Pauia which was ſuppoſed to make the lodging verye ſtrong: The lodginges of thimperials caryed the ſame forme of fortification, hauing alſo the libertye of the whole contrey from S. Lazarus drawing towardes Belioyeuſo, euen vntill the riuer of Pavv, which miniſtred to them great abundance of vittels. Betwene the ramparts of both the one and other lodging, was no more diſtance then xl. paſſes, and the baſtillions ſo neare neighbours, that the ſmall ſhot played in great libertie. Theſe two armies were thus lodged and incamped the eyght daye of February: and albeit they loſt no time in skirmiſhing, yet euery one kept himſelf within his fort, not willing to do any thing to his diſaduauntage: The imperiall capteines made their reckoning, that they had gayned much till that day beeing approched ſo neare Pauia, that if it came to a day of battel, they might be ayded with the garriſons that were within the towne: And becauſe the ſouldiors within Pauia ſuffred want of municions, the imperialls ventred to ſend in fifty horſemen, euery one carying in croupe or behind him, a litle bag full of powder: who taking by night the way of Millan, & obſeruing the inſtant wherin their campe by a token giuen ſhould giue thalarme to the french men, they got ſafely into Pauia, their fortune being nothing inferior to their vallour. Anth. de Leua made many ſallyes out of the town, bringing with him in diuers maners many harmes and domages to thenemies, in one of which ſallies he charged thoſe that had the gard of the borow of S. Lanfrank, whom he did not only defeate & breake, but alſo with the ſame felicitie tooke from them three peces of artilleries, and foure wagons laden with municions. In this condition it was wonderfull to behold what was the ſtudy, the induſtry, and perpetuall toyle of body & minde of the Marquis of Piſquaro, who omitted no oportunitie wherin occaſion was giuen to vexe thenemie, ſometimes prouoking them with skirmiſhes, ſometimes traueling thē with alarmes, and neuer ceaſſing to kepe them awaked eyther with vndermining, intrenching, or rayſing of Mountes to annoy them: They cauſed to erect a cauallier or mount vpon the chānel: and for that the frenchmen with ij. peces of artilleries planted vpō S. Lazarus, made dangerous execution of thoſe that wrought vpon it, they planted there certein peces which reuerſed the ſaid place of S. Lazarus & compelled the french to abādon it: And as the artilleries of this cauallier annoyed thē much, ſo alſo they were no leſſe beaten by an other mount or Cauallier which they had made within Pauia: Beſides, the Spaniards had ſo fortified thēſelues with baſtillions & ramparts, & other preparatiues defenſiue, that they had great meane to greue the french campe, without receiuing much offence thēſelues: for which cauſe the frēchmen remoued their artilleries to beate thē in the flanke, the Spaniards not ceaſſing for al that to aduance and come on, & to winne aduantage by footmeale: and in this eſtate of procedings, in ſuch a neare neyborhood & affronting of tharmies, the skirmiſhes were very rife, wherin the frenchmen for the moſt part caried the worſe: and yet the practiſes and negociations of truce did nothing ceaſe, beeing continually ſolicited by the Popes Nuncioes reſident in both the armies: To whō were adioyned many of ſtrait familiaritie & fauor with the king, who ceaſſed not to admoniſh him, the Popes counſell alſo concurring, that to auoyde ſo great a perill it were his beſt to retyre his armie from before Pauia, by which meane the victory could not but fall vpō him with facilitie, & without effuſion of blood, the rather by the neceſſities of thenemies ſuffring great want of money. The xvij. day of February the ſouldiors within Pauia made a ſally, & charged the regimēt of Iohn de Medicis, who gaue thē a braue repulſe, & with no leſſe vallor compelled them to retyre: But immediatly afterwards as he returned to ſhowe to the Admirall the place of thincounter, with relation of things as they passed, certayne loose shot lurking in a house, gaue him a wounde with the bullet a litle aboue the heele whiche brake the bone, for the curing of whiche hurte he was constrayned to be caryed to Plaisanca: This was an vnfortunate hurt or else vnhappily chaunced on that man, for that lyke as immediately after his wounding, the furie of the Frenche campe in skirmishing and assaulting, began to diminishe and abate, so it seemed to giue to them of Pauia a greater and more ready resolucion, for that their sallies were more familiar and furious, in whiche vehement inclination they burned the Abbey of Saint Lanfranke, and ceassed not fiercely to execute the French men, taking aduauntage of the diminution of their courage and fortune: In so muche that the night betwene the xix. and xx. daye of Februarye, the Marquis of Pisquairo issuing out with a regiment of three thousande Spanish footemen, assaulted the French bastillions, and winning the ramparts, he slew more then fiue hundred footemen, and cloyed three peeces of artilleries.

It was nowe not possible to thimperial Capteines any longer to maynteine their armie in that place, for want of money: They considered also that if they shoulde breake vp and retyre, the estate of Pauia woulde not onely remayne desperate, but also there woulde be leste little hope to be hable to defende their other peces which they possessed in the Duchie of Millan: There was also in them all a wonderfull confidence to obteine the victorie, bothe for the resolucion and vallour of their souldiors, and also through the infinite disorders in the Frenche armie, and the insolent departing awaye of diuerse of their footemen, in so muche as the bodies to feight did not by farre aunswere the numbers that were inrolled in their paybookes: Therefore partely to determine these difficulties, and partely to followe the humor of their hopes, the night before the fiue and twenty of February, a daye dedicated by the Christians to thapostle Saint Matthevv, and also the daye of the natiuitie of thEmperour, they determined ro marche to Mirabell, where laye incamped certayne companies of horsemen and footemen: In this marche they stoode vppon this intention, that if the French men moued, then they had set at libertie the siege of Pauia: and if they moued not, then to aduenture the fortune of the battell: Therfore the better to aduaunce this determination, all the beginning of the night they gaue many Alarmes, the more to keepe trauelled and wearie the Frenche men, making semblance as though they woulde charge them on that side towards Pavv, Thesin, and Saint Lazarus, and about midnight euery souldiour, by the commaundement of the capteines, put on a white cassakin ouer his armor to be knowen from the French men: They were cast into two squadrons of horsmen, and foure of footmen: In the first were six thousand footmen equally compoũded of launceknights, Spaniards, and Italians: This squadron was led by the Marquis of Guast: the second stoode only vpon certayne bands of Spanish footmen vnder the charge of the Marquis of Pisquairo: the thirde and fourth squadron were of Launceknightes commaunded by the Viceroy and the duke of Burbon: They ariued at the parke walls certayne howres before day, and by the working of their Masons & ready wills of their souldiors, they cast downe to the earth threeskore fadome of wall: by which breach being entred within the parke, the first squadron drew towards Mirabell, & the residue of the army tooke the way to the campe. Assone as the king vnderstoode that they were entred the parke, thinking they would draw to Mirabell, he issued oute of his lodging to feight in playne and open fielde, desyring to drawe the battell rather to that place then to anye other for thaduauntages whiche it gaue to the horsemen: he commaunded to turne the artilleries towardes thenemies, whiche beating beating them in flanke, brought great domage to the arearegard: But in the meane while, the battell of the Imperialls gaue a furious charge vppon the kings squadron which ordinarely was the battell, but as the Spanyards went, it was the arearegard: The king fought valiantly and susteyned with great courage the violence of his enemies, who with the furie of their harquebuziers constrayned his men to giue groũd, vntill the reskew of the Svvyzzers came, when the Spanyards were repulsed aswell by them as by the horsemen that charged them in flanke: But the Viceroy being called in by the Marquis of Pisquairo, who brought to the fight his launceknights, they were easily broken, not without great slaughter of the Svvyzzers, who that daye did nothing aunswer the opinion of vallour which afforetymes they had wont so honorably to expresse in battells: The king kept alwayes the middell of the battell, being enuyroned with a great garde of men at armes, And albeit he did what he could to conteyne & confirme his people, yet after he had fought long with his owne hands, his horse being slayne vnder him, him selfe lightly hurt in the face and in the hande, he was striken downe to the earth and taken prisoner by fiue souldiours that knewe not what he was: In which misfortune the Viceroy pressing into the thronge, his maiestie discloſed him selfe to him, who, with great reuerence kissed his hand and receiued him prisoner in th Emprours name. At the same tyme the Marquis of Guast with the first squadron, had defeated the horsemen that were at Mirabell: And Antho. de Leua, who as was sayd, had to that ende cast downe to the earth so great a quantitie and space of wall, as an hundred and fiftie horsemen might sallye forth in front, issued out of Pauya, and so charged the French men behinde, that he put them wholly to flight: And in that feare they were almost all stripped and trussed except the arearegard of the horsemen, which being led by Monsr d'Alenson from the beginning of the battell, retyred almost whole: It is holden for certaine, that in this battell were slayne more then eyght thowsand men of the French campe, part by the sword, and part of bodies drowned in the riuer of Thesin seeking their sauetie by swymming: of this generall number were about twenty of the most noble and apparant Lordes of Fraunce, as the Admirall, the L. Iames Chabanes, the L. Palissa and Trimouille, the Maister of the horse, Monsr d'Aubigny, Monsr de Boyssy, and Monsr de l'Escud, who beeing taken greeuously wounded by his enemies, gaue to them his life in steede of a raunsom: The prisoners that were taken were the king of Nauarre, the bastard of Sauoye, the L. Montmerancy, Saint Pauvle, Bryon, Aual, Monsr de Chandion, Monsr d'Imbercourt, Galeas Visconte, Federyk Bossolo, Bernabye Visconte, Guidanes, with many gentlemen and almost all the Capteines that escaped the slaughter of the sword: There was also taken prisoner Ierome Leandro Bishop of Brunduso the Popes Nuncio, but by commaũdement of the Viceroy, he was eftsoones set at libertie: as also Monsr Saint Pauvle & Federyk Bossole committed to the castell of Pauya, brake prison a litle after by the corrupcion of the Spanyards that had them in charge: Of th imperialls side the vniuersall slaughter exceeded not seuen hundred bodies, and not one Capteine of name except Ferrand Castriot Marquis of Saint Angeo: The Marquis of Pisquaro was wounded in two places, and Antho. de Leua lightly hurt in the legge: The praye and spoyle of this battell was so great, as there had not bene seene in Italy more rich souldiours: Of so great an armie, there was preserued but the arearegard of foure hundred launces commaunded by Monsr d'Alenson, they neuer came to the fight, neuer suffered charge, nor neuer were followed, but leauing behind them their baggage, they retyred whole to Pyemont, their feare making them more hastye to flee, then carefull of their honor: And as one calamitie followeth an other, so the losse of the battell was no sooner reapported at Myllan, then Theoder Tryuulce who laye there in garrison with foure hundred launces, departed and tooke his way to Musocquo all the souldiours following him by trowpes, Insomuch as the same day that the king lost the battell, all the Duchie of Myllan was made free from the iurisdiction of the French.

The day after the victorie, the king was led prisoner to the Rocke of Pisqueton, for that the Duke of Myllan in regard of his propper sewertie, consented hardly that the person of the king should be kept within the castell of Myllan: he was garded with great ielousie and watche, but in all other things except his libertie, he was vsed and honored as apperteyned to the state and maiestie of a king.

IN the booke before, you haue seene set downe the ouerthrowe of the French armie in the battell of Pauia, A wretched successe where was so great exspectacion of victorie: you haue seene a mightie king deliuered vppe prisoner into the handes of him with whome he contended for glorye & imperie, A spectacle most tragicall amongest all the calamities that fortune bringeth vppon mans mortalitie: you haue seene the moste parte of the nobilitie and honorable Capteines of Fraunce slayne in the seruice and presence of their king, A matter that made more lamentable his owne condicion and aduersitie: you haue seene the residue of that armie, so vniuersally perplexed with feare and confusion, that the same thing that should haue reteyned them in so great affliction, made them the lesse assured and further of from confidence: Lastly, you haue seene the lowsse hartes and pusillanimitie of the Svvyzzers, A nation which in the warres past, had fought in Italy with so great name and glory: But the thing that most wonderfully encreased the reputacion of the Victors, was the general feare and astonishment of all the Potentats in Italy, who looking into the felicitie of the Imperialls carying so honorable a victorie with so litle losse to them selues, could not but make a desperat reckoning of their own saueties: In which astonishmēt, they set before their eyes all those daungers which either doubt or dispaire could stirre vp: Their feare would not let them hope for the thinges that reasonably might comfort them: And whatsoeuer their amazed minds suspected, the same did they feare would assuredly happen vnto thē: Lastly when they saw them selues disarmed on all sides, And th Emprours forces most mighty in the field without impediment of ennemies, they could not but giue a greuous sentēce against their own estate & condicion: And in this cōfusion they could not be so much assured & cōforted by the opiniō which many had of the good intēcion of th Emprour, of his honorable inclinacion to peace, & of his ververtuous minde not to vsurpe the estates of others, as their passions were redoubled by the consideracion of their great daungers, most manifest to the eye, and no lesse fearefull to their mindes, in which lay suppressed all that resolucion and constancie which reasonable men should expresse chiefly in times of aduersities: They doubted least th Emperour, pushed on either by ambicion, (naturall almost to all earthlie Princes) or by insolencie (which commonly accompanieth victories) or caried by the importunate couetousnes of those that gouerned his affaires in Italie, or lastly set on by the vniuersall perswasions of his councell and court: They doubted I say, least in these vehement respectes, and in an occasion so sufficient to sette an edge vppon the dullest spirite that was, he woulde not dispose his thoughtes to make him selfe absolute Lorde ouer all Italie: Wherein they were not ignorant howe easie it is to euerie great Prince, but muche more to an Emperour of Rome, to iustefie his enterprises with titles appearing comelie and resonable. This feare and astonishment did not onely occupie those potentates that were of meane force and authoritie, but also euen the Pope and the Venetians were no lesse trauelled then the others: The Venetians beganne to call into remorse and conscience, the faulte they had committed against th Emperour without iust cause, in not following the capitulacions of the confederacion: And also the memorie of auncient hatreds and iniuries betwene them and the house of Austrich, together with the greate warres they had had, not many yeares before with his grandfather Maximilian: By which they feared would be reuiued in the estates which they possessed in the firme land, the name and memorie of the rightes of th Empire which were almost buried and forgotten: as also they cast this coniecture, that whosoeuer had any purpose to make him selfe great in Italie, would haue his first recourse to lay plottes to embase and pul downe their too much puisance and greatnes: And for the Pope, his passion was this, that except the maiestie of the Popedom which euen in the times of the auncient reuerence that the worlde bare to the sea Apostolike was oftentimes ill assured of the greatnes of th Emperours, he was in all other regardes very easie to be endomaged, as being disarmed of forces, depriued of money, the Church in an vniuersall weakenesse for want of strong townes, the mindes of the people not vnited nor firme in deuocion to their Prince, all the free holdes and dependaunces of the Church full of diuisions and factions, the one parte being Guelffes, and the other parte Gebelins, and the Gebelins by an auncient and naturall impression, inclined to the name of th Emperours, and lastlie the Citie of Rome more then all other places, defiled and weakened with these seedes and rootes of diuisions: The Pope also called into care and reckoning the estate of Florence, which depending vppon him, and being the verie peculiar and auncient greatnesse of his house, it was happily no lesse deare to his harte then the estate of the Church, and assuredlie no lesse easie to be innouated and chaunged: for as that Citie, since the passage of king Charles, hauing chassed out the familie of Medicis, and vnder the name of libertie, was diuolued to a gouernment popular for eighteene yeres space, stoode so ill contented with the returne of the Medicis, that there were very few to whom in deede was agreable their puisance & greatnes: so also the Pope feared vehemently least to so mighty occasions, were not added a forward will and desire to offende that state: Wherein also he had reason to doubt that that same desire and enuy was not lesse, not so much for the regard of ambicion in the most mightie from which who is least puisant, is neuer wholly assured, as for feare that for many reasons, his name in that time were not odious to th Emperour: And albeit he made discourses in him selfe how much,

both in the life of Pope Leo, and afterwardes ſince he was Cardinall, he had trauelled for the greatneſſe of thEmperour, ſo farre foorth as Pope Leo and he with their greate exſpenſes and daungers, had opened him the waye in Italie to ſo greate a puiſſance, and that for his owne particular, ſince his election to the Popedome, he had giuen money to his Capteynes, and made the Florentins to contribute during the Admiralls being in Italie, without reuoking from his armie the regimentes of the Church and the bandes of Florence: yet, either in conſideracion of his office wherein he is a father and paſtour indifferent betwene Princes Chriſtian, and rather the author of peace then the nourriſher of warres: or elſe for that he had begon verie lately to ſuſpect and feare ſuche a greatneſſe, he was retyred, and ſo giuen ouer to runne the ſame fortune, that neither he woulde renew the confederacion made by his predeceſſor for the defenſe of Italie, neither ayde him with money when the yeare before, the Duke of Burbon entred with his armie into Prouence: And albeit theſe matters had not giuen to thEmprours Capteines any iuſt cauſe to complaine, ſeeing he was not as yet bounde by the league of Adrian to be concurrant againſt the frenchemen in the warres of Italie: Yet they were beginninges to make him not eſteemed the ſame man with thEmperour, but diminiſhed muche of the faith that till that day they had in him, as men who caried onely either by their appetites or by neceſſitie, thought themſelues offended, if, to their particular enterpriſes dreſſed to occupie Fraunce, others did not as it were lay to their handes according to theexamples before of others begon, vnder title to aſſure Italie againſt the power of the frenche: The complaintes and diſpleaſures beganne to diſcouer themſelues at ſuch times as the french king paſſed the mountes to recouer the Duchie of Mylan: for, albeit the Pope according to the complaint he made afterwardes to thEmperour by a letter which he wrote to him, had ſecretly diſtributed certeine quantities of money to the frenchmen at their returne from Marſeilles, yet afterwardes he had no ſtraite familiarity or intelligence with them: but aſſone as the king had made a conqueſt of the Citie of Millan, he entred into capitulacions with him, taking his reaſon vppon the good euent and traine of his affaires; Of which he excuſed himſelfe to thEmperour with this allegacion, that in that time, his Capteines forbearing to communicate with him any parte of their plots or purpoſes by the ſpace of twentie dayes, and diſpairing afterwards of the preſeruacion of that ſtate, not without ſome feare of the kingdome of Naples for that the Duke of Albania drewe with his regimentes towardes Tuskane: he was conſtrained to looke to his ſuretie, and yet neuertheleſſe the regard of his proper daunger did not ſo muche carie him, but that he did accorde with condicions no leſſe fauorable and prouiding for thEmperours affaires then his owne, and did refuſe verie great offers which the frenche king tendred, to thende to make him enter into the allyance ioyntly with him: And yet neuertheleſſe theſe excuſes had not ſuche operacion, but that thEmperour and his Capteines were muche troubled, not ſo muche for that they ſawe themſelues whollie depriued of hope to haue any more ſuccours of him, as for the doubt they had that the capitulacion conteyned not ſome further matter then thobligacion of newtralitie: Beſides, they conſtrued that in all ſortes he had giuen too great reputacion to thenterpriſe of the frenchmen, & had this further feare alſo, leaſt the Pope were the meane that the Venetians were not brought to followe his example, a matter which afterwardes was diſcerned to bee true by certeyne letters and bills founde in the kinges tent after the victorie: Laſtly the Pope had kindeled theſe ſuſpicions and diſcontentmentes when he conſented that the munitions lent by the

Duke of Ferrara to the French king when he lay affore Pauia, ſhould not only paſſe through his landes, but alſo he gaue ayde to the conduction of them: But muche more were theſe quarrels broached at ſuche time as the Duke of Albanie went to the enterpriſe of the realme of Naples, not onely for that he was receyued and honored as a friende along all the eſtates of the Church and the Florentins, but alſo he ſtayed certayne dayes about Siena to reforme at his inſtance the gouernment of that citie: whiche albeit was the cauſe to prolong the Dukes voyage into the realme of Naples, and that it was a matter ſolicited principally by him to that ende, as beeing a thing troubleſome to him that vpon one man ſhoulde be layde the iuriſdiction of Naples and Millan: yet thimperialls in that reſpect had made an interpretation, that betwene the French king and him was a further bonde, then a ſimple promiſe not to offende one an other. So that it was not without good reaſon that the Pope did not onely feare together with the other Potentates, to be inuaded by the imperialls vpon euery concurrance of time and occaſion: But alſo he had his feare particular, that without exſpecting an oportunitie more great, they would bring on their fortune preſently euen to ſet vpon the eſtate of the Church, or to execute ſome action agaynſt the common weale of Florence: But the thing whiche more redoubled hys feare, was, that the Duke of Albanie aſſone as he was aduertiſed of the kings calamitie, retyred from the Mount Rotondo towards Bracciano for his ſafetie: And hauing alſo ſent thither a cornet of an hundred and fiftie horſemen that were within Rome, whom the Pope cauſed to accompany him thither for his garde, fearing the preparations which the Duke of Seſſo and the Imperials made to defeate the regimentes of the Duke of Albanie: And comming from Sermonete about foure hundred horſe and twelue hundred footemen of the bandes of the Vrſins, beeing followed by Iulio Colonno with many trowpes of horſemen and footemen, it happned that he ouerthrewe them at the Abbey of three fountaynes, who fleeing for their ſafetie into the citie of Rome, where they entred at the gates of ſaint Paule and ſaint Sebaſtian, the bandes of Iulio entred with them pelmell, and in their rage killed diuerſe of them in the fielde of Flora and other places of the Citie: Vpon whiche occaſion the whole Citie drawing into tumult tooke armes, firſt with a great feare, and afterwards with no litle indignation of the Pope, for the ſlender regarde and reuerence that was giuen to his authoritie: But in ſuche a doubt and generall trauell of minde, he had occurrant the counſells and offers of the Venetians, who beeing of them ſelues entred into the like feare, laboured to perſwade him with no ſmall inſtance, that by their common ayde and meanes there might be procured to diſcende into Italie with all ſpeede, a regiment of ten thouſande Svvizzers, and calling alſo into their paye an other colonie of Italians, they might ioyne in groſſe to oppoſe agaynſt ſo manyfeſt and huge daungers: Wherein they promiſed for their partes (whiche is their ordinary cuſtome) farre greater things then they are wont to obſerue: They alleaged that it was many monthes ſince the Launceknightes within Pauia had bene payed, who ſeeing ſince the victorie the ſame difficulties of payment to continue, were become mutinous, and ceazing vpon the artilleries, were drawne into a ſetled ſtrength within Pauia: That becauſe the Capteines had no meane to make good their payment, all the reſidue of the armie was drawne into tumult, and murmured euerye day more and more: In ſo muche as both he and they falling ſpeedily into armes, both their common eſtates were aſſured, and the occaſion was enterteined by the which they would of themſelues fall into diſorder, beeing no leſſe embarked into thoſe difficulties, then conſtrayned to keepe continually great forces for the garde of the king that was priſoner: To this they added that there was no doubt that the Lady Regent through whoſe hands paſſed the gouernment of Fraunce, and in whom was no ſmall deſire to further that vnion, would not onely make marche at their inſtance the Duke of Albanie with his regimentes, and the foure hundred Launces of the arearegarde reſerued of the battell: but alſo would induce the vniuerſall conſent of the kingdome of Fraunce to be concurrant for the ſafetie of Italie, with a greate ſumme of money, as knowing that therevpon depended the greateſt parte of their hope to recouer the king: Laſtely they vrged this deliberation to be good and neceſſary, if it were with the ſame ſpeede put in execution: but to deferre and temporiſe, were to giue meane to thimperialls to reduce their condition and reorder themſelues, the rather for that who ſo euer tooke not a reſolution to enter into armes, ſtoode in caſe of conſtraynt to compound with them and to giue them money: which was no other thing then to become an inſtrument & meane to deliuer them from all their difficulties, and ſubmit themſelues wilfully vnder a yoke of perpetuall ſubiection: Moreouer they put him in hope, that the Duke of Ferrara would follow them, who like as both for his auncient dependancie of the Frenche, and for the ayde which in that warre he had adminiſtred to the king, was not without his feare: ſo alſo his coniunction ſeemed of no litle importance, no leſſe for the commoditie of his eſtate in the warres of Lombardie (Ferrara beeing a very ſtrong towne) then for his great ſtore of munitions and artilleries, and (as the brute went) for his right huge wealth of golde and ſiluer. But neyther the hope to ouercome an enterpriſe ſo harde and daungerous, which with wiſe men ought to cary no litle care and impreſſion: nor the conſideration of perilles furtheſt off and remoued, to the which tyme is wont to bring thoſe remedies which the wit of man could not finde out: nor anye other thing of what property or operation ſoeuer, could not encline the Pope to open his eares to ſuche ſpeeches and perſwaſions, had not a feare to be inuaded preſently, induced him to laye him ſelfe downe rather to the daunger leaſt certayne, then to the perill that ſeemed moſte aſſured and moſte preſent: And therefore the practiſes were ſo farre aduaunced betweene them, and they ſtaying vppon nothing but to ſet downe the capitulations by writing, there was exſpectation from howre to howre to contract and accorde: In ſo muche as the Pope, who perſwaded himſelfe of the concluſion, diſpatched in poſt to the king of Englande, Ieronimo Ghinuccio a Siennois and Auditor of thapoſtolike chamber, whoſe commiſſion was to labor to diſpoſe the king to oppoſe his forces againſt ſuche a greatnes of themperour. In the very inſtant of this expedicion aryued with good oportunitie the Archbiſhop of Capua his auncient ſecretorie and counſellor, and for many yeres of great authoritie with him: he aſſone as he was aduertiſed of the victory of thimperials, departed from Plaiſance, and went to the campe of Don Charles de Lauoy Viceroy of Naples, and being reſolued of his intention, he tooke poſt horſe to go to the Pope, to whom he caryed an aſſured hope of accorde: for at that tyme the Viceroy and the other Capteines were occupied with two thoughtes and perplexities: the one to prouide money to content the armie, which for want of paye they ſawe began to decline into manyfeſt confuſion: the other, to cary the perſon of the French king into ſuch a place as the difficultie to garde him ſhould not keepe them in continuall care and feare: Which two things being eſtabliſhed, they iudged them to ſtande in degree and condition alwayes hable to execute and put to effect their purpoſes: In which reſpect they deſired accorde with the Pope, pretending thereby to drawe from him a great quantitie of money: wherevnto ſeeking to diſpoſe him the rather by feare,

Thimperialls determine to accorde with the Pope.

and alſo in releeuing theſtate of Millan, which was almoſte waſted with the burden of ſouldiours, they ſent to lye vpon the countrey of Plaiſanca foure hundred men at armes and eight thouſand launceknightes, not as enemies, but alleaging ſometimes the pouerty of the Duchie of Millan to be farre vnhable to nouriſhe ſo great an armie: and ſometimes threatning to make them marche vp to the territories of Rome to ſeeke out the Duke of Albanie if the regimentes of men of warre that had bene leauyed by the Vrſins were not retyred and diſſolued: But theſe induſtries and diligences were ſuperfluous, for that aſſoone as the Pope was aſſured to auoyde the daungers preſent, he lefte there all his other thoughtes, and diſpoſed his minde wholly to thaccorde: In which inclination concurring alſo the reaſons and counſell of tharchbiſhop, he ſent after thauditor of the Chamber, to countermaunde him backe agayne: And to take awaye all occaſions that might hinder thaccorde, he wrought ſo that the Duke of Albanie diſperſed his whole armie, excepte thoſe bandes of footemen and horſemen that were of beyonde the Mountes: he lodged the Duke within Corneto, after he had on thother ſide receyued promiſe of themperours commaunders, to giue leaue alſo to their ſouldiours that laye vpon the paſſages of Rome, and cauſe to ſtaye Askanius Colonno with the other companies that came from the kingdome: He alſo was an interpoſer with the Colonnois, beginning to moleſt the lands of the Vrſins, to deſiſt and depoſe armes.

The Pope both deſyred and did all he could to bring the Venetians comprehended within thaccorde whiche he ſolicited with the Viceroy, but the onely difficultie that reſiſted was, that they refuſed to paye ſo muche money as the Viceroy demaunded of them: for he required of them ſo muche money as had bene ſpente in the warre, to the which they ought to contribute, and that hereafter they ſhould make their contribution not with men but with money: The like demaunde did he alſo make to all thoſe that were comprehended in the confederation made with Adrian: But it made well for the Pope that the Venetians ſhewed themſelues harde & ſtraite, becauſe they put the Viceroy in ſuſpicion that they layde for newe ſtirres and commotions: And whyleſt theſe matters were negociated with a very aſſured hope of concluſion, the Florentins, by the Popes ordinance, ſent xxv. thouſande ducketts to the Marquis of Piſquairo for thenterteinment of tharmye, hauing firſt receyued promiſe from Iohn Bart. de Gattinaro who negociated with the Pope for the Viceroy, that that ſumme ſhould be percell of the principall ſumme which was to be payd to him by vertue of the newe capitulacion: And not many dayes afore the reſolution and concluſion of the ſayd capitulation, the duke of Albanie, who for his returning into Fraunce had taried for the nauy at ſea, which being now come, & alſo the gallies that were ſent him, he imbarked himſelfe in them together with the gallies of the Pope which were ſent to him by conſent of the Viceroy, and had neuertheles no ſafeconduit neither for the one nor for the other: Ranſe de Cere was imbarked with him, together with thartilleries which he had had from Siena and Lucquay, and foure hundred horſe, a thouſand launceknightes, with a very ſmal trowpe of Italians, the reſidue of the regiments being retyred and gone away by trowpes: The reſidue of the horſes were partly ſolde, and partly left there. It was diſcerned clearly by the dealing and proceding of the Duke of Albanie, that the purpoſe of his ſending thither, was eyther to diuert thimperialls from the Duchie of Millan for feare of the kingdome of Naples: or elſe through that feare to induce them to accorde, and aſwell for that cauſe he had marched ſlowly, as for that the forces which the king had giuen him, were not ſufficient for ſuche an enterpriſe.

But at laſte leauing out the Venetians, the confederation was concluded within Rome the firſt day of Aprill, betweene the Pope and Florentins on the one part, and themprour of thother, for whom the Viceroy vndertooke being his lieftenant generall in Italie, and for the Viceroy, Iohn Bart. de Gattinaro nephew to themprours chief Chauncellor being in Rome with full and ample commiſſion. Theffect of the Capitulations moſt importing was this: That betwene the Pope and themprour ſhould be a perpetuall amitie and confederation, by the which both the one and the other ſhoulde be bound to defende with a certayne proportion of men, the Duchie of Millan, being then poſſeſſed vnder the name of themperour, by Frauncis Sforce, who was named as principall in this capitulation: That themperour ſhould take into his protection, all the eſtates which the Church helde, together with thoſe which the Florentins poſſeſſed, and particularly the houſe of Medicis with all the authoritie and preheminences which that famulie helde in that Citie: That the Florentins ſhould pay preſently an hundred thouſande duckets, for recompence of their parte of contribucion in the laſte warres, by vertue of the league made by Pope Adrian, which themperour pretended not to be diſſolued by his death, for that it was manifeſtly expreſſed vpon the capitulations to endure one yere after the ſeuerall death of the confederates: That thimperials ſhould retyre their forces from of the church eſtates, and not to ſende afterwardes any bandes of ſouldiours to harbour or lodge there without the Popes conſent. There was place lefte for the Venetians to enter into this confederation within the tearme of twenty dayes vnder reaſonable conditions which were to be declared by the Pope and themperour. Moreouer it was accorded that the Viceroy ſhould be bound to bring in within foure monthes themperours ratification to all theſe capitulations: And thoſe that were delegates and deputies for the Viceroy, were bounde ſeuerally to a capitulation confirmed by othe, that if themperour within the ſayd time did not ratifie the ſayde capitulations, the Viceroy ſhould repay ouer agayne the ſayde hundred thouſande duckets: And yet ſo long as they were not repayed, the league ſhould haue his full obſeruation, to the which were added theſe three articles, not being any of the text of the capitulation, but ſet downe in articles apart, and confirmed alſo by othe: That in all cauſes and actions of benefices of the realme of Naples, it ſhould be permitted to the Popes to vſe the ſame authoritie and iuriſdiction as was diſpoſed by the inueſtitures of the kingdome: That hereafter the Duchie of Millan ſhould make all their prouiſion of ſalte from Ceruia, according to the price and order which had bene aforetime couenanted betwene Pope Leo and the French king nowe reigning, and confirmed in the capitulation which the ſayde Pope Leo made with themperour in the yeare a thouſande fiue hundred twentie and one: That the Viceroy ſhould ſo worke and labour, as the Duke of Ferrara ſhould immediatly render to the Church, Reggia, Rubiera, with ſuche other townes as he had taken during the vacation of the ſea by the death of Adrian: And that in conſideration thereof, the Pope aſſone as he ſhould be repoſſeſſed of them, ſhould pay to themperour an hundred thouſande duckets, and at the firſt requeſt to be made to him, to abſolue the Duke of Ferrara of the Cenſures and priuations which he had incurred, but not of the penaltie of an hundred thouſande duckets which he had promiſed in caſe of breaking the bond made with Adrian: And yet neuertheles after the Pope had recouered poſſeſſion, there ſhould be ſearche and examination made in lawe, whether thoſe townes, together with Modena, apperteined to the Church or to the Empire: And if they were founde to be the rightes of thempire, then they ſhould ſtande holden and recognized in chief of themperour, and otherwise to remayne free to the sea Apostolike.

This deliberation of the Pope was diuersly interpreted, according to the diuersitie of mens passions and iudgementes: but especially did varye the construction of the popular sorte, to whom suche counsels as carye the fayrest shewes seeme commonly more acceptable and pleasing, then those that are disgested with good maturitie of reasons: The common people also according to their lightnesse and credulitie, do for the most part esteeme for wise and noble, suche men as measure things not by discression and experience, but by affection and light relation: There were also some that professed to desire the libertie of Italie, who blamed the Popes dealing, as though through pucillanimitie and infirmitie of courage he had let slippe thoccasion to vnite it agaynst themperour, and to deliuer him selfe from all disorders: But most men of deeper iudgement and insight in matters of state, were of an other opinion: They sawe howe farre it had bene from wise counsell to oppose resistance with newe companies agaynst so glorious and victorious an armie: They considered by howe many reasons the comming of the Svvizzers might be long and dilatorie, and with what difficulties they shoulde passe notwithstanding they were ready to discende: And yet wayghing with their custome and inconstancie of their nature, the fresh wound which they had so lately receyued, there was no assurance of their comming: These wise men sawe also that there was no better hope or exspectation on the French side, eyther for that by reason of so great an ouerthrow they stoode depriued both of courage and counsell, or else there remayned no prouision of money, nor any supply of men of warre to refurnishe the bandes (those fewe that escaped the lamentable slaughter of the battell beeing so spoyled of their furniture and baggage, that they stoode neede both of time and money to readresse them): So that this vnion caryed no other fundation apparant or probable, then a naked hope that tharmie of thenemies would not come on nor moue for wante of money: A matter which though it came so to passe, yet they remayned not for all that depriued of the Duchie of Millan, which so long as it stoode at the deuotion of themperour, the Pope could not be without a perpetuall occasion of feare: And yet that hope was not without his vncertenties, for that it drewe with it this feare, that the Capteines, eyther by their authoritie, or by their pollicie, or lastly by propounding to the souldiors the sacke of some riche towne of the Churche or of Tuskane, would dispose the armie to marche: And of this inclination was discerned this manifest token, that one part of the Launceknightes to seeke a place of harbor of more benefite and conueniencie, were passed the ryuer of Pavv, and come vppon the landes of Parma and Plaisanca: In so muche as if they had any intention to passe further, it could not be but all remedies would come to late, and also so great a deliberation was grounded with too great a daunger, vpon a bare hope of the disorders of thenemies, who neuertheless had it in their power and will to ridde them selues out of their disorders. Then the counsell of the Pope seemed discret and well considered according to the time that then ranne, but it had happly ben more commendable, if in all the articles of the capitulation he had vsed the same discression, and disposed his wit rather to close vp and make whole all the woundes of Italie, then to open and make sharpe any one of consequence: Wherein he had wisely imitated the order of the skilfull Phisitions, who when the remedies they prepare to cure thindisposition of thinferiour members, augment the maladie of the head or the heart, they throwe away all care of griefes and infirmities most light, and with the fauour of tyme they proceede carefully to the cure of that which most importeth and carieth moſt neceſſitie of remedy for the ſafety and good health of the pacient: But the better to explaine and ſignifie ſuch a matter, it is neceſſarie we diſcend more deepely into the diſcourſe of one parte of thoſe things which we haue ſet downe ſeuerally heare and there, and reduce them into one place and order.

The rightes & pretenſions of the familie of Eſt.

They of the family and houſe of Eſt, beſides that they haue bene poſſeſſed of long time vnder the title of the Vicaires of the Church, of the iuriſdiction of Ferrara: were Lords alſo for many yeares of Reggia and Modena by vertue of inueſtiture from the Emperours, for that in thoſe times there was none that called into doubt why thoſe two Cities were not ſubiect to the Empire: They were enioyed peaſibly vntill Pope Iulio the ſecond (he whoſe cuſtome was to vncouer the auncient titles and rightes of the Church long buried with tract of time, & vnder ſhadow of piety, was the author of many ills) begon the warre with Duke Alfonſo, to reduce wholly Ferrara vnder the obedience of the Church: By the occaſion and accidents of this warre, the Pope tooke from him Modena, and at the beginning reteined it for him ſelfe, as though, together with all the other townes euen to the riuer of Pavv, it had apperteined to the ſea Apoſtolike, as being parte of the partage or diuiſion of Rauenna: But a litle after he gaue it to th Emperour Maximilian for feare of the frenchemen, and yet he ceaſſed not for all that the warre againſt Alfonſo, but tooke from him afterwardes Reggia: yea it was beleued that (in that humor of authority & ambicion) if he had liued longer, he would haue depriued him alſo of Ferrara: Not that he accõpanied his action with equitie, but for the hatred and enuie he bare to Alfonſo, wherein he not only ſought to couer his ambicion with pietie, pretending vnder that pretext to recouer to the Church all that he could find had bene holden by her in any time: but alſo vnder ſuche a ſhadowe, he puſhed on the diſdaine he had to Alfonſo, for that he followed rather the amitie of Fraunce, then depended of him: yea in this malicious diſpoſicion was happily concurrant the vnappeaſible hatred which he boare to the memory and relikes of Alexander the ſixt his predeceſſor, whoſe daughter called Lucrece had bene maried to the Duke Alfonſo, of which mariage were procreated many children: The ſayde Pope Iulio left by his death to his ſucceſſors not only the ſucceſſion of Reggia, but alſo the ſame thirſt & deſire to get Ferrara, wherunto they ſeemed to be inclined for the glorious memorie he had left of him ſelfe to poſterity: for which reaſon that ambicion was more mighty in Leon his ſucceſſor, then the regard to the greatnes which the houſe of Medicis had in Florence, on whoſe behalfe it ſeemed more profitable that the puiſance of the church ſhould diminiſh, then to haue it made more redoubted to all her neighbours, by annexing of Ferrara to it: And in deede after he had bought Modena, he diſpoſed his ſpirites and ſtudy wholly to the getting of Ferrara, and that more by practiſe and ambuſhes, then with force open and diſcloſed, for that it would haue bene an enterpriſe of too great difficulties, ſince Alfonſo by the conſideracion of his owne daungers, fortefied him ſelfe on all ſides, and made plentifull prouiſion of artilleries and municions, and as the brute went, had confirmed his ſtrength with huge proporcions of wealth and treaſure: it may be his hatreds were greater then the hatreds of Iulio, euen ſo were they managed with more ſecrecy and ſuttletie: wherein beſides many plots which he layed to take Ferrara, either by ſurpriſe or by fraude, he paſſed ſuch manner of obligacions with thoſe Princes that he made alliance withall, that at leaſt they were reſtrained to hinder him in this enterpriſe: That held him, not onely during the life of Iulian his brother and Laurence his nephew, for whoſe greatnes and exaltacion it was thought he was caried with that ambicion, but alſo euen after their death: Yea he was ſo ouer-

ruled with that burning desire, that many were perswaded that therevpon proceded his last deliberation (more rashe then discrete) to knitte with themperour agaynst the French king: In so muche that by necessitie Alfonso was constrayned to satisfie the French king (being his onely founder and hope) in making warre vppon them of Modena, at suche time as the armies of Pope Leo and themperour helde Pauia besieged: In which warre albeit he had receyued a verye yll succesſe, yet he had bene reduced into farre greater difficulties, if Pope Leo euen amidde the course and dayes of his victories, had not bene called into the other life by sodayne death: An accident which assuredly chaunced no lesse aptly and conueniētly to him and to his affayres, then the death of Iulio: And it may be doubted, whether at last Adrian that was succesſor to Leo, was not infected with that property of couetousnesse, although both for his newe creation, and want of trayning in thaffayres of Italie, he gaue him absolution of the Censures in the very firste tymes of his comming to Rome: He graunted him also of newe thinuestiture of the Duchie, with permission to reteyne all that he had possessed during the vacation of the sea: He brought him also into a generall hope to make restitution of Modena & Reggia, though afterwards vpon better information of thestate and condition of things, he well expressed how farre his wyll was estraunged from his promise: But by the creation of Pope Clement, Alfonso entred into a great feare to returne eftsoones into the same daungers wherein he was intangled before: He tooke his reason of this feare, for that if things had happely succeeded with Clement, the same propertie of disposition woulde haue bene found in him, which had alwayes followed Iulio and Leo: But as thoccasion was not yet ripe for Ferrara, so he made his next practise and preparation to haue agayne Reggia and Rubiera, as an enterprise of more facilitie and better to bee iustified by the late possession whiche the Churche had of them, and as though in that regarde he coulde not but beare dishonour and infamie, to leaue them vnrecouered: Vpon which selfe suggestions and reasons, he tooke occasion bothe in many other sortes affore, and lastly in the capitulation with the Viceroy, to occupie his memorie with that deuise more often then many desyred: who as they looked into the daungers hanging ouer euery mans head by the greatnesse of themperour, and to breake the same sawe no better remedie then a ready and generall vnion of all the states of Italie together, that the tyme might cut out occasions and necessities euery daye to take armes: So they iudged it a better course for the Pope not to stirre and kindle the Duke of Ferrara, and muche lesse to put him into necessitie to seeke his reskewe betweene the armes of themperour, agaynst whose forces, whose fortune, and whose felicities, the tyme gaue them no power to oppose: And for the particular of the Duke, he was a Prince riche, which in conference of actions and enterprises, is not of the least consideration, and for his trayning and experience well hable to foresee and auoyde, a vertue moste commendable in a Prince whether his case be to defende or offende: Besides, aswell for the congruencie of his estate, as for his other conditions, the present diuisions and conspiracies of the tyme, required rather to cal him into affection and assurance, then to leaue him perplexed with hatred or feare: And yet it may be doubted whether to do benefite and pleasure to one perswaded that he hath receyued iniuries, bee sufficient to wype out of a minde yll disposed and full of iealousie, the memorie of wronges and offences, specially when the pleasure is done at a time when it seemes it proceedes more by necessitie then of good will.

After this capitulation was resolued, the Pope not to omitte anye conuenient

office to so great a Prince as the French king, by permission of the Viceroy, sent the Bishoppe of Pistoya to visite and comforte him in his name: There past betwene the king and hym but generall speeches, and that in the presence and hearing of Capteyne Alarcon, wherein he chiefly besought the Pope to make some good solicitation for hym to themperour: He asked him also, in suche secrecie as the lycence of a prisoner woulde suffer, what was become of the Duke of Albanie, and was aunswered to his great griefe, that one parte of hys armie beeing broken and retyred, he was returned with the residue into Fraunce. In these tymes they of Lucquay accorded with the Viceroy, who receyued them into the protection of themperour, vnder condition of tenne thousande duckets: By whose example also thinhabitantes of Syena contracted with him for fifteene thousande duckets without bynding him to maynteine more the one forme of gouernment then the other: for that of the one side, the famulie of Motenouo who at the instance of the Pope and by the meane of the Duke of Albanie, had resumed thauthoritie, which neuertheles was not as yet well confirmed: & on the other part, those who by the profession they made to desire libertie were commonly called Libertins, tooke hart by reason of the battell of Pauia, and would not endure the pollitie and gouernment introduced by the forces of the French king: Both partes sent messengers to the Viceroy to incline him, and to worke him fauourable to their seuerall doinges, and receyuing from him no certayne resolution touching the forme of gouernment, they ioyned both together and solicited readily composition: whiche beeing established and set downe, and the men ariued whom the Viceroy sent to receyue the money, it hapned both in their presence and in the very action of counting the money, that Ierome Seuerino a Citisen of Siena, who had bene sometime with the Viceroy, slue Alexander Dichio both chiefe of the newe gouernment, and also to whom the Pope had assigned at that tyme the whole reputation: The residue of the Citisens of faction and conspiracie with him, vppon that alarme tooke armes, concurring with them the commotion and consociation of the populars, beeing yll contented that the pollicie shoulde eftsoones returne vnder the yoke of tyrannie: In whiche vniuersall emotion and rysing they chased out the chieftaynes of the famulie of Montonouo, and reducing the Citie to a reformation, they readdressed eftsoones the gouernment popular, beeing bothe enemie to the Pope and adherent to themperour: It was beleeued that this alteration of pollicie was eyther done directlye with the priuitie of the Viceroy, or at least not without his great allowing and approbation, seeing it brought no little commoditie to thaffayres of themperour to haue at hys deuotion that Citie, whiche for her forces is very mightie and puissant, for the oportunitie of her portes and hauens, of greate regarde for marine enterprises, for her fertilitie of countreys very riche and plentifull, for her neighborhoode to the realme of Naples, very congruent and apte, and for her situation betweene Rome and Florence not of least respect and reason to fauour hys affayres: And yet both the Viceroy and Duke of Sessa had giuen hope to the Pope not to alter the gouernment introduced with hys fauour. There were many other townes in Italie who taking example of thinclination of them of Lucquay and Sienna, followed the fortune of the victors: Amongest these was the Marquis of Montferat, who compounded for fifteene thousand duckets: And the duke of Ferrara made a loane to the Viceroy of fiftie thousande duckets, vnder promise to haue them repaied if they did not capitulate together: he tooke his reason of that loane vpon the present condition of his affayres which could not be established so speedily, both for the respects

they bare to the capitulation made with the Pope, and also for the necessitie to vnderstande firste the will of the Emperour: But with the money of that loane, together with a hundred thousande duckets whiche were promised from the Duchie of Millan, and the imposition of Sienna and Lucquay, together with some proportion of treasure sente to Genes by Themperour for the supportation of the warre (whiche neuertheless came after the victorie) the Capteines set downe the payes of the army according to the rate and quantitie of the money that came, meaning to pay the souldiors for all that was paste, and to sende backe from hande to hande the Almains into Germanie: So that no tokens appearing that there was any intention at that tyme to followe the course of the victorie agaynst any man, since the Viceroy bothe had ratified the capitulation made with the Pope according to his requeste, and also had put in negociation at the same tyme a newe appoyntment with the Venetians whiche he greatly desyred. The eyes of euery man were set to beholde with what propertie of affection themperour woulde receyue his gladsome newes, and to what endes his thoughtes were disposed: who so farre as exteriour demonstrations made showe of, expressed great tokens of a minde muche moderated, and verye apte to resiste easily the prosperitie of fortune: yea the signes and inclinations appearing seemed so muche the more incredible, by howmuch he was a Prince mightie and young, and as yet had neuer tasted but of felicitie: For after he was informed truely of so greate a victorie, whereof he had the reapporte the tenth of Marche together with letters of the French kinges owne hande, written rather in the spirite and condition of a prisoner, then wyth the courage of a king: he wente foorthwith to the Churche to make hys holye oblations to God wyth manye solemnities, and the morning following he receyued with signes of righte greate deuotion the Sacrament of the Eucharistie, and so wente in processiõ to oure Ladies Churche oute of Madrill where was his Courte at that tyme: His temperaunce and moderation was aboue thexspectation of his estate, and farre contrarye to the custome of the tyme in matters of that nature: for he woulde not suffer anye belles to be ronge, nor bonfyres to be made, nor anye other manner of publike demonstrations, suche as are vsed for glorye or gladnesse, alleaging wyth a mynde more vertuous then insolent, that suche propertie of feasting and reioysing was due to victories obteyned agaynst Infidells, but oughte to haue no showe where one Christian ouercame an other: Neyther were the actions and gestures of hys persõne and speeches differing from so greate a temperaunce and continencie of mynde, whiche he well expressed in the aunsweres he made to the congratulations of thembassadours and greate men that were about him: to whome he sayde he was not gladde of thaccident according to the glorious operation of flesche and blood, but his reioysing was in that God had so manifestly ayded him, which he interpreted to an assured signe that he stoode in his grace and fauour, though not through his owne merite, yet by his celestiall election: Both for that he hoped nowe to haue occasion to reduce Christendome to peace, and to prepare warre against thinfidels, and also to haue meane to do good to his friends and to pardon his enemies: he sayde that albeit he might iustely appropriate to himselfe the whole victory, for that the helpe of none of his friendes did concurre in the action, yet he was contented so great a prosperitie should runne common to them all without any seperation of glory: Wherein after he had heard thembassadot of Venice, who iustified affore him the seruices done by his common weale, he said to such as stoode about him, that though his reasons and iustifications were not true, yet he woulde both accept them and repute them for true: And after he had continued certayne dayes in these speeches and demonstrations full of wisedome and moderation, he called his Counsayle together, to thende that according to his obseruation and custome, nothing were proceeded in, whiche were not well measured with maturitie of reasons and counsell: He required them by a manner of proposicion, to aduise him in what sorte he was to deale with the French king, and to what endes he was to addresse and dispose his victorie, commaunding them all to delyuer freely in his presence their seuerall opinions: Amongest them the first place of speaking was referred to the Bishop of Osimo his Confessor, who reasoned in this maner.

The Oration of the Bishop of Osimo touching the taking of the fr. king.

It is not vnknowen to your excellent Maiestie, that God hath authoritie to dispose all thinges, by the same power wherewith he hath created them of nothing: And albeit all accidentes and mortall euentes what so euer falling in this inferiour worlde, take their proceedinges and dayely mouinges of the prouidence of the-
" ternall God, yet we finde it oftentimes more especially declared in some nature of " thinges then in others, as manyfestly hath appeared vppon the succesſe of your " present victorie: for, both for the greatnesse of the glorie gotten, which is the most " honorable ende and rewarde of warre, and for the facilitie of the victorie, which iu" stifieth the innocencie and goodnesse of your cause, and also for your happines to
" haue subdued enemies moste puissant and better prepared for the warre then you,
" by which your vallour and felicitie shyneth with a clearer lighte, I thinke it can " not bee denyed that in the action hath not beene expressed an especiall will of " God drawing almoste to a myracle: Therefore by howe muche the eternall God
" hath layde this greate blessing vppon you bothe manyfestly and publikely, by so
" muche more stande you tyed in obligation and office bothe to acknowledge it
" with humilitie and submission, and by demonstration to declare howe thankefull
" you are for it. This is the sacrifice that God requireth at your handes, and to this
" calleth you the consideration of the benefite, and your christian pyetie: The acti" on whereof consisteth principally that you addresse your victorie to thexaltation
" of the seruice of God, which is the ende for the which you ought to beleeue that " he hath throwen it vppon you. And for my parte, when I looke into what tearmes " and degrees the estate of Christendome is reduced, I see no waye more holye,
" more necessarie, nor more agreable to God, then to worke an vniuersall peace be" tweene the Princes of the imperie and regiment of Christendome: Wherein I " am so muche the more touched in conscience, in office, and in calling, by howmuch
" I discerne by the generall face and showe of thinges, that without peace, both re" ligion and all her lawes and rules, and fayth whiche mortall men reappose in it,
" together with all obseruation of the commaundementes of God, which is the fun-
" dation of our Christianitie, are slyding into manyfest ruine. Your Maiestie is not " ignorant, howe on the one side we haue the nation of the Turkes, who besides they
" haue wonne great things vppon the Christians by our owne discordes and diuisi-
" ons, do nowe manifestly threaten the kingdome of Hungarie which appertaineth to " the husbande of your sister: Their ambicion goeth on increasing by the degrees
" of our separations and disagreements: And if God for our punishment suffer them " to take Hungarie, which assuredly they will take if the Christian Princes doo not
" drawe into one vnitie and amitie together, the waye is made open to them to carie
" the whole Monarchy of Germanie and Italie: A losse irreparable and no lesse tyed
" to a perpetuall infamie to the name of Christian Princes, then the seruitude

and

and yoke of barbariſme wyll be alwayes intollerable to the generall poſteritie of all Chriſtian ſowles. On the other ſide we haue the infection of Lutheraniſme, ſo ſlaunderous to thoſe that haue power to oppreſſe it, and ſo daungerous for the ſpreading it makes in all partes, that if it be not reſtrayned, the worlde is in hazarde to be repleniſhed with Heretikes: There is no other remedie for that euill then by your authoritie and puiſſance, whiche yet you can not aduaunce for the cure of this maladie, ſo long as you ſtande embarqued in other warres. But be it, that for the preſent there were neyther feare of the Turkes, nor daunger of Heretikes, yet to a Prince profeſſing pyetie and charitie, what can bee more fowle, more ſinnefull, or more to bee abhorred, then for our paſſions, and emulation of ambition, to lyue in the effuſion of ſo muche Chriſtian blood, whiche eyther with greater glory might be ſpent in the quarrell of the fayth of Chriſte, or at leaſt with better oportunitie be reſerued for tymes more neceſſarie. The warres that you nowe proſecute, drawe after them a bottomleſſe gulfe of violations and whordomes, an infinitie of ſacrileges and blaſphemies, and a world of other impious and execrable deedes: Suche as who ſo euer is a voluntary author of them can not but ſtande in a weake eſtate of grace or hope of pardon at Gods hande, ſeeing that yf neceſſitie leade him into them, he is without merite of excuſe, if at the leaſt he proceede not to the remedie of ſo great euills ſo ſpeedily as he hath the meane: It is not good to be the author of euill, but we are eſpecially bidden to beware to continue in thoſe euilles which our conſcience doth aſſure vs to offende God: So that this ought to be the ende of your Maieſties thoughtes and counſels, and the eſpeciall marke whereat you haue to ſhoote, to reduce the Princes and Potentates of Chriſtendome to an vniuerſall peace, as a matter moſte honorable, moſte holy, and moſte neceſſarie: for the manner and reall effecting whereof, your Maieſtie may take three deliberations touching the Frenche king: The firſte to keepe hym a perpetuall priſoner: The ſeconde to delyuer him friendly and brotherly without other conditions then ſuche as maye induce betweene you a perpetuall peace and amitie, and tende to cure and readdreſſe the harmes of Chriſtendome: The thirde, to exacte by his libertie as greate a profite as you can: Of theſe, two of them in my opinion do augment and prolonge the warres: but the thirde whiche is his abſolute libertie in amitie and brotherhood, is the onely remedie to remoue the warre, and reſiſte for euer all motions and occaſions to renewe it: For it is not to be doubted that the Frenche kinge for ſo ſingular a liberalitie as the free benefite of his libertie, wyll not remayne more aſſured to you in minde and affection, then he ſtandes nowe faſte bounde to you in body. Greater is the bonde of liberalitie and friendſhippe, then the lawe of kindred and blood, for that election and iudgemente make a friende, but fortune brings parentage: And if betweene your ſacred Maieſtie and hym ſhall runne a league of true vnion and concorde, all other Chriſtian Princes wyll embraſe reconciliation and agreement, and by your vertuous example, will labour ro reclayme to the body of Chriſtendome, ſuche members as lyue nowe in ſeperation: But yf you make a reſolution to deteyne hym alwayes in pryſon, beſides the apparant crueltie in the acte, whiche is contrarie to the pyetie of a Chriſtian Prince, and beſides the imputation of ignoraunce touching the mutabilitie of fortune, which in matters of victorie draweth deepe conſideration, you ſhall nouriſhe the ſeedes of mutuall warres betwene you, whiche no doubt will growe increaſing and multiplying to thindifferent ruine of you both: for in ſo doing you wyll make the world

" clamarous agaynſt your vehement thirſte after the Crowne of Fraunce, or ſome " member thereof, and dryue him in reaſon and equitie to ryſe into newe warres, to " reſiſte ſo greate an ambicion: And to chooſe the waye to deliuer him vnder capi-
" tulations for your moſte profite and aduauntage, can not bee but the worſe waye
" and an election more daungerous then bothe the others: for, make what alliance
" you will, what capitulations you can, and what obligations you thinke good, yet
" by howe muche you ſeeke to tye his libertie to ſuche conditions, by ſo muche wyll
" he take occaſion to be more and more your enemie, wherein he ſhall neuer wante
" the aſſiſtance and companie of all thoſe Princes whome he can induce to be ielouſe
" ouer your greatneſſe. In caſes of iealouſie and emulation for imperie and eſtate, it " is harde to conteyne the courage of man, though in all other occaſions nature
" hath aſſigned hym an ordinary bridle and reſtraynte: And ſuche is mans infirmitie,
" that when the heart is poſſeſſed of the iniurie, the whole bodye is caryed with a " violent motion to the paſſion of reuenge. I am not ignoraunt howe farre this opi" nion differeth from the taſte of ordinary men, neyther howe newe it is to their " eares, nor howe little confirmed with examples: But I knowe agayne howe much
" it agreeth with the maieſtie of thEmperour to diſpoſe his minde to deliberations
" extraordinary and ſingular, ſuche as the conceptions and capacitie of other men
" can not reache vnto, whome if your Maieſtie exceede in dignitie, you ought by ſo
" many degrees to ſurmount in magnanimitie; whiche will not onely leade you to " the merite and effecte of true glory, but alſo it will open your ſacred eyes to diſ-
" cerne what greater comelyneſſe it bringes to you to pardon and vſe liberalitie, then
" to puniſhe and be couetous in getting: By this your Maieſtie ſhall knowe that God
" hath not giuen you in vayne, yea almoſte miraculouſly, the power to reduce the " worlde to a peace: And that it apperteineth vnto you, after ſo many victories, af" ter ſo many graces and bleſſinges throwen vppon you by the goodneſſe of God,
" and after you haue brought ſo many Princes proſtrate at your feete, to proceede
" no more in the perſon of an enemie to anye man, but to prouide in the affection
" of a common father, for the ſafetie of all men. That glorie is vniuſte that is pur-
" chaſed with the iniurie of an other, and nature hath ſowen in man aſwell ſeedes
" of equitie and clemencie, as of iniurie and furie. The magnanimitie whiche A- " lexander the great and Iulius Cæſar haue ſhowed in pardoning their enemies, and " reſtoring kingdomes to thoſe they had vanquiſhed, hath made their names more " glorious, then their infinite victories and many triumphes: Whoſe example it im" porteth moſt thoſe men to followe, who not making glory their onely end (though
" it be a right great rewarde) do deſyre principally to do that whiche is the true and " proper office of euery Chriſtian prince. But to thende to conuince ſuche as mea" ſure humaine thinges onely with humaine endes, let vs conſider further if there re-
" mayne yet any other deliberation more conformable then this: For my parte I be" leeue, that in all the greatnes and ſoueraigne eſtate of your Maieſtie, there is no
" parte more wonderfull nor more worthy, then this recommendation and glorie,
" that you haue ſtande tyll this daye inuincible, and haue guyded all your enterpri-
" ſes to a moſte happie ende, drawing with it bothe felicitie and reputation: whiche
" as you can not but interprete to be the moſte precious iewell, and moſte ſinguler
" treaſour that God hath indued you withall, ſo he hath lefte to your Maieſtie no " better waye to eſtabliſhe it, nor fitter meane to aſſure and conſerue it, then in lea-
" uing the warres with an ende ſo honorable and worthy, to take out of the handes
" and power of fortune the ſubuerſion of your glory gotten, and to reduce from the

middeſt of the ſea to the port of ſauetie, this veſſell loaden with marchandiſe of vallue ineſtimable: It belonges to wiſe men not to referre eſtſoones to the arbitermēt of fortune, the thinges which they haue once achieued by their vallour and wiſedome: And this hath bene alwayes an obſeruacion with wiſe men, that the greater their fortune was, the leſſe did they truſt it: But let vs paſſe further, there is no man dowteth that that greatnes which is preſerued willingly is not more agreeable, then that which is meinteyned by violence, for that it is ſo much the more ſtable, ſo much the more eaſie, ſo much the more agreeable, and ſo much the more honorable: If your maieſtie bind the French king to you by ſo great a liberalitie, and by ſo great a benefit, will it not be the propper degree to put vpon you the abſolute authoritie & iuriſdiction both of him ſelfe and his kingdom? If you giue to the Pope and other Princes ſo manifeſt a certeintie, that you are contented with the ſtates which you haue, and that you liue in a ſpeciall care and watching ouer the vniuerſall ſauetie of Chriſtendom: Will not they remaine without ſuſpicion? yea hauing no more to feare you, nor nothing to quarrell with you, they will not onely loue you, but they will honor in your perſon ſo great a bountie: By this meane you ſhall drawe to you the harts of men, which are not to be ſubdued by fiercenes, you ſhall giue lawes to all nations for that they ſee you deuided from ambicion, And by this meane ſhall you diſpoſe more Chriſtians with good will and authoritie, then with forces and ſubiection: By this meane being followed and ayded of all men, you ſhal haue good oportunitie to turne your armes againſt the Lutherans & Infidels, with greater glory & with more occaſion of greater conqueſts: Which I know not why they ſhould not be alſo deſired in Afrika, in Greece, or in Leuant, ſeeing that as you haue had ſo great facilitie to amplifie your dominion amongſt the Chriſtians, And the puiſſance of your maieſtie ſo augmented that it is almoſt become terrible to them all, So when they ſhall ſee your purpoſes extended further, and your ambicion breake out of lymit, all the world will conſpire by neceſſitie againſt you whom they find armed with a mind ſo preiudiciall to their libertie. In all times, in all clymats, and to all natures, ſeruitude hath bene hatefull, and libertie ſweete and acceptable: the Pope feareth your power, the Venetians tremble vnder your puiſſant hande, your forces haue put all Italy into aſtoniſhment, and by the tokens that are diſcerned, it is credible that the king of England enuyeth your felicitie: you may for certaine monethes enterteyne the French men with fayre hopes and vaine practiſes, but in the end, either the king muſt be deliuered, or they muſt be ſent backe deſperat: if they reape diſpaire, they haue reaſon to conſpyre againſt you with all the confederats they can procure: And if you deliuer the king with condicions of litle profit to your maieſtie, what ſhal you winne, to loſe thoccaſion to vſe ſo great a magnanimitie? which if you expreſſe not at this beginning, when afterwards you would ſhowe it, it will haue neither prayſe, glory, nor the like grace: if you tye to his deliuerie couenants that bind him to your profit and commoditie, he will not obſerue them, for that no ſewertie that he ſhall giue you can ſo much import him, but that it will import him much more not to haue his enemie to become ſo great as afterwardes he ſhall not be able to oppreſſe him: And ſo ſhall we haue either a peace vnprofitable, which ought to be farre from the deliberacion of your maieſtie, or els warres very daungerous, whoſe ende is as vncerteine as the action is ielous: Beſides, the chaunge of fortune is to be feared of him to whome ſhe hath giuen ſo long a fruicion of felicitie, And much more griefe and heauynes by the yll ſucceſſe of things, is to be doubted of him who hath had power to aſſure them. Thus haue I ſatisfied the commaundement of your Maieſtie,

" though not with grauitie and witte that was exſpected, yet with affection and fide" litie according to a ſubiect, beſeeching God to inſpire you with the election of that " deliberation, which may be moſt acceptable to his will and agreable to your glory,
" and alſo be moſte conducible to the benefite of the common weale of Chriſten-
" dome, of the which both for your ſupreme dignitie, and correſpondencie of the di-
" uine will of God, there is neceſſarily transferred to your perſon the name of patron " and protector.

This Oration was heard of th Emperour with great attention, and yet he made no declaration by any ſigne or ieſture, whether he allowed or condemned it: But giuing the ſigne to the reſidue to ſpeake, Federike duke of Alba, a man of great authoritie with the perour, roaſe vp and reaſoned in this ſort:

The opinion of the duke of Alba touching the kings impriſonment.

There be in the ſoule of man two principall powers neceſſarilie concurring to euery good action, the vnderſtanding and the will, of both whiche, wiſdome is the full perfection: The one we neede not doubt to be the free gifte of God, and the other we may aſſure to be bredde in nature: the one an inſpiration to leade vs to the knowledge of things, and the other a diſpoſicion carying vs to the operation and
" action of the ſame, and they both no other thing then the effect of that perfection
" which is referred to wiſdome: And as this wiſdome diſcendeth by grace, and is not " giuen by nature, ſo yet in thadminiſtration of worldly things, we ſee it bothe much " holpen and well confirmed by learning and induſtrie. In which reſpect (right ſoue-" raigne Emperour) I pray to be excuſed, if my iudgement differ not from the com" mon iudgement of others, & if by the facultie of my ſpirite I be not capable to perce
" ſo deepe as the vnderſtanding of others can not reache vnto: yea I hope to deſerue
" more commendation, if in my counſells I perſwade you to followe the ſame waye
" which your fathers and elders haue alwayes taken: for albeit counſells newe and " without vſe, at the firſt ſight may happly bring with them glorious ſhowes and ap-" parances, yet no doubt in the ende they are founde to draw with them more daun-
" ger and deceite, then ſuche as beeing meaſured by reaſon, example and experience,
" haue bene in all times approued by generall ſentence of all men: yea all thinges are " put to aduenture, that are done by raſhnes and not by reaſon. Your Maieſtie hath " receyued principally by the will and working of God, and ſecondlye through the " vallour of your Capteines and armie, the greateſt victorie that in many ages hath " bene transferred to any Chriſtian Prince: But the chiefe frute to vanquiſhe conſi" ſteth in the well vſing of your victorie, and who ordreth not his felicitie ſo, incur" reth a farre greater infamie, then if he knewe not howe to vanquiſhe. Greater is the " fault of that man who ſuffreth himſelfe to be deceyued by thoſe things whiche he " holdeth in his owne power, then by ſuche as depende vpon the arbitration of for" tune: Since for the moſte parte whom fortune doth bring to beleeue in her, ſhe " maketh them more deſirous of glory, then apt to receyue it or hable to gouerne it.
" Your Maieſtie hath to take heede to enter into any deliberation which in the ende
" may bring ſhame to others, and repentance to your ſelfe: And by how much thim-
" portance of this negociation is great, by ſo muche doth it call your Maieſtie to pro-
" ceede with great aduiſe in your reſolutions, in which the faultes that are once com" mitted, can not be corrected. If you once deliuer the French king, you can no more
" reteine him, but ſo long as he remayneth your priſoner, it is alwayes in your power " to giue him libertie. In caſes of captiuitie he that haſtely enfreeth his enemie, wor-
" keth to him ſelfe the occaſion of his owne harme: And therefore it can not but be " an iniurie to obiect your ſlownes to ſet him at libertie, ſince the king knoweth in

his owne conſcience how he would vſe thEmperour if he were his priſoner: Truly it was a great felicitie to take the frenche king, but in conference and compariſon of things, it would proue a farre greater infelicity to let him go: I hope your maieſty is not ignorant that follie and raſhneſſe haue no ſocietie with wiſdom, nor fortune no community with good councell, and therefore touching the deliberacion of his deliuerie, it ought to be debated with grauetie of councell, calling to you a long aſſiſtance and courſe of time: I might happily chaunge this opinion, if I ſaw any reaſon to perſwade me, that the king being preſently deliuered, would reaſonably acknowledge the benefite according to the conſequence of it, and that the Pope and the other potentats of Italie, would be brought to lay away together with their ſuſpicions, all their couetouſnes and ambicion: But who knoweth not how daungerous it is to ground & eſtabliſh a reſolucion of ſo great importance vpon a ſuppoſition both vntrue and vncerteine: The conſideracion of the condicion & maner of mortall men induceth the contrarie, for that ordinarilie there is nothing endureth ſo litle a ſeaſon as the remembraunce of benefites receiued, and the more greater they be, the more commonly are they recompenſed with ingratitude, for that he that either can not or will not make them good with recompenſe, ſeeketh oftentimes to deface them with forgetfulnes, or at leaſt to make them leſſe, by perſwading that they were not ſo great: And as to ſome men it is a more ſhame to confeſſe a fault then to do it, ſo, we haue ſeene many who being reduced to ſuche neceſſitie as they haue ſtande neede of a benefit, doe yet receiue it with mindes grudging and not contented: in whom commonly hatred beareth more rule for the remembraunce of the neceſſitie wherein they were falne, then the obligacion and thankefulnes which ought to followe the fauor and benefit that was done vnto them: Moreouer there is no nation vnder the couer of the skie to whom inſolencie is more naturall, and lightnes more familiar, then to the frenchmen: And where is inſolency, there is inconſideracion: And where is lightneſſe, there is no knowledge of vertue, there is no iudgement to diſcerne of the actions of others, nor grauetie to meaſure that which concerneth them ſelues: Then what other thing may we hope for in the french king, for his cuſtome ſo inſolent, and for his greatnes ſo prowde and hawtie, then that he burneth with rage and diſdaine to be priſoner to thEmperour, at a time when he looked to triumphe ouer him: he will keepe alwayes before his eyes, the remembrance of this infamie, and being deliuered, he will neuer beleue that the meane to quench it, is to be thankefull and acknowledge, but in ſtriuing to be ſuperior, he will perſwade himſelfe that you let him go for the difficulties to holde & reteine him, and not through your bounty & magnanimity: Such is for the moſt part the nature of men, and ſuch hath bene alwayes the condicion of the frenchmen, from whom who looketh for a conſtancy or magnanimity, exſpecteth a renouacion & new rule in humane things: So that in place to haue peace, and to reorder the regions of Chriſtendom, we ſhall ſee riſe vp, warres, both more doubtfull and more daungerous then thoſe that are paſſed, ſuche as for their confederacies will be intollerable, and for their calamities horrible: The reaſon of theſe is, for that your reputacion will be leſſened, and your armie, which now exſpecteth the frute due vpon ſo great a victorie being deceiued of their hopes, will haue no more the ſame vertue, nor your affaires followed with the ſame fortune: Who if ſhe be hardly holden by him that reteineth her, muche leſſe will ſhe tarie with ſuche as chaſe her and driue her away: ſhe hath a freewill to come and go when ſhe liſt, and is not ſtayed by the power of mortall Princes, whom with other earthly creatures nature hath made ſubiect to the law of reuolucion and

" chaunge: neither haue you reason to reappose any thing in the bountie of the Pope,
" or the modestie of the Venetians, for that repenting them selues to haue suffered you
" to goe away with the victorie past, they will seeke to cast blocks in your way for go" ing any further, wherin will be concurrant the present feare they haue of you, which " will compell them to oppose against your newe fortunes and victories to come: yea
" where you haue now in your power to hold all men bownd and astonished, your self
" with a dissolute bountie will be he that will vnbind them and giue them hart: I know
" not what is the will and resolucion of God, neither doe I thinke others can reach to " the knowledge of it, for that we are made assured by the Scriptures that his iudge-
" ments are secret, and deepe: But if it be lawfull to interprete matters by coniecture,
" which is the onely way to comprehend things to come, I see many tokens that God
" fauoreth your greatnes: neither can I beleue that he extendeth his graces vpon you
" in so great abundance to thend you should dissipat and dissolue them of your selfe,
" but thereby to raise you and make you superior ouer others aswell in effect, as you " are in title and right: And truely to lose so rare an occasion which God doth sende
" you, would be no other thing then to tempt him & make you vnworthy of his grace:
" In cases of conquest and victorie, Princes are hardly contented with that which oc" casion doth offer, for that the things which they winne first doe not satisfie them, so " long as they hope to get better. Reason hath alwayes taught, and experience doth " well confirme it, that seldom doe those things draw good successe which depend vp-
" pon the councells of many: By which argument I doubt whether he measure right" ly the nature of the world, who beleueth that he is able to roote out the Heretikes,
" or suppresse the Infidells, with the vnion of many Princes: They be enterprises that
" haue neede of a Prince so mighty and great, as to be able to giue lawes and rules to " others: If that be not obserued and considered, they will haue their passage hereaf" ter with the same successe, wherewith they haue passed in times before: for this " cause doe I beleue that God hath cast on you so great victories, and for the same rea" son hath opened you the way to the whole Monarchie, which onely may make you
" able to bringe to passe so great and holy effects: To the which it is not amisse that " you be slow to giue the first beginnings, to thende to accomplishe them with more
" better and more certeine foundacions: Let not the feare of so many puissant leagues
" and confederacions as are contracted against you, estraunge you from this delibera-
" cion, for that both thoccasion which you reteyne in your hande is sufficient to ad-
" uaunce it, And also if things be well negociated, the kings mother, for her affection
" to her sonne, and for the necessitie to recouer his libertie, wil neuer cast of her hopes " to redeeme him of you by accord. Besides, the Princes of Italy will neuer enter vnitie
" with the gouernment of Fraunce, knowing that it remayneth alwayes in your hand,
" setting the kinge at libertie, not onely to seperate him but also to turne him against " them: A matter which as for the time it wil keepe them in astonishment & suspense,
" so in the end it must needes come to passe that they must be the first to receiue lawes
" of you, And then it can not be but an action full of glorye, to vse towards them cle-
" mencie and magnanimitie, euen when matters shall be reduced to that estate and " degree as they can not chuse but acknowledge you for superior: Such was the man" ner of dealing of Alexander and Cæsar, who were forward aad liberall to pardon in" iuries, and not slow and inconsiderat to readdresse their estate of them selues, Amidd
" those difficulties and daungers which they had already surmounted: he that doth
" so, deserueth praise, for that he doth an acte which hath very fewe examples, but that

hath no law of example nor rule of time: By theſe reaſons I am bold to induce your maieſtie to draw of your victorie, as great a profit as you can, and alwayes vſing towardes the king thoſe offices and oblacions that apperteine to him, either to ſende for him into Spaine, or at leaſt to haue him conueyed to Naples: And for aunſwere of his letter ſent to your maieſtie, it were good to returne to him ſome ſpeciall man to viſite him with wordes full of grace and hope, and withall to propownd vnto him condicions of his deliuerance, ſuch as (vpon more particular conſultacion) may be worthie recompenſes and rewardes of ſo greate a victorie: In this ſorte your fundacions being layed, and your thoughtes extended to theſe endes, the time and the operacions and accidentes thereof, will make either more quicke or more ſlowe, the deliuerie of the king, and will alſo beget occaſions of peace or warre with thItalians, whom for the preſent you may enterteine with good hopes: So ſhall you with art and induſtrie augument the fauor and reputacion of armes, and auoyding to tempt euerie day a new fortune, we ſhall be prepared and readie to accord either with this Prince or with that common weale, either with all together or with one in particular as occaſions & accidents ſhall induce vs: Theſe be the wayes which wiſe Princes haue alwayes followed, and particularly thoſe who haue left to you the fundacions of ſuch a greatnes: They were neuer curious to reiect occaſions that made to raiſe them higher, nor ſlow to puſh on the fauor of fortune when they ſaw her wel diſpoſed: To you belongeth the intereſt of their example, as of right apperteineth vnto you that which in any of them might ſeeme to be ambicion: Your maieſtie muſt remember that you are a Prince, and that it is one office in your calling to followe the trace of Princes: Muche leſſe that any reaſon either diuine or humane perſwadeth you to leaue thoccaſion to releue and readdreſſe thauthority of the Empire vſurped and defaced, ſeeing all lawes of God and nations binde you by ſtraite obligacion, to arme your corage and intencions to recouer it rightfully: occaſions are precious if they be executed in the ripeneſſe of time, but being foreſlowed, they turne to the preiudice of thoſe that hoped in them: Your maieſtie muſt be gealous ouer them, knowing how eaſely they are loſt, and with what difficultie they are recouered: you muſt not be curious to make your profit of them, nor doubtfull to aduaunce them when you ſee they draw with them a correſpondencie of time, of place, and all other circumſtances helping to your enterpriſes: You are not to make your fundacion vpon the bountie or wiſedome of thoſe that bee vanquiſhed, ſeeing all mortall men draw with them their corruptions, and the whole worlde is full of infirmitie and error: dignities and greatnes are the effectes and rewards of vallour, and where is a reſolute minde to execute, there neuer wanteth a good fortune to eſtabliſhe and confirme: Laſtly ſeeing the eſtate of Chriſtendom can not be defended by any other meane then by your greatnes, it is a iuſt office in your maieſtie to lay to your hande, though not for the intereſt of your owne authoritie and glorie, yet for the ſeruice of God, and zeale of the vniuerſall benefit.

This oration was hard with a wonderful fauor & inclinacion of the whole coũcell, in whom, for the authority of the man, and for the ſpirit and efficacie of his reaſons, might be diſcerned an vniuerſall impreſſion of ambicion almoſt to the whole Empire of Chriſtendom: There was not one amongeſt them, who without replie, did not confirme his opinion, which thEmperour alſo approued, though more for colour not to ſeeme to ſwarue from the councell of his frends, then in diſcloſing what was the propertie of his inclinacion: Monſr Beauruin, by office his great Chamberlaine, and by fauour verie gracious with him, was diſpatched both to imparte with the Capteines of the armie, thEmprours deliberacion, and alſo to viſit in his name the French king, and to propownd to him the condicions by the which he might obteine his deliuerance: he tooke his way by lande, for that the kinges mother had made free and open all paſſages for Meſſengers and corryers to come and goe to thEmprours Court, for the more eaſie and ſafe negociacion of her ſonnes affayres: And ſo together with the Duke of Burbon & the Viceroy, he went to Piſqueton, where the king remeyned as yet: There he offered him his libertie, but with ſo vnequall & heauy condicions, that the very hearing of them was intollerable to the king: for, beſides the reſigning of all his titles and rights which he pretended in Italy, thEmprour demaunded to haue rendred vnto him the Duchie of Burgonguie as apperteyning to him in propper, And to giue to the Duke of Burbon, Prouence with all the dependencies thereof: And he required beſides, aſwell for him ſelfe as for the king of England, other condicions of very great moment: It ſeemed the vertue of the king had ouercome the aduerſities of his impriſonment, for, to thEmprours demaundes he aunſwered conſtantly, that he had rather offer vp his life in priſon then to depriue his children of any part of the Realme of Fraunce, And though he ſhould conſent to a compoſicion ſo preiudiciall, yet it was not in his power to execute it: for that the auncient tradicions and conſtitucions of Fraunce did not ſuffer alienacion of any member or appertenancie to the crowne without the conſent of the parliaments, & others in whoſe hands reſted the authoritie of the whole kingdom, and who in like caſes had bene alwayes wont to preferre the vniuerſall ſauetie of the mayne body of the Realme, affore the particular intereſt, of the perſons of their kings: That if they would demaund condicions which were in his power to performe, they ſhould finde him moſt ready to ioyne with thEmprour, and to fauor his greatnes: But ſuch was his deſire of libertie, that here he ceaſſed not to offer condicions diuers, making no difficulty to graunt large parts of other mens eſtates, without promiſing any thing of his owne. This was in effect the ſumme of the things he accorded: he offered to take to wife thEmprours ſiſter, a late widowe by the death of the king of Portugall: he made confeſſion that he would hold Burgonguie as in dowrye, and that it ſhould apperteyne to the children yſſuing of that mariage: That he would reſtore to the Duke of Burbon, the Duchie that had beene confiſked from him enlarging it with ſome other eſtate: That in recompenſe of thEmprours ſiſter who had bene promiſed to the Duke, the king would giue him in mariage, his ſiſter a late widowe by the deceaſſe of Monſr d'Alenſon: That he would ſatisfie the king of England with money, and pay to thEmprour a great treaſor for his raunſom: That he would reſigne vnto him his intereſts and rights in the kingdom of Naples and Duchie of Myllan: That he woulde ſend to accompany him both with a nauie by ſea and an armie by lande, at ſuch tyme as he would goe to Rome to take the crowne Imperiall, which was as much as if he had promiſed to giue him in pray, the whole Monarchie of Italy. Beaurayn returned with theſe capitulacions to thEmprour, to whom went with him alſo Monſr Montmorancy a perſonage then very agreeable to the king, and afterwards great maiſter of Fraunce, and at laſt by the kings liberalitie, indued with the dignitie of high Conſtable of Fraunce.

The ſorowes and feares of Fraunce for the impriſonment of the king.

But now let vs ſay ſomewhat of the ſorowes & feares of Fraunce: After they were poſſeſſed of the newes of the ouerthrow of tharmie, & taking of the king, there ranne thorow the whole kingdome an vniuerſall aſtoniſhment and confuſion: for, beſides the incredible ſorow which thaccident of the kinges impriſonment brought to that nation, naturally very deuout and louing to their kinges, there appeared on all ſides

infinite mournings and heauines aſwell publike as priuate: Priuate men lamented and made their ſorrowes aparte, for that aſwell of the Courte as of the Nobilitie, there were very fewe who had not loſte in the battell, their children, their brethren, or other their parentes and friends of marke: They wepte and coulde not be comforted, becauſe they iudged their ſorrowe could not be greater then the qualitie of their loſſe: And in the publike and generall body of the realme might be diſcerned nothing but an vniuerſall face of deſolation and diſpayre, euery one crying out of ſo great a diminution of the authoritie & glory of ſo flouriſhing a realme: A perplexitie ſo muche the more grieuous & intollerable to them, by howmuch naturally they are hawty and preſuming of themſelues: In this eſtate of aduerſitie they ſet before their eyes all that feare and diſpayre coulde imagine: They doubted leaſt ſo great a calamitie were not the beginning of a further ruine and ſubuerſion: They ſawe their king priſoner, and with him eyther taken or ſlaine in the battel, the chieftayns of the kingdome, which in the imagination of their ſorowes they helde a loſſe irreparable: They behelde their capteins diſcomforted, and their ſouldiors diſcouraged: A calamitie which ſtopped in them all hope to be readdreſſed or reaſſured: They ſaw the realme made naked of money & treaſor, and enuironed with moſt mighty enemies, an affliction which moſt of all caryed their thoughts into the laſt cogitations of deſperate ruine: for the king of England, notwithſtanding he had holden many parleys and treaties, and ſhowed in many things a variation of mind, yet not many daies before the battel, he had cut off al the negociations which he had enterteined with the king, & had publiſhed that he would diſcend into Fraunce if the things of Italie tooke any good ſucceſſe: So that the frenchmen feared leaſt in ſo great an oportunity thẽprour & he would not leauy warre agaynſt Fraunce, eyther for that there was no other head or gouernor then a woman and the litle children of the king, of whom the eldeſt had not yet runne eyght yeres accompliſhed: or els becauſe thenemies had with thẽ the duke of Burbon, for his owne particular a puiſſant prince, and for his authority in the realme of Fraunce very popular & ſtrong in opinion, a mighty inſtrument to ſtirre vp moſt dangerous emotions. Beſides, the Lady Regent, aſwell for the loue ſhe bare to the king, as for the daungers of the realme, was not without her paſſions both proper and particular: for being full of ambition and moſt greedy of the gouernment, ſhe feared that if the kinges deliuery drewe any long tract of tyme, or that any new difficultie happned in Fraunce, ſhe ſhould be conſtrayned to yelde vp thadminiſtration of the Crowne to ſuche as ſhould be delegate and aſſigned by the voyces of the kingdome: Neuertheles amid ſo many aſtoniſhmentes & confuſions ſhe drew her ſpirites to her, & by her example were recõforted the nobles that were of counſell with her, who taking ſpeedy order to manne the frontiers of the realme, and with diligence to leauy a good prouiſion of money: The Lady Regent in whoſe name all expeditions & diſpatches went out, wrote to themprour letters full of humilitie and compaſſion, wherein ſhe forgot not by degrees vehement and inducing to ſolicit a negociatiõ of accord, by vertue wherof, hauing a litle after deliuered Don Hugo dẽ Moncado, ſhe ſent him to themprour, to offer him, that her ſonne ſhould renounce & diſclaime frõ all rightes of the kingdome of Naples and theſtate of Millan, with contentment to refer to the cenſure & arbitration of the law, the titles & rights of Burgondy, which if it apperteined to thẽprour, he ſhould acknowledge it for the dowry of his ſiſter: That he ſhould render to Monſr Burbon his eſtate together with his moueables & goods which were of great vallour, and alſo the frutes & reuenues which had bin leauied by the cõmiſſioners deputed out of the regal chamber: That he ſhould giue to him his ſiſter in mariage,& deliuer vp to him Prouence,if iudgemẽt of the intereſt & right were made of his ſide: And for the more facilitie and ſpeedy paſſage of this negociatiõ, rather then for any deſire ſhe had to nouriſh her inclination to the warre,ſhe diſpatched immediatly Embaſſadours into Italie, to recõmend to the Pope & the Venetians the ſafetie of her ſonne: To whom ſhe offred,that if for their proper ſecuritie they would contract with her, and rayſe armes agaynſt themperour,ſhe would for her particular aduaunce fiue hundred launces, together with a great contribution of money. But amidde theſe trauells and aſtoniſhmentes, the principall deſire aſwell of her as of the whole Realme of Fraunce, was, to appeaſe and aſſure the minde of the king of England, iudging truely that if they could reduce him to amitie and reconcilement, the Crowne of Fraunce ſhould remayne without quarrell or moleſtation: Where,if he on the one ſide, and themprour on the other, ſhould ryſe in one ioynt force, hauing concurrant with them the perſon of the duke of Burbon, and many other oportunities and occaſions, it could not be but all things woulde be full of difficulties and daungers: Of this the Lady Regent began to diſcerne many tokens and apparances of good hope: for notwithſtanding the king of Englande immediatly after the firſt reapportes of the victory, had not only expreſſed great tokens of gladnes & reioyſing,but alſo publiſhed that he would in perſon paſſe into Fraunce:and withall had ſent Embaſſadors to themprour to ſolicite & treate of the mouing of warre ioyntly together: yet proceding in deede with more mildnes then was exſpected of ſo furious ſhowes & tokens,he diſpatched a meſſanger to the Lady Regent, to ſende to him an expreſſe Embaſſador: which accordingly was accompliſhed, & that with fulnes of authority & commiſſion, ſuch as brought with it alſo all ſortes of ſubmiſſions & implorations which ſhe thought apt to reduce to appeaſement the mind of that king ſo highly diſpleaſed: he reappoſed himſelf altogether vpon the will and counſel of the cardinal of Yorke, who ſeemed to reſtrayne the king & his thoughtes to this principall end, that bearing ſuch a hand vpon the controuerſies & quarrels that ranne betwene other princes,al the world might acknowledge to depend vpon him and his authoritie the reſolution and exſpectation of all affayres: And for this cauſe he offred to themperour at the ſame time to diſcend into Fraunce with a puiſſant army, both to giue perfection to the alliance concluded betwene them before, and alſo to remoue all ſcruple and ielouſie, he offred preſently to conſigne vnto him his daughter who was not as yet in an age and diſpoſition able for mariage: But in theſe matters were very great difficulties, partly depending vpon himſelf,and partly deriuing from themprour,who nowe ſhewed nothing of that readines to contract with him which he had vſed before:for the king of England demaunded almoſt al the rewards of the victory,as Normandy,Guyen,& Gaſcoign,with the title of king of Fraunce: And that themprour,notwithſtanding thinequality of the conditions,ſhould paſſe likewiſe into Fraunce,and cõmunicate equally in thexſpences & dangers: Thinequality of theſe demaũds troubled not a litle themprour, to whõ they were by ſo much the more grieuous,by howmuch he remẽbred that in the yeres next before,he had always deferred to make warre euẽ in the greateſt dangers of the french king: So that he perſwaded himſelfe that he ſhould not be able to make any fundation vpon that confederation: And ſtanding in a ſtate no leſſe impoueriſhed for mony & treſor,thẽ made weary with labors & perils,he hoped to draw more cõmodities from the french king by the meane of peace,then by the violence of armes & warre,ſpecially ioyning with the king of England: Beſides,he made not that accompt which he was wont to do of the mariage of his daughter,both for her

her minority in age,& alſo for the dowry for the which he ſhould ſtande accõptable for ſo much as themprour had receyued by way of loane of the king of England: he ſemed by many tokens in nature to nouriſh a wonderful deſire to haue children,and by the neceſſitie of his condicion, he was caried with great couetouſnes of money: vppon which two reaſons he tooke a great deſire to marye the ſiſter of the houſe of Portugall, which was both in an age hable for mariage, and with whome he hoped to receyue a plentifull porcion in gold and treaſor, beſides the liberalities of his own peoples offered by waye of beneuolence in caſe the mariage went forwarde: ſuche was their deſire to haue a Queene of the ſame nation and language, and of hope to procreate children: for theſe cauſes the negociacion became euery daye more hard and deſperat betweene both thoſe Princes, wherein was alſo concurrant the ordinary inclinacion of the Cardinall of Yorke towardes the Frenche king, together with the open complaintes he made of thEmprour, aſwell for thintereſts and reſpects of his king,as for the ſmall reputacion thEmprour beganne to holde of him: He conſidered that affore the battell of Pauya, thEmprour neuer ſent letters vnto him which were not written with his owne hande, and ſubſcribed, your ſonne and Coſin Charles: But after the battell, he vſed the ſeruice of Secretories in all the letters he wrote to him, infixing nothing of his owne hande but the ſubſcripcion,not with titles of ſo greate reuerence and ſubmiſſion, but onely with this bare worde Charles: In this alteracion of affection of the Cardinall, the king of England tooke occaſion to receiue with gracious wordes and demonſtracions, thEmbaſſador ſent by the Ladye regent, to whome he gaue comfort to hope well in thinges to come: And a litle afterwards, eſtraunging his minde wholly from thaffayres which were in negociacion betwene him and thEmprour, he made a confederacion with the Lady regent contracting in the name of her ſonne, wherein he would haue inſerted this expreſſe condicion, that for the kings raunſom and deliuerie, ſhould not be deliuered to thEmprour any thing that at that time ſhould be vnder the power or poſſeſſion of the crowne of Fraunce.

This was the firſt hope which fell vppon the Realme of Fraunce, And this was the firſt conſolation in ſo many aduerſities,which afterwards went on increaſing by the diſorders of thImperialls in Italy: They were become ſo inſolent for ſo great a victorie,that perſwading them ſelues that all men and all difficulties ſhould yeeld and giue place to their will, their glory made them loſe thoccaſion to accorde with the Venetians, and gayneſaye thinges which they had promiſed to the Pope, and laſtly brought them to fill full of ſuſpicions both the Duchie of Myllan and all the other regions of Italy: And ſo going on to ſowe ſeedes of new innouacions and troubles, they reduced thEmprour to this neceſſitie, to make a raſhe deliberacion, daungerous for his eſtate in Italy if his auncient felicitie and the harde fortune and deſtinie of the Pope, had not beene of greater force: Matters aſſuredly moſte worthy of a knowledge perticular,to thend that of accidents and things ſo memorable may be vnderſtanded the foundacions and councells,which being oftentymes hid,are for the moſt part reuealed and publiſhed after a manner moſt farre from the truth.

But skarcely had the Pope capitulated with the Viceroy, when were preſented vnto him the great offers of Fraunce,to ſtirre him vppe to the warre: wherein albeit he wanted not the perſwaſions of many to induce him to the ſame effecte, and leſſe diminucion of the diſtruſt which he had before of thImperialls, yet he determined to take ſuche a courſſe and proceeding in all thinges, as he woulde leaue no cauſe to eyther of them to ſuſpecte him for his actions: Therefore he had no ſoo-

ner vnderſtande that the Viceroy had accepted and pronownced the contract made at Rome, then he cauſed publication to be made within S. Iohn de Latran, And as he taried not for the ratificacion of thEmprour which was promiſed to be ſent firſt, ſo the better to demonſtrat his intencion, he honored with his preſence and with the ſame ſolemnitie he was wont to vſe at his coronation, the publication which was made the firſt day of Maye: he ſolicited alſo the Florentyns to make payment of the money promiſed, and interpoſed as much as he could, to drawe the Venetians to enter appoyntment with the Imperialls: But on thother ſide, were preſented to him by them, many iuſt cauſes of complaint, ſince in the payment of the money promiſed, they would not accept the xxv. thowſand duckats payed by the Florentyns according to his ordenaunce during the negociacion of thaccord, for that the Viceroy alleaged impudently that if other promiſe were paſt, it was made without his commiſſion: Beſides, much leſſe that they retyred their ſouldiers from of the landes of the Churche, ſeeing they repleniſhed the townes of Plaiſanca with garriſons: To theſe things which ſome waye might happly bee excuſed bothe for their want of money, and neceſſitie of harbor and lodging, was added alſo, that not onely in the mutacion of the ſtate of Siena, they gaue ſuſpicion to beare a mynde eſtraunged from the Pope, but alſo they ſuffered afterwardes the Citizens of Montenouo to be ill handeled and ſpoyled of their goods by the Libertyns, notwithſtanding vpon the Popes often complayntes, they gaue him hope to remedye thoſe diſorders: But that which vexed him moſte of all, was the dealing of the Viceroy, who did not onely inclyne ſuddeinlye to the ſolicitacions of the Duke of Ferrara, but alſo put him in hope not to force him to leaue Reggia and Rubiera: he promiſed him alſo to induce thEmprour to take his eſtates into protection, notwithſtanding he made dayly promiſſes to the Pope, that when the Florentyns had performed to paye that which they ought, he woulde make him eftſoones repoſſeſſed of thoſe townes: And to thende the Pope ſhoulde the better ſolicite theffects of theſe promiſſes and hopes, and alſo to obteyne to haue the companies of men of warre to retyre from the territories of the Churche, he ſent vnto him the Cardinall Saluiatio, his Legat in Lombardye and Deputie Legat with thEmprour, to whome the Viceroy made beleeue that he was determined to procure reſtitucion of Reggia by armes, if the Duke refuſed to render it by good will: But the effecte of thinges aunſwered nothinge the promiſſes and wordes: A matter and manner of dealing which coulde not bee excuſed by the neceſſitie of money, for that vppon the rendring of thoſe townes, there grewe to them a greater quantitie: And there was taken good reaſon and matter to interprete the likelihoode of that matter to proceede of a deſire they had eyther to haue him embaſed and pulled lower, or els to wynne the Duke of Ferrara, or laſtely, to goe on ſtill with better degrees and preparacions for the oppreſſing of Italy: Theſe matters brought to the Pope a ſuſpicion and griefe of mind almoſt incredible, But much more was he perplexed to ſee and conſider that thEmprours intencion was nothing different: who hauing diſpatched to the Pope letters of ratificacion of the confederacion made in his name to the Viceroy, deferred to cõfirme the three articles accorded apart & ſeperat from the capitulacion: he alleaged that touching the reſtoring of the townes holden by the Duke of Ferrara, he had no power to do an acte preiudiciall to the rights of thEmpire, nor to force the Duke who proteſted to holde them in chiefe of thEmpire, In which reſpecte thEmprour offered to referre that controuerſie to the tryall of lawe and iuſtice, or els to be reſolued by ſome friendely compoſicion: It was eaſily easely comprehended that he could haue bene contented they shoulde still haue remeined to the Duke, but vnder his inuestiture and to pay him an hundred thowsand duckats, and as much to the Pope for the inuestiture of Ferrara and for the penaltie imposed vpon the contract which he had made with Adrian: he alleaged that it was a thing impertinent to accorde with his ministers touching the trade & prouision of salt from the Duchy of Millan, bicause the soueraigne profit of that Dukedom by the composition of thinuestiture though not as yet consigned, apperteined to Frauncis Sforce: And that therefore the Viceroy was not simply bound by thartidle to compell him to take it, but to do what he could to induce him to consent: which promise for that it was extended to the action of a third person, was notoriously of no force touching the effect to bind either him selfe or an other: Neuertheless for desire he had to gratifie the Pope he woulde haue practised to induce the Duke to consent, if the matter had not become no more his owne interest but thinterest of an other, seeing the Duke of Millan in recompense of the succors which th Archduke had sent him, had couenanted to take salt of him: and yet notwithstanding, he said he would interpose and doe all he could to induce his brother (receiuing recompense of money) to accord & consent to it, not for euer as the article expressed, but during the Popes life which was most agreable to reason: he would not admit also the article of benefits & benefices, onlesse, together with that which was expressed in the inuestitures, were ioyned such things as had bene obserued by his predecessors kings of Naples: In regarde of these difficulties, the Pope refused to accept the letters of ratificacion, nor would not send his to th Emprour, but insisted this demaund that seeing th Emprour had not ratified within the tearme of foure moneths according to the promise of the Viceroy, that the hũdred thowsand duckats might be restored to the Florentins: which demaund was answered with suttleties & rather cauillaciõs, then with firme & good fundacions: that the cõdicion of restitucion of the hũdred thousand duckats was not affixed to the instrument, but promised in an article separat & apart by the Viceroys Agentes by oth, and that it was not referred to the ratificacion of the league which th Emperour had not only ratified within the tearme of foure moneths, but also had sent out letters of it in due forme: Moreouer the Pope had aduertisemẽt that th Emperours court was vniuersally ill disposed to the things of Italie, & he was not ignorant that the capteines of his army rose vp to perswade him, that for the more absolute assuring of his enterprises in Italie, it were good to cause Modena to be rendred to the Duke of Ferrara, to repossesse the family of Bentiuoleis of Bolognia, & to take the iurisdiction of Florence, of Siena, and of Lucqua, as townes apperteining to th Empire: yea, so full was he of dout & suspicion, & so farre from stay and resolucion, & knowing withall that the frenchmen offred as a pray to th Emperour the regions of Italie, that by necessitie he went temporising, hauing not whereupon to fix his fundacion.

A treatise of of accord betwene the Viceroy and the Venetians

In this time thaccord betwene the Viceroy & the Venetians was solicited continually, wherin besides the Viceroy sought to bind of new the Venetians to the defense of the Duchy of Millan, he demaunded great summes of money to satisfie their fault of inobseruaciõ of the cõfederacion passed: The Venetians had many reasons to incline thẽ to giue place to necessity, but of the contrary, they were caried with more reasonable perswasiõs to remeine in suspence amid which incerteinty of estate, their coũcels were ful of variety & irresolucion: Neuertheles after many conferences & meetings, their astonishmẽt being no lesse then their neighbours for so great a victory of th Emprour, & their estate only being abãdoned & reduced to priuacion on all sides, they addressed new cõmissions to P. Pesero their Embassador residẽt with the Viceroy, to confirme the league in the same manner it had bene made affore, paying ouer to thEmperour foure score thowsand duckats for satisfaction of penalties past: But the Viceroy being made so much the more obstinate, by howe muche they seemed fearefull, aunswered them resolutely, that he would not renue the confederacion, onlesse they payed in the hũdred thowsand duckats: which obstinacy drew with it this ill accident as oftentimes is seene to happen in matters deliberated with longnes of time and no readines of wil: for, so long a tract was taken in the disputing and debating of this litle summe, that the Venetians had aduertisement how the king of England bare no more so ill a minde to the aduersities of Fraunce as was feared in the beginning, and besides, the Imperiall armie had both payed and dimissed many regimentes of Launceknights: Matters which the Venetians interpreting to their aduauntage, and better suretie from vexacion, they determined to dwell as yet in suspence and to reserue in them selues (as much as they could) power & election to take those deliberacions which by the traine & euent of generall things, they knew were best for thē.

The person of the frenche king led prisoner into Spaine.

The Viceroy and the other Capteines Imperiall were not a litle stirred vp by these variacions to transport the person of the french king into a place of suretie, iudging that for the ill disposicion of others, they could not without perill, kepe him garded in the Duchie of Millan: In which feare ioyned to their continuall desire so to doe, they resolued to conueye him to Genes, and from thence by sea to Naples, where his lodging was prepared within the newcastell: This determinacion brought no litle greefe to the king, who from the beginning of his captiuitie, had vehemently desired to be caried into Spaine: perhappes he had opinion (measuring happily an other man by his owne nature, or else running with the common error of mortall men being easely beguiled in things they desire) that if once he were brought to the presence of thEmperour, he doubted not of some easie passage for his liberty, either through thEmperours benignitie, or by the condicions he ment to offer: The Viceroy was of the same desire for the augmentacion of his owne glory, but being reteined for feare of the french army by sea, they dispatched by common consent Monsr Montmerancy to the Ladie Regent: she graunted to him six light gallies of those that lay in the port of Marseilles vpon promise to haue them restored assoone as the king was arriued in Spaine: With these gallies he returned to Portofino where the kinges person was alreadie ariued, and ioyning them to sixteene gallies of thEmperour which was the nauy appointed at first to conduct him to Naples, he reduced them all into one fleete and armed them all with footemen of the Spanish: The Captaines Imperialls & the Duke of Burbon, were perswaded that the kinges person shoulde be ledde to Naples, but of the contrarie, setting saile the seuenth of Iune, they tooke suche course, that the eight daye they arriued with a happy voyage at Rosa a hauen of Catalognia: Their comming brought no small ioy to the Emperour, who till that day had vnderstande nothing of that resolucion: And assoone as he was made assured of the kings being there, he dispatched cõmaundements to all places where he should passe, to receiue him with great honors, only till it should be otherwise determined, he gaue order to kepe him in the castel of Sciatiua neare to Valence, a castel anciently vsed by the kings of Aragon for the garding of great personages, & wherein had bene kept prisoner for many yeares, the Duke of Calabria: But the deliberacion to keepe him in that place, seeming farre too rigorous to the Viceroy, and nothing agreeable to the promises he had made to the king in Italie, he won so much of thEmperour, that till he had taken an other councell, the kinges person might remeine neare Valence in a place apt for hunting & other delights of the field: There he left him lodged with sufficient gard

vnder the charge of Capteine Alarcon, in whose custodie he had alwayes remayned since his vnfortunate day: And from thence the Viceroy together with Montmerancie, went to themperour to make reapport of the estate of Italie, and the discourse of things which tyll that day had bene debated with the king, with whom he perswaded themperour with many reasons to drawe to accorde, for that he could not haue a faythfull amitie and coniunction with the Italians: Themprour after he had heard the Viceroy and Montmerancy, determined to conuey the king into Castillo to the castell of Madrill, a place farre remoued from the sea and the confines of Fraunce, where being honored with ceremonies & reuerences agreable to so great a prince, he should neuertheless be kept vnder carefull and straite garde, with libertie to take the ayre abrode certayne times of the day, mounted onely vpon a moyle. Themperour coulde neuer be brought to admitte the king to his presence, if first thaccorde were not eyther established, or at least in an assured hope of resolution: And to thende there might be interposed in the negociation a personage honorable, and almost equall with the king, Montmerancie was sent in great diligence into Fraunce, to bring the Ducheesse of Alenson the kings sister and a widowe, with fulnesse of authoritie to debate and contract: And to thende this negociacion of accorde were not hindred by newe difficulties, there was made a little afterwardes a truce vntill the ende of December, betweene themperour and such as administred the gouernment of Fraunce. Moreouer themperour gaue order that one parte of those gallies which were come with the Viceroy, should returne into Italie to bring the Duke of Burbon into Spayne, without whose presence and priuitie he gaue out that he would make no conuention: and yet the gallies what for want of money, and other impedimentes were prepared but with slowe diligence. Themperour showing him selfe vehementlye disposed to establishe an vniuersall peace betweene the Princes of Christendome, and also at one tyme to giue some reasonable forme to thaffayres of Italie, solicited instantly the Pope to hasten away the Cardinall Saluiatio or some others, with sufficient authoritie: He sent also to be excused to the king of Englande, taking the reasons of his excuse vpon this, that he could not resist the generall wyll and vniuersall inclination of his peoples: and sent withall to the Pope Lopes Vtrado, for a dispensation to marry the infant of Portugall his cousin german, and by that meane conioyned to him in second degree: He sent also by the same Lopes, who departed vpon the ende of Iulie, the inuestiture of the Duchie of Millan, to Frauncis Sforce, but vnder this condition, to pay presently an hundred thousande Duckets, with obligation to paye fiue hundred thousand more at diuerse tearmes, and to take the trade of saltes of the Archduke his brother: The same Lopes caryed also commission to dispose of his men of warre in this sorte, that except the regimentes of Spanishe footemen who were to remayne in the Marquisdome of Saluzzo, all the others shoulde be dismissed: That fixe hundred men at armes should returne to the realme of Naples, and the residue remayne in the Duchie of Millan: And lastly that the Marquis of Pisquairo should be capteyne generall of his armie: The Emperour added to this commission, that those moneys which he had sent to Genes to defray foure Carackes with the which he intended speedily to passe in person into Spayne, should be conuerted to the necessities and vsage of tharmie, for that he was nowe determined not to departe out of Spayne: The Commission bare also to sende in themperours name the Protonotarie Carracciolo to Venice, to induce that Senate to a newe confederation, or at least to insinuate his disposition, and leaue them satisfied that all his actions tended to an vniuersall peace amongest Princes Christian.

But the going of the French king into Spayne brought no little perplexitie to the Pope and the Venetians, who seeing themprours armie was muche diminished, considered that into what part of Italie the kings person should be transported, thimperialls could not but finde many impedimentes by the necessitie to haue him well garded: so that by that meane eyther there might easily aryse some occasion to deliuer him, or at least the difficultie to cary him into Spayne, and the litle surety to kepe him in Italie, would constrayne themperour to giue some good forme to the generall affayres: But when by transporting his person into Spayne, both his owne hopes were disappoynted, and meane giuen to his enemies to leade him into sure prison, they discerned that all treatises and negociations were wholly in the hands of themperour, and that there could be established no fundation vpon the practises and offers of the French: In so muche as the reputation of themperour rising into augmentation by dayly degrees, all men began to exspect from his Court and from his hande, lawes and rules to dispose all affayres. In these discontentmentes were concurrant also (but for diuers causes) the displeasures of the Duke of Burbon, and the Marquis of Pisquairo, for that the Viceroy tooke vppon him without their priuitie to
" leade the French king into Spayne: Suche is the emulation of men in the case of " glorie or reputation, which more then all other worldlye passions hath a naturall
" propertie to carye their mindes headlong into ambition of other mens merite: The Duke of Burbon tooke the reason of his discontentment vpon this, that beeing expulsed Fraunce for thalliance he had made with themperour, he chalenged a more interest then any others to be called and to communicate in all the practises of accorde: In regarde whereof he determined to passe also into Spayne, and yet he was driuen to stande longer vpon his going then willingly he would, for that he taryed for the returne of the gallies that caried the Viceroy: The Marquis tooke displeasure with the Viceroy for the small estimation he made of him: and was no lesse yll contented with themprour, for that he was not thankfull as apperteined to his merites and many seruices done in the laste warres, and lately in the battell of Pauia, touching which victorie albeit he had deserued more prayse and glory then all the capteines of tharmy, yet themperour, contrary to the lawe of equitie and reason, had transferred the whole reputation to the Viceroy, with many highe honours and demonstrations: This the Marquis could not digest with suffrance, but in the passion of his wrong as he thought, he wrote letters to themprour full of detraction against the Viceroy, tempered with complayntes, to be so muche disauoured of him as not to be thought worthy at least to be made priuie to suche a resolution: and that if in the warre and daungers thereof, the deliberation of things had bene referred to his counsell and proper arbitration, the French king had not onely not bene taken, but also assone as the losse of the duchie of Millan had followed, thimperiall army beeing dryuen to abandon the defence of Lombardie, would necessarily haue retyred to Naples: Lastely he charged the Viceroy to be gone to triumphe of a victorie, wherein it was manifestly knowen to the whole armie he had no part at all: yea for proofe that in the heate and moste furie of the battell, he was both without courage and without counsell, there were many that heard him crye many times, VVe are losse and vanquished: and that if he would denie this chalenge, he offred to iustifie it vpon his body by the execution of armes, according to the lawes and rules of warre: The Marquis also was further incensed vpon this, that sending immediatly after the victorie to take possession of Carpy, thinking themprour would deliuer it to him, he was not satisfied in that desire, The reason was, that themperour hauing graunted

it two yeres before to Prospero Colonno, assured that notwithstanding he neuer had thinuestiture, yet in memorie of him that was dead, he would, to the profite of Vespasian his sonne, leaue to his house the same recompence which in his lyfe time he had intended in recordation of his vallour and actions: Whiche reason albeit was iuste, and that suche examples of gratitude ought to be acceptable to the Marquis, though not so muche for thexcellencie of them, yet for the hope they brought that his great seruises should be brought into liberall consideration by themperour: yet it was not embrased of him, not for that it was not iust & equall, but because for the opinion he bare of him selfe, he helde it conuenient that that peculiar humor & appetite of his, proceding of a couetousnes & irreconcileable hatred which he bare to the name of Prospero, should be preferred before all other interests how iust soeuer they were: In this intemperãcie of passion, he cried out of themprour and the whole counsell, sending his complayntes through all the Regions of Italie, and that with such detestatiõ of themprours ingratitude, that by his exclaiming others tooke courage to buyld new plotts: Of which, if themperour thought to proceede no further in the matters of Italie, did ryse a iust occasion, yea almost a necessitie to take other resolutions: but if he stoode vpon endes and purposes ambicious, he had meanes to couer them with the most honest occasion and fayrest cooller he coulde desire: And seeing from thence was deryued the very beginning and cause of righte great stirres and alterations, it is necessary we reduce it to some particular rehearsall.

Occasions giuen to themperour of new emotions.

The warre which in the lyfe of the late Pope Leo, was begonne aswell by him as by themperour, for the chasing of the Frenche king out of Italie, was leauyed vnder cooller to reestablish Frauncis Sforce in the Duchie of Millan: And albeit for thexecution hereof, after the victorie was obteined, promise was made to transfer to him the obedience of that state, together with the castell of Millan and the other places of strength, when they should be recouered: Yet such was the magnificencie and oportunitie of that Duchy, that the former feare ceassed not which men had of themperours ambition to aspire to it: They interpreted the impedimentes which he receiued by the french king, to be the cause that he kept cloked as yet so great a thirst, for that he had altered those peoples desyring vehemently to haue Frauncis Sforce for lorde, and had stirred vp all Italie agaynst him, being not content to suffer the French to ryse to suche a greatnes: So that Frauncis Sforce helde that Duchie, but with a harde yoke and subiection, and tributes and charges intollerable: for all the staye and fundation of his defence agaynst the French, consisting in themperour and in his armie, he was constrayned not onely to respect him as his prince, but also to liue subiected to the will of his capteines: By whom he was miserably compelled to enterteine his regimentes of men of warre not payed by themperour, sometymes with money which he leauyed vpon his subiectes with grieuous impostes and great difficulties, and sometimes in suffiring them licenciously to lyue vppon his people by discression, and that in all the seuerall partes of his estate, except the Citie of Millan: Oppressions which albeit of themselues were heauye and grieuous, yet the nature of the Spaniarde being greedy, and when he hath the meane to discouer his inclination very insolent, made them intollerable: Neuertheless the daunger which was had of the Frenche men to whom thinhabitantes were enemies, and the hope that those vexations would one day drawe to ende, wrought in the heartes of men a greater suffraunce then their forces or faculties could well beare. But after the victorie of Pauia the people could no more endure, seeing the same necessities no more continuing for that the king was prisoner, yet their calamities continued notwith-

ſtanding: and therefore they required to bee ſomewhat eaſed of their burdens, by withdrawing from the Duchie, eyther all or the moſte parte of the armie: The like inſtance was alſo made by the Duke, hauing enioyed of the Dukedome no other thing till that day, then the bare name and title: he feared leaſt themprour, beeing nowe aſſured of the French king, would occupie and reteine the Duchie to himſelf, or at leaſt beſtowe it in donation vpon ſome of his followers and dependanciers: In which feare and ſuſpicion, deriued of the very nature of thaffayres occurrant, he was ſpecially nouriſhed by the inſolent words ſpoken by the Viceroy affore he conueyed the king into Spayne, together with the demonſtrations expreſſed by the other capteines, wherein muche leſſe that they publiſhed any reputation to be holden of the Duke, ſeeing they deſired openly that themperour woulde oppreſſe him: Beſides, themperour, after many delayes and deferring, hauing ſent to the Viceroy the expedition and priuileages of the inueſtiture, the Viceroy when he preſented them to the Duke, demaunded for recompence of charges for conquering and defending that ſtate, to paye to themperour within a certayne tearme, the ſumme of twelue hundred thouſande duckets: A demaunde ſo exceſſiue and intollerable, that the Duke was driuen to haue recourſe to the Emperour to moderate and abate the ſumme. But theſe difficulties drew a doubt leaſt the demaundes ſo immoderate were not interpoſed to make the matter alwayes deferred: Moreouer ſuche as ſought to excuſe the neceſſitie of Frauncis Sforce, alleaged many other generall cauſes of his iuſt ſuſpicion, and particularly the knowledge he had that thimperiall Capteines were reſolued to reſtrayne or retayne him: In ſo muche as being ſommoned by the Viceroy to a certayne councell or Dyet, he refuſed to go fayning to be ſicke, couering himſelfe with the like excuſes in all places where they had power to do him violence: He nouriſhed this ſuſpicion whether it were true or falſe, and ioyned withall this conſideration, that the ſtate of Millan was well disburdened of the regimentes of men of warre, parte of the Spaniſhe footemen being gone into Spayne at ſeuerall times with the Viceroy and the Duke of Burbon, and alſo diuerſe bandes being made riche with pillage and pray, were retyred by trowpes into ſundrie places: And conſidering alſo the great indignation that was ſhowed to the Marquis of Piſquairo, he deuiſed by theſe aduauntages to aſſure himſelfe of the preſent daunger, and entred into hope that tharmie might be eaſily defeated vſing the conſent and vallour of the Marquis: The author of this deuiſe was Ierome Moron his Chauncellor, a man of high authoritie and place with him, and for the facultie of his ſpirite, facilitie of inuention, flowing eloquence, familiar readynes, and great experience, and laſtly for his reſolution and magnanimitie, hauing oftētimes made ſinguler reſiſtance agaynſt aduerſities, was in our age a perſonage of right worthy memorie: Whiche partes or giftes had tyed vpon his name a perpetuall fame and honor, if they had gone accompanied with ſuche ſinceritie of minde, ſuche care and zeale to integritie, and with ſuche maturitie of iudgement, as his counſels for the moſte parte had not bene diſcerned to holde more of precipitation and impudencie, then of circumſpection or honeſtie: This man ſounding the intention of the Marquis, made ſuche inſinuation into his minde already deepely grieued, that they began to common to cut in peeces the remaynder of the regimentes remayning within the Duchie of Millan, and to make the Marquis king of Naples: An enterpriſe whiche they helde of eaſie action, if the Pope and Venetians woulde be concurrant with them: And touching the Pope, whoſe minde was drawen with ſuſpicion and doubt, after he was ſounded by the aduiſe of Moron, he ſhowed him ſelfe no whit diſagreeing to that counſell, and yet he aduertiſed themprour vnder cooller of friendſhip to interteine his capteines in deuotion and well contented, not that he ment to diſcloſe the practiſe, but to prepare to himſelfe a refuge if the matter declined to ſome yll euent: But the Venetians embraſed the deuiſe with reſolution and ſincere affection, perſwading themſelues that no leſſe readineſſe of minde and will woulde be founde in the Lady Regent, who began to perceyue, that ſince her ſonne was arriued in Spayne, the negociations of his deliuerie were not continued with that facilitie that was looked for. There is no doubt that theſe counſels had not eaſily ſucceded, if the Marquis of Piſquairo had proceeded ſincerely in that confederation agaynſt themprour: But whether at the firſt he enterteyned the practiſe or not, there was diuerſitie of opinions aſwell amongeſt the Spaniardes as in the verye Court of themperour: Many that were obſeruers of tymes and euentes of affayres, beleeued that at the beginning he was ſimply concurrant with the reſidue, but afterwards he diſclaymed from thenterpriſe, and made newe deliberations both for the conſideration of many difficulties that might happen with the tyme, and alſo fearing the continuall ſolicitations of the French with themperour, with the reſolution that the Ducheſſe of Alanſon ſhould go to him: yea ſome do aſſure that he deferred ſo long to aduertiſe themperour of theſe conſpiracies pretended in Italie, that hauing receyued knowledge of them by Antho. de Leua and Marino Abbot of Nagero Commiſſary in themperours armie, all the whole Court maruelled at the ſilence of the Marquis: But how ſoeuer his dealing was then, it is certayne that a little after he ſent to themperour Iohn Baptiſta Caſtaldo, who imparted the reall diſcourſe of the conſpiracie: and with the priuitie of themperour did not onely enterteine the practiſe, but alſo the better to decipher the thoughtes of euery man, and to take from them all, the meane to denie that they had conſented, he commoned by mouth with the duke of Millan, and perſwaded Moron to induce the Pope (who a little before had indued him with the perpetuall gouernment of the Citie of Beneuent) to ſende Dominike Savvlo wyth a letter of credence to conferre with him of the matter. The concluſions of the treatiſe were theſe: That betwene the Pope, the realme of Fraunce, and the gouernments of Italie, ſhould be a league, ouer the which the Marquis of Piſquairo ſhould be capteine generall: That for the firſt action he ſhould beſtowe the infanterie or footebandes of the Spaniſhe ſeuerally in ſundry places of the Duchie of Millan, and ſo drawing to himſelfe ſo many as would followe him, the others ſhoulde be ſpoyled and put to the ſworde together with Antho. de Leua, who next to him ſelfe was the chiefe commaunder of the armie: And then ioyning to him the forces of all the confederates, he ſhould execute thenterpriſe of the kingdome of Naples, whereof the Pope was to indue him with the inueſtiture. The Marquis ſeemed to finde no other difficultie in theſe actions, ſauing that affore he put any thing to tryall, he deſired to be ſatisfied whether without blemiſhing his honor and fidelitie, he mighte embraſe ſuche an enterpriſe in caſe the Pope put it vppon him by his authoritie: Wherevpon was brought into queſtion and conſideration, to whom, he beeing a Baron and ſubiect of the Realme of Naples, ought to obey, eyther to themprour to whom the profitable iuriſdiction of the Realme apperteined by thinueſtiture he had receyued of the Churche, or to the Pope in whom was the direct ſoueraigntie, being abſolute and ſoueraigne thereof: Vpon which article, both at Millan by the ordinance of Frauncis Sforce, and at Rome by thappoyntmēt of the Pope, were called very ſecret cōſultations of excellent doctors with ſuppreſſion of their true names. Theſe hopes agaynſt themperour were augmented by the offers of the Lady Regent, who iudging that eyther the neceſſitie or the feare of themprour, would aduaunce much the matters that were treated with him for the deliuery of her ſonne, ſolicited earneſtly to take armes, promiſing to ſend into Lombardy a ſtrength of 500. launces, and to be concurrant in thexſpences of the warre with great contributions of money. Moron for his parte ceaſſed not to confirme the mindes of the reſidue in that opinion: for, beſides the perſwaſions he made howe eaſie it would be euen without the ayde of the Marquis of Piſquairo, to defeate that armie ſo much diminiſhed in numbers, he promiſed in the Dukes name, that if the Marquis ſhould not ſtande conſtant but ſwarue from the reſolution of the treatiſe, immediatly after order giuen to the other buſineſſe, there ſhould be apprehended priſoners within the Caſtell of Millan aſwell he as the other Capteines hauing dayly acceſſe thither to conſult. But albeit theſe occaſions ſeemed great and no leſſe importing the circumſtances and dependaunces which they drewe, yet they had not bene ſufficient to carye the Pope into armes without the Marquis of Piſquairo, if at the ſame tyme he had not hearde of prouiſion ſent to Genes to arme foure Carakes, and withall had not had ſome token and intelligence from Spayne of themperours inclination to paſſe into Italy: A matter which dyd not a little afflict him aſwell in regarde of the conditions of the time preſent, as alſo for the auncient obſeruation and diſpoſition of the Popes of Rome, to whom nothing hath wonte to bring more terrour and aſtoniſhment, then the comming of Emperours with armed hande into Italy: In ſo muche as deſyring in his feare to meete with this daunger, he tooke the conſent and priuitie of the Venetians, and diſpatched ſecretly into Fraunce to conclude the matters negociated with the Lady Regent, Sigiſmond ſecretory to Albert Carpy, a man experienced in affayres of eſtate, and of ſingular confidence with the Pope: but as he ranne poſte towardes Fraunce, he was ſet vppon by night by theeues and robbers and ſlayne neare the lake of Iſea vppon the territorie of Breſsia, which accident for the ſecrete keeping of it many dayes, brought to the Pope great ſuſpicion that he was ſecretlye taken and ſtayed in ſome place by thimperiall Capteines, and happily by the Marquis himſelf, whom they began to diſtruſt muche for his maner of proceeding, but more for the delayes he vſed.

In this eſtate and condition of affayres, arryued the diſpatche of Lopus Vtrado, who remayning ſicke in Sauoye, ſente his expedition awaye to Millan by a man expreſſe: He brought the letters patentes by the whiche the Marquis of Piſquairo was declared capteine general, who to continue with others in the ſame ſemblance, made as though ſuche a charge was not very agreable to him, and yet he accepted it immediatly. The ſame Lopus ſent alſo to the Protonotorie Carraccioll, the commiſſion to goe to Venice in thEmperours name, to induce that Senate to a newe confederation, or at leaſt to inſinuate into them what deſyre thEmperour had to lyue in peace with all men. In thys tyme Frauncis Sforce was falne into a diſeaſe verye daungerous for his lyfe, and accepted thinueſtiture of the Duchie, paying for it fiftie thouſande duckets, and ceaſſed not for all that to continue the practiſes begonne with the Marquis. The opinions were diuerſe touching this diſpatche of thEmperour: Some beleeued that he had ſimply determined to aſſure thItalians: But others iudged that for feare of newe innouations and ſtirres, he ſought to holde men in ſuſpence with diuerſe hopes, and going on ſtill wynning of tyme, to agree to thinueſtiture, and in apparaunce graunt a commiſſion ſo agreable to all Italy to make tetyre hys armie, thoughe on the other ſide he had giuen directions to his Capteynes not to ſtirre nor remoue: yea there were ſome that had this opinion that he had intelligence from the Marquis of the practiſes enterteyned with Moron, and therefore he ſente out ſuche a Commiſſion, not to be obeyed, but to gette ſome iuſtification, and with his hopes to keepe lulled aſleepe the myndes of men, vntill he ſawe apte tyme to aduaunce and execute his purpoſes: In whiche diuerſitie of humors and opinions albeit it was very harde to ſounde oute the ſimple trueth, ſeeing withall it was not knowen whether Lopus Vtrado was diſpatched at the ſame tyme that aryued at the Court Iohn Baptiſta Caſtaldo ſente by the Marquis to aduertiſe themperour of the negociation: Yet conſidering by many accidentes and euentes ſithence, what courſe themperour hath taken, it is without doubt that it is leſſe fallible to holde for true the better and the more eaſie interpretation. But in this meane while the Marquis omitted no oportunitie wherein occaſion was giuen to enterteine Moron and the others with the ſame hopes, deferring notwithſtanding with many excuſes thexecution of thinges: Wherein he tooke one occaſion of the ſicknes of the Duke of Millan, which increaſed on him by ſuch daungerous degrees, that euery one helde almoſt for certayne, that it would leade him to his laſt time: for all the Capteines pretending that in caſe of the Dukes death, the eſtate of that Duchie ſhould returne to themperour as ſoueraigne lorde in chiefe, it was not only not conuenient for him to retyre his army, but alſo it was neceſſary to call in a newe ſtrength of two thouſande Launceknightes, and prepare a greater number to be in readineſſe: So that the ſouldiours for their numbers and vallours beeing puiſſant in the Duchie of Millan, there was no meane eyther to diſſolue them, or at leaſt to offende them: He gaue alſo hope to execute the counſells of the conſpiracie aſſoone as there was apte concurrancie of tyme and meane: in exſpectation whereof he ſayde he proceeded with a great reſpecte to the Pope, and for gratification of him, he leauyed frō of the eſtates of the Church his garriſons of men of warre, who gaue him occaſion of right great complayntes.

The Fr. king extremely ſicke in the caſtell of Madrill.

But about this time almoſt all things were chaunged by a newe accident which hapned in Spayne: for the french king falling ſick in the caſtell of Madrill, and hauing in vayne deſired the preſence of themperour, was caried by his diſcontentment and melancoly into ſuch extremitie & daunger of his life, that the Phiſitions appoynted for his cure, tolde themperour that they ſtoode deſperat of his recouerie, if himſelfe in perſon came not to comforte him with ſome hope of his deliuerie: Themperour obeying more compaſſion then the reaſon of thinges, was not curious to condiſcende to performe ſo good an office, And as he prepared to viſite him accordingly, his high Chauncellor ſeeking to turne him from the iorney, tolde him with many ſtrong reaſons, that he could not go to him in honor, but with intention to deliuer him preſently and without any couenant: Otherwiſe as it would be a humanity not royall but marcenory, ſo it woulde diſcloſe a deſire to recouer him, not moued of charitie, but puſhed on by his proper intereſt, as not to loaſe by his death thoccaſion of the profite hoped for by the victorie: A counſell aſſuredly bothe graue and honorable touching the man that gaue it, and no leſſe worthy to be followed by ſo great a prince as themprour: and yet being more caried by the reaſons of others, he tooke poſt to go to him: But for the daunger of the king being almoſt at the extremitie, the viſitation was ſhort, & yet for the time accompanied with gracious words full of hope that he would deliuer him immediatly vpon his returning to health: In ſo much that whether it was by the cōfort that he breathed into him (in the ſicknes of captiuity the promiſe of liberty excedes all medicines) or by the benefite of hys youth, whiche with the fauour of nature was ſtronger then the maladie, he began after this visitation to resume so good disposition, that within fewe dayes he was out of daunger, notwithstanding he could not recouer his former health but with very slowe time.

And nowe neither the difficulties that were shewed on themperours side, nor the hopes whiche were giuen by thItalians, nor any other nature of impedimentes what so euer, coulde staye the voyage of the Lady Alanson into Spayne: for that as nothing was more harde or heauy to the French men then to leaue off the practises and negociations of accorde begonne with those that had power to restore their king: so nothing was more easie to themperour then feeding the Frenche wyth hopes, to drawe their myndes from taking armes, and by that meane so to keepe thItalians in suspence, as not to dare to enter into newe deliberations: And in that cunning manner, sometymes vsing delayes, and sometymes pressing forwarde thafayres, he thought to keepe the myndes of all men confused and intangled. The Lady Alanson was receyued by themperour with very gracious demonstrations and hopes, but theffectes fell oute bothe harde and heauy: for when she ministred speeche to him for the mariage of hys sister the widdowe with the king, he made aunswere that it was a matter which could not be done without the consent of the Duke of Burbon: The other particularities were debated by deputies of both partes, wherein as the Emprour insisted obstinately to haue the Duchy of Burgonguy restored as apperteining to him: so the French refused to consent, vnlesse he woulde accept it for dowrie, or else to referre it to the sentence of the law and iustice to decide the true title: And albeit they could easily haue condiscended to the residue, yet for that they were so farre off for the demaund of Burgonguy, the Lady Alanson returned at laste into Fraunce, without winning any other grace then a fauour to see the king her brother: who growing more and more into distrust of his deliuery, desyred her at her departing, to admonishe his mother and all the counsayle from him, to looke carefully to the profite of the Crowne of Fraunce without hauing any consideration of him, as if he lyued not: But notwithstanding the departing of the Ladye Alanson, the solicitations for the kings deliuerie did not ceasse, for that there remayned behinde the President of Paris and the Bishops of Ambrum and Tarbe, who had tyll then followed the negociation but with very litle hope, since themprour would not harken to any cõdition, if first Burgonguy were not rendred, which the king could not be brought to restore, but in a last necessitie.

About this time the Cardinall Saluatio the Popes Legate aryued at the Courte, where being receyued of themperour with great honor and fauors, he debated vpon his commissions which principally conteyned the ratification of the Articles promised by the Viceroy, and secondly a demaunde to transferre thinuestiture to the Duke of Millan for the common suretie of Italy: But the Viceroy notwithstanding his promises, disswaded the restitution of Reggia and Rubiera: and by his counsell and through the hopes he had in him, the Duke of Ferrara, desiring to solicite his owne cause before themperour, and hauing the Popes promise not to execute any enterprise vpon his estate, for sixe monethes, tooke his way to the frontyer of the realme of Fraunce, with intention to passe further, but being denied passage and safeconduit by the Lady Regent, he returned backe agayne to Ferrara. The Legate and themprour conferred together touching a dispensation to take to wife the king of Portugals sister, A mariage which themprour was determined to contract notwithstãding he had promised the king of England by oth to take no other wife then his daughter: But the Pope temporised this demaund, & stood long to accord to the dispẽsation, for

for that many perſwaded him that the deſire to obteyne ſuch a grace, would reduce the Emperour, and make him the more eaſie to his deſires touching the matters in negociation: And at leaſt wiſe, in caſe he would make warre vpon him, it were farre from pollicie and diſcreſſion, to giue him meane to heape together ſo great a maſſe of money as would growe to him by that mariage, for that the king of Portugall offred him for a portion, nyne hundred thouſande ducketts: Of whiche, deducting ſo muche as was ſet downe to defraye the debtes contracted betweene them, it was thought there would come to his handes at leaſt a ſumme offiue hundred thouſand duckets: Beſides, the ſubiectes of Spayne conſented to rayſe a contribution of foure hundred thouſande, vnder the title of a beneuolence or ſeruice, which taking his beginning in tymes paſte of the proper willes and motion of the people to releeue the neceſſities of their kinges, was reduced by cuſtome and working of tymes, into a loane or rather an ordinary Subſedie: yea they offred him moreouer to enriche him with a further ſumme of foure hundred thouſande duckats, if he went through with the mariage. On the other ſide, the Pope had no power to reſiſte thimportunities of the Duke of Seſſo thEmperours Embaſſadour, for that by the propertie of his inclination, there appeared for the moſte parte in hym a repugnancie betweene that he purpoſed, and thinges whiche he executed: for beeing by nature very farre of to accorde any grace that was demaunded of him, he was not apt to vſe difficulties, nor eaſie to make deniall: onely by the facilitie of his nature, he ſuffred oftentymes hys will to be wonne and ouerruled by thimportunitie of ſuche as ſued to hym, and in that diſpoſition ſeemed to accorde to thinges more through feare then by grace, wherein he proceeded not neyther with that conſtancie of minde, nor with that maieſtie of title and place, whiche was required of the greatneſſe of his dignitie, and was agreable to thimportance of thaffayres that ſtoode vppon negociation: And in that maner did he deale touching the diſpenſation required by themperour, for as on the one ſide he was caryed by hys proper profite, and on the other ſide ouerruled by his ordinarie facilitie and ſoftneſſe, ſo according to hys cuſtome, he diſcharged vppon the backe of an other the thing whiche him ſelfe was not ſufficient to ſuſteine, neyther with his body nor with his mynde: he diſpatched by a writte the diſpenſation in the ſame forme themperour demaunded it, and ſending it to the Cardinall Saluiatio, he tyed to it this commiſſion, that if his affayres with thEmperour ſoarted to a reſolution according to the hope he had giuen aſſoone as the ſayde Cardinall ſhould come to the Court, he ſhould deliuer the writ, otherwiſe to retayne it to him ſelfe: A commiſſion wherein the miniſter or ſeruant (as ſhall be ſayde in his place) ſhowed himſelfe no more firme nor more conſtant, then the maiſter.

But whileſt the Cardinall diſputed the Popes Commiſſions with themperour, and was alwayes enterteined with hope to haue thexpedition he deſyred, there fell oute in Lombardie verye diuerſe effectes: for the Duke of Millan beeing ſo well recouered of hys ſickneſſe, that at the leaſt he was holden out of daunger of ſoddayne death, the Marquis of Piſquairo hauing receyued by Caſtaldo themperours Commiſſion to prouide for thoſe daungers as he thought good, determined to enter vppon the Duchie of Millan vnder this cooller, that the Duke by reaſon of the conſpiracies and practiſes holden by Moron, was falne from the rightes of inueſtiture, and the chiefe or ſoueraigne freeholde reuerted vpon the Emperour as ſupreme Lorde: And to giue a beginning to this reſolution, the Marquis lying at Nouaro very ſicke, notwithſtanding he had beſtowed one parte of the armie within Pauia, and lodged the Launceknightes neare Loda, whiche two cities he had fortified: yet vnder cooller to disposse the armie through all the state of Millan, he reuoked to Nouaro when was least doubt of suche a matter, the residue of the bands disperssed in Pyedmont and the Marquisdome of Salusse, whiche state the Imperiall capteines had occupied almoste immediatly after the victorie: He called also to Nouaro, Moron, in whose person rested almost the importance of all thinges: And as it was certayne that Moron beeing made prisoner, the Duke of Millan would be made depriued both of men and counsell: So the Marquis by that meane thought to take awaye all impedimentes and resistance, where, if he shoulde suffer him to liue in libertie, it could not be but that Moron, with his spirite, with his experience, and with his reputation, woulde entangle the estate of hys affayres, and giue many impedimentes to his plotts and purposes: Besides, it was necessary for themperour to haue the person of Moron in his power and possession, for that beeing the author and speciall instrument of all the conspiracies, he thoughte to drawe from him by his proper confession all those treasons and intelligences whiche

" were charged vppon the Duke of Millan. There is nothing more harde then to a-

and consenting to all that had bene paste, whiche was the matter that principally was sought. Thus the Marquis hauing Moron vnder garde and keeping, proceeded by other degrees to reuerse vtterly the Duke: And beeing already possessed of Loda and Pauia, he required the Duke for the suretie of themprours estate, to deliuer vp Cremona and the Castels of Bressia, Lecqua, and Pisqueton, places supposed to be the keyes of the Duchie of Millan, for that they haue their situation vppon the passage of Adda: And as he promised to introduce no alteration nor innouation, so the Duke both abandoned of counsell, and depriued of hope, made present deliuerie according to the demaunde, departing willingly with the things which his destinie denied him to deteyne: Beeing possessed of these places, of no lesse importance for the surety of the Marquis and his driftes, then most apte to pull on the extreme reuersement of the Duke, he passed to further insolencies, requiring to be receyued into Millan to haue conference with the Duke as he alleaged: which being graunted to him with the same facilitie, he demaunded eftsones to be possessed of the castel of Cremona: and albeit he forbare to require the castell of Millan as being a demaunde not reasonable, for that his person was lodged within it, yet he insisted vehemently that for the suretie of themperours armie he woulde consent the Castell might be enuironed with trenches: He required also to haue deliuered into his handes Iohn Angeo Riccio, his Secretorie, and Politian Secretorie to Moron, to thende examinations might be imposed vppon them for the conspiracies agaynst the Emperour. To these demaundes the Duke aunswered: That touching the Castells of Millan and Cremona, as he held them in the name and at the instance of themprour, to whom he had alwayes bene a most deuoute and faythfull vassall, so he coulde not but iudge it preiudiciall to his fidelitie, to deliuer them vp to the hands of any without hys priuitie and wyll: Wherein for his more full vnderstanding and satisfying, he sayde he woulde dispatche foorthwith a messaunger expresse, so farrefoorth as the Marquis woulde giue hym suretie of passage: That in the meane whyle he helde it neyther comely nor conuenient to consente to be incloſed or intrenched within the Castell, A violence whiche he woulde defende with all his power: That he coulde not departe wyth Iohn Angeo, beeing the onely man that was instructed in all hys affayres of importaunce, and at that tyme the onely officer aboute hym: And that as touching the Secretorie of Moron, he had a greater care to deteyne hym, to thende to presente hym to thEmperour, and to proue by that meane, that during the Dukes sickneſſe, his Maister had embraſed and dispatched in hys name and without hys priuitie manye expeditions, whiche sinisterlye mighte bee charged vppon hym, if by that meane he iustified not his innocencie, and showed that the practises of Moron were farre differente and separate from his operations: But theffecte was, that after manye offers and protestations paste by wryting aswell by the one as thother partie, the Marquis compelled the peoples of Millan to passe an othe of fidelitie to themperour, in whose name he bestowed officers throughe all the estate of the Dukedome, to the great displeasure and discontenting of thinhabitantes: And in that authoritie he beganne with trenches to incompasse the Castells of Cremona and Millan, in the whiche the Duke was resolued to remayne wyth eyght hundred choyse footemen and suche reasonable store of vittells as by the shortneſſe of the time he could prouide: He gaue him selfe ouer to that besieging, partly through the neceſſitie of the tyme, and partely for the comfortes and hopes of succours giuen hym by the Pope and the Venetians, not faylinge withall wyth the vse of hys Artilleries

to hinder as muche as he coulde the working of the trenches which were drawen on that ſide without, and of more diſtance from the Caſtell then thoſe whiche Proſper Colonno cauſed to be caſt.

All the Regions of Italie were reduced to a great aſtoniſhment for the vſurpation of the Dukedome of Millan, which they ſawe could not but fall into manyfeſt ſeruitude when ſo euer an Emprour of nature ambicious and ſtirring, and for his forces mightie and warlike, ſhould be Lorde ouer Millan and Naples: But aboue all others the Pope was eſpecially afflicted, ſeeing in that action his practiſes were diſcloſed, with the which he had pretended not onely to aſſure Millan, but alſo to confounde themprours armie, and take from him the kingdome of Naples. Touching the Marquis of Piſquairo, it maye be that by theſe operations he wonne great fauour with themperour, but with all other ſortes of men he purchaſed perpetuall infamie, not onely for thopinion that moſte conceyued of him, that in the beginning he extended his intentions to double with themperour and to bandy agaynſt him, but alſo notwithſtanding he intended fidelitie to themprour, yet he ranne a courſe of infamy in this, to ſet on men, and with ſo great arte and infidelitie to drawe them into conſpiracie with him, to thende to haue occaſion to detect them, and to make himſelfe greate of the tranſgreſſions of others, ſolicited with words diſſembled and artificial: This alteration made harde the hope of accorde that was negociated with the Senat of Venice by the Protenotorie Caraccioll: who hoped that (for the tearmes wherin things ſtoode) the Senate would ſpeedily drawe to a concluſion to renew the former confederation with the ſame conditions: and to paye to themprour foureſcore thouſande duckets in recompence that in tymes paſte he had withdrawne his ayde, leauing there wholly all demaundes to contribute hereafter with money: But the accident of Millan reduced the Senate to no litle perplexitie: for on the one ſide they ſtoode grieued to be the onely people in Italy that with ſo great daunger contended agaynſt themprour, ſeeing they were threatned by the Marquis of Piſquairo to tranſport the whole warre vpon their eſtate, whereof they diſcerned already certayne preparations: And on the other ſide, they were not ignorant that in caſe thaccorde went throw, themprour ſhould with greater facilitie make himſelfe abſolute lorde of that Duchie, which being ioyned to ſo many eſtates, and ſo many other oportunities, they ſawe was the onely line to leade him to ſubdue them together with the reſidue of Italy: A matter which was continually declared to them by the Biſhop of Bayeux, whom the Lady Regent had ſent to ſolicite an vnion with thItalians agaynſt themprour: for which purpoſe, in ſo great a doubt, and in ſo daungerous apparances, they made many aſſemblies, but without any reſolution for the diuerſitie of opinions: And albeit to accept thaccorde, was a thing more conformable to their cuſtome and maner of proceeding, for that it ſo tooke them out of daungers preſent, as they might hope in the tract of tymes and benefite of occaſions which common weales may attend (who in compariſon of Princes are immortall:) yet it ſeemed to them a matter of too great importance, to ſuffer themprour confirmed in theſtate of Millan, and to ſee the French remayne excluded from all hope of alliance in Italy: Therefore after they had at laſte reſolued to be bounde to no thing, they made this aunſwere to the Protenotary Carraccioll: That the forme of their actions paſte gaue fayth to all the world, and he himſelfe being preſent at the concluſion of the confederation, could well teſtifie, with what great affection they had alwayes deſired thamitie of themprour: with whom as they contracted a confederation in a tyme when if they had harkned to the French, it had bene (as all the world world knewe) an operacion of right great consequence, so they had persevered and would for euer continue in the same disposicion towards him: Only the necessity of thinges kept them in suspence, both for that they saw in Lombardie many chaunges and innouations of great importaunce, and also for that they remembred that their confederacion with thEmperour, together with so many moulngs and stirres, happned that yeare in Italie, drewe no other end or meaning then to transferre Fraunc is Sforce to the Duchie of Millan as the principall fundacion of the libertie and suretie of Italie: In which regard they besought his Maiestie, that maintaining in that case him selfe and deducing affore all the world his bountie, he would remoue and make cease so great an innouacion, and establish the tranquillitie of Italie: which as it was in his power to doe being nowe the starre that guided the whole firmament, so for their partes, he should find them alwayes disposed and prepared both with their authoritie and with their forces, to follow so holy an inclinacion, and honor him besides with all other sortes of office and humility whether he would extend them generally, or applie them to his particular interests: This aunswere albeit it conteined no hope of cōclusion, yet it bred not for al that any ouerture or beginning of warre: for that both the sickenesse of the Marquis of Pisquairo which aggrauated dayly in worse degrees, & the desire to impatronise him selfe first of the whole estate of Millan, and to establish and assure that conquest, together with thinclinacion of thEmperour extending to put end and resolucion to so many other affaires which he had in hande, would not suffer him to giue beginning to an enterprise of so great consequence.

About this time the Duke of Burbon was arriued in Spaine, and came to thEmperours Court the fifteene day of Nouember: concerning whom it is not reasonable I omit here to touch by the way, that albeit thEmperour receiued him with all honors and demonstracions of Court, embracing him with the title and grace of his brother in law, yet all the Lordes and Nobles of the Court accustomed in all other things to follow theexample of their Prince, abhorred him as a person infamous, and called him traitor to his king: such was their hatred against him, that one of them being required in thEmperours name to suffer his house to be made readie for the Duke of Burbon, aunswered in the corage & stowtnes of a Spaniard, that as he would not deny thEmperour any thing he would demaunde of him, so his Maiestie should well vnderstand that assoone as Burbon was gone out of his house he would burne it as a pallace infected with the infamie of Burbon and vnworthie afterwardes for the dwelling of men of honor. The graces and honors which the thEmperour shewed to the Duke of Burbon, augmented greatly the distrust of the frenchmen, who, somewhat by that meane, but more for the returning of the Ladie Regent without effect, began to haue cold hopes in thaccord, notwithstanding it was continually negociated by men expresse remeining with thEmperour: In respect whereof, they labored as much as they could to aduance the league with the Pope: wherein did concurre the perswasions and authority of the king of England, and the redoubled and vehement instances of the Venetians, together with this oportunitie not of the least consequence. The death of the Marquis of Pisquairo, who about that time, which was the beginning of December, made his last end happily by the iust sentence of God, who would not suffer him to enioy the frute of that seede which he had sowen with so great malignity: He was of the house of Abalos originally deriued from Catalignia, and his predecessor came into Italie with king Alfonso of Aragon, he who the first of that house made conquest of the kingdome of Naples: He began to follow armes at the battell of Rauenna, where, being very younge he was taken prisoner: And afterwards aspyring to a reputacion of a Capteine, he followed all the warres which the Spanyards had in Italy: Insomuch as though he had not past the age of xxxvj. yeres, yet for experience he was olde, for inuencion suttle, in councell graue, in execucion resolute, wise to forsee a daunger, and quicke to auoid a mischiefe: he bare great authoritie and credit with the infanterie of Spayne, ouer whom as he had bene of long, Capteine generall: so both the victorie of Pauia and all other actions of merit executed by that army since certaine yeares, were principally succeeded by his councel and by his vertue: he was assuredly a Capteine of great vallour, but one that with arte and dissimulacion, knewe how to drawe fauor and grace to his doings, being besides, prowd of minde, of wit deceitfull, of nature malicious, of councell and action without sincerity, and so singuler in his owne weening, that oftentimes he hath bene heard saye, that he was more worthye to haue Spayne for his contry then Italy: His death as it kindled a great confusion in the whole armie with whome he stoode in no litle grace and reputacion, so also by his death the contrary side tooke occasion to hope that easily they might be able to bringe all the souldiers to ruine and oppression since there was taken from them a Capteine of so great authoritie and vallour. And by this occasion like as with the Pope were more vehement and importunate the instances of such as solicited the proceeding of the league, so also the doubtes which deteyned him in suspence were nothing lesse, and that with good right, since on all partes he was touched with mocions of right waighty reasons, such as might suffice to hold confused and suspenced any man of right good action and councell, and much more a Pope Clement to whom it was familiar to proceede alwayes in his affayres with slownes and doubt.

There was no further exspectacion of thEmprour for any way or deuise to assure the regions of Italy, And he was manifestly discerned to solicite vehemently the taking of the castell of Myllan: In which action was layed a foundacion to conuert many other patrimonies into apparant praye or spoyle, but specially the states of the Pope, who being reduced to a generall weakenes, had his being planted betweene Lombardye and the Realme of Naples: And if it were in thEmprours power to oppresse the Pope, there was no doubt that he would not execute it, either for ambicion which is almost naturally inuested in Emprours against the Popes, or for his own suertie which wise men preferre affore all other regards, or lastly for reuenge, being drawne both to disdaine and distrust for the conspiracies which he enterteyned with the Marquis of Pisquairo: And if the necessitie to prouide for this daunger, was great, the foundacions and hopes to doe it seemed not light, for that if the remedie were not to succeede by the meane of so mighty a league and vnion, it was to be thought desperate for euer: The Regent of Fraunce made promisse of fiue hundred launces, and to contribute for euery moneth so long as the warre should endure, forty thowsand duckats, with the which it was intended to wage ten thowsand Svvyzzers. The Pope and the Venetians in one ioynt ayde, were to leauye xviij. hundred men at armes, twenty thowsand footemen, and two thowsand light horsemen: The French men and the Venetians promised to take the sea, and with a great nauie to do inuasion vppon Genes, or the Realme of Naples: Lastly the Lady Regent of Fraunce was bound to begin the warre immediatly with a stronge armie vppon the frontyers of Spayne, to thende to stoppe thEmprour for sending of men and money to releeue the warre in Italy.

Deuises of Princes against the power of thEmprour.

ThEmprours armie that remeyned in Lombardye was not great, neither for the numbers

nũbers & quality of ſouldiers being much diminiſhed, nor for the preſence of Capteines of conduct and authoritie, ſeeing both the Marquis was dead, and the Duke of Burbon & the Viceroy of Naples abode as yet in Spaine: They were without meane to recouer money for their payes, and had no plentie of vittells to ſerue them for foode: The generall inhabitantes there, were enemies to them for the quarrell and deſire of their Duke, and no leſſe for thintollerable exactions impoſed by the ſouldiours both in the Citie of Millan and elſewhere: The caſtells of Millan and Cremona helde good as yet for the Duke: And laſtly the Venetians gaue hope that the Duke of Ferrara would alſo enter into this confederacion, if the Pope would accord to him Reggia, which by one meanes or other he had alwayes poſſeſſed: Theſe were the hopes of the confederates, which reduced to good manner of proceeding, caried their manifeſt reaſons of happie iſſue: Theſe were the fundacions they layed againſt the ambicion and puiſance of thEmperour, ſhadowed neuertheleſſe vnder the cloake and liuerie to aſſure their proper liberties: But on thother ſide, the difficulties which they diſcerned reſted in the ſuttlety and vertue of thenemies, who had this by cuſtome and propertie of condicion, to temporiſe a long time with litle money, and endure many neceſſities with much patience: They ſaw the townes which thennemies held, were well fortified, and no leſſe facilitie to reduce them to better ſtrength with rampars & other ſort of fortificacion, for that they were townes whoſe ſituacion was in the plaine or champion: By which oportunitie they were hable to enterteine them ſelues together vntill there came from Germanie a ſufficient ſuccor to drawe and driue the whole warre to the fortune of a battell. Moreouer they ſawe that touching the ſouldiours of the league, they could not be but bodies raw & vntrained, in compariſon of the others reſolute and nouriſhed in ſo many victories: Beſides they wanted the conduct and preſence of a Capteine generall, for that in the Marquis of Mantua then Capteine of the Church, they reappoſed not ſufficient habilitie to manage and beare out ſuche a charge, neither could they with any ſuretie committe them ſelues to the fidelitie of the Duke of Ferrara nor the Duke of Vrbin whom they had ſo much offended, & much leſſe would they reſt contented with the greatnes of the Pope whom they enuied with no litle murmure and grudge of mind: Laſtly they were not ignorant that naturally the armes and weapons of the Church had but dull edges and cut ſlowly, and no leſſe inferior was the vallour of the Venetians, of whom if either of them aparte and ſeuerallie were weake and feeble, what opinion or exſpectacion of their forces being accompanied and conioyned? This was alſo brought into conſideracion, that in the armies of leagues and confederats, was ſeldome ſeene a concurrancie of prouiſions at conuenient time, and muche leſſe a correſpondencie of wills and mindes, for that amongeſt ſuche a diuerſitie of humors which draw with them diuerſities of intereſtes and endes, are eaſely kindled diſorders, diſdaines, and diſtruſts, at the leaſt there is ſeldom an vniuerſall readines to followe reſolutely the fauor of fortune when it is offered, nor a ioynt diſpoſicion to reſiſt with conſtancie thoſe ſtormes and aduerſities with either the disfauour of the time or malicious inſtrument, many ſtirre vp in an armie. But the matter that in this councell or deliberacion drewe with it a great feare and difficultie was a ſuſpicion conceiued of the frenchemen, that whenſoeuer thEmperour ſhoulde be conſtrained by the neceſſities of this warre to offer the deliuerie of their king, that nation woulde not onely abandon the league, but alſo ioyne in ayde with the Emperour gainſt the confederates: And albeit the kinge of Englande gaue for them his faith and worde of a Prince that they ſhoulde not accorde to ſuche a renuncia-cion, and that there was deuise to giue assurance in Rome, in Florence, or in Venice for three monethes paye, yet all this sufficed not to assure suche a suspicion: For, as the Frenche men had no other ende nor intencion then to recouer their king, and did manifestly professe to beare no inclinacion to the warre but when they saw no hope to effect the accord: so it was a thing verie congruent and likelie, that whensoeuer th Emperour shoulde be disposed, they woulde preferre affore all other regardes and interestes, to compounde and accorde with him: And like as they were not ignorant that by how much were great and mighty the preparacions and forces of the league, by so much more readily would th Emprour be inclined to compound with the French king: euen so it seemed a matter full of perill, to enter a confederacion to make a warre in the which the stronge prouisions of the confederats might doe as much hurt as helpe. With these reasons did th Embassadors and agents of Princes labor the Pope on all sides, and no lesse was he solicited by his owne officers and Ministers, for that both the multitude of his Court, and the people peculiar of his councell, were deuided: of whom euery one in particular fauored his proper inclinacion with so much lesse regard, by how much greater was th authority they had gotten vppon him, who till that time was accustomed to suffer him selfe to be caried for the moste part by the will of such as in reason ought to haue obeyed the twinkling of his eye, and to serue no other office then as ministers and executors of the direction and ordenance of their maister: for the better informacion whereof and of many other occurrances, it is necessary to set downe a more large and particular discourse.

Qualities of Pope Leo and Clement.

Leo was the first of the famulie of Medicis that bare any Ecclesiasticall dignitie, who in the state and authoritie of Cardinall, did so well support both him selfe and his house falne from a wonderfull greatnes into much declinacion, that it was reduced to respire and reexspect the returne of a good fortune: he was a man of great liberalitie, if such a name doe worthely become him being of so excessiue exspences as they passed all rate and measure: At such time as he was rayse to the Popedom, he boare a presence of such magnificence and maiestie ioyned to a poart and showe royall, that the representacion he made might be thought wonderfull euen in one that by long succession had discended of kings and Emprours: he was not only prodigall of money and treasor, but also of all other graces and distribucions belonging to the prerogatiue and power of a Pope: These he disposed in such immoderate liberalitie, that he made vile and base the authoritie spirituall, disordered the style and course of the Court, and through his prodigall exspenses, reduced him selfe to necessitie to seeke money alwayes by meanes extraordinary: This great facilitie was accompanied with a most deepe dissimulacion, with the which he beguiled all the world in the beginning of his pontificacie: The thing that made him seeme a good Prince, (I speake not of the goodnes Apostolike, for that in those corrupted tymes, then is prayse the bountie or goodnes of the Pope, when it exceedes not the malignitie of other men) was th opinion that was conceyued of his clemencie, hauing a desire to doe good to all men, and farre estraunged from inclinacion to offend any: Amongest his other felicities which were many and great, it was no litle happines to him to haue about him Iulio de Medicis, his Cosin, whom notwithstanding he was not borne in lawfull mariage, yet he rayse him to the estate of Cardinall, being before, Knight of the order of Rhodes: for, Iulio being by nature, graue to sownd deepely into thinges, diligent in office and seruice, watchfull ouer affayres, not delited in securitie and pleasure, but ordered and regulated in all thinges, and for his modestie

hauing vnder his hands thadminiſtration of al thaffaires of importance of the Popedome, did beare out and moderate many diſorders which proceded of his prodigall facilitie: yea ſuche was his temperaunce and vertue working with a perpetuall care ouer the pope, that forſaking the cuſtome of all other couſins and brethren of Popes, he preferred alwayes the honor and greatnes of Leo, affore all friendſhippes and fundations which he might apply to his owne ſtabilitie after the Popes death: And beeing withall no leſſe obedient to him then faythfull, he ſeemed in all his behauiours to be a ſeconde himſelfe to him by whom he had receyued ſo high confidence: for this cauſe the Pope rayſed him euery day, and puſhed on by gratifications and benefites the minde that ſerued him with ſo great ſtudie and fidelitie: he reappoſed himſelfe more and more vppon him touching affayres of greateſt conſequence, which beeing managed by two natures ſo different, ſhowed howe well oftentimes doth agree together the mixture of two contraries, ſtraytnes with facility, watchfulneſſe with ſecuritie, meaſure with prodigalitie, grauitie of manners with pleaſures and ydlenes: Which thinges and the gouernment of them made manye beleeue that Leo was caryed by Iulio, beeing not hable of himſelfe to rule ſo great a charge and no diſpoſition to hurt any one, together with a vehement deſyre to enioye the frutes and delightes of the Popedome: But of the contrarie, they interpreted Iulio to be of a ſpirite ambicious, ſtirring, and addicted to innouations: So that all the rigours, all the actions, and all the enterpriſes of Leos tyme, were by imputation heaped vppon Iulio, whom they reputed a man malicious, though he caried a minde of magnanimitie and courage: which opinion of his vallour was confirmed and increaſed after the death of Leo, for that amidde infinite contradictions & difficulties obiected agaynſt him, he ſupported the eſtate and countenaunce of hys affayres with ſuch a dignitie as reſembled the perſon and place of a Pope: yea he ſo conſerued his authoritie with the Cardinalls, that making his entrie into two Conclaues abſolute commaunder of ſixteene voyces, he was at laſte made Pope within two yeres after the death of Leo, notwithſtanding the many obtruſions and emulations of the moſte auncient Cardinalls: And he entred into his Popedome wyth ſuche an exſpectation, that it was thought he would become the greateſt Pope, and bring to paſſe greater matters then euer did any that tyll that daye had ſitte in that ſupreme ſeate: But it was founde out afterwardes howe farre men were abuſed in their iudgementes both concerning Leo and him, ſince in Clement were diſcerned many conditions farre different from that which men beleeued of him before: for, there was not in him neyther that ambition nor thirſt after innouations and chaunges, nor that greatnes of courage and inclination of minde to noble and high enterpriſes which was ſuppoſed before, yea he was interpreted to be about Leo, rather an executer and miniſter of his plottes and purpoſes, then a framer and introducer of his counſells and willes: And albeit he was of witte very apte and capable, and had a deepe ſcience and inſight in all the affayres of the worlde, yet when it came to poyntes of reſolution and execution, that propertie of gifte was not correſpondent to him ſelfe, for that it was not onely hindred by a certayne tymerouſnes of ſpirite which was not little in him, together with a deſyre of nygardneſſe and ſparing, an humor hurtfull in a minde rayſed to high things: but alſo he was followed with a certayne irreſolution & perplexitie, which was ſo naturall in him, that for the moſt parte it kept him conteined in ſuſpence and doubt euen when he was at poynte to eſtabliſh things which he had aforetime with great foreſight conſidered, meaſured, and almoſt reſolued: by which it happned, that aſwell in his deliberations, as in

thexecucion of his councells, euery trifling regard rising of new in his conceite, and euerie light impediment that appeared, seemed sufficient to lead him into the same confusion wherein he was affore he deliberated, being alwayes perswaded that after he had consulted, that councell was the best which he had reiected: for, in that case, calling only into reckoning & representacion those reasons which he had not estemed before, he forbare to reduce into discourse the argumentes which had moued him to make suche election, which being conformed and compared with the contraries, would haue made weaker the force and strength of the others, neither did he take experience by the memorie of his naturall timerousnes, to beware to slide into the passion and humor of vaine feare: In which disposicion intangled, and maner of dealing confused, he suffered him selfe oftentimes to be transported and gouerned by his officers, in which case he seemed rather caried then counselled by them: Of whom, these bore most authoritie with him, Nicolas Scombergh a Germain, and Mathievv Gibert a Genovvay: the one almoste reuerenced and feared of the Pope, and the other loued and fauored with a singular affection: Scombergh was a disciple of Ierome Sauonarola, and of the order of freare preachers whileste he studied the lawes, but afterwards leauing his religion and profession, he reteyned onely the habit & the name, and followed the vocacion of secular affaires: Gibert had bene bestowed verie young in the function of religion, but afterwards he left that vocacion by the priuitie of his father, and notwithstanding he was not borne in lawefull mariage, yet he disclaimed both the habit and the name of his profession: They two were of one society and agreement together whileste he was Cardinal, and also in the beginning and entrie to his Popedom, bearing such a hande on him as they gouerned his thoughtes and drewe his will to their wayes: but as amongeste mortall men, there can be no perfect concord, where is no conformitie of condicions, so beginning afterwardes to disagree eyther through ambicion, or by the diuersitie of their natures, they brought ruine vpon him whom they had before supported, and ledde his affaires into great cõfusion: for, freare Nicolas either for that he was a Germain of nation, which caried him to fauor immoderatly thaffaires of his contrie, or for some other regard mouing, bore great affection to the name of thEmperour, by which occasion, concurring also his obstinacie in his opinions which oftentimes were different from others, the Pope stoode many wayes suspicious that he preferred more the profit of an other, then was studious ouer the aduauncementes of his affaires: And touching the other, both by nature and all other respects of office, he was verie deuoute to the person of the Pope, whom he acknowledged alone for his Lord and maister, and simply caried very careful & studious impressions ouer his affaires: And albeit in the time of Leo, he had bene a great ennemie to the Frenche, and fauored highly the affaires of thEmperour, yet after the death of that Pope, he was conuerted into an other humor and habit.

Thus these two principal ministers of the Pope being in manifest discord bewene them selues, neither proceeded in his affaires with soundnes of councell nor for the honor of his person, with reuerence and regards agreable, by which diuision, euery one knowing howe irresolute and weake the Pope was of his owne condicion, he was made contemnible & skorned to the world by those men who ought with better modestie to haue couered his imperfections: Insomuche, as being priuie to his owne weakenes, and by the property of his nature alwayes irresolute, he knewe not what course to take in a deliberacion so slipperie and full of difficulties, seeing that those to whom it apperteined to stay and resolue him, were the men that caried him

into greateſt confuſion: ſo daungerous is it for Princes to haue faction and diuiſion in their councells, which of all others haue the greateſt facilitie to leade their perſons and eſtates into perill of ruine and ſubuerſion. Neuertheleſſe at the laſt, more by neceſſitie to deliberate ſomething, then by reſolution or firme iudgement, and ſtanding chiefly in theſe tearmes, that to deliberate nothing was in a kinde, to deliberate, he inclined to go through with the league, and in companie of the reſidue, to beginne the warre agaynſt themprour: Wherein they fell to accorde, and drew the capitulations into particulars, wanting no other thing then to giue his full perfection at ſuch time as he receyued newes that the Commandador Erraro whom themprour ſent to him, was ariued at Rome: He was thought to be ſent in diligence with ſome good and gracious diſpatche, In which reſpect the Pope determined to attende his comming, which droue thembaſſadors to complayne, whom he had aſſured to paſſe the ſame day the confederation. The cauſe of his comming was, that themprour after he had ſent ſuch a commiſſion to the Marquis of Piſquaro to reteine at the leaſt in his power to impatronize himſelfe vpon theſtate of Millan, and fearing leaſt by that occaſion there were not incenſed ſome newe ſtirres in Italy: dyd begin to debate more ſtraytly and ſincerely of thaccorde with the Legat Saluiatio, ſo that there paſſed betwene them one capitulation (reſeruing neuertheleſſe the condition of the ratification by the Pope) wherein bothe he was ſatisfied touching the reſtitution of Reggia and Rubiera, and alſo the defence and conſeruation of the Duke of Millan was comprehended in it, Matters which the Pope did principally deſire: Moreouer it was expreſly ſet downe, that if the Duke ſhould dye, themprour neyther ſhould reteine that dukedome, nor giue it to tharchduke his brother, but ſhould inueſt it in the Duke of Burbon, which the Pope very vndiſcretly by the ſetting on of tharchbiſhop of Capua, had accorded vnto, together with George of Auſtria brother to themperour Maximilian, at ſuche tyme as the lyfe of Frauncis Sforce was almoſte holden deſperate. Aſſone as the capitulation was made, the Legate not tarying for Pope Clement to giue it perfection, eyther could not or would not refuſe to preſent themprour with the writte of diſpenſation for his mariage ſo muche deſired: Which for that it was made before, onely with mention of ſtoppe and impediment to the ſeconde degree without naming the king of Portugalls daughter for offending the king of Englande, or becauſe there was betwene them a double bonde of affinitie, there was no mention made but of the bonde that was moſt ſtrong: it was thought neceſſary to make an other, which with expreſſe mention of the perſons, conteined al the impedimēts. The Cōmandador Erraro departed from themprours Court with the diſpatche of this confederation, about a day or two after themperour was aduertiſed of thimpriſoning of Moron: and comming to the Popes court the ſixt of December, he was brought to his preſence, where after he had preſented to him many offers, with the like information of the good will of themprour, he deliuered him the capitulations, in which albeit the Articles touching the ſalte and matters of benefice within the realme of Naples, were contrary to that whiche had bene ſolicited and reſolued by the Viceroy: yet for that his principall end was to be aſſured of ſuſpicions, he had allowed and accepted them, if he had founde a ſincere proceeding touching the Duchie of Millan: But ſeeing in tharticle concerning Frauncis Sforce, was conteined no mention of thimputation made agaynſt him, neyther promiſing to render theſtate that was taken from him, nor to pardon his faultes committed, their arte and ſuttleties were eaſily diſcerned, the rather for that themperour in the concluſion made with the Legate and in the inſtructions giuen to his Agent, seemed to take no knowledge of suche things: for the confederation made to defende and preserue Frauncis Sforce in the Dukedome of Millan, depriued not themperour of power to proceede agaynst him as agaynst his vassall, and to declare the freeholde to be confisqued for the conspiracie supposed vppon him agaynst his Maiestie: And Burbon subborned to be Duke in case of his death, was also to succeede in case of his priuation, for that by the lawes is considered the death naturall and the death ciuill, by which they iudge that man to dye who is condemned for suche a cryme. for this cause the Pope aunswered with verye graue speeches, that as he had no particular matter of discorde with themperour, so touching all differences and contentions that might happen betweene them, he woulde for his parte choose no other arbitrator or iudge then his Maiestie: Onely he helde it necessary to establishe so good an order for the publike affayres, as Italy might remayne assured, whiche coulde not be done vnlesse he restored to Frauncis Sforce the Duchie of Millan: Lastely he layde affore him reasons, prouing whye a Capitulation so generall was not sufficient, concluding that it woulde bring no small griefe to hym to be driuen to that necessitie, to enter into newe deliberations and counselles, and to be made estraunged from themperour, with whom he had alwayes bene moste firmely conioyned. To these the Duke of Sesso replyed with reasons iustificatorie, that as themperour had alwayes a sinceare and vprighte intention: So he assured that his Maiestie was well contented that notwithstanding thaccidentes hapned and paste, the Duchie of Millan should remayne to Frauncis Sforce: Onely if tharticle especiall of that clause (through mistaking) were not set downe in sufficient and ample forme, it was referred to the Pope to reforme it according to his will and discression, promising for themprour to present to him within two monthes the ratification, so farreforth also as he would giue his worde not to conclude during that tyme the League which was negociated with the gouernment of Fraunce and the Venetians. It was clearely discerned that this offer had no other fundation then a desire to temporise and winne a respite or tyme of two monethes, to thende to giue vnto themprour a better leasure to take good counsels and leauy conuenient remedies agaynst so strong a League: Neuertheless, after many contentions and disputations, the discontentment of thembassadors concurring, the Pope consented to that demaund, aswell by desire and reason to enter as slowly as he could into exspences and troubles, as also for this pollicie; that so long as the french king continued in the condition of a prisoner, all contracts & confederations made with the Regent of Fraunce would be ielouse and daungerous, for that themprour would alwayes reteine a power to dissolue and breake them as often as he list: Also he iudged that by this respite or delay interposed, themprour might with more facilitie obteine his purpose, notwithstãding there was no great apparance of hope: And if by that were wrought thaccorde betwene the two kings, he made this depe consideration (though many iudged agaynst it) that it were better to passe in a time when themprour stoode in least necessitie, for that by howe muche his affayres were aduaunced or stoode in good trayne, by so muche more rude would be the conditions he would offer to the French king, which being seuere and rigorous, he supposed the king would not obserue them after he were possessed of his libertie: There was also added to that treatise, that during the sayde tyme, there should be no newe enterprise embraced, nor no action executed agaynst the Castell of Millan, so farrefoorth as Frauncis Sforce woulde be bounde not to do any molestation vpon those that laye without, which condition he would not accept.

The

The yere of the natiuity of the ſonne of God a thowſand fiue hundred twenty fiue being run out in theſe actions more diſpoſed to warre then to peace, there followed ſucceſſiuely the yeare 1526 which being repleniſhed with great accidents, brought a face of wonderfull troubles: In the beginning of this yeare the commandator Erraro returned to themprour with letters ſubſigned and written with the Popes owne hande, by the which he neither denied nor confeſſed the conſpiracies practiſed againſt him, but laying the fault vpon the Marquis of Piſquairo, he labored to excuſe Frauncis Sforce, whome he alleaged (if he had offended at all) to be abuſed by the counſels of Ierome Moron, beſeching him with tearmes of great affection, that for the benefit and quiet of all Chriſtendom, he would preferre his clemencie affore his iuſtice: At this time thEmperour exſpecting the aunſwere of the Pope, helde in ſuſpenſe the negociacions and practiſes of all Princes, & albeit he had exerciſed great grace, fauor, and honor vpon the Duke of Burbon, promiſing with ſpeede to aduance the conſummacion of the mariage betwene his ſiſter & him, yet when Burbon vrged the accompliſhing of his worde and promiſe, he was aunſwered with euaſions and delaies, ſuch as made the matter doutful & the Duke diſcontented: Neuertheles to ſatisfie him with ſome reaſonable or apparant excuſe, he was caried ouer with this, that thEmperour would firſt giue perfection to his owne mariage with the infant of Portugall, who was exſpected from one day to an other, but in true meaning that excuſe drew this draught, to leaue alwayes in the power & will of the Emperour (notwithſtanding his promiſe to the Duke of Burbon) to giue her to wife to the frenche king if the accord went on: ſuche is the ordinarie humor of ſome Princes to be caried rather with conſideracions of profit, then with care of honeſtie: Nowe after thEmperours mariage was conſummated at Seuille in Spayne, the commaundator Erraro arriued at the Court with the breuiat of tharticle concerning Frauncis Sforce, which article the Pope had deduced at large in his fauor: So that thEmperour, being alſo aſſured that the Legat Saluiatio had no commiſſion to conclude any thing but according to that article, and his whole councell thinking it neceſſary to ſtoppe and hinder the league that was in hande, and no leſſe daungerous to haue to doe at one time, with ſo greate a number of ennemies: He ſawe him ſelfe reduced to theſe tearmes, either to content the Pope and the Venetians by reſtoring Frauncis Sforce to the Duchie of Millan, or elſe to compounde with the Frenche king: Who for his parte, after long arguing and diſputacion for the countrey of Burgongnie, and finding that without the price of it, he coulde not hope for his deliuerie by thEmperour, offered to render it with all thappurtenaunces and dependancies, and to renownce all titles and rightes which he had to the kingdome of Naples and Duchie of Millan, and to aſſure the obſeruacion of his promiſe by the oſtage of two of his ſonnes: The diſputacions were greate vppon the election of the one or the other waye, wherein the Viceroy inſiſted more vehementlie then euer, both for that he had the conduct of the Frenche king into Spayne, and had nourriſhed him with many braue hopes of his deliuerie vnder eaſie conditions: His authoritie was great with thEmperour and his reputacion nothing inferiour, both for that thEmperour reappoſed muche in his fidelitie, and truſted him becauſe he knewe he loued him: But there oppoſed againſt him Mercurio Gattinaro a man of baſe diſcending in the contrie of Piedmont, and by his vertue raiſed to the place of high Chauncellor to thEmprour, & for his experiēce & credit, had managed of long time all the affaires of the Court of moſt importaunce: One day thEmperour ſitting really in councell to reſolue abſolutely the matters that had bene diſcourſed ſo many monethes, theſe

Oration of the Chaunceller.

I haue alwayes feared leaſt our too great greedineſſe concurring with the immoderate ends we aſpire vnto, would not be the cauſe, that of ſo ſingular and honorable a victory, we reaped in the ende neither glory nor profit: But I coulde neuer be induced by anye argument or reaſon, that by your victorie (oh gracious Emperour) eyther your eſtate or your reputacion ſhoulde fall into daunger: A matter whiche nowe appeareth manifeſtly, ſince there is queſtion to conclude an accorde, by the which all the regions of Italie ſhall be reduced to a condicion deſperate, which can not but bring infamy to your name, & the french king deliuered vp to his liberty, but vnder ſo vnequall condicions that he will continue a greater enemy to you then before, though not of will which happily he may reſtraine and temper, yet by neceſſitie which is alwaies a mighty mocion to moue men to reuenge: for my parte, I coulde wiſh with as great ſhow of affectiō as others, that at one time & by one meane, your Maieſty might recouer Bourgongny & alſo eſtabliſh fundacions of your imperie in Italie: But vaine is the wit that aſpireth to hold the thing which the hand is not hable to gripe, and in the property of worldly things, there is nothing more full of errour, then that ambicion which goeth on working in the humor of wening only, & lookes not backe to order and reaſon, which are the aſſured lines that laye out the infallible ſucceſſe of euery mortall action: I haue alwaies ſeene that that Prince who ſodainly hath embraſed many thinges, hath gone on with perill to effect nothing, for that all thoſe things are put to aduenture that are guided by will & not by reaſon: That fire that is mightily kindled hath much a do to be quenched, but when vpon one fire riſeth many flames whoſe propertie is to flie with the winde into many places, it can not be that the burning wil not be great, yea oftentimes extended to the conſuming of him that firſt kindled it: I ſee no reaſon to induce vs to thinke that the french king being deliuered, wil obſerue the articles of ſo great importance, ſince he is not ignorant that in making you Lord of Burgongny, he layeth open ſuch a gappe to lead you into the bowells of Fraunce, that it will be alwayes in your election to runne vp euen to the gates of Paris: And he knoweth well enough that when he hath once put into your hande the power to vex Fraunce in ſo many places, he hath left to him ſelfe no poſſibility to make reſiſtance againſt you: doth not he know & all the world ſee, that to conſent that you goe to Rome with an armie, is no other thing, then to giue you a raine with whoſe bridle you may checke all Italie, & authoritie to diſpoſe according to your liking, of the eſtate ſpirituall and temporall of the Church, and by that meane your puiſance being redoubled, you ſhall for alwayes after neuer want money nor forces to offend him? And who doubteth that of this greatnes he maketh this concluſion, that he ſhall be conſtrained to accept all ſuche lawes as it ſhall pleaſe you to impoſe vpon him: Is it then reaſonable to beleue that he will obſerue an accorde by the which he is made your ſlaue and you his Lorde? Where is ſeruitude hatefull, if not in the minde whome nature hath borne to ſoueraintie: And howe can it bee thought that he will liue vnder the yoke of ſubiection, whoſe ambicion coulde not hitherunto be conteyned within the large limites of Fraunce: But be it, that in the king will be founde no want of conſcience to obſerue the condicions of the contract, yet he may be ouercaried by a naturall compaſſion by the complaintes and lamentacions of his kingdome, and by the perſwaſions of the king of Englande accompanied with thincitacion of all Italie: It may bee that by the lawe of amitie that is betwene you two, he will reappoſe confidence in you, or at leaſt looke into

the power you are of: But was there euer two Princes betwene whome haue bene greater cauſes of hatred and contencion? There is not onely betweene you a reciprocall ielouſie of greatnes, A matter apt to ſtirre vppe one brother agaynſt another, but alſo your common emulacion is puſhed on by many auncient and great quarrells begonne in the tymes of your fathers and great grandfathers, many long warres betweene thoſe two houſes, many peaces and accordes not obſerued, many harmes done, and many iniuries receyued: There is no quarrell more mortall then that which taketh his nurriture in tract and preſcripcion of tyme, nor any hatred ſo daungerous as that which lyeth ſmothered like fire couered with hoate ymbers by whome the heate is preſerued to a greater power of burning: To the mind that is iniuried, there is nothinge ſo ſweete as the paſſion of reuenge, And by howe muche thoffence is auncient and inueterat, by ſo much more incurable is the humor of reuenge, and more heauye the ſtroake where it lighteth: We may beleeue that the kinges minde burneth with diſdayne, when he remembreth how many monethes he hath beene your priſoner, with what ſeueritie he hath beene kept vnder ſtraite and ſure garde, and neuer was fauored ſo much as to ſpeake to you or ſee you: Beſides, in this calamitie of impriſonment he hath paſſed ſo many perplexities and perills as had almoſt brought him to the ende of his mortall life, cauſes not litle materiall to make him highly incenſed, beſides the deſpite of his other iniuries ſufficient to drawe on his deſire to be reuenged: And nowe he ſeeth we goe about to deliuer him, not through magnanimitie or amitie, but by neceſſitie and feare of ſo great a confederacion conſpired againſt vs: Do we thinke that parentage made by neceſſitie, is more mighty, then ſo many vehement incitacions: Doe not we know how much Princes eſteeme of ſuch bonds: And who can yeld a better teſtimonie then our ſelues, of the eſtimacion and reckoning of parentages: But it may happly ſeeme to ſome that we ſhall be greatly aſſured by the faith he will giue to returne againe into priſon: Oh weake foundacions and full of frailtie, oh hopes vnperfect and drawing more perill then ſewertie, oh councell vndiſcreete which hath no ſocietie with wiſedome and forecaſt: The griefe I haue to ſee vs diſpoſed to take a courſſe ſo hurtfull and daungerous, makes me burſt out into this libertie of playne ſpeeche: This boarde is not ignorant, what reckoning is made of faith and worde giuen, when there is queſtion of intereſts of eſtate, neyther are we to learne of what force are the promiſſes of the French men, who though they be open and playne in all other thinges, yet in this regarde let vs thinke them Schoolemaiſters moſte perfect in deceyuing and abuſing: And for the king, he hath naturally a readye tongue to promiſſe, and a ſlowe hande to performe, and by cuſtom is ſo much the more harde and ſparing in effects, by howe much he is plentifull and prodigall in words and ſpeeches: Vppon which I gather this reaſonable concluſion, that neither the reſpect of good will betwene two Princes who haue for an auncient inheritance, iniuries and offences, nor the memorie of benefits, which neuer was any, nor the cõſideracion of faith & promiſſes, which in controuerſie of matters of eſtate importeth nothing with the frenchmen, wil haue any force to induce him to follow an accord, which lifteth vp his enemy into heauen, & throweth his owne perſon & his kingdom into manifeſt ſubiection: where it may be obiected that for feare of theſe things, & the better to aſſure your maieſty, you demaũd two of his childrẽ (of whom one to be theldeſt) whoſe loue wil cõtein him more thẽ the price of Burgongny: I aũſwer that the loue of thoſe childrẽ wil rather cauſe the cõtrary, ſpecially whẽ the memory of thẽ ſhal moue in the cogitaciõs of his mind, & cõſideration that to obſerue

" thaccord,would be the beginning to make them your ſlaues:it is doubtful that ſuch
" a pawne will not be ſufficient, if he ſhould be altogether deſperat to recouer it in o" ther ſort: for that as it is a thing that much importeth to put his Realme in daunger,
" which being once loſt is hard to be recouered: So neuertheleſſe he may haue many " hopes to redeeme his children either with the fauor of tyme, or by the benefit of ac" cord,or by thopportunitie of ſome other occaſion, and yet in reſpect of their baſe
" age thexſpectacion wil not be greeuous to him:Beſides,ſtanding in tearmes to draw
" into vnitie againſt you almoſt all the Princes of Chriſtendom,who doubteth not but " he will confederat with them: who ſeeth not that he will ſeeke to moderat that ac" cord by the waye of warre and armes: And who knoweth not that in that caſe, the
" gayne and profit which we ſhall reape by this victorie, will bringe vppon vs a moſt
" ſtronge and daungerous warre ſtirred vp by the deſperat hatred of the French king,
" by the burning ielouſie of the king of England, and by the general neceſſitie of all the " Potentats in Italy: Againſt whom how ſhall we be able to defende our ſelues,vnles
" God continue daily to worke the ſame miracles for vs which he hath ſo often done " till this tyme,or vnles fortune for our ſakes, chaunge her nature, and reduce her in" conſtancie and lightnes to an example of conſtancie and firmenes contrary to all
" experience paſt: how many monethes haue we concluded in our councells, to doe
" all that we could to let thItalians for vniting with the houſe of Fraunce: And now we " throwe our ſelues raſhly into a deliberacion which takes away all difficulties that till
" this hower haue kept them in ſuſpence: A matter which multiplieth our daungers,
" & encreaſeth the forces of our enemies,ſince it is not to be doubted that that league
" wil be more ſtrong and mighty which ſhal haue for a head,the French king ſtanding
" in his freedome and in his kingdome,then that which ſhould be contracted with the " houſe of Fraunce and the king remeine your priſoner: There is no other thing which " till this day hath deteyned the Pope from entring confederacion againſt you, then
" the feare he had that you would alwayes ſeparate the French from the reſidue, in " offering to them the libertie of their king: but leſſe will be their feare of ſuch a mat" ter, when you ſhall haue the children who import not muche, and diſmiſſe the fa" ther vppon whoſe perſon reſteth the ballancing of all things: So that by this meane,
" the medicine which we haue ſought to applye to preuent our daunger,will become
" without all compariſon the chiefe poyſon and inſtrument of our perill,And in place " to breake this vnion we ſhall be the meane to enforce it and make it more firme and " puiſſant.But me thinkes I ſee ſome ready to aske my aduiſe,and whether I wil coun-
" cell your Maieſtie to drawe no profitte of ſo greate a victorie, and to ſuffer you to " dwell alwayes vppon theſe doubtes and perplexities, to whome I aunſwer and con-
" firme eſtſoones the ſimilitude I haue ſpoken many tymes, that it is a matter too
" hurtfull to receyue ſo much meate at one tyme as the ſtomacke can not beare: And " that it is neceſſary, eyther by returning into amitie with Italy which demaundes no" thing of vs but to be aſſured, to gette of the Frenche king both Burgonguye and aſ-
" much els as we can: or els to make a compoſicion with him (by the which Italy
" may remeyne at our diſcreſſion) but ſo eaſie touching his intereſts, as he may haue
" cauſe to obſerue the condicions of it: In thelection of the one of theſe two wayes
" it apperteyneth to your maieſtie in pollicie & forecaſt tø preferre that which in deed
" is moſte ſtable and iuſt, affore that which at the firſt ſhow may happly ſeeme moſte
" great and moſt profitable: I confeſſe the Duchie of Myllan is an eſtate more riche
" and more commodious for many regardes,then Burgonguie,and that there can no a-
" mitie paſſe with Italy,vnleſſe Myllan be transferred eyther to Frauncis Sforce, or to some other of the Popes lyking: And yet I rather allowe to do this, then to accorde with the Frenche men, for that Burgonguy apperteineth to you with better equitie and iustice then Millan, and beareth more facilitie to be mayntained then a contrey where is no person that willeth you good. To seeke to get Burgonguy your auncient inheritance, is an action of great worthynes and prayse: but to aspire after Millan eyther to your owne vse, or for any other that dependeth wholly vpon you, can not be without manifest notes of ambicion: The one calleth you to it by the honorable memorie of so many your predecessors, whose bones lying buryed in captiuitie, call vpon you to be deliuered and redeemed by your vertue, whose compassion accompanied with their iust, pityfull, and holy desires, may happly moue God to be more fauorable to thaction. Your Maiestie must consider that it is a more discrete and easie counsell, to establishe an amitie with him that vnwillingly becomes your enemie, then with one who in no time can be your friend: for there will neuer be in the French king but a perpetuall hate and desire to oppose agaynst your doings: where the Pope and the other potentates of Italie beeing once assured of all suspicion by the reuoking of your armie that is in Lombardy, will haue no occasion of controuersie with you, neyther through iealousie wherein they will be satisfied, nor by feare which then will be resolued into assurance, and remayning your friendes, you shall drawe from them both now and alwayes a greater commoditie and profite: So that there are to leade your Maiesties inclination to this amitie, not onely the consideration of honor, which ought to be most familiar with great princes, not only the regarde of profite, whiche fashioneth hawty mindes to reason and facilitie, not onely the respect of suretie, which to princes and peoples is the sweteſt ende and rewarde of their warres and contentions, but also the operation of necessitie, which aboue all other motions in the mindes of men, caryeth them violently to resolution and accorde: For, be it that you compounde with the king, and binde him to no other thing then to ayde you in thenterprises of Italy, yet it is not likely he will obserue it, since this will be his opinion, that in leauing you Italy for a pray, he should so much the more imbarke his owne Realme in perill and desperate daunger: Where on the other side, his hopes and oportunities will be great that by the compulsion of so mighty an vnion he shall be hable to vex and trauell you, and in the end to reduce you to accorde vnder easie conditions: So that of a king whom we holde prisoner, we shall not onely giue him libertie, but also prepare him to be our enemie, and sende home to the Realme of Fraunce a soueraigne chieftayne or leader, to thende that ioyning with the residue, he might rayse warre agaynst vs both with greater forces and with more profite. Howe much better were it to confederate with thItalians, who haue the same conformitie of reasons with vs? Howe much more necessary to contract a firme and true alliance with the Pope, who hath continually desired it? And howe muche assured to remoue from the Frenche all hope to ioyne with thItalians, seeing that in that case not onely necessitie or feare of new leagues, but also euen your owne will and qualitie of the conditions, will drawe you to accorde with the French. Then shall you see that their vniuersall necessitie and dispayre of their common condition, will constrayne them not onely to delyuer vp Burgonguy into your handes, and to followe you with greater offers, but also to assure them with suche obligations and ostages, that you shall not neede to doubt the obseruation: For the which his children are no sufficient pawnes so long as they hope to effect so great an vnion: And scarcely wyll suffice the townes of Bayon and Narbona, if they put them into your hands, nor an armie at sea. This is the waye to

" draw of your victorie a frute plentyfull, honorable, comely and sure: And otherwise
" (if I haue any insight in the matters of the worlde) by this accorde you shall em-
" barke your estate into so great daungers, that I see no way to deliuer you, vnlesse the " indiscression of the French king may happly be greater then ours.

This oration, what with theloquence and good disposition of the matter, ioyned with the reputation and wisedome of the man, wrought muche in the minds of the greatest parte of the counsell: But the Viceroy being of an other humor, pronounced a contrary opinion in this sorte:

Oration of the Viceroy.

If it be a fault blameable in suche men as through the motion of worldly appetite and ambition, seeke to embrace more then they are hable to hold, the offence is " no lesse in mine opinion, in others who eyther by too many suspicios or too muche
" incredulitie, do willingly depriue them selues of great occasions gotten with many " difficulties and daungers: But if there be propertie of errour in both, obseruing the " qualitie of the persons in whom they raygne, that which proceedeth of feare and " abiection of minde, is more to be reprehended and condemned in a great prince,
" then that which moueth of an inclination heroicall and true greatnes of spirit and " courage: And seeing it is to great thinges that the thoughts of great princes ought " to be raysed and dressed, it can not but be more agreable to their merite and vertue,
" to seeke to winne muche with hazarde and daunger, then by auoyding of perill
" which is but casuall, to lose or corrupt suche occasions as verye rarely happen
" to mortall men. This is the very course layde out to your Maiestie by the Lorde " Chauncellor, who doubting that by this accorde Burgongny and Millan maye not " be obteyned, (we muste not thinke he is pushed on eyther with the loue of Italy
" which is his contrey, or with the benefite or good turne that he wisheth to the duke " of Millan) hath made a resolution of a waye by the which as he sayth, we shall get
" Burgongny and lose Millan, an estate without comparison of greater importance.
" But I feare that in following that deuise, as we shall not onely lose Millan and not " winne Burgongny, so also, where your Maiesty hath with great glory opened you a " waye to the imperie and iurisdiction of all Christendome, there will remayne no o" ther frute of it if you take your direction by his counsell, then great domage accom" panied with perpetuall infamie: Effects which in all reasonable sorte your Maiestie " is to auoyde, least through indiscression and sinister counsell of one priuate man,
" you blemishe the reputation and vallour of so many princes and braue Capteines,
" who vnder the felicity and fortune of your name fought for the victorie which now
" you haue: So will the world thinke you more apte to get then hable to holde, and " lesse worthy of glory then meete to manage it. For my parte muche lesse that I can
" discerne any suretie in the counsell he hath giuen, seeing of the contrary it bringes
" lurking vnder it many tokens of manyfest daunger, and some apparances of a little " profite and yet easy to slide out of our handes, not without our shame and your in" dignitie: Where of the contrary, in compounding with the French king, your Ma-
" iestie shall reape glory, which especially followeth the name of Emperours, it wyll
" bring you profite which is a sweete rewarde of victories, and it wyll giue you a " sufficient assurance of your estates, which is the happiest ende and conclusion of " warre and controuersies betwene Princes. I aske this question of the lord Chaun-" cellor, vnder what reason, vnder what suretie, and vnder what fidelity he doth war" rant or promise that the Italians after we haue left them the Duchie of Millan, will " obserue the accorde, and will not intermedle with the affayres that shall passe be-" twene the French king and vs? Yea rather after they haue embased our reputation, after

after they haue corrupted the armie that nowe holdeth them in bridle, and after they ſhall be aſſured that no newe companies of Launceknightes can come into Italy becauſe there is no place of retrait for them, I aske agayne with what humor the Lorde Chauncellor can aunſwere for thItalians that they will not recontinue their practiſes, and threatning the kingdome of Naples whiche will almoſte remayne at their diſcreſſion, they will not ryſe and force vs to deliuer the French king. If it bee good to prouide that a miſchiefe happen not, it is better not to loſe thoportunitie of the remedie that is proper for it, ſince there can be no greate daunger to defend the harme that ſtandes in feare of a remedie to reſiſte it. It is farre from reaſon for my Lorde Chauncellor to reapoſe confidence in Frauncis Sforce to acknowledge the benefites that your Maieſtie ſhall do to him, ſeeing he hath already ſo yll obſerued your honorable liberalities, & with treaſons hath recompenſed the fauors you haue vſed to him? But what exſpectation of conſpiracie & worſe dealing, when he ſeeth a deſire to call him to iuſtice, and to puniſh by ſentence of the law, the vnthankfulnes he hath pretended with ſo great iniquitie? And what feare will he haue of your puniſhment, when he exſpecteth his ſafetie by the deliueraunce of your enemies?
He will not care to offende you, that feareth not your puniſhment: and that puniſhment will he not holde grieuous, which eyther he ſuppoſeth to ſuffer for innocencie, or is aſſured of his meane of deliuerie. And leſſe reaſon is there to induce you to haue confidence in the Venetians, for that beeing by nature enemies auncient to the Crowne of thempire and the houſe of Auſtria, can not yet but tremble vnder the memorie of Maximilian your grandfather, who tooke from them many of thoſe townes which they poſſeſſe at this day. The minde poſſeſſed with iniurie & wrong, can neuer be made aſſured: and where the remembraunce of the harmes done remayneth without recompence or reconciliation, there is nothing leſſe certayne then fidelitie, and nothing more frayle then the friendſhippes they profeſſe. Touching Pope Clement, there is no reaſon of confidence eyther in his vertue, or in his inclination to themperour, ſince the firſt alliance that Pope Leo made with him after he had attempted many things agaynſt vs, was, for deſire eyther to be reuenged, or to be aſſured agaynſt the French men, and for ambicion to occupie Ferrara: And after him, the Pope raygning being hated of the one moytie of the world, continued by neceſſitie (after the death of Leo) in your amitie, but being become Pope, he returned immediatly to the nature of Popes, which is both to feare & hate themprors, and for his parte he hath nothing in more horror then the name of themperour. I confeſſe theſe reaſons may be aunſwered with excuſes, and it may be alleaged that their complotts and enterpriſes tooke no proceding of hatred or ambicion, but only of ſuſpicion and iealouſie of your greatnes, which being ceaſſed, all their conſpirations will take ende: But it may be aunſwered, that eyther this is not true, or if at the beginning it hath bene true, it hath nowe by neceſſitie taken other roote, and become an other humor, for that it is a thing naturall that hatred followeth ſuſpicion, and offences and vexacions come after hatred, and after offences men drawe to alliance and amitie with thenemies of him whom they haue offended, laboring to rayſe practiſes not onely for their proper ſurety, but alſo to make their profite of him whom they haue offended. Nature hath ſowen in man ſeedes of hatred and reuenge, and though the lawes holde it more iuſt to reuenge an iniurie then to do it, yet kinde and nature ſhoweth that both the one and the other proceede of one imbecillitie: Beſides, the remembraunce of wrongs is farre greater and more ſtirring in the mind of him that doth them, then in him that receyueth them: So that where

" in the beginning ſuſpicion onely would ſet them vp and make them to moue, the " ſame would be alſo the cauſe to make them become our enemies, to cary them both
" in inclination and in hope to the French part, and then to beginne to cantonize and " make a diuident of the Realme of Naples, as they haue done in all contractes paſte:
" And nowe let vs giue them what ſuretie we will, and inferre what accorde we can,
" we ſhall finde kindled in their ſtomackes the ſame hatred and feare that before, with " minds not diſpoſed to reappoſe confidence in that, which to their ſeeming we ſhal
" do through neceſſitie: In ſo much as vnder an opinion they may haue the more ea-
" ſily to raunge vs to their wills, and fearing leaſt in the ende there runne betwene the " French king and vs a new appoyntment ſemblable to that which was made at Cam-
" bray, and laſtly deſiring according to their owne phraſes to deliuer Italy of ſtraun-
" gers, they will not ſticke to preſume to ryſe vp to giue you lawes, and to demaunde
" at your handes the deliuery of the French king: A matter whiche if your Maieſtie
" re fuſe, I ſee not howe you can defende agaynſt them the kingdome of Naples: And " in according that, you loſe all the frutes of your victory, beſides a manifeſt diſhonor
" and reiection that will ſtande vpon your name for euer. But let vs laye the caſe that " Italy will performe and obſerue thaccorde, and neceſſitie conſtrayne you eyther to " leaue Millan or not to recouer Burgongnie, yet in iuſt compariſon there is great dif" ference betwene the one and the other: Burgongnie is a countrey of litle circuite, of " ſmall reuenue, and nothing aunſwering the commodities that are perſwaded to be " there: Where the Duchie of Millan, both for the riches and reputation of ſo many " Cities, for the number and noblenes of ſubiectes, for the liberall and plentifull reue-" nues, and for the oportunitie and ſufficiencie to nouriſh all the armies of the world,
" caryeth more value & price then many kingdomes: And yet beſides the amplitude
" and puiſſance of it, you haue to make a greater reckoning of the commodities that " may reuert to you by conquering it, then of the ſimple accompt and valuation of it
" ſelfe: for Millan and Naples being at your deuotion, it followeth by congruent ne-
" ceſſitie that the Popes, as aunciently they are wont, muſte depende vpon thautho-
" ritie of Emprours: That all the region of Tuskane, the Duke of Ferrara, and the " Marquis of Mantua muſt be your ſubiectes: And the Venetians beeing enuironed
" with Lombardy and Germany, ſtande in caſe to accept lawes at your hande: And ſo
" not with force and armes diſplayed, but with a glorious reputation of your name,
" with the onely ſommonce of a Herald, and with the enſeignes of the Empire, you
" ſhall commaunde abſolutely ouer all Italy. Lift but vp your Maieſties minde to the " conſideration of Italy, and you ſhall finde it with great right eſteemed the ſupreme
" ſeate of all other prouinces, both for the oportunitie of ſituation, for temperature " of ayre and Climate, for thexcellencie of wittes inclined to all honorable enterpri-
" ſes, for the fertilitie of all things neceſſary to the lyfe of man, for the ſtately repre-
" ſentation of ſo many noble Cities, for the ſoueraigne ſeate of religon, and for the " auncient glory of thempire: To which prayſes as I may aptely adioyne the commo-" ditie of imperie which it brings, extending ſo farre in your perſon, that if you com-
" maunde ouer it, the ſounde of your name and authoritie runneth fearefull in the " eares of other Princes: So it can not but belong to your greatnes and to your glory,
" to rayſe your thoughtes to this, which is an action more agreable to the bones of " your elders (ſeeing they are brought into counſell) who for their bounty and pietie,
" we are not to beleeue do deſire any other thing then what is moſt conuenient and
" agreable to the glory of your name: So that, according to the counſell of the Lord
" Chauncellor, we ſhall loaſe a matter of great price and value, for a thing of righte

ſmal conqueſt, and yet wrapt in many vncerteinties, wherein we ought to ſtand warned by that which was like to happen certeine moneths paſt: Doe we not remember the great griefe that fell amongeſt vs when the French king laye in daunger of death, which griefe proceeded of no other humor then a knowledge we had that with his life we ſhould loſe the frute we hoped for by the victory: And who can now aſſure vs that the like accident will no more reuert vpon him? yea who feareth not the relaps with more facilitie, both for that the reliques of his maladie doe yet poſſeſſe him, and alſo the hope which till now hath ſupported him, being taken away, who doubteth not but his grieued mind will heape vpon him greater fits of ſorowe and diſcontentment, the onely cauſe of his ſicknes, eſpecially newe condicions and aſſurances being interpoſed, it can not be that for their hardnes, they make not the negociacion long and tedious, A matter ſubiect to the former accident and happly to others both more great and daungerous: We are not ignorant, that nothing hath ſo long reteyned the gouernment and councell of Fraunce, as an opinion they haue had of the ſpeedy deliuery of their king, In which humor of exſpectacion the Nobles and Chieftaines of that Realme, haue remayned peaſible and conformable to the Lady Regent: But when they finde the foundacions of this hope to fayle, who doubteth not that the Barons of that Realme will not eaſily enter into mindes of deſpite and reuenge, and with an vniuerſall conformetie, chaunge the courſſe of the gouernment: ſtronge is the operacion of ambicion, and no leſſe violent the paſſion and thirſt after imperie and ſouereintie, ſpecially where is ſeene no meane to make reſiſtance againſt ſo mighty mocions: which I allude to the diſpoſicion of Fraunce, where, if the greatnes of the kingdome get once the bridle in their hand, much leſſe that they will be carefull ouer the deliuerie of their king, ſeeing of the contrary, their ambicion will cary them to meinteyne an eſtate of libertie, and aſpyring to eſtabliſh ſupremacie in them ſelues, what will it offend them to ſuffer the captiuitie of their king: And ſo in place to get Burgongnie and ſo many other great conqueſts, what other thing doe we reteyne, then a deſperat hope both by his impriſonment, and by his deliuerie: But this further queſtion may be asked of the Lord Chauncellor, whether thEmprour in this reſolucion ought to regard the reckoning and reputacion of his dignitie and his maieſtie: Then what greater infamie, or what more diminucion of his honor, can he receiue then to haue his clemencie forced, and conſtrayned to pardon Frauncis Sforce, he who lately being halfe dead, detected of manifeſt rebellion, and a ſinguler example of ingratitude, not comming to humilitie nor imploring your mercy, but running betwene the armes of your enemies to ſeeke to force you to render to him the eſtate which ſo iuſtly hath bene taken from him, and compell you to take lawes of him, who by equitie of condēnation ought to beare ſubiection to your imperial name: It were better for your maieſtie, more agreable to the dignitie of thEmpire, and more worthy your greatnes and puiſſance to laye out your ſelfe to a newe fortune, and to referre eftſoones all thinges to hazard and daunger, then in blemiſhing thauthoritie of the Prince ſoueraigne ouer all Princes, and the name of thEmprour, and hauing ſo oftentymes vanquiſhed ſo mighty a king: To receiue at the hands of Preeſtes and Marchaunts, ſuch condicions, as if you had bene ouerthrowen there could not haue beene offered to you either more vniuſt or more vnworthy: honor and dignitie are the gifts of God, which by how much they are baſely eſteemed of thoſe to whome they are transferred, by ſo much more is highly offended the eternall goodnes that gaue them who will eftſoones reuoke them with no ſmall indignation: That man can not be accompted worthy of honor, that de-

" clareth himselfe not hable to vse it, since honor is a rewarde or effect of vertue, who " enhableth to honor and dignitie those persons to whom her selfe is conioyned. So " that, moste gracious Emprour, calling estsones into consideration all these reasons,
" both howe litle profite may resort to you by thaccorde with th Italians, and by how " many accidentes it maye easily slide out of your handes, howe litle assurance or " showe of fidelitie is in them, and howe vnworthy a thing it is to leaue the state of " Millan: And lastely that it is necessary for vs to soart at last to a resolution, and that " the imprisonment of the king profiteth vs not but in regarde of the frutes that maye
" be drawen of his deliuery. I stande firme and conclude vppon this aduise, that wee " compounde rather with the king then accorde with th Italians, A matter which can " not be denyed to be more glorious, more reasonable, and more profitable, so farre-
" foorth as we may be assured of thobseruation: Wherein I discerne some good fun-
" dation in this, that for a more thankfull acknowledging of your benefite, he offreth
" to take to wife your sister, a Lady for her vertue and stayed condition very well able
" and conuenient to enterteine you in amitie: Besides thoblation of two of his sonnes,
" of whom one to be theldest, which is suche a propertie of pawne and ostage, as a-" mongest worldly men and to assure worldly things, there can not be offred nor re-
" ceiued a more worthy nor more important: And seeing our necessitie driueth vs to " determine some thing, it is more reasonable we reappose confidence in a Frenche
" king vnder suche nature of ostages, then in a nation of Italians of no lesse infidelitie
" then without gage: and rather to trust the worde and fayth of so great a king, then
" to be caryed with the immoderate couetousnes of priestes and suspicious basenesse
" and bartring of Marchantes: And lastly, according to the example of our aunceStors,

This Oration of the Viceroy drew the residue of the counsel into diuersitie of opi-nion: It seemed to suche as were of iudgement sounde and vpright, that to accorde with

with the French king according to the maner declared, could not be but full of danger: And yet such was the parcialitie of the Flemings desyring to recouer agayne Burgongnie the auncient patrimonie and tytle of their Princes, that their affection would not suffer them to discerne the truth: besides, it was sayde that the giftes and great promises made by the French men, wrought not a little to corrupt and carry many: But themprour aboue all the residue, eyther for that suche was his first inclination, or for that thauthoritie of the Viceroy could do much with him hauing concurrancy with thopinion of the Count Nausan, or haply because he held it too great indignity to pardon by cõpulsion Frauncis Sforce, who had offended him by so great malice, seemed to heare with ready and willing eares all suche as counselled him to compound with the French king: So that after he had caused to be sounded agayne the Legate Saluiatio to knowe if he would consent that thestate of Millan shoulde be transported to the person of the Duke of Burbon, And that the Legate had certefied him that he had no commission to allowe that drifte, and therewithall had made offer to hym of the Popes amitie: he determined to goe on with thaccorde with the Frenche king, with whom things hauing already paste many disputations and acts, he grew in very fewe dayes to conclusion, not respecting at all the cõmunitie or interposing of the Popes Legat: And for the better perfection and stability of the accorde, themperour had obteyned before the Duke of Burbons consent to giue in mariage to the French king, his sister whom he had promised to him: The Duke was driuen to passe this consent, not so muche for a desire he had to carye the Duchy of Millan, which was promised him contrary to the authority of the Chauncellor and Viceroy, vnder obligation notwithstanding to pay a great summe of money: as for the necessitie of his affayres which were reduced to those tearmes, that neyther hauing nor could not haue any other piller or stay then themprour, he was constrayned to accommodate his condition to themprours will: And assoone as he had in all things accomplished this consent, to take him out of the presence of the Court in a tyme so vnconuenient, he departed foorthwith by themprours order, taking his waye by Barselonia, whither was appoynted to be sente to him necessary prouisions to passe into Italy, which for want of mony and lacke of vessels, had slow proceding, for that in Spayne were but three gallies at that tyme.

The solicitation of the peace which was resolued the fourteenth of February 1526. conteyned these couenantes: That betwene themprour and the french king should be a peace perpetuall, in which should be comprehended all such as should be named by their common consent: That the French king by the sixt daye of the next moneth of Marche, shoulde be set at libertie vppon the marches in the coaste of Fontarabie: That within sixe wekes after he should consigne to themprour the Duchie of Burgongnie, the Countie of Charrolois, the iurisdiction of Noyers, the Castell Chaynro dependancies of the sayde Duchie, the Vicountie of Flussona, the resorte of S. Lavvrence de la Roche a dependant of Franche Countie, together with all the appurtenances aswell of the sayd Duchy as Vicountie, all whiche for hereafter should be seperate and exempted from the soueraigntie of the Realme of Fraunce: That at the same and very instant that the king should be deliuered, there should be put into themprours hands the Daulphin of Fraunce, & with him eyther the Duke of Orleance the kings second sonne, or else xij. principall Lords of Fraunce, whõ themprour dyd name: It was left to thelection of the Lady Regent, either to deliuer the kings secõd sonne, or the xij. barons, & they to remayne as ostages vntill restitution were made of the lands and places aforesayd, and the peace sworne and ratified together with all the articles by the estates generall of Fraunce, and inregistred in all the Courtes of Parliament of the kingdome with forme and solemnities necessary: for thaccomplishing whereof there was set downe a tearme of foure monethes: at which time returning the ostages, there should be put into themprours hands, the Duke d'Angoulesme the kings thirde sonne, to thende to trayne him vp with themprour the better to enterteine and assure the peace: That the French king should renounce and giue vp to themprour all his rightes to the Realme of Naples, together with all such titles and preeminences as were to come to him by thinuestiture of the Churche: That he shoulde do the lyke touching his interest in the state of Millan, of Genes, of Ast, and likewise of Arras, Tourney, of the Ile, and of Dovvay: That he should render vp the towne and castell of Hedin as a member of the countie of Artois, with all the munitions, artilleries, and mouables that were in it when it was laste taken: That he should disclayme and yelde vp all soueraignetie in Flaunders and Artois, and all other places or peces which themprour possessed: and that on the other side, themprour should resigne and giue vp to him all the right, title and quarrell which he pretended to any place possessed by the French men, and especially the townes and Casteldomes of Perone, Mondidier, Roye, the Counties of Bolleyne, Guynes, and Ponthievu, with other townes standing vpon the one & other shore of the riuer of Somme: That there shoulde be betweene them a league and confederation perpetuall for the defence of their estates, with obligation to ayde one another when nede required, with fiue hundred men at armes, and ten thousande footmen: That themprour should promise to giue in mariage to the king the Lady Eleoner his sister, whom assone as the dispensation should be obteined from the Pope, he shoulde contract or handfast with words obligatorie for the present, and afterwards she should be ledde into Fraunce to consummat the mariage at the same time that according to the capitulations the ostages were to be deliuered: That she should haue for her portion two hundred thousande crownes, with Iewels according to her estate, the one moytie of the money to be payed within sixteene monethes, and the other halfe in one yere after: That a mariage should be made betwene the Daulphine and the daughter of the king of Portugall, daughter to the Lady Eleoner, at suche tyme as their age woulde suffer: That the Frenche king shoulde do all that he coulde to induce the auncient king of Nauarre to giue vp to themperour the rightes of that kingdome, whiche in case he woulde not perfourme, then the king not to ayde him with any succours: That the Duke of Gueldres and the Counte of Zulff and the principall townes of those estates, shoulde promise with sufficient securitie, to giue themselues to the Emperour, after his death: That the kinge shoulde giue no succours to the Duke of VVittenberg, nor likewise to Robert de la Marche: That he shoulde furnishe and rigge for themperour, both when he shoulde passe into Italy, and two monthes after beeing so required, twelue gallies, foure shippes, and foure gallions, all well municioned and appoynted, except men of warre; and the sayde vesselles to be rendred three monthes after accompting from the daye of his embarking: That in place of tharmy by lande which the king offred for Italy, he should pay him two hundred thousande crownes in money, the one halfe within sixtene monethes, and the other halfe within a yere after: And that at the time when thostages should be deliuered, he should be bounde to giue billes of exchaunge for the paye of sixe thousand footmen for six monthes immediatly after themprours arriual in Italy: That he should also furnish for his seruice fiue hundred launces payed, with a band of artillerie: That he should saue harmeles themprour of his promise made to the king of Englande by penſions which the Frenche king ſhould paye to him, the arrerages whereof amounted to fiue hundred thouſande crownes, or els to deliuer ſo much in ready money to themprour: That they ſhould both ioyne to beſech the Pope to cal a generall councell with all ſpeede to thende to conſult vpon an vniuerſall peace amongeſt Chriſtians, to aduaunce an enterpriſe agaynſt the infidels and heretikes, and to graunt to all the Croiſade for three yeres: That within ſixe weekes the king ſhould reſtore the Duke of Burbon in moſte ample forme, into all his eſtates, goodes mouable and vnmouable, and frutes and reuenues receyued: not to moleſt him for any thing paſt, nor conſtrayne him to dwell or go to the Realme of Fraunce: That it ſhould be lawfull to the ſayde Duke of Burbon to demaunde by the waye of lawe and iuſtice, the Earledome of Prouence: That in like ſort all thoſe that had followed him ſhould reenter in ſafetie into their goods and ſtates, and namely the Biſhop of Autun and Monſr de ſaint Valier: That the priſoners taken in the warre ſhould be deliuered on both partes within fifteene dayes: That there ſhould be reſtitution made to the Lady Margaret of Auſtrich of all that ſhe poſſeſſed affore the warre: That the Prince of Orange ſhould be ſet at liberty with reſtauration to the principality of Orange, and all that he poſſeſſed by the death of his father which had bene taken from him for following the faction of themprour: That the like ſhould be done to other Barons: That there ſhould be made reſtitutiõ to the Marquis of Saluſſe of his eſtate: That the king aſſone as he ariued in the firſt towne of his Realme, ſhould ratifie this capitulation, & be bound to procure the Daulphin to ratifie it whẽ he ſhould come to the age of fourteneyeres: Many were named by common conſent, & chiefly the Svvizzers: Onely there was not one of the Potentates of Italy, except the Pope whome they named as conſeruator of the accorde, and that more for maner ſake and ceremonie, then in effect and true meaning: Laſtly it was expreſſed in the ſayde capitulation, that in caſe the king for any occaſion, would not accompliſh theſe matters promiſed, he ſhould returne true priſoner.

This accorde, for the partes it conteyned, brought no ſmall aſtoniſhment to all Chriſtendom: for when it was vnderſtanded that the firſt execution therof conſiſted in the deliuery of the king, all mens opinions was, that being in his liberty, he would not deliuer vp Burgongny as being a member of too great importance for the realme of Fraunce: And except a few who had counſelled themprour to it, all his Court had the ſame iudgement, and namely the Chauncellor, who reprehended and deteſted the matter with ſo great vehemency, that notwithſtãding he was coommaunded to ſigne the capitulation according to thoffice of chief Chauncellors, yet he refuſed to do it, alleaging that in ſuch matters dangerous & hurtfull as that was, he ought not to vſe thauthority that was giuen him: neither could he be altred from this opinion notwithſtanding the emprour was angry with him: who ſeing him ſo reſolute in his opinion, ſigned it himſelf, & within few days after went to Madrill to confirme thalliance & make a fundation of amity & goodwill with the king, whom he enterteined in familiar and priuat ſort. Great were the ceremonies and demonſtrations of amitie betwene them: oftentimes they ſhowed themſelues together in places publike: and as often did they paſſe in ſecret familiar diſcourſes: They went together in one coache to a caſtell not halfe a dayes iourney from thence, where was queene Eleoner whom the king maryed: And yet in all theſe great ſignes of peace and amity, he was obſerued with as carefull and ſtrayte gard as before, without any aduauntage of libertie: So that he was embraſed as a brother, and garded as a priſoner, A matter whiche made manyfeſt to the worlde, that it was an accorde full of diſcorde, an alliance without amitie, and that vpon euery occasion their auncient ielousies and passions woulde be stronger in them, then the regarde of that alliance made more by force then friendship.

Many days were spent in these offices & ceremonies of amitie, when was brought from the Lady Regent the ratification, together with the declaration, that with the Daulphin of Fraunce, they would rather giue in ostage the kings seconde sonne, then the twelue Barons: Then the king departed frō Madrill, taking his way to the frontier of his Realme, where was to be exchaunged his person for his sonnes who boare very small age: There was sent to accompany him the Viceroy the worker & author of his deliuery, to whom themprour had giuen the Citie of Ast, with other estates in Flaunders & in the kingdome of Naples. At this time themprour wrote to the Pope a letter of Court, wherein he certified him that in regarde to haue peace, and for the common benefite of Christendome, he had subdued all passions of iniuries & emulation, & restoring the French king to liberty, he had confirmed the league of amity betwene them with the mariage of his sister, and seeking to continue alwayes his obedient sonne, he had chosen him for conseruer of the peace. Not many dayes after he wrote to him an other letter of his owne hand, which he sent by the same Commandador Erraro, who brought him the Popes letter written with his owne hande: This was a letter responsiue indifferently tempered with words milde and gracious, and matter harde and rigorous, wherein he concluded that if Frauncis Sforce were not founde guyltie of the action of his accusation, he will render to him the Duchie of Millan, and touching the tryall of the cause, he referred it to the arbitration of the lawes vnder suche iudges as himselfe would appoynt as his superior: But in case his innocencie were found insufficient, he could do no lesse then in that state to inuest the Duke of Burbon, to whom the Pope was the cause that he had promised it, aduising him therevnto whyleſt Frauncis Sforce laye sicke: He added further in this letter to the Pope, that aswell to satisfie him, as to assure all Italy, he woulde neither reteine that Dukedome for himselfe, nor passe it by donation to his owne brother, vnder which testimonie he assured the Pope vpon his fayth that suche was his simple intention the which he desired him to allow and approue, offring to him alwayes his authoritie and his forces as a sonne obedient to the sea Apostolike. By the same Erraro was sent also the aunswere to the particulars of the Article whiche had bene set downe at length by the Pope in fauor of Frauncis Sforce, which themprour continuing in his first resolution, would not allowe. Themprour sent also by him to the Duke of Sesse the forme of thaccorde as he was determined to do the last time, with authoritie and power to contract if the Pope would accept it: In whiche was expressed that Frauncis Sforce should be comprehended in the confederation so farreforth as he were not founde guiltie in the crime of treason: But in case of hys death or depriuation, the Duke of Burbon should take place in the confederation, and receiue of him thinuestiture for the duchie of Millan: The obligation was confirmed which the Viceroy had made for restitution of the townes holden by the Duke of Ferrara, but vnder condition that the Pope should be bound to passe to him thinuestiture of Ferrara, and forgiue him the penaltie of contrauenion: A matter contrary to the Popes driftes, who had determined to exact a payne of an hundred thousande duckets, to make payment of the fine of an hūdred thousand which he had promised to themprour, in case that restitution went on: He did not admit thestate of Millan to make prouision of salt of the Church, and touching the collation of benefices in the realme of Naples, he would not be referred to the tenour of thinuestitures, but to the the cuſtome and vſage of the kings affore, who in many caſes had contemned the rightes and authoritie of the ſea Apoſtolike: And becauſe a treatie had beene made with the Legate, that to remoue the armie out of Lombardie whiche was a great charge to all Italy, the Pope and he as king of Naples and the other potentates of Italy, ſhould paye an hundred and fiftie thouſande duckets, and then the ſayd army to retyre to Naples, or into ſome ſuche place out of Italy as ſhoulde ſeeme good to themperour, who ſayde he woulde tranſport it into Barbarie: yea it was added that becauſe there was more due to tharmie then at that tyme, there ſhould be exacted a paye of two hundred thouſande duckets: A copie of theſe Articles was preſented to the Pope by the Duke of Seſſo and the Commandator Erraro, with proteſtation that it was not in their power to alter or chaunge one ſillable: And yet all other difficulties had eaſily taken forme, if the Duchie of Millan had bene ſo diſpoſed as the Pope with the reſidue had had no cauſe to enter into ſuſpicion: But in the conſideration of the Duke of Burbon and the minde he bare, they made this iudgement of him, that he was ſo implacable an enemie to the Frenche king, that eyther for his ſuretie or for a deſire to enter Fraunce, he would be alwayes moſt deuout and ſubiect to themprour, and reteine in himſelfe nothing leſſe then humors of ambition and deſire to be great: They thought that Article to remoue the armie out of Lombardy (ſo greatly deſired of all, and for the which they would haue bene brought to haue aduaunced any ſummes of money) would be to little purpoſe, ſo long as there remayned at Millan a Duke, who not onely vpon euery gracious offer or motion of themperour, would be ready to accept the gifte of it, but alſo for his particular intereſt, woulde ambiciouſly aſpire and thirſte after it. In theſe regardes, the Pope, who for that in thaccorde which the Emprour had made with the Frenche king, was made no particular mention of him, nor of the ſuretie of theſtates of Italye, ſtoode more and more confirmed in his former opinion, that the ambicion and greatnes of themperour woulde in the ende be his ſeruitude and thraldome: And therefore he determined not to accept thaccorde in the maner it was offred to him, but to reſerue him ſelfe free vntill he were aſſured what courſe the Frenche woulde take touching the obſeruation of the peace: In which reſolution he ſtoode ſo much the more firme, by howe muche beſides thapparance and likelyhoodes of it, he had heard by the relation of certayne ſpeeches deliuered by the king affore hys libertie, and ſpread abroade by ſome that were familiar in counſell with him, that the king had a mynde altogether eſtraunged from performing the thinges he had promiſed to themperour: And the better to confirme the king in that deliberation (his owne ſuretie alſo depending vppon it) he ſent in poſte into Fraunce, Pavvle Vittorio a Florentin and capteine of his Gallies: his charge was to be at the Court at the ſame tyme the king ſhould aryue, vſing that diligence not onely to know his intention aſſone as might be, but alſo the king hauing a ready hope to be hable to drawe into league agaynſt themprour the Pope and the Venetians, he might take occaſion the ſooner to reſolue himſelf: It was enioyned alſo to the expedition of Pavvle, to congratulate in the Popes name the kings deliuerie, and to diſcourſe with him at large what he had done to that ende, and howe muche did induce themperours inclination to his libertie, the practiſes of confederation that were enterteyned with the Lady Regent: Laſtely that he ſhoulde impart with the king the Popes vehement deſire to haue an vniuerſall peace in Chriſtendome, and that thEmperour and he woulde perfourme together thenterpriſe agaynſt the Turke, who was reapported to make mightie preparations to inuade that yeare the Realme of Hungarie.

Theſe were his Commiſſions apparant and knowen, but this was his direction moſt ſubſtantiall and ſecrete, that aboue all things he ſhould ſounde throwly the kinges inclination, whom if he founde reſolute to obſerue the reſolution of Madrill, then to paſſe no further, leaſt vaynely he ſhould make his caſe more deſperate with themperour then before, but if he founde him to haue other thoughtes, and to hang in doubt, that he ſhould labour to confirme him in that diſpoſition, and ſeruing hys turne of all occaſions, he ſhould ſpecially compell him to take that courſe, giuing him knowledge of the Popes deſire to ioyne with him for the common benefite: He diſpatched in like ſort into Englande the pronotorie Gambaro, to manage the like office with that king, and to the ſame ende: Beſides, he procured the Venetians to ſende into Fraunce their ſecretory Andrevv Roſſe, with ſemblable commiſſions. As Pavvle paſt by Florence vpon his voyage, he fell ſicke and dyed, by reaſon of whiche accidẽt the Pope ſent to performe the legacion in his place, Capui de Mantua, taking it to an yll prediction, that nowe the ſeconde tyme the Miniſters which he had ſente into Fraunce to aduaunce thoſe practiſes, were in the waye intercepted by death. In the meane while making no omiſſion of time nor oportunities, he together with the Venetians, did all that they could to keepe in courage the Duke of Millan, and to enterteine him in hopes, leaſt the peace of Madrill ledde him not both with feare and raſhnes to make ſome accorde with themprour.

The maner of the deliuery of the french king.

By this time the french king was comen vpon the confines of Fontaraby, a towne apperteyning to themprour, ſtanding vppon the Occean ſea, and is a frontyer betwene Biskay and the Duchie of Guyen: And on the other ſide, the Lady Regent was aryued with the children of Fraunce, at Bayonne not many leagues from Fontaraby: The tormentes of the gowte tooke her by the waye, which was the cauſe that ſhe had lingred ſome tyme longer then the daye appoynted of permutation: But at laſt, the xviij. daye of Marche, the French king accompanied with the Viceroy and Capteine Alarcon with fifty horſe, was preſented vpon the ſhoare of the ryuer that deuideth the realme of Fraunce from the kingdome of Spayne: And on the other ſide, vpon the ſhoare oppoſite appeared Monſr Lavvtrech with the kings children and like number of horſe: There was in the middeſt of the ryuer a great barke made faſt with ankers, in which was no perſon: The king was rowed neare to this barke, in a little boate wherein he was accompanied with the Viceroy, Capteine Alarcon, and eyght others, all armed with ſhorte weapons: And on the other ſide of the barke were likewiſe brought in a litle boate, Monſr Lavvtrech with the oſtages and eight others weaponed according to the others: After this the Viceroy went into the barke with the perſon of the king, and all his companie: and alſo Monſr Lavvtrech with his eyght that accompanied him, ſo that they were within the barke a like number of both partes, Alarcon and his eyght being with the Viceroy, and Lavvtrech & the others, with the perſon of the king: And when they were all thus within the barke, Lavvtrech fetched out of the boate into the barke, the Daulphin, who being giuen to the Viceroy and by him committed to capteine Alarcon, was foorthwith beſtowed in their boate, and after him followed the little duke of Orleans, who was no ſooner entred the barke, then the French king leaped out of the barke into his boate, which he did with ſuche quicknes and celeritie, that thexchaunge or permutation was thought to be done at one ſelfe inſtant. Aſſoone as the king was on the other ſide of the ſhore, his newe libertie making him fearefull of ambuſh, he mounted vpon a Turkiſhe horſe of a wonderfull ſwiftnes, which was prepared for the purpoſe: and running betwene feare and gladnes vppon the ſpurre, he neuer ſtayed till he came to S.Iohn de Lus, a towne of his obedience foure leagues from the place: And being there readilie relieued with a freſhe horſe, he ran with the ſame ſwiftnes to Bayonne, where, after he had paſt ouer the offices of Court done to him by his people, he diſpatched with greate diligence a gentleman, to the king of England, to whom he wrote with his owne hande letters of his deliuerie, charging the meſſenger vnder verie louing commiſſions, to tell the king of Englande, that as he acknowledged theffect of his libertie to be wrought whollie by him and his operacions, ſo, in recompenſe, he offred to remaine to him a perpetuall and aſſured frend, and to be guided in all his affaires by his councell: And afterwardes he ſent an other ſolemne Embaſſage into Englande to ratifie the peace which his mother had made with him as one that reappoſed a verie great fundacion in thamitie of that king.

THE ARGVMENT OF THE SEVENTENTH BOOKE.

The Pope, the french king, the Venetians, and the Duke of Millan, draw into league againſt th Emperour: The Duke of Burbon comes to Millan: The armie of the league breakes vp from before Millan: The caſtell of Millan is rendred to thimperialls: Many enterpriſes are dreſſed againſt the Pope: The confederats ſend their armies by ſea to Genes: Rome is ſurpriſed by the Colonnois, the Pope makes truce with thimperialls which hurteth the deuiſes of Lombardie: The Duke of Ferrara confederats with the Emperour.

THE SEVENTEENTH BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

NOtwithſtanding, the pledge of the two children of Fraunce (of whom the eldeſt being heire apparant to ſo great a ſucceſſion, was one) was added to the oth and faith that paſſed betwene the Emperour and the frenche king for confirmacion of the accorde ſolemnly made at Madrill, and notwithſtanding for the full perfection of thaſſurance, the king had contracted thEmperours ſiſter in his owne perſon: Yet, by his deliuerie, both ſtraunge for the maner, and ſeuere for the aſſurance and pawnes that were enforced, all the Princes of Chriſtendom, drew into no ſmall exſpectacion what would be the iſſue of thinges: And as during his captiuitie, the eyes of men ſtoode fixed vpon thEmperour, to behold vnder what raunſome he would reſtore him to libertie, ſo being deliuered they began now to turne all their thoughtes and contemplacions vpon the king, for that they diſcerned ſundrie and greate effects, depending vpon his deliberacion either to obſerue or not obſerue, the capitulacion of Madrill: for, as in obſeruing the contract they ſaw a deſtinie of preſent ſeruitude to hang ouer the regions of Italy, both for the authoritie and greatnes of th Emprour, which went increaſing, and for the imbecillitie of the prouinces to whome was left neither fortune nor vertue, to make head againſt ſo great a courſe of victory: So in not performing the articles of thaccord, they ſaw the Emprour would be driuen, either to put vp in forgetfulnes the conſpiracies and enterpriſes dreſſed againſt him by the Duke of Myllan, and to reſtore to him that Duchie, leaſt the Pope and Venetians tooke occaſion to conioyne with the French king, by which meane he ſhould ſtand in hazard to loſe the great profits he hoped to reape by his victorie: or els (making his indignacion againſt the Duke of Myllan, more mighty, together with his deſire to haue no impediment of the French in Italy) he ſhould be compelled to aſſure the accord made with the king, conuerting into certeyne payments of money, all his obligacions and promiſſes to reſtore Burgonie: or laſtly, neither yelding to the one nor the other, he would be driuen to ſuffer to be brought againſt him by ſo many enemies a warre very greeuous almoſt by his owne confeſſion, ſince to auoid it, he was reduced to this ſtraite, to let the king goe with ſo great a daunger.

But the world ſtoode not long in doubt of the will and intencion of the French king: for that aſſoone as he was got into Bayonne, being required by a gentleman of the Viceroys, to ratifie thaccord according to thobligacion of his word being come into a place free and aſſured, he deferred it from one day to an other interpoſing reaſons and excuſes generall: wherein to thende to hold ſtill the Emprour in hope, he ſent to aduertiſe him by a man eſpeciall, that he forbare for the preſent, to accompliſh the ratificacion, not by omiſſion or willing negligence, but vpon this neceſſitie, that before he proceeded really to ſuch an act, he was to labor to reappeaſe and reduce the mindes of his ſubiects ill contented with the obligacions he had made, tending to the diminucion of the crowne of Fraunce: Neuertheleſſe, he would in his time, reſolue all difficulties and obſerue with fidelitie all that he had promiſed to him, both in ſubſtance and circumſtance: By this dealing, no leſſe doubtfull for the manner, then daungerous in meaning, might eaſily be comprehended, what were his intencions, the ſame being more manifeſtly detected at the arriuall of the Meſſengers ſent to him not many dayes after, by the Pope and Venetians, In whome was no great neede of induſtrie or labor, to ſownd out the plaine courſe of his inclinacion: for, after he had receiued them with many demonſtracions and offices of Court, he enterteyned them ſeuerally and a part with ſondry ſpeeches of compaſſion, ſuch as tended to manifeſt complaints againſt the inhumanitie of th Emprour: who he ſaid did neuer adminiſter to him during his captiuitie, any one office apperteyning to the ranke of a Prince, Nor at any time, ſhewed him ſelfe touched with that affection and commiſeracion which one Prince ought to expreſſe vpon the calamities of an other, And much leſſe would vſe any courſſe of common comfort, either to relieue the heauines of his condicion with any propertie of apt conſolacion, or once to enter into conſideracion, that the ſame accident that had falne vppon him, might alſo be as heauily heaped vppon his owne heade. In this complaint, he alleaged the example of Edvvard king of England called of ſome Edvvard Longe ſhanke, To whome when was preſented as priſoner Iohn king of the French men, taken by the Prince of VVales his ſonne in the battel of Poytiers, he did not only receiue him with greate comfort & compaſſion of his afflicted caſe, but alſo, all the tyme of his impriſonment, within the Realme of England, he let him go at libertie vnder a free gard, he had had daily familier cõuersation with him, he would oftentymes haue him to accompany him on hunting to communicate in the open ayre and solace of the field, and was not curious to call him to eate with him at his table: And by these humanities muche lesse that he loste his prisoner, or raunged him to an accorde lesse fauorable, but of the contrarie, by the operation of those graces and good offices, there grewe betwene them suche a familiaritie and confidence, that the French king, after he had continued many yeres in Fraunce, made a voluntary voyage into Englande, to honor and gratifie vnder that propertie of office, the liberalitie and franknes of the king: He alleaged that as there was onely remembraunce of two kings of Fraunce that had bene taken prisoners in battell, king Iohn and him selfe: So the diuersitie of thexamples was also worthy of singular memorie, seeing vpon the one was exercised all facilitie and mildnes of the victor, and to the other were ministred all those rigours and seuerities, which tyrantes in the height and pride of their fortune are wont to vse: That muche lesse that he boare towardes others a disposition eyther more peasible or better qualified, seing he gathered by the construction of his speeches vsed at Madrill, that following the humor of his ambition, he employed his thoughts most how to subdue vnder seruitude the imperie of the Church, the potẽtacies of Italie, & all other Princes of Christendome: In which regard he wished the Pope and Venetians to prouide for their proper safety, wherein he offred him selfe with great affection to be concurrant with them in the quarrell of their common safetie, and to establishe agaynst themprour a straite alliance, not that he intended to reconquer to himselfe the estate of Millan, or otherwise to encrease his puissance, but onely that by the meane of warre he might make recouerie of his children, and reassure the libertie of Italy, seeing the too great couetousnes of themprour had taken from him all cooller and reason of bondes to obserue tharticles of the capitulation: A libertie which he insisted the rather for that at the first whyleste he was in the Castell of Pisqueton, and afterwardes in Madrill, he had oftentimes protested to themperour for the iniquitie of his demaundes, that if through necessitie he were driuen to compounde vnder conditions vnequall or suche as were not in his power to performe: that muche lesse that he would obserue them, but of the contrarie, taking thaduauntage of the iniurie in constrayning him to make promises vnreasonable and vnpossible, he would omit no occasion wherein oportunitie were offred, to be reuenged: And that he had not forborne to tell him that whiche of them selues they might knowe, and which he beleeued was obserued in other Realmes, that it was not in the power of a king of Fraunce, to binde him selfe to the alienation of any thing depending vpon the Crowne, without the consent of the estates generall of the Realme: That the lawes of Christians did not beare, that a Prince made prisoner by the accident of warre, should be deteyned in perpetuall prison, A punishment proper for malefactors, but not rigorously executed agaynst such as had bene persecuted with the crueltie of fortune: That no man doubted, that all obligations made by constraynt in prison, were of no vallue, and that as suche capitulations were of no force, so likewise the fayth which was but the accidentes, and the confirmation of the same, coulde not be bounde: That the othes whiche he had made at Rheines, where the kings of Fraunce are consecrated with so great ceremonie and with the sacred oyle, were first, by the which he was bounde according to the precedent and custome of all other kings of Fraunce, not to make alienation of the patrimonie of the Crowne: That for these reasons he was no lesse free then ready to moderate thinsolencie of themprour, and ryse vp agaynst his ambicion: Wherein the kinges mother made apparance the ſame deſyre, together with his ſiſter, who taking vpon her in vayne a long iourney to goe into Spayne, complayned grieuouſly againſt the rigour of thEmperour, and the ſeuerity of his Court, and namely ſuch as were moſt familiar with him in councell: for end, the king affirmed that if commiſſions and directions were once addreſſed from the Pope and Venetians, it ſhould not be long ere the league were accompliſhed, which he ſaid were beſt to be negociated in Fraunce, to thend to draw in with more facility, the king of England, in whom they ſhowed to haue a great hope.

This was the diſcourſe of the ſpeeches which the king held with them, being in like ſorte aſſured and confirmed by the vniuerſall inclinacion of thoſe that gouerned him: but in ſecret, his thoughts were farre others: for, albeit he had no diſpoſicion to deliuer vp Burgongnie to thEmperour, yet he bore a minde farre eſtraunged to moue warre againſt him, onleſſe he were compelled by great neceſſity: Only he hoped that in laboring to be confederate with thItalians, thEmperour, to auoyde ſo great a gulphe of difficulties, would be induced to conuert into obligacion of money, the article of the reſtitucion of Burgonie: In which caſe, not one regard touching the matters of Italie, ſhould ſtay him from couenaunting with him, for the deſire he had to retyre and reuoke his children.

Theſe Agents of the Pope and Venetians, made ſpeedie relacion of the hopes and good inclinacion which they founde in the frenche king, and that at a time, when were much increaſed in Italie, both the neceſſitie and occaſion to confederat againſt the Emperour: This was the neceſſitie: The Duke of Millan in the beginning of the ſeege, partly by the fault of his officers, and partly for the ſhortnes of time, had beſtowed within the caſtell, a very ſmall proporcion of vittells, and yet the ſtore he had prouided was more immoderatly exſpended, then men reduced to ſo hard tearmes, are wont to do, for which cauſe (hauing notwithſtanding the ſtraitnes of the ſeege, good meane to wryte out of the caſtell) he gaue knowledge of his wants, which if they were not remedied by the next moneth of Iune, he ſhoulde be conſtrained to giue him ſelfe vp to the diſcreſſion of the Emperour: And albeit it was beleued that (according to the cuſtome of ſuche as are beſeeged) the Duke ſet downe a greater want and ſcarcetie of vittells then in deede there was, yet there were many reaſons to perſwade that the ſtore coulde not be ſufficient for any long time: And to ſuffer the caſtell to fall into the handes of thEmperour, was a matter that made more hard the recouering of that ſtate, beſides that it would increaſe not a litle the reputacion of thEmperour: But it ſeemed not that thoccaſion was the leſſe increaſed, ſeeing the people were reduced to the laſt diſpaire: for, as the Emperour ſent no money to the armie, to the which many payes were due, and leſſe meane to leauie any in any other place: So the Capteines to ſtoppe as well as they coulde all courſe of mutinie amongeſt the ſouldiours, had beſtowed all the regimentes of the men at armes and light horſemen, in ſeuerall places of the countrey, taxing euerie towne ratelike with bands & numbers, & compelled the townes to compound for money with the Capteines and with the ſouldiours: A taxacion executed with ſuch exceſſe, that it was aſſured by the credible informacion of many that had priuity with the affaires of that ſtate, that the Duchy of Millan paied euery day to thEmperours ſouldiours, fiue thowſand duckats, of which came to the priuat purſe of Anthonie de Leua, thirtie duckats dayly: By thexample of the horſemen, the bands of footemen, that were diſperſed in ſeueral lodgings within Millan & other townes, were inſolent vpon the owners of the houſes wherin the lay, whom they cõſtrained not only to make prouiſion

sion of al things which they thought meete for their feding & clothing, but also many of them being lodged in one house enforced the seruice of the good man for the prouision of them all: And such houses as had not meane to feede them, were cõpelled to compownd with them for money at their owne rate: And as it often fell out that one onely souldier had to him selfe a whole house with absolute commaũdement of all, so, he taxed to furnish him of money, all the residue, except him whõe he vsed in the prouision of his dyot: This miserable condicion exercised with so great crueltie, made desperat the whole inhabitants of that Duchie, and namely the townesmen of the city of Myllan, to whom had bene nether custom nor precedent, before the entry of the Marquis of Pisquairo, to be charged eyther with vittells or contribucion for the lodging of souldiours: Their custom in times of warre before, ronning in a courss of greater humanitie and facilitie, made the yoke of this innouacion more heauy to them, In which respect, looking into their owne estate, both to be mighty in numbers and armes, and remembring the lawe and obligacion of their freedom and libertie, they beganne to murmure as men not able any longer to endure so great insolencie and moste greeuous exactions: And therefore to make some honest way to be deliuered, or at least to reduce them to some comely moderacion, the towne of Myllan sent Embassadors to th Emprour, who brought from him no other expedicion then words generall, and that without any remedie to their afflictions: The towne of Myllan principally and ouer and besides all the other townes of the Duchy, being charged according to his proporcion with a greater number of souldiers then the other townes, was also taxed to prouide money for expenses publike such as were set downe by the Capteines for the conseruacion of th Emprours things: the Ministers of which exaction proceded with no lesse rigour and seueritie then the others: for remedy of which aggreuances, since by solicitacion they could neither be easied nor pitied, the people pushed on with the impressions of men in a desperate state, determined to resist with their weapons in hande those sore exactions which the iniquitie of the warre had layed vppon them to eate them vp: They gaue order that whosoeuer were oppressed by the cruelty of the exactors, should call vpon his neighbours to come to his defence, who, together with the vniuersall multitude of all the residue, should ronne at the commaundement of certeine chieftaines assigned in many partes of the citie, to resist the furie of the Officers and represse the insolencie of the souldiours that should rise in their fauor: After this order and direction was established amongest them, the first experience fell vppon a Marchant of retayle, who being vexed by the Collectors of the exactions, stirred vp for his defence, his neighbours, who calling to the alarme a great part of the populars, the whole towne was forthwith in a tumult: which, by the diligence of Antho. de Leua, and the good office of the Marquis of Guast, and other of the principall gentlemen of Myllan, was eftsoones reappeased: But vnder this condicion and promisse, that the Capteines had assured the people to rest contented with the publike reuenues, and would not laye vppon them other imposicions, nor bringe into the towne other bands of souldiers: This was an accord but for a very short tyme, since it endured no longer then till the day following: for, the people hauing aduertisement that new regiments of souldiers approached neare the towne, they fell againe into armes, but both in a greater tumult, and better gouerned, and with a greater assistance of the people, then the day before: yea, what with the rage of the populars, which in their furie is daungerous, and what with their well ordering of the vprore being taught by the example of the daye before, The Capteines fearing not to be hable to reſiſte ſo great a furie, were vpon the poynt to goe out of the towne with their bandes: A matter which in deede the humor of their feare had drawne them to do, if the people with a ſetled reſolution had marched on to be reuenged of them and their ſouldiours: But as in tumultes and popular vprores there is alwayes ſomething of imperfection, and that aſwell by the propertie of the action which holdeth of diſobedience and rebellion, as by the ignorance of the leaders, who for the moſt parte haue more paſſion then reaſon: So firſt of all they wente without all order or skill to ſacke the olde Court, a place where laye the Capteine of Criminall iuſtice with certayne bandes of footemen, making their beginning with that which ſhould haue bene the laſte acte of their execution: A matter whiche gaue no litle life and aduauntage to thimperiall Capteines, who in that oportunitie omitted not to fortefie their ſtraytes and places of acceſſe, and reuoking from the ſiege the moſt parte of the footmen that kept the Caſtel enuironed, they aſſembled al into one ſtrength, to make head agaynſt the people if they offred to inuade them: By that occaſion the beſieged within the Caſtell made a ſally out to ſet vpon the ramparts caſte on that ſide within: But when they ſaw the people made not on to their ſuccours, they retyred eftſoones into the Caſtell, leauing vnperfect the enterpriſe which with due execution would haue done muche to haue eſtabliſhed their libertie: The people, partly for want of experience in actions of warre, and partely for the care of the pillage they had made at the olde Court, did not onely omit to do that which apperteined, but alſo began to breake and ſeperate them ſelues, euery one beeing more mindefull to preſerue the praye he had made, then to followe further the victorie which their fortune offred to them: By which occaſion the Capteines of the army, concurring the ayde of certayne gentlemen of the towne, reappeaſed eftſones this tumult, with promiſe to leade out of the towne and contrey of Millan, all the ſouldiours except thoſe bandes of launceknightes which helde the Caſtell beſieged: In this ſort the Capteines and men of warre, by their pollicie and induſtrie, quenched a daungerous fyre which the furie of the people had kindled in their raſhnes, and rightly skorned their diſorders and ignorance to manage armes and weapons, errours which familiarly do followe a communaltie drawne into mutinie, hauing no leaders of experience and vallour: But by theſe appeaſementes and accordes, all intelligences were not broken, and muche leſſe layde downe the armes of the people, but retayning ſtill many tokens of a diſpoſition to ſtirre vp a greater emotion, it ſeemed that who ſo euer would take vpon him to trouble thaffayres of themprour, neede not want a fitte occaſion, conſidering principally both the ſmall forces and other great difficulties which thimperialls had, and alſo that in the laſte warres, the wonderfull vallour of the people of Millan, and of other townes expreſſed in their fauor, had bene a great fundation for the defence of that eſtate.

Theſe were the tearmes and eſtate of the affayres of Italy, when were brought out of Fraunce the reapports of the ready diſpoſition and offers of the king, together with his requeſt for the ſending of Commiſſions: And at the ſame time thembaſſadours of the king of Englande reſident with the Pope, laboured to induce him by reaſons and perſwaſions to deuiſe howe to moderate the greatnes of themperour, and to encourage the Frenche king not to obſerue the capitulation: By reaſon of which inducementes accompanied with thauthoritie and inclinations of their princes, not onely the Venetians, who in all times and in farre leſſer occaſions had giuen counſell to take armes, but alſo the Pope, notwithſtanding his harde diſpoſition to enter into that trauell, iudged nowe that by neceſſitie he was to reduce and gather together together the ſumme of all thoſe diſcourſes, and no more deferre to take ſome deliberation: The reaſons which in the monethes before had made him inclined to the warre, were not only the ſelfe ſame in nature & property, but alſo were more mightie and of greater conſideration: for as themprour for his part, by howe muche the practiſes and treatiſes had bene holden out in tract & longnes of time, was apte and hable to diſcouer what intentions the Pope bare agaynſt his greatnes: So the Pope tooke occaſion by the contentes of the accorde which the emprour had made with the french king, to enter into a iuſt ſuſpicion not to be hable to obteyne of him any reaſonable conditions, & that he had a ſecret reſolution to proceede to oppreſſe the reſidue of Italy: Wherein the daunger was more apparant then euer, for that the caſtell of Millan beeing not hable to holde out any long time, ſtoode almoſte vpon the poynt of rendring: He was alſo prouoked with the conſideration of newe iniuries redoubled by the Imperial capteines, who ſince the capitulation of Madrill had ſent to be forried vpon the territories of Plaiſanca and Parma, certeine enſignes of Italian footmen, ſuche as executed vpon the places many inſolencies and domages: And when the Pope complained of their oppreſſions, they made him aunſwere, that they were drawne thither of their proper authority, for that there was no pay diſtributed in the army: He was likewiſe incenſed with matters happly more light and frayle, but taken in the worſe part, as often cõmeth to paſſe in ſuſpicions & quarels which haue this in propertye, to take nothing in good that is not agreable to the humor of their will and liking, and to turne all things to blame that hath no coreſpondency with their owne intentions & meanings: For as themprour had publiſhed in Spayne, certayne Edictes pragmatike agaynſt the authority of the ſea Apoſtolike, by vertue whereof his ſubiectes were forbidden to treate of cauſes of benefices within his realmes: So vnder that warrant a Spaniſh Notary tooke boldnes euen in the court of Rome and in the Chamber of audience, to commaund certen men in themprours name, to deſiſt to pleade any more in that Auditory: And alſo it did not only ſeeme that by the deliuery of the french king, the knot was vnfaſtned which had bound euery man in doubt that the French men, to haue agayne their king, would not ſticke to abandon the league: And withall it was well diſcerned that the ſocietie and preſence of the kings perſon was of farre greater importãce for the enterpriſe, then the felowſhip of his mother and the generall gouernment: But alſo there were ſeene other farre greater occaſions: for as the cõmotion of the cõmons of Millan ſeemed to draw with it a matter of great conſequence, ſo by the penury of vittels that paſſed generally ouer al that eſtate, it was thought it could not be but a great aduantage to ſet vpon thimperials, before they fell into the oportunity of the harueſt to reuittell and refurniſh their ſtrong places: and before neceſſity compelled the caſtell of Millan to yeelde: and before themprour had time to ſende into Italy newe ſupplyes of men, or releeue them with prouiſions of money. Moreouer there fell into conſideration, that the French king, in whom for the memorie of things paſt, was greate likelyhoode of diſtruſt agaynſt the Pope, and nowe finding not in him a zeale and forwardnes to make warre, would eſtſones reſolue to obſerue thaccord made at Madrill, or elſe to reconfirme it of newe: And it was not doubted, that ſo great forces both by ſea & land being conioyned in one, together with ſufficient meanes to continue for long time thexſpences of the warre, that the conditions of thẽpror ſtãding both abãdoned of al other princes, & made naked of al ſtore of mony, would be farre inferior in the warre: Only there was one ſcruple to the contrary, cauſed by a feare that the frẽch king to redeme his childrẽ, would not leaue abãdoned the other cõfe-derates, according to the doubt that was had of the gouernment of Fraunce at ſuch time as the king was priſoner: And yet there was eſtemed great difference, for that in taking armes againſt themprour with ſo many good occaſions, there was ſo great hope to recouer them by force, and the action to ſuccede with ſo great a reputation of the king, that he would haue no reaſon to open his eares to any accorde particular, which would not only bring infamy to him, but alſo would be preiudiciall to hys affayres, though not for the preſent, at leaſt in time to come: for that it could not but be a matter moſt daungerous for the realme of Fraunce, to ſuffer themprour to diſpoſe of Italy according to his owne arbitration: of which reaſon did likewiſe follow, that he would not fayle to make ſharpe warre vpon him, ſince it could not be but a naked Counſell, in confederating agaynſt themprour, to depriue him ſelfe of the recouering of his children by thobſeruation of the accord: And yet on the other ſide, to lay apart all things by the which he might hope to redeeme them glorioufly by armes: Suche as made their diſcourſes in this ſorte, conſidered happly more that which reaſonably he ought to do, then they looked with iudgement into the nature and diſcreſſion of the French men: A fault wherein men do oftentimes fall, in matters of deliberations and iudgementes that are made of the diſpoſition and will of others: Perhappes alſo they did not ſufficiently conſider, howe much Princes that are culpable, who of their proper inclination do oftentimes preferre vtilitie affore fidelitie, are eaſily perſwaded the ſemblable of other princes: And that therefore the French king ſuſpecting leaſt the Pope and Venetians woulde become negligent and careleſſe of his intereſtes, when by the conqueſt of the duchie of Millan they ſhould ſtande aſſured of the power of themprour: would iudge that the longnes of the warre would be more profitable to him then the victorie, as a meane more eaſie to induce themprour to reſtore his children vppon ſome newe compoſition, beeing already made wearie of the long trauelles and exſpences of warres. So that partely by the reaſons affore rehearſed making deepe impreſſion in the minde of the Pope, but more for repentance that he had ſtande an ydle beholder of the iſſue of the battell of Pauia, and ſomewhat for that he was reproched by euery one of tymerouſnes, and laſtely for the common murmure of all his Court and of all Italy, who caſte in his teeth, that by his faulte the ſea Apoſtolike together with the whole eſtate of Italy were reduced into ſo great daungers: He determined in the ende, not onely to enter confederation with the Frenche king and the reſidue, agaynſt themprour, but alſo by hys labour and ſolicitation, to aduaunce and purſue it to ſpeedy concluſion: In which good inclination, he was puſhed on partely for the other regardes, but principally for this, that in tyme might be aduaunced the prouiſions for the reliefe of the Caſtell of Millan, before the extremitie of famine compelled them to reappoſe more in the mercy of thennemies, then in the remedie of their friends: That neceſſitie was the cauſe of all the aduerſities which followed: for that otherwiſe the Pope proceeding more ſlowly (vpon whoſe authority the Venetians depended much in this action) had exſpected if themprour being moued with thinobſeruation of the French king, would not propounde for a common ſurety, thoſe conditions which had bin ſet downe before, ſpecially when he ſhould ſee him ſelf conſtrayned to take armes: And being not compelled to ſhow to the french king ſo great a neceſſity, he had eaſily obteyned of him aſwell for him ſelfe as for the Venetians better conditions: And it had bene without doubt that therby tharticles of the confederation had bin better ſet down & particulated, together with more aſſurãce of thobſeruatiõ, & that the warre had not begon but that the

Svvizzers had ſtirred, and all the prouiſions neceſſary had bene ready: and laſtely the king of Englande might happly haue bene drawne into the confederation, with whom for the diſtance of places, there was no leaſure to negociate. But for that by the daunger of the Caſtell of Millan, the Pope and the Venetians ſawe that celeritie was of greate importance, they diſpatched with ſpeede (but ſecretely) commiſſions to their ſeuerall Agentes, to goe thorowe with the confederation, wherein they were enioyned to followe almoſte all thoſe Articles which had bene debated before with the Ladye Regent of Fraunce, the more to haſten thexpedition: There were ſent dayly aduertiſementes of the neceſſitie of the Caſtell, which made the Pope enter into conſideration, That where as it was neceſſarie for that the high waye from Rome to the Court of Fraunce was ſtopped, to ſend his meſſenger & corriers by a long circuit of way through Svvizzerlande, and where he thought that in the action of capitulation might fall out ſome difficultie which neceſſarily might drawe ſome intermiſſion and tract of time, it might happen that they might ſtand ſo long vppon the concluſion of the confederation, that if tyll then the Caſtell were deferred to be reskewed, there were daunger leaſt the ſuccours would come to late: for which conſideration importing almoſte the effect and ſubſtance of the whole, he called to conſulte of the preſent perill, the Venetians, by whoſe counſell together with thimportunate ſolicitation of the Agentes of the Duke of Millan reſident at Rome and at Venice, and concurring alſo the counſell of many others of his factiō, they reſolued to prepare a ſufficient force to giue reskew to the Caſtell, to thende to be ready to employ them aſſone as the concluſion of the league were come out of Fraunce, and in the meane while to giue hope to the people of Millan, and to nouriſhe many practiſes whiche they enterteyned in the townes of that ſtate: They made then a reſolute concluſion that the Venetians ſhoulde ſende the Duke of Vrbin to their frontiers towards the ryuer of Adda, accompanied with their men at armes, and ſix thouſande footmen Italians, and the Pope to ſende to Plaiſanca, the Count Guido Rangon with ſixe thouſande footemen: And for that it was neceſſarie to ſo great a warre, to haue many numbers of the Svvizzers, of which nation the Duke of Vrbin counſelled to leauye twelue thouſande for the aſſured obteyning of the victorie, who alſo aduiſed the Pope and the Venetians, that not to diſcloſe them ſelues ſo muche agaynſt themperour ſo long as they were not aſſured that the league was made, it were not good to ſende out their Agentes to leauye the Svvizzers, they gaue eare to Iohn Ia. de Medicis of Millan, who of a Capteine of the rocke of Mus, had made him ſelfe lorde of the place, partely by a knowledge he had of the ſituation and fortreſſe, and partly by the occaſion and fauour of the time running: he tolde them that many monethes before, he had practiſed to that effect with many of the Svvizzer Capteines, and did offer vnder an impreſt of ſixe thouſande duckets, to make diſcende an armie of ſixe thouſande Svvizzers, whiche ſhould not be leauyed by the decree of the Cantons, but particularly, and then to procede to furniſh their paye, aſſone as they were diſcended into the duchy of Millan: So that as it often hapneth in enterpriſes which of the one ſide are eſtemed eaſie, and on the other ſide are preſſed with the ſhortnes of time, the offer of this man was accepted by the Pope and the Venetians, being alſo approued by the Agentes of the Duke of Millan, and by Ennia Biſhop of Verula in whom the Pope reappoſed wholly for matters of the Svvizzers, for that he had long time followed the ſolicitation of thoſe affayres in the name of the Church, and in that action had lyen many moneths at Breſcia by his direction, & was at that time with the Agent of the Venetians, where he treated continually with many of that nation: In like sorte they harkned at Venice to Octauian Fregosa Bishoppe of Loda, who offring to make an easie leauie of many numbers of that nation, had immediatly his expedition (without communicating with the Pope) for Swvizzerlande to wage sixe thousande, in the same sorte and at the same rate of payes: Of which deuises, both yll vnderstanded and worse ordered, was bred (as shall be recited in his place) a beginning to put to confusion the enterprise, which was dressed with so great hope.

Whyleſt theſe preparations were in hande in Italy, themprour beginning to enter into suspicion for the delayes that were interposed to the ratification, dispatched into Fraunce the Viceroy of Naples and Capteine Alarcon, to be fully informed of the kinges intention, who was nowe gone from Bayonne to Congnac: The Viceroy had stayed all that whyle in the towne of Victoria, hauing with him the ostages and the Queene Eleoner, to thende to present them to the king assoone as he had accomplished the contentes of the capitulation: And albeit the Viceroy was receyued with very greate honor, both for that he was Embassador from themprour, and also the king acknowledged in him and his working, a great parte of his deliuerie, yet he found the king wholly estraunged and farre of to leaue Burgongnie, sometimes taking his excuse vpon the obstinacie of the estates of the Realm whose consent he coulde not obteine: and sometimes alleaging that willingly he neuer passed a promise, which for that it was very preiudiciall to the Crowne of Fraunce, it was impossible for him to obserue: Onely in respect of his great desire to enterteyne the league of amitie begonne with themprour, and to giue perfection to the mariage promised, he sayde he was contented, obseruing all other couenantes betweene them, to paye vnto him two millions of Crownes, in place of the resignation of Burgongnie: To which excuses he added, that no other thing induced him to confirme with this moderation the accord made at Madrill, then an inclination he had to continue in good intelligence and correspondencie with themprour, the rather for that he wanted not the working of offers and motions from the Pope, the king of England, and the Venetians, to incense him to the warre: Which answere comprehending his last resolution, the Viceroy signified to themprour the message, being accompanied with one of the kings secretories, to confirme the same: By this it hapned that notwithstãding the commissions from the Pope & Venetians so much desired before, were now come to the Court, yet the king bearing a more inclination to haue agrement with the Emprour, and in that regard had determined to exspect his answere vpon the new offer wherin the Viceroy had giuen him some hope, began openly to defer the cõclusion of the cõfederation, not altogether dissembling (since it was impossible to hide it) that he solicited a new accorde with themprour, which being propounded by the Viceroy, it was a matter which could no way do hurt to be vnderstanded: Besides, he assured thẽ (notwithstanding he had other intentions) that he would neuer make any conclusion which should not conteine the restoring of his children, the release of the duchy of Millan, & vnfayned prouision for the suretie of all Italy: An alteration of it selfe sufficient to consume the Pope, if for his impressions of suspicion & feare, he had not iudged that the onely remedie for his affayres, was to confederate him selfe with the French king. But it is not to be douted with what discontentment and perturbation of minde, the Emprour receiued the newes of the Viceroys aduertisementes, confirmed by the relation of the secretory of the french king: for, as it brought no little griefe to him to fall frõ the hope he had to recouer Burgongnie, a matter which he vehemently desired aswell for thaugmentation

of his glory, as for thoportunitie of that prouince: So his indignation seemed redoubled, for that the french king by finding euasions to shift off his promises and fayth giuen, made manifest declaration to all the world that he reiected & despised to performe the thing he had promised: But the thing that bred most torment in his mind, was a certayne shame & reprouing of himselfe, for that both contrary to the counsell of all his Nobles, and agaynst the vniuersall iudgement of all his Court, and also contrary to the prediction or foreshowing of the countrey of Flaunders related to him by the Lady Margaret his Aunt, and by all his Agentes and officers in Italye, he dyd not measure with better reasons and more maturitie of counsell, the importance and condition of affayres, but lulled simplye in the humor of affection, perswaded him selfe that the Frenche king would obserue thaccorde: And as amidde these impressions and varietie of thoughtes, he had diligently cast alwayes that concerned his dignitie, and foreseene in what tearmes of daunger and difficulties his affayres woulde stande at all assayes: he determined to alter no one ioate of that article or chapter whiche spake of the restoring of Burgongnie: no he rather resolued to accorde with the Pope, and to consent to the reintegration of Frauncis Sforce, as though it had bene more agreable or comely for him, to pardon a prince lesse then him selfe, then by yeelding to the will of a king ambicious and puissant, and enuious of his greatnes, to make as it were a voluntary confession of feare: wherin his passion caryed him into this resolution, to haue rather a most dangerous warre with euery one, then to remit the iniurie receyued of the French king: for he feared least the Pope seeing his amitie contemned, was not wholly estraunged in minde from him, wherein his suspicion was augmented by the aduertisement he receyued, that besides the Pope had sent into Fraunce a particular messanger to congratulate with the king, he had also sent publikely an Embassadour: But muche more dyd he suspect, for that he had newely taken into his paye, vnder cooller to assure agaynst the Mores the sea shoares of the Churche, Andrea Dore with eyght gallies vnder the pay of thirtie thousand duckets for enterteinment, and pensions for euery yere: A matter which, both for the qualitie of the man, and for that neuer heretofore the Pope had any thought to make him selfe strong vppon the sea, and also because Andrea Dore had bene many yeres in the pay of the French king: made him enter into suspicion least that practise were subborned of intention to trouble thestate of Genes: For these reasons he prepared him selfe to endure all accidentes, and leauyed at the same tyme many prouisions of warre, bothe to offende and defende: He solicited the passing of the Duke of Burbon into Italye, who made but slowe preparation to that expedition, before he gaue order to that ende, that the seuen gallies which laye at Monaco in Italye, shoulde be brought about to Barcelonia to be ioyned with the residue, and that there should be sent to releeue the necessities of Italy, an hundred thousande duckets, for that without them the going of the Duke of Burbon woulde serue to nothing: He dispatched to the Pope Don Hugo de Moncado, with commission (as he sayde) to satisfie hym: But his directions were to passe firste by the Courte of Fraunce, to thende that learning of the Viceroy if there were any hope that the kinge woulde obserue, that eyther he should passe no further, or if he did, that he should chaunge his instructions & commissions according to thestate and necessitie of affayres: But to euery good counsell that was giuen to the Pope, was opposed the daunger of the Castell of Millan, which being almost consumed with want of vittels, he had great feare least it would be rēdred to thenemy: he was also timerous that by some meane were not cōtracted

a newe accorde betwene the Frenche king and themprour: he was vncertayne of that which might be wrought by the comming of Don Hugo, whose legation was made so muche the more suspicious, by howe muche he was to passe firste by the Court of Fraunce: And he was ielouse of the dissimulations and conninges that would be vsed when he should be passed into Italy: In which regard the Pope together with the Venetians, soliciting with great instance the conclusion of the confederation, the king at laste began to harken with better inclination to the resolution of the League: Wherevnto he was induced partely for that he did vnderstande by the comming of Don Hugo, that themprour would alter nothing of tharticles of the capitulation, and partely through feare that if he should deferre further the action of confederation, the Pope would be caryed into newe counsells: he iudged also that by this confederation his affayres should stande in better estate of reputation with themprour, in whom feare might happly plye or moderate the rigour of his mind: And lastely he wanted not thincitations of the king of Englande, who more with perswasions and reasons then with effectes and sounde meaninges, seemed to fauor that conclusion. This league was cõcluded the tenth day of May in the yere a thousande fiue hundred and six, at Cougnac, betwene the kings Counsell deputies for the king on the one parte, and the Agents of the Pope and Venetians on the other part: That betwene the Pope, the french king, the Venetians, and the Duke of Millan (for whom the Pope and the Venetians assured the ratification) should be a league and confederation perpetuall, to thende to repossesse Frauncis Sforce freely of the Duchie of Millan, and restore to libertie the French kinges children: That the League should be signified to the Emprour, to whom was graunted power to enter into it within three monethes, vpon condition to redeliuer the kings children, receyuing a competent raunsome, such as should be arbitrated by the king of England: which condition also was extended to leaue wholly the duchy of Millan to Frauncis Sforce, and the other potentates and estates of Italy, as they were affore the laste warre began: That for the deliuery of Frauncis Sforce nowe besieged within the Castell of Millan, and for the recouery of that estate, a present warre shoulde be made with eight hundred men at armes, seuen hundred light horsemen, and eight thousande footemen for the Popes parte: and for the Venetians, the warre to be furnished with eight hundred men at armes, a thousande light horsemen, and eight thousand footmen: for the Duke of Millan foure hundred men at armes, three hundred lighte horsemen, and foure thousande footemen: this proportion to be furnished assoone as he should be hable, and in the meane tyme the Pope and Venetians to accomplish for him: The French king to sende immediatly into Italy fiue hundred launces, and so long as the warre should endure, to paye to the Pope and to the Venetians fortie thousande crownes monthly, whiche money was to be employed in the leauie of bandes of Svvizzers: That the French king should immediatly open the warre agaynst themprour beyonde the Mountes on what side he should thinke most conuenient, and that with an army of two thousande launces, and ten thousande footmen, with sufficient numbers of artilleries: That the French king should arme xij. light gallies, and the Venetians thirtene, at their proper exspences: That the Pope should ioyne to those gallies, that proportion of Nauie with the which he had enterteyned into his paye Andrea Dore: That the charges should runne in common touching necessary shippes for the sayde armie by sea, with the which they should addresse their course to Genes: That after themprours armie in Lombardie were eyther vanquished or weakned, they should mightily inuade the kingdome of Naples

aſwell by lande as ſea, which being once conquered, the poſſeſſion and inueſtiture ſhould be transferred to which of the confederates it pleaſed the Pope: And yet in an article ſeperate was ſet downe that the Pope could not diſpoſe of it without the conſent of the confederates, only there was reſeruation made of the tributes & contributions which aunciently were vſed to be payed to the ſea Apoſtolike, together with one ſingular eſtate of forty thouſande duckets of reuenue, to gratifie whom it pleaſed the Pope: That to thend the French king were certayne, that by the victorie to be obteined in Italy and the conqueſt of Naples, might be made eaſie the deliuery of his children: that if the Emprour in that caſe would within foure monethes after the loſſe of that kingdome, enter into the confederation vnder the conditions afforeſayd, the kingdome ſhould be rendred to him: but if he would not accept that power to reenter into the league, then the french king ſhould take and enioye the yerely and perpetuall rent of that realme: That the french king ſhould not at anye time, nor for any cauſe, moleſt Frauncis Sforce for the duchy of Millan, but ſhould be bound together with the others, to defende him agaynſt all men, and to do what he could to introduce betwene him & the Svvizzers a new confederation: Onely the king ſhould receiue of him yerely and perpetuall tribute, ſuch as ſhould be ſet down by the arbitration of the Pope and Venetians, and that not to be leſſe then fiftie thouſande duckets: That Frauncis Sforce ſhould take to wyfe ſuche a Lady of the blood of Fraunce, as it ſhould pleaſe the king to prouide for him, and ſhould be bounde to enterteyne as apperteyned, his brother Maximilian, in place of the yearely penſion which he receyued of the king: That the king ſhould reenter into the Earledome of Aſt: That if Genes were recouered, the king to reteyne the ſame eſtate of ſuperiority which he was wont to do in times paſt: and that if Anth. Adorne who then was duke there, would compounde with the league, he ſhould be receyued ſo farreforth as he woulde acknowledge the French king for ſuperior, in the ſame ſorte and manner as Octauian Fregoſa had done a fewe yeres before: That all the confederates ſhould demaunde of themprour the deliuerie of the children of Fraunce, and if he refuſed to reſtore them, that it ſhould be denounced to him in the name of them all, that the League would do all that they coulde to haue them agayne: That aſſone as the warres of Italy were finiſhed, or at leaſt the Realme of Naples taken, and themperours armie ſo weakned as there was no feare of it, all the confederates ſhould be bounde to ayde the Frenche king agaynſt themprour beyonde the Mountes with a thouſande men at armes, a thouſande fiue hundred light horſemen, and ten thouſande footemen, or elſe with money in place of men, at the kinges choyſe: That not one of the confederates without the conſent of the others, might not contract with the Emperour, to whom it ſhould be permitted in caſe he would enter into the confederation, to goe to Rome to take thimperiall Crowne with ſuche a trayne of men as ſhoulde not be feared, the ſame to be rated by the Pope and Venetians: That thoughe anye one of the confederates were taken awaye by death, yet the league ſhoulde ſtande good and abſolute: That the kinge of Englande ſhould be protector and defender of the league, to whome was lefte power to enter into it: And in caſe he woulde enter, there ſhoulde bee giuen to hym in the Realme of Naples, an eſtate of thirtie thouſande duckets of reuenue, and an other of tenne thouſande to the Cardinall of Yorke, and that to bee leauyed eyther in the ſame Realme or in ſome other parte of Italy: The Pope woulde not ſuffer the Duke of Ferrara to be comprehended within the confederation, notwithſtanding the french king and the Venetians did greatly ſolicite it: yea he procured that the confederation ſhould beare (though vnder generall words) that the confederates ſhoulde be bound to ayde him to recouer thoſe places, for the whiche the ſayde Duke was in contention with the Churche: Touching the Florentins, there was no doubt that they were not effectually comprehended in the confederation, for that the Pope made his reckoning not onely to ſerue his turne with their men at armes and their forces, but alſo to reduce them concurrant with him, yea euen to make thē ſuſteine the greateſt burden of the exſpences of the warre: But, not to hinder the traffike and entercourſe which that nation had with the ſubiectes of themprour, as alſo not to put in daunger their Marchantes and factors, they were not named vnder the tytle of confederates: Onely it was ſet downe that they ſhould enioy all the exemptions, priuileages, and benefites of the confederation, as if they had bene expreſly comprehended, the Pope aſſuring for them that they ſhould be in no ſort agaynſt the league: There was no prouiſion nor nomination of the Capteine generall of this armie and warre, for that by the ſhortneſſe of the tyme they had no leaſure to bring into counſell and election vppon whoſe ſhoulders they ſhoulde laye ſo great a burden, both for the authoritie and qualitie of the man, and the confidence that euery one had in him: Neither was it eaſie to finde out ſuche a man, in whoſe perſon were concurrant ſo worthy conditions.

The League beeing thus contracted, the Frenche king who had not as yet altogether withdrawne his minde from the practiſes whiche he enterteined with the Viceroy of Naples, both deferred to ratifie it, and to beginne to make to marche his companies of men at armes, and alſo to ſende the fortie thouſande ducketts for the firſt moneth, vntill the ratification of the Pope and the Venetians were accompliſhed: And albeit ſuche an intermiſſion was not a litle troubleſome to them, yet being preſſed by their neceſſities to purſue their purpoſe, they diſpatched the ratification, and entred immediatly to giue beginning to the warre vnder the tytle that they would reskew the Caſtell of Millan: In which action the Pope, who had before ſent to Plaiſanca, Guido Rangon generall of the Church armie with his companies of men at armes, and a ſtrength of fiue thouſande footemen: ſent thither of new with other regimentes of footmen and the men at armes of Florence, Vitello Vitelli their Capteine and gouernour, together with Iohn de Medicis commaunder ouer the Italian infanterie: He created Frauncis Guicciardin at that tyme preſident of Romagnia, his lieftenant generall ouer the armie and ouer the whole iuriſdiction, induing him with moſt ample and almoſte abſolute power: The Venetians on their ſide encreaſed their armie which remayned at Chiara in the contrey of Breſſia, ouer the whiche was conſtituted capteine generall the duke of Vrbin, and for their treaſorer was appoynted Peter Pezero: Both the one & other armie had one direction, which was to endomage the imperialls, and to inuade them without deferring or ſuffring for any reſpect. In this meane while was aryued at Millan Don Hugo de Moncado, who albeit the league was ſtill kept from the knowledge of the Viceroy and him, yet diſtruſting by the kings aunſwers, that matters could not be reduced to the contentment of themprour, he had followed his way into Italy: and there carying with him into the Caſtell of Millan the pronotorie Carraccioll, he labored to aſſure the Duke of the facilitie and clemency of themprour, ſeeking to perſwade him to referre him ſelfe to his will: But the Duke made aunſwere, that in regarde of the iniuries which themprours Capteines had done to him, he was driuen to haue recourſe to the Pope and Venetians, without whoſe priuity and participation he could not diſpoſe of himſelfe: Don Hugo put him in hope that themprours intention was, that the crimes that were charged agaynſt him, ſhould be ſummarily viewed & examined by the pronotorie Caracciolli, who was a prelat of great confidence with the Duke: A courſe which he ſayde themprour tooke, rather to reſtore vnto him his eſtate with a better conſeruation of themprours reputation, then for any other occaſion: and yet he would not conſent that the ſiege might be firſt leauied, nor promiſe to innouate any thing according to the inſtance of the Duke. It was beleued that the authority and power which themprour gaue to Don Hugo was very ample & large, the ſame extẽding not only to enhable him to contract with the Pope according to the reintegratiõ of the duke of Millan, but alſo his cõmiſſion bare to compound with the duke alone, taking aſſurãce that being reſtored to his eſtate, he ſhould do no act preiudicial to thaffaires of themprour: Only this cõmiſſion was vnder limitation according to the trayne of times and neceſſity, So that Don Hugo conſidering into what extremity was reduced the caſtel, & that to compound with the duke profited nothing the affaires of themprour, but inſtrumentally or as a meane to eſtabliſh thaccord with the Pope and the Venetians, iudged it would be a matter vnprofitable to contract with him alone. Afterwards Don Hugo & the Pronotory cauſed to be brought from Monce, Moron, kept priſoner within the rocke of Trezzo, the ſame being for this cauſe that the Pronotorie who was to be iudge of the cauſe, ſhould take his information of him. Immediatlye after this, Don Hugo tooke his way from Millan to Rome, hauing firſt written to Venice, that they ſhould ſend ſufficient authority to their Embaſſador at Rome to negociate & debate of thaffayres occurrant: Beeing come to Rome he was brought to the preſence of the Pope together with the duke of Seſſo, to whom he declared with braue words, that it was in his election to accept eyther peace or warre, for that themprour, notwithſtanding by his good intention & inclination was not eſtranged from peace, yet he was neuertheles both in courage & in preparation ready diſpoſed both to the one and to the other. Wherevnto the Pope aunſwered generally, and complayned that what for the harde tearmes which the Emprours officers had vſed to him, and the very late arriuall of Don Hugo, he ſtoode now bound to others, where afore he was in his owne liberty: They returned to him the next day, ſignifying that themprours intention was to leaue wholly the duchy of Millan to Frauncis Sforce, ſo farreforth as the caſtell might be conſigned into the hands of the pronotorie Carracciolli, vntill for themprours honor there were examination made of the cauſe, though not to the bottome & ſubſtance, yet in apparance & by ceremony: That alſo themprours intention was to put ende to the quarrels betwene him and the Venetians by ſome reaſonable and comely meane, & to withdrawe his army out of Lombardy with the payes which had bene treated vpon at other times: And that in counterchange and recompence of all theſe, he demaunded no other thing of the Pope, then that he would forbeare to interpoſe betwene him & the French king. To theſe propoſitions the Pope aunſwered, that he doubted not that all the world had not taken ſufficient knowledge, how carefully he had alwayes deſired to kepe amitie with themprour, & that he had neuer demaunded greater things, then thoſe which themprour himſelfe did willingly offer him: Matters which could not be more to his contentment, for that his deſire was always greater to the cõmon benefite, then for his profite: That ſtill he continued in the ſame inclination, though there were giuen to him many occaſions to fal from it: Neuertheles that he heard now with a greater griefe of mind the matters which were offred to him by accord, then he had heard them at ſuche time as they were denyed him, An alteration which had not proceeded of his fault, but of the ſlownes of themprour deferring ſo long to reſolue: By which occasion, ioyning also that there was neuer brought vnto him any hope of the assurance of the common affayres of Italy, and seeing in the meane while the perill of the castell of Millan, he had bene constrayned for his owne safety, and for the common interest of others, to ioyne confederation with the french king, without whom he had no power to determine any thing. This was the constancy of the Pope verified with many other replications & circumstãces tending to assure his faith giuen: Agaynst the whiche after Don Hugo had in vayne obiected his reasons and inducements, he departed from Rome ill contented with the Popes aunswers: By whose example also all the imperiall capteines fell to murmure, for that the hopes of peace being cut of, they saw things tende to a manyfest warre, which both for the might and power of the league, and for their owne extremities and disorders, they supposed it would be very heauy for them to susteine.

About this time the Popes lieftenant surprised a packet of letters written by Ant. de Leua to the Duke of Sessa, by the whiche he gaue him aduertisement of the yll disposition of the people of Millan, and touching their affayres, there was no other remedie then the grace of God: He also intercepted letters written from him & the Marquis of Guast, to Don Hugo after he was gone from Millan, wherein making earnest solicitation to aduañce the peace, they insisted greatly to know forthwith what would ensue of the negociation, not fayling with words of great compassion to recommend vnto them the daunger wherin their liues stoode, and the perillous condition of themprours army: But there was not so great assurance in the mindes of those that were to dispose of the forces of the league, as the feare was great ioyned with incertentie of resolution amongst the imperiall capteines: for the Duke of Vrbin, who for the title he had of Capteine generall ouer the Venetian army, & also for his singularity of estate, authoritie, and reputation aboue the others, managed in effect the absolute gouernment of the whole army: he esteemed happly more then was conuenient, of the vallour of the Spaniards & launceknightes, and doubted no lesse of the vertue of the Italian souldiors: In which distrust he had resolued in hys mind, not to passe the riuer of Adda, if he had not at the least in the army a strength of 5000. Svvizzers: And fearing also least the Imperials would passe Adda and set vpon him, if only with the companies of the Venetians he passed the ryuer of Oglio, he made instance that the army of the Church which was then at Plaisanca, passing ouer the ryuer of Pavv beneath Cremona, might marche to ioyne with the Venetiãs, and so in one mayne strength to drawe neare the riuer of Adda, and vpon the shores of the same in some place of strength, to attende the comming of the Svvizzers: who contrary to their custome and nature were slowe to discende, beeing lette with many impedimentes & difficulties, the rather for that the charge to leauy them was vndiscretly committed to capteine Mus and the Bishop of Loda: of whom as the Bishop being a man full of humors of vanitie & lightnes, was not apte to manage that busines as apperteined, So capteine Mus according to his couetousnesse sought chiefly to possesse him selfe of one parte of the money that was sent to distribute in impreſt to the souldiours: And for other respectes neyther of them bothe caryed suche authoritie with that nation, as vnder so small a quantitie of money, to make leauy of so great a number, and that with that speede which the necessitie of the seruice required: Besides, thexpedition was corrupted by the imperfection of the parties, the one beeing caryed with ambition, and the other with vanitie, and they both more disposed to respect their interests particular, then to obserue the generall cause of the seruice: Agaynst this action also the French Agents that lay in the con-

trey of Svvizzerlande oppoſed ſome difficulties, for that they neyther knewe what will and inclination their king bare to it, nor whether it was contrarie or conformable to his intentions: for not by omiſſion or forgetfulnes, but willingly and expreſly they had fayled to aduertiſe the king of that expedition, following happly thoſe counſels which oftentimes ſeeming very diſcrete and well raunged, are found in the ende very ſuttle and fallible: for Albert Pio the kings Embaſſador reſident with the Pope, had ſignified to them, that if the king vnderſtood before the concluſion of the league, of the direction giuen to make a leauy of Svvizzers, there would be daunger leaſt he would defer longer to conclude, for that it ſemed to him euery way that the warre againſt thempror had bin begon without him, by the Pope & Venetians. Thus for the long tarying of the Svvizzers, was forſlowed one of the moſt principall and moſt mighty fundations layd for the reskew of the caſtell of Millan, notwithſtanding both the Biſhop and capteine Mus gaue daylye moſte certaine and preſent hopes that they would be ſpeedely at the campe. But when the capteines Imperiall ſawe that the warre was prepared openly, and that their former doubtes & ſecret coniectures were now reſolued & turned to manyfeſt aſſurance, they determined, leaſt at one time they were trauelled with enemies both within & without, to ſtande aſſured of the people of Millan, who riſing euery daye more inſolent, did not onely denie to anſwere all thoſe prouiſions that were demaunded vpon them, but alſo accompanying their diſobedience with fiercenes & blood, they fayled not to make ſlaughter of the ſouldiors in the city, when they found any ſingle or ſeperat from his felowes: So that the capteines Imperiall taking occaſion of the diſorders that were done in the towne, required that certaine heades & chieftayns of the populars ſhould depart the city of Millan: which demaund could not ſo eaſily be diſgeſted, but that the cõmons beginning to draw into tumult, there was a new ſlaughter made of certen Spaniards going alone in the ſtretes: And to meete with that miſchiefe before it proceeded to greater degrees, Anth. de Leua & the Marquis of Guaſt, after they had ſecretly drawne neare to Millan their forces, & denoũced to the people that they were now no more bound to thaccord made certen daies before, they gaue the alarme to the tumult by killing in their preſence foure of the cõmons who would do no reuerence to thẽ in paſſing by them: and then iſſuing out of their lodginges with a trowpe of launceknights, they gaue occaſion to the cõmons to ſound their alarme: But as in al popular cõmotions there are many errors, & the people for the moſt part more rude and obſtinat, then skilful to order a fight, runne in their ignorance to their owne deſtructions with cries & ſhowtes: So notwithſtãding in their firſt fury they had forced the olde court & the groſſe towre of the Biſhoprike garded by many Italians: yet partly by their own diſorders, & partly by the importunity of certen ſhot beſtowed in places of aduantage which the Spaniards had furniſhed before, many of them fighting in their wilfull humor of liberty, founde wretchedly at one inſtant the priuation of their life & liberty together: In ſo much as their diſorders & feare encreaſing by equall degrees, and their lateſt perills haſtning with a deſperate ſwiftnes, for that the launceknights were vpon poynt to put fire into the next houſes, beſides the calling into the citie the regimentes of Spaniards attending the token or ſigne to be giuen by the capteins: the commons in their laſt feares offred to parley with thimperials, wherin they agreed that their leaders & many other perſons of ſuſpect, ſhould go out of Millan, and that the popular multitude ſhould depoſe armes & ſubmit themſelues to the obedience of the capteins imperiall: who for their partes receiuing the conditions, made haſt to reappeaſe & ceaſe the tumult before the regiments of Spaniſh footmen entred within the towne, fearing leaſt both partes being in armes, it would be hard for them to gouerne or bridle the fury of warre, or to reſtraine the ſouldiors in that readynes, from ſacking the towne: A matter which they doubted, & yet were loth it ſhould happen, aſwell for feare leaſt the army being made riche with ſo great a booty, would not grow into corruption and great diminucion, as alſo conſidering what want of money and other difficulties they might ſuffer in the warre, they iudged it a pollicy more profitable to preſerue the citie in which they might long nouriſh the army, then in one day & in one fury, to conſume the force and liuely ſpirite which it had. Thus it ſeemed that the affayres of the league proceded not with that proſperity which men in their imaginations had promiſed in the beginning, bothe for that there were many difficulties in the diſcending of the Svvizzers, and alſo the fundation of the people of Millan was ſhaked and quayled: But as there is no eſtate or condition of worldly things, which is not full of vncertenties and caſualties, ſo by a new accident that hapned, both their reputation was eftſones reſtored, & the facilitie of victory made both more great and more apparant, then before. In ſo great a diſcontentment or rather a laſt diſpaire of the duchy of Millan, there was entertained for certayne monethes by the working of many perſons, ſundrye intelligences and practiſes of innouation, almoſt with all the townes of the Duchy: Amongſt the which, one ſucceded to good effect in the citie of Loda, being managed by the Duke of Vrbin and treaſorer of Venice, with Lodovvike Viſtarin a gentleman of the ſame Citie: who what with the impreſſion that he had bin an auncient ſeruant to the houſe of the Sforceis, and with the inducement of compaſſion ouer the calamities of his contrey, being no leſſe rudely delte withall by Fabricio Maramo Colonell of xv. hundred footmē Neapolitains, then Millan was by the Spaniards & launceknights, determined to help into the towne the Venetian regiments notwithſtanding he was in the paye of thimperials: But he aſſured and the Duke confirmed it, that he had before, both demaunded and obteyned his leaue to go away, taking his excuſe vpon this reaſon, that he was no longer hable to enterteine without money the bandes of ſouldiors which were committed to his charge. This was the order & direction of the enterpriſe: That vpō the xxiiij. day of Iune by night, Malateſta Baillon with three or foure thouſand footmen of the Venetians, ſhould about the vaniſhing of the day, approche the walls of the citie on that ſide where was a certayne baſtillion, to thend to be receiued in by Viſtarin: who a litle before, with two others that accompanied him, being come neare the baſtilliō which ſix ſouldiors garded, as it were to ſearch, & being folowed with ſome others of his faction whō he had hidden within certen houſes thereby, he leaped vpon the baſtillion, and began to fight with the ſouldiors that garded it: for albeit he had pronounced before the watchword according to the cuſtome of warre, yet the ſouldiors being doubtfull of treaſon, were come to handſtrokes with him, when others running by the brute of thalarme that was made, the baſtillion was in great daunger to be recouered by the fury of the fray wherin Lodovvike was hurt: But as he was almoſt reduced to the laſt neceſſitie, Malateſta aryued with his bands, & skaling the baſtillion by the helpe of their ladders, they entred the towne which they had ſo long deſired: by which entry both by force & intelligēce, the alarme running through the towne, Fabricio Maramo prepared himſelf to go to the walls with a great part of his ſouldiors, but cōming to late to the reskew of that which was already loſt, he was conſtrayned for his ſafety to retyre into the Caſtell. Thus the towne was ſurpriſed, and the moſt part of the ſouldiors that were lodged in ſundry places of the city, were ſtripped & made priſoners. A litle after the Duke of Vrbin arriued with one part of his regiments, who to make his approches the better, was marched the day before, to lodge at Oragno vpon the riuer of Oglio, which he passed the same night by the fauor of a bridge made in hast, & vnderstanding of the entry of Malatesta within Loda, he passed also vpon a like bridge, the riuer of Adda: and after he had bestowed a greater garrison within Loda for the better defense in case succours should be ministred by the meane of the castell, he returned immediatly to the army: But assone as the knowledge of this accident was come to Millan, the Marquis of Guast with certeine troupes of light horsemen, & a strength of three thousand spanish footmen amongst whom was Iohn of Vrbin, made with great celerity to Loda, & hauing without impediment, bestowed his bands of footmen within the castel, by the benefit of whose scituaciō, he might enter with sauety by a way naturally couered & defended, without daunger to be annoied with shot cōming from the flanks of the city: he made a sodaine irruptiō into the city by the castel, & got to the market place, where the forces that Malatesta brought with him and the succours that came afterwards, had made their strength or place of defence, & put diuerse houses vnder gard, together with the streete that led to the gate by the which they were entred, to thend they might be hable to retire and issue with sauety, if it hapned that thimperialls became maisters: The fight was valliantly performed for the beginning, which vallor if it had continued in the Spaniards, the iudgement ran that they had recouered Loda, for that the Venetian souldiors declined no lesse to cowardise thē to wearines: But as in surprises, when thenterprise commeth to an execution, distrust is for the most part greater then confidence, & feare farre aboue resolucion & assurance, so the Marquis of Guast, either for that he found a greater number of souldiors then he had esteemed in the beginning, or for that he had a conceit that the Venetian army was at hand, retired presently from the fight, & returned to Millan after he had furnished the castell with a garrison: Immediatly after this skirmish the Duke of Vrbin came againe to Loda, making no litle glory that without staying, he had passed his army ouer two great riuers by the benefit of bridges: and the better to assure the victory, he resupplied the regiments that were within Loda, to thend to make the better resistance in case thennemies would returne to recouer the thing frō the which they had bene repulsed: he caused artilleries to be planted roūd about the castel, the better to assure the seege & cut of the reskewes that might be sent, neuertheles the defendāts both for their small exspectacion of succors, the meanes of their releese being cut of, and lesse hability to defend the castell which for his small circuit was not capable of many men, left the castell abandoned the night following, being receiued by certeine horsemen sent frō Millan for that purpose. This cōquest of Loda hapned very cōueniently & gaue great reputacion to the affaires of the league, both for that the city was well fortified, and bare a name to be one of those which it was thought thimperialls would defend to the last: from Loda the victors might march without impedimēt, euen to the gates of Millan & Pauia, for that those cities bearing a scituacion in triangle, are twenty miles one from an other, for which cause the imperialls dispatched with great expedicion xv. hundred launceknightes to Pauia: Moreouer the league had won the passage of Adda, which before was supposed to be very troublesome, all impediments were remoued that might hinder all the armies of the league to ioyne together, all meanes taken away to succour Cremona, in which city lay in garrison, Capteine Couradin with xv. hundred launceknights, and the enemies depriued of place apt to trauel and vex the state of the Church & the Venetians: Insomuch as the common opinion of the whole army was, that if they aduaunced with speede according to their fortune, the imperials could not but be reduced into great perplexity & cõfusiõ: But the Duke of Vrbin was of an other iudgemẽt, holding it an enterprise of great peril to draw nere to Millan without a great strẽgth of Svvizzers: & yet for that he would not discouer to others that which he reteined in his secret opiniõ, he was cõtented to seme to do the thing he intẽded not, & in that resoluciõ marching slowly, & reappoſing alwaies one day at the least in euery lodging, he determined neuertheles to giue time to the discẽding of the Svvizzers, hoping that within few daies they would be with the army: yea he had so great exspectaciõ of their cõming (notwithstãding by thexperiẽce of their long tract & deferring, there was great dout) & reappoſed such assurãce in their vallour, that onles they came, he contẽned al mocions & inducemẽts to action & enterprise what reason or property of likelyhoode soeuer they bare. After the conqueſt of Loda, the church army marching to S. Martin within iij. miles of Loda, it was resolued there by cõmon councel, that after the ij. armies, that is to say thEcclesiastikes & the Venetiãs had soiorned there one day, they should draw the next day towards old Loda, about v. miles frõ Loda, where it is writtẽ that Pompey builded Loda, & so taking the high way that leadeth to Pauia, they pretẽded vnder that marching, to threatẽ Millã & Pauia, a deuise to hold thimperials in greater feare & suspẽce: the same day the armies Ecclesiastike & Venetian ioined together in the field as they marched, being almoſt equal in nũbers of footmen & cõteining in all, few lesse thẽ xx. thousand: only the Venetians exceded thẽ in nũbers of men at armes & light horsemen, & in prouisions of artilleries, municions with al other necessary habillemẽts of war: The day following they reappoſed at old Loda, where the Capteines taking councell for the dispoſing of their marching, determined that hereafter the armies shoulde keepe along the high way, the better to auoide the incõmodities of the contry, which out of the high way is full of ditches & risings & other impediments to marching: One reason also of following that way, was the facility to giue succours to the castell by the oportunity of the way that leadeth towardes the gate of Coma, rather then by the way of Landriano which turneth to the gate of Verceill by the which was greater difficultie to lead the army in regard of the quality & dispoſicion of the contry: & lastly, by the benefit of that way, there was a more safe recourse & traffike for vittels to follow the armies, & more easy for the discẽding & receiuing of the Svvizzers who were alwaies to secõd thẽ & back thẽ: with this resolucion the army being gathered into one maine strẽgth, ariued the last day of Iune at Marignan: where being drawn into coũcel touching the further directiõ & dispoſing of the warre, the Duke of Vrbin perswaded vehemẽtly to abide the cõming of the Svvizzers, of whose discending he had happily some more assured informacion thẽ before: he considered that without such a strength and firme backe, it could not but be daungerous to draw neare Millan with regiments of souldiours vntrained and leauied in hast, notwithstanding there was within the towne of enemies but a very slender strength of horsemen, three thousand launceknights, and but fiue or six thowsand Spaniards footmen, to whose small numbers of bodies were adioyned many discommodities & wants, as lack of money which maketh the souldiors vnwilling, & very litle prouision of vittells which weakeneth him for the fight, with other impediments much hindring the action exspected in souldiours: But the other capteines were not of his opiniõ, for that they iudged that marching in order, and alwaies vsing good skoutes to discouer their camping places for the day before, there could be no daũger to approch Millan, the rather for that the parts of the contry were euery way so strong and defensible, that without difficulties the army might alwaies incampe in places of surety: They reasoned that it was not likely, that thim-

perials would issue out into the field to inuade thē, for that leuing necessarily the castell besieged, & by that occasiō, being not to lead their whole forces out of the town for suspicion of the cōmons of Millan, their nūbers would be too few to set vpon so great an army, which albeit was dressed & cōpounded of bodies new & raw, yet was gouerned by the best experienced Capteines in Italy, hauing withal dispersed in seueral bands of the army, many troupes of footmen well disciplined & of good traineur in warre: Besides, albeit they coulde not make their approaches to Millan without daunger, yet to draw neare it, was not without hope to carie the victory, for that the subburbes of Millan being not fortified, but by negligence left open in many parts, it semed not credible that thimperials would stand to defend so great a circuit of place: Of this were discerned already many manifest tokens, for that thimperials vsing smal care to reenforce their subburbes, had turned all their industry to the fortificacion of the towne: Insomuch that if they once abandoned the subburbs & gaue place to the army to lodge there, it could not be reasonable that the towne could long hold out: Not so much for the wants of vittells & money which afflicted their whole army, as for that Prospero Colonno with the other Capteines of knowledge and iudgement, had bene alwaies of this opinion, that with great difficulty could the towne of Millan be kept against an army that was Lord of the subburbes, both for that the Citie is verie weake in walls (the houses of certeine particulars serving for want of wall in many places) as for that the subburbes haue a great aduantage & cōmaundement ouer the City: To these reasons lastly was added, that they had the castel at deuocion. But not only the estate of this direction or deliberaciō, but also the absolute resolucion of the whole body of the warre, depended chiefly vpon the Duke of Vrbin, for that albeit he was but only Capteine ouer the Venetians, yet the Ecclesiastikes to auoyde contencions, had determined to referre themselues ouer to him as to the Capteine generall of the army. Neuertheles notwithstanding these reasons had no power to stirre him to aduance & passe further, nor the vehement instances, which (by order frō their superiors) the Popes Lieutenant & the Treasorer of Venice vrged, with whom did concurre many other Capteines: yet in the end, he considered that if he made any long abode in that place without a better certeintie of the comming of the Swvizzers, it would not be but to his great infamy & challenge: therfore after the army had rested two daies at Marignan, he remoued it the third of Iune to S. Donato within fiue miles of Millan, from whence he determined to passe further, though more to satisfie the desire and iudgement of others, then of his proper inclinacion or councells, and he reserued to him selfe this order and intencion, to put alwayes one day betwene the remouing of the campe, to thend to giue time to the comming of the Swvizzers, of whom a thowsand discending by Bergama, were ariued at tharmie, and for the others (according to their custome) they sent euerie day messengers to enterteine the exspectacion of their comming, and to signifie that their absence should not be long.

In this sort the fift of Iuly, the army passing frō S. Martin which is out of the high way on the right hand, marched on to incampe within iij. miles of Millan, in a place of good strength and surety: where the same day was executed some light action of warre against certeine harquebuziers of the Spanyards who were fortified within a house; & the day following, the campe being at the same place executed some other small exploit of warre, & immediatly after ariued at the campe fiue hundred Swvizzers led by Cæsar Gaulois: heare the Capteines fell againe to councell of the maner of passing further, & albeit the first intention was to march directly to succor the castell of Millan, whose trenches that were cut round about without were not so strong, but that there was great hope to win them: yet, by the authoritie of the Duke of Vrbin whose aduise was at last approued of all the others, not altogether for the sufficiency & soundnes, but partly for the priuiledge and prerogatiue of his place, which caried him to expresse his opinion in councel, & either not to attend the answers of others, or at least in their answers the Capteines durst not impugne his reasons: The armies tooke the way that leadeth directly to the subburbes of Millan, and he alleaged, that for the making plaine of the waies which of necessity must be done by reason of the naturall impediments of the contry, it would be a labor long & not without daunger of some disorder, to lead the armie out of the high way to the reskew of the castell: Both for that they were to show themselues too neare in flanke to thenemies, & also it was to giue thenemy meane to make a greater resistãce, because they would raũge all their forces on that side towards the castell: where otherwise they should be constrained to remeine deuided for the better resistãce of thenemies, & not to abandon the gard of the castell, & drawing to the gate of Rome, it would be alwaies in the power of the Capteines of the league, to turne easilie on what side they would according as occasions called thẽ: According to this councell it was resolued, that the seuenth day the campe should lodge at Vnfaletto and Pillastrello which are crokings or turnings alõg the high way within shot of cannon, & there to take that course which occasion and proceeding of thenemies should minister: Many were of opinion that thenemies whẽ they should see the campe so neare them, would not (specially in the night) embrase the hazard to defend the subburbs, both for that the ditches were filled vp in many places, & the rampartes cast downe & made plaine & in some places so open & discouered, that very hardly could they preserue their bodies which they brought to defend the place: But the night before the day wherein the army was to aduance, the Duke of Burbon, being ariued a few daies before at Genes with six gallies & bringing bills of exchaunge for an hundred thowsand duckats, entred into Millan accompanied with viij. hundred spanish footmen whom he had brought with him: his comming in such a time of perill, & after so long exspectacion for succour, gaue a new corage to the souldiors that so desperatly lay exposed to the daunger of their liues: By his cõming, being vehemently solicited by the Marquis of Guast & Anth. de Leua, may be easily cõprehended the affected negligence or rather cold disposicion, which the french king had to the warre: for, where the Pope in the beginning when he interteined into his pay Andrea Dore, had consulted with him, with what forces & preparacions thenterprise of Genes should be executed: he tolde him it would be an action very easie so farre forth as it were put to execucion at the time that the warre should be begon in the Duchy of Millan, & that to his eight gallies should be ioyned the kinges gallies riding in the port of Marceilles, or at least that they might be emploied to stop the comming of the gallies of the Duke of Burbon: wherein his reason was, that remeining in that sort Lord of the sea with his eight gallies, the City of Genes, hauing the sea shut vp, could not menteine it selfe long, both for the restraint of marchandise, for thimpediment of exercises, and for the cutting of accesse of vittels: And notwithstanding the frenche king protested to stop the comming of the Duke of Burbon, yet it was a promise vaine and ill assured, both for that his vessells were not in order, which hindred thexpedicion, and also the Capteines of his gallies, partely for want of money and partelie through negligence, and happilie of purpose, were very slowly furnished to accomplishe the seruice: The same fault or negligence was also vsed in aduauncing the men at armes appointed to his porcion.

But the ariuall of the Duke of Burbon being vnknowen to the army of the league

that

that was without, the resolucion that had bene set downe to aduaunce forward, was peruerted by the Duke of Vrbin, & that either by some aduertisements which he had receiued from Millan, or by the reapport of some spie: for, leauing the distrust which he had reteined till that day, he assured the Popes Lieutenant in the presence of the Venetian treasorer, That he made an assured reckoning that the day following would be a day of prosperity & happy successe: seing saith he, if thenemies issue out to fight (which he could not beleue) they could not but be ouerthrowen & broken: & in case they did not issue out, he was certeine that either they would abandon Millan the same day & retire into Pauia, or at least abandoning the defense of the subburbs, they would gather themselues into the Citie, which they had no meane to defende after the subburbes were lost: insomuch as he warranted that any of these three accidents was sufficient to make them remeine victors & maisters of the warre: Therfore ioyning diligence to the oportunity that offred, the day following being the seuenth of Iuly, they left the lodging appointed for the day before hoping to win the subburbes without resistance, wherein rising in a glorie to surprise them by assault in marching, certeine troupes of their souldiours ran in their insolency, to giue a charge vpon the gates of Rome & Tosa: where, notwithstanding the aduertisements they had the day before & redoubled the same day, that the Spaniards would breake vp and go away, yet they found vaine those relacions, for that the Spaniards affronted them & made head orderly against their disordered charge, not that they ment to make a cõtinuall resistance, but like men of warre showing their faces to thenemies, to retire in order to Millan, rather then to leaue to thenemy that aduantage to say that they found the subburbes cowardlie abandoned: Moreouer by making that resistance, they did not only preserue the reputaciõ of their army reteining still in their power to make their retraite alwaies into the City without disorder: But also in the action might happen some occasion to take hart and perseuere in the defense of the subburbes, a matter of right great importance: for that, to make their retire into the towne, was an election to be followed rather by necessity then of will, seing that besides many other reasons if they should restraine themselues into a circuit of place so strait & litle, it would be so much the more easie to the armies of the league to stoppe the entrie of vittels into Millan, without which kinde of releefe they could not long hold out, for that the prouisiõs of new corne were not yet come in. Thus certeine bands of harquebuziers being presented to the defense of the two gates, where also the other Spanyardes ceassed not to labor & fortifie cõtinually. The Duke whose opinion was beguiled in that resistance, caused three cannons of battery to be drawne within a crosbow shot of Rome gate, and hauing planted them brauely, he began to execute vpon the gate: In whiche batterie he laboured to leauie or dismount a falconnet, and so made discend certeine bands of souldiours to giue thassault, and gaue direction to bring on the skaling ladders: But altering immediatlie his purpose to giue thassault, the matter was turned into light skirmishes of shotte betwene those that were without, and the defendantes that were vppon the rampartes, who fighting at great aduauntage, slewe about fortie of the confederates, and hurte many: In this meane while the gate had felt many blowes of the cannon, though with verie small dammage, for that the cannons being planted farre of, the bullet lost muche of his force by the farre distaunce, of the place, insomuche as no benefite rising by the execucions of the cannons, and no aduauntage gotten by the skirmishe of the shotte, the Duke considering it woulde be verie late to lodge the campe, woulde not suffer the assault to be performed, but gaue order to bestow and forrie the campe in that place, which was not done not without confusion, for the shortnes of the time: There was left a reasonable gard for the three Cannons, and the residue of the campe were bestowed almost full vpon the right hand of the way, euerie one hauing great hope of the victorie, both for that by many aduertisementes and by the relacion of prisoners taken, they had certeine informacion that thimperialls trussed baggage & prepared rather to depart, then to defende the place: To this hope was ioyned also this good happe, that in good time the same euening, there came to the campe sixe Cannons of the Venetians, a releefe muche helping on the comfort and hope of the victorie:

" But as in worldly things there is no assurance till the end be knowen, and all mortall
" men and their actions are put vnder an estate of incerteinty and errour according to " their constitucion being full of frailtie and imperfection, so, not long after, that hope and the glorious imaginacion of the victorie, did not onely chaunge, but also the whole estate of the affaires varied & altered, for that certeine bands of spanish footmen issuing out almost vppon the beginning of the night to set vppon thartillerie, were repulsed & beaten in by the footemen that had the gard of the same notwithstanding the Duke of Vrbin said that they were driuen in in disorder: Insomuch as after two or three howers of the night were past, he determined without councell to dislodge and retyre the armie, taking his reason for so sodaine alteracion vppon the matter of his hope which he sawe abused, for that he founde resistance at the gates, and defendantes vpon the rampartes of the suburbes, and also the feare he had conceiued before of the infanterie of thenemies, was in this rashnes of some consideracion with him: And proceeding in his sodaine passion to execute the matter he had resolued without councell or consent of others, he gaue order to the artilleries and municions to march away, and commaunded the regiments of the Venetians, to prepare to depart: Lastly he sent to the Treasorer and Lieutenant, and other Capteines of the Church, to signifie more in speede then with reason, the resolucion he had set downe, perswading them to do the like without tract or deferring: A matter of such astonishment and confusion to either of them, both for the sodainnes being against all order and course of warre, and for the newnes seeming to containe some misterie for that it was cõtrarie to thexspectacion of all men, they went to him to vnderstand more particularlie his inductions and reasons of this alteracion, and to labour with words and arguments to bring him backe againe to his former resolucion: But he insisted stil vpon the remouing of the campe, wherein with speeches cleare & resolute, he complained manifestly that contrarie to his aduise & only to satisfie the humors of others, he was cõpelled to approch so nere Millan: which since it was an offence, he told them it belonged to wisdom and good councell rather to correct the fault in time, then by suffring, to let it run out of all cure and remedie: he knew that both for that the armie the day before for the shortnes of the time, had bene lodged confusedlie, and for the cowardise of thItalian footemen in the same euening that the artilleries were assailed, if the campe lay there till the day following, it woulde not onely be the destruction of thenterprise, but the ruine of all the state of the league: for, he stoode so assured that they would be defeated and broken, that he held it not reasonable to stande to dispute with any man, seeing that the imperialls the same euening had planted a Sacre betwene Rome gate and the gate of Foso which executed in flanke vpon that quarter where lay the Venetian footemen: That the same night they would go on in that oportunity to plant other peeces of artilleries and the day following would sound thalarome, for which cause the armie being constrained to fall into order, should be so annoyed in the flanke by the artilleries, that they would be driuen into disorder, and so vpon the sallie of th Imperialls out of the towne, the whole campe full of passions of feare and disorder would be easily ouerthrowen: That he was sory that both by the shortnes of the tyme, and th impediments of the municions and artilleries which were farre greater in his armie then in the armie Ecclesiastike, he was compelled to leauy and breake vp affore he had communicated with them: But he tolde them that in elections done by necessitie, it was a labor superfluous to alleage excuses: That he had aduentured a greater matter, then euer had done any Capteine, offring as it were in marching to giue an assalt to Myllan, And that now he would take vp and vse discression, and dispaire nothing of the victorie of the enterprise for the retraite: That Prospero Colonno, happly with lesse iust causes, leauied his seege from before Parma when it was halfe taken, & yet not long after he gloriously conquered the whole Duchie of Myllan: he aduised them for end to beleue his councell and followe it, and not in other weenings to deferre their departings, since he eftsoones assured them with a newe vehemencie of words, that if they stayed there til the rising of the Sunne, their destruction was more certeine then the remedie, and therefore to thend to flee from the storme before the clowde brake, he willed them alwayes with one constancie to returne to their lodgings at Saint Martyn: These speeches borne vp more by thauthoritie of the man then by any reason they brought, were not a litle greeuous to the residue of the Capteines that happly bare an other corage to the warre, and reasonably sawe further into the facilitie of the victorie, and therefore were of a contrary opinion: Amongest whom the Popes Lieuetenant assaying by words and reasons to make him constant whom feare caried into so many variacions, made him aunswer, That albeit there was none amongest them who thought not that his resolucions were made with great forecast and wisedom, yet the Capteines in their experience & tradicions of warre, saw no manifest cause to constraine him to breake vp so suddeinly: he reduced to his memorie the dispayre of the Duke of Myllan, beholding in his calamitie the going away of such as he hoped would haue succoured him, and dispayring to be reskewed, what could stay him from doing the thinge from the which the hope to be succored by them, had holden him? howe much it would discourage the Pope and Venetians, and what impressions are wont to stirre and moue in the mindes of Princes when enterprises begin to succeede il, especially in their beginnings: Lastly that if the place of their campe, and the ill disposing of it, was the cause of so great a daunger as he pretended, it was easie without depriuing the armie of so great a reputacion, to remedie it both in bestowing it in some other place with better order, & also in remouing it with such aduauntage, that the fakers planted by the enemies should haue no meane to annoye them: But the Duke confirmed of newe his first conclusion, and added with vehement termes that according to the reason of warre, they could not take any other deliberacion: And lastly he knitte vp that he would take vpon him selfe all the faule, and to lay him selfe downe to all opinions and imputacions that the world would heape against him for being the Author of the action: And so aduising them not to consume vainely in wordes and reasons, the time which they should employ for their sauetie, he told them that if they were not dislodged before the ende of the night, it would be too late to apply the medicine when the ill was past cure. With this conclusion he dismissed euery one, who returning to their seuerall quarters, euery one prepared to dislodge and make to depart their charge and companies: Amongest whom such bands as laye before, brake vp with such astonishment, that many going almost with demonstracion to be broken and deſeated, many bands of footemen and horſemen of the Venetians, disbanded them ſelues, ſome of them not looking behind them till they came to Loda: And the artilleries of the Venetians paſſed beyond Marignan, but being reuoked, they were ſtayed there: The reſidue of the bands but principally the arearegard marched away in order: And Iohn de Medicis, who with the footemen of the Church was in the laſt part of the army, would not ſtirre til it was high day, eſteeming it not agreeable to his honor, in place of the victorie ſo much hoped for, to cary away infamie and imputacion of fleing away by night: A matter which his experience induced him, that he had no neede to doe, becauſe he ſaw none of thImperialls yſſue out of their ramparts to charge vppon the tayle of the army: Onely when they within the towne ſaw by the benefit of the Sũne & clearnes of the day, how the campe was diſlodged in manner of a tumult, they ſtoode wondering at the going away of thoſe, whome if they had taried they could not but haue ſtande in feare of: And yet in the interpretacion of ſouldiers and martiall doings, they could not imagine the cauſe of ſo ſuddeine alteracion: The infamie of this retrayt was alſo augmented by this, that notwithſtanding the Duke had giuen order that the campe ſhould ſtay at S. Martyn, yet he ſent out a new direction without communicating it, that the campemaiſters of the Venetians ſhould leade their men to Marignan, wherein he feared that eyther the ennemies would yſſue out to aſſaile him in his lodging at S. Martyn, or at leaſt that the caſtell of Myllan, ſeeing to retyre the forces that were comen, to reskewe it, (A matter more then all other that terrifieth thoſe that are beſeeged) would ſue for compoſicion, and reſigne by that vile compulſion the holde they had kept ſo longe with their vallour: In which caſe becauſe he durſt not abide at S. Martyn he iudged it leſſe diſhonorable to retyre once for all, then to make two retraits in ſo litle tyme: And in that humor, he cauſed the artilleries, the baggage, & the foremeſt regiment of the Venetian army to hold on to Marignan without ſtaying at S. Martyn: of which alteracion when the Popes Lieuetenant demaunded the cauſe, the Duke aunſwered that touching their ſewertie he put no difference betweene the one and the other place, eſteming S. Martyn as tenable and defenſable againſt thennemies, as Marignan, But the cauſe why he marched further was, for that the bands of ſouldiers being made weary with the actions of the dayes before, might with good commoditie reappoſe and refreſhe them ſelues without receiuing any impediments or vexacions of thennemies: And as the Lieuetenant replyed touching the equall ſewertie of the one and other place, that if the campe retyred as farre as Marignan, the hope of ſuccours would be more deſperate to thoſe that were beſeeged in the caſtell of Myllan, then if the armies ſtayed at S. Martyn: So the Duke returned vppon him with wordes vehement that ſo long as he caried in his hands the ſtaffe of commaundement ouer the Venetians, he would not ſuffer any other to entermedle with his authoritie: In which obſtinacie both the one and other army with the great diſhonor and clamour of all the ſouldiers, went to encampe at Marignan, exclayming contrary to the ſaying of Cæſar, veni, vidi, fugi, we are come, we haue ſeene, and we are ronne away: The Duke determined to remeyne at Marignan, vntill not onely the campe were poſſeſſed of the number of fiue thowſand Swyzzers whereunto were reſtrayned the promiſſes of Capteine Mus and the Biſhop of Loda, who at the ſame time that the campe brake vp came thether with fiue hundred, but alſo till he were furniſhed of ſo many other of that nation as would make vp the full nũber of twelue thowſand ſtronge of thoſe regions: And that for an opinion he had, that becauſe there could be made no more foundacion of the caſtell of Myllan, it would be impoſſible possible to force the towne, or to reduce it to a necessitie to yeeld for want of vittells and other relieues necessary, without the action of two armies, and either of them so mighty that of it selfe it might suffice to defend it selfe against all the forces of the nemies vnited together.

The army of the league broken vp from before Myllan.

Thus the eight day of Iuly, did retyre from the walls of Myllan, the two armies of the league, A matter of no small astonishment to many men, and no lesse concurring the infelicitie of the prediction, for that the same daye, with the common consent of the whole confederats, the league was published at Rome, at Venice, and in Fraunce with ceremonies and solemnities accustomed. In the iudgement of all men of obseruacion or skill, it seemed to hold so litle of necessitie to take a courrse so infamous, that many doubted least the Duke of Vrbin were not caried into that deliberacion by some secret order and direction from the Senate of Venice, who for some ende vnknowen to others might desire to haue the warre protracted: And others were of opinion that the Duke, by the memorie of iniuries receiued of Leo, together with the wrongs which the Pope raigning had done to him when he was Cardinall, and fearing withall least the greatnes of the Pope would put his estate in daunger, could not brooke so suddeine a victorie of the warre, being indifferently caried both with the passion of hatred which is much, and the humor of ielousie which is more: Wherein one thing that gaue him so iust a cause to doubt and feare the Pope, was that the Florentyns held Saint Leo with all the contry of Montfeltro, and that the only Daughter of Lavvrence de Medicis being as yet very younge, reteyned alwayes the name of Ducheesse of Vrbin: Neuertheleesse the Popes Lieuetenant was aduertised by very especial Messengers that the Venetians were not a litle discontented with that manner of retyring, and that they had alwayes solicited that the army might approch to Myllan in hope that the towne might be easily caried: And withall, seeing it was not likely that the Duke, if he had hoped to take Myllan would haue depriued him self of a glory, by so much more greate aboue the merit of any other generall in times past, by how much was greater the reputacion and renowne of th Imperiall armye aboue all others which had bene in Italy many yeares before, of which glory followed almost by necessitie the sewertie of his estate, seeing the Pope, either to auoyd so great an infamie, or not to offend so much the Venetians, would not dare to inuade him: And considering also with diligence the action of all those dayes there: The Lieuetenant iudged it more likely (wherein many others were concurrant with him in that opinion) that the Duke falne from the hope which two dayes before had nourished him, that th Imperialls at least would abandon the subburbs, was returned in that vehemencie to his first opinion, wherein he shewed him selfe to haue a greater feare of the Spanyards and distrust of the Italian footemen, then any of the other Capteines had: And by that meane entring into impressions of deeper feare, he embraced rashly and confusedly that deliberacion.

Katherine de Medicis.

The Pope in great astonishment.

This retrait astonished not a litle the Pope and Venetians and made them so much the more altered and confused, by how much they were entred into hope and expectacion to heare newes euery daye of the taking of Myllan: But principally the perplexitie of this accident touched the Pope, who neither with money which was farre from him, nor with constancy of mind which was suppressed by his frailtie, was not prepared to endure the traite and longnes of the warre: Besides that aswell at Rome, as in other quarters of his estate, many emotions and difficulties were disclosed: for, a regiment of three hundred footemen and certeine cornets of horsemen lying in garrison within Carpy, began to make incursions and very hurtful actions vppon all the confynes that apperteined to the Church, obiecting by that meane many impediments to the passage of corriers and money sent to tharmy from Rome & Florence: An aduersitie which could not be mette withall but by bestowing stronge garrisons within the townes: And the Pope, who was entred into the warre with very litle store of money, and deepely imbarked into great exspenses, could hardly, both with the money of his owne store, and with the contribucions brought to him continually from Florence to furnish the charges of the warre, make sufficient prouisions to stoppe them, Being withall troubled with a new enterprise in Tuskane, and constrayned to stand vpon his gard about Rome: for, after Don Hugo and the Duke of Sesso had taken leaue of the Pope and had deposed them selues from the action of their embassage, Askanius and Vespasian Colonno being then reduced within the small borowes of the Colonnoys which are neare to Rome, made many demonstracions to stirre vp some emocion on that side, Many of their factioners and adherents being drawne to a strength within Alagno: And the Pope was driuen to keepe a diligent eye vppon their doings and stirres, aswell for the regarde of the Gebelin faction in Rome, as for that not many dayes before, were discouered against him many signes of the ill disposicion of the Commons: The reason was, for that when he tooke into his pay Andrea Dore, and for the better furnishing of that charge, had raysed and improued certeine impostes vnder coller to assure the seas of Rome against the foystes of the Moares by whome the traffique and wealth of the citie was greatly hindred, the Butchers refused to pay their part of the taxacion, assembling in manner of a tumult affore the lodging of the Duke of Sesso not as yet departed from Rome, And by their example all the Spanyards that were within the towne, ranne thether in armes: Neuertheless this tumult was easily appeased. About this tyme, the Pope stoode in doubt if he should enforce the enterprise to alter the state of Syenna, for that the councells of such as were about him, differed and were of diuers humors: for, some reapposing confidence no lesse in the great number of the exiles then in the confusion of the gouernment popular, perswaded by many reasons that thinnouacion and chaunge of the state would be an action of great facilitie, wherein they ledde him on in this propertie of well liking, that in that tyme it would be a matter of great importance to assure him selfe of that estate: for that in all accidents that might happen, the entry which the enemies might make that way, might be very daungerous for the affayres of Rome and Florence: But others induced him, that it were farre better for him to addresse all his forces into one place onely, then to intangle him selfe with so many enterprises with a very litle or none at all alteracion or diuersion of the principall effects: for that in the ende such as remeyned maisters in Lombardy, would become Commaunders in euery place: Lastly they told him he was not to lay such a foundacion of confidence vppon the forces and trayne of the exiles whose hopes in the ende would be found vayne, as to set vppon the mutacion of that state without making of mightye and stronge prouisions, suche as was very hard for him to accomplishe, aswell for the greatnes of the expences which in enterprises draweth the deepest care, as for the want of principall Capteines, whome he had already sent to the warre of Lombardye. It may be these last perswasions had preuailed more with him if those that gouerned within Sienna, had proceeded with that moderacion which in affayres of small importance the inferiors ought to vse towards their superiors, hauing more regard to necessity then to a iust discontentment: for, thus it hapned, There was one Iohn Baptista Palmier Capteine within Sienna of an hundred footemen for the citie, who hauing of long time before, giuen hope to the Pope that in sending his bands of souldiers to the towne, he would put them within by a sluce or gutter that passed vnderneath the wall neare to a bastillion: And by his direction the Pope hauing sent to him two footemen men of assurance and credit, to one of the which Iohn Baptista gaue his enseigne to beare: The Magistrats of the citie with whose priuitie he entertеyned this practise and abused the Pope, caused these two footemen to be apprehended, against whome after they had proceeded by way of accusation and iudicially condemned them with publicacion of the conspiracie, they passed them to the execucion of manifest death to thende to slaunder the Pope as much as they could: Moreouer they sent certeine bands of their souldiers to beseege Iohn Martynozze one of the exiles dwelling in the contry about Syenna: all which things done as it were in despite of the Pope, incensed him with the fury of a mind iniuried, to aduenture to restore all the exiles within Sienna with his owne forces & the strength of the Florentyns: But as the general prouisions were more weake then apperteyned to the action of such an enterprise, & especially the numbers of footemen: So also the vallour & authoritie of the Capteines recompensed nothing the weaknes of the army, ouer the which he instituted as chiefe cõmaunders Virginio Vrsin Count of Languillaro, Lodovvyk Count of Petillane & Iohn Fran. his sonne, Gentill Baillon & Iohn Suffatello: who making their muster at Centyna & drawing along the riuer of Arbyra so much renowmed for the worthy victorye of the Gebelins against the Guelffes of Florence, approched the walls of Sienna about the xvij of Iuly with nyne peeces of artilleries, twelue hundred horse & more then eight thowsand footemen, almost all leauied in the state of the Church & Florentyns, or at least all sent without money to the exiles by their friends, from Perousa & other places: And at the same time Andrea Dore with his gallies & a thowsand footemen sent to him in supply, made inuasion vppon the hauen of the Siennoys: But in this, their hope was deceiued, that when the forces approched neare the walls of Sienna, they within made no signe of tumult, by which disappointment they were constrained to setle in campe & beseege the towne, in which was a strength of six hundred horsemẽ & three hundred footemen forreyners: And as the enemies made their approches to the gate of Camollia, and began on that side to batter the wall with their artilleries: So, the citie being strong by situacion, & wel fortified with rampars, & for the circuit so great that the army enuyroned but the lesse part of it, They found the inhabitants disposed with firme resolucion to defende the gouernment that then ranne, wherein their hatred against the Pope & Florentyns caried them more vehemently, then the affection they bare to the exiles: And of the contrary in the army that beseeged them, the souldiers hauing no pay made to them, were litle profitable to the seruice, And the Capteines hauing no reputacion in armes, were also in ciuill diuision amongest them selues together with the exiles, who varied not onely vppon the prouisions & daily councels, but also contended for the forme of the future gouernment, seeking to impart and deuide being without, the thing which could not be estabilished but by such as were within: for which condicions after they had made a vaine battry vppon the wall and had no harts to goe to the assault, they began vnder those signes of dissolute dealing, to haue a very slender hope of the victory.

In these times the difficulties of the confederats increased in Lombardy: for, notwithstanding the regiment of fiue thowsand Svvizzers leauied by Capteine Mus & the Bishop of Loda, were at last come to the armye: yet for that the Duke of Vrbin held them not a number sufficient to execute the enterprise of Myllan, there was exspectacion of an other proporcion of that nation which they had sent to require of the Cantons in the name of the French king: They hoped the Cantons would not be hard to accord those leauies though not for other hope, at least to deface the ignominy of the battel of Pauya, And that for the same reasons the bands of souldiers would agree to goe to the warre with a ready corage, specially in so great a hope of the victorie: But as in that nation who not many yeares before for their vallour & for the authority they had won, had no small oportunities to get a very large dominion or iurisdictiõ, There was now no more neither the same desire of glory, nor any care of the interests of the cõmon weale: So, of the contrary, hauing their minds ouercaried with incredible couetousnes and appetites of gaine, they gaue them selues ouer as to the chiefest end & honor of the exercise of warre, to returne to their houses loden with money & bootie: In which humors, the generall Cantons harkning to the solicitacions of warre, as marchants do in bargaines & marting, either publikely seruing their turnes of the necessitie of others for their owne profit, or els hauing amõgest them many men whose mindes were vendible & corrupted, They did either accorde or refuse to depart with souldiours according to the working of those endes: And by their example the chiefe & special Capteines, being labored to be enterteined into pay, did rise so much the higher & made their demaunds so much the more intollerable, by how much they saw that Princes & cõmõ weales had neede of their seruice: In regard of these reasons, the french king summoning the Cantons according to the articles of the contract, to ayde him with men, who by common consent were to be paid with the forty thowsand duckats which the king deliuered out of his treasor: The general Cantons after many coũcels & deliberacions, made him aũswer according to their custõ, that they would not agree to any leauies or mooster of soldiours, onles the king made them first contented of all the arrerages of their pensiõs which he was bound to pay by yearely reuenue: which summes being great, & hard to be satisfied in a litle time, the kings agents were cõstrained to enterteine capteines perticular & yet not without leaue & authoritie of the Cantons, who graũted such power not without great difficultie: A course which besides the long tract & consuming of time which could not be but daungerous for the present estate of affayres, did neuertheless not succeede neither with that effect nor that reputacion, which it would haue done if the consent & authority of the Lords of the Cantons, had concurred. Vnder this occasion no lesse slaunderous to the Duke of Vrbin, then hurtfull to the general proceeding of the warre, the Imperials who in this meane while were dispensed with from all vexacion of thennemies lying idlely at Marignan, turned all their diligẽce to fortifie Myllan, Not the body of the city as they did in the beginning of the warre, but the rampars & bastillions of the subburbs, which they did no more distrust to be able to defend: for that by howe much the reputacion of thennemies was diminished, by so much was their hope reconfirmed & their corage redoubled: And because they had taken from all the inhabitants of Myllan their armes & weapons, & had thrust out of the towne all persons suspected, much lesse that the Capteines had now so great a feare or ielousie as before, seing they established their own assurance by reducing the towne to so cruell a seruitude, that they stoode careles to make payes to the souldiours: And lodging the bands by their tyranny in the houses of the inhabitants, they did not onely compel the masters & owners of houses to minister daily foode to the soldiers both plẽtifully & delicatly, but also to furnish them with money for all other things which in their vanities & fancies they would desire, not forgetting to impose vpon them as much as the rigour of tyranny could deuise: which dealings were so intollerable to the citizens, that they had no other remedye then

then by ſtelth and ſecret wayes to flee from the place where were layde vp the monumentes of their natiuities, the effect of their delightes, and the rewards of all the pleaſures and ſolace of their lyfe: Neyther durſt they ſeeke this miſerable ſafety openly or manifeſtly, for that the eyes of thoſe that oppreſſed them kepte a ſeuere eſpiall vpon them: And the better to aſſure the ſouldiours of thoſe rates and taxations impoſed vpō euery houſholder, but eſpecially the Spaniards, for in the launce-knightes was a greater modeſtie and fauour, the Capteines kepte bounde and in chaynes in their owne houſes, certaine principall houſholders with their wiues and little children, not omitting to expoſe euery ſex and age to their abhominable luſte: By reaſon of this tyrannie all the ſhoppes of Millan were ſhutte in, and euery man ſought to hyde as ſecretly as he coulde, his goods and Iewells of moſte value, making alſo the ſame conueiance and beſtowing of the riches and ornaments of Churches, which for all that were not altogether in ſuretie: for that the ſouldiours vnder cooller to ſearche for armor and weapons, tooke libertie to ranſacke all the corners of the towne, and in that inſolent authoritie, forced the ſeruauntes to diſcloſe the goodes of their maiſters, which when they found, they imparted to the owners porcions not according to equitie or conſcience, but ſuch as in their licentiouſnes they thought good: The face & vniuerſall apparance of that Citie was made miſerable, to beholde the auncient inhabitantes and glory of the ſame reduced to an eſtate of extreme oppreſſion: A matter worthy of great commiſeration, and an incredible example of the mutation of fortune to ſuch as had ſeene it fewe yeres before, moſte populous and riche in Citiſens, plentifull in Marchantes and Artificers, proude in pompes, and very ſumptuous in ornaments for men and women, naturally addicted to feaſtings & pleaſures, and not only full of reioyſing & ſolace, but alſo moſt happy in all other nature of comfort & contentment for the life of man: Where nowe it ſtoode lamentably depriued of inhabitantes, what by the ſtroke of the plague that raged there, and for the continuall euaſions of ſuche as fledde from the violation of tyrantes: Miſerable was the apparance of men & women being moſte wretched in pouerty and nakednes: No entercourſe of marchantes or trade which before was wont to enrich the citie: And the chearfulnes and ſpirites of men were wholly conuerted into a ſtate of languiſhing dolor and feare: No, no other thing remayned of the glorious apparance of that city, then the fundations of houſes & Churches, and yet euen in them was diſcerned a lamentable ſpectacle, in regard of the former memory of them. Neuertheles as there is no ſorrowe without his comfort, nor no miſchiefe without his remedy, ſo their afflictions and heauines tooke ſome conſolation for the comming of the Duke of Burbon, for that the brute went he brought ſome reliefe to the army: and alſo in their miſerie they made this laſt perſwaſion, that for the retrayte of the campe of the confederates, their neceſſities and daungers would ſomwhat diminiſh: And they hoped that the Duke to whom it was ſayde themprour had giuen the Duchy of Millan, would for his owne intereſts, and the better to preſerue the reuenues and eſtate of the citie, take order agaynſt ſo licenſious oppreſſions of the Spaniards: This was a naked hope without any ſtaye or fundation, for that they knew by relation of their embaſſadors whō they had ſent to themprour, that there was no further exſpectation of remedy from him, eyther for that by hys farre diſtance he could not apply neceſſary prouiſions for their ſafety, or elſe (which they iudged by many experiences) the compaſſion of the oppreſſions and miſeries of the people was farre colder in him, then his deſire for thintereſts of his eſtate to miniſter to tharmy and maynteine it: To the which becauſe paymentes were not made in times due, neither his authoritye which was farre of, nor the lawes of his capteines ioyned to their preſence, could not conteine the ſouldiors frō inſolencies and iniuries: Neither did the capteines, to inſinuate & winne the harts of the ſouldiours, & ſharing alſo in the profite of ſo vniuerſall a ſpoyle, labor much to reſtrayne this licence of warre, the rather for that vnder their cōplaintes & excuſes of want of payes, they cloked what ſo euer was done in inſolency & oppreſſion. In ſo much as the chiefeſt within Millan aboue the reſidue, aſſembling in one great number, & expreſſing in their face, their attire, and whole apparance, the miſerable eſtate of their contrey, including alſo their own wretched condition: went with many teares & cōplaints to ſeke the duke of Burbon, afore whoſe feete that pitifull ſpectacle of Citiſens fell proſtrate, and one of them deliuered the complayntes of their griefe in this ſort:

The inhabitantes of Millan implore the compaſſion of the Duke of Burbon.

Were it not that the heauy oppreſſions of this Citie, for their nature more bitter, and for their time more intollerable then euer raged ouer any city or contrey within the age or memory of men, did not hinder the due offices and humilities which in ſo generall inclination of the whole contrey to haue a prince proper and peculiar, our affections would offer & prefer, your cōming (oh gracious Duke) had bin embraſed with ceremonies & apparances agreable to the gladnes & comfort we receiue in the aſpect of your gracious & honorable preſence: For as to men liuing vnder a cloude of obſcurity & darknes, nothing is ſo ſwete as the deſire of light, and nothing more acceptable thē the vſe & benefit of the ſame: So to the citie of Millan ſo long reſtrained vnder the yoke of ſeruitude and oppreſſion, no worldly thing could be offred of more felicity or comfort, thē to behold in your face the effect of our long exſpectation, & to receiue of the hand of thempror, a prince of right noble diſcending, & in whom, in many actions & at ſundry times, we haue experienced your wiſdome, your iuſtice, your vallor, your clemency, & your liberality: But our ſeuere & bitter fortune vnder whoſe lawes we are without all moderation ſubdued, conſtrayneth vs (exſpecting our remedy of none other then of you) to poure out afore you our miſeries, being greater without compariſon then thoſe that any townes taken by aſſalt, did euer endure by the fury, by the ambition, or by the luſt of any tyrants that conquered thē: Which things of themſelues intollerable, are yet made more grieuous to vs by the continual reproches heaped againſt vs, that they are inflicted vpō vs for puniſhmēt of our infidelity to themprour: As though the late tumultes proceded by publike conſent, & not by the incitation of certen yongmen ſedicious, who in their raſhnes drew to their factiō the cōmons, who by their pouerty were aſſured to loſe nothing, & by their nature liue always deſirous of innouation & change: and therefore are a kind & an eſtate of people that with ſo much the more facility are allured to cōmocion, by how much they are cōpounded of humors repleniſhed with errors & vaine perſuaſiōs ſtirring at the appetite of euery thing that moueth thē, euen as the waues of the ſea are caried with euery light vapor or wind that bloweth. And touching the accuſations that are heaped againſt vs, we ſeke not either for our excuſe, or to make leſſe the quality of the crime, to reduce into reckoning the merites of the people of Millan frō the greateſt to the hieſt for the ſeruice of thēpror in the yeres before: firſt when the whole citie vnder the memory of their auncient deuotion to the name of thempror, roſe againſt the gouernors & againſt the french king: an experience reaſonably inducing with what property of affection we ſought to introduce the authority & ſupremacy of thempire: Secōdly whē with ſo great cōſtancy we bare out two moſt ſtraite & harde beſiegings, ſubmitting willingly our vittels, houſes and our mony to the cōmodity of the ſouldiors, & with thē cherfully expoſed our perſons to

euery watch and ward to all daungers, and to all actions of warre: An example of sufficient credit to iustify our faith & loyaltie to the sacred name of themprour: And thirdly when at the battell of Bicocque the inhabitantes of our towne defended with so braue resolution, the bridge, the onely passage by the whiche the Frenche were to pearce euen into the bowels of the imperiall army, A confirmation without resistance, that we preferred the defence of themprours cause before the safety of oure owne liues: Then was our fayth recõmended, then was our valour reputed to vs for good, & then was our constancy lifted vp to the third heauẽ both by Prospero Colon-no, the Marquis of Pisquairo, & by the other capteines: And in these actions we may truly call vpon the testimony of your excellencye, since beeing present in the warre which thadmirall Bonnyuet made, your eyes saw, your toung cõmended, & your hart did oftẽ maruell at so great fidelitie, & so assured disposition: But it agreeth not with our condition to insist vpon the memory of these things, nor to counterpeise merits with offences, since our misery present offreth to stand agaynst all operations of merits or seruices paste: And if nowe there can be found in the people of Millan, any humor, any vayne, or any inclination of yll affection agaynst themprour, we lay our selues downe to what penalties shall be determined vpon vs, yea much lesse that we wil speake in our iustification, seing we wil no lesse willingly submit our necks to the blocke, then we will hold for iust the sentence that condemneth vs: Onely we loued not a litle Frauncis Sforce, as a prince giuen vnto vs by the Emprour, and as one in whose father, grandfather, & brother had bin inuested a cõmaundement & gouernment ouer vs: And we could do no lesse then honor him for the peculiar exspectatiõ that euery one had of his vertue: For which causes it brought no litle griefe vnto vs to see him so sodenly deuested & dispoiled without information of the cause, yea we were not certified that he had conspired any thing agaynst themprour, but of the contrary, both he & others assured vs, that it proceded rather of the ambitiõ of him that gouerned the army, then of any cõmission from themprour: And yet the whole city passed an oth of fidelity to thẽprour, & submitted themselues to thobedience of his capteins: Such was the resolution of the city, such was the vniuersall counsell of the Magistrates, such was the publike consent of thinhabitants, & such was the for-wardnes & fidelity of the nobility, whom to persecute thus for falts particular, there is neither law of reason, iustice, nor exãple: But euen in the very dayes of the tumults our faith was showed according to the quality of the places that we held, since both in the beginning of the stir & in the heate & fury therof, we fayled not to labor with our authority & petitions to make thẽ leaue armes: And in the last day of the tumult there were none others then we that induced the chieftayns & sedicious youngmen to go out of the city, & perswaded the cõmons to submit to the obedience of them-prours capteins: But both the cõmemoration of our actions & merits, & our iusti-fications agaynst the infamies heaped agaynst vs, might haply be necessary or conuenient, if there were any correspondency betwene the punishments we endure, & the faltes we haue committed, or at least if our afflictions did not farre exceede our offences: But there is great difference betwene the one and the other, for we may boldlye saye (and we saye it in our owne trueth) that yf all the calamities, all the cruelties, all the inhumanities (without speaking for our honour of filthye luste or violation) which at any tyme within the memorie of men haue bene endured by any Citie, any people, or any congregation of inhabitantes, were gathered together and reduced into one presence, they woulde make but a little parte of those miseries whiche we wretchedly do suffer, not for a moment, not for an howre,

"not for a daye, but continually and without intermission: seeing that in one in"stant we are dispoyled of all our substance, free men liue tormented with bondage,
"our wiues are imprisoned in their houses and kept chayned by the souldiors, who
"with a perpetuall rage runne vpon vs for vittels, for money, for armor, for all their "wantes, and in their licentiousnes will not be vsed as belongeth to men of warre, but "as best liketh their insolent fancies: If we be not hable to furnishe them dayly with "freshe supplyes of money, they dryue vs to seeke to do that which is impossible to "our estate, and in their crueltie they constrayne vs with threates, with iniuries, with "beatinges, and with all sortes of outrages: So that there is not one of vs which in-"terpreteth not to a singular grace and felicitie, to abandon to praye and spoyle all
"our goods, and for the sauing of our wretched lyues, to flee barefoote out of Mil-
"lan, and for euer to loase the solace of our countrey which for euer hath preserued
"vs tyll this accursed daye. In the tyme of our aunceſtors Federike Barberoſſo made "desolate this Citie, and executed no small cruelties against the inhabitantes, against "the buyldings, and agaynst the walles: But alas the miseries of that tyme holde no "comparison with the calamities of vs wretches, not onely for that the tyrannie of "thenemie is more easie to be endured as beeing more iuste, then the crueltie vn"iuste of a friende, but also for that one daye, two dayes, three dayes sufficed to glot
"the wrathe and inhumanitie of the victor, and the punishmentes of the vanqui-
"shed tooke ende: But with vs it is more then a moneth that we haue bene exerci"sed vnder these miseries, wherein our tormentes haue increased by so many degrees "of crueltie, by howe many haue bene the dayes and howres since our persecution,
"yea we endure those crosses which before we would haue thought had bene impos"sible to the state of humaine condition, and as men reprobate and damned to eter-
"nall perdition, we suffer without hope to see an ende of our woes. Onely the con"fidence we haue resteth in your vertue and clemencie, vppon which we make oure
"implorations, that you would not suffer this Citie lawfully made yours, and com"mitted to your protection, to be wholly deuowred with the iawes of Lions and Ty-
"gers: Wherein reclayming vs with that property of piety, besides the perpetuall
"honor of your name to be the onely patron and restorer of this Citie, yet you shall "settle & establish more in one day your principality with the goodwil and deuotion
"of subiects, then other new princes do in manye yeres with armes and forces: For
"ende, all our petitions, all our humilities, all our oblations, and all our desires tende
"to this, that if for any cause whatsoeuer, your wyll be estraunged to deliuer vs from
"this infinite oppression, or if you stande curious or restrayned by anye inducement "to remoue from our neckes the yoke of this intollerable seruitude, at least wee be"seech you with the deareſt teares of our inwarde hartes and affections, that you will "turne agaynst vs, and discharge vppon this people, vppon vs all, vppon euery one,
"vppon euery sex and vppon euery age, the furie, the forces, the fyre, and the ar-
"tilleries of your armie: In which action, we wyll conster to a speciall felicitie to "dye by the stroake of your hande rather at one blowe, then by languishing in our "present myseries, to dye by degrees more grieuous, then the lyfe and breath that "is leste vs can suffer: And if you haue no other remedie to comfort vs, your
"pyetie shall bee so muche the more commended to adde the laste ende to oure
"calamities, by howe muche more theyr inhumanitie wyll bee deteſted, who "seeke to leade vs in a lingringe deathe, and yet wyll not adde the blowe that "shoulde dispatche vs: Neyther shall it bee lesse easie for vs to ende in this sorte
"our moste wretched lyfe, then suche as loue vs wyll be gladde with this kinde of

our death, euen as fathers and parentes are wont to reioyse at the birthe of theyr children.

These words were folowed with the teares and wepings of the whole assistantes, to whom the Duke answered with a chearfull affability, that he was no lesse agreued with their infelicities, then touched with remorse and desire to releue them: which compassion he tolde them he would extende as much as in him lay, not onely vpon the citie, but also ouer the whole Duchy: he excused the insolencies done, that they were not only agaynst the will of themprour, but also contrary to thintention of all the Capteines, whom for that there was no meane to paye the souldiours, necessitie had induced to consent rather to suche outrages, then to abandon Millan, and leaue the armie in daunger, and put all thestate which themprour had in Italy in manyfest praye to thenemies: He tolde them he had brought with him some quantitie of money, but not sufficient to content the souldiours to whom many payes were due: Neuertheless if the Citie of Millan would furnishe him with thirtie thousand duckets for the pay of one moneth, that he would cause the armie to issue out of Millan and bestowe them elsewhere, assuring them that though at other times they had bin abused in the like promises, the custome of other men should breede no law in him, for that he would alwayes obserue his fayth and worde, vpon the which they might assuredly reappose themselues, which he confirmed with this last addition, that if he fayled them, he wished his head might be take from his shoulders by the first shot of Cannon from thenemies. But albeit suche a summe, both for the quantitie whiche was great to men already consumed, and for the suddennes wherein was matter of more astonishment to those who were already amazed, was hard to be found in the citie so muche wasted, yet the miseries they endured in lodging the souldiors being greater then all other degrees of calamities, they accepted the cõdition of the duke, and began to make prouision with as great diligence as they could: But their calamities were rather suspended then ended, for that albeit one part of the souldiours amongest whom was imparted ratably the money that was leauyed, were sent to lodge in the suburbes of Romegate and the gate of Tosa, and there both to garde the rampars, and worke at the fortifications, and also to labour at the trenche towards the garden where Prospero Colonno had made one before: yet they retayned still no lesse then the others that abode in the towne, the same lodginges they had, and continued to handle their hostes with the same rudenes: Wherein it seemed the Duke of Burbon helde no reckoning of his promise, or at least, as was beleeued, he was not hable to resiste the rage and insolencie of the souldiours, beeing enterteyned and pushed on in that humor by certayne Capteynes, who eyther by wyll, or through ambicion, or for hatred, gaue impedimentes to his counsells. But the miserable people of Millan beeing thus depriued of their laste hope, and hauing not where to make their further recourse, fell into suche an estate of dispayre, that some of them, to put ende by dying to so many miseries and cruelties, which they coulde not ouercome by liuing, threw them selues headlong from the toppe of their houses into the streetes, and some dyd wretchedlye hang them selues: And yet notwithstanding all those grieuous spectacles, neyther the rauine, nor rage, nor inhumanitie of the souldiours, coulde bee anye waye appeased. In that tyme also the playne countrey was in poore condition, beeing no lesse ransackte by the souldiours of the Confederates, who as they were receyued at firste wyth a greate ioye and desyre, so not longe after, theyr inhumanities and extorsions had conuerted the first affections of the people into iuste hatreds, A corruption which generally ranne amongeſt the men of warre of that tyme, who taking example by the Spaniardes, waſted their friendes aſwell as they deſtroyed their enemies: for, notwithſtanding in many chaunges of tymes, the libertie of ſouldiours had bene great in Italy, yet it had taken infinite augmentation by the footemen of the Spaniards, though not vppon iuſte cauſe, yet for reaſons neceſſary, for that in all the warres of Italy they were alwayes yll payde: So that vnder the cooller of examples, notwithſtanding they had a beginning excuſable, yet they proceeded and continued alwayes from yll to worſe: By whoſe rule, the Italians albeit they had not the ſame neceſſitie, for that their payes were orderly performed, yet making the cuſtome of the Spaniardes a lawe to them, they began not to be inferiour to them in any courſe of enormities: In which corruption, to the great contempt of the diſcipline of warre of that time, the ſouldiors waighed in one ballance both their friends and their enemies, and ſo both peoples and countreys were no leſſe deſolated by ſuche as were payed to defende them, then thoſe that receyued their payes to inuade and ſpoyle them.

About this time the beſieged within the Caſtell of Millan were reduced to ſuch ſtraytes for want of vittells, that they were at poynt to render the Caſtell: But becauſe for their longer holding out, certayne of the chiefe confederates enterteined them with hopes to be ſuccoured, they thruſt out in the night at the Caſtell gate which hath his proſpect vpon the trenches that enuironed it without, more then 300. footmen, women, children, & mouthes vnprofitable: Who albeit the enemies that warded at that place hearing the noyſe of their going, gaue the alarme to the reſidue, yet they paſſed away all in ſafety without any impedimēt, finding fauour in the ſtraytnes of the trenches & aide of their pikes. There were two trenches about two ſtones caſt from the Caſtell, & betwene them both a rampar of forty faddomes high: which rampar as it ſerued as a garde agaynſt the Caſtell, ſo alſo it couered ſuch as without would aſſayle the trenches: This miſerable trowpe excluded out of the Caſtell, went to Marignan where the army was, and giuing good teſtimony of thextremitie wherein the Caſtell was, and no leſſe experience of the weaknes of the trenches, for that both women and little children founde paſſage thorow them, the Capteines by their relation turned eftſones to deuiſe for the ſuccour of the Caſtell: with whom did readily concurre the Duke of Vrbin, to thend he woulde not take vpon him ſelfe alone the burden of thexcuſe which he ſuppoſed would not be nowe ſo eaſie as before, for that his army being nowe poſſeſſed of a ſtrength of fiue thouſande Svvizzers, there was cut off the principall cauſe of daunger alleaged to make their approches to Millan without other footemen then thItalians: So that it was ſet downe with a full conſent of Counſell, that the armie ſhould directly addreſſe their approches to the Caſtell, and commaunding the Churches of S. Gregorie and S. Angelo neighbours to the counterskarpes, they ſhould incampe below Millan: With which reſolution the armye brake vp from Marignan, and for the impedimentes of the wayes being cloyed with hilles & ditches, they marched foure dayes by wayes troubleſome, and the xxij. of Iulye they came to incampe betwene the Abbey of S. Cæſareo and the ryuer of Ambro, in a place commonly called Ambro: In which place the Duke chaunging the firſt direction ſet downe in the councell, gaue order to diſpoſe the lodgings of the army in ſuch ſort, that the front of the campe might haue his proſpect vpon the Abbey of Cæſareo which is within a myle of Millan, and keeping the ryuer of Ambro vpon his backe, it might ſtretche out of the right hande vntill the harbour, and on the lefte hande vntill the bridge:

The armye of the league come before Millan the ſecond time.

So

So that the lodgings of tharmy bare directly betweene the porte of Renze and the port of Toso, and holding little of the newe gate, it bare a strong situation and disposition, aswell for those regardes as for the nature of the contrey: The Duke alleaged that he had exchaunged the lodging of the Monasteries for that place, both for that it was more neare the Castell, and also not so farre vnderneath the walles as to be put into daunger by any compulsion, and withall for that threatning thenemies in many places, they should be constrayned to bestowe gardes in seuerall quarters, A matter which for their small number, encreased not a little their difficulties. And nowe the armie being incamped in those lodgings, some regimentes were sent out the same day to besiege the towne of Monceo, which they tooke by composition, and the day following with artilleries they subdued the Castell, wherein was a garrison of an hundred footemen Neapolitans: There the Capteines began to deuise straytly howe to put vittels within the castell of Millan, which they were enformed was reduced to suche a state of necessitie, that there was intention to sende oute Frauncis Sforce: And albeit there were amongst them many Capteines, who eyther for that simply suche was their opinion, or else to showe themselues forwarde and valiant in those things which were to be determined with a greater daunger of honor and reputation to others then to them selues, gaue counsell to giue a charge vpon the trenches: yet the Duke seeing into the perill and desperate hazarde of thexployt, would not be agaynst it openly, but obiecting difficulties and temporising with delayes, he hindred that there was made no conclusion: In so muche as the deliberation being referred ouer tyll the next day, the Capteines of the Svvizzers demaunded to be introduced into the councell, which neuer tyll then was permitted to them: In which, capteine Mus, who for that he had leauyed the greatest parte of them, reteyned amongest them the tytle of capteine generall, alleaged in the behalfe of all his nation: That they maruelled not a litle that the warre beeing begon for the reskew of the Castell of Millan, whose necessities redoubled by so muche tyme as it was deferred; they stoode to dispute vaynely whether they should succour it or not, at a tyme when was more necessitie of courage and execution: That he did not doubt that in suche a councell would not be set downe a resolution agreable to the vniuersal safetie of the state of Millan, to the honor of so many braue Capteins, and to the reputation of so florishing an armie: In which case he let them to vnderstande that the Capteines and souldiours of his nation would interprete it to their great iniurie and shame, if in the approching and action of the Castell, they were not referred both to that place, and to that parte of the perill, which the fidelitie and honor of their nation did deserue: Lastly he protested that in taking that counsell he would not fayle to reduce them not to keepe so great a memorie of such as with infamie had lost the enterprises begon before, as thereby they should passe into forgetfulnes the glory and fortune of those that had vanquished.

As they stoode vpon consuming of time about these counsels and deliberations, wherein was manifestly discerned that the Duke of Vrbin was of opinion that the Castell could not be succouted: Newes came to the campe (though not very certayne) that the Castell had compounded with thImperialls, or at least was vppon the poynt to capitulate: These aduertisementes were easily beleeued of the Duke, who alleaged in the presence of the whole Councell, that though the accorde could not be but preiudiciall to the Duke of Millan, yet it was agreable and profitable to the affayres of the league, seeing it tooke them out of the daunger whiche eyther desire or necessitie to releeue the Castell might happly bring vpon the army,

being caryed with raſhe and ſodayne mindes to aduenture to do the thing which in reaſon and experience of warre helde almoſte of impoſſibilitie: In ſo much as that daunger being nowe taken away, they were to beginne of newe to conſult and deliberate vpon the proceedings of the warre in the ſame ſort, as if it were the firſt day of the beginning of the ſame: So litle a thing hapning accidentally doth alter the whole eſtate and reſolution of great affayres. But not many dayes after, the campe was credibly aduertiſed that the compoſition was paſte: For the Duke of Millan who ſawe the Caſtell reduced to ſuche an extremitie for vittells that it coulde ſcarcely holde out one daye, and being altogether out of hope to be reskewed, for that he ſawe no aduauncing of the campe of the League who had lyen ſo neare two dayes, was driuen by the conſideration of his owne perill, and not to be founde vnready to enterteine the parley which had bene begon many dayes before with the Duke of Burbon, who after the retyring of the army, was ſent to viſite him in the caſtell, and there the xxiiij. of Iuly, they fell to accord in this ſort: That without preiudice to his rightes and intereſtes, he ſhould delyuer vp the caſtell of Millan to the Capteines appoynted to receyue it in the Emprours name, who promiſed him to depart in ſafety together with thoſe companies that were with him: That it ſhould be lawfull for him to remayne at Coma, which was deliuered to him with the gouernment and reuenues of the ſame towne, vntill they had receyued further direction from the emprour touching his affayres: And that there ſhould bee added ſo muche of other nature of reuenues, as ſhould in the whole amount to thirtie thouſande duckets yerely: That they ſhould giue him ſafeconduit to go in perſon to the Emprour, with obligation to content the ſouldiours that were within the Caſtell for all their payes due and paſt, which were ſuppoſed to amount vnto twenty thouſande duckets: That the Duke of Millan ſhould put into the handes of the pronotorie Caracciolli, Iohn Angelo Riccio, and Politiano, to thende he might examine them: Neuertheleſſe Caracciolli to giue his fayth to ſuffer them to go away afterwards, and to giue them ſafeconduit to ſome place of ſuretie: That the Duke ſhould deliuer the Biſhop of Alexandria who was priſoner within the Caſtell of Cremona, and that newe caſtell in Tortono ſhould be deliuered to Sforzino. In this conuention there was no ſpeeche made of the caſtell of Cremona, which being no longer hable to reſiſt the rage of hunger, the Duke had giuen charge to Iames Phillip Sacco whom he had ſent to the Duke of Burbon to promiſe it to thimperialls, if compoſition coulde not be obteined otherwiſe: But he diſcerning by their words and maner of dealing what deſire they had to accorde, and declaring vnto them that the Duke could neuer paſſe ſuche a matter, obteyned ſo muche that there ſhould be nothing ſpoken of it: for albeit the Capteines imperials had great coniectures that the Caſtell had no great ſtore of vittells, and that the neceſſitie of the defendantes would ere it were long make them ſatisfied of the ende and exſpectation of their intention: yet being deſirous to be aſſured of it, they were determined to accept it vnder any conditions, for that they ſtoode doubtfull whether the army of the league that lay neare, would aduenture to ſuccour it: In which caſe hauing no confidence to be hable to defende the trenches, they had reſolued to iſſue out into the fielde and fight: Which doubtfull euent of fortune they were willing to auoide in accepting what conditions they could obteyne of the Duke, who the day following iſſued out of the Caſtell, and being accompanied with many of thimperiall capteines euen as farre as the barryers and limites of tharmy, he taryed there one day: and afterwards he tooke the way to Coma, thimperialls ſtanding vpon this, that they had promiſed to giue him ſafe

The Caſtell of Millan rendred to thimperialls.

retrayte and lodging within Coma, but not to make departe out of the towne their companies of ſouldiors that were there in garriſon: In regarde of which dealing, he ſawe no cauſe to reappoſe further confidence in them, and albeit he had determined before to do nothing that might incenſe or ſtirre vp the minde of themprour, yet for his ſafety he tooke the waye to Loda, which Citie the confederates reſtored wholly into his handes, and there, for that there was no one article of the capitulations obſerued to him, ſauing that he & his companies came away in ſafety, he ratified by publike inſtrument, the league made in his name by the Pope and Venetians.

But in this time albeit the Pope, who for the commotion of the Colonnoys, had publiſhed a Bull agaynſt the Cardinall and all others of the famulie of Colonno: yet ſeeing his hope to chaunge the gouernment of Siena much diminiſhed, and no leſſe grieuous and troubleſome to him to be vexed and trauelled in the territories of Rome: he began with better inclination to open his eares to Don Hugo de Moncado, who not with intention to contract with him, but to make him more negligent in aduauncing his prouiſions, made a motion that vnder certayne conditions, the offences ſhould ceaſe agaynſt the Siennois, and all quarrels betweene him and the Colonnois: And to deale in this negociation, Veſpaſian Colonno whom the Pope truſted muche, came to Rome, by which occaſion the Pope hauing loſte all hope of ſucceſſe about Sienna, and treating to leauye the armie from before the walls, delayed thexecution of that good counſell, exſpecting, to runne into a leſſer ſlaunder, to make it breake vp aſſone as the accorde nowe in negociation ſhoulde be concluded: And yet for the diſorders and confuſions of the army which went encreaſing, it was determined at Florence that it ſhould retire: But ſodayne and ſtraunge be the accidents of warre: The day before the army was appoynted to departe, a regiment of foure hundred footemen iſſuing out of the towne, marched towards the artilleries which were garded by Iames Corſo, who ſeeing the faces of the ſouldiors comming, ranne away in feare from the place that he had promiſed to defende: By whoſe example together with the noyſe and brute of the accident comming to the armie, the whole armie hauing neyther order nor obedience, tooke to flying, beeing neyther charged nor folowed: In which confuſion of running away, there was ſtriuing who could make beſt ſpeede, and for the deſyre they had to eſcape the daunger whiche their tymerous imaginations ſtirred vp, the deſire to flee was all one in the capteins and the ſouldiors, and in the horſemen and the footemen, nothing being hable to aſſure them, in whoſe eares the noyſe of feare did continually ring: They left to the enemies their vittels, their baggage, and artilleries, of which ten peeces great and ſmall belonging to the Florentins, and ſeuen apperteyning to Perouſa, were caryed into Sienna with no little gladnes tending almoſte to a triumph: By the example of this accident, the people began with great ſhowting and cryes, to renewe the infamies deſerued by the Florentins in the like caſe, loaſing long time before euen afore the wals of Sienna, their artilleries which were garded vpon the publike place of the ſame city. This chaſe was giuen the day after the rendring of the caſtell of Millan to the Imperials: At which time alſo the publike calamities of all Chriſtendome being added to afflictions particular, the Pope had aduertiſement out of Hungary, that Solyman Ottoman who was come from Conſtantinople with a mighty army to inuade the kingdome of Hungary, hauing paſſed the ryuer of Sauo without impediment, by the commoditie of Belgrado which he had ſubdued fewe yeares before: had taken the Caſtell of Peter Varradin and paſſed the ryuer of Drauo: in ſo muche as hauing no impediment of mountaynes or ryuers, the rage of the Turke was like to reduce the whole kingdome of Hungary into manyfeſt daunger.

Nowe for as muche as the Caſtell of Millan was falne into the handes of themprour, it ſeemed that in Italye the ſtate of the warre was wonderfully chaunged: Wherein the Duke of Vrbin tooke his reaſon vppon neceſſitie to take newe counſelles, ſuche as they ſhoulde haue ſet downe and taken if from the beginning of the warre the Caſtell of Millan had not beene in the handes of Frauncis Sforce: And in that regarde the ſame day the Caſtell was rendred, amplifying a diſcourſe which he made to the Popes lieftenant and treaſorer of Venice touching the eſtate of affayres, he added that it was neceſſary to create a Capteine generall ouer the whole league to take charge and commaunde all the armies: Wherein he ſayd he ioyned with himſelfe the intereſtes and reſpects of others, beeing determined for his owne particular without that authority, not to intangle him ſelfe with care of any other thing then to commaunde ouer the Venetian army, A reſolution which he prayed them to ſignifie to the Pope and Venetians: Wherupon the Senat agreed, the rather to remoue him from that demaund which was made in a time ſo inconuenient & ſo greatly diſcontenting the Pope, to ſende to the campe Lovvis Piſan a gentleman of great authority, by whoſe working his vehement inclination was rather moderated, then his determination altered. But touching the maner of proceding in the warre hereafter, it was determined that the armie ſhoulde not remoue from the place where it was, tyll the Svvizzers were come, who were waged vnder the name and with the money of the Frenche king: The Duke of Vrbin thought it neceſſarye after they were come, to lye about Millan in two ſeuerall quarters, not to aſſayle it or proue to force it, but to holde it languiſhing tyll for want of vittelles it were dryuen to yeelde, whiche he hoped would come to paſſe within three monethes: He was with great vehemencie agaynſt thopinion of thoſe who counſelled that after the campe was ſetled they ſhould aduenture to take the towne, wherein he inferred that the League beeing mightie in men and money, and the Imperialles in neceſſitie of both, all reaſons and inducementes of warre promiſed the victorie of thenterpriſe: He ſayde there was not one argument for the whiche the contrarie ought to be feared, but the deſire to aduaunce the victorie, for that thennemies conſuming them ſelues with tyme and patience, there was nothing to ſtoppe the good courſe and ſucceſſe of things. He was aunſwered, that the diſcourſe he made was ſtrong and credible, if he ſtoode aſſured that there woulde not come out of Germanie a newe ſuccour of footemen, whiche if it were ſuche as to enhable thimperialls to take the fielde, there was no doubte that the euent of the whole warre woulde not be expoſed to the arbitrement of fortune. But he replyed that euen in that caſe he made no leſſe accompt of the victorie, for that knowing the Duke of Vrbin to be of nature burning and actiue, he made this iudgement of him, that when ſo euer he eſteemed him ſelfe to be equall in forces with the armie of the confederates, he would aduaunce ſo faſte as by his raſhneſſe woulde ryſe occaſion of ſome good accident to haſten the victorie: But becauſe for the difficulties whiche they vnderſtoode fell out in leauying them, they feared they woulde drawe a long tract of time in comming which might bring daunger: it was determined by the counſell of the Duke of Vrbin and ſolicitation of the Duke of Millan, to ſende out Malateſta Baillon with an armie of three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſmen, and fiue thouſande footmen, to take the towne of Cremona, which they ſuppoſed might be eaſily forced for that it conteyned not but an hundred men at armes, two hundred light horſemen, a thouſande launceknightes of choyſe, and three hundred

dred Spaniards, verye ſmall ſtore of artilleries, leſſe quantitie of munitions, and a ſlender prouiſion of vittells: the inhabitantes notwithſtanding they were appalled in courage, yet they were enemies to thimperialls: and the Caſtell no leſſe hatefull to the name of themprour: And albeit the Caſtell was ſeperate from the Citie by a trenche, yet by the reapport of Anniball Picciánard who was capteine, it was eaſie to ſupplant the flankes, and by that meane to cary it without daunger: With theſe directions and counſells Malateſta went to Cremona, for whoſe departure the army beeing diminiſhed, the Duke of Vrbin fell into no ſmall feare, leaſt the regimentes that were within Millan ſhould giue them in the night a Canuiſeado in their lodgings, ſo farre were things remoued from all hope of the victorie: Neuertheles Iohn de Medicis prouoked many skirmiſhes and performed them, wherein notwithſtanding he made many good impreſſions of his vallour, with no leſſe declaration of the vertue of thItalian footemen whiche had not bene ſeene but ſithence he had the charge of them: yet thoſe skirmiſhes did rather hurt then helpe the ſubſtance of the warre, for that ordinarily they conſumed ſome of the moſte braue and beſt experienced ſouldiors.

Here is to be noted that for theſe aduerſities and contrarie euentes of affayres, the Pope was growne into a marueilous diſcourage and appalement of minde, both for that he was not prouided of money to furniſhe the long trayne of the warre which he nowe diſcerned, and alſo not diſpoſed to make leauyes of treaſors by ſuch meanes as thimportance of the affayres required, and ſuche as other Popes affore him had wont to vſe to releeue thoſe wants: But the thing that troubled him moſt, was, that he ſawe not that the effects of the French king were correſpondent to the obligations of the league, and to the aſſurance and promiſe which euery one made of him: for, beſides he was long before he would make payment of the xl. thouſand duckets for the firſt moneths pay, and giue order for the leauying of the Svvizzers, yet there was not diſcerned in him any preparation to begin the warre beyonde the Mountes: No rather he found reaſons to alleage, that it was firſt neceſſary to ſignifie to themprour what had bene contracted in the articles of the confederation, for that otherwiſe the king of England who had a particular league with themprour for their common defence, might happly miniſter ayde vnto him, where, if ſignification were made, that regarde and conieƈture would ceaſe: and that then he woulde immediatly beginne the warre, hoping the king of England would do the like, who promiſed aſſone as ſignification were made, to proteſt agaynſt themprour, and then to enter into the confederation made at Coignar. Moreouer the French king proceded coldly to prepare his army by ſea, And the thing that diſcouered more his intention was, that the fiue hundred launces whiche he was bound to ſende into Italy, were long in paſſing the Mountes: Agaynſt which albeit was alleaged, that ſuche a traƈt and lingring proceeded eyther of the negligence of the French men which is natural to that nation, or of the diſhabilitie to recouer money which hapned by the loſſe of credite the laſte yeares with the Marchantes of Lyon, or for that the companies of men at armes were in very yll poynt, for their loſſes receyued in the battell of Pauia, and had not bene repayred with any money ſince: ſo that they could not reorder and refurniſh themſelues, but with the fauor of a good time: Yet ſuch as made a more neare obſeruation of things, began to doubt by the procedings of the frēch, leaſt to the king was more agreable the lingring of the warre, then thexpedition of the victorie: They ſuppoſed he feared (according to the ſmall fidelity & confidence amongſt princes in thoſe times) that thItalians recouering once the duchy of Millan

and by that meane making ſmall accompt of his intereſtes, would eyther growe to accord without him with themprour, or at leaſt would be negligent ſo to vexe and trauell him, as not to induce or compell him to reſtore his children. But the matter that moſt kept the Pope in ſuſpence, was, that the king of England being required to enter the confederation that was made by his perſwaſions & ſetting on, and expreſſing now no correſpondency of reaſons and promiſes which he had made before: made a demaund, more to protract and defer then for other occaſion, that the confederats would be boũd to ſatisfie him of the mony which the Emprour ought him, and that the eſtate and reuenues promiſed to him in the kingdome of Naples, might by aſſignation be payde out of the duchy of Millan. Moreouer the Pope feared leaſt the famuly of the Colonnois who with many cõmotions held him in continuall ſuſpicion, would not in the end riſe to inuade him with the forces of the realm of Naples: So that making a collection and conſideration of all theſe difficulties and daungers together, he made vehement inſtance to the cõfederats, that notwithſtanding euery one in particular ſhould ſolicite & aduaunce ſuch prouiſions both by ſea and lande, as they were bound vnto by the articles of the league, yet he perſwaded them in generall to make a common inuaſion vpon the kingdome of Naples with an army of a thouſand light horſmen, twelue thouſand footmen, & a conuenient number of men at armes: He tooke his reaſon of this deuiſe vpon the experience of things done tyll that day, & iudged that afterwards there would ſuccede no better iſſue, if they vexed not themprour with warre in other places then in the duchy of Millan: And for the better aduauncing of this expedition he diſpatched to the french king Iohn Baptiſta Sanga a Romaine and one of his ſecretories, both to pul him on with a better inclination to the warre, and to impart with him the eſtate of his wantes and pouertie of money, together with the ſmall meanes he had to goe on with ſo heauy a burden of exſpences, if he were not eaſed with ſome quantity of money from him: That he was determined to harken preſently to the warre of Naples notwithſtanding the articles of the confederation bare not to do any action vpon that kingdome ſo long as the warre ſhould endure in Lombardy: That the Venetians notwithſtanding to auoyde ſo great exſpences, had made difficulty in the beginning, yet being caried with his importunities, they had conſented to be concurrant in the action, and that without the french king, but with ſo much leſſe numbers of men as imported his part and contribution: That the french king for that cauſe ouer & beſides the 500. launces, to whõ he was minded to giue for generall and commaunder, the Marquis of Saluſſa, more for the fortune and felicity, then for the vallour and vertue of the man, as he ſayde: would alſo ſend an other proportion of 300. launces into Lombardy, to thend to adminiſter one part of them to the warres of Naples: That he would ſolicit the cõming on of the army by ſea, & that either to hold Genes ſhort & reſtrayned with it, or elſe to conuert it againſt the kingdome of Naples: Which army albeit the frẽch mẽ led on with as ſlow aduauncementes as they vſed in the other prouiſions, yet it went on ſtill in forwardnes: The kings nauy conteined 4. gallions & 16. light gallies, the Venetians conteined 13. gallies, and the Popes 11. Ouer all which Nauy reduced into one Admiralty, Peter Nauarre was appointed Capteine general at the kings inſtãce, notwithſtãding the Pope could hane wiſhed that dignity to haue bin transferred to Andrea Dore: Beſides all theſe inſtructions and commiſſions, the Pope gaue a ſecret charge to Sanga, to perſwade the french king to vndertake the enterpriſe of Millan for himſelf, to thend to intangle him with that occaſion, & to imbarke him into the warre with all his forces. Moreouer Sanga was enioyned to go out of Fraunce to the king

king of England, to demaund succours of money, seeing the king of that Realme desiring greatly in the beginning the warre against the Emprour, so farre forth as the league were negociated in England according to his desire & the Cardinals of Yorke, would enter the league as was beleued: But the nature of the time, and necessitie of the castel of Myllan not suffring a long treaty or conference, when he saw the league was made by others, he thought he might hold the ballance and stand as a looker on and a iudge. The Pope also solicited both at the perswasions of the Venetians, and at the request of the French king who had sent to that end, the Bishop of Bayeux to Ferrara, to haue composed the controuersies that were betwene him & that Duke: But he handled that action more in apparance then in effect, making vnto him many offers, and amongest others to giue him Rauenna in counterchaunge of Modena and Reggia: A couerture or culler which the Duke made no reckoning of, not onely for that by taking a new hart for the retyring of the army from before the walls of Myllan, he was more hardly then before drawne to like of the offers that were made, and chiefly that of Rauenna: but also for the great difference and inequalitie of the reuenues, And that he tooke it to be a meane to driue him with time into contencion with the Venetians.

These were the practises, preparacions, and operacions of the confederats, deferred, broken of, and chaunged, according to the endes and according to the councels of the Princes that managed them.

Prouisions of the Emprour against the confederats.

But th Emprour whose deliberacions depended wholly of him selfe, was neyther negligent nor irresolute so farre forth as his power and forces stretched: for, after the Frenche king, at the instance of the confederats, had denyed to the Viceroy, leaue to passe into Italy which he demaunded with great affection, The Viceroy refusing to take the kinges present which was supposed to be in value twenty thowsande crownes, departed and tooke his waye into Spayne, bearing with him a writing written with the kings hande, wherein he protested a readines to obserue the accord of Madrill so farre forth as he woulde conuert the restitucion of Burgonguie into an exchaunge and payment of two myllions of crownes: By whose relacion th Emprour, seeing nowe no further hope of obseruacion in the king, determined to sende by sea into Italy, the Viceroy with the launceknights that were in Parpignan beeing almost three thowsande, with the like number of Spanish footemen, conteyning in all a number of six thowsande: he gaue order also to sende a newe supplye of an hundred thowsande duckats to Myllan, And albeit he solicited the expedicion of the armye by sea, yet it coulde not be ready with speede according to his exspectacion, for that besides the tyme to mooster and assemble the Spanish souldiers, there was necessitie to paye the launceknightes an hundred thowsande duckatts due vppon their wages past: furthermore he addressed continuall directions into Germanye to sende to Myllan newe succours of footemen, but bothe for that he gaue no order for their payes, and also for the dishabilitie of his brother to leauye money, that expedicion proceeded slowely: And yet by the delayes and yll succesſe and yssue of the confederats, no sorte of temporising nor slowenes coulde bee hurtefull: for Malatesta Baillon, beeing come before Cremona, planted his artilleries by nyght of the seuenth of August before the gate of La Mussa, iudging that place to bee weake for that it was yll flanked and worsse rampared: And for that he thought at the same tyme to giue thassault on the castell side, he supposed it best to make his batterye in a place farre of, to thende to constrayne the defendants to deuide their strength into sundrye places: Neuertheleſſe after his artilleries had executed, he founde the place ſtrong and forteſied with rampars, and the wall which he battered ſo highe of earth, that the diſcent into the towne woulde be too troubleſome: The ſame beeing the cauſe that he woulde not giue thaſſault, but with a councell quite contrary, he determined to beginne a newe battrie neare the caſtell in a place called Santa Monaca which aforetyme had beene battred by Federyk Boſſolo: And at the ſame tyme he cauſed to cutte two trenches vppon the caſtell greene, of which one of them drewe on the right hande towardes the riuer of Pavo, where the defendants of the caſtell had made two trenches: he hoped by the commoditie of his trenche, to take from them a baſtyllion neate to the which there was ſouldiers already arriued, And which baſtyllion was in their firſt trench neare the wall of the towne: if he wonne it, he layed his plotte to ſerue his turne by the benefitte of it, and to make it a Caualier, or Mount to batter alonge the walls which the French men at other tymes had battred: for which cauſe the Imperialls made an other baſtyllion behinde their hyndmoſt trenche: The other trench which Malateſta caſt, was on the left hande towardes the wall, and ſo neare to theirs that they ioyned within the caſting of ſtones: he determined to beginne his batterie aſſoone as the trenches were made according to his deuiſe, to the which thartilleries of the ennemies gaue no great impediment, for that within Cremona were but foure falconnets, which they applyed but ſeldome by reaſon of their neceſſitie of municions and powder: yet the ſouldiers that were footemen within, ceaſſed not to make ſallyes out and vexe thoſe that labored at the trenches, whome they oftentymes put to greate diſtreſſe notwithſtanding they had a greate garde: By reaſon of which impediments increaſing with other difficulties and daungers, Malateſta who was vncertaine what to doe, confounded with litle prayſe to him ſelfe by diuerſe iudgements and letters, all the Capteines of the armye, who finding the action of Cremona to multiply in difficulties, ſent to his campe a regiment of twelue hundred launceknights newely leauyed by the Venetians at a ioynt charge and exſpenſes with the Pope: And not many dayes after, to thende to reconcile the diſcorde and ielouſie growne betweene Malateſta and Filius Manfron, The Treaſorer Pezero who after a greate reconciliacion was nowe become more agreeable to the Duke of Vrbin, went alſo to his campe with a ſtrength of three thowſand footemen: But Malateſta continued his batteries, and the night before the thirteenth of Auguſt, he planted foure peeces of artilleries betweene Saint Lukes gate and the caſtell, to take a baſtyllion, where, after he had executed almoſt all the daye, he made an opening or breache into the trench, hoping to cary the baſtyllion the ſame night: But about foure howers within night there yſſued out of the towne a ſmall crewe of launceknights who gaue a charge vppon thoſe that garded the trenches conteyning both within and without more then a thowſande footemen, And after they had put them in diſorder they forced the garde to abandon the charge: Neuertheleſſe they were compelled the daye after to goe away, ſo that the trench that had beene made with ſo greate payne and induſtrie, remeyned abandoned, aſwell on the one parte as on the other: But amyd theſe actions it ſeemed fortune woulde playe a parte offering to be fauorable to thoſe without, if they coulde haue knowen howe to diſcerne or to take the occaſion: for, as in the night of the fouretenth daye, about fortye faddome of wall fell of it ſelfe, betweene Saint Lukes gate and the caſtell, wherein was deuowred and loſte one peece of their artilleries in the ruines: So, if they had taken the aduauntage of this accident and followed on with thaſſault aſſoone as the daye had had appeared, The defendants whose feare was redoubled with the astonishment of a chaunce so sodaine and vnlooked for, would haue had no hope at all to resist or repulse them, for that the place which they shoulde haue occupied with defence, layed open and discouered to thartilleries of the castell: But as there is nothinge more suttle then occasion, which beeing taken and applyed draweth with it good yssue, but being neglected or foreslowed slydeth away as a vapour leauing men abused with their propper errour: So, whileſt Malatesta stoode longe before he could resolue, and then lost tyme ere he could raunge his souldiers to goe to thassault, the benefit of this occasion was taken away by the industrie of the defendants, who labored with extreme diligence within, they first sought to couer them selues with risings and hills cast vppe with the labor of their handes, against the artillerie of the castell, and afterwardes they ramparde them selues in the front of thennemies: So that when the assalt came to be presented beeing then well of the day, albeit the moste parte of the campe were conuerted to that side, yet for that they went all discouered and open they made their approches with their great harmes: And beeing approched, besides the other defences wherein they found perill, they were wonderfully vexed with stones which the defendants within cast downe vppon them: By which manner of execucion Iulius Manfron and Captaine Maron, were slayne vppon the place together with many other souldiers of condicion: At the same time there was an other assault giuen by the castell, but that was repulsed with a very small domage: it was appoynted also that at the batterie made at Santa Monaca, should be performed an other assalt with foure score men at armes, an hundred light horsemen, & a thowsand footemen: But by the impediment of the ditch which was full of water, and the disauauntage of the place beeing well fortefied, the souldiers retyred without doing any thing: After this arriued at the campe, the treasorer Pezero with three thowsande footemen Italians, and more then a thowsande Svvyzzers together with a new coplemēt of artilleries: By which supply the campe being now aboue eight thowsand footemen, the Capteines thought to make two batteries following on with thassalt to either of them with three thowsand footemē, and with the other two thowsand to assaile the part towards the castell: And Pezero bringing with him to the campe a great quantitie of pyoners, they labored with greate industrie all the trenches, of the which one beeing finished the xxiij. of August, they wonne after longe fight to couer by their vallour a flanke of thennemies: Afterwardes the night of the fiue and twentye daye, they made two batteries, the one (of the which Malatesta had charge) beyonde that place which Federyk had executed afforetyme: the other at Mussegate managed by Camylla Vrsin: But the succesſe both at the one and the other was very slender, for that the place where Malatesta braked his artilleries by reason it was maresh, gaue no firme groūd to the artilleries for that in sinking at the breache by the softnes of the place, they mounted at the mettall or mouth of the peece, & shot ouer: And touching the battry of Camylla, both it was low which hindred the execucion, & in the action of thassalt the souldiers found impediment in a ditch which was ful of water, together with so many final shot beating in flanke, that their vallour could not make them a way to passe further: So that albeit for all these difficulties they gaue thassalt & receiued in that place the greatest harmes, And albeit on Malatesta side the footemē went vp to the wal passing a ditch wherein the water was deeper then was looked for, yet by the vertue of the defendants applied to the aduaūtages of places, they were easily & readily repulsed: Moreouer on the castel side one part of the caualier being reuersed &

put down, the footemen mounted vpon it: But for that the discent withinwards was too high, the souldiers that were come to the assalt from all parts in no good order, were put backe, some ronning on in their rashnes till they were slayne, & some with a more fauorable infelicitie bare away the rewardes of their enterprise in woundes and maymes of their bodies, and with very litle hurt of their enemies. These disorders together with the priuacion of hope to take Cremona, ioyned to the want of gouernment and obedience of the campe, called the Duke of Vrbin to goe thether in person, who drewe out of the armie that laye before Myllan, almost all the Venetian footemen, And left there one part of the men at armes with all the regiments of the Church, together with the Svvyzzers who nowe might conteine a number of xiij thowsand: And now, that there remeyned in the army a lesse number of men, which being disfurnished of a generall or Commaunder of such authoritie, he despised the same daunger which he seemed alwayes before, to feare when there were greater forces: And lastly assuring that it was not the custome of men of warre, but chiefly of the Spanyards, to inuade other men of warre in their strength or campe: he went from the armye to Cremona, laying this plot, not to cary it with the onely force of batteries and assalts, for that the rampars of thennemies were too stronge, But by seeking with the industrie of so many pyonners to approache their trenches and bastyllions, and to make them selues Maisters of them more by the benefit of vndermyning, then through the vertue of armes: There were many of the Captaines that reprehended him in many thinges touching the gouernment of that enterprise against the state of Myllan, but chiefly they reproched the retraite & breaking vp from before the wals of Myllan: But most of all did they chalenge him of indiscression, for that from the beginning he had attempted to cary Cremona with very smal forces, trusting more in his vanitie and fancy then by the rule of experience or reason, to accomplish thaction with great facilitie: Wherein also the difficulties of thenterprise stil redoubling & discouering, he had embarked such a part of the army, as farre greater occasions falling out whileſt he consumed the time there, were hindred & lost by following that seruice: for, seeing now the full numbers of Svvyzzers were come to the campe, both so many as was necessary, & no fewer then was loked for, he might, by enuyroning Myllan with two armies according to the first resolucion, cut of that great reasort & traffike of vittels which cõtinually had passage thether by the way of Pauia, which the single army that laye at Amber could not restraine for the great circuit of place & waies to be made: But the matter of greateſt importãce, was, to lose the occasion that happly was offred to force Myllan: The rather for that the bands of souldiers that were within, were so weakned by sicknes & diseases, that the bodies most sownd & free being scarcely able to enterteine the ordinary watche & ward with other necessary factions of warre, the Imperialls them selues gaue this iudgement of their owne estate, that if they had bene inuaded in that aduersitie and weaknes, their daũger had bene greater thẽ their vallour could haue defended it: But amid these good offers to the confederats no lesse certein & great was the occasion giuen to take Genes: for that as the Venetian nauy was ioyned with the Popes at Ciuita vecchia, & afterwards staied in the port of Lyuorne to tary for the french, which with xvj gallies, iiij gallions, & iiij other vessels was falne into the riuer of Ponent, had gottẽ by the consent of thinhabitants, Sauona & all the riuer of Ponent: So that army by sea after they had taken many ships loden with gaine going to Genes, passed away to Lyuorne to knit & ioyne with the residue: Besides, it was also determined, that at the cõmon exspenses of the confederats, there should be armed in the port of Marseilles xij

great shippes, to thende that with the French gallies and by the direction of Peter of Nauarre, to meete with the nauie that was prepared in the port of Cartage, or at least to encownter them at sea: Where the three fleetes making sayle together, the nauie Eccleſiastike and Venetian stayed at Porto fino, and the French fleete returned to Sauona, And from those places skowring all the seas without resistance, they restrayned Genes so straight where was want of vittells, that if they had sent vppe a certeine strength of souldiers by lande to cut from them that onely refuge, there was no doubt that the towne of Genes would not haue come to composicion: The Capteines of the sayd nauies desired no other thing both by letters and Messengers expresse, demaunding at least that there might be set foure thowsand men on lande: But there could be no souldiers drawne from the campe that laye before Cremona: And the Duke of Vrbin with others holding it too great a daunger to diminish the armie that laye before Myllan, they enterteyned the demaundes of the sea Capteines with hope, that assoone as thenterprise of Cremona were ended, there should be sent to them a sufficient strength of souldiers according to their desire.

But thenterprise of Cremona aswell for the vertue of the defendants, as for that the great workings of pyoners draw a long time, proceeded euery day with greater delayes and temporising then was looked for: for, the Duke who would needes haue at the campe two thowsand pyoners, a great quantitie of municions, and no lesse store of all sortes of instruments, made a continuall working at the trenches of the castell and at the bastillion towards Pavv, both to winne that and to serue his turne of the Caualier, notwithstanding that thenemies doubting of his intencion, were retyred many daies before hauing made a strong rampart behind it: he drewe a worke also at the two heads of the trenches which went ouerthwart the castell greene, the better to beate the Caualiers which the enemies had made there: And betwene the two trenches of the campe, he cast an other trenche of six faddom broad, prouiding that during the labor of the pyoners they should be couered with earth and other matter for their defense both on front & in flanke: The reason of this worke was, to make a caualier at such time as they should be come to the ditch of thenemies trēch: Moreouer he caused to cast a ditche without the castell towards the towne wall, the better to haue way to the bastillion towards the wall that was ruinat: he made an other trenche at Saint Lukes gate drawing euen vp to the wall: And by the commoditie of these labors and workings, he ceassed not with thartilleries planted within the castell, to execute vppon the ramparts of thennemies, which for the alteracion of the earth much vsed and loossened, did easily dampe and moderate the shot of thartilleries: On the other side the defendants within, lost no tyme: for, distrusting to be longe able to keepe trenches and caualyers, they made a ditche towards the houses of the towne, and yet made many braue yssues and sallyes and with great courage charged vppon the workes of thennemies: Insomuch as the night beforē the seuenth day, they set vppon in three places those trenches which thennemies cast vppon the side of the castell: where finding sleeping in their securitie the bands of footemen that were set to garde them, they slue more then a hundred together with certeine Capteines, and followed the charge euen vppe to the rauelyn before the castell: Neuertheless notwithstanding their vallour, which in those extremities laye not idle, and notwithstanding their industry and perpetuall working at rampars and trenches, yet they were more and more reduced into straight tearmes, and their affayres declining by swift degrees to dominucion: for, the Duke hauing made way with his trenches euen to their ramparts which seperated the castel from the towne, went on vexing them with certeine trowpes of ſhot & other ſouldiers couered with their targets, by whom they receiued great harmes, as alſo by the artilleries from the towers of the caſtell: By reaſon of theſe harmes th Imperialls, not to giue fauor to thennemies by any of their labors, burned their rampar which they made at the Caualier to thend it ſhould not ſerue for a parapet to thoſe that were without: And about the neenetenth daye two trenches of theirs within their ditches, being beaten open & flat, they retired within the other trenches, of which the Duke of Vrbin made ſmall accompt, both for that for the ſhortnes of time they could not be well forteſied, And alſo by their retyring more at large and abroad, there muſt be neceſſarily a greater gard to defend them. But notwithſtanding all theſe works were managed to a good end and yſſue, yet the procedings of the campe were but ſlow for the neceſſitie to reorder & renew the regiment of the Venetian footemen who had bene long time without paye, for which cauſe they were greatly diminiſhed in numbers, as alwayes in the affayres of the confederats one diſorder hapned vpon an other: And as th Imperialls partly to apply to their aduauntage the diſorders of the campe, & partly to follow the fauor of other occaſions, did make many ſallies by night to proue & prouoke the trenches, So all their vallour and labor was in vaine, for that their ennemies were nowe made wiſe by thexperience of the harmes they had receiued there before: Inſomuch as at laſt, the Duke of Vrbin hauing now got a ſufficient ſtrength of footemen, began the xxij day to make a violent battery vppon a tower which afforetymes had bene battred by Federyk, where after he had executed certeine ſhot of cannon, he found thennemies reduced to ſuch termes of weakenes, as they could not refuſe to compownd: In which opinion he ſent out a trompet to ſummon them to render the towne, with whome came forth a Capteine launceknight, and a Spaniſh Capteine together with Guido Vaino: The day following the capitulacion went betwene them and the Duke, that if they were not ſuccored by the ende of the moneth, they ſhould depart out of Cremona: That it ſhould be permitted to the launceknights to goe into Germany and the Spanyards to the Realme of Naples: That in foure moneths they ſhould not beare armes for the defence of the ſtate of Myllan: That they ſhould leaue all their artilleries and municions, And goe out with their enſeignes folded vp and without ſownd of dromme or trompet other then at ſuch time as they leauied and brake vp.

Cremona rendred to the confederats.

A litle after this time there was ſent to remeyne in the French Court as Legat, Cardinall Saluiatio who was departed out of Spayne with the leaue of th Emprour: And in this meane while the French king had aunſwered to the requeſts that were made to him by the Pope: Wherein he excuſed him ſelfe by his great want and neceſſitie of money, that his doings and actions were not correſpondent to his will and affection: But if he might haue a permiſſion to leauy throughout all his realme, a tenth of the reuenues of benefices, he would releeue him with twenty thowſand duckats monthly of that collection, and would be alſo concurrant with him in the warres of Naples: he refuſed to harken to the conqueſt of the Duchie of Myllan for him ſelfe, from the which his mother and Monſr Lavvtrech did chiefly drawe him, notwithſtanding he had declared from the beginning, a good inclinaciō that way: he gaue him hope that he would goe on with the warre beyond the Mounts, But he alleaged that it was neceſſary thintimacion proceeded, which being done, he offered to beginne the warre vppon Flaunders ſide and Parpignan: And yet it was diſcerned that he had no diſpoſicion to it, his intencion therein being nothing different from the will of the king of England, with whome thexpedicion ſent by the Pope, ſerued

to no purpose, for that the Cardinall of Yorke, whose humor was to enterteine euerie one, and be sued vnto of all men, would giue no resolucion: Only the king and the Cardinall made oftentimes this aunswere, The affaires of Italie apperteine nothing to vs.

At this time the confederats fearing least the Grisons, who, during the seege of the castell of Millan, had reconquered and rased Chiauana, woulde enter into the pay of the Duke of Burbon, or at least woulde suffer the launceknightes whome he exspected for succours, to passe thorowe their contrie: The Pope and Venetians bounde them selues to take into their pay, two thowsand footemen of the Grisons, and to pay to Captaine Mus fiue thowsande fiue hundred duckats, which they had promised to him more by force then by frendship: This Capteine Mus was fled from the campe fearing the Duke of Millan who was then come to tharmie, and afterwards pretending that there was money owing to him for the payes of the Svvizzers, he deteined prisoners two Embassadors of the Venetians who had bene sent into Fraunce: The obligacions of the Pope & Venetians stretched also to deliuer them of the new taxes impосed vpon such as traffiked in nauigacion vpon the lake of Coma. And touching the Grisons, they bound themselues to stop the passage of the launceknightes, and wrought so as Tegane their Capteine who had compounded with the Duke of Burbon to serue him with two thowsande footemen, aduaunced not. In the meane while the affaires of Italie proceeded coldly: for, the armie that was before Millan, wherein was greatly diminished the numbers of such Svvizzers as were not payed, lay with an idle campe without doing any other action then enterchaunge of light skirmishes according to custome: But an other humor raigned in the Spaniards that lay within Carpy, who forbare not to do the worst they could, & being secretly aduertised by their espialls, (taking withall the commodity to withdraw themselues vpon the lands of the Duke of Ferrara) they gaue many impediments to the Corriers and other persons going to tharmie: In which libertie running ouer all the contrie therabouts euen vpon the confines of the Bolonnois and Mantuans, they committed very many insolencies & harmes, but not to any others then the subiects of the Church. At last the Marquis of Salussa passed the mounts with fiue hundred french launces, by reason of whose comming, Fabricio Maramo who battered the towne of Valence and lay incamped before it, (Iohn Biraguo lying there in garrison) retyred him selfe to Bassignan: But the Marquis refused to passe further onlesse a regiment of foure thowsand footemen whom he had led out of Fraunce for that intencion, were payed by the confederats by equall porcion: which in the end by necessitie was consented vnto, the rather for the instance and importunitie of the king, who solicited it vehemently for the surety of his men at armes, and to raise into greater degrees the reputacion of the Marquis.

In this time Synybald Fiesque made him selfe Lorde of the towne of Pontriemoli, which Sforzino helde, but it was eftsoones recouered with the same facilitie, by the meane of the castell: within Millan was great want of money, since both there was none receiued from th Emperour, and thinhabitantes within were so impouerished by their intollerable defrayments, that skarcely could they furnish the thirtie thowsand duckats promised to the Duke of Burbon: who had receiued into his pay Galeaz Birague and Lodovvike Belioyeuse who till that day had alwayes followed the frenche parte: The reason was, for that the confederates could not accept them for the intollerable burdens of charges which they susteyned. About this time Iohn Biraguo got Nony.

During theſe ſtirres the ſtate of the Marquis of Mantua ſtoode almoſt indifferent and common to all ſides, wherein he excuſed him ſelfe for that he was in the pay of the Pope, and a freeholder of thEmperour: And to hold ſtill his eſtate of indifferencie, when the end of the tearme of his pay drew neare, he put him ſelfe of new into the pay of the Pope and the Florentins for foure yeres more, with this expreſſe condicion that neither in his perſon nor with his eſtate, he ſhould be boũd to any thing againſt thEmperour: And yet in the beginning of the warre he deſired to go in perſon to the armie, which being not agreeable to the Pope as hauing no confidence in his gouernment, he was aunſwered that in regard he was a freeholder of thEmperour, he would not bring him ſo farre in daunger.

This was the eſtate of affaires in Lombardy at that time.

In Tuskane, albeit the Florentins had neither armies nor armes vpon their landes and confines, yet were they not without their parte of the burdens of the warre, for the contribucions that were impoſed vpon them: for, the Pope who had no money by meanes ordinarie, and would not make any leauies or collections extraordinarie, layed vpon their ſhoulders with a great impietie almoſt the whole waight & charge of the exſpences of Lombardie: The Siennois alſo were not without their vexacion, on the ſea ſide, for that Andrea Dore commaunding Talamone and Portherculo, made them ſtand continuallie vpon their gard, notwithſtanding not long after, Talamone was reſtored to the Siennois by the infidelitie of a Capteine that was appointed to keepe it: Their aduerſitie alſo was increaſed by the vexacion of thexiles of Sienna, who hauing ſupportacion by the Pope, moleſted them in the partes of Maremma: Where Iohn Pavvle the ſonne of Ranſo de Cero who was enterteined by the Pope, made him ſelfe Lord of Orbatella by a ſurpriſe that was made by certeine horſemen of the gate of the towne, which he followed forthwith with his companies.

But at Rome the alteracion was great and drew after it effectes of right great conſequence, ſuch as tooke not their beginning of armes & open warre, but were bred in the boſome of conſpiracies and ambuſh: They brought no leſſe infamie & ſlaunder to the Pope, then confuſion and diſorder to the affaires of Lombardie, where, by reaſon of the conqueſt of Cremona, was hoped a good iſſue of thenterpriſe of Genes, and alſo to be hable to diſpoſe the campe in two partes before Millan according to the plots ſet downe at the firſt: for, like as ſince the chaſe giuen to thEccleſiaſtikes before Sienna, the Pope hauing no hope to do any great action vpon the familie of the Colonnoy, continued his inclinacion altogether to inuade the realme of Naples with greater forces: So, on the other ſide, the Colonnois and thEmperours Agentes, finding by the diſpoſicion of their owne affaires that they were hable to doe no notable matter againſt him, and deſiring to keepe him ſtill amuſed, & to take time from him vntill the Viceroy were come out of Spaine with the nauie: They ſent to Rome Veſpaſian Colonne in whoſe fidelity the Pope reappoſed much, by whoſe meanes they fell to capitulat together the two and twentie of Auguſt: That the Colonnois ſhould render Auaguo with other places which they had taken: That they ſhould withdraw their power to the kingdom of Naples, and enterteine no more bands of ſouldiors in the townes which they poſſeſſed in the dominion of the Church: That they might freely ſerue thEmprour againſt al men for the defenſe of the kingdom of Naples: and on the Popes ſide it was agreed, that he ſhould pardon all offences paſt, and reuoke and aboliſh the bull publiſhed againſt the Cardinall Colonno: That he ſhould not inuade their eſtates, nor ſuffer them to be endomaged by the Vrſins: By reaſon of this reconciliacion, the Pope, who verie vndiſcretly reappoſed too much in the fidelitie of

of Vespasian, dismissed almost all his horsemen and footemen which he had waged, and those bands that remeined, he dispersed them in seueral townes about Rome, and from thenceforth seemed to grow cold in all things that concerned the plot of inuading the kingdom of Naples: for, as by the complaints and protestacions which ordinarily came from Millan and Genes to th Emperours officers resident in the realme of Naples, it was discerned that those Cities woulde holde out no lenger onlesse the confederates were turned from the pursute of their enterprise with a mightie diuersion: So th Emperours Capteines and officers there hauing no meane to make openly a strong warre such as was hable to administer a speedie remedie, tooke an other course, and disposed immediatlie all their thoughts and spirites to oppresse the Pope with ambushes & deuises: Such is the operacion of minds malicious & ambicious, that the thing which the law of equitie and order denieth them to do, & their forces too weake to further the impiety of their hart, they will not faile to follow it to effect with conspiracie and infidelitie.

Whilest these practises were in preparacion, the almighty God bringing to passe that to the affliction which the Pope suffred for his affaires particular, should be adioyned other visitacions more publike and generall: aduertisementes came that Solyman Ottoman Prince of the Turkes had ouerthrowen in a battell raunged and accomplished, Levvis king of Hungrie, a victory which it was supposed the Turke won no lesse through the temerity of his enemies, then by his owne vallour & forces: for, the Hungarians notwithstanding their numbers were but small in comparison of so huge an armie of their enemies, & in their rashnes reapposing more for them selues in their victories past against the Turkes, then in the estate and condicion of things present: yet they perswaded their king who being young in age and yeares, was also more young in councell & iudgement, that not to obscure the auncient reputacion and glorie of warre gotten by his peoples, and lesse attending the succors that were to come to him from Transiluania, he would aduaunce his forces and go seeke the enemy, and not refuse to fight with them in open field, a maner of action wherein the Turkes are almost inuincible by reason of their infinite nũbers of horsemen: So that the euent and effect falling out all one with their rashnes & indiscression, his armie being compounded of all the nobility and valliant men of his realme, was ouerthrowen with a great slaughter of the generall multitude of souldiours, and the death of the kings person with many of the principall Barons and Prelats of the realme. This victorie bothe bloodie for the slaughter, and daungerous for the consequence, brought an vniuersall terrour and astonishment ouer all the regions and landes of Christendom, euerie one seeing in his owne iudgement that nothing coulde holde back the Turke from appropriating to himselfe the whole realme of Hungria which for so many yeares had bene the onely bulwarke and defense of Christendom: And as in the mindes of men alreadie troubled and afflicted, newe displeasures and accidentes make a deeper impression, then they do in such spirites as are free and voyde of passion: So this ouerthrow was to the Pope aboue all other Princes, most bitter and grieuous, insomuch as expressing in his actions, in his words, and in his countenaunce, great tokens of inward dolor and heauines, he complained in that griefe affore the Cardinalls sitting in consistorie of so great a domage and ignominie done to the common weale of Christendom: Which for his parte he had not failed both to foresee & prouide for, as well by exhorting and perswading the Princes of Christendom to peace, as also in comforting in their most necessities the kingdome of Hungarie, with a great contribucion of money: he sayd that from the beginning he had foreseene and fortelled that that warre woulde be full of incommodities, and a warre verie daungerous for the defense of that kingdom: Only he alleaged that seeing there was no reckoning made of those reasonable condicions which he proponed for the tranquillitie of the sea Apostolike and Italie, he was driuen by necessitie to haue recourse to armes and forces, contrarie to his perpetuall intencion: Wherein he referred him selfe to be iustefied, both by the newtralitie which he had vsed before that necessitie, and also the condicions of the league which he had made respecting all the common benefite: All which he sayd aunswered sufficientlie for him, that he had not bene pushed on by any consideracion of his proper interestes, or particular respectes of those of his familie: But since it is Gods good pleasure happilie for some good ende, that the heade and principall parte of Christendome shoulde be hurte, speciallie in a time when all the other members of the same bodie were deuided into other thoughtes then suche as tended to the safetie of the whole: He thought that the holie will of God was, that they shoulde seeke to cure so greate a maladie by some other meane: And therefore seeing that care apperteyned more to him then to any other in respect of his office of Pastour, he was determined contrarie to all consideracions of thincommodities, of the daungers, and of his dignitie, and soliciting withall as soone as he coulde vnder some good condicions, a surceance of armes in Italie, to mount vpon his gallies and in person to go seeke the Princes of Christendom, and to solicite a holie and vniuersall peace with perswasions, with peticions, and with teares: He exhorted the Cardinalls to put them selues in preparacion for this expedicion, and with one franke readines to dispose their mindes and bodies to aide their common father in so holie an enterprise, which he besought God to blesse & fauor: And that if for the common sinnes of the world it could not be guided to his perfection, he besought the goodnesse of God, that at least in the negociacion he woulde rather depriue him of life then of hope to accomplishe it: for that (sayth he) no infelicitie, no aduersitie, no miserie can happen to me so great, as in so daungerous and mortall astonishments, to loase both hope and meane to put to my hande for the remedy and redresse of so generall an euill.

This protestacion of the Pope was heard with great attencion, and with no lesse compassion and deuocion was it holden for recommended and esteemed: But it had imprinted a farre greater operacion, if his wordes as touching the person had caried so muche fidelitie and credit, as in them selues they seemed to beare authoritie and dignitie: for, the most parte of the Cardinalls were of this opinion, that he was more touched with the consideracion of the difficulties wherein the present warre was reduced, then with any conscience of the daunger of that kingdom: A matter which they proued by this obseruacion, that he had taken armes against thEmperour in a time when, for the open preparacions of the Turkes, the daunger of the realme of Hungarie was manifest and vndoubted: But of this there coulde not be made a true experience: for, the faction of the Colonnois beginning to execute the treason they had pretended, sent Cæsar Filettin their confederate, with a strength of two thowsande footemen, to Agnano, where was a garrison for the Pope, of two hundred footemen payed: And in the manner of their doinges, the better to keepe couered and hidde their thoughtes and intencions, they made showe as though they woulde take the towne: But for that in true meaning their purpose drewe to an other effect, they occupied all the passages, and with an extreame diligence cutte of from comming to Rome all meane of aduer-

tiſement of their enterpriſe: And in the meane while after they had aſſembled their forces whiche they had ſent to keepe about Agniano, and together with thoſe bandes that were with them ſelues, were reduced all into one ſtrength which happily might conteyne in all about eight hundred horſemen and three thowſand footmen, all trained and diſciplined, they marched in greate celeritie towardes Rome where was holden no ſuſpicion nor doubt of their comming: They arriued there the night before the twentie day of September, where in their firſt action, they tooke by ſurpriſe three gates of Rome, making their entrie by the gate of Saint Iohn de Latran: There met them in perſon not onely Askanio Colonno and Don Hugo de Moncado (for the Duke of Seſſo was dead before at Marino) but alſo Veſpaſian who had ſolicited thaccorde and giuen his faith as well for him as for all the reſidue: There was alſo in perſon Cardinall Pompey Colonno, a man ſo farre ouercaried with ambicion and furie, that he had not onely conſpired the death of the Pope in cruell manner, but alſo, by bloodie handes and meanes full of impietie and ſacriledge, he had aſpired to the ſeate pontificall, conſtraining with force and armes, the Cardinalls to make election of his perſon whome he knewe they woulde not call for his vertue or merits: About the breaking of the day, the Pope had informacion of their ariuall, being by that time all aſſembled about Saint Coſmo and Saint Damiano: And what by the ſuddeinnes of thaccident tending to a manifeſt ſurpriſe, and by the operacion of his owne frailtie, which by ſo muche was redoubled, by howe muche his perill was preſent and deſperate, he ſought in this aſtoniſhment and confuſion to appeaſe the tumult with his authoritie: for, neither had he readie any forces particular to defende the daunger that his deſtinie pulled on, neither did the people of Rome make any ſigne to ſtirre, partely for that it grieued not them to ſee him fall into inconuenience whome they loued not, and partelie according to the humor of populars, they made as though a vexacion publike and generall did nothing touche nor concerne them: By reaſon of which weakeneſſe of the Pope, and want of inclinacion in the people, thennemies with theſe oportunities aduaunced forward and with all their bandes, ſtayed at Santo Apoſtolo, from whence they ſent beyonde Tyber by the bridge Siſta, a ſtrength of fiue hundred footemen with certeine horſemen: Who, after a ſmall reſiſtaunce, repulſed from the portall of Santo Spirito, Stephen Colonno being in the Popes pay and appointed to that place with two hundred footemen: Then, taking the way of the olde ſubburbes, they drewe to Saint Peters and to the Biſhoppes pallaice where the Pope was: no leſſe doubtfull of his ſafetie then depriued of all aſſurance and vertue in ſo great a diſtreſſe: he called in vaine vpon the ſuccours of God and men, and yet hauing a glorious deſire to dye in the ſeate of his dignitie, he prepared him ſelfe with the habit and ornamentes of his calling to take his ſeate in the chaire pontificall, according to thexample of Pope Boniface the eight when he was ſurpriſed and reſtrained by the Colonnois. In his feare and aſtoniſhment he coulde not diſcerne the way of his ſafetie, and in that deſperate accompt of him ſelfe and his eſtate, he was without all conſideracion that ſuddeine actions puſhed on with that propertie of furie and rage, haue their ordinarie diſſolucion before they come to worke the worſt that the timerous man in his fraile conceites doth imagine: Onely he founde comfort and care in the Cardinalls that were about him, who with a reſolucion aboue the greatneſſe of their perill, coniured him to chaunge his timerous deuiſe to dye in his chaire, and willed him to goe out though not for his owne reſpect, at leaſt for the reputacion of the holie ſea leaſt the honor of God were wickedlie and wretchedly offended in the perſon of his Vi-caire: By their perſwaſions he retired together with ſuch of them as he truſted moſt, into the caſtell about ten a clocke: if in his feare he had lingred there longer, he had ſeene with his eyes that ſpectacle of calamitie which in his timerous condicion he alwaies douted: for, by that time he was remoued, al the horſemen & footmen together with the whole army were aſſembled before the pallace, & in their fury not ſparing the place which at other times in their modeſtie they reuerēced, they entred & ſackt the pallace making violacion and pillage of all the holy ornaments of S. Peter: Their inſolency tooke from thē all regard to the Maieſtie of religion, & whoſe harts had reiected all deuocion and piety, their hands tooke liberty to prophane all things that their fury could find out, yea they made as ſmall ceremonie to ranſacke the holy things of Rome, as the Turkes did in the Churches of the realme of Hungarie: And being made weary with running thorow the ſpoile of things rich and precious they left in their fulnes to make further pillage of the holy relikes, & in their rage they retyred to the new ſubburbes of which they ſacked about the third part, and paſſed no further for feare of the artilleries of the caſtel: This was the laſt act & paſſage of their fury, which they ſeemed there to reſtraine & cut of, not that their rage was fullie ſatisfied, but becauſe their hands were weary with robbing: A tumult which they executed with ſo much the leſſe impediments by how much more they forbare in their liberty to do any domage to the people of Rome: And after they had continued three howers in this licenſious execucion, Don Hugo vnder the Popes faith & receiuing as oſtages for his ſurety the Cardinals Cibo & Rodolffo the Popes coſines, went vp to the caſtell to ſpeake with the Pope, to whom vſing the tearmes & phraſes that apperteined to a victor, he ſet downe to him condicions of truce: whereupon aunſwere being deferred till the day following, the cōpoſicion was concluded in this ſort: That there ſhould be betwene the Pope aſwell in his owne name as in the name of the confederats, & betwene the Emprour a truce for iiij. moneths, with liberty to the cōfederats to enter within ij. moneths: That in the ſame truce ſhould be cōprehended not only the ſtate Eccleſiaſtike, & the realme of Naples: but alſo the Duchy of Millan, the Florentins, the Genovvaies, the Siennois and the Duke of Ferrara & all the ſubiects of the Church mediat, & immediat: That the Pope ſhould be boūd to retire immediatly on this ſide the riuer of Pavv, his men of warre that lay before Millan, and to call home frō his army by ſea, Andrea Dore with his gallies: That he ſhould be bound to pardon al the Collonnois & any other whoſoeuer was party to this cōmotion: That he ſhould be bound to deliuer for oſtages of obſeruancy, Philip Strozzi & one of the ſonnes of Iames Saluiatio, and to ſend them to Naples within two monethes vpon paine to loaſe xxx. thowſand duckats: That thimperialls & the Colonnois ſhould depart out of Rome and all the eſtate Eccleſiaſtike and retyre their forces to the kingdom of Naples.

Truce betwene the Pope and th Emperour.

This truce was willinglie accepted both by the one & other partie: it was acceptable to the Pope for that he had not in the caſtel ſufficient prouiſion of vittels: And Don Hugo (though cōtrarie to thinſtāce of the Colonnois) thought it now time to take vp both for that he had done enough for th Emperour, and alſo he ſaw moſt of thoſe ſouldiors that had entred Rome with him, diſperſed heare & there, being more loden with pray & bootie, then bearing aptnes to any further ſeruice: But this truce brake all the deuiſes & plots of Lombardie, & tooke away all the frute of the victorie of Cremona: for, notwithſtanding almoſt at the ſame time, the Marquis of Saluſſo was come to the armie with the frenche launces, yet the Popes regimentes beginning to faile who for the moſt parte by reaſon of the truce retyred to Plaiſanca, the ſeuenth of October: yet the deuiſe to ſend ſouldiors to Genes was no leſſe diſſolued and diſorde-

red, then the resolution to enuiron Millan with two armies: Wherein the matter that helped also to this alteration and trouble, was the Duke of Vrbin, who after he had made a composition with those in Cremona, went to visite his wife at Mantua, without tarying for the consignation, notwithstanding he was credibly aduertised of the truce made at Rome: And hauing accorded to the companies that were within Cremona, a prolongation of time to departe, there was so long tarying about Cremona, before they dislodged, that he came not to the army with those companies that were before Cremona before the middest of October, A matter that broughte great preiudice to all the affayres: both for that there was solicitation made to send men to Genes, which Peter Nauarre and the Venetian treasorer of the army by sea demaunded with greater instance then euer, for that (all the Venetian regimentes being reassembled) there were in the army so many forces as might suffice for that effect, without that it was nedeful for that matter to remoue the campe: And also for that the Marquis of Saluſſa had brought with him fiue hundred launces and foure thousand footmen, besides a dayly exspectation of two thousand Grisons who were waged according to thaccord made with them: And lastly the Pope, albeit he made open demonstrations to obserue the truce, yet his intention being otherwise, he had left in tharmy foure thousande footmen with Iohn de Medicis, vnder pretence that the French king should paye them: An excuse not without apparant coollers, for that Iohn de Medicis was alwayes in the kings paye, and in his name reteined continually a company of men at armes. At last thimperialls that were within Cremona went out of that Citie, the possession wherof was consigned ouer to Frauncis Sforce: The Launceknightes with their capteine Conradin tooke their waye to Trente: But the horsemen and footemen of the Spaniardes hauing passed ouer Pavv to returne to the Realme of Naples, and the Popes Lieftenant making difficultie to giue them sufficient passeportes and safeconduites, for that it was contrarie to the Pope to suffer them to goe to the Realme of Naples: they suddenly turned their waye, and wente vp by the Mountayne of Parma and Plaisanca: and after wyth greate diligence they repassed the ryuer of Pavv at Chiarella, from whence they went in safetie to Lomelino, and so to Millan: And the Popes Lieftenant Guicciardin for thobseruancie of the truce, did not onely goe from before the walles of Millan with the Popes regimentes, but also Andrea Dore remoued himselfe from Genes with his gallies: Out of which towne not many dayes before, were issued sixe thousand footemen aswell bodies payed and waged, as men voluntarie and followers, with direction to set vppon the sixe hundred footemen who were vppon the lande with Phillip Fiesquo: who with the fauour of the toppe of the Mountaynes neare to Portofino, had so fortified him selfe with rampars and bastillions, that he constrayned them to retyre with their great losse: And yet not many dayes after, Andrea Dore returned to Portofino with sixe gallies, to continue together with the residue, the siege of Genes by sea.

Cremona giue by the confederates to Fr. Sforce.

At the same tyme that these matters succeeded in Italye wyth diuerse euentes, the Embassadours of the Pope, the Frenche kinge, and the Venetians, signified to thEmprour the fourthe daye of September, the League that was made, together wythe the libertye that was lefte to hym to enter accordinge to the conditions sette downe in the Capitulations: At whiche an Embassadour of Englande beeing presente, he deliuered to thEmprour from his king a letter, modestly perswading him to enter into the League. The Emperour heard with great affabilitie the reasons and relations of thembassadors, but he aunswered them, that it agreed not with his dignitie to enter into a confederation made principally agaynſt his eſtate and his honor: Onely he had bene alwayes moſte deuoute and diſpoſed to haue an vniuerſall peace, according to which inclination ſtill continuing, he offred to accompliſh it preſently, if they had ſufficient warrant & commiſſions for the ſame: Neuertheles it was beleeued that his intention was farre otherwiſe, and that he did but inſinuat that offer for his greater iuſtification, and to giue occaſion to the king of England to deferre to enter into the league, and alſo to make colde with that hope, the preparations of the confederates, and ſo vnder the treatie of peace, to leade them into ſome iealouſie & diſtruſt: And yet notwithſtanding this practiſe, he ſolicited on the other ſide the prouiſions for the army by ſea, which was ſuppoſed to be fortie ſhippes and ſixe thouſande men payde: And the rather to make that army aduaunce beeing aſſembled at the notable porte of Carthage, the Viceroy departed from the Court the xxiiij. daye of September: By which expedition and celeritie it ſeemed that themprour was more ready and carefull of his affayres then the French king, who notwithſtanding he was preſſed with ſo great intereſts and conſiderations, yet he forbare not to follow the humor of his negligence and paſſed foorth the moſt part of his time in the pleaſures of hunting, dauſing, and making court to Ladies: And then were his captiue children caryed vp to Valdolit, when it was manifeſtly diſcerned that there was no more hope that thaccord would be obſerued. The cõming of this army by ſea cõpelled the Pope to take armes, who with the iealouſie of thoſe apparances, coulde not but doubte of the fidelitie of the Viceroy and the Spaniards: In which daunger he did not onely call to Rome Vitelly with his regimentes and the bandes of his Nephewes, but alſo he called in for his ſafety an hundred men at armes of the Marquis of Mantua, and an hundred lighte horſemen of Peter Maria Roſſo: and there was ſent to him from the armie two thouſand Svvizzers at his charges, and three thouſande footemen Italians: Neuertheleſſe he continued ſtill and aſſured from one tyme to an other, that he would go into Spayne to conferre with themprour, from the which moſt of the Cardinalls diſſwaded him, the rather for that he followed an action vncertayne, aduiſing him firſt to ſende thither his Legates.

Deliberation of the duke of Vrbin.

But now to returne to the army whiche the confederates kept incamped before Millan: After the duke of Vrbin was returned thither, who ſaw there was no hope to cary the towne eyther by force or by famine, and being with great importunity ſolicited by the capteins of the ſea army to ſend out ſouldiors to vex by land the people of Genes: he determined for the better aduauncement of that expedition, to drawe the army farre from the walls of Millan, & yet he made ſuch diſpoſition & direction of things, that all reaſort of vittells that was to come to that citie was cut off & ſtopped: for which occaſion and to haue the better oportunity to that action, he began to fortifie Monce, to leaue there with more ſurety ſome crewe of ſouldiours, both to empeach the traffike of vittells from the Mount Brianſo and other places confining, and alſo by the commoditie of that fortification to tranſport the army into ſuche a place as might reſtraine the markets of vittels comming continually to Millan from Biagreſſo & Pauia: And afterwards that place being reduced to good ſtrength & fortification, the direction extended that the Marquis of Saluſſo ſhould marche to Genes with his footemen accompanied for his better ſtrength with an other regiment of Svvizzers, A proportiõ which the ſea armies did much deſire, for that the town of Genes laboured in ſuch extreme wants of vittells that it could ſcarcely hold out any longer: But as theſe deliberations & directions were ſuch as they could not be put to

execution but with a farre greater tract and longnes of tyme, then eyther was agreable to the eſtate of affayres, or the neceſſities of Genes could endure: So for that the only meane to cary that citie, reſted in no other property of action then in the ſtopping of the reſort of vittels which paſſed thither by land, thoſe counſels tooke no reſolution, nor were not referred to effect, notwithſtanding there were in the army 4000. Svvizzers, 2000. Griſons, the regiment of 4000. footmen of the Marquis of Saluſſe, and 4000. others vnder Iohn de Medicis payed by the Pope, together with the bandes of footmen of the Venetians, which according to thobligation of the league, and teſtimonie & reapport of themſelues, were aſſured to conteine a ſtrength of ten thouſand men: but in truth vpon the iuſt mooſtring & view of the bands, they conteined a farre leſſe number: At laſt, being the laſt of October, the army diſlodged frō the place where it had ſo long incamped, and drew to Pioltello fiue miles frō the firſt lodging, but in diſcamping they had a great skirmiſh with the ſouldiors of Millan, in which Burbon was in perſon: Thintention of the Duke of Vrbin was to ſtay at Pioltello vntill the fortifications were ended at Monce, where he deuiſed to leaue in garriſon two thouſand footmen with certayne helpes of horſmen, and ſo to go to Marignan where he was determined to lodge the army: and from thence hauing firſt taken and fortified that place & alſo Biagreſſa as he ſuppoſed, he thought to ſend bands of men to Genes: Expeditions which drew with thē ſo long an execution that there was reaſon to accuſe him, notwithſtāding that he alleaged for one part of his excuſe the yll prouiſions of the Venetians, who not paying their footemen in time conuenient, neither had they their nūbers complet which were promiſed, & many of thoſe which they had diminiſhed alwayes for the vncertenty of their payes, the Duke was conſtrayned when the pay dayes came, to furniſh their places with others, in ſuche ſort as he ſeemed to haue euery day new companies and a new armie. But this deferring or protraction which hitherunto ſeemed voluntarie, began to haue a cauſe and cooller of neceſſitie: for after many negociations and practiſes holden in Germany to ſende a new ſtrength of footmen into Italy, the ſame ſeruing to no effect aſwell for the diſhabilitie of tharchduke, as for the pouertie of themprour who ſente no money thither: George Frougſpergh for the affection he bare to the affayres of the Emprour, ioyned to a deſire to aduaunce the glory of his nation, and who with great merite had at two ſeuerall tymes commaunded in Italy two great armies for the Emprour agaynſt the Frenchmen; determined to ſupply with his goods and faculties priuate, the charge which princes for their weaknes were not able to vndertake: he ſtirred vp with his authority many bands of footmen, whom he allured with the ſweete inſinuation of pray and booty, concurring withall the good oportunitie and occaſion that offred to make them riche with the ſpoyles of Italy: And after he had contracted with them that in receiuing for euery man a crowne in preſt, they would follow him to the ſuccors of themprour, And obteined of tharchduke certen aydes of horſmen and artilleries, he prepared to marche, making the generall mooſter and leauye of all his men betweene Bolzano and Maran. The rumor of this preparation for the ſodenneſſe not exſpected, and for the authoritie of the man muche redowted, pearcing eaſily into the bowells of Italy, was the cauſe that the Duke of Vrbin wente not on with hys reſolution to moleſt Genes, whiche was nowe reduced almoſte to the laſte extremitye: And yet Andrea Dore for that he woulde haue thexpedition aduaunced, abated ſome parte of his firſt demaunds, and required nowe but fifteene hundred footemen, making his reckoning to furniſhe the reſidue by his owne meanes: But the Duke refuſing alſo that demaunde, alleaged for his excuſe, that it was neceſſarye to ſende from the army vppon the countrey of Vincenſa, a ſtrength of 1500. footmen of the Venetians, for a feare which that Senate had leaſt the army of the launceknightes would take that way: An opinion which the Duke confuted, perſwading him ſelf that they would rather take the way of Lecqua, and for that reaſon he ſtirred not from Pioltella for that he would be more neare the ryuer of Adda, And he publiſhed that he would march to mete them and fight with them beyond Adda at their comming out of the vale of Sarcina.

By theſe variations as the affaires of Lombardy began to draw to new & farre greater difficulties, ſo alſo there burſt out in the towne of Rome a freſh fyre of trouble and new vexation: for the Pope, who for the accident of the Colonnois was pulled downe in courage, and in an inclination to peace, was bent to goe by ſea to Barcelona to contract ſome accorde with themprour: aſſoone as his enemies were gone out of Rome, had ſent Paule d'Arezze his chamberlayne to the french king, and from him to paſſe to the Emprour with his priuitie, to negociate the peace: his commiſſions extended alſo to ſignifie to the king his neceſſities & his daungers, and to demaund an hundred thouſand crownes for his better defence: In which matters he ſeemed ſo diſcordant and diſagreable to himſelfe, that in demaunding money of the king, and vrging him to a greater readines in the warre, he would not only not conſent to the tenthes without condition of a moytie to himſelf, which the king refuſed vnder this reaſon that it was cõtrary to the tradition & vſage of Fraunce: but alſo in his contradiction he could not be reſolued to create Cardinal the Chauncellor Prat, who both for the authority & ſwaigh he bare in the kings councells, and for that all expeditiõs of money paſſed through his handes, might haue bene a neceſſarie inſtrument to helpe forward all his purpoſes: Suche was his confuſion, that his counſells were no leſſe dilatorie and ſlowe, then the execution vncertayne and irreſolute: which paſſion as it tooke beginning of his aſtoniſhment for the tumult of the Colonnois, ſo it went on encreaſing by newe terrours whoſe operations ledde him into manyfeſt contradiction in matters concerning his owne ſafetie. But the French king forgat not to be ſorrowfull with Paule d'Arezzo and the other Nuncios, for the accident of Rome, and in that compaſſion he offred to the Pope all things for his defence, and wiſhing he would reapoſe no more confidence in themprour, he aduiſed him to perſeuer no longer in the truce: vppon which condition and not otherwiſe, he promiſed ſtill to ſatisfie the twentie thouſande duckets which he was bound vnto for euery moneth. To this the Pope was alſo aduiſed by the king of Englande, who diſſwaded him from his voyage to Barcelona, and to comfort his preſent diſtreſſe, he ſent him xxv. thouſand duckets. The French king diſcounſelled the Pope from his purpoſe to go viſite the Princes of Chriſtendome, as being a matter which for the importance required a deeper conſultation: And at the firſt he refuſed to conſent that Paule d'Arezze ſhould go to themprour, eyther for ſuſpicion that the Pope would begin to enterteine with him ſome practiſe ſeperat, or elſe that he helde it a matter more honorable to worke the peace by the meane of the kinge of Englande, then to ſeeme vnder thoſe wayes to begge it of themprour: Neuertheleſſe by a newe inſtance made by the Pope, he gaue his conſent to lette hym goe, eyther for that he deſyred the peace in deede, or elſe becauſe he beganne not well to brooke to haue it wrought by the king of Englande: who bare ſuche a hande and gouernment in theſe actions, that the French king coulde not but doubt, leaſt for his intereſtes particular, he would drawe him to conditions harde and inconuenient: Wherein he tooke the reaſon of his doubt vppon the diſpoſition of the king of Englande, or rather

the Cardinall of Yorke vnder his name, who caried with ambition and a glorious desire to be iudge of all, set downe conditions very straunge and farre of, and hauing also endes different from the purposes of others, he feared by reason of those endes least he woulde suffer him to be abused by themprour, and woulde not be grieued that the Duchie of Millan should fall vpon the person of the Duke of Burbon by the benefite of the peace so farreforth as he maryed themprours sister, to thende it remayned in his power to giue his daughter in mariage to the Frenche king. So that what by these perswasions tendred to the Pope by the one and other king, and what through his feare not to loase thamity of the confederates, and so by the priuation of their aydes, to remaine in pray to themprour and his officers: and what by thimportunities and vehement inducements of his owne counsellors: and what for the hatred and disdayne conceyued agaynst the Colonnois, together with the burning desire to recouer by way of reuenge the honor he had lost: he was induced to conuert against the townes & lands of the Colonnois, all those forces which he had called into Rome onely for the surety of his person. And in this variation and ballansing of reasons and causes, he iudged there was no law of equitie nor order to compell him to obserue thaccord which he had not made by will and free consent, but vnder the abuse of their fraudes and forced by their armes contrary to the law of fayth: he sent out immediatly Vitelly with his companies to vex the lands of the Colonnois, making his account to burne and raze all their townes, for that for the auncient affection of thinhabitantes, it could not be a matter very preiudicial to them to take the townes only without doing other violence: And in the humor of his anger he published a Bull against the Cardinall and others of that famuly, by vertue wherof he proceded afterwards to depriue the Cardinall of the purple hat, who seeking before to defend himselfe with the bull of symonie, had made publike appellations at Naples, and had appealed to the generall councell to come: onely the Pope deferred to pronounce sentence against the residue of the house of the Colonnois, who were not negligent to wage both horsmen & footmen in the realme of Naples: But the Popes bands being entred into their towns, they burned Marina, & Montfortin whose Castel held good as yet for the Colonnois: And in this rage of victory & aduantage, they rased Gallicana and Tagarola, the Colonnois being careles of al other townes, then to defend their places of strength, & chiefly the towne of Paliano which is a pece strong by situation & of very hard accesse for great artilleries: besides, hath no accesse but by three wayes wherof one can not succor an other: and hauing about it walls of good fortification & thicknes, the inhabitants were determined with great resolution to defend it: Neuertheles it was beleued that if he had marched with diligence to assayle it notwithstanding many of thinhabitants of those towns that had bin taken were retyred thyther, he had easily caried it, for that there was not a souldior within it: but whilest he stood temporising & deferring to go thither, folowing the inclination & working of his nature which was full of irresolution & feare when things were to be put in execution: There entred into the towne by night a strength of 500. footemen aswell launceknights as Italians, being sent from the realme of Naples: a relefe which as it made the taking of the towne so hard & desperate, that Vitelli who at the same time kept his companies about Grotta Ferrata, not daring to attempt further enterprise vpon Paliano, & much lesse to execute any action against the peece called the Popes rock: So after he had sent to batter with his artilleries the rock of Montfortin garded by the Colonnois, he determined to gather together all his forces at Valmonton, more to looke to the defence of the contrey if any stirre or emotion were made on Naples

ſide, then with hope to be able to do any thing of importance: for the which he was blamed much of the Pope, who at a tyme when his deuiſe was to inuade the kingdome Naples, and afterwards when he called into Rome the regimentes for his defence, wiſhed to be ſent thither Vitelli & Iohn de Medicis, two capteines who as they were conioyned together by amitie and alliance, ſo by a naturall correſpondency of complexion, the ſlownes and coldnes of the one ſeemed ſufficient both to ballance and temper and alſo to be ballanced and tempered of the valour and forwardnes of the other: But deſtenie drawing to a ſodayne death in Lombardy Iohn de Medicis, and the Pope by the counſell of his lieftenant ſeruing his turne in the meane while of Vitelly in leſſer things, had deferred to call Iohn de Medicis vntil either there were a greater neceſſity of him, or elſe he taried for an offer & occaſiõ of ſome more worthy enterpriſe: Wherein his reaſon to forbeare ſo long to call Iohn de Medicis, was, that he would not depriue the armie that was in Lombardy of a perſonage of ſo many merites and good partes, who by his reſolution and forwardnes gaue no litle terror to his enemies, and by his vertue and prouidence dyd muche aſſure his friends: And one inducement helping to his ſtaye and abyding, was, the rumour which by relation of eſpials redoubled dayly, of the diſcending of the launceknights for themprour, whoſe comming ioyned to thaduertiſements that ranne of the Spaniſhe Nauy to be vpon the poynt to depart out of the port of Carthage, conſtrayned the Pope (being withall vrged by many of the confederates and by his owne counſellors) to deuiſe, contrary to his meaning alwayes before, to make ſome compoſition with the Duke of Ferrara: Not ſo muche to ſtande aſſured of his conſpiracies and emotions, as to drawe from him ſome great quantitie of money, and to induce him to goe to the armie as Capteine generall of all the League: Wherein after he had many tymes delt with Matthevv Caſella the Dukes Embaſſador reſident wyth him, who aſſured him that in the Duke was no want of inclination that waye: he ſent to his lieftenaunt Guicciardin, who was then at Parma, to goe to Ferrara, furniſhing him with a Commiſſion very large in apparance, but in deede full of reſtraints and limitations, for that he would haue him conſent to render to the Duke of Ferrara the townes of Modena and Reggia: and he to paye in recompence and counterchaunge, in a very ſhort time, two hundred thouſande duckets: To binde the Duke to declare and proteſt openly and to goe to the armie as Capteine generall of the League: That his eldeſt ſonne ſhould take in mariage Catherine the daughter of Lavvrence de Medicis: That there ſhould be labor made to giue one of the Dukes daughters in mariage to Hippolito de Medicis ſonne of Iulian, with a conuenient dowry: Many other conditions were annexed to this commiſſion, whiche for that by their owne varietie and for the ſhortnes of the time, were almoſt impoſſible to be decided, yet the Pope notwithſtanding he condiſcended not to them but by a laſte neceſſitie, yet he charged him not to paſſe thaccorde nor to growe to abſolute concluſion tyll he had from him newe directions and other inſtructions: But not long after he enlarged his commiſſion, aſwell for regarde of the conditions, as for authoritie and power to conclude: The reaſon of this amplification was, that he had receyued credible aduertiſement, howe the Viceroy of Naples was aryued with xxxij. ſhippes, in the gulffe of S. Florent in Corſika, and had brought with him three hundred horſe, two thouſande launceknightes, and three or foure thouſande Spaniards footemen. But nowe the Popes will and working was to litle purpoſe, for that a gentleman of the Duke of Ferraraes beeing with the Viceroy, who with great diligence was diſpatched from the place abouesayde, did not onely ſignifie to the duke

the comming of the army by sea, but also he caryed vnto him from themprour, the inuestiture of Modena and Reggia, with wordes of promise of the next mariage of Lady Margerit d'Austriche bastarde daughter to themprour, with Hercules eldest sonne to the Duke: By reason of which aduertisementes, the Duke, who before exspected with great desire the comming of the lieftenant, began nowe vnder the accident of this occasion to chaunge counsell: and discerning both by the approche of the launceknightes and discending of the army by sea, some good fortune to beginne to followe themprours affayres, he sayled not to embrace thopportunitie to followe the streame, and in that variation of minde sent a Counsellor of his called Iames Aluator to signifie to the Popes lieftenant, who being gone from Parma was then at Centa, the expedition he had receyued out of Spayne: By the which, albeit he was not bound to declare himselfe neither agaynst the Pope, nor against the league, yet for that he had receyued so great a benefite by themprour, it was not reasonable he should enterteine any further practise agaynst him: In which regarde, the negociation for the which he went to Ferrara being dissolued, he thought good to giue him signification of it, to thende not to giue the Pope by his silence any iuste cause of discontentment against him: Neuertheless he would not forbid him to come to Ferrara, but left it referred to his good discression. The Lieftenant discerned manyfestly by this relation that it would be in vayne for him to go on to Ferrara, In which respect ioyning withall thinterest of the Popes reputation to follow a voyage wherin was so small hope of fruite, and beeing also called backe by the necessitie of the affayres of Lombardy, he gaue place to the operation of the time, and returned immediatly to Modena, after he had (notwithstanding) preferred in other forme new solicitations of accord, the rather for that the state of the Church on that side grew dayly reduced into farre greater daungers: for that George Fronspergh with his army of launceknightes conteyning thirteene or fourteene thousande, taking their waye by the vale of Sabio, & so passing by the rocke of Anfo towards Salo, were now come to Chastillion vpon the confines of Mantua. The Duke of Vrbin not many dayes before to be the more ready to encounter the Launceknightes, had ledde the army of the league to Vavvry vpon the ryuer of Adda betwene Trezza and Cassan, and there had erected a bridge and fortified his campe: And leauing at Vavvry the Marquis of Salussa with the French bandes, the Svvizzers, the Grisons, and his owne footemen, he departed him selfe from Vavvry the xix. of Nouember, leading with him Iohn de Medicis, six hundred men at armes, many cornets of light horsemen, and eyght or nyne thousande footemen: His intention was not to set vpon them directly in the playne field, but to vex them with incommodities and cut off their releefes and vittels, alleaging that the onely way to vanquishe men of that humor, was to driue them to fall into some disorder, which being well obserued and applied, would do them greater domage then a manyfest inuasion: In whiche minde the one and twenty day he aryued at Souzin, from whence he caused to aduaunce forward Mercurio with all the light horsemen and a bande of men at armes, and they to intangle thenemie with skirmish whyleste the whole army might haue time to ouertake them: The reason of that aduauncing of the light horsemen and hastie marching of the army after, was, for that he feared he should come very late being lodged the same day at Cauriano: by which occasion excusing himselfe of his long tarying at Vavvry, he layde the fault vpon the negligence and couetousnes of the treasorer Pisani, through whose fault the campe was constrayned to remayne there a daye or two more, tarying for the oxen that should drawe thartilleries: of which fault he allea-ged afterwards did proceede a very great disorder, extending almost to the ruine of the whole enterprise. Vntill that time there was great doubt what way the launce-knightes would take, for that at first it was beleeued they would drawe towards Adda by Bressia and Bergama, with purpose to be mette by the bandes imperialls, and so to goe with them to Millan: And afterwards it was supposed that they would passe the ryuer of Pavv at Casalmaior, and from thence would take their orderly march to Millan: But being come the xxij. day to Ryuolto within eyght myles of Mantua betwene the ryuers of Minceo and Oglio, the Duke of Vrbin lodging the same daye at Prato, Albuino, it was knowen (for that they passed not Minceo at Goito) that they would goe on to passe Pavv rather at Bourgfort or Viadana then at Ostia or in the places more lower: But passing at Ostia, it was a manifest signe that they would take the way of Modena and Bolognia, in both which places there was made leauyes of footemen and other prouisions: Afterwards the Launceknightes tooke the way of Bourgfort the xxiiij. day, whither, because they had no artilleries, the Duke of Ferrara sent them foure Falconets by the ryuer of Pavv, which though of it selfe was but a very slender succour, yet it was very profitable to the seruice by the benefite of fortune: for, as the Duke of Vrbin in following them was entred within the straite of Mantua, within the which they were as yet: So in their approching to Bourgfort, Iohn de Medicis made after them with his light horsemen to charge them vpon the tayle, though with no reason or hope to do any great matter: and as he accoasted them very neare, not knowing that they had any artilleries, his destenie led him on in that secure resolution to the daunger of his life, for that with the second shotte of one of those Falconets, his legge was broken a little aboue the knee, from whence being caryed wounded to Mantua, he ended his life there within fewe dayes after to the great preiudice of thenterprise, since thenemies neuer stoode in feare of any mans armes or vallour, then of his: for notwithstanding he had but xxij. yeares of age, and by that disposition of youthe, was full of heate and forwardnes, yet his experience and vertue subdued to moderation and temperaunce the rage of nature and youth, and dayly raunged to good order and discression, those violent humors which through the intemperancie of his youth tooke libertie to stirre in him: And by the tokens of industrie and wisedome appearing more and more in him, he caried an assured exspectation to become in tyme a capteine moste sufficient and accomplished in all things concerning the science of warre. After this the Launce-knightes without any impediment drew along the ryuer of Pavv to Ostia, the Duke of Vrbin being at Bourgfort: And hauing passed ouer Pavv at Ostia the xxviij. day, they incamped at Rouero, where the Duke of Ferrara sent them a certayne releefe of money, and furnished them with some field peeces. But the inhabitantes of Bolognia and all Tuskane began to be very fearefull, for that the Duke of Vrbin, notwithstanding he had assured before that if thenemies passed the ryuer of Pavv, he would do the like, was gone to Mantua, saying he would tary in that place for a commission from the Senate of Venice, to direct him whether he should passe Pavv or not: But the launceknightes after they had passed the ryuer of Sechia, turned to the waye of Lombardy to ioyne with the companies that were within Millan.

At which tyme the Viceroy, who was departed from Corsika with xxv. vessells (for two of his shippes were perished in a storme before he came to S. Florent, and fiue others were seperate from the Nauy abyding their fortune) encountred aboue Sestria in the Leuant, the Nauy of the league, whiche conteyned sixe gallies of the French, fiue of the Popes, and fiue of the Venetians: and beeing grappled together aboue aboue Codemont, they fought from two of the clocke tyll night: In which conflict it is written by Andrea Dore that he sunke one of their shippes wherein were more then three hundred men, and did manye other great domages to the whole fleete with his artilleries: He wrote also that for the stormy season the gallies were constrayned to retyre vnder the hyll of Portofino, exspecting the same night the other gallies that were at Portouenere: But whether they came or not, he wrote that vpon the appearing of the day they would go seeke thenemie: Neuertheles albeit they followed the fleete to Lyuorno, yet they coulde neuer ouertake it, for the waye they had wonne affore them, by which occasion beleeuing that the fleete had runne vp eyther into Corso or into Sardignia, they were so much the lesse ready in diligence to followe it. Afterwards the Viceroy followed his way, but so shaken with stormes and & tempests, that his shipps were dispersed, wherof one of them cõmaunded by Don Ferrand de Gonsaguo, was driuen into Sicile, which afterwards came to Caietto, where were set on lande certayne launceknightes: But touching him selfe he aryued with the residue of the nauy at the Port of Saint Stephen, from whence for that he was vncertayne in what condition or tearmes stoode the affayres, he sent to the Pope at Rome the Commander Pigualoso, with commissions expressing the good intentions of themprour: And after the rage of the sea was abated, he sayled with his Nauie to Caietto.

Encounter of the Nauye of themprour with the fleete of the confederates.

The prince of Orenge with the Launceknights.

In this meane while the launceknightes after they had passed the ryuer of Secchia and were drawne towardes Razzolo and Gonsaguo, lodged the thirde day of December at Guastallo, and the fourth day at Newcastell and Povvy which is ten miles from Parma: There the prince of Orenge came to them passing from Mantua with two companions in the habit of a simple harquebuzier: The fift day after they had passed the ryuer of Lenze aboue the bridge and the high way, they lodged at Monchiaroncolo, the Duke of Vrbin remayning yet at Mantua with his wife and was not touched with the present daunger of thaffayres: The seuenth day after they had passed the ryuer beyonde Parma, they bestowed them selues in the villages of Felina. At that tyme the raynes fell great and thicke whereby the ryuers swelled high and broade, and Capteine George by the relation of his letters written to the Duke of Burbon and surprised by espiall, showed himselfe very irresolute what course to take. The xi. day they passed the ryuer of Taro, and the daye following they lodged at the borowe Saint Donin, where they exercised their malice against holy relikes and images of Saints: The xiij. day they incamped at Firenzolo, from whence as was discerned by surprising of letters, they solicited the bandes of Millan to come and ioyne with them, who albeit were agreing with them in they same desire, yet the were reteyned by want of money: for the penurie of the Spaniardes carying them into mindes insolent and disobedient, made them bolde to saye that they would not departe out of Millan, vnlesse they were satisfied of their olde payes, and in that disorder they began to sacke and spoyle: But at laste to stoppe the course of so daungerour a mutinie, the industrie of the Capteines reappeased the angrie mindes of the souldiours, who were contented to receyue onely fiue payes, which to furnishe and accomplish they were driuen to despoyle the Churches of their plate, and to imprison many Citizens: Wherein the better to conteine the whole in safety, such of the souldiours as were payde the Capteines sent to Pauia, though with very greate difficultie, for that they were loth to leaue the place where they had liued with so great libertie: And because the action of these things would require some time, the Capteines in the meane while sent beyonde Pavv certayne bands of horsemen and footemen Italians to ioyne with the launceknightes: And albeit the Popes Lieftenant had made instance, that the duke of Vrbin for the better suretie of the state of the Church, would passe the ryuer of Pavv on that side with the Venetian regimentes: yet the Duke had not onely deferred to passe, alleaging sometimes that he exspected the will and resolution of the Venetians, and sometimes temporising vppon other causes and reasons, but also he gaue signification to the Senate, that if he should leade the army ouer the ryuer of Pavv, there would be daunger least thimperialls would inuade their estates: for which allegation holding more vppon feare then good reason of warre, he receyued straite charge from them not to passe the ryuer: And he had also in that regarde reteined many dayes the bands of footemen that were vnder the commaundement of Iohn de Medicis, whom the Lieftenant had vehementlye solicited to passe Pavv for the defence of the affayres of the Church. And where as the Marquis of Saluſſa had passed the ryuer of Adda, of whō the Lieftenant had required succours aswell to assure the things of the Churche, as for that by the great diminution of the Svvizzers and Griſons, he sawe himselfe not strong ynough at Vavvry: Nowe the Venetians who before had consented that the Marquis should passe Pavv to the succours of the Pope with ten thousande footemen both Svvizzers and of his owne people, who were payed with the forty thousande duckets allotted to the Frenche king, besought the Duke of Vrbin that they might not be ledde ouer the ryuer, beeing thereunto moued and induced by the perswasions of the sayde Duke: By reason whereof the Duke sending him worde that he would conferre with him at Sovvzin deferred his comming so long, that the Marquis went his way: Wherein suche was eyther his negligence of the affayres, or his tymerous condition, that he did not onely all he could to make him to staye, to thende to beholde with better eye what the launceknightes would do, but also he made manifest perswasions to him not to passe at all, An occasion that somewhat stayed him in thexpedition, as also that the payes of the Svvizzers were not ready, who were payde after the rate of sixe thousande and were in trueth but foure thousande: And albeit for that impediment he deferred to passe vntill the xxvij. of December, yet he sent abrode into diuerse places of the contrey, the french horsemen with certayne bands of footmen, to stoppe the passage of vittells to the launceknightes, who had nowe remayned many dayes at Firenzola: for that seruice also was sent Guido Vuine to the borowe of Saint Domin with an hundred light horsmen: and Paule Luſaſquo came out of Plaiſanca with a good trowpe of horsemen, and drew neare to Firenzola, from which place one part of the launceknightes went to lodge at the borowe of Arquo for the more commoditie of vittells: For feare of the sayde launceknightes Plaiſanca had bene refurnished before, but not with so sufficient forces as were thought conuenient for the defence of the place, for that the Popes lieftenaunt who had alwayes feared since the cōming of the launceknights, least the difficulties to aduaunce their expeditions in Lombardy, would not force thimperialls to passe into Tuskane, wished that they would desire to go incampe before Plaiſanca: for which reason vnknowen to all men yea euen to the Pope himself, he so deferred to furnishe Plaiſanca that they might despayre to be hable to take it: and yet he manned it and fortified it in suche sorte as they could not easily cary it, leauing this hope, that if they went thither he could not lacke meane to reskew it: But by the long abode which the launceknights made in the places thereabout, and the vniuersall exclamations of all men touching the daunger, least that citie should be taken, he was driuen to suffer Guido Rangon to goe thither with a great companie

of ſouldiours, like as alſo according to the direction of the Venetians, who had promiſed to ſende thither for garriſon a thouſande footemen to ſuccour the Popes neceſſitie, Nabbon de Naldo one of their capteines, was diſpatched thither with a regiment of a thouſande footemen: but becauſe they were yll payde, they were immediatly diminiſhed to foure hundred. At laſte the Marquis of Saluſſa paſſed the ryuer, who in true mooſter and computation had not in his army aboue foure thouſande Svvizzers and Griſons, and three thouſand footmen of his owne: And being come to Puleſina, notwithſtanding he was deſired not to depart from thence the better to vex the launceknightes who were at Firenzola, whither Luſaſquo made incurſions many times euen vp to their lodgings, yet for his better ſuretie he went vp to Torricella and Siſſa: But amidde theſe marchings and remouings of ſouldiours and regiments, the launceknightes within two dayes after brake vp from Firenzola, and went to Carpinetta and the places thereaboutes: Neyther was it knowen what courſe the Duke of Burbon would take, whether he would plant his campe before Plaiſanca being come out of Millan, or whether he would paſſe further in the expedition of Tuskane: Afterwards the launceknightes paſſed the ryuer of Nuro the laſte daye of the yere, to thend to paſſe afterwards the ryuer of Trebbia, and to tary for the Duke of Burbon in that place, which was leaſt ſubiect to thincurſions of thenemie.

Thus the affayres of Lombardy proceeded in a ſlowe courſe, not ſo muche for the ſeaſon of the yeare which was ſharpe and full of incommodities, as for the difficulties which the Duke of Burbon had to pay his ſouldiours wherein reſted not the leaſt impedimentes to the good fortune and felicitie of the warre. The wretched people of Millan were wonderfully trauelled for prouiſion of money, In which neceſſitie or rather tyrannie, Ierome Moron beeing condemned to death, compounded the night before he ſhould ſuffer, to paye twenty thouſande duckets, for the whiche it ſeemed they had paſſed him to ſentence of death: But after the releeſe of his purſe had auoyded the daunger of his life, & vnder the ſame good meane his perſon was deliuered out of priſon, ſuche was the courſe of his deſteny working inſtrumentally by the dexteritie of his ſpirite and witte, that of a priſoner to the Duke of Burbon, he became his councellor, and within ſhort time he went on by the operation of hys witte, tyll he became almoſte his onely gouernor and director. Ierom Moron out of priſon.

Neuertheleſſe amid all theſe variations and vexations, the treatiſes of truce or peace were great betwene the Pope and the Viceroy, though in good meaning the plottes and purpoſes of the Viceroy tended rather to make warre, wherein he was ſet on both by thincitation of the Colonnois, who had breathed into him a new life ſince he came to Caietto, and alſo becauſe he vnderſtoode that the Pope no leſſe abated in courage then naked in money, founde nothing ſo ſweete as the deſire of peace: Wherein both publiſhing to all the world his pouerty and his feare, and in his confuſion refuſing to create Cardinalls for money according to the counſell that was giuen him, the demonſtrations he made of his owne weaknes, gaue courage and hope to who ſo euer would offende him: for as the Pope not entring into the warre with that conſtancie of minde that apperteined, had ſent to themprour a letter the xxvj. of Iune, conteyning matter bitter and full of complayntes, that he droue him by neceſſitie to intende to the warre: So alſo fearing afterwardes leaſt by the ſharpe phraſes of that letter he might further incenſe themprour whom he ſo much feared, he ſent after an other expedition compounded of an humor more temperate and reformed, charging his Nuncio to reteyne the firſt, which neuertheles was deliuered for that it came firſt to his handes: the other was preſented afterwardes, but themprour vnder one expedition, aunſwered them both ſeuerally according to the argument and nature of matter they conteyned. Moreouer the Pope had readely harkned to the generall of grayfreers, who going into Spayne at ſuche time as the warre began, was charged by him to deliuer to themprour embaſſages milde and full of amitie: And beeing eftſones returned to Rome by commiſſion of themprour, he brought many reapportes and informations touching his good intention, and howe he would be content to come into Italy with a trayne of fiue thouſande men, and from thence after he had taken the Crowne of thempire, he would paſſe into Germany to ſet downe ſome forme to the matters of Luther, without ſpeaking any thing of the Councell: That he was alſo well inclined to accorde with the Venetians vnder reaſonable conditions: That he would referre the cauſe of Frauncis Sforce to the arbitration of two Iudges aſſigned by the Pope and him, and in caſe he were condemned, he would beſtow that eſtate vpon the Duke of Burbon: That he would reuoke his army out of Italy, ſo farreforth as the Pope & Venetians would pay three hundred thouſande crownes to ſatisfie the wages of the army, which notwithſtanding he would labour to make contented with a ſumme more moderate: That he would reſtore to the French king his children, receyuing in counterchaunge two millions of golde at two or more tearmes: He ſhowed alſo that it would be eaſie to accorde with the king of Englande, bothe for that the ſumme that was in queſtion was not great, and alſo the king had made offer of it. And the better to debate and worke theſe matters, the generall of grayfreers offred a truce for viij. or x. moneths, proteſting that he had warrantes and commiſſions from themprour verye large and abſolute, wherein all power of negociation and concluſion was giuen to him, to the Viceroy, and to Don Hugo: In regarde of which authoritie, and good inclination of themprour, the Pope, after he had giuen audience to Pignaloſo, and had receyued aduertiſement that the Viceroy was gone out of the porte of S. Stephen, ſent the Generall to Caietta to treate vpon theſe matters with him: Whereunto he was the rather induced, for that bothe the Venetians woulde not refuſe the truce if the French king would conſent, who for his part was not farre eſtraunged from it, and his mother had ſent to Rome Lavvrence Tuskane declaring an inclination to peace, wherein ſhoulde be a generall comprehenſion of all men. And alſo for that he thought no practiſe to be ſure without the will and concurrencie of the Duke of Burbon, he ſent to him in that behalfe one of his owne Amners that was at Rome, whom the Duke returned eftſones to the Pope to ſolicite the ſame matter: And yet neither to loaſe thoportunitie of the time, nor to abandon the prouiſions for the warre, he ſent Cardinall Auguſtin Triuulco as Legate to the army which was then in the field, And continuing alſo his preparations to inuade the Realme of Naples, Peter Nauarre ariued the third of December at Ciuitavecchia with a Nauy of xxviij. gallies of the Popes, the French, and the Venetians: At which time alſo Ranſo de Cere being ſent for the french king for thexpedition intended vpon Naples, was ariued at Sauonna with a fleete of ſayles quartered: On the other ſide Askanio Colonno with a ſtrength of two thouſande footemen and three hundred horſemen, came to Valbon fifteene miles from Tiboli, where are the landes of the Abbot of Farfa and Iohn Iordan: with theſe forces the twelfth of December he tooke Cepperano, finding no reſiſtance for that it was not garded. Vitelly with the Popes companies reduced himſelf betwene Tiboly, Paleſtime, and Velletre: Afterwardes the Colonnois tooke Pontecorue which was not garded, and in vayne gaue aſſault to Scarpa which is a litle and weake place depending vpon the Abbey of Farfa: Cæſar Filettin approached by night to

Alagnia with fiftene hundred footemen, of which fiue hundred making their entrie secretly, by the fauour of a house ioyning to the walles, and by the practise of certen of the townesmen that receiued them, were repulsed and driuen out agayne by Lyon de Fano commaunder of the footemen that were there. In this meane while the generall of grayfreers returned from the Viceroy to the Pope, to whom he related the Viceroyes inclination to consent to the truce for certayne monethes, to thende that in the meane while the peace might take course: Only he stoode vpon demaundes of money, and for suretie he required the Castells of Ostia and Ciuitavecchia. But of the contrary to him, tharchbishop of Capua aryuing at Caietta after he was departed, and who happly had bene sent thither with an yll counsel of the Pope, wrote to him that the Viceroy reiecting all motions to truce, was contented to make peace with the Pope onely, or with the Pope and Venetians ioyntly, so farreforth as they would make payment of money to thend to mainteine the army for assurance of the peace, and afterwards to debate in the matter of the truce with the others: An alteration moūing eyther by the variation or chaunge of the Viceroy, or happly by the perswasions of tharchbishop as many suspected: At which time Paule d'Arezze being come to themprours Court with authoritie from the Pope, the Venetians, and Frauncis Sforce, whither also went by the motiō of the king of England for the negociation of peace, the Auditor of the Chamber, the rather for that before were come thither full commissions from the french king: He found themprour wholy chaunged both in minde & will, taking the reason of his alteration vpon an aduertisement he had receiued of the army of the launceknightes, and of his Nauy in Italy: In so much as enforcing the fauor of that good aduauntage, he fled from all the conditions that were set downe before, and vrged vehemently that the French king should obserue absolutely thaccord of Madrill, & to haue the cause of Frauncis Sforce heard by law before Iudges assigned by himselfe. Thus did both the will and intention of themprour vary according to the successe of affayres, like as also his commissions which he sent to his Agentes in Italy, bare alwayes by reason of the distance of the place, eyther an expresse or silent condition to gouerne themselues according to the variation of times and occasions. Therfore the Viceroy after he had many dayes abused the Pope with vayne practises, and would not so muche as consent to a surceance of armes for a few daies till the negociation might soart to some issue: brake vp from Naples the xx. of December to goe into thestates of the Church, In which wilfulnesse he offred many new and very straunge conditions of accorde.

Capitulations betwene thē-prour & duke of Ferrara.

But to returne to the laste daye of the yeare, wherein the Launceknightes as we haue sayde passed the ryuer of Nure: The same day also the Duke of Ferrara, by the meane of his Embassador, capitulated with the Viceroy and Don Hugo who had commission from themprour: Neuertheles the capitulation was made with a very small liking of that Embassador, for that he was almoste constrayned to consent by the threates and rude words of the Viceroy: Tharticles of the capitulation were these: That the duke of Ferrara should be bounde aswell in his person as in his estates, to serue themprour agaynst all his enemies: That he should be capteine generall for themprour in Italy, with a company of an hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horsemen, onely he should assemble and leauy them at his owne charges, and receyue agayne allowance in his accountes: That he should presently receyue the towne of Carpy and the Castell of Nouy which had apperteined to Albert Pio, for the dowry of themprours bastard daughter promised to his sonne, onely the reuenues should be aunswered in account of the souldiors, a compensation to be made vntill

the consummation of the mariage: And that Vespatian Colonno and the Marquis of Guast should disclayme and renounce the rightes which they pretended to them: That he should pay the summe of two hundred thousand duckets, when he had recouered Modena: but out of that should be deducted that which he had giuen to the Viceroy since the battell of Pauia: That if he did not recouer Modena, all the summes of money which he had before disbursed, should be eftsones repayed to him: That themprour should be bound to his protection, & not to make peace without comprehending him, and not without obteining for him of the Pope, absolution of the paynes and censures which he had incurred euer since he was declared confederate to themprour: And lastly that he should vse all his meanes and authoritie to the Pope to absolue him of all those penalties and transgressions which he had runne into before. Thus in the ende of the yere a thousande fiue hundred and sixe & twentie all things prepared and tended to a manyfest and open warre.

THE EIGHTEENTH BOOKE OF THE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

1427. NOW ensueth the yeare of our Lorde a thousande fiue hundred and seuen and twenty: A yeare prepared to many harde euentes and accidentes, suche as for their crueltie were full of feare and daunger, and for their straungenes, had no example or experience with the worldes and ages before: For in the predictions of this yeare was expressed an vniuersall face of troubles and confusion, of mutation of estates, of captiuitie of princes, of desolation of Cities, of dearth of vittelles, and of a generall visitation of the plague, yea through all the regions and climates of Italy, there was no apparance nor contemplation of other thing then of blood, death, famine, and fleeing, A condition lamentable euen to forreiners and straungers that dyd but heare of it, but moste moſte intollerable to thoſe miſerable wretches vpon whoſe neckes the lawe of deſtenie had drawne ſo grieuous a yoke. To theſe calamities there was no other thing that ſtayed the action of beginning and execution, but the difficulties whiche the Duke of Burbon founde to make the regimentes of Spaniſhe footemen to departe out of Millan: for where he had determined that Anthony de Leua ſhoulde abide there for the defence of the whole Duchie, and reteyne with him all thoſe bands of Launceknightes which were there before, for whoſe enterteinmentes and payes were conſumed bothe all the moneyes exacted at tymes vppon the Millannois, and alſo ſuche other ſummes as were leauyed by the billes of exchaunge which the Duke of Burbon brought from Spayne: And where he had alſo appoynted to remayne with the ſayd Leua for the ſeruice of the Duchie, a ſtrength of twelue hundred footemen Spaniardes, together with ſome bandes of Italian footemen vnder the leading of Lodovvike Bellienſe and other commaunders: So likewiſe by their example all the other bandes and regimentes of ſouldiors, for that they had in pray the houſes, the wyues, and daughters of thinhabitantes of Millan, were not diſcontented to liue ſtill in that eſtate of licentious libertie: But for that both for the neceſſitie of the preſent ſeruice, and regarde of their proper honor, and laſtely for the awe and authoritie of the Duke of Burbon, they coulde not directly refuſe the appoyntment, they demaunded at leaſt to be ſatisfied before they departed of their payes due to them before that daye: Neuertheleſſe what by the force of reaſons and perſwaſions, and what by the example of ſome particulars inducing the reſidue by their good inclination, they promiſed at laſte to followe the Duke ſo farrefoorth as he would paye them onely fiue payes, A condition verye harde to accompliſhe and furniſhe, for that there was no poſſibilitie to make anye more leauyes of money of thinhabitantes of Millan, neither by way of rigor or threatninges, nor by ſacking their houſes, nor by impriſoning their perſons: Beſides, in that eſtate of extreame violence and oppreſſion, ſuche as were abſente and had abandoned the towne, were adiorned and taxed at rates to nouriſhe the armie, and thoſe that vppon ſommonce refuſed to appeare, their goods by ſentence were giuen to the ſouldiours.

At laſt both by the induſtrie of the Duke and the extremitie of the time, all theſe difficulties were ouercome, and the Imperialls, called on both by the neceſſitie of the ſeruice, & hazard of the whole warre, paſſed ouer the riuer of Pavv the laſt day ſaue one of Ianuary: The day after one parte of the launceknights who before had paſſed ouer the ryuer of Trebia, repaſſed it agayne and wente to lodge at Pontenouo, and the reſidue of the army ſtayde beyond Plaiſanca. On the other ſide, the Marquis of Saluſſa, who had all his regiments & bands of ſouldiors diſperſed in the contrey, was at Parma: And the Duke of Vrbin being now come to Caſalmaior, and to whoſe opinion and election the Venetians had referred to paſſe or not paſſe the ryuer of Pavv, began to paſſe his companies, aſſuring the army that if thimperials tooke the way of Tuskane according to thaduertiſements he had receiued from Millan: That both he would paſſe in perſon with 600. men at armes, 9000. footemen, and 500. light horſmen, and through his celeritie would be before them at Bolognia: and alſo the Marquis of Saluſſa ſhoulde do the like with his regimentes and the bandes of the Churche. The armie imperiall ſtayed about twenty dayes the one halfe on this ſide, and the other halfe beyonde Plaiſanca, A matter happning partly through the difficulty of money, the Launceknightes not hauing receyued till that day one penye of the Duke of Burbon: and partely by a deſyre he had to plant his campe before Plaiſanca, though happly more for the difficulties he fo unde to paſſe further then for any other matter: Wherein the better to aduaunce his intention for the beſieging of Plaiſanca, he ſolicited the Duke of Ferrara to furniſh him with powder and artilleries, and to come and ioyne his perſon with the army, offring to ſende out to meete him fiue hundred men at armes and capteine George with ſixe thouſande footemen. To this demaunde the Duke of Ferrara made aunſwere, that he could not with any ſafety ſende powder through the countrey of thenemie, for that it could not be without manyfeſt daunger of interception: And that he coulde not without apparant hazarde of his perſon, ioyne him ſelfe with him, for that all the companies of the league laye in the wayes of his paſſage: But bee it there were ſafetie and facilitie in both thoſe wayes, yet he wiſhed the Duke of Burbon to conſider that he coulde not do a thing more commodious for thenemie, nor more agreable to their deſires, then to ſtande temporiſing and loaſe time about the action of thoſe townes one after an other: That if he tooke not Plaiſanca, wherein the doubt was greater then the hope, or if he dyd take it, the action whereof woulde deuowre a great deale of tyme, he was to looke howe farre it would concerne hys reputation, and with what meanes he were hable to purſue the warre hauing ſo great wantes of money and other prouiſions: Laſtely he tolde him that the waye to aduaunce the benefite of themprour and to eſtabliſhe the victorie, was to drawe and addreſſe him ſelfe to the head, and caſting behinde him all other enterpriſes, to march with celeritie to Bologna, and there to determine eyther to force that towne (in which enterpriſe he could not want ſuccours) or at leaſt to paſſe on eyther to Florence or to Rome.

The duke of Ferrara perſwadeth the duke of Burbon.

But during the counſell and expedition of theſe matters together with the deuiſes the Duke of Burbon vſed to get money both to make vp the full pay of the Spaniſh ſouldiors, and to giue ſome releefe to the Launceknightes, amongeſt whom at their departing from Plaiſanca he diſtributed two crownes to euerye man: The warre went on, and was ſtrongly kindled in the eſtate of the Churche: for Banſo de Cere at his returne from Fraunce was newlye gone to the campe Eccleſiaſtike, whiche campe laye very neare to the Viceroy who was then vppon the confines of Cepperano, where certayne bandes of Italian footemen gaue an ouerthrowe to three hundred men of the Spaniſh footemen. But the counſels and opinions of men were diuerſe touching the maner howe to defende theſtate eccleſiaſtike: for as Vitelly before the comming of Ranſo, had coũſelled the Pope to abandon the prouince of Campagnia, and to beſtow two thouſand footmen within Tiuoly, and two thouſand within Pilliſtrina, and the reſidue of the army to remayne at Villetra to ſtop the Viceroy for going to Rome: So Ranſo ariuing euen vpon the poynt of this reſolution, reproued the counſell to remayne and be incloſed within Villetra, both for the great and large circuite of the towne, the many impediments and incommodities to fortifie it, and laſtly for the vnaptnes and many inconueniences it bare to ſtoppe the paſſage of thenemies: But his opinion was to haue the armie holden within Ferentin, where by reaſon they ſhoulde not be tyed to the garding of ſo many places, it ſhould be more ſtrong and full, beſides alſo that the place gaue good oportunitie to hinder thenemies for paſſing further. This counſell was approued and holden for good, and according to the reaſons and directions of it, they beſtowed within Fruſolone a principall towne of Campagnia and within fiue myles of Ferentin, a garriſon of eyghteene hundred footemen of the regimentes of Iohn de Medicis, who for the moſte parte were called by the name of the blacke bandes: And thither thither were also sent Alexander Vitelly, Iohn Baptista Sauella, and Peter Biraguo, commaunders ouer light horsemen.

But in this meane while the famuly of the Colonnois had secretly conspired with Napoleon Vrsin Abbot of Farfa, and had induced him to take armes in the towne of Rome as souldiour to themprour: But the Pope hauing aduertisement of the whole practise, whiche he dyd dissemble with the same suttlety which he founde it out withall, found meane to send the Abbot, who had receiued money of him before, to mete Monsr Vaudemont the duke of Lorraines brother, whom the french king sent to him to fauor the enterprise of Naples: And by the Popes direction the Abbot was apprehended neare to Pracciano, and sent prisoner to the castell S. Angelo. The Pope was al this while in no smal thought to make prouision of money, wherin imploring the ayde of other princes, he receiued of new from the king of England a supply of thirty thousand duckets which the lord Russell his Chamberlaine brought to him: And with him came Monsr de Rabandanges with ten thousande crownes sent to him by the french king vpon the benefit of the tenthes which the Pope had accorded to him by necessitie & compulsion, vnder this promise notwithstãding that besides the payments of the forty thousand crownes which he gaue to the league, and twenty thousand which he contributed to the Pope for euery moneth, he should presently minister to him thirty thousand duckets, & within a moneth thirty thousand more: The king of Englande gaue commission also to the Lorde Russell to signifie to the Viceroy and the Duke of Burbon, a surseance of armes to thend to giue sufferance and tyme to treate a peace, the practise and negociation whereof according to themprours will, was holden in Englande: And if the Viceroy would not condiscend to it, then to denounce agaynst him warre. It seemed by this readynes and many other apparances, that the king of Englande vnder a desire to marry his daughter with the Frenche king, was well inclined to the confederates and fauoured their cause, And in that good inclination he promised that assoone as the mariage were establishedto enter into the league and beginne the warre in Flaunders: It seemed also he was particularly disposed to do pleasure to the Pope: But there could be no great exspectation of ready remedies from a prince who both measured not well the present conditions of Italy, nor stoode firme and resolute in his purposes, beeing styll labored and retyred by the hope which themprour gaue him to commit to him the working and arbitration of the peace, notwithstanding theffectes were in nothing correspondant to the semblances and showes he made: for when the Auditor of the Chamber was with him for that matter, albeit themprour did what he could to perswade him in many sortes that such was his intention: yet for that he exspected some euentes from Italy since the discending of the launceknightes, and the aryuall of his Nauy at sea wherof he had receiued some aduertisement, he forbare to giue him an aunswere assured and certayne, taking his excuse vppon the warrantes and commissions of the confederates, as though they were not sufficient.

But thaccorde whiche the Pope solicited continually with the Viceroy, hurt him not a little with the Confederates, both for that they stoode alwayes in feare least he woulde resolue and compound with him, And also the French king and the Venetians made this iudgement, that all the exspences and defraymentes whiche they should make to support him, would be almost vnprofitable: This iudgement and suspicion tooke encreasing by certayne degrees of vehement feares whiche were discerned in him together with the lamentable protestations he made dayly that he was no more hable to susteine the warre: Wherein agaynst hys ordinarye meane and remedy in that caſe, he oppoſed wilfully his naturall obſtinacy, & would not make Cardinalls for money, nor releeue himſelfe in ſo great neceſſities & amid ſo many daungers of the Church, with thoſe meanes which other Popes had wont to vſe, yea euen in thatchieuing of their vniuſt and ambicious enterpriſes: In which regarde, the French king and the Venetians, to be the better prepared and ready in all accidents, were eſtſones particularly bound to make no accord with themprour, the one without the other: And the French king, for that cauſe, and for the great hope which the king of Englande gaue to rayſe together with him (in caſe the mariage went forwarde) great emotions in the ſpring following, became more negligent and leſſe carefull of the daungers of Italy.

In this time the Viceroy who ſolicited an inuaſion vpon the Churche ſtates, diſpatched a regiment of two thouſande Spaniſh footemen, to aſſault a ſmall Caſtell of Stephen Colonno, where the vallour of the defendantes made that enterpriſe in vayne: And becauſe the Viceroy came on and aduaunced, theccleſiaſtikes referred to an other time to execute the reſolution taken to batter the Popes rocke, the garriſons of which place had ſurpriſed the Caſtell Gandolffo but weakly manned, and at that tyme holden by the Cardinall de Monte: At laſt the Viceroy, after he had aſſembled into one ſtrength twelue thouſande footemen, all bodyes commaunded and trayned ſauing the Spaniards and Launceknights that were come with him by ſea, encamped with his whole armie the xxix. of Ianuary before Fruſolone, a towne weake and without walles, ſauing that the howſes of ſome particulars ſerue as a wall, and within the which the capteines of the Church had beſtowed garriſon, becauſe they would leaue him no footing nor entrie into Campagnia: to the weaknes of this place was ioyned a great neceſſitie and want of vittells: and yet the ſituation of the towne ſtanding vpon a hill, giueth alwayes to the inhabitantes good meane and oportunitie to ſaue them ſelues of one ſide, for that it beareth a certaine benefite of reskew and backing: A matter which gaue a great reſolution to the garriſon within to defende it, beſides that they were of the beſt choyſe of Italians whiche at that time tooke paye: Moreouer the height of the mountayne was no litle impediment to thenemies to do any action vpon their artilleries, of which they had planted three demy Cannons and foure Coluerines: Onely the greateſt care of thenemies was to ſtoppe as muche as they could the entry of vittells into the towne. On the other ſide the Pope, who albeit was muche impoueriſhed for money, and was more apt to ſuffer indignitie to deſire others to releeue him, then to furniſhe himſelfe by meanes extraordinary, encreaſed his campe as muche as he could with bandes of footemen payed and trayned: And in that incertentie of minde and dealing, he had newly taken into his paye Horacio Baillon, without keeping memorie or obſeruation of the iniuries which he had done before to his father, and afterwardes to him, whom he had of long holden priſoner within the Caſtell of S. Angelo as a troubler of the quiet of Perouſa: With theſe ſupplies of ſouldiours his armie went on alwayes drawing neare to Ferentin to make there his generall mooſters, and to giue hope of ſuccours to thoſe that were beſieged. The batterye of Fruſolona was reduced to perfection the xxiiij. day, but becauſe it was not ſuche as to giue hope to cary the place, there was no aſſault performed: Onely capteine Alarcon trauelling about the walles was hurt with the blowe of a harquebuſe, and likewiſe Maria Vrſin was wounded: One of the principall grounds and hopes of the Viceroy was, that he was not ignorant that the ſouldiors within ſuffred great ſcarcitie of vittells, as alſo the armie that mooſtred at Ferentin was in the ſame extremitie: for the

ſouldiours of the Colonnois whiche laye within Palicina, Montfortin, and the Popes Rocke, the onely places which they helde, robbed and ſpoyled all that they found vpon the wayes, And Ranſo going to the army, hauing for his eskorte and ſafety the bandes of footemen of Cuio, they cutte them in peeces and made pillage of what they found. Neuertheleſſe as euery accident of warre is tyed to his ſeuerall euent, and where be made many aduentures there be ſundry iſſues & fortunes: So it happned that three hundred footmen iſſuing out of Fruſolone ſeconded & backed by one part of the horſemen which were ledde by Alexander Vitelli, Iohn Baptiſta Sauello, and Peter Biraguo, approched within halfe a myle of Larnato, where were lodged fiue enſeignes of Spaniſhe footemen: of which they drewe two enſeignes into an ambuſh and ouerthrew them, and in the conflict was ſlayne capteine Perault with fourſcore footemen, many were made priſoners, and two enſeignes wonne and borne away. All this while the Viceroy was buſie in caſting of mynes at Fruſolone, which for the moſt part were reuerſed by countermynes made by the defendants, who ſtāding fully aſſured in their owne vallour, and fearing litle the forces of the enemies, refuſed the ayde of foure hundred footemen whom the Capteines of the army would haue ſent thither for their ſuccours. And yet amidde all theſe actions and accidentes of warre, the ſolicitations of accorde kept on their courſe with the ſame vehemencie they did before: for at this time the Generall and tharchbiſhop of Capua were returned to Rome, & with them was come Cæſar Fieremoſquo a Neapolitane, whom themprour had diſpatched to the Pope after the Viceroy was departed from Spayne: To him was giuen full cōmiſſion to aſſure the Pope by eſpeciall proteſtation, both how much he was diſcontented with thaction of Don Hugo and the Colonnois vpon Rome, together with the accidents that followed, & alſo to make impreſſion of themprors deſire and inclination to compound with him friendly, al the controuerſies and differences that were betweene them: Their expedition bare alſo that they ſhould debate vpon the peace in his name, A matter which he ſeemed alſo inclined to accōpliſhe with the other confederates, ſaying according to the relation of his Nuncio, that if the Pope executed his enterpriſe to go to Bologna, he would giue him ful and free power to pronounce it as he thought beſt. Theſe deputies propounded for the Viceroy a ſurceance of armes for two or three yeres with the Pope & Venetians, euery one reteining ſtil the poſſeſſions they enioyed at the preſent, and the Pope to pay an hundred & fifty thouſand duckets, & the Venetians fifty thouſand: A taxation albeit not a litle grieuous to the Pope for the difficulties to leauy it, yet ſuch was his inclinatiō to be deliuered of the trauels of the warre, that the rather to induce the Venetians, he offred to impoſe vpon himſelf the fifty thouſand duckets rated vpon them: wherin the better to allure their conſents, & to exſpect their anſwere, he made truce for eight dayes with the Viceroy the laſt of Ianuary, In which it was agreed that the regiments of the church ſhould not paſſe Ferentin, nor the bands of the Viceroy Fruſolone, And that as there ſhould be no action executed againſt the towne, ſo likewiſe the towne was forbidden all maner of fortifications & prouiſions of vittels but from one day to an other: Amid which interpoſing of the truce, Fieremoſquo thinking he had well ſounded the intention of the Pope, and could alſo diſcouer the meaning of themprour without doing wrong to his dignity, he preſented him a long letter written with the Emprours hand, full of his good intention, offers, & deuotion towards the Pope: But after he was departed from the Popes preſence, & prepared to go ſignifie to the Viceroy & the Legate the ſurceance agreed vpon, & to giue addreſſe for the execution of it, the ſame day he found the army departed from Ferentin & marching towards Frusolono: he communicated with the Legate all that had passed betwene the Pope & him, who not willing to breake the great hopes which he and his souldiors had of the victory, enterteined his doings with prayse & commendation, and leading him in the abuse of fayre words, he sent secret direction to his capteines not to forbeare to march on. The army could not come in time to Frusolono, if they wonne not a passage or way in forme of a bridge lying at the foote of the first hill of Frusolono, & garded by foure enseignes of launceknights: But assone as the vauward came which was commaunded by Stephen Colonno, & that they came to hand strokes with them, they disordred & put thē to flight, after they had made slaughter of 200. and taken 400. prisoners together with their enseignes: And thus the first hill being wonne, the others by that example retyred into places more strong, leauing a free and safe entry into Frusolono to the eccleſiastikes, who omitting nothing which eyther the fauor of their fortune or the oportunity of the time gaue them being nowe very neare night, pitched their tentes and lodgings euen at their beardes: By the benefit of which action Ranso and Vitelly with whom the Pope was discontented for this enterprise, had great hope to giue them the defeate eyther if they stayde there, or in case they brake vp and retyred, A matter which was beleeued would assuredly haue succeeded if they had incamped vpon the hill which was taken, or had bene diligent or carefull to obserue the retyring of thenemies: for the Viceroy not the day following but the thirde day, making no signe nor token that he would dislodge, went away with the army two or three howres before day, setting on fyre certayne munitions that remayned, and left behinde him many bullets & great shot: And albeit the Eccleſiastikes when they knewe he was gone, sent out after him their lighte horsmen, who fel vpon his baggage and tooke a few prisoners of small importance, yet they were not there in sufficient time to do him any notable hurt: And yet he left behinde him one parte of his vittells, and retyred him selfe to Cesena and from thence to Cepperano. By reason of this retrayte the Pope tooke suche courage concurring also thincitation of thembassadors of the confederates, whom he could not otherwise satisfie, that he resolued to execute thenterprise of Naples: for Rabādanges who had brought the ten thousand duckets collected of the tenthes, and ten thousand more for the portion of Ranso, had commission not to disburse them without the consent of Albert Pio, Ranso, and Monsr de Lange, and that in case they were assured that the Pope would not accord. And touching the Venetians (to whom was gone the lorde Russell to induce them to accept the truce offred by the Viceroy and approued by the Pope, but by the accident of his legge breaking by the waye he sent an other to them) They made aunswere that they would not accept the truce before they were well informed of the Frenche kinges will, in which deniall they stoode so muche the more resolute, by howe muche they vnderstoode that Genes was reduced to great extremities and wants of vittels: So that it was determined to inuade the kingdome of Naples aswel by sea as by land: and that Monsr de Vaudemont should be Admirall of the army by sea, for whose better strength there was addresse giuen to leauy 2000. footmen: But Ranso by whose direction was distributed & exspended the money of the french king, determined contrary to the Popes will (who was of opinion to conuert into one place al the forces of that expeditiō) to dispose 6000. men to enter Abruzza: he hoped that by the working of the sonnes of the Count Montoiro who had bin sent thither with 2000. footmē, they should make an easy action vpon Aquila, which accordingly hapned through the feare of Askanio Colonno, who assone as he heard of their approch, fled from the daunger which his

tymerous condition would not suffer him to abide. The beginnings and first actions of this enterprise were full of hope and felicitie: for albeit the Viceroy who had bestowed garrisons within the places neare him, was busy to readdresse and refurnishe his army asmuch as he could: yet both for that one part of his regimentes was disbanded, and an other parte by necessitie bestowed in garrisons, it was thought he would stande daungerously imbarked, and with great difficultie be hable to make resistance onely to the sea army: It was beleeued also by the same reason that Ranso in Abruzza, and the Nauies of the Churche and Venetians conteining xxij. gallies, should finde no head made agaynst them, both for that they were resupplied with a strength of three thousande men, and also for the ioyning of Oratio with two thousande footemen, together with the person of Monsr de Vaudemont, who vnder the auncient rightes and claymes of king Rene, pretended to the succession of that kingdome, and at that time managed the place of Lieftenaunt generall vnder the Pope: But these matters proceeded very slowely to execution, both for the temporising of the army ecclesiastike not as yet departed from Frusolono, where they taryed for the great artilleries that were to come from Rome, and also for the expedition of Abruzza, and the aryuall of the sea army: These impedimentes and losse of tyme were also increased by the mutinie of the footemen within Frusolono, who demaunded double paye, as a matter wonne and due for the victorie. Neuertheles the eightenth day of February the souldiours of the Viceroy abandoned Cesana and other places confining, & withdrew them selues to Cepperana: by thoportunitie of whose retrayte, the army ecclesiastike beginning already to feele the want of vittels, passed Saint Germain, and the Viceroy fearing to put things to hazard, retyred to Caietta, and Don Hugo to Naples: All whiche notwithstanding the Pope pressed still with his wantes and necessities of money, and fearing no lesse the aduauncing of the Duke of Burbon, agaynst whose armye he sawe the Confederates disposed to make no greate resistaunce, continued styll his inclination to compounde with themprour, and in that humor had eftsones procured the Lorde Russell to goe vp to the Viceroy in the name of his king: Vppon whiche it followed that Fieremosquo returned to Rome the xxj. of February, from whence also the daye following he departed, hauing published his commissions, and left the Popes minde full of confusion and irresolution: In regarde of whiche perill and the Popes alteration, the Venetians least he should rashely intangle him selfe with thaccorde, made offer to him in the beginning of Marche, to sende him in ready money within fifteene daies fifteene thousande duckets, and fifteene thousande more within other fifteene dayes, so farreforth as he would graunt them a Iubiley for all their gouernment. But amid these delayes and temporisings the Popes Nauy and the Venetians, which had with great losse taryed to exspect the french fleete, and beeing by rage of weather driuen into the Ile of Ponso the xxiij. of February, fell with the Molo of Caietta and sacked it: And the fourth day of Marche hauing set on lande the footemen at Pozzolo, returned eftsones to the sea for that they found it in good condition of defence: And so passing further, they discended agayne neare to Naples by the ryuer of the borowe of Stabbia, where was Diomed Caraffa with fiue hundred footemen: They caryed this borowe by assault the thirde daye on that side of the Mountayne, by whose example the Castell rendred the day after: The tenth day they forced the Greeke towre and Surrenta: And in that violence of victorie and fortune, many places on that side yeelded afterwardes vppon composition: This fleete also had taken before certayne shippes laden with grayne for the prouision of Naples whiche had great neede of them, and for want of them ſuffred no ſmall vexation, the rather for that thenemie found no impediment vpon the ſea, neyther was there ſuche order taken as was neceſſarie: In which diſorder and want of good direction, the flete drewe ſo neare the Mole the ſeconde daye in Lent, that the Caſtell and the gallies ſhotte at it: yea the footemen came on ſo faſte by lande, that with great difficultie the Neapolitanes could retyre them ſelues by the Market gate and ſhutte it: After this they tooke Salerne: when Vaudemont made after certayne ſhippes, and leauing foure gallies at Salerne where Oracio was, the prince of Salerne at the ſame time entred within the towne by the way of the Caſtell with many ſouldiours, but he was ouerthrowne by Oracio, in which encounter were ſlayne more then two hundred footemen and many made priſoners. In Abruzza after the Viceroy had deliuered out of priſon the olde Count of Montoire to thende he might recouer Aquila, the ſayde Count was no ſooner ſet at liberty by the Viceroy, then he was made priſoner by his owne ſonnes. And Ranſo who tooke the ſixt of March Scicibiana and Talleconſa, went vp towards Sora: Neuertheles, notwithſtanding the fauor of ſo fayre occaſions, and the benefite of ſo many felicities concurring, the ſouldiors began the firſt daye of March to abandon the army on land by trowpes, and that eyther for want of vittels, or through negligence in the officers, or at leaſt for the yll prouiſions of the Pope.

The negociations and counſels of the peace continued and kept on their courſe, and in that action were come to Rome the ſeconde of Marche Fieremoſquo and Serenon ſecretorie to the Viceroy: There they founde aryued the daye before, Monſr de Lange, inſtructed with wordes and promiſes ſufficient for the credite of his expedition, but he brought no money notwithſtanding they had aduertiſement out of Fraunce that he was departed both with twenty thouſand duckets for the payes of the footemen appoynted to ſerue in the great ſhippes whiche were exſpected at Ciuitavecchia, and alſo that he brought twenty thouſand more for the Pope, to helpe to aduaunce thenterpriſe of the realme of Naples for one of the ſonnes of the french king, to whom ſhould be giuen in mariage Katherine de Medicis daughter to Lavvrence and neece to the Pope: for the french king reappoſing muche for him ſelfe in the negociation of England, and being perſwaded that the Viceroy for the diſorder of Fruſolono, coulde execute nothing, and alſo that the army imperiall both for their ſlownes to moue and march, and for their wants & neceſſities of money, would not go at al into Tuskane: would heare no further of the motion of the truce, no though it ſhould be generall and extended to comprehende all, and that he ſhould be acquited from all payments of money: Wherin albeit his principall intention was, not to giue time to themprour to reorder and readdreſſe his forces, yet in regarde of his owne nakednes & pouerty of money, he ſent to the Pope no other thing of the xx. thouſand duckets which he had promiſed monthly, nor of the money collected of the tenth, then ten thouſand duckets: Neither had he ſent as yet the wages of thoſe bands of footmen appoynted to the mayne army at ſea running in the common accompts & exſpences of the Venetians and him: And laſtly for that he had deſire that there ſhould be no action or enterpriſe till ſome concluſion were made with the king of Englande, he thought it but reaſonable that the Pope ſhould temporiſe and exſpect till that time. So that the enterpriſe of Naples begun with ſo great felicitie and hope, went euery day diminiſhing and of leſſe exſpectation, for as the army by ſea which was neither made greater by veſſels and ſhipping, nor ſtronger with ſupplies of ſouldiors, was not to execute any great action, the rather for that they were to drawe out of their mayne forces, garriſons of men to defende ſuch places as they tooke:

tooke: So the army by land, which for the yll disposition of the tyme, was not as yet possessed of the vittels that were sent from Rome by sea, did not onely not aduaunce, but also diminishing dayly by new degrees of disorder and penury of vittells, it retyred at laste to Piperna: Besides, those regiments of footemen which Ranso ledde and gouerned, were so diminished for want of money, that Ranso seeing he could not inclose the Viceroy according to the plotte he had layde, returned backe to Rome: yea lastly the straite negociation and labor of the accorde which the Pope interteined, augmented greatly those disorders: for as it abated the preparations of the confederates which of them selues came but slowely on, So on the other side it pushed on the Popes inclination to the accorde, wherein he was induced to reappose a greater hope in thintention of themprour, for thintelligence he had by one of his letters surprised, by which he charged the Viceroy to enterteine and embrace thaccorde with the Pope, if thestate and condition of his affayres induced him not to take other counsell: But the matter that moste stirred and moued him, was, that he sawe the Duke of Burbon marche and aduaunce continually with the armie Imperiall: neyther did he discerne the resolutions of the Duke of Vrbin to be so constant, nor the prouisions of the Venetians so full and forwarde, as he could be assured of the matters of Tuskane, the feare of which brought no small affliction to him: for as thimperialls laye some of them on this side, and some of them beyonde Plaisanca, the Duke of Vrbin had chaunged his firste opinion, which was to get before them into Bolognia with the Venetian armie: and had resolued in his counsell, that assoone as he should be aduertised that thenemies would remoue, the armie ecclesiastike leauing good garrison within Parma and Modena, should goe to Bolognia: And for him selfe, he woulde marche with the Venetian armie in the tayle of thenemies, though twentye or thirtye miles from them, for the more surety of his people. According to which order, when afterwards thenemies would take the way to Romagnia or Tuskane, the whole campe should aduaunce continually, the armie ecclesiastik marching alwayes before with the Marquis of Saluce leading the french launces, the Svvizzers footemen, and his owne, and leauing alwayes garrisons in such places as thenemies should passe by after them, and they afterwards to be reassembled and reuoked from hand to hand according as the enemie should aduaunce and passe; This counsell the Duke iustified and folowed with many reasons, such as the other capteins could neither comprehende nor approue: First he alleaged that there was no surety to assemble and ioyne all together in the fielde to stop the passage of thimperialls: for that it would be a matter eyther daungerous or vnprofitable: Touching the daunger, he referred it to rest in the feight or battell, for that if thimperialls were not superiour in numbers and multitudes, at least they were aboue them in force and vallour: an aduauntage which would make the victory easie to them: And he proued it vnprofitable by this, that if thimperialls would not feight, at least it would be alwayes in their power to leaue behinde them the armie of the confederates, and so keeping alwayes before them, they shoulde be apte to accomplishe great exploytes: Lastely he alleaged, that as in thexperience and reason of things, he helde this counsell better then all others, So also he was constrayned by necessitie to embrace and followe it: for that thimperiall armie beeing as was beleeued halfe shaken, he could not put his people into suche speedy readynes as to be assured to marche in tyme and to gette before: Besides, seeing the Venetians had wholly reapposed them selues vppon him touching that deliberation, he was to consider not to leaue their estate in daunger, which if thennemies discerned to be vnfurniſhed, they might, taking newe counſell vppon newe occaſions, turne their courſe to paſſe ouer Pavv, and ſo intrude vpon their landes to their harmes. This reaſon might ſuffice to content the Senate of Venice, for that naturally they haue for obiect to proceede aduiſedly and ſurely in all their affayres: But it did not ſatisfie the Pope, for that vnder that counſell he ſawe opened a waye to thimperiall armie to take their courſe euen vp to Rome or to Tuskane, or to make their paſſage into what place they liſte, ſeeing there was no poſſibilitie of reſiſtance by the armie that was to goe before, bothe for that they were to diſtribute in places as they paſſed garriſons of ſouldiours, and alſo their mayne ſtrength was to ſuffer diminution by other meanes: Neyther was it a matter certayne, that in the Venetians tarying once behinde, woulde bee as greate readineſſe to followe with effectes, as the Duke was liberall to promiſe in wordes, conſidering his cuſtome and manner of proceeding in all the courſe of the warre before: Laſtely he iudged that if the armies were reduced into one ſtrength, wherein the numbers of ſouldiours farre exceeded the Imperialls, they mighte with more facilitie ſtoppe thennemie for paſſing further, cutte off the traffike of their vittells, obſerue all occaſions that offred, and neuer be ſo farre remoued from them, that in good ſeaſon and oportunitie they might not ſuccour the townes of the Venetians if thennemie offred to make anye violent action vpon them. But this reſolution diſpleaſed him ſo muche the more, by howe muche he vnderſtoode the Duke of Vrbin beeing come to Parma the thirde of Ianuarie, was retyred the fourth daye to Caſalmaior, by the accident of a ſmall maladie that happned vppon him, and fiue dayes after he went from thence to Caſſola vnder cooller to cure his ſickneſſe: To whiche place he ſent for his wife, beeing ſomewhat eaſed of his feauer, but tormented as he ſayde with the panges of the gowte. Suche as were fauourers and good interpreters of this manner of dealing very ſuſpicious to the Pope, referred the cauſe of all to his negociations and practiſes of peace: but hys Lieftenaunt Guicciardin comprehending partely by tokens of likelyhood and probabilitie, and partely by information of the Dukes owne wordes and ſpeeches, that hys deſyre to recouer Montfeltro and Saint Leo poſſeſſed by the Florentins, was the matter that induced hym to that deliberation: And iudging that if in that he were not contented, he woulde leaue bothe the Pope and Florentines abandoned in their greateſt neceſſities: and laſtlye ſuppoſing that he iudged not theſe places to bee a rewarde worthy ynough for expoſing him ſelfe to ſo greate a daunger: and knowinge withall that they had the ſame deſyre at Florence: In all theſe reſpectes he gaue to the Duke an aſſured hope of the reſtitution of thoſe places, as though he had commiſſion ſo to do from the Pope: Which neuertheleſſe was not approued by the Pope, who in that caſe ſuffred him ſelfe to be caryed more by olde and newe hatreds, then by equitie or reaſon.

In all this meane whyle thimperialls, who had made diſtribution of a very ſmall ſumme of money amongeſt the Launceknightes, kepte them ſelues incamped vppon the confines of Plaiſanca, where was the Counte Guido Rangon wyth ſixe thouſande footemen: At whiche place Pavvle Luzaſquo wyth certayne other light horſemen of theccleſiaſtikes making ſometymes incurſions to diſcouer the countrey: and beeing in that action one daye accompanied with certayne bandes of footemen and ſome men at armes, they encountred a trowpe of enemies of the ſame facultie and profeſſion, whom they ouerthrewe and tooke foure skore horſe and an hundred footemen, ouer and beſides Capteines Scalenguo, Succar, and Gruguy Burgonions who remeyned prisoners: After this Monsr Burbon sent out tenne ensignes of Spanyardes to reuittell Pisqueton, and ioyntlie with that action, the Count Caiazzo with the light horsemen and with his regimentes of footemen, came to lodge in the borowe of Saint Donyn which the Ecclesiastikes had abandoned: The sayd Count the day after according to an intelligence which was enterteyned with him before, and also pretending for want of his pay, to be acquited and made free from his othe which he had giuen to th Imperialls, passed to the campe Ecclesiastike, where he was enterteined by the Lieuttenaunt (though more to content others then of his owne inclinacion) and with him were taken into wages twelue hundred footemen, and an hundred and thirtie light horsemen which he had with him: This condicion was tyed to the contract, that if th Emperour tooke from him by way of warre or other violence his Earldome of Caiazzo, the Pope within eight monethes should indue him with so muche in yearelie value as th Erledom was worth, and to remeyne possessed of it vntill he had recouered his owne.

Count Caiazzo goeth from th imperialls to the pay of th Ecclesiastikes.

The Duke of Ferrara refusing alwayes to come to tharmie, pushed on by perswasions the Duke of Burbons desire, to take his course rather to Bolognia and Florence, then to stay and intangle his armie with the action of those townes: And as an armie of souldiours compounded vppon sundrie natures, nations, and languages, draweth after it for the most parte so many sortes of accidentes and aduersities, as it conteyneth seuerall complexions and humors: So, his regimentes of Spanishe footemen, either for want of money in deede, or making that their colour, drewe into mutinie the seuenteenth day demaunding their pay: And albeit in that rage of insolency, they slue the sergeaunt Maior whom the Duke had sent to appease them, yet vsing mildnesse and gouernment where his sergeaunt Maior sought to manage them by authoritie and rigor, he raunged them by discression whome his officer could not reduce by seueritie, and so with mindes well reconciled the twentie day he passed ouer Trebia with his whole armie, and incamped about three myles from Plaisanca hauing with him fiue hundred men at armes, and many light horsemen Italians who were not payed: Touching the old bandes of Launceknights one parte of them were appointed to remeyne at Myllan, and the others were addressed to Sauona to aide those of Genes who were reduced to great necessitie: Sure the resolucion of the Duke of Burbon and the armie, which he led, was straunge and wonderfull, for that being without money and pay which onely leadeth the souldiour to fight, and hauing no municions, without the which standeth maimed all enterprises of warre, and standing destitute of the seruice of pionners, a matter most important in the action of townes and peeces, and lastlie being followed with no addresse nor order for vittells which alwayes is accompted one of the strongest vaines or sinewes of an armie, They sought to aduaunce and passe further amidde so many priuacions and wantes, thorowe so many townes and peeces of thenemies, and against foes of farre greater numbers then they: But more recommendable was the constancie of the Launceknightes, who being drawne out of Germanie with one onlie duckat a peece, and suffering a long time with a wonderfull temperance in Italie, and neuer were releeued since they first sette their foote to marche with more then two or three duckats at the most, offered to march on with the same resolucion and cherefullnes of minde with the which they betooke them selues first to the seruice: And in that good example to all souldiours of other nations, they passed on, contrarie to the ordinarie custome of men of warre, and especiallie against the humor of their owne climate and region depending vpon no other pay or assignacion then

vpon the hope of the victory notwithstanding it was manifestlie discerned that they coulde not continue without money, both for the neareneſſe of thennemies whoſe importunitie preſſed them, and for the neceſſities of vittells which more and more grewe into extreame penurie: Onely amidde theſe ſufferinges and afflictions they were muche ſtayed and ſupported by the authoritie and operacion of Capteyne George, who the better to conteyne them, ſette before their eyes the ſacke of Rome, and the bootie of moſt patte of Italie, a matter which he thought moſt agreable to mindes repleniſhed with impreſſions of ambicion, glorie, and profit: And in that good confotmacion of minde, the armie marched the two and twentie day to the borowe of Saint Donyn: Out of the which the day following iſſued the Marquis of Saluſſa and the Eccleſiaſtike regimentes leauing certeine bandes of Venetian footemen for the garde of Parma, and ſo they followed the way of Bolognia with eleuen or twelue thowſande footemen: But it was ordeined that the Count Guido ſhoulde come from Plaiſanca to Modena, and the footemen of the blacke bandes to Bolognia, leauing a ſufficient garriſon within Plaiſanca: In this ſorte in foure remoues they marched by the countrey of Reggia betwene Anzolo and the bridge of Rene: At that time the Duke of Burbon was vppon the confines of Reggia: And the Duke of Vrbin who being perſwaded at Caſalmaior by Guicciardin to augment his number of Swvizzers, had refuſed it as a matter vnproffitable: ſtoode nowe vpon vehement inſtaunce to ſende to Rome and Venice to make a newe leauie of foure thowſand Swvizzers & two thowſand Launceknights: In which variacion and chaunge of his minde, he excuſed the contradiction that was made then, both for that the ſeaſon did not then require to take the fielde, and alſo he beleued by many reaſonable coniectures that thennemies woulde haue diſſolued and broken, whom nowe he promiſed to accoaſt with that ſtrength and newe ſupplie: But that was a councell ill diſgeſted of them all, & not holden indifferent of any, both for that there was no poſſibilitie to releeue the daungers that were preſent with remedies ſo ſlow and farre of, and alſo that for the difficulties of money, and the diſagreement of the confederats, the effect of that councell could not be put in execucion.

In this time the Duke of Millan, with the vallour of three thowſande footemen whom he had aſſembled, did not only defend Loda, Cremona, and all that contrie beyond Adda, and made incurſions vpon the territories of Millan, but alſo ioyning order to celeritie, he ſurpriſed with the ſame felicitie the towne of Monce: Neuertheleſſe his ſouldiours left it eftſoones abandoned hauing aduertiſement that Antho. de Leua (who after he had giuen conduit to the Duke of Burbon was returned to Millan) marched thither with two thowſand of the old Launceknights & fiftene hundred of a new leauy, a thowſand Spaniſh footemen, and fiue thowſande Italians, commaunded by diuerſe Capteines.

The Duke of Ferrara coũcelleth the Duke of Burbon to goe to Rome.

But after the Duke of Burbon had paſſed the riuer of Secchia, he tooke his way on the left hande and arriued the fift day of Marche as Bonport: There he left his people, and went him ſelfe to Finalo to communicate with the Duke of Ferrara, who perſwaded him with many argumentes and reaſons to drawe towardes Florence or Rome, and to reduce thither all his thoughtes: Yea it was thought that the ſcoape of his councell tended chiefelie to take his courſe to Rome, and in regarde of that to lette paſſe all other enterpriſes: In this deliberacion there occurred many accidentes and difficulties which troubled the minde of the Duke of Burbon, but chiefelie he feared, leaſt the armie being come to Rome, they woulde paſſe on to the realme of Naples, and that either for neceſſitie whiche is mightie

in the mindes of ſouldiours, or for deſire to be refreſhed which their long wearines, and ſufferance did iuſtly chalenge, or for ſome other difficultie that might happen whereof he did not dout, neither had his dout bene fallible or vaine, if at his comming to Rome he had not found the Pope diſarmed: The ſame day did the regiments of the Venetians paſſe the riuer of Pavv without the perſon of the Duke of Vrbin, who notwithſtanding he was almoſt recouered and hoale, yet he remayned at Gazzolo though with intencion to put him ſelfe on the way forthwith: The ſeuenth day the Duke of Burbon lodged at Saint Iohn vpon the confines of Bolognia, from which place he ſent a trompet to Bolognia, whether were retyred the armie Eccleſiaſtike: The ſummonce of the trompet was to demaund vittells, and to aſſure them that the Duke of Burbon would go to the ſuccors of the realme of Naples: And the ſame day the bandes of Spanyardes that were within Carpy after they had deliuered vp the towne to the Duke of Ferarra, ioyned them ſelues with the Duke of Burbon: The armie of the Venetians lay incamped along the riuer of Secchia, not reſolued to paſſe further onleſſe they firſt vnderſtoode that the Duke of Burbon were diſcamped from S. Iohn, into whoſe army had paſſage & reſort a traffike of vittels from aboue the territories of Ferrara: But for that the vittellors demaunded money of the ſouldiours, who had almoſt none to pay, they diſperſed them ſelues to lodge at large & abroad, to eate and deuour the contrie, and in that wretched inſolencie they ranne into all places robbing both man and beaſt the better to furniſh them of meanes to pay for their vittells: The ſame bringing ſuche a diſorder ouer the whole armie, that it was holden for certeine that if in that confuſion they had met with any ſtrong encounter, or if thEccleſiaſtikes who were within Bolognia and the confines there aboutes, would haue incamped neare them, their owne diſorder would haue drawne vppon them no ſmall difficulties and daungers: Both for that ſo long as they continued ſo diſperſed at large and at randome, their perills coulde not but be more apparaunt then their ſafetie, and reducing them ſelues into a ſtrait and one campe, they ſtoode depriued of all meane and prouidence for vittells: The bandes alſo that were within Bolognia were not without their diſorders, as wel through the condicion of the Marquis who was more apt to breake a launce in a fayer ſhow at tilt then to manage the office of a Capteine in the fielde: as alſo for that the Svvizzers and his companies of footemen were not payed in times dewe by the Venetians, the ſame beinge the cauſe that made them loaſe a fayer occaſion: In the meane while the Duke of Burbon to thende to paſſe further, was at the poynt to drawe from Ferrara a prouiſion of vittells for many dayes, together with a proporcion of powder, pyoners and oxen to drawe foure cannons: Wherein notwithſtanding he made many demonſtracions that ſuch was his intencion, yet it was holden for certeine that he was determined to paſſe into Tuskane by the way paued or cawſeyed: The like was confirmed by Ierom Moron, who many dayes before had holden a ſecrete intelligence with the Marquis of Saluſſa, though in the iudgemēt of many, but frandulently & diſſemblinglie: But ſuch is the operacion of a diſorder begon, that if it be not as well cured at the roote as reconciled at the top, it goeth on working to daũgerous effects euen as a fire couered and raked vp with aſhes is not fullie quenched but ſmoothered and preſerued to a greater burning: for, as the army was appointed to depart & breake vp the foureteenth day of March, & to that end had ſent backe againe to Bodyn the foure cannons: So the day before, the bands of Launceknightes hauing bene long led in abuſe by many promiſes made to pay them, ioyned their exclamacions to the complaints of the Spaniſh footmen, & began with inſolent voices to call for their payes, wherein giuing scoape to their discontentmentes to passe from one passion of rage to an other, they mutined & drew into manifest tumult, and that to the great daunger of the life of the Duke of Burbon, if he had not with present diligence escaped from his lodging, which in their fury they inuaded & sacked killing one of his gentlemen who stoode to defend the goods of his maister: By reason of this accident the Marquis of Guast went foorthwith to Ferrara, from whence he returned with some litle summe of money, with the which the army was reappeased: The seuenteenth day there fell from the regions aboue such abundance of snowe and raine, that for certeine dayes it tooke away all libertie of marching, as well for the impediment of the wayes made worse by the ill weather, as for the swelling of the riuers which the snowes and landfluddes had made equal with the toppes of their bankes or shoares: By which intemperaunce of the wether instrumentallie working in the destinie assigned, Capteine George fell sicke of an appoplexie which so vexed him to the great perill of his life, that at least thennemies hoped that he would become vnprofitable to followe the campe, and vnder that occasion the Launceknightes would no more beare their incommodities, and want of money: But the effect was otherwise then thapparance declared: By this time the Venetian armie was at S. Fauustin neare to Rubiero, to whom the eighteenth of Marche came the person of the Duke of Vrbin, who according to his custome promised to the Senate of Venice almost a certeintie of the victorie, not so much through the vallour and puissance of the confederates, as for the difficulties and straites whereunto were reduced thennemies.

The Pope loaseth corage and why.

But now the affaires of the Pope being reduced on all parts to these hard tearmes, he ranne a careless course accompanied with faintnesse of courage, both for that he was pinched with the want & necessitie of money wherein his care was so much the greater by howe muche did redouble his extremities, and also for thenterprise of Naples which tooke not succesſe according to his first deuises, and lastlie for that his companies were retyred to Piperna, being no longer hable to endure the want of vittells: But the matter that most tooke away his resolucion and spirite, was the temporising of the Frenche in whom was found no correspondencie betwene their promises and their effects, a custome which they had duely obserued euen from the first day of the warre till the last end of the same: for, besides that the king was long in sending the fortie thowsande duckats for the first moneth of the warre, and to dispatche the fiue hundred launces for the sea armie: And besides that he woulde not according as he was bounde, make warre beyonde the mountes which was one of the principall fundacions and meanes sette downe to aspire to the victorie: Yet also he failed to obserue his promises with the Pope from day to day, that besides the ordinarie contribucion, he would minister to him monethly twentie thowsand duckats to make warre in the realme of Naples: Also the truce being made by reason of the conspiring of Don Hugo and the Colonnois, he councelled him not to keepe the articles of the truce, and confirmed vnto him the same promise not onlie to ayde him in the warres against Naples, but also in all actions for his proper defense: And lastly he promised to send to him Ranso de Cere whom he fauored much, for that he had expressed great vallour in the defense of Marselles: All which things, albeit they had bene promised from the moneth of October, yet it was so long ere they were executed, that it was the fourth day of Ianuarie before Ranse came to Rome, and yet he brought no money, and also it was ten dayes after before the twenty thowsand duckats were sent: Of which summe foure thowsand were reteined by Ranse as well for his expenses and defrayments, as for his pension, and ten thowsand

were conuerted to furniſh thenterpriſe of Abruzze, ſo that to the Popes hands who vnder that promiſe had broken the truce almoſt three moneths before, there neuer came of that ſumme more then ſix thowſand: Moreouer the king had promiſed the Pope in regard of his conſenting to a tenth, to pay vnto him xxv. thouſand crownes within eight dayes, and xxxv. thowſand more within two monethes: But he neuer receiued aboue nine thowſand which were brought him by Monſr Rabandanges: The king alſo extended his promiſe further, for that after Pavvle Aretze had taken his leaue of him the twelfth of Februarie, he promiſed him a coplemēt of twenty thowſand duckats to thend to giue to the Pope a better ſtomake to make warre: But the ſayd twentie thowſande duckats which were ſent after Monſr de Lange, neuer paſſed further then Sauona: The king was bound by the capitulacions of the confederacion to ſend twelue gallies of which ſorte of veſſells he ſayd he had ſent ſixteene, but the moſt parte of them ſo ill prepared and ſo ſlenderlie furniſhed of men to ſet on land that they ſtirred not from Sauona: Where, if at the firſt when ouerture was made of the warre againſt the kingdome of Naples, they had immediatly ioyned with the gallies of the Pope and Venetians, they would not but haue executed right great exployts: And touching the armie by ſea verie mightie in great veſſells, notwithſtanding the king had made many promiſes to ſende them out againſt Naples, yet they neuer went farre from Prouence, or Sauona: Furthermore, after he had condiſcended to geue two payes to the ſouldiours of the Marquis of Saluſſe, he agreed with the Venetians who had a leſſe number of ſouldiours then he to whome they were bounde, that their pay ſhoulde be taken vpon the contribucion of the fortie thowſand duckats: He ſaw the comfortes and ſuccours of the king of England were verie farre of and vncerteine: The Venetians made but ſlowe paymentes to their companies, and for that cauſe the bandes of the Marquis of Saluſſe and the Svvizzers who were within Bolognia, ſerued almoſt for nothing: The variacions and vncerteinties of the Duke of Vrbin, aſtoniſhed him not a litle, ſince thereby he diſcerned that no impediment would be giuen to thImperials to paſſe into Tuskane: By which meane, waying together with the ill diſpoſicion of the people of Florence, thintelligence which the Citie of Sienna had with thImperialls, he ſaw that not onelie the ſtate of Florence woulde fall into manifeſt daunger, but alſo the circuit and iuriſdiction of the Churche: All which reaſons albeit they moued him greatlie and wrought no ſmall impreſſions in him, yet after many driftes and doubtes, notwithſtanding he diſcerned well enough howe infamous and daungerous it would be to ſeparate him ſelfe from the confederates and to referre him to the diſcreſſion of thennemies: yet, both for that he was not ſufficientlie ſuccored by the reſidue, and much leſſe would applie ſuche aide of him ſelfe as he might, and alſo being ouerruled by paſſions of preſent feare and not hable to reſiſt with reſolucion and courage, the difficulties and daungers occurring, he determined to accord with Fieramoſquo and Serenon whom the Viceroy had ſent to Rome for that matter: The articles of thaccorde were theſe: That there ſhould be a ſurceance of armes for eight monethes, the Pope paying to thImperiall army three ſcore thowſand duckats: That whatſoeuer had bene taken vpon the Church, vpon the realme of Naples, and vpon the familie of the Colonnois, ſhould be rendered: That Pompey Colonno ſhould be reſtored to the dignitie of Cardinall with abſolucion of all paynes and Cenſures: This was a condicion moſte greeuous to the Pope, and wherunto he condiſcended with a verie ill will: That the Frenche king and Venetians might enter this accord within a certeine time: That in caſe they did enter, the Launceknightes ſhoulde goe out of Italie, and if they did not enter, then they ſhoulde departe from the Church eſtate, and likewiſe from the territories of Florence: That the Pope ſhould pay in fortie thowſand duckats within two and twentie dayes accompting from the preſent day, and to ſatisfie the reſidue within one moneth after: That the Viceroy ſhoulde come to Rome, which the Pope ſuppoſed to be the beſt meane to aſſure him that the Duke of Burbon ſhould obſerue thaccorde, a hope wherein he was eftſoones confirmed by the relacion of a letter ſurpriſed by Guicciardin, by which the Duke of Burbon aduertiſed the Viceroy of the difficulties of the armie, for remedie whereof he councelled him to growe to accorde with the Pope ſo farre foorth as it might be done with thEmperours honor: Immediatlie vpon the concluding of thaccorde, either partie retyred their bandes of ſouldiours, reuoked their armie by ſea, and the places that were taken were rendered, the Pope vſing good faith, and meaning in thexecucion of the contentes of the capitulacion, notwithſtanding at that time he had the better in all the realme of Naples: ſauing that in the parte of Agnila, the ſonnes of the Count Montoiro douting to remeine there in ſafetie, deliuered vp their father, who foorthwith with the fauor of the faction Imperiall chaſed them out of that prouince together with all thoſe that were againſt him: After this the Viceroy came to Rome, by reaſon of whoſe preſence there, the Pope iudging he ſtoode euerie way in good ſuretie for thobſeruacion of thaccorde, diſmiſſed with a verie ill councell, all thoſe bandes of ſouldiours that were in his pay in the quarters of Rome: Reteining only two hundred light horſemen, and two thowſand footemen of the blacke bandes: he was induced to this diſmiſſion of his regimentes by an opinion he had that the Duke of Burbon was inclined to thaccord, both for the difficulties that increaſed vpon him dayly, and alſo for the teſtimonie he had alwayes giuen of his deſire and diſpoſicion to peace.

But the affaires tooke an other courſe about the confines of Bolognia, for, aſſoone as the truce was eſtabliſhed, the Pope diſpatched Cæſar Fieremoſquo to the Duke of Burbon to approue and confirme thaccord, & to ſee him depart from of the Church lands ſo ſoone as he ſhould receiue money: But contrarie to their exſpectacion and the teſtimonies he had giuen before, the Duke of Burbon ſhewed a hard diſpoſicion to the peace, and in his ſouldiours appeared a farre more forward inclinacion, who ſemed to ſtand reſolut to follow the warre, either for that they ſtoode fixed vpon the hope of a great profit, or becauſe the moneys promiſed by the Pope, were not ſufficient to ſatisfie two paies: A matter which induced many to beleue, that if the Pope had aduaunced to the ſumme of an hundred thowſande duckats, the ſouldiours had eaſely accepted the truce: But whatſoeuer was the ground or campe of their obſtinacie, it is certaine that after the comming of Fieremoſquo, they ceaſſed not to rake and harrie the partes of Bolognia as before, and expreſſe vpon the people all demonſtracions and actes of ennemies: Neuertheleſſe the Duke of Burbon who cauſed to caſt platformes, and Fieremoſquo gaue continuall hope to the Popes Lieutenaunt that notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties & inſolencies the army ſhould accept the truce: together with which promiſe, Burbon aſſured him that he was conſtrained to caſt platformes and expreſſe other apparaunces of enterpriſe, only to enterteine the armie in hope to paſſe further, vntill he had reduced them to his deſire which was to keepe amitie with the Pope: Notwithſtanding at the ſame time were brought to the campe many prouiſions of meale, pyenors, cartes, powder and other like neceſſaries ſent by the Duke of Ferrara, who afterwards iuſtefied him ſelfe that neither the money he had ſent them, nor all other releues of what nature ſo euer, paſſed not the value of three ſcore thowſand duckats: But on the other ſide the Duke of Vrbin,

vnder a ſemblance of feare that if the army did accept the truce, it would returne towards Poliſena de Rovvigno, retyred the Venetian regiments beyonde Pavv and incamped at Caſalmaior: In this eſtate of ſuſpenſe and temporiſing continued the affayres of the warre for eyght dayes: But at laſt the Duke of Burbon, eyther for that ſuch had bene alwayes his intencion, or bicauſe the army was falne into an inſolencie aboue his power to reſtrayne, wrote letters to the Lieuetenant Guicciardin, that ſince he was not able to raunge the ſouldiers to his will, neceſſitie conſtrayned him to paſſe further: And putting it accordingly in execucion, he remoued the daye following being the laſt of Marche, and went to incampe at the bridge of Rene, where the furie of the footemen of the campe, had killed a gentleman ſent by the Viceroy to ſolicit the Duke of Burbon to imbrace the truce, had he not both with good celeritie and fortune auoyded the daunger of his life by fleeing away: But in that humor of rage and mutinie they expreſſed farre more inſolent demonſtracions againſt the Marquis of Guaſt, who being gon from tharmye to draw to the Realme of Naples by reaſon of his indiſpoſicion, or not to be concurrant with others to impugne th Emprours will, or induced happly by ſome other cauſe, was publiſhed and proclaymed rebell by the ſouldiers of tharmy.

The comming of the Duke of Burbon to the bridge of Rene, aſſured the Marquis of Saluſſo and the Popes Lieuetenant, that the army would drawe directly towardes Romagnia. By reaſon whereof, after they had left one parte of th Italian footemen for the gard of Bolognia, and with great difficultie brought thether the Svvyzzers for whoſe payes the Popes Lieuetenant was driuen to lend tenne thowſand duckats to Iohn Vetturio, they went the ſame night with the reſidue of the army to Furly, whereinto they entred the third day of Aprill, leauing within Imola a ſufficient garriſon to defend it: Somewhat beneath the ſame citie, the Duke of Burbon paſſed the fift day and incamped more lower vnder the high way. But thaduertiſement being come to Rome that the Duke of Burbon had not accepted the truce, the Viceroy made many ſemblances to be diſcontented, wherein perſwading him ſelfe that according to the former aduertiſements he had receiued, it was needeful to aduaūce a greater ſumme of money, he diſpatched a gentleman of his to make an offer of twenty thowſand duckats more, which he would leauy of the reuenues of Naples: But vnderſtanding that the gentleman had hardly eſcaped with the hazard of his life, he departed from Rome in perſon the third of Aprill, to meete and conferre with the Duke of Burbon, promiſing the Pope to compell him to imbrace the truce by ſeperating from him the men at armes & moſt part of the Spaniſh footemē, if by other meanes he could not induce him: But arriuing the ſixt daye at Florence, he ſtayed there as in a place moſt conuenient, to debate with the Deputies whome the Duke of Burbon ſent to him: By whome he was fully aſſured that there was no poſſibilitie to ſtay or conteine the army, but by aduauncing a greater defrayment of money, and that to be leauied vppon the Florentyns, vppon whome the Pope had layed all the charge of that prouiſion.

Theſe variacions increaſed greatly the difficulties & daungers of the Pope, which for many dayes before were augmented euen into degrees of extremities: for, both amyd ſuch an vncerteinty of councells and dealings of the Duke of Burbon, and by the ſucceſſe and yſſue drawne from the labor of the Viceroy, he ſtoode neede of the ſuccours of the confederats, the actions of whom went on dayly diminiſhing and abating, notwithſtanding the perſwaſions and inſtance of the Lieuetenant Guicciardin: The reaſon grewe vppon the Popes owne dealing, for that in all his ſpeeches & demonſtracions, he gaue knowledge of his deſire to the accord together with the great hope he had of the ſucceſſe of the ſame by the working of the Viceroy: And on the other ſide, the Lieuetenant, who comprehended by many ſignes that the Popes hope was vaine, and by the ſame reaſon ſaw that if the prouiſions of the confederats grewe cold, the matters of Florence and Rome ſtoode in apparant daunger, fell to perſwade with many ſtronge reaſons and ſimilitudes the Marquis of Saluſſo & the Venetians, that the accorde would not ſort to effect: Wherein he forgat not to encorage them, that, if not for the regardes of others, at leaſt for their owne intereſts, they would not abandon the affayres of the Pope and Tuskane: And in that action, the better to inſinuate credit and authoritie, he did not diſſemble that the Pope did vehemently deſire and demaund truce, and did vndiſcreetly labor and exſpecte the ſame, not looking into the manifeſt abuſes and doublenes of the Imperialls: he forgat not alſo to induce them, that though by ayding him they obteyned no other thing then to make eaſie for him the condicions of the accord: yet in that action they ſhould driue a drift of great good and profit to them ſelues, for that the Pope by their helpe, would accord for him and for the Florentyns vnder condicions which ſhould litle hurt the league: Where, if they left him abandoned, the neceſſitie of his affayres would compell him to pay to the Imperialls, a great ſumme of money preſently, with continuacion of ſome huge contribucion monthly for thinterteyning of thoſe armes and ſouldiers with the which the warre was to be brought againſt them afterwards: In which regardes, onles they would wilfully preiudice and harme them ſelues, they ought to ſtirre & come on with all their forces, to defend Tuskane whenſoeuer the Duke of Burbon would aduaunce to inuade it: The matter of this deliberacion reduced the Marquis of Saluſſo into no ſmal doubts & perplexities, but much more it heaped aſtoniſhment vppon the Venetians: for, the puſillanimitie of the Pope being not vnknowen to them both, they held for certeine, that though they ſhould ſeeke to ſuccor him of newe, yet he would not ſticke to embraſe thaccord (without reſpect to the confederats) as often as he had meane to obteyne it: Inſomuch as it ſeemed that they were preſſed in a matter very new and ſtraunge, to miniſter ayde to him to thend he might more eaſily accord with their common enemies: They conſidered that to leaue him abandoned, would be more preiudiciall to their common affayres: And yet they ſaw that they could not leaue their men in manifeſt daunger betweene the Appenyn and the ennemies, and in a contrye become already againſt them, if, whileſt they were in Tuskane, the Pope did eyther confirme thaccord, or made a new: Moreouer the Senate of Venice feared leaſt the Pope made inſtance to haue their men paſſe into Tuskane, to thende to conſtrayne them to conſent to a ſurceance of armes, by meane of the daunger wherein they ſhould be to loſe their mẽ. The Lieuetenant had eaſily retyred the Marquis of Saluſſo from thoſe doubts & perplexities, notwithſtanding he was encoraged to the contrary by many of his councell, to thende not to commit his ſouldiers to daunger: So that euen as he had not bene ready to come to Furly, ſo he refuſed not to paſſe into Tuskane if neede ſo required: But the Venetians who ſought to hold the Pope and Florentyns vnder hope, and on the other ſide, were apt to ſtand ready prepared from day to daye, to take ſuch courſe as the occurrances of things did require: gaue out directions to the Duke of Vrbyn to yſſue out of Caſalmaior the fourth day of Aprill, and to ſend the horſemen on that ſide beyond by the way that leadeth to Pavv, and the footemen alonge the riuer: And the Duke of Vrbin hauing regard to his owne perticular, was fearefull by the courſe that the Imperialls tooke into Romagnia, in which humor he diſpatched a regiment of two thowſande footemen Venetians, for the gard of his owne eſtates, notwithſtanding many were of opinion and perticularly the Pope, that he had paſſed a ſecret promiſſe to the Duke of Burbon, not to ſtoppe his paſſage into Tuskane,

But in this meane while the Duke of Burbon caſting to recouer vittells from all partes of which he had great want, ſent one part of tharmie affore Cotignola, a towne which after it had endured certeine ſummonce of the cannon, rendred vnder compoſicion, notwithſtanding it was very ſtronge by fortificacion and walls: for, they of the towne fearing the hauocke and inſolencies of ſouldiers had refuſed thoſe bands that were ſent to defende them: After the action of Cotignola, the Duke of Burbon ſent to Lugo foure cannons: And aſwell to make prouiſion of vittells, as for thimpediment of waters, he aboad three or foure dayes vppon the riuer of Lamono: And ſo he paſſed the riuer of Montono the xiij daye of Aprill and lodged at Villafrancho fiue miles from Furly: The ſame daye did the Marquis of Saluſſo ſtrippe and robbe fiue hundred footemen Spaniſh disbanded, who were gon out towards Monto Poggio to make pillage for vittels according to the example of the whole army being conſtrained by the great penury and neceſſitie of releeſe: The xiiij daye the Duke of Burbon incamped aboue the way that leadeth towards Meldolo, A way to paſſe into Tuskane by Galearo and Valdibagnio: he was ſolicited to take that way by them of Sienna who offred to him great quantities of vittells and pyonners: And in the way (inſolencies following diſorders) the launceknights who burned all as they paſſed, aſſaulted the towne of Meldolo which rendred vppon compoſicion, but was conſumed with fire notwithſtanding: That day the Duke of Burbon was aduertiſed that the Viceroy by the conſent of the Lord La Motte ſent by him for that effect, had capitulated the day before at Florence in this ſorte: That without going from other matters, but confirming of newe the capitulacion made at Rome, The Duke of Burbon ſhould beginne within fiue dayes next, to retyre him ſelfe with the armye: That at the firſt place whereunto he ſhould be retyred, there ſhould be paied to him three skore thowſand duckats, to which the Viceroy did adde twentye thowſande: That he ſhoulde receiue three skore thowſand more by the ende of the next moneth of Maye, of which the Viceroy by a ſcedule ſubſigned with his owne hand, bownd thEmprour to reſtore and repay fifty thowſand: Onely theſe laſt three skore thowſand duckats ſhould not be payed onles Phillip Stroſſy were deliuered and Iames Saluiatio abſolued of the penaltie of thirty thowſand duckats, as the Viceroy had promiſed to the Pope though not in the capitulacions of the truce, yet vnder ſimple and ſecret words: But neyther the knowledge of this reteyned the Duke of Burbon for paſſing further, nor the aduertiſement he had that the Viceroy was departed from Florence to come to the armye to him and to eſtabliſh with him all things that ſhould be neceſſary: for, the Viceroy did earneſtly deſire thaccord, aſwell for many other generall cauſes, as eſpecially (which I haue heard by credible relacion) for that he ſought to conuert the armie preſently againſt the Venetians: And albeit the Viceroy had promiſed at Rome to deiude from the Duke of Burbon, his caualarye or horſemen together with the moſte parte of the Spaniſh footemen, yet he refuſed to make ſuch ſeparacion ſo long as he was vppon the treatie within Florence, alleaging that it belonged not to him to be the cauſe of the ruine of thEmprours army: The xvj day the Duke of Burbon marched to lodge at Saint Sophia, A towne of the valley of Galearo ſubiect to the Florentyns: And ſtriuing with diligence and with deceite to preuent the ennemies to thende no impediment ſhoulde be giuen to him in paſſing the Alpes, A place where, for want of vittells, euery contrary accident had bene ſufficient to diſorder him: the xvij day he re-ceiued at Saint Peter at the baines, letters from the Viceroy and the Popes Lieuetenant signifying to him the comming of the Viceroy, to whome he made aunſwer as alſo to the Lieuetenant, that where the aduertiſement came to him in a lodging ſo vnapt as he could not without incommoditie attende him there, he would exſpect him the day following at Saint Mary of the baynes below the Alpes: In the ſeuerall letter which he wrote a part to the Viceroy, he recommended perticularly the ready deſire he had to come to accord, wherein he deſired him to impart with the Pope his good inclinacion and deuocion, notwithſtanding his intencion was otherwiſe. At the day aſſigned the Viceroy went to meete the Duke of Burbon, together with the Lieuetenant Guicciardin who being not without ſuſpicion of his marching & comming on with his power, and to thend he ſhould not enter with his army into Tuskane before the ſuccours prepared to defende it, perſwaded the Marquis of Saluſſo with many reaſons to aduaunce and goe before. And after he had with great efficacy of words and ſpirit diſputed the matter againſt Iohn Vetturio the Venetian Treaſorer alwayes aſſiſtant with the Marquis, and againſt others, who for feare leaſt their regiments of ſouldiers were committed to daunger, made their demaunds that before they paſſed into Tuskane, there ſhould be deliuered vnto them aſſurance for two hũdred thowſande duckats or at leaſt ſome ſtronge places in pawne, he brought him with all his companies to goe to Breſiquello: from thence he wrote to the Pope, that he found the Marquis ſo well diſpoſed and ready to march, that he made no doubt to procure him to paſſe with his army into Tuskane, aſſuring him ſelfe that the Venetian regiments would doe the like: But he ſignified that by howe much the matters of Florence ſtood aſſured by their paſſage, by ſo much were endaungered the affaires of Rome, becauſe the Duke of Burbon hauing no other hope remaining, would be cõſtrayned to conuert his forces to that enterpriſe: And that his armye hauing thaduauntage to be ſo neare Rome, it would be hard, with the ſuccors that ſhould be ſent, to match his diligence and celeritie, ſeeing he might well paſſe thappenyn in two remoues of incamping: That for feare of this, the Florentyns ſought affore hand to fortefie them ſelues with the forces of the Venetians and the Duke of Vrbin, to whom they had giuen hope and afterwardes aſſured it with promiſe, to enter the league, in caſe their bands of men of warre did paſſe into Tuskane: Whereunto they added obligacions for payment of a certaine number of footemen, And not to accord with th Emprour though the Pope would: That they had alſo offred to the Duke of Vrbin, (who being paſſed Pavv at Ficqueroles was arriued the xiij of Aprill at Finalo, and afterwards at Corticello) to render vp to him the caſtels of Saint Leo & Maiuolo, which offer was ſollicited with him by Pallas Rucellai whom they ſent to him to follow that negociacion: Inſomuch as it was leſſe hard for them to haue a ready ſuccour, yea though there was aduertiſement that the Viceroy did not onely not find in the place appoynted the Duke of Burbon who the ſame day diſſembling thappoyntmẽt ſought to paſſe the Alpes: but alſo had bene in great daunger to be ſlayne by the payſants of thoſe quarters riſing in armes for thoppreſſions and harmes they receiued by the army: for, the Marquis was ready to paſſe the Alpes, notwithſtanding the Duke of Vrbin ſoliciting him to come and ſpeake with him in the borow of Saint Peter, ſought by all meane to forſlowe and hinder him: But the xxij of Aprill he incamped at the borow of Saint Lavvrence in Mugello: The ſame being the cauſe that by his example, the Duke of Vrbin, who with no honor nor good order could goe farre from him, paſſed in like ſort, and incamped at Barberina the xxv. day of Aprill: Wherein he tooke one principall reaſon vpon the obiection that might be made againſt him, that in case any ill accident or harmes fell vppon them, they should not lay it vppon him, both seeing the readines of the French men, and knowing that the Venetians had referred them selues to his will, though with this relacion and commission, that if immediatly after he were ariued in Tuskane, the Florentyns went not thorow with the confederacion, he should presently repasse and retyre his army.

At last the Duke of Burbon being the same day passed the Alpes, lodged at Saint Stephens, which towne defended brauely thassalt of his souldiers: And the more to blind the Pope with excuses and reasons artificiall, and to haue a greater occasion to offend him, he sent one of his gentlemen to keepe him stil confirmed in his good deuocion and desire to haue accord with him: Onely he alleaged that as in regard of the obstinacie of his armye which he could not resist, he was driuen to accompany his souldiers to auoyde a greater harme: so he besought him to beleeue well of his fidelitie, with this councell not to leaue of the solicitacions of accorde and not to sticke for any summe of money: But it was a matter superfluous to vse those diligences with the Pope, who beleeuing too much the thing which he desired, and desiring too much to ease him selfe of exspenses, assoone as he was aduertised of the conclusion made at Florence in the presence & priuitie of the procurer of the Duke of Burbon, did vndiscreetly dismisse almost all his footemen of the blacke bands: And in that securitie Monsr Vavvdemont was gon by sea to Marseilles, as if the peace had bene as firme as the Pope was secure: But all the armies beeing thus drawne into the bodye of Tuskane, and the confederats hauing vnderstanding that the Duke of Burbon was gonne in one daye which was the three and twenty daye from Saint Stephens to incampe at Chiassa neare to Aretzo conteyning a distance of eyghteene myles: The Capteines who were assembled at Barberina, drewe into councell what was to bee done: Amongest whome many of them together with the agents of the Pope and Florentyns, made instance that the armies knitte in one strength shoulde marche and bee bestowed in some place beyond Florence, to take from the Duke of Burbon all meanes to approache that citie: which instance being somewhat qualified, it was resolued to suffer the regiments to repose in the lodgings where they were, And that the Captaines the daye following shoulde goe to Ancisa thirteene miles from Florence, to thende afterwardes to call thether all their companies if they founde that place to bee assured, which Federyk Bossolo the Author of that councell did promisse: But as they were the daye after vppon the waye and very neare Florence, there happened an accident which might haue brought forth very daungerous effects, if it had not beene remedied, the same hindring greatly the execucion of that councell and many other good complots which might haue deriued of it: This was the discourse of the accident: At Florence the mindes of men were much stirred, of whome as the most part of the populars were discontented with the present gouernment, so the youth of the towne concurring in that insolencie, made a prowde instance to the Magistrates to giue them libertie of publike armes to defende them as they sayde agaynst the oppressions of the souldiours: But before the Magistrates could establishe any resolucion, the discontentment which before was but in opinion, burst out into a manifest and open tumult in the publike place, where the most part of the Commons and almost all the concurse of the youth, proclayming armes, beganne in their furie to ronne to the pallace: One matter that inflamed and pushed on this tumult was the indiscression and tymerousnes of Siluio Cardinall of Cortono, who being determined to yssue out of the towne to goe meete the Duke of Vrbyn to doe him honor, forbare not to abandon the towne, notwith-

ſtanding he was not ignorant before his going that the tumult was in action: So that the towne being poſſeſſed with a rumor of his fleing away, euery one was the more ready to ronne to the pallace, which being in the power of the youth that were conſpirators, and the Court and greene all full of the Commons armed, The high Magiſtrate was conſtrayned to proclayme rebells by a ſolemne decree, Hipolito and Alexander the Popes Nephewes, with intencion to introduce againe the popular gouernment: But in the meane while as the Magiſtrat held the people appeaſed with this proclamacion, the Duke and the Marquis entred Florence with many Captaines and were accompanied with the Cardinall of Cortono and Hipolito de Medicis: They managing at firſt certaine bands of fifteene hundred footemen who had bene kept armed in the citie many dayes for feare of the Duke of Burbon, reduced them all into one reſolut and firme ſtrength, and drew in warlike order towards the greene or mayne place, which the Commons immediatly abandoned, and in their feare left to their power, the thing which they had no vallour to defend: Neuertheleſſe what by the violence of ſtones caſt from within the pallace, and fury of the ſmall ſhot that played vpon them, there was no ſauetye for them to abide there, but ſomewhat to auoyd the importunitie of the daunger, and not altogether to be farre from the place they had gotten, they retyred them ſelues into the ſtreetes and quarters thereabouts: The Duke of Vrbin was of opinion (A reaſon which albeit ſeemed to beare but ſmall conſequence, yet it was the principall cauſe that Florence that day was deliuered of ſo great a daunger) that the bands that were within Florence were not ſufficient to winne the pallace: And doubting according to the experience of a ſouldier that if it were recouered by night, leaſt the Commons would eftſoones haue recourſe to armes, he determined with the priuitie of Cardinalls Cibo, Cortono, and Radolffo together with the conſent of the Marquis of Saluſſo and the Venetian Legats being all aſſembled in the ſtreete of Garba ioyning to the pallace greene, to ſend for one part of the Venetian bands incamped vpon the plaine of Florence neare the citie: By meane of this deuiſe there was towards, a daungerous encownter, for that neyther the pallace could be ſubdued without the ſlaughter of moſt of the nobilitie that were within, and alſo the drommes ſtriking vp to armes, there was daunger leaſt the ſouldiours in that libertie would not put to ſacke the reſidue of the citye: yea that daye had beene very vnhappye for the Florentyns, if the ready witte and councell of the Lieuetenant Guicciardin, had not cutte in ſunder the knotte that of it ſelfe was very harde to bee vndone: he ſeeing to come towardes them, Federyk Boſſolo, and comprehending in his imagination the cauſe of his comming, left the others with whome he was deuiſing, and ranne to meete him to thende to bee the firſt to ſpeake to him: In the beginning of the mutinie Federyk went vp to the pallace hoping to reappeaſe the riot aſwell through his authoritie as for the familiaritye he had with the moſte parte of the youthe: But muche leſſe that he profited by that labour, ſeeing of the contrary he receyued from ſome of them wordes iniurious and reprochefull ſuche as the humor of men drawne into rebellion coulde afforde, yea beeing kept reteyned certeyne howers he founde greate difficultie to bee ſette at libertye: But beeing got from them more full of diſdayne then of compaſſion, and bringing away a true diſcouerie and informacion howe eaſie it were to take the place bothe for the litle forces they had, and for the leſſe order they kept, he perſwaded the reſidue to aſſault it preſently: But the Lieuetenant cutting of that deuiſe, ſtept in and with very ſhort ſpeeches tolde him what greefe the Pope woulde conceyue by thoſe diſorders together with the domage

that consequently woulde followe vppon all the affayres of the Confederates: In which regardes as it were better to labour rather to appease and settle then to kindle and incense the heartes of men, So also it was a matter not a little preiudiciall to make knowen to the Duke of Vrbin and others so great a facilitie to carye it: In so muche as raunging him to his opinion he procured him so to temper with the residue, and to reconcile the mutinie without the helpe of armes, that they all approued his deuise, and made choyse of them two to goe vp to the Pallace to deale with the Conspirators, and assure them in generall and particular that what so euer they had committed agaynst the lawes of the state that daye, shoulde not in any sorte be imputed agaynst them: And beeing gone vp to the Pallace vnder safeconduit of those that were within, they induced them at laste after many difficulties, to condiscende to abandon the Pallace which they coulde no longer keepe. Thus was the tumulte appeased more by industrie then by armes, And the Citie that earst was full of insolencie and furie, was thus by counsell deliuered from daunger, and all thinges returned to the same estate wherein they were before the mutinie. But oftentimes as ingratitude and reproche are farre more ready then the remuneration and prayse of good workes, So albeit for the present the operation and witte of the lieftenant Guicciardin was highly esteemed and commended, yet not long after the Cardinall of Cortono burst out into murmure and complayntes agaynst him, that holding more deare the safety of the Citizens, and particularly Levvis Guicciardin his brother being at that time chiefe Magistrate, then carefull ouer the greatnes of the house of Medicis, his artificial dealing had bin the cause why the state had not bin that day established for euer in the house of Medicis, with the armes & blood of the Citisens: And on the other side, the commons and populars followed him with accusations and complayntes, for that bringing backe from the Pallace reaportes that the daungers were farre greater then they were, he had betrayed the vallour of the Nobility by inducing them for the benefite of the famulie of the Medicis, to render without any necessitie: So hard it is to do the thing that beareth a cleare sight in the eyes of all men, for that no good action what dignitie so euer it hath, if it bring not with it the fauour of the time wherin it is done, and the opinion & iudgement of those into whose hearts it seeketh to insinuate and winne place, it is but a candle that burneth dimme, and whose shadowe seemeth more then the lighte. Albeit you see the tumulte of Florence appeased the same daye without murder and blood, yet from that originall ground did ensue successiuely many great disorders: yea it may be inferred that had it not bin for that accident, the ruine that happned immediatly after, had bin accompanied with his euasion: for bothe the Duke of Vrbin and Marquis of Saluſſe abyding still at Florence for the occasion of the mutinie, went not on according to the first resolution, to view the lodging of Anciſa: And also the day after the appeasement, Lovvis Piſan, and Marke Foſcaro Embassadour for the Venetians with the Florentins, taking occasion vppon the inconstancie of the Citie, protested that they would not suffer the armie to passe Florence, vnlesse there were made a concluſion of the confederation which had bin negociated: In which they demaunded contribution for ten thousande footemen, seeking through the oportunity of the time to serue their turnes of the necessities of the Florentins: But in the end the cõcluſion was accomplished the xxviij. day, referring the matter of the cõtribution to the sentence of the Pope, who was beleued to be alredy reunited with the confederates: Besides, the time being accomplished for the payes of the Svvizzers, & Loys Piſan hauing no mony to furnish them for the yll ordenãce and addreſſe which the Venetians had giuen, there paſt certen dayes before he could make prouiſion of money: In ſo muche as through theſe variations and other impedimentes ſubſiſting, the good counſell to drawe with the armies to Anciſa, was made vayne. But in this eſtate and condition of affayres, the Pope looking with better eye into the wyles wherewith the Duke of Burbon had abuſed the Viceroy, and alſo ſeeing him to aduaunce forwarde into the heart of Tuskane, turned by neceſſitie all his cogitations to the warre, And in that humor diſcerning on all ſides nothing but viſions of daunger and feare, after the xxv. daye, he made a newe confederation with the Frenche king and the Venetians, by the whiche as they were bounde to miniſter to him a greate ſumme of money, ſo he would not reſtrayne him ſelfe nor the Florentines to anye further obligation then their faculties were hable to beare, alleaging that vppon them both had bene layde already heauy burdens of exſpences and trauelles: But albeit theſe conditions very grieuous of them ſelues, were approued by th Embaſſadours of the confederates, to ſeperate entirely the Pope from the accordes made with the Viceroy: yet they had not their perfection and confirmation by their maiſters and heades principall, in whom eyther their authoritie or their will did muche to diſſolue the conditions of the action: for the Venetians charged Dominike Venerio with a great errour, for that without commiſſion of the Senate he had concluded a confederation of great exſpences and little frute, ſince they gathered by the Popes inconſtancie, that in all occaſions he would eftſoones turne to his firſte deſire to accorde with the Viceroy: And touching the French king, both drayned of money, and driuen more to weary themprour with the longnes of the warre, then with the victorie, he iudged it would ſuffice nowe to enterteyne the warre with a ſmall exſpence: And which more is, albeit in the beginning whē he vnderſtood the Pope had made truce with the Viceroy, both the matter and manner of the truce were grieuous to him: yet looking better afterwardes into theſtate of affayres, he wiſhed that the Pope would diſpoſe the Venetians (without whom he could make no conuention) to embrace the truce. But at this tyme the Pope was not a little diſcontented to ſee the body of the warre transferred into Tuskane, and yet leſſe grieued then if it had imbraced the towne of Rome: and in that regarde he leauyed bands of ſouldiours, & made prouiſions for money, but not with that property of diligence which the eſtate of his daungers required: He had alſo a purpoſe to ſende Ranſo de Cere agaynſt them of Sienna, and alſo to inuade them by ſea, to thende that the duke of Burbon being intangled in Tuskane, might be ſtopped for taking his way to Rome: Of which expedition neuertheles he had euery day ſo much the leſſe feare and doubt, by how much more he hoped, that both for the difficulties of the duke of Burbon to leade his army to Rome without vittels and money, and for the cōmoditie of theſtate of Sienna where at the leaſt his ſouldiors would be refreſhed, he would be driuen to ſtay himſelfe vpon thenterpriſe againſt the Florentins. But the Duke of Burbon, eyther for that hys firſte counſell was otherwyſe, whiche he had ſecretly determined at Finalo by the authoritie of the duke of Ferrara and aduiſe of Ierome Moron: or diſtruſting to driue to any good iſſue the enterpriſe of Florence, for that the mayn forces of the league were aſſembled neare there for the defence of the citie: and laſtly being no longer able to enterteine the army without money, which he had till that day caried through ſo many difficulties with promiſes & hopes: and now ſeing time had reduced him to this ſtraite, either to periſh amid the murmures of his ſouldiors, which could not but be miſerable to a mā of his hart, or els to hazard the fortune of battell in ſo great a weaknes and diſorder, wherein if there there were anye certentye it was in the losse of the victory: he determined to march with all diligence to surprise the towne of Rome, where the rewardes of the victorie would be equall with the daunger of thaduenture, and to themprour it would bring no lesse renowme and honor, then to the souldiours a full satisfaction of their long and weary trauells: He was pushed on to this enterprise by a hope which he felt to carye the towne, seeing the Pope with an euill counsell had firste decassed the Svvizzers, and afterwardes dismissed the blacke bandes, and begon so slowely to refurnishe him selfe at suche tyme as the accord was desperate, that it was thought he could not in good time assemble forces sufficient to defende his daungers: And so the Duke of Burbon with whom nothing was more familiar then the enterprise of Rome, departed the xxvj. of Aprill from the countrey of Aretze, with his armie no lesse speedy in marching then swift in hope: his celeritie to march & winne time tooke from him all care to cary artilleries or anye trayne or baggage of campe, so well was he disposed to see executed the thing whiche in his heart he had determined, or rather so violent was his destenie, to call him to the ende of his life which he could now no longer prolong: In so much as marching with this incredible diligẽce neyther being hindred by the raynes which in those dayes fell in great abundance, nor with the want of vittells which is no small impediment to all great actions, he drewe neare to Rome at a time when the Pope was scarcely aduertised of his comming: All the wayes where he passed were as free from resistance, as his desire was farre from alteration and chaunge, seeing he found no impediment neyther at Viterba whither the Pope had not sent strength in time, nor in any other place apte to staye the resolution of the armie so well prepared to endomage him. Nowe began the Pope to haue recourse to those remedies, which if he had vsed in their due time and place, might haue bene to speciall purpose to turne awaye so great storme: and nowe founde he too late theffect and truth of the counselles of some wise men about him, propheſying that he would deferre the ministration of those helpes vntill eyther his necessities were greater then his remedies, or at leaste they woulde profite little beeing applyed out of due season: Nowe did he create three Cardinalles for money, which eyther could not be leauyed for the speedy importunitie of thassayres, or else if he should receiue it, the vse would be vnprofitable by reason of hys daungers that hastned on so faste: He called together the people of Rome, whome in great compassion he besought that in so great a hazarde of their countrey, they would readely runne to armes to defende it, wherein he disposed the bodies of the popular sort to protect their libertie, and imposed vppon the rycher loanes of money to wage souldiours: A taxation which ranne amongest the people with no authoritie, seeing vppon the leauying of the impostes one Dominike Maximo of the greatest wealth amongst the Romains, offred to lende but an hundred duckets: for which couetousnes he bare a sharpe punishment, for that his sonnes were made a pray to the souldiours, and himselfe falling into the calamitie of a prisoner, was rated at a huge raunsome to redeme his libertie. But after they vnderstood at Florence the newes of the discamping of the duke of Burbon, which beeing written by Vitelly lying then within Aretzo, lingred a daye in comming more then ordinary: The capteins determined that the count Guido Rangon with his horsmen & with the trowpes of the count Caiezze, together with a thousand footmen of Florence & the Church, should march spedely without baggage towards the towne of Rome, and that the other part of the army should follow after: They hoped that if the D. of Burbon drew with him hs artilleries, that proportion of succours woulde be at Rome before him,

And if he marched with expedition, it would aryue so soone after him, that hauing no artilleries, and the citie of Rome beeing furnished with six thousand footmen by the Popes reaport, the towne would be hable to maynteine defence vntill the first succours were come, which being aryued, there could be no danger of the losing of Rome: But the celeritie of the Duke of Burbon and the slow prouisions made at Rome, preuented theffect of all those deuises: for as Ranso de Cero to whom the Pope had recommended the principall charge of the defence of Rome, had according to his short time leauyed very few footmen of seruice, but gathered a great crewe of men ignorant and vntrained in warre, whom he had drawne by force out of the stables of Cardinals and prelates, and shoppes of artificers, besides Innes and other domesticall places of the towne: So he laboured to cast rampars in the suburbes, such as in his iudgement were sufficient for defence, though in the account of others they were farre to weake to holde out the daunger that was toward: his confidence was such to defend them, that he would not suffer (for the safety of the towne) to breake vp the bridge of Tyber in case the suburbes and quarter beyond Tyber coulde not be defended: and in that humor of securitie holding for superfluous all other sortes of succours, when he was aduertised of the comming of Count Guido, he wrote letters to him in the Popes name by the Bishop of Verona, that seeing the citie of Rome was furnished and fortified sufficiently, he should only sende a proportion of six or eight hundred harquebuziers, and for himselfe with the residue of his people, he aduised him to goe ioyne himselfe to the army of the league, where he should do more profite, then if he were inclosed within the towne of Rome: Which letter albeit did litle harme for that the Count was not so farre aduaunced as he might aryue in time, yet it made good declaratiō what slender sense or feling he had of the present dangers: But if it may be referred to a wonder that mortall men neither can not nor know not howe to resist destenie, it was a matter no lesse maruelous that the Pope, who before was wont to despise Ranso de Cere aboue all other capteins, threw himselfe now into his armes, and reappосed his life and estate wholly vpon his confidence and iudgement: And yet this was a matter more straunge and contrary, that he who in farre lesser daungers was wont to be vexed with feare and terror, beeing euen vppon the poynt to abandon the Citie at such time as the Viceroy drew with his campe to Frusolono, Now in so great a tempest of perill and hazard, cōtrary to his custome, his nature and all exspectation, did not only constantly remayne in Rome, but had so great a hope to defend it, that being as it were the aduocate & somner to solicit for thenemies, he did not only forbid men to go away, but also in the same obstinacy he gaue out ordenance that there should not be transportation nor outcarying of goodes, suche as Marchantes with other natures of Artificers woulde for safety haue sente downe the ryuer.

The fift day of May the duke of Burbon incamped within the medowe neare to Rome, from whence with the insolencie of a souldiour he sent a trumpet to demaund passage of the Pope through the citie of Rome, to go with his army to the Realme of Naples: The morning following vppon the poynt of the daye, by the consideration of his case and thaduersities therof, he found there remayned no other hope for hys affayres, then to be resolute to releeue the afflictions of his armie, and according to the oportunitie that was offred by the citie of Rome, eyther to dye or to vanquish: In which resolution pushed on more and more by the murmures and exclamations of his souldiors in whom he could not discerne which was greater either their insolencies or their necessities, he drew neare the suburbes by the way of the Mountaine

and Santo Spirito, where he began to giue a furious assault: wherein he seemed to haue the fauour of fortune, who made him present the armie in more surety by the benefite of a thicke mist, which beeing ryssen before day and increased with degrees of fogge and thicknes, became such a couer to his whole campe that his souldiours were not discerned til they were neare the place where they began to giue the assalt: The Duke of Burbon through a laste dispayre of his estate aduaunced before all his companies, eyther for that he had no other exspectation of refuge in case he returned not victorious, or else by his owne example, he thought to call on with a greater courage the Launceknightes whome it seemed went not resolutely to the seruice: But suche was his destenie to determine his life and his glorie together, or rather suche the rewarde of his wilfull forwardnes, which for the most parte heapeth wretched effectes vpon such as seeke not to accompanie their vallour with counsell and discression: In the beginning of the assaulte he was stricken with a bullet of a harquebuze, of which wound he fell downe dead to the earth, receiuing iustly vpon his body and life the price of the action which contrary to all iustice and pyetie he went about to execute: But muche lesse that his death did abate or diminishe, seeing it did inflame and redouble the courage of his souldiours, who feighting with a wonderfull constancie the space of two houres, made way at last by their hands and weapons to enter the suburbes, wherein they were not onely holpen by the weaknes of the rampiers which were great and generall, but also they found helpe in the slender resistance which the defendantes made: An experience of right good doctrine to such as haue not as yet gotten by the benefite of examples paste, the knowledge of things present, who in that action may discerne what property of difference is betwene the vertue of souldiours exercised & trayned in warre, and armies newly and hastily leauied and compounded of the multitude of a people more wilful then skilfull, and by so muche lesse apt to be drawne vnder discipline, by how much more by their nature and custome they are seldome conformable to any good order. For there was at the defence of the suburbes one parte of the youth of Rome vnder the enseignes of the people, notwithstanding that many of the Gebelins and faction of Colonno desired or at least did not feare the victorie of thimperialls: They hoped in regard of their faction, to receiue no harme or offence by the victors, the same being the cause why they proceded so coldly in the defence: Neuertheles for that according to the rules of warre, it is a hard matter to take townes without artilleries, there dyed of the assaylants, partly by that want, and partly through their wilfull forwardnes, about a thousand footemen: who hauing once by their vallour made the waye open to enter in, all the defendantes fled before them as men whose feare was farre aboue any other sense or passion in them, In which disorder some tooke the waye which his fortune and not his witte layde out for him: some in the astonishment seking to flee who durst no more feight, was slayne by thenemy afore he could resolue vpon the way of his safety, some eyther better prepared or more happly preserued, found that safety in running away which they could not but dout if they had longer endured the fight: and some with that resolutiō which their present calamity would suffer, ranne by heapes towards the Castell, where in place of reskew they founde a feare conformable to their owne, In so much as all things beeing reduced to confusion and manyfest flight, the suburbes were entirely abandoned and leste a pray to the victors: And the person of the Pope who exspected with great deuotion in the pallace of Vattican what would be the issue of thassault, hearing that the enemies were entred, had also (with the others) his passions of feare and frayltie, and in that tymerous contemplation of hys owne perill, he fledde with certayne Cardinalls to the Caſtell: His feare kept him from beeing reſolute in a perill that was ſo deſperate, neyther dyd he thinke that with the preſence and maieſtie of his perſon though it was couered with the vayle of the higheſt dignitie vpon earth, he was hable to put by the daunger, which the vallour and fidelitie of his ſouldiours could not defende with their weapons: There he conſulted with the Cardinalls whether it were more for his ſafety to remayne there, or during the fury of thaſtoniſhment to retyre with the light horſemen of his garde into ſome place of more ſuretie by the waye of Rome: But he who was appoynted by deſtenie to be an example of the calamities that may thunder vpon Popes, and howe frayle is thauthoritie and maieſtie of that ſea, beeing certified by the relation of Berard de Padoa who was fledde from tharmy imperiall, that the Duke of Burbon was dead, and that the whole army ſtanding abated in courage for the death of their Capteine, deſyred to come to accorde with him, In which matter they ſent out men to parley with the principalls there, he wretchedly left there all his counſells to goe awaye, both he and his Capteines remayning no leſſe irreſolute in the prouiſions for defence, then they had bin ſlowe in thexpeditions: So that the day following, the Spaniardes neyther ſeeing order nor counſell to defende the quarter beyonde Tyber, entred the place without any reſiſtance: and from thence, not finding any impedimentes to ſtoppe their victorie, the ſame euening they entred the Citie of Rome by the bridge Xiſto, where except ſuche as reappoſed in the confidence of their faction, and certayne Cardinalls, who for that they bare a name to embrace themprours quarrell, beleeued to finde more ſuretie then the others, all the reſidue of the Court and Citie (as happneth in accidentes ſo furious) was conuerted into fleeing and confuſion: But the ſouldiours beeing within the Citie whiche they knewe wanted nothing to make them right, glorious, and well ſatisfied of all things apperteining to their deſyres, they began to omit no tyme to execute the thing they had ſo dearely bought: euery one ranne to pillage with the ſame vnbridled libertie whiche in ſuche caſes maketh ſouldiours both inſolent and impious: There was ſmall care or regarde borne eyther to the name of friends, factions, or fauorers, and muche leſſe was reſpected the authoritie of Cardinalls and prelates, or dignitie of temples and monaſteries, and laſtely not reſerued from violation the holy Relickes brought thither from all partes of the world, yea euen things ſacred and ſpecially dedicated, were prophaned from their ſhrines and holy places, and made ſubiect to the furious willes and diſcreſſion of the ſouldiours: it is not onely impoſſible to reaccount, but alſo to imagine the calamities of that Citie rayſed to a wonderfull greatnes, and appoynted by Gods ordinance to ſuffer many fortunes and directions, hauing bene ſacked by the Gothes within nyne hundred and foureskore yeres: It is harde to particulate the greatnes of the pray, both for the generall wealth and riches which the greedy hands of the ſouldiours had made vp in heapes, and for other thinges more rare and precious drawne out of the ſtore houſes of Marchauntes and courtiers: But the matter which made the ſpoyle infinite in value, was the qualitie and great number of priſoners redeemed with moſt riche and huge raunſomes: And to make vp a full tragedie of miſerie and infamie, the Launceknightes beeing ſo muche the more inſolent and cruell, by howe muche they bare hatred to the name of the Churche of Rome, tooke priſoners certayne Prelates, whom with great contempt and indignitie they ſet vpon Aſſes and leane Moyles, and with their faces reuerſed to the crowpe of the beaſtes, they ledde them through the Citie of Rome apparelled with the habites

and markes of their dignitie: yea they passed many of them to cruell tormentes, who eyther dyed in the furie of the action, or at least with the paynefulnes thereof they lyued not long after, first yeelding a raunsome, and afterwards rendring their liues: The generall slaughter aswell at the assault as in the rage of sacking, was about foure thousande bodies: All the pallaces of the Cardinals were sacked, except some particulars, who to saue the Marchantes that were retyred thither with their goods together with the persons and goods of many others reserued of the generall calamitie, made promise of great summes of money: To whom notwithstanding was vsed this iniquitie, that some of them that had compounded with the Spaniardes, were afterwards sacked by the launceknightes, or at least constrayned to a seconde raunsome: The Lady Marquis of Mantua compounded for her pallace for the summe of fiftie thousande duckets which were payed by the Marchants and others retyred thither: of which summe the rumor ranne that Ferrand her sonne had ten thousande for his share: The Cardinall of Sienna dedicated in a perpetuall deuotion to the name of themprour, after he had agreed with the Spaniardes aswell for himselfe as for his pallace, was afterwardes made prisoner by the Launceknightes, who made bootie and pray of his pallace, and afterwardes leading him all naked with buffets and bastonadoes into the Borow, he was driuen to redeeme his lyfe out of their handes with a promise of fiue thousande duckets: The Cardinalls Minerua and Ponsero passed vnder almoste the like calamitie: who beeing prisoners to the Launceknightes, were rated at a raunsome which they payed, after they had bene in a vyle spectacle caryed in processiõ through the towne of Rome: This furie of souldiours executed in a place of so great riches and profite, could endure no dispensation of any sorte or qualitie of men, seeing the Prelates and Cardinalls Spanish and Germains, who made themselues assured that the souldiours of their Nation would spare them from oppression and taxation, were taken and passed by the same measure of miserie and calamitie as others did: Right pitifull were the cryings and lamentations of the women of Rome, and no lesse worthy of compassion the calamitie of Nonnes and Virgins professed, whom the souldiours rauished by trowpes out of their houses to satisfie their lust, no age, no sex, no dignitie or calling was free from the violation of souldiours, in whom it was doubtfull whether bare more rule the humor of crueltie to kill, or the appetite of luste to deflowre, or lastely the rage of couetousnes to robbe and spoyle: yea in the violation of these women might be discerned a confirmation of the iudgementes of God hidden from mortall men, for that he suffred to be deliuered vp to the vilenes of men barbarous and bloudy, the renowmed chastitie of women professed and virgins: To this compassion was ioyned the infinite clamours of men forced agaynst all law of humanitie, partly to wrest from them vnreasonable raunsomes, and partly to disclose their goods which they had hidden from the rauine of the souldiours: All holy things, Sacraments, and relikes of Saintes whereof the Churches were full, beeing dispoyled of their ornamentes, were pulde downe and layde vpon the earth, suffring no small prophanations by the vyle handes of the Launceknightes: And what so euer remayned vpon the prayes and spoylings of thimperialls, which were things but base and vyle, were raked and caryed away by the peysantes and tennantes of the lands of the Colonnois, whose insolencie caryed them into Rome during the generall furie: Onely the Cardinall of Colonno aryuing the day after, preserued in his compassion the honour of many women that happly were fledde for reskew into his house. The rumor went that the valuation and prise of this sacke in golde, siluer, and iewells, amounted to more then a million of duckets, but the matter of raunſomes conteyned a greater quantitie.

The ſame day that thimperials tooke Rome, Count Guido aryued with his light horſmen and eight hundred harquebuziers, thinking to enter the ſame night by the bridge of Salaro: But hearing of the accident and dolorous eſtate of the towne, he retyred to Otricoly, where the reſidue of his forces came to him: for notwithſtanding the letters he had receyued from Rome, by which he vnderſtoode there was no reckoning made of his ſuccours, yet he forbare not to kepe on his waye, reteining this ſpecial deuotion to be reputed the man that ſhould giue reskew to Rome in her greateſt afflictions: And yet like as it is the nature of men to be gracious and eaſy interpreters of their owne actions, but hard and ſeuere cenſors of the actions of others, ſo there wanted not ſome who in that humor reprehended the Count Guido for not knowing howe to vſe a fayre occaſion: for that as the Imperialls beeing wholly diſpoſed to followe ſo riche a pray, to robbe houſes, to ſearche out treaſour that was hidde, to take priſoners, and to reduce to places of ſuretie ſuche as they had taken, were diſperſed into all the partes of the Citie, without order for their lodging, without knowing their enſeignes, and without obeying the commaundementes of their Capteins: their confuſion was ſuche, as if Count Guido with his reskewes had made a ſodayne entrie into Rome and ſhowed their faces to the Caſtell which was neyther beſieged nor garded, it was beleeued that they had not onely obteyned the deliuerance of the Pope, but alſo in that oportunitie had done ſome braue exployte: wherein they ſhould haue had ſo muche the more facilitie, by howe muche they might haue commaunded ouer the diſorders of the ſouldiours, who were ſo vniuerſally drowned in the action of pillage, that for any accident that might happen, there could be ſcarcely reordred or drawne together any notable number, the ſame beeing verified by thexperience of certayne dayes after, when vppon ſounding the " Alarme, not a ſouldiour was in readynes to reſort to his enſeigne: But ſuche are the " errours and imperfections of men that being caryed with ſelfe opinion, without the " ground of reaſon or example, they oftentimes beleeue that if things had taken an " other courſe, the iſſue had bene otherwiſe, wherof if thexperience might be ſeene,
" their iudgementes would oftentimes be founde fallible and falſe. But nowe there remayned onely to thoſe that were incloſed within the Caſtell, a hope to be reskewed by the armie of the league, who beeing departed from Florence no ſooner then the thirde of May for the long tyme the Venetians tooke to paye the Svvizzers, diſpoſed their marching in ſuche ſort as the Marquis of Saluſſe went a dayes iourney before the Venetian regimentes, but vnder this ordenance and agreement betweene him and the Duke that he ſhould followe him the ſame way: Neuertheles the Duke contrary to that reſolution, tooke the ſeuenth day the way from the lodging of Cortona to Perouſa, to aryue at Lody, and afterwardes at Otrio, and there paſſing Tyber to ioyne with the reſidue: Who as they marched along the waye appoynted, forced and ſackt the borow of Pieua refuſing in their obſtinacie to lodge the Svvizzers, in which conflict were paſſed to the ſworde ſix or eight hundred of thoſe that were within: By reaſon of this diſorder which drew the ſouldiours to conſume time in pillage and ſpoyle, the armie aryued no ſooner then the tenth day at the bridge of Graniauola, where they had aduertiſement of the taking of Rome, and the eleuenth daye they came to Oruieto, where by the counſell of Federike de Boſſolo, he and the Marquis and Hugo Peppoly with a great trowpe of horſe drewe towards the Caſtell, with this intention, that he and Hugo ſhould go vp euen to the Caſtell, and the Marquis

quis to remayne behinde to backe them: In which deuise they had this hope, that finding thimperialls disordered, the suddennes of their aryuing both not looked for, and in their greatest heate of spoyle and pillage, would happly fauour them with occasion to drawe out of the Castell the Pope and his Cardinalls, wherein they seemed chiefly to take the aduauntage of the disorders of the souldiours, in whom was more care to robbe and spoyle then to foresee daungers: But that deuise drewe to no effect, both for that beeing not farre from Rome, Federiks horse falling vnder him he receyued suche a hurt as he was not hable without greater hazarde to goe from the place, and also Hugo showing him selfe before the Castell at high dayes where by his direction he should haue aryued in the night, retyred his companies, alleaging that thenterprise was discouered, but as Federike sayde, he forsooke the action committed to him because his feare was greater then his vallour.

In this meane while the duke of Vrbin vnderstanding the accident of Rome, albeit he assured that he would succour the Pope with all his forces, yet taking the fauour of the tyme and occasion to depriue the estate of Perousa out of the hands of Gentill Baillon who was supported and confirmed in it by the Popes authoritie, and to restore it to the arbitration and disposing of the sonnes of John Pavvle, made his approches to Perousa with the Venetian regimentes, & what with threates which were sharpe and rigorous, and with the terrour of his armie standing prepared in their presence, he compelled Gentill to depart from the thing which he kept by vsurpation: He consumed three daies in that action, and leauing there certayne commanders, suche as depended vpon Malateste and Horatio, of whom the one was inclosed in the Castell S. Angeo, and the other managed the warre in Lombardy with the Venetian regimentes, he departed from thence the sixtenth day to Orbietta, the waye which he tooke at comming out of Cortona to goe to Rome beyonde Tyber, being the cause that he had lingred long. At Orbietta all the Capteines and commaunders of the armie tooke counsell together, to set downe a resolution of their proceedings hereafter: Amongst whom the duke of Vrbin, after many protestations of his deare and right great affection, propounded many difficulties, recõmending them chiefly to thinke vpon the suretie of their retrayte in case the succours of the Castel soarted to no good successe: In which reason he vrged of them of Orbietta to giue him ostages for assurance not to releeue the army with vittells at their returning: And interposing in all the affayres of that enterprise a temporising and tract of time, he resolued at laste to be at Nepi the xix. day, and that the same day the Marquis with his people and the Count Guido with his Italian footemen, should likewise be at Braciano, to thende to goe the next day in one strength to the Ile, whiche is a place nyne myles from Rome: The Pope vnderstanding of the approching of these succours by the relation of Guicciardin writing to him from Viterbo, tooke occasion, that hauing almoste concluded thaccorde with thimperialls, he refused to subsigne the articles: Not so much for the hope he receyued by the letters, which (albeit they were aduisedly written) made some discouery to him of things which by discoursing of matters past, he was to looke and hope for of the time to come, as to auoyde thimputation and note of ignominie to laye vpon his fearfulnes and rashnes the fault that he had not bene reskewed. There was in the French an vniuersall readynes to succour the Castell, in whom the Venetians with letters and relations of great affection, augmented the same disposition, the prince soliciting the matter with great vehemency in the counsell of the Pregati: So that all excuses beeing taken away from the Duke, he consented that the day following a mooster should be made of all the armies and men of warre, hoping perhaps that finding ſuche diminution of numbers amongſt the regimentes and particular bandes, that he might make it a iuſte cauſe to refuſe the feight: A deuiſe which he could not reaſonably vſe to ſerue his turne, ſince vpon preſenting the armies to the mooſters, there were founde fifteene thouſande footemen ſtrong, with an vniuerſall reſolution to feight and do the office of ſouldiours: Immediatly after the mooſter and ſuruey of the armies, a generall counſell was taken for the maner of their proceeding further, whiche drewe to this determination to leade the armie to incampe at the croſſe of Montmary according to the great inſtance and ſolicitation of thoſe of the Caſtell: They alleaged that in reſpect of the ſtrength of the place and the ſmáll diſtance thereof from Rome conteyning but three myles, together that there was no feare of thimperialls to iſſue out of Rome to incampe, They might not onely remayne there in ſafety, but alſo retyre without daunger, And laſtely that by the oportunitie of that place they might better take a view and better execute the occaſion to ſuccour the Caſtell. But this reſolution nothing pleaſing the Duke of Vrbin, he embraced an other deuiſe propounded by Guido Rangon, who offred to approche the Caſtell the ſame night with all the horſemen and footemen of the Churche, and in that action to aduenture to reskew the Pope out of the Caſtell, So farre foorth as the Duke of Vrbin with the reſidue of the mayne armie would marche vp to the three Cauannes to backe him: But that deuiſe was not executed that night, becauſe the Duke went vp to ſuruey the lodging of Montmary being earneſtly preſſed by the importunities of the Pope: And albeit he offred to make his approches that night, yet eyther for his wante of vallour, or his toomuch iealouſie of his own ſafety, he paſſed not the three Cauannes, In ſo much as many howres being vaynly ſpent in that temporiſing, they were driuẽ to deferre thexecution of thenterpriſe till the night following: But the ſame daye they were aduertiſed by their eſpials (whether true or ſuborned) that as the trẽches which the Imperialls had made in the medowes, were more ſtrong and braue then they were in deede, So alſo that they had broken vp in many places (which alſo was falſe) the gallery wall that leadeth from the Vatican to the Caſtell Saint Angeo, to thend to miniſter ſuccours of many ſides, in caſe any inuaſion were offred: Vppon which reaport the Duke tooke occaſion to alleage many difficulties, which were all conſented vnto by Guido and approued almoſt by all the other capteines: Whereupon enſued the concluſion that it was a matter impoſſible to giue ſuccours to the Caſtell for the preſent, wherein ſome other of the Capteines that roſe vp to diſpute & defend the contrarie opinion, were bitterly reprehended of the Duke, who wanted patience to be drawne to that by reaſons and argumentes, wherunto he had no inclination of will and vallour. In this ſorte the perſon and preſence of the Pope remayned in pray, not one launce beeing broken to reskewe and recouer out of priſon, him who to ſuccour others had leauyed ſo many bandes of ſouldiours, exſpended ſuche huge maſſes of money and treaſure, and ſtirred vp to warre almoſte all the Nations of the worlde: Neuertheleſſe they diſputed if the helpes that were not to be giuen preſently, might be miniſtred at an other tyme with more forces: A deuiſe which beeing proponed by the Duke, was alſo aunſwered by him ſelfe, that vndoubtedly the Caſtell might be ſuccoured when ſo euer the armie were poſſeſſed of a ſtrength of ſixteene thouſande Svvizzers leauyed by ordenance of the Cantons, not comprehending in the reckoning ſuche as were there already, as beeing become vnprofitable for the ſeruice by their long abyding in Italy: And beſides this cooplement of Svvizzers, he required a newe proportion of ten thouſande sande harquebuziers Italians, three thousande pyoners, and fortie peeces of artilleries: With which resolution he required the Lieftenaunt to comfort the Pope, whom they knewe to be furnished with vittells for a weeke, that amid his aduersities he woulde temporise and deferre to make anye accorde till his forces might be assembled together. The Lieftenaunt aunswered, that as he lyked of his deuise so farreforth as in the meane whyle the estate of affayres did not chaunge: So beeing very likely that those within Rome would make the reskew more harde with newe trenches and fortifications, and also that from Naples woulde come to Rome the bandes which the Viceroy had ledde thither by sea, he desyred to knowe what propertie of hope he could giue to the Pope in case matters drew that successe according to the sensible apparances and coniectures that were discerned. But the Duke replied, that in suche case should be omitted no indeuour or action tending to so good an office, adding withall, that if the bandes that were at Naples were ioyned with those of Rome, their strength woulde be in all more then twelue thousande Launceknightes, and eight or ten thousande Spanish footemen, and that if the Castell were loste, there could be made no rekoning to remayne maisters of the warre, if there were not at least xxij. or xxiiij. thousande Svvizzers strong: Whiche demaundes being contemned of all the Capteins as vnreasonable and impossible, the army beeing diminished in footemen, retyred the first day of Iune to Monterga, notwithstanding the great instance which the Pope made, not to depart so soone to thend to make his aduauntage of tharmy in the practise & negociation of thaccord: The same night Peter Mariaroſſa & Alexander Vitelly with two hundred light horsmen passed vp to Rome towards thenemies. But nowe the Pope hauing small expectation of succours, and no lesse feare and ielousie of his life by the rage of the Colonnois and furie of the Launceknightes, sente for the Viceroy who was at Sienna to come to Rome, And as the Pope hoped that by the interposing of the Viceroy his composition would be both more easie and reasonable, so the Viceroy went with great will and readynes to finde the armie, with intention and hope to be created Capteine generall: But beeinge aryued at Rome whither he passed vnder safeconduit of the Capteines of the armie, he founde no good inclination in the Launceknightes and Spaniardes, who after the death of the Duke of Burbon had elected to that place the Prince of Orange: By reason of whiche preuention together with the yll disposition of the armie continuing, he had no reason to abyde at Rome, And yet as he went towardes Naples, he was encountred in the waye by the Marquis of Guast, Don Hugo, and Capteine Alarcon, by whose counsells he returned eftsones to Rome: Neuertheleſſe for that he was not agreable to the armye, he bare no more authoritie neyther in the affayres of the warre, nor in the negociation of accorde with the Pope: Who beeing by his aduersitie made naked of all helpe present, and lesse exspectation to be reskewed where was so great want of vallour and order, was dryuen to runne the race of his fortune, compounding the sixth day of Iune with the Imperialles almost vnder the same conditions with the which he mighte haue accorded before: That the Pope should pay to the Armie foure hundred thousande duckets in this order: one hundred thousande presently to be defrayed of the golde, money, and treasure reserued in the Castell: fiftie thousande within twentie dayes, and two hundred and fiftie thousande within two monethes, Assigning to him for these defraymentes, an imposte of money to be charged vpon the whole Church state: That he should deliuer into the power of themprour to reteyne them so long as he thought good, the Castell Saint Angeo,

the Rockes of Ostia, of Ciuitavecchia, and of Ciuita Castellano, together with the Cities of Parma, Plaisanca, and Modena: That the Pope together with all those Cardinalls that were with him, which were thirteene in number, should remayne prisoners within the Castell vntill the firste payment of an hundred and fiftie thousande duckets were satisfied: That afterwards they should goe to Naples or to Caietta to exspect what themprour would determine of them: That for assurance of the paymentes whereof the thirde parte apperteined to the Spaniardes, he should deliuer in for ostages, the Archbishops of Siponto and Pisa, the Bishoppes of Pistoia and Verona, together with Iames Saluiatio, Simon de Ricasola, and Lavvrence brother to Cardinall Rodolffo: That Ranso de Cero, Albert Pio, Oratio Baillon, the knight Casalo, thembassadour of Englande, with all others that were saued within the Castell, except the Pope and the Cardinalles, shoulde departe in suretie: That the Pope should giue absolution to the Colonnois of the censures they had incurred: And that when he shoulde bee ledde out of Rome, a Legate shoulde remayne there for him with authoritie to dispose and administer iustice. Assoone as this accorde was passed, Capteine Alarcon entred within the Castell with three bandes of Spanishe footemen, and three companies of Launceknights: who because there was put vppon him the confidence and deputation to garde the Castell, and the Pope, he perfourmed it with a very strayte and seuere watche, suche as shutte vp from the prisoners almoste all libertie. But touching the other castells and townes promised, they were not so easily consigned, for that as the Castell of Ciuitavecchia was kepte and defended in the name of the Confederates, so Andrea Dore notwithstanding he had receyued warrant and commaundement from the Pope, refused to deliuer vp the Castell of Ciuita Castellano, vnlesse he were firste satisfied of foureteene thousande duckets which he sayde were due to him for his paye. Iulian Leno a Romaine was sent to Parma and Plaisanca in the Popes name, and Lodovvike Count of Lodron accompanied in the name of the Capteines, with commaundement to those Cities to obey the will of themprour, notwithstanding the Pope had giuen them secrete aduertisement to the contrarie: And accordingly, those Cities abhorring the iurisdiction of the Spaniardes, refused to receyue them. Touching them of Modena, they stoode not in their owne power, for that the Duke of Ferrara letting not passe any occasion whiche the calamities of the Pope offred him, threatned them to ouerrunne and waste all their corne whiche was nowe rype, by whiche compulsion he constrayned them to render vp the towne to hym the sixt of Iune, not without the infamie of Count Lodovvike Rangon, who notwithstanding the Duke had but a small strength with him, lefte the towne abandoned without making any signe of resistance. In this action the Duke respected not the authoritie of the Venetians, who perswaded him to attempt or innouate nothing agaynst the Church in such troubled times: And yet they themselues enterteyning intelligence with the Guelffes of Rauenna, after they had sent certeine bands of footemen vnder cooller to defende the towne for feare of those of Cotignola, conuerted to themselues the iurisdiction & possession of that city, and vnder the same cloke tooke the castell, after thay had made secret slaughter of the capteine, publishing that they would holde it in the name of the whole league: Not many dayes after they possessed thēselues of Ceruia & the saltes that were there, apperteining to the Pope, whose estates being neither garded nor defended further then the people and inhabitantes for their own interests, stoode in defence of their places and libertie: Sigismond Malatesta with the same facilitie seased vpon the towne and castell of Rimini.

The affayres of the Pope proceeded with no better course in the citie of Florence, where when the accidence and losse of Rome was related to them, the Cardinall Cortono, whose feare was farre greater then his assurance, resolued to giue place to necessitie and fortune: He sawe he was abandoned of those partakers and Citizens who made profession to be friendes to the house of Medicis: he sawe there remeyned no meane for him to leauy money without vsing meanes violent and extraordinary: And lastly lacking deuocion to employe his owne purse at least till he saw a further euent and yssue of the armies who were marched to succour the Pope, he stoode possessed with passions of feare and cowardisse, and gaue skoape to the aduersities of the towne without laying to his hande to restrayne or moderat the vniuersall perill: In which dispositicion, after he had made an assembly of the Citizens together, he deposed vnto them the free administracion of the common weale, hauing before obteined certeine priuileages and exempcions together with faculty to the Popes Nephewes to remeyne at Florence as Citizens priuat being clearly absolued and pardoned of all things past, which they had committed ioyntly or seuerally against the estate: Vppon the conclusion of which graunts, the sixt daye of May he went to Lucquay with the Popes Nephewes, where reprehending and repenting his departure in so greate timerousnes, he practised to reteyne to him selfe the castells of Pysa and Lyuorna, beeing already in the handes of Capteines of the Popes confidence, who neuertheless, hauing no hope of succours by reason of the Popes captiuity, and being corrupted with some secret summe of money, within very few daies after, deliuered vp those castells to the Florentyns: In the meane while the people of Florence had reduced their citie to a popular gouernment, and in that humor had created Gonfalonier and chiefe Magistrate of the pollicie for one yeare with faculties of confirmation for three yeares, one Nicholas Cappony, A Citizen of great authoritie and a louer of the publike libertie: This man desiring wholly the concord and vnitie of the Citizens, and no lesse zealous to reduce the gouernment to the most perfect forme of a common weale that was possible, debated the action with reasons graue and resolued, in a conuocacion of the great councell in whome rested absolute power to establishe lawes and create all Magistrates: And sure if the Citizens had giuen faith to the perswasions of this man, their new libertie had happly endured longer: But as for the most parte the passion of spite and disdaine is stronger in him that recouereth libertie, then in an other that defendeth it, so the hatreds being great against the house of Medicis for many causes, but especially for that they haue bene driuen to beare out for the most part with their owne money, all the enterprises that they had begonne: The people began to persecute immoderatly all those Citizens that were friendes to the Medicis, together with such as boare affection to the name of the Pope: They called into remembraunce how the citie had exspended not onely in the occupacion but also in the defence of the Duchie of Vrbyn, more then fiue hundred thowsand duckats, And as much in the warre which Pope Leo managed against the French king, and in matters hapning after his death depending vppon the same warre: Neither did they forget the three hundred thowsand duckats which were payed to the Capteines Imperialls and to the Viceroy, before the creacion of Clement: And lastly they reduced into reckoning the six hundred thowsand duckats disburssed aswell since that tyme, as employed in this last warre agaynst the Emprour: These reckonings beeing ioyned to the humor of their vniuersall hatreds, so aggrauated their rage and furye, that they defaced and reuersed through all the partes of the citie, the armes and enseignes of the house of Medicis, not forbearing in that course of insolencie to pull downe euen those skootchions which were affixed and emboasted to the publike pallaices builded by them selues: They brake the images or portraictes of Leo and Clement set vp in so greate glorye in the temple of Annunciado so much celebrated through all the worlde: yea the moste parte of them omitted nothing apperteyning to moue the Popes disdaine, and to nourish the diuisions and discords of the citie, wherein they had risen into greater degrees of disorder, if the authoritie & discression of the Gonfalonier had not bene interposed, which yet was not sufficient to remedie many insolencies.

But by this tyme were comen to Rome with the Marquis of Guast and Don Hugo, all those footebands of launceknights and Spanyards which were in the Realme of Naples: So that it was sayd they had stronge within the towne of Rome eyght thowsande Spanish footemen, twelue thowsand launceknights, and foure thowsand Italians: An armye sufficient to doe in Italy what they would, aswell for the reputacion they had gotten, as for the vniuersall astonishment of those regions, together with the weake prouisions that were made to oppose against them: Onely the armye tooke such libertie in their insolencies and disorders, the Prince of Orenge being Capteine generall in title and name, but not in authoritie and effect, that they tooke litle care of thinteresis of thEmprour, beeing wholly caried with the humor of praye and spoyle, and to raunsom prisoners and racke the purse of the Pope: Matters whose sweetenes deteyned them still in Rome, where running a race of tumult and mutinie, the Viceroy and the Marquis of Guast feared least they woulde extend their furye vppon their persons to the daunger of their liues, In which feare they fled, leauing the souldiours to the hazard and stroake of the plague, which beeing already begonne, kindled amongest them greater bronds of infection to their vniuersall domage: for these reasons thImperialls lost thoccasion of many enterprises, but especially they omitted the oportunitie to conquer Bolognia, A citie which albeit the Count Hugo de Pepoly went thether after the losse of Rome with an army of a thowsand footemen payed by the Venetians, yet it stoode and persuered in the obedience of the sea Apostolike, though not without difficultie by reason of the tumult which Lavvrence Maluezzo made by the secret consent of Ramassotto and the fauor of the faction of the Bentyuoleis, yea, (which was of no lesse importance then the residue) their disorder and careles nes gaue tyme to the French king to dispatch into Italy a moste mightye armye, with great daunger to the Emperor to lose the Realme of Naples after he had triumphed gloriously in so great a victorye: for, matters going on long time before in Fraunce to a preparacion of a newe warre, there was established the foure and twenty of Aprill, A conclusion of the confederacion solycited many moneths, betwene the French king and king of England: Wherein one condicion was that the Daughter of the king of England shoulde be maryed to the french king, or to the Duke of Orleans his second sonne, the election of which shoulde be resolued at the tyme of the enteruiewe of the two kinges which was to bee performed at Whitsontyde betweene Callyce and Bolleyne: An other article was that the kinge of Englande shoulde renownce the title of kinge of Fraunce, receyuing in recompense a yearely pension of fiftye thowsande duckats: The thirde article bare that the kinge of Englande shoulde enter the league made at Rome, and to bee bownde by the next moneth of Iulye, to moue warre beyonde the Mountes agaynste thEmprour with nyne thowsande footemen, and the Frenche Kinge with eyghteene thowsande, and a conuenient number of launlaunces and artilleries: That in the meane whyle bothe the one and the other of them, shoulde sende Embassadors to thEmprour, bothe to signifie the confederacion made by them, to summon him to restore the kinges children, and to enter into the peace with comely condicions: Which in case he woulde not accept within one moneth, their Embassadors shoulde denownce warre to him, and beginne it: Assoone as this accorde was passed, the king of England entred the league, who together with the Frenche king dispatched two gentlemen in post to present to thEmprour conuenient summonce: Matters which were done by the Embassadors of the Frenche and Englishe with a farre greater readines then they were performed by the Popes commission: for that his Nuncio Baltasar Castillion, sparing to sharpen the mynde of thEmprour, would not consent to denownce warre agaynst him: But afterwardes the Court of Fraunce beeing possessed with the newes of the losse of Rome, And the displeasure of the accident of the Pope beeing ballanced with the gladnes of the deathe of the Duke of Burbon, And lastly the Frenche kinge not holding it good pollicye to suffer the thinges of Italy so to declyne, he contracted the fiftenth daye of Maye with the Venetians, that they shoulde wage in common tenne thowsande Svvyzzers, he to furnishe the first paye, and the Venetians the seconde, and so forwarde according to that rule: That he shoulde sende into Italy tenne thowsande Frenche men, vnder Peter Nauarre: That in lyke sorte the Venetians ioyntly with the Duke of Myllan shoulde wage tenne thowsande footemen Italyans: That he shoulde sende thether a newe supplye of fiue hundred launces and eyghteene peeces of artilleries: And bicause the king of England notwithstanding tharticles of the contract, shewed no greate readines to make warre beyonde the Mountes, A dealing which was not very agreable to the French king, They dispensed with that obligacion, and in place of that, they couenanted: That the king of England to furnishe the warre of Italy shoulde defraye the paye of tenne thowsande footemen for six monethes full: And at the speciall instance of the sayde kinge of England, Monsr de Lavvtrech almoste agaynst his will, was declared Capteine generall of the whole armye, during whose preparacion to marche and passe with conuenient prouisions of money and other thinges necessarye, there was nothinge done in Italy that was of any consequence: for, bothe thEmprours armye styrred not out of Rome notwithstanding that many perished dayly by the rage of the plague which at that tyme ranne also with greate mortalitye in Florence, and through many partes of Italy: And also the armye of the league, into which at thinstance of the Marquis of Salusso and the Venetians, the Florentyns were entred of newe with obligacion to defraye fiue thowsande footemen wherewith thEmprour felt him selfe greeuously offended for that hauing at their instance giuen to the Duke of Ferrara authoritie to compownd in his name, was almost assoone aduertised of their contrary deliberacion: This armye beeing greatly diminished in numbers for that the regiments of the Venetians, of the Marquis, and the Svvyzzers were yll payed, was retyred towardes Viterba, And looking altogether to temporise and enterteyne, they labored to holde in the deuocion of the league, Perousa, Orbieta, Spoleto with other places thereabowts: And afterwardes hauing vnderstandinge in that place that one parte of thEmprours armye was yssued out of Rome somewhat to take breathe with the largenes and skoape of ayre fearing least the residue shoulde doe the lyke after the first payments were made, they retyred to Orbietta and afterwardes neare to the borowe of Pyena: And in that inclinacion they had retyred vppon the landes of the Florentyns, if they would haue giuen consent: In this rage of the plague the castell of Saint Angeo was visited, to the great daunger of the life of the Pope abowt whom dyed certeine speciall men that did seruice to his person: who amyd so many afflictions and aduersities and no other hope remeyning to him then in the clemencie of th Emprour, appoynted for Legat with the consent of the Capteines, Cardinall Alexander of Farneso, who notwithstanding being yssued out of the castell and Rome, refused vnder that occasion to goe in the layd legacion: The Capteines desired to cary the person of the Pope with the thirteene Cardinals that were with him, to Caietto, but he labored against that resolucion with greate diligence, peticions, and arte.

Monsr Lawtrech Capteine generall of the league.

At last Monsr de Lavvtrech, after he had giuen order to thinges necessary, departed from the Court the last of Iune with eyght hundred launces, and honored with the title of Capteine generall of the whole league. And the king of England in place to present tenne thowsand footemen, was taxed to paye in money for euery moneth beginning the first of Iune, the summe of xxx. thowsand duckats: Which money should be conuerted to the payment of tenne thowsand launceknights vnder Monsr Vavvdemont, which was a regiment of very good exercise and practise, for that they had many times broken the bands of the Lutherans: The French king tooke also to his paye Andre Dore with eyght gallyes and xxxvj. crownes for euery yeare: But before Monsr Lavvtrech was past the Mounts, the regiments of the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan ioyned together, marched to Marignan, whome Antho. de Leua yssuing out of Myllan with eyght hundred Spanyards and the like number of Italyans together with a very fewe horsemen, constrayned them to retyre: About which tyme Iohn Iames de Medicis Captaine of Mus who was in pay with the French king, and expected vppon the lake the comming of the Svvyzzers, made him selfe Lord by suttle meanes vppon the castell of Monguzzo seated betwene Lecqua and Coma, wherein dwelt Alexander Bentyuolo as in his owne house: for the recouering of it, Antho. de Leua sent thether Lodovvyk de Belioyense, who hauing assalted it in vaine, turned to Monceo: But afterwards, Antho. de Leua hauing espiall that the sayd Capteine Mus with two thowsand fiue hundred footemen, was come to the village of Carato foureteene myles from Myllan, returned to Myllan: where leauing onely two hundred men notwithstanding the Venetians were almost ten thowsand, and yssuing out by night with the rest of the armye, he charged suddeinly, vppon the rising of the Sunne, the bands of Capteine Mus, who at the alarme leauing their houses wherein they were lodged, they retyred into a playne place enuyroned with hedges not farre from the village, not thinking that all the bands were there: And albeit they cast them selues into order, yet by the disaduauntage of the place beeing lowe and strayted as a prison, they fell all without any resistance into the calamitye of the sworde or prisoners, except many who in the beginning sought their sauetye by fleeing, taking their example of the Capteine.

In this meane while, Th Emprour had aduertisement of the Popes captiuitie, by letters which his high Chauncellor wrote to him from Monaco, as he went into Italy, whether he was sent by his authoritie: And albeit by his speeches and outward forme of behauior he expressed how greeuous that accident was to him, yet it was discerned by his secrete mocions and affections that he was not muche discontented with it, which he well declared in publike demonstracions not forbearing to followe the feastes and torneyes begonne before for the byrthe of his Sonne:

But

But as the deliuerie of the Pope was vehemently desired by the king of England and Cardinall of Yorke, and for their authoritie no lesse displeasing to the French kinge, who in case he coulde otherwayes haue recouered his children, woulde haue taken litle care and greefe for the calamities of the Pope and vniuersall domages of all Italy: So in a cause so generally inducing to compassion, bothe the one and the other king sent Embassadors to thEmprour, to demaunde the deliuerance of the Pope as a matter apperteyning in common to all the Princes Christian, and particularly due by the Emprour vnder whose faith he had beene reduced to that estate of misery, by his Capteynes and by his armye. Abowt this tyme the Cardinalls that were in Italy made a mocion, that aswell they as the other Cardinalls beyonde the Mountes might assemble together at Auignion, to take councell in so troublesom a tyme, what courrse to holde for the stabilitie of the Church: But becausse they woulde not all at one tyme raunge themselues vnder the power of so mightye Princes, they refused to goe thether though with diuerse excuses: By whose example also the Cardinall Saluiatio Legat in the Frenche Court, beeing required by the Pope to goe to thEmprour to helpe his affayres at the comming of Don Hugo who according to the capitulacion, was to go vp to thEmprour, refused to accomplish that legacion as though it had beene a matter hurtfull to deliuer vppe to the power of thEmprour at one tyme, so many Cardinalls: Onely he sent by one of his seruaunts of credit thinstructions he had receyued from Rome, to thAuditor of the chamber resident with thEmprour, to thende he might negociat with him, who brought from him very gracious wordes, but such as promised a diuerse and vncerteine resolucion: And albeit thEmprour could haue desired that the Pope had beene ledde into Spayne, yet for that it was a matter full of infamye and greatly tending to incense the king of England, And withall for that all the Potentates and prouinces of Spayne and principally the Prelats and Lordes, detested not a litle that an Emprour of Rome Protector and Aduocat of the Church should, with so great indignitie to all Christendom, holde in prison the man in whome was represented the person of Iesus Christ in earth: In those regardes he made gracious aunswers to all thEmbassadors which occupied his presence there, At whose instance also to goe thorowe with a peace, he sayde he was content to referre the action of it to the king of England, which was accepted by them: And seeming to confirme this good inclinacion with corespondencye of effects, he dispatched into Italy the thirde daye of August the generall of the Graye Frears, and foure dayes after him Veri de Miglian enhabling both the one and other with commissions sufficient to the Viceroy for the deliuery of the Pope and restitucion of all such townes and castells as had bene taken from him: he consented also for the better releeuing of the Pope, that his Nuncio should send him a certeine summe of money exacted vpon the collection of his Realmes who in their Courts and parlyaments had refused to contribute money to thEmprour.

The Cardinal of Yorke in Fraunce.

In this time about the ende of Iuly, the Cardinall of Yorke passed the sea to Callyce with twelue hundred horse: The French king who had great desire to receyue him with all showes of honor, sent to meete him at his landing the Cardinal of Lorraine, and went afterwardes in persone to Amyens where the Cardinall of Yorke made his entrey the daye after with very greate pompe: Wherein one thinge that muche augmented his glorye and reputacion, was the treasor he had brought with him amownting to three hundred thowsande crownes, bothe to furnishe thexspenses occurringe, and to imparte it with the Frenche Kinge by waye of loane if neede were: They debated betwene them aſwel of matters apperteyning to the peace, as of occaſions tending to nouriſh the warre: Wherein albeit the ends and intencions of the French king were different from the purpoſes of the king of England, for that to haue his children reſtored he cared not to leaue abandoned to manifeſt praye both the Pope and all the ſtate of Italy: yet what by the authoritie of the king of England, and neceſſitie of his owne affayres, he was driuen to promiſſe to make no accord with thEmprour without the deliuery of the Pope: And therefore thEmprour hauing ſent to the king of England the articles of the peace, aunſwer was made to him by both the kings that they woulde accept the peace vnder condicions of reſtitucion of the children of Fraunce receyuing for raunſom of them two millions of duckats within a certeine tyme, and deliuerye of the Popes perſon with the ſtate Eccleſiaſtike, together with the conſeruacion of all the gouernments and eſtates of Italy as they were at that preſent, and laſtly vnder condicion of an vniuerſall and generall peace: And bicauſe the mariage of the French king with the Emprours ſiſter ſhould ſtill continue, there was ſet downe a ſpeciall couenant that thEmprour accepting theſe articles, the Daughter of the king of England ſhould be maryed to the Duke of Orleans: But in caſe the peace ſucceeded not, the king him ſelfe ſhould take her to wife: After theſe articles were ſent, they refuſed to giue ſafe conduit to a man whome the Emprour required to ſend into Fraunce, aunſwering that they had done enough to ſend him the articles of their reſolucion: Which being not accepted by thEmprour, the peace and confederacion betweene the two kings was ſworne and publiſhed ſolemnly the eyght day of Auguſt: They determined to employ all their forces in the warre of Italy hauing for their principall obiect, the deliuerye of the Pope, And touching the manner to proceede in that warre, they reappoſed them ſelues vppon Monſr Lavvtrech, to whome according to the confidence they had in him, they gaue abſolute power, and before he tooke his leaue to depart with his expedicion, they ſuffered him to obteyne of the French king all his demaundes, for that the king ment in that warre to ſet vppe his laſt reſt: The Cardinall of Yorke would alſo that the knight Caſalo ſhoulde goe to the campe on the behalfe of his king and that the thirty thowſande duckats which were his monthly contribucion, ſhould be deliuered to him to thende to be aſſured if the nũber of Almaines were compleate. Thus after the reſolucions and directions of the warre were eſtabliſhed, the Cardinall of Yorke returned, and at his departure he diſpatched the pronotorye Gambaro to the Pope to induce him to make him his Viccaire generall in England, in Fraunce, and in Germanye ſo longe as he was in priſon, Whereunto though the French king ſeemed by demonſtracions to conſent, yet ſecretly and in effect he did impugne ſo great an ambicion.

In this meane whyle there paſſed but very fewe actions and exployts of warre in Italy, thexſpectacion of the comming of Lavvtrech being very great: The reaſon was, that as the Imperiall armye full of diſorder and diſobedience to their Capteynes, and no leſſe chargeable to their friendes and townes that were rendred, made no greate mouing and gaue no feare at all to their enemyes: ſo the footebandes of Spanyardes and Italyans fleeing from the infection of the plague, laye diſpearſed and wandring abowt the confynes of Rome, And the Prince of Orenge with an hundred and fiftye horſemen was gonne vppe to Syenna, aſwell to eſchewe the daunger of the plague, as to keepe that citie in the deuocion of thEmperour: And for the better conteyning the Citie in fidelitie and order, he had ſent thyther before, certeyne bandes of footemen, the rather for that the people beeing drawne into commocion at the incensing of certeine sedicious Citizens, had, in that tumult sacked the houses of such as were of the familie of Montenouo, and had slaine in their rage Peter Bourgeso a Citizen of authority together with one of his sonnes and seuenteene or eighteene others: There remained only within Rome the Launceknightes, as full of infection and plague as ripe in disorder and insolencie, who, being satisfied by the Pope with verie great difficultie of the first hundred thowsande duckats which were partely payed in money, and parte to be aunswered vpon bills of marchants of Genovvay being to be repayed vpon the tenthes of the realme of Naples and vpon the sale of Beneuent, required for the residue of their payes due, other sureties, and other assignacion, then the imposicion of the state Eccleſiastike, a matter impossible to the Pope being a prisoner: By reason whereof after many threatninges made to the ostages and sureties whom in great crueltie they kept in chaines, they led them in a manifest ignominy to the field of Flora, where they sette vp a gibbet as though they would haue made present execucion of them: Afterwardes they issued all out of Rome without any Capteines of authoritie, rather to lodge abroade and refresh them selues, then to execute any exployt of importaunce: In which inhumanitie and insolencie, after they had sacked the Cities of Ferno and Naruo, Spoleto agreed to giue them passage and vittells: By which occasion the armie of the confederats to assure Perousa, went to lodge at Pontonouo beyond Perousa, they were incamped before vpon the lake of Perousa, but they were much diminished in numbers in regard of thobligacion of the confederates: for, the Marquis had with him three hundred launces and three hundred french archers, three thowsand Svvizzers and a thowsand footemen Italians: The Duke of Vrbin had with him fiue hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, a thowsand footemen Almains, and two thowsand Italians: The Venetians alleaged for their excuses, that they supplied their promise and obligacion with the bandes of souldiours whom they held in the Duchy of Millan: The Florentins had foure score men at armes, an hundred and fiftie light horsemen, and foure thowsand footemen: And as they were constrained to maintaine a better prouision then all the others, for a continual feare they had least thEmperours army would assaile Tuskane: So in that respect they failed not to make payes to their souldiors in times due, wherin they did contrarie to all the residue: But the Duke of Vrbin ouer & besides his auncient difficulties was not without his passions of greefe and disquietnes tending almost to dispaire, for that he knew that both the french king and Monsr Lavvtrech spake not of him to his honor, and also the Venetians were drawne into a very ill opinion of him: Who, suspecting either his fidelitie or his inconstancie, had set a diligent and carefull gard vpon his wife & children that were at Venice least they should depart without their leaue: And in that humor of gelousie and suspicion, they reproued openlie his councell, which was, that Lavvtrech should drawe directlie to Rome without attempting any thing in Lombardie.

So that all matters of action or enterprise lay on sleepe in that armie, who interpreted it to a speciall grace that thimperialls passed not further: And thimperialls hauing a litle afterwards receiued two crownes a peece of the Marquis of Guast who went to tharmie, returned, the Launceknightes (who agreed not well with the Spanyardes) to Rome, and the Spanyardes were seuerallie dispersed to Aluiano, Tegliano Chastillion, and Bolseno: Only the generall numbers were so muche diminished especiallie the Launceknights, by the stroke of the plague, that it was thought the whole army of thEmprour conteyned not aboue tenne thowsand footemen: Here is not to be omitted the reapport of an act worthy of perpetuall infamy committed by the Imperiall Capteines before their departure: The discourse of it was this, Gentill Baillon being returned to Perousa with the will and consent of Horacio, who perswading that the disorders betwene them were hurtfull to euery one, had made show that he would reconcile him selfe to him: Thither went Federike Bossolo with the priuitie & authority of all the Capteines to signifie vnto him, that forasmuch as they had found out that he practised secretlie with thennemies, they thought good to be assured of his person notwithstanding he iustified him selfe and promised that he would go to Chastillion: he was left in the gard of Gigant Corse Coronell of the Venetians supposing though his libertie was restrained, yet there was no daunger to his life: But the malice of his ennemies pulling on by violent handes, the last degree of his destinie, he was the same night slaine with two of his Nephewes by certeine murtherers of Horacio subborned by his commission: Which bloodie accident he caused to be also accompanied at the same time with the slaughter of Galeotto, brother to Braccio & one of the Nephewes of Gentill: After this the confederates sent souldiours to enter within Camerino, by reason they had aduertisement that the Duke was dead, but they were preuented by Sforce Baillon in the name of the Imperialls: Insomuch as Sero Colonno made his entrie on the behalfe of Rodolff his sonne in law bastard sonne to the late Duke: Afterwards the Marquis of Salussa and Federik with many horsemen and a thowsand footmen, assaulted by night the Abbay of S. Peter which is neare Ferno, wherein were Peter Maria Rossa & Alexander Vitelly with a strength of two hundred horsemen and foure hundred footemen: This enterprise verie rash of it selfe, since for the garrison that was there, the place was not pregnable but by artilleries, succeded well to them either by fortune which is vainlie supposed to beare some sway in actions, or by indiscression which leades all thinges in errour and confusion, or else through the couetousnesse of the Capteines who hauing sent out the same day an hundred and fiftie harquebuziers to make pillage of a towne fast by, had depriued them selues of a strength necessary to defend it: Insomuch as after they had maintained resistance for certeine howers, they yeelded to discression reseruing onely the persons and goodes of Peter Maria Rossa and Alexander Vitelly who in defending the place which they could not keepe, had receiued wounds with the bollet, the one in the legge, and the other in the hande: About this time the riuer of Tiber rising in two or three places aboue the bankes, ouerflowed with great hurt, the campe of the league, which went to lodge at Asceса, thimperialls being as yet betwene Farno and Narno: And then passing further, the Duke of Vrbin lodged at Narno, the Frenche men at Boudgno, and the blacke bands commaunded by Horacio Baillon Capteine generall of thinfanterie of the Florentins, seeing there was no lodging prepared for them, entred into the towne of Montfalcon and sackt it: In which course of insolencie certeine bandes of his footemen inuaded afterwardes Pressia, whether were retyred Rodolffo de Varano and Bettrice his wife, who in so great an aduersitie hauing no meane to defende them selues, yeelded to discression: Neuertheless not long after, they recouered their libertie, for that Sero being not hable to remeine longer within Camerino for the displeasures he receiued of that armie, compounded to abandon it vnder condicion to recouer his sonne in lawe and his daughter: And in this enterchaunge of actions and affaires, the Marquis of Salusso and Federik made a practise, with the French horsemen and two thowsand footemen, to surprise and strippe the Spanishe horsemen who were lodged at Monte Rotondo without gard and watche as Maria Vrsin reapported: They had three dayes marching to the place where thexployt

ployt shoulde be done, wherein they proceeded with so litle order, that they were discloſed & returned without doing any thing, notwithstanding, they had determined, the better to take from the Spanyards all meanes to flie away, to breake downe at the same time the bridge of Feuerono.

During the whole time of this sommer the actions of the souldiours that were in Lombardie, were of the like propertie: for, as the bandes of the Venetians and the Duke being drawne into one strength neere to Millan, with intencion to leauie and take away the corne of that countrey, had ouerthrowen the eskert or garde of vittells, and slaine an hundred footemen, taken thirtie men at armes, and three hundred horse of seruice and others: So, they forbare to proceede any further against their corne, for that the bandes of the Venetians according to their custome, did immediatlie disperse and diminishe: Andre Dore was retyred with his fleete towardes Sauona: And the Genovvaies vnder that occasion had reconquered Spetia: But afterwardes the affaires of Lombardye beganne to take a newe life for the discending of Monsr de Lavvtrech into Piedmont with one parte of tharmie: Who hauing no minde to remeyne idle whileſt he exspected the residue of his forces, went to incampe in the beginning of Auguſt affore the towne of Bosco in the countrey of Alexandria wherein were left for garrison a thowsande footemen: The most parte of them were Launceknightes who defended their liues with so muche the more obstinacie and resolucion, by howe much Lavvtrech made angrie for that they had slaine certeine Svvizzers, woulde not receiue them to rendering onleſse they referred them selues whollie to his discression, wherein the more to confirme them in hart and courage, Lodovvike Count of Lodron to whome was committed in charge Alexandria, sent to them oftentimes and comforted them by all the meanes they coulde: In which good office he had speciall interest for that his wife and children were beseeged also within Bosco: Neuertheleſse their aduersitie being farre aboue their power, at last after they had day and night for the space of tenne dayes endured the importunate furie of thartilleries, the mindes that through their vallour were no longer hable to make resistance, were compelled through the malice of their calamitie, to submitte whollie their liues and goodes to the arbitracion of Monsr Lavvtrech: Who tempering his seueritie and iustice with compassion and clemencie, reteined the Capteines prisoners and saued the life of the souldiours, but with this condicion that the Spanyardes shoulde returne into Spaine thorowe Fraunce, and the Launceknightes to take their way into Germanie by the countrey of Svvizzerland, & euerie particular of euerie nation of them, according to the brauerie of warre, to goe out of Bosco without armes, euerie one bearing a white rodde in his hand: Only in this his magnanimitie exceeded his iustice, that he liberallie rendred to the Count Lodron his wife & his children: This conqueſt was accompanied with a happie succeſse of the affaires of Genes: for, fiue shippes, whereof foure were laden with corne, and the fift with marchandise which went to Genes, being ariued at Portofino, and to thende they might passe in safetie, nine gallies being sent out of Genes to accompany them: It hapned that by reason of an aduertisement that Cæsar Fregoso approached to Genes by land with two thowsand footemen, almost all those that were at Portofino went to Genes leauing the fleete abandoned, the same giuing occasion to Andre Dore to encloſe it with his gallies in the same porte: At which place the Genovvaies knowing that they were not hable to resist, disarmed their gallies and set their souldiours on land, by which meane, of the nine gallies (one being burned) the others fell into the power of thenemies together with the shippes laden with corne and the carracke iustinian, which being come out of Leuant was supposed to haue a lading in value worthe an hundred thowsande duckats: At this exployt were also the other Frenche gallies, who hauing taken before, fiue shippes laden with corne which were bound for Genes, were afterwardes drawne behinde Codomont betwene Portofino and Genes: Moreouer at that instant certeine bands of footmen which the Adorneys had leauied to bestowe within Genes, were ouerthrowne at Priacroce a place scituated in the same mountaines: This calamitie ioyned to many other losses of money and sundrie vessells, tooke from the Genouvaies being now reduced to extremitie, all hope to make good any further resistance, notwithstanding that at the same time Cæsar Fregoso being drawne neare to Saint Peter de Rene, was constrained to retyre him selfe: But the stroke of famine being ioyned to the forces and vexacions of thennemies, and no further necessitie remaining to make their calamitie more wretched, they sent Embassadors to Monsr Lavvtrech, to capitulate: Antho. Adorney who was Duke of Genes, retyred within the castell: Insomuch as the tumultes being appeased principallie by the industrie of Philip Dore who was prisoner there, the Citie diuolued to the obedience of the Frenche king who created gouernor there Theoder Triuulco: By the example of this felicitie, Monsr Lavvtrech drewe neare to Alexandria hauing in his armie eight thowsande Svvizzers, who diminished dayly in number, and the tenne thowsande footemen commaunded by Peter Nauare, together with three thowsande Gascons whom the Barron of Bear had newlie brought into Italie, and also three thowsande footemen of the Duchie of Millan: There were within Alexandria fifteene hundred footemen, who for the ouerthrowe and losse of the Almains of Bosco, were both muche weakened, and no lesse terrified, but being releeued afterwardes with fiue hundred footemen entring by the fauour of the hills next to the Citie, and guided by Alberig de Belioyense, they resumed their spirites and made a valliant defense: Neuertheless what by the furie of the batteries redoubled in many places, and freshe courage of the Venetian bandes newlie ariued in the armie, (who notwithstanding did nothing aunswere neither by sea nor lande the numbers they were bounde vnto) and also the defendantes at the same time being muche trauelled and weakened with the trenches and mynes which Peter Nauare cast, their aduersities compelled them to yeelde vp the place with safetie of goodes and life. This conqueste of Alexandria bredde amongest the confederates a beginning of some contencion: for, as Monsr Lavvtrech layed his plot to leaue there in garrison fiue hundred footemen, to thend that in all euentes, his bandes and regimentes might haue a sure retraite there, and also suche companies as shoulde come out of Fraunce might orderlie reassemble and refreshe them selues in that Citie: So, thEmbassador of the Duke of Millan who beganne to suspect least that beginning extended to vsurpe and occupie that state for his king, opposed against it with protestacions and wordes full of efficacie: Wherein thEmbassador of Venice concurring with him in that minde and the Englishe interposing in the action, Monsr Lavvtrech at last agreed albeit with great indignacion to leaue it freely to the Duke of Millan: A matter which happilie was of great preiudice for that enterprise, for that according to thopinion of many he vsed a greater negligence in the conqueste of Millan either through disdaine, or else to reserue him selfe to doe it in a time when without the regard of others, he might make his profit of it: But after the losse of Alexandria, it was not doubted but Monsr Lavvtrech would conuert his forces either to Millan or to Pauia, and therfore that Antho. de Leua who had there with him an hundred, and fiftie men at armes and fiue thow-

and fiue thousand footemen Spanish and Lanceknightes, distrusting to be able to defende Millan with so small forces, and amid so many difficulties, shoulde retyre his companies to Pauia: neuertheles, considering that Pauya gaue smal relefe or store of vittels, and lesse exspectation to mainteine the armie there with robberies & extortions as hadde bene done rudely and iniuriously at Myllan, he chaunged purpose and stayed at Myllan, sending to the garde of Pauya Lodovvyke Belioyense, and to the Myllanois who with money would buy libertie to depart, he solde for corruption and gaine the thing that he could not lawfully giue: But Monsr Lavvtrech notwithstanding he was much weakened in nombers of Svvizzers, marched on and tooke Vigeuena, and afterwardes making a bridge vpon the riuer of Thesin, and by the ayde of the same past his armie ouer, he drewe towards Benerolo, which is a village within iiij. miles of Myllan: In this order of proceeding he made shew as though he would incampe before that Citie, whereunto he was also counselled by the Venetians, but in deede he was resolued to take that course which seemed most easie: And because he vnderstoode when he was within eight miles of Myllan, that Lodovvyke Belioyense had sent thyther the night before, foure hundred footemen, by which meane there remayned no more then eight hundred within Pauya: He turned way and went the day folowing being the xxviij. of September, to the Monasterie of Charterhouse, and from thence with great celeritie he went to incampe before Pauya: To the suecours or reskue of which Citie, Anthonie de leua, taking occasion vpon the alteration of Monsr Lavvtrech and chaunging his way, dispatched thyther three ensignes of footemen, who coulde not enter: by which impediment together with the small nombers of men of warre that were there, it seemed the Towne coulde make no great resistance: And in that weakenes and feare, notwithstanding they of the Towne besought Belioyense to make some composition to auoyde the sacke and destruction of the Citie, yet he refused to graunt them that compassion: But when he saw with what importunitie Lavvtrech continued his batterie by the space of foure dayes, hauing reuersed so much of the wall, that the small nomber of men that were within, sufficed not to reenforce it: The necessitie of the place ioyned to the complaintes of the townesmen, compelled at last Belioyense to sende a trumpet to Lavvtrech, who hauing no speedie accesse to him by reason that he was by chaunce gone to the Venetian campe, The souldiers drawing neare the towne, entred into it by the ruines of the wall: which, being a spectacle greeuous to Belioyense, and no meane to remedie or resist it, he set open the gates of the towne, and issued out in his misfortune to yelde himselfe to the Frenchmen, who sent him prisoner to Genes. The Citie was sackt, in which action the Frenchmen spent eight dayes in pillage and crueltie, putting fire into diuers houses, which in their furie they consumed in reuenge of the battel which they lost within the parke: Then they drewe to counsel, whether they shoulde execute the enterprise of Myllan, or addresse their forces to Rome: The Florentines made instance to passe further, for feare least Lavvtrech staying in Lombardie, the imperiall armie issued not out of Rome to distresse them: The Venetians and Duke of Myllan who was expresly come from Myllan, impugned it, alleaging what great opportunitie there was to take Myllan, and the profite that would rise by it for the enterprise of Naples: for that as Myllan being taken, there remayned no hope to thimperials to haue succours out of Germanie, so that gate being layde open, it was to be alwayes feared that a great armie comming from that part, woulde not eyther put Lavvtrech in daunger, or at least diuert him from the enterprise of Naples: But he aunswered that he must necessarily passe further by the commaundementes of his king and the king of Englande, who had ſent him into Italie chiefelie to deliuer the Pope: To which reſolucion it was beleued he might be induced by ſuſpicion, that if the Duchie of Millan were got, the Venetians thinking them ſelues aſſured from all daunger of the greatneſſe of thEmperour, would not be negligent to ayde the king in the enterpriſe of the realme of Naples: And happily he was no leſſe induced by this that the king ſuppoſed it would be for the benefitte and proffit of his affaires not to ſuffer Frauncis Sforce to recouer whollie that ſtate, to thende that reteyning the power to offer to the Emperour to leaue it, he might the eaſelier obteyne the deliueraunce of his children by way of thaccorde which continuallie was negociated with thEmperour by thEmbaſſadors of Fraunce, Englande, and Venice: But in the negociacion of the ſame appeared many difficulties, for that thEmperour made inſtance that the cauſe of Frauncis Sforce ſhould be referred to the ſentence of the lawe, and that during the triall, theſtate of Millan to be holden by him, promiſing in all accidentes not to appropriat it to him ſelfe: He required that the Venetians ſhoulde pay to thArchduke the reſidue of the two hundred thowſande duckats which were due to him by the capitulacions of VVormes, which the Venetian Embaſſador refuſed not ſo farre foorth as thArchduke woulde accompliſhe the ſayd capitulacions and render ſuch places as he was bound by the obligacions of the ſame: he demaunded of the ſayd Venetians to giue to their exiles according to couenaunt an hundred thowſande duckats, or at leaſt aſſignacion for fiue thowſande duckats of reuenue: That they ſhould pay that which they ought him for the cõfederacion made with him, which he wiſhed might be renued: That they ſhoulde render Rauenna to the Church, and whollie to giue ouer all that they helde in the Duchie of Millan: he required thirtie thowſande duckats of the Florentins in recompenſe of the defrayments and exſpenſes made, and for domages receiued by reaſon of their inobſeruancie: He conſented that the Frenche king ſhoulde pay for him to the king of England a dette of foure hundred and fiftie thowſande duckats, and for the reſidue amounting to two millions, he required oſtages, he required to be prouided for him the twelue gallies of the Frenche king for the conuey of his perſon into Italie, onely he cut of all proporcions of horſemen and footemen: Laſtlie he demaunded that as ſoone as thaccorde were reſolued, all the Frenche regimentes ſhould iſſue out of Italie, an article which the Frenche king refuſed, onleſſe his children were firſt reſtored to him: Yea when it was hoped that he would mitigate theſe demaundes for the loſſe of Alexandria and Pauia, it was then he ſhowed him ſelfe more firme, and reſolute following his cuſtome which was not to yeelde to difficulties: In ſo muche as when the Auditor of the Chamber came to him out of Englande the fifteenth of October to ſolicite the Popes deliuerie in the name of the king of Englande, he aunſwered that he had taken order for that by the Generall: And that touching the accorde, he woulde not eyther for loue or by force, alter the condicions he had eſtabliſhed before: But aſſuredlie it was diſcerned manifeſtlie that thEmperour bare no great inclinacion to the peace, for that many thinges gaue him corage againſt the puiſſance of his ennemies: for, he called into conſideracion that in Italy he might make reſiſtance through the vertue of his armie, and for the facilitie to defende townes: That he coulde alwayes with ſmall difficultie make paſſe newe ſupplies of Launceknightes: That the long tract of exſpenſes had drayned of money and treaſor, the Frenche king and the Venetians: That according to the cuſtome of leagues, their prouiſions were defectiue and diminiſhed: he had confidence to draw out of Spaine ſufficient ſtore of money, seeing he bare out the warre with farre lesser exspenses then did the confederates being much impouerished by the pillage and robberie of souldiers, and also for that he hoped by seperating the confederates to make them more weake or negligent. Lastlye, he promised much to himselfe of his great felicitie both approoued by thexperience of so many yeeres, and had bene assured from his infancie by manye predictions.

But in this time Monsr Lavvtrech solicited that the armies by sea prepared to inuade either Cicilia or the Realme of Naples, shoulde aduaunce and come on: of which, the fleete of the Venetians (whose prouisions eyther by sea or lande aunswered nothing thobligations,) was at Corfon, and sixteene gallies were to ioyne with Andre Dore, who exspected in the ryuer of Genes Ranso de Cero, appoynted to the footemen of that enterprise: After Lavvtrech sent backe agayne into Fraunce foure hundred launces, and three thousande footemen, and contracted with the Venetians whom he counselled to render Rauenna to the colleage of Cardinals, and with the Duke of Millan, that to defende that which hadde bene conquered, they shoulde reteyne their bands with whom were Ianus Fregosa and Count Caieste, in a place well fortified at Landriano, which is a village within two miles of Millan: By reason of whose neighbourhead for that the companies that were within Millan coulde not goe abroade, it was supposed an easyer gard woulde be made of Pauia, Moncia, Biagrassa, Marignan, Binasquo, Vigeuena, and Alexandria: After he hadde established these thinges, the eighteene of October he marched with fifteene hundred Svvizzers, the like nomber of Launceknightes, and sixe thowsande aswell Frenche as Gascons, And with this strength he passed the ryuer of Pavv right ouer agaynst the Borowe of Saint Iohn, with intention to abide there the comming of the Launceknightes, of whom till then was arriued but a very slender nomber, and also an other regiment of footemen of the same nation, which the French king had sent to leuye of newe in place of the Svvizzers, who were almost gone away: But from this place he was driuen to sende backe agayne beyonde Pavv, Peter Nauarre, with the bands of footemen Gascons and Italians, to the succours of Biagrassa, before which towne garded by the Duke of Millan, Antho. de Leua, was gone to incampe the xxviij. of October with foure thowsande footemen, and seuen peeces of artilleries, taking his reason of that enterprise vpon the wantes and ill prouisions of the towne: which being yelded to him the second day by accorde, he prepared to passe into Lomelino, to the ende to reconquer Vigeuena and Nouaro,: But being aduertised by good espiall that Peter Nauare was come with a greater supplie of forces, he returned backe againe to Millan: By which retyring he made easie to Peter Nauare, to get againe Biagressa, in whiche Frauncis Sforce bestowed better prouisions. It was nowe discerned that Monsr Lavvtrech deferred with great industrie and art, to depart: Wherein albeit he alleaged that the thing that reteyned him, was the tarying of the Launceknightes, of whom one band being at last arriued vnder the charge of Monsr Vaudemont, he abode the comming of the others, And albeit he cunningly accompanied that excuse with a complaint of the slender prouisions of the Venetians, yet it was supposed that the onely cause that helde him in deferring and lingring, was the money which he exspected out of Fraunce: But the true and most stronge reason was, that the French king hoping much in the peace, the negotiacion whereof was stil continued with themperour, he gaue direction to Lavvtrech to dissemble vnder slowe proceedings, his aduauncing on: whereupon also it came to passe that the kyng was not readie to satisfie his part of the pay of thoſe Almains which were leauyed in place of the Svvizzers, and much leſſe the other bands that were before reſerued to go with Monſr Vavvdemont. With theſe neceſſities or rather excuſes Monſr Lavvtrech ſoiourning at Plaiſanca, and his companies being beſtowed betwene Plaiſanca and Parma, the difficultie which before was had of the duke of Ferrara was nowe taken awaye: This Duke, like as Monſr Lavvtrech aſſone as he was entred into Italy, had ſolicited to enter into the league, which was a matter deſired of thone ſide by the Duke in reſpect of thalliance that was offred to him with the French king, and on the other ſide the ſame reteining him, both for a diſtruſt he had of the vallour of the French, and for a ſuſpicion he had leaſt the king for the recouery of his children, would not at laſt accord with themprour: So neuertheles fearing the threats of Lavvtrech, he was reduced conformable to the will of the French, demaunding only that the negociatiõ of thoſe affayres might be performed at Ferrara, for that he would in his owne perſon manage a cauſe that imported him ſo muche: So that thembaſſadours of the whole confederates went vp to Ferrara, together with Cardinall Cibo in the name of thoſe Cardinalls that were aſſembled at Parma: And the Duke beeing not a litle moued to ſee Lavvtrech aduaunce, after he had laboured to inſinuate his reaſons, and make them ſeeme good to Capteine George and Andrevv de Burgo, (theſe were within Ferrara and greatly honoured and enterteyned by him) he lefte them ſatisfied of the neceſſitie that compelled him to compound: And at laſt he accorded but with conditions well ſhowing eyther his induſtrie & knowledge howe to negociate, & that it was not in vayne that he ſought to draw the action into his preſence, or elſe by the conditions were well declared the great deſire the other partie had to draw him into the confederation: Wherin he entred with obligation to pay monthly for the ſpace of ſixe moneths, ſix or ten thouſand crownes according to the arbitration of the french king, who reſolued afterwards vpon ſix thouſand, with bond to deliuer to Monſr Lavvtrech a company of an hundred men at armes payed: On the other ſide, the confederates bound themſelues to the protection of him & his eſtate: To deliuer to him Cotignolo (which a litle before the Venetians had taken from the Spaniards) in exchange of the auncient and almoſt deſolate citie of Adria, which he demaunded with great importunity: To render vnto him the pallaces which before time he had poſſeſſed in Venice & in Florence: To giue him ſuffrance to winne vpon Albert Pio the caſtell de Nouy ſtanding vpon the confines of Mantua, which he helde beſieged at the ſame time: That they would pay the frutes of the Archbiſhoprike of Millan, to his ſonne who was Archbiſhop there, if the imperials gaue no impedimẽt to him to receiue them: The Cardinall Cibo in the name of thoſe Cardinalls who promiſed the ratification of the College, bound the Pope to renew thinueſtiture of Ferrara: To renounce the rights of Modena in regard of the purchaſe he had made of it with Maximilian: To cancell the obligations for the ſaltes: To conſent to the protection which the confederates tooke of him and his: To promiſe by Buls Apoſtolike to ſuffer aſwell him as his ſucceſſors to poſſeſſe all that they nowe enioyed: and that the Pope ſhould create his ſonne Cardinall, and beſtow vpon him the Biſhoprike of Modena vacant by the death of the Cardinall Rangon. To this confederation was added that Renea the daughter of king Lovvis ſhould be giuen in mariage to Hercules his eldeſt ſonne, & to indue the mariage with the duchy of Chartres and other honorable conditions. By the example of the duke of Ferrara, concurring alſo the inſtance & ſolicitation of Monſr Lavvtrech, the Marquis of Mantua entred into the league, notwithſtanding he had put himſelfe before into the pay of themprour.

The Duke of Ferrara entreth into the league.

But at this time the confederate armie was very weake, and laye many dayes without doing any thing, betweene Fuglino, Montfalcon, and Beuaguo: And the duke of Vrbin who had aduertiſement of the reſtrayning of his wife and children at Venice, being departed from the army agaynſt the commiſſion of the Senate to iuſtifie his cauſe, was tolde by the way that they were deliuered, and that the Senate beeing well ſatisfied of his gouernment deſyred him to paſſe further: by reaſon of which aduertiſement he returned to the army, In whiche the Svvizzers and the footbands of the Marquis were not payed: Neither did the Venetians eyther there or in Lombardy where they were bound to mainteine nine thouſand footmen, aduance the third part: By which negligence accompanied with an vniuerſall ſparing of exſpences, the army was declined to great debilitie: in which weaknes they retired afterwards to the territory of Lody & the confines therabout. And the Spaniards vpon the end of Nouember were gone vp towards Corneto and Toſcanello, and the launceknights remained at Rome, to whom the prince of Orenge was returned from Sienna, where he had made but ſmall abode, for that he ſaw he could not be apt to reorder that gouernment as he thought he could haue done. Aſſuredly it was not to be douted that if themprours army had aduaunced, the duke of Vrbin and the Marquis of Saluſſe had not retired with their forces to the walls of Florence, notwithſtãding they had made many vauntes that to ſtoppe them from entring into Tuskane, they would plant a campe eyther within Orbietto or Viterba, or els vpon the territorie of Sienna towards Chiuſa and Sertiano: But Monſr Lavvtrech notwithſtanding the bandes of launceknightes were ariued, proceding, for thexſpectation of the iſſue of the peace, ſo ſlowly as he was wont, made his abode within Parma: where albeit he had reduced into his power the caſtells of that citie, and had leauyed vpon that towne and Plaiſanca and their territories about fiftie thouſande duckets, yet it was beleued that he had an intention not onely to ſubdue to his deuotion and power Parma and Plaiſanca, but alſo to thend to draw Bologna to depend vpon the authoritie of his king, he had impreſſion to conuert the iuriſdiction of that citie into the famuly of the Pepolies: But thoſe deuiſes ſorted to nõ effect by reaſon of the Popes deliuery: To the which albeit it ſeemed at the firſt that themprour was not to condiſcend readily (for ſince the newes of his calamitie he had temporiſed one whole moneth before he would reſolue) yet both vnderſtanding that Lavvtrech was paſſed into Italy, and alſo not ignorant of the king of Englands readines to the warre, he had diſpatched into Italy the Generall of the grayfreers and Verio de Migliato, with commiſſion to the Viceroy to debate that action: But the Generall finding the Viceroy dead before he ariued at Caietto, he was then to transfer the negociatiõ of thoſe affayres to Don Hugo de Moncado, to whom as themprours cõmiſſion did alſo extend, ſo the Viceroy had orderly ſubſtituted him in his place vntil themprour ſhould ſend ſome new addreſſe for the gouernment of the realme: And after the General had communicated with Don Hugo, he went to Rome, accõpanied with Migliato who was come out of Spayne with the like cõmiſſions: This buſines & negociation conteined two principal articles, the one that the Pope ſhould ſatisfie the army to whom was owing a very great ſumme of mony, And the other that the Pope being deliuered ſhould not be adherent to his enemies: To which two articles were tyed hard conditions of oſtages & townes for aſſurance: Which difficulties as they drew a long tract and delay in the general matter, ſo to make the iſſue eaſy, the Pope failed not by ſecret meanes to ſolicit cõtinually Monſr Lavvtrech to aduãce, aſſuring him that as his intentiõ was to promiſe nothing to thimperials but by force, ſo alſo in that caſe, being once out of priſon,he would obſerue nothing ſo ſoone as his perſon were once transferred into a place of ſuretie, whiche he forgat not to bring to paſſe in giuing to them the leaſt oportunities he could: But in caſe he did accorde, he beſought him that the compaſſion of his aduerſities and neceſſities might ſerue him for excuſe. But during the ſolicitation of theſe matters the Oſtages ſtale away ſecretly from Rome in the ende of Nouember, not without the great indignation of the Launceknightes.

Long was the diſputation vpon this matter,euen thoſe being not of one opinion and aduiſe,in whom was moſt power to determine: for albeit Don Hugo had ſent to Rome Serenon his ſecretorie together with the others. yet what for his yll nature and the litle loue he bare to the Pope,he had no great inclination to his deliuery: The Generall bare a contrary affection, eyther in true regarde of office and compaſſion, or for that he aſpired to be Cardinall: And Migliato impugned it as a matter moſt daungerous for themprour,and beeing not hable to reſiſt it, he went from them to Naples, of which impietie he bare a right puniſhment, for that at the firſt beſieging of Naples leading the skirmiſh, he was ſlayne with the ſhot of a harquebuze. The Pope omitted nothing that by induſtrie might be made for his purpoſe,for he allured to his opinion,and wonne on his ſide the witte and toung of Ierome Moron, the counſels of whom bare great authoritie with the imperials in al their deliberations: The meane with the which he did allure him was,that the Pope transferred the Biſhoprike of Modena to his ſonne, and corrupted him with the promiſe of certayne corne which he had at Cornetta amounting in value to aboue twelue thouſand duckets: He made fauourable the Cardinall Colonno with a leſſe induſtrie, both by promiſing him the legation of la Marqua,and alſo aſſuring him at ſuch time as he came to viſite him in the caſtell,that he would principally acknowledge ſo great a benefit of him: wherein he forgat not to worke vpon the humor of the man,that he could not wiſhe a greater degree of glorie and felicitie,then to let all the world know that it was in his power to pul downe Popes,and being once embaſed and reuerſed,that it was in his hand to reamount them and rayſe them to their former eſtate of greatnes: With which inſinuations of them ſelues full of compaſſion, and for the party that preferred them of no leſſe pyetie and deuotion, ioyned to the propertie of the Cardinall being by nature hawty and glorious, inclined him to a ready diſpoſition to deliuer the Pope, beleeuing that it would be as eaſie for the Pope in his libertie to forgette ſo many wronges and iniuries, as beeing priſoner he was apte with prayers and teares humbly to recommend vnto him his deliueraunce.But all ſortes of difficulties were ſomewhat eaſed by a newe commiſſion from themprour, by the which he gaue order that the Pope ſhould be deliuered to his contẽtment as much as was poſſible,Wherein it ſeemed he helde it ſufficient that being in his libertie,he would be for the confederates no more then for him: Neuertheles the matter that more then all other wrought for his deliuery,was,a neceſſitie they had,which made them fearefull,leaſt Monſr Lavvtrech would leade his armie to the defence of the Realme of Naples: Which was a matter impoſſible vnleſſe they were firſte aſſured of the payes due to them, in recompence whereof they would not ſuffer ſo many prayes and great gaynes as they had made at the ſame tyme: This neceſſitie to prouide for the payes, was alſo the cauſe why there was made leſſe accounte to bee aſſured of the Pope in tyme to come. At laſte after longe negociation and practiſe, and many accidentes and difficulties occurring, there was concluded in Rome the laſte of October, a reſolution of accorde wyth the Generall and wyth Serenon in the name of Don Hugo, who afterwardes ratified it: Theſe were the articles of the composition: That the Pope shoulde bee no partie agaynst thEmprour, neyther in the affayres of Millan, nor in the kingdome of Naples: That he should accord vnto themprour the Croysade in Spayne, and a tenth of the reuenues ecclesiastike through all his dominions: That to assure thobseruation of these things, Ostia should remayne in the handes of themprour, and Ciuitavecchia which Andrea Dore had left to him before: That he should assigne ouer to him Ciuita Castellana, a towne which had refused to receiue thimperialls, Mario Perusquo procurer of the fiske being entred within the rocke by secret commission from the Pope, notwithstanding he made semblance of the contrary: That he should also deliuer ouer to him the rocke of Furly, and to put into his hands for ostages Hipolito & Alexander his nephewes, And tyll they were come from Parma themprour to be possessed of the Cardinalls Pisani, Triuulco, and Gaddi, whom they led to the realme of Naples: That he should make present payment to the Launceknightes of three skore thousande duckets, and to the Spaniardes thirtie and fiue thousande: That in so doing they should let him come out at libertie with all the Cardinalls, and they to goe out of Rome & out of the castell, alwayes interpreting to libertie when soeuer they should be conueyed in safety to Orbietto, Spoletto, or Perousa: That within fiftene dayes after his going out of Rome he should paye the like quantitie of money to the launceknights, and afterwards the residue within three monethes to the Spaniards and launceknightes ioyntly, according to their shares & portions: Which residue together with the summes payed amounted to more then three hundred and fiftie thousande duckets. The Pope to haue the better meane to obserue these payments, and withall to deliuer himselfe of the heauy yoke of his imprisonment, had recourse to those remedies, which he would not apply before to keepe him out of that calamitie: And in that necessitie he created for money certeine Cardinalls, of whome the most part for their doctrine or vertue, were vnworthy so great honor: The same property of extremitie forced him also to consent to the Article of the tenthes through the realm of Naples, with power to alienate the goods of the Church: In so much that that which was dedicated to the seruice of God (so deepe and profound are his iudgementes) was conuerted to the vse and enterteyning of Heretikes, and that by the permission and consent of the Vicare of Christe: With which meanes hauing assured the paymentes of the money according to the times promised, he deliuered also for ostage for the suretie of the souldiors, the Cardinalls Cesis & Vrsin, who were led by the Cardinall Colonno to Grottaferara: And so all things hauing their orderly expedition, and the resolution set downe that the tenth of December the Spaniards should accompany him into a place of suretie, he fearing some variation eyther for the yll minde which he knewe Don Hugo bare to him, or for any other accident that might happen, the night before he stale secretly out of the Castell in the closing of the euening, disguysed in the attyre of a Marchaunt: Leyvis de Gonsaguo who was in the paye of the Emprour, taryed for him in the medowes with a strong companie of harquebuziers, and with that garde did accompanie him to Montfalcon, where dismissing almoste all his bandes of footemen, he was ledde by the same Leyvis euen to Orbietto, into whiche Citie he entred by nighte without the company of any one Cardinall: An example worthy of consideration, and perhaps neuer happned since the Churche was great, that a Pope shoulde in that sorte fall from so great a puissance and reuerence, his eyes to beholde the losse and sacke of Rome, his person to bee turned ouer into captiuitie, and his whole estate reduced to the disposing of an other, and within fewe monethes after, to be reſtored and reeſtabliſhed in hys former greatnes : So greate towardes princes Chriſtian is thauthoritie of the Pope, and the reſpect which mortall mendo beare to him.

About this time which was immediatly after Monſr Lavvtrech was departed from Plaiſanca, Antho.de Leua ſent out of Millan the bandes of Spaniſhe and Italian footemen, both to feede and refreſh them ſelues, and alſo to recouer ſuche places of the contrey as were moſt weake, to thend to open a way and commodity to bring a traffike of vitttelles to Myllan: Theſe bandes exchaunging the captiuitie of the towne wherein they were kept ſtrayte, for the libertie of the countrey which gaue them skope, tooke that part of the countrey which is called Spetio. He ſent out alſo at the ſame time and to the ſame ends Phillip Toruiello with eleuen hundred footmen and certayne light horſemen to Nouaro, in which citie was a garriſon of foure hundren footemen of the duke of Millan : Toruiello made his entrye by the Rocke which had bene alwayes holden in the name of the Emprour: and finding a very ſlender defence, he made himſelfe maiſter of the towne, where making pillage of ſome of the footemen, and ſending the reſidue to their houſes, he kept within Nouaro, holding it for a retrayte to ouerrunne all the countrey thereabout: But there were part of the Launceknightes got into Arona, and an other part beſtowed within Moraro, To whom for that the Duke had ſent a ſtrength of other footmen for the defence of Lomelina, and the countrey, they became impedimentes to Toruiello that he had no libertie to make his incurſions farre off: In ſo much as that wynter running foorth in no other exploytes then in many skirmiſhes, both partes made pillage aſwell vpon their friendes as their enemies, & in that libertie of warre ranne ouer the whole countrey with an vniuerſall ruine of all ſortes of people. In like ſort at that time were ioyned and aſſembled at Liuorno, the gallies of Andrea Dore, and fourteene French gallies, with ſixteene gallies of the Venetians: who after they had receyued in Ranſo de Cere, with three thouſande footemen to put on lande, they waighed anker the xiij. of Nouember, to departe out of the port of Liuorno: And albeit it was determined before, that they ſhould make an inuaſion vpon the Ile of Sicile, yet that reſolution beeing innouated, they were conuerted to the enterpriſe of Sardignia, at the perſwaſion as was ſuppoſed of Andrea Dore, who happly had in his minde other conceptions: Monſr Lavvtrech conſented eaſily to embrace this enterpriſe, hoping that Sardignia beeing taken, the conqueſt of Sicilie woulde be of leſſe difficultie: But what ſo euer the cauſe was, the iſſue and effect was ſtraunge and diuerſe, for that falling into the rage of a verye violent ſtorme, they were ſeperated and turned to their ſeuerall hazardes of the ſea: One of the Frenche gallies periſhed neare the ſhoares of Sardignia, and foure of the Venetians beeing ſore beaten with the fury of tempeſts, returned to Liuorno: the other gallies of the french were driuen into Corſa by the rage of the windes, agaynſt which the skill of the Pylotes had no force, and afterwardes they reaſſembled with the foure Venetian gallies within Portovecchio: the other eight of the Venetians were caried by violence of ſea and ſtorme into Liuorno: So that after many perills by ſtorme and weather that enterpriſe ſtoode diſſolued, Andrea Dore and Ranſo de Cere remayning in great diſcorde together. But Monſr Lavvtrech beeing within Reggia, aſſone as he was aduertiſed of the Popes deliuerie, he left the caſtell of Parma to the officers of the Church, and went vp to Bolognia, In which Citie he made his abode, exſpecting the comming of the laſt bandes of the Launceknightes, who within fewe dayes afterwardes aryued vppon the countreys of Bolognia, not in number of ſixe thouſande as

was appoynted,but only three thousand,which was farre lesse then was looked for: And neuertheles after they were aryued,Lavvtrech soiourned twentie dayes within Bologna,attending the kings aduertisemẽt for the last resolution touching the negociation of the peace: He vsed in the meane whyle a great diligence wherin was also interposed the authoritie of the king of England to draw the Pope to make an open protestation to cleaue to the confederates: But immediatly after he was aryued at Orbietta,like as there went to congratulate with him the duke of Vrbin, the Marquis of Salusso,Federike Bossolo who dyed a litle after at Lody,and Levvis Pisano cõmissarie for the Venetians: So he besought them with great instance to retire their cõpanies & bands of men of warre from the state ecclesiastik,assuring them that the imperials had promised him to withdrawe their forces, if they might discerne the armies of the confederats to do the like. And in that cõpassion he wrote also a letter to Monsr Lavvtrech tending to thanke him both for that he had done to purchase his deliuerance, and also for the counsell he gaue him to procure his libertie in any sorte what so euer: He debated with him that his actions and industrie had bin of so great consequence to constrayne thimperialls to resolue vpon his deliuerie, that he did no lesse acknowledge himselfe bound to the king and to him, then if his person had bin taken out of that calamitie with the force of their armes: The ayde and proceedings of which he would willingly haue tarryed for,had not his necessitie compelled him to abandon all temporising, the rather for that the conditions that were proponed were alwayes chaunged from yll to worse, the same testifying vnto him in cleare apparance that his fortune had lefte vnto him no other meane of deliuerye, then by the benefite and operation of accorde: which by how muche more it was deferred and put of,by so muche more the authoritie and estate of the Church was to fall into manyfest reuersement: But the chiefest matter that induced him to determine his aduersitie by accorde, was a hope he had conceyued that beeing at libertie,he should be made an apt instrument to solicite a common tranquillitie both with his king and the other princes of Christendome. Such were at first his phrases and manner of speeches protested in simplicitie and roundnes, as became the office of a Bishop,but especially a Pope who had receyued at the hands of God so seueare and sharpe admonitions: Neuertheles it was not long ere he returned to his natural custome,hauing not left for the calamitie of his imprisonment,neither his suttleties wherin he could depely dissemble,nor his couetousnes which he could not auoyde: for when the Agents which Lavvtrech sent together with the Embassadour of the king of Englande were come before him to solicite him to confederate with the residue, he began to giue them diuerse aunsweres,Sometimes he dismissed them with hope that he would be reduced conformable to their desires, and sometimes he would inferre excuses that hauing neyther men,money,nor authoritie,as it coulde not helpe them muche to haue him to ioyne with them,so the action could not but be preiudiciall to himselfe, for that thimperialls would take occasion to vex him in many places: And sometimes he showed a ready inclination to satisfie their demaundes,so farre foorth as Monsr Lavvtrech did aduaunce: A matter which he desyred greatly to thend the Launceknightes were compelled to depart out of Rome, who going on consuming the remaynders of that miserable citie and all the countrey confining, would not be brought to giue ouer to hunt the praye whiche they founde so sweete, but in their insolencies neyther respecting their Capteines with obedience,nor forbearing ciuill tumult and mutinies amongest them selues, they demaunded new payes.

But from the ende of the yere going before, and much more in the beginning of the yere following, the induſtrie and ſolicitations of the peace began to appeare vayne, and by that reaſon the mindes of Princes and ſtates beganne to be ſo muche more incenſed and kindled, by how much leſſe they ſaw themſelues excluded from the hope of peace: For as all the difficulties were almoſt reſolued, ſeing themprour refuſed not to render to Frauncis Sforce the Duchie of Millan, and to compounde with the Venetians, the Florentins, and the other confederates: So this reſted onely in queſtion, which of theſe two things ſhould be put firſt in execution, eyther the withdrawing of the French armie out of Italy, or the reſtitution of the kinges children: The king would not be bound to reuoke his armie out of Italy, if firſt he recouered not his children, offring to put oſtages into the handes of the king of England to aſſure the obſeruation of the penalties wherein he was bounde, if vpon the reſuming of his children he retyred not preſently his armie: But themprour made inſtance to the contrarie, offring the ſame cawtions into the king of Englands hands: Wherein the queſtion and diſputation running, in whether of them it would bee more comely or honeſt to truſt the other, themprour ſayde it was not reaſonable to reapoſe confidence in him who had once deceyued him. To the which the French Embaſſadours aunſwered, that by how muche more he pretended to be deceiued by their king, by ſo much leſſe could their king reapoſe confidence in him: They alleaged alſo that themprours offer to conſigne into the hands of the king of England the ſame aſſurances which their king offred, was neyther equall nor indifferent: for that both the caſe varyed in this, that the thing which themprour promiſed to do, was of farre greater conſequence then thobligation of their king, and therefore not reaſonable to be aſſured vnder the ſame cawtions: And alſo they added, that the Engliſh Embaſſadours who had authoritie to binde their king to obſerue what ſo euer the French king ſhould promiſe, had no commiſſion to tye him to thobſeruation of themprours promiſes: And that their faculties & authoritie being limited and reſtrayned to tearme and time, they could neither exceed nor anticipate: Vpon which diſputation could ſoart no reſolution, for that themprour had not the ſame inclination to the peace, which his Counſell had, the rather for that he enterteined himſelfe with this opinion, that though by warre he ſhould loſe the kingdome of Naples, yet he ſhould be apt to recouer it by rendring the children of Fraunce: yea the great Chauncellour who long time before was returned into Spayne, was touched muche by imputation, to haue troubled greatly the ſolicitations of the peace with cauillations and interpretations ſophiſticall. At laſt thembaſſadours of Englande and Fraunce following their commiſſions in caſe they diſpayred of thaccorde, determined to demaund leaue of themprour to depart, and immediatly afterwards to denounce warre agaynſt him: And with that concluſion being brought to his preſence the xxj. of Ianuary, his Court being then at Burgos, and beeing folowed with thembaſſadours of Venice, of the Duke of Millan, and Florence, Thengliſhe Embaſſadours demaunded of him the foure hundred and fiftie thouſande duckets which their king had lent to him, and ſixe hundred thouſande for the penaltie impoſed vpon him in that he had refuſed his daughter, together with fiue hundred thouſande for the penſions of the French king and for other cauſes: Whiche demaundes being propoſed for greater iuſtification, all thembaſſadours of the confederates asked leaue to depart away: But he tolde them he woulde take aduiſe of his counſell before he would aunſwere that demaunde, beeing in deede neceſſarie affore they departed that his Embaſſadours were in places of ſuretie. Thembaſſa-

dours were no ſooner departed his preſence, then the Heraldes of Englande and Fraunce entred, to denounce warre agaynſt him, whiche he accepted with a greate ſhowe of gladnes and brauerie: And in that humor he gaue preſent direction that thembaſſadours of Fraunce, Venice, and Florence, ſhould be conueyed to a towne fifteene leagues from the Court, where beeing garded with archiers and halberdiers, they were forbidden eyther to communicate or to write anye thing what ſo euer: Touching the duke of Myllans Embaſſadour, he impoſed vpon him a commaundement as vpon his ſubiect, that he ſhould not departe from his Court: Onely on the behalfe of the Embaſſadour of Englande there was nothing innouated.

VVarre denounced agaynſt them prour by the kings of Englande and Fraunce.

Thus all the negociations and hopes of peace being broken, there remayned only inflamed and kindled the cogitations and thoughts of the warre: which as it declared it ſelfe in manyfeſt preparation through all the regions of Italy, So to reduce to action and beginning the thing that as yet was but in apparance & ſhow, Monſr Lavvtrech puſhed on by the king, but muche more by the king of Englande, ſince the hope of peace began to diminiſhe, was departed from Bolognia the nynth of Ianuary to marche to the kingdome of Naples by the way of Romagnia and la Marqua: This way after long conſultation was choſen by him contrary to thinſtance of the Pope, who deſyred vnder thoccaſion of his marching, to reſtore into Sienna, Fabio Petruccio and Montenouo: That election of the way was alſo agaynſt the inſtance of the Florentins, who to thend to haue that army more ready to ſuccour them, in caſe thimperialls marched to inuade Tuskane, deſired them to take the way of Tuskane: But Monſr Lavvtrech choſe rather to make his entry into the realme of Naples by the way of Tronto, both for the commoditie of that way to leade the artilleries, and alſo for the fertilitie of the countrey yeelding plenty of vittels: and laſtly becauſe he would not giue occaſion to thenemies to make head at Sienna or in any other place, hauing a ſpeciall deſire to make his entrye into the kingdome of Naples before he ſhould encounter any impediment: And aſſone as he was departed from Bolognia, Iohn Saſſatello rendred to the Pope the rocke of Tmola, of which he had made himſelfe lorde in the time of his impriſonment: And drawing neare afterwards to Rimini, Sigiſmond Malateſta ſonne to Pandolffo, contracted with him to giue vp that Citie to the Pope, vpon condition that he ſhould be bound to ſuffer his mother to enioy her dowry, to giue to his ſiſter who was not maryed ſixe thouſande duckets, and to aſſigne for his father and for him two thouſand duckets of reuenue: That Sigiſmond ſhould depard immediatly out of Rimini, and his father to remayne there vntill the Pope had ſent the ratification: And that in the meane while the rocke ſhould abide in the handes of Guido Rangon his couſin, who being in the pay of the French king followed Monſr Lavvtrech to the warre: But the Pope deferring to accompliſhe theſe promiſes, Sigiſmond repoſſeſſed and occupied agayne the rocke, though not without a great complaynt of the Pope agaynſt Guido Rangon, as though he had ſecretly ſuffred him, and not without ſuſpicion that Lavvtrech and the Venetians had conſented, ſeeming they had deſired to kepe him in continuall difficulties: The ſuſpicion of the Venetians grewe vpon the cauſe of Rauenna, which the Pope aſſone as he was deliuered out of the Caſtell hauing ſent to ſommon and demaunde it of the Senate by the Archbiſhop of Siponto, he was aunſwered with words generall, referring the matter to the arbitration of Iaſper Contarin Embaſſadour elect reſident with him: for notwithſtanding they had giuen aſſurance before that they reteyned it for the ſea Apoſtolike, yet they had no deſire to reſtore it: Wherein they were moued aſwell by intereſts publike as priuate for the commoditie of that Citie to augment their iuriſdiction in Romagnia, fertill of it ſelfe in grayne, and for the plentie of the countreys adioyning, of great oportunitie to draw to Venice euery yere good quantities of corne: Beſides many of the citie of Venice had in that territorie, great and goodly poſſeſſions: And touching Monſr Lavvtrech the Pope doubted no leſſe of him, for that beſides many inſtances which had bin made to him before, Lavvtrech notwithſtanding he had ſent to him after he was come from Bolognia, Monſr Vavvdemont capteine generall of the Launceknightes, together with Monſr Longeuille whome the king ſente to ſolicite him earneſtlye to declare agaynſt thEmperour: could not obteine ſo muche of him, the Pope not refuſing expreſly, but vnder delayes and excuſes: And in that cunning he had offred to the french king to giue his conſent, but vnder this condition that the Venetians ſhould render to him Rauenna: A condition which he knew could not take effect, both for that it behoued not the Venetians to be induced to it by the kings perſwaſions, neither was it agreable to the time that the king ſhould make them his enemies, to ſatisfie the Pope: Moreouer he gaue no inclination to thinſtance which Lavvtrech made to him to ratifie the accorde made with the Duke of Ferrara, alleaging that it was a matter farre vnworthye of him to approue in his life time, conditions made in his name whyleſt he was dead: and yet he alleaged that he woulde not refuſe to contracte with him: By reaſon whereof the duke of Ferrara taking that occaſion, made difficultie (notwithſtanding the king and the Venetians had receyued him into their protection) to ſende to Monſr Lavvtrech the hundred men at armes and the money which he had promiſed: Wherin he ſtoode vpon this obſeruation, that doubting the iſſue of affayres, he would not be ſo much for the French king, as not to reſerue place and meane to appeaſe in all euentes the minde of themprour, to whom he had excuſed himſelfe by his neceſſitie: Beſides he enterteined cõtinually at Ferrara George Fronſpergh and Andrevv de Burgo. Neuertheleſſe the armie for all this ceaſſed not to aduaunce, which vnder the leading of Monſr de Lavvtrech aryued the tenth of Februarie vpon the ryuer of Tronto which ſeperateth the eſtate eccleſiaſtike from the kingdome of Naples.

But in Fraunce after aduertiſement was brought that themprour had reteined the kings Embaſſadour, by his example the king cauſed themprours Agentes to be reſtrayned within the Caſtell of Paris, and all Marchantes ſubiects to him to be ſtayed throughout all the regions of Fraunce: The king of Englande did the like by themprours Embaſſadour reſident with him, whom he eftſones redeliuered, after he was made to vnderſtande that no reſtraynt was made vpon his. And as the warre was nowe publiſhed in Fraunce, in Englande, and in Spayne, ſo the French king ſtoode vppon this requeſt, that the firſt action might begin ioyntly in Flaunders, in which reſolution he ſent certayne bands of ſouldiours to make incurſions into that contrey: Neuertheles the Flemings for all thoſe prouocations, made no emotion nor riſing, vnleſſe to defende them ſelues, for that the Lady Margaret of Auſtria laboring to auoyde all occaſions to enter warre with the French king, would not ſuffer her people to iſſue out of their boundes and confines: But it was a matter grieuous to the king of Englande to haue warre with the people of Flaunders, for that notwithſtanding there were to be confined to him aſſone as they ſhould be conquered, certaine townes promiſed before by themprour for aſſurance of the mony he had lent him, yet he helde it alſo a matter no leſſe preiudiciall aſwell for his particular reuenues, as for the generall intereſt and benefite of his realme, to breake the trade and entercourſe of his Marchantes with thoſe prouinces: Neuertheleſſe according to thob-

ligations of the contract, as he could not apparantly refuse it, so yet he temporised & deferred it asmuch as he could, taking thaduauntage of the capitulacions by the which it was lawfull for him to linger fortie daies after sommonce made, to thende to giue time to the marchants to retire themselues. This excuse of his and inclinacion being both well knowen & approued by the french king, he solicited him that in place to make warre in Flaunders, he would with an armie by sea, inuade the sea coastes of Spayne, where he assured him he had right good intelligence: By which alteracion of councells it hapned at last, that as the king sending to the french king a bishop to perswade him to giue ouer thenterprise of beyonde the mountes, and to encrease and make stronge the warre of Italy: so by his perswasions and his authoritie there was an order established, that for the space of eight monethes next ensuing there should be done no vexacions nor harmes by the french and english, vpon the contreys of Flaunders nor any of the estates or subiects of themprour confyning vpon those prouinces: Wherein for the more easie induction of the french king to condiscend to this order, the king of England was bound to pay thirtie thowsand duckats monthly for the warre of Italy, in which was determined the contribucion promised before for six monethes.

But by how much were augmented and enforced the preparacions of the warre, by so much and by the same degrees were kindled & redoubled the hatreds of both the princes hauing especiall interest in this warre: either of them tooke occasion to multiplie iniuries and enforce quarrells, In which passions they contended no lesse with courage and malice, then with force and armes: For, whereas themprour about two yeares before in the towne of Grenado when in like sorte the peace was solicited betwene the french king and him, spake to the President of Grenoble the french embassador then, certeine wordes inferring that he would willingly put end to all quarrells betwene the king and him by a singular combat of both their persones, to thende to auoide so much bloode and affliction of Christians and persones innocent: And whereas also since that time he had cõfirmed the same wordes to the herald the last time he signified the warre to him, with this addicion that the french king had delt with him villanously and cowardly in falsefying the faith he had giuen to him: These speeches being now deliuered ouer to the king, he thought he could not let them lie in silence without his ignominie and dishonor: And therefore albeit the chalenge might better become the persones of knightes, then to be performed by princes of their estate and greatnes, yet being no lesse guided with the enuie of the chalenge then desirous to purge and iustifie his honor, he caused to assemble the xxvij. of Marche in a great hall of his pallaice at Paris, all his princes, attending his person, all thembassadors resident from the forreine, and the whole presence of his court: And in that aspect and stately view of nobles & embassadors the king in his time discended into the hall with a great pompe and furnishment of sumptuous attire, & no lesse honorably accompanied with a traine of Barons: where after he was with all ceremonies of state & dignitie set in his seate royall, he caused to be called before him themprours embassador who sued for his dispatch for that it was determined that being conueighed to Bayone, he should be deliuered at the same time that the other confederat embassadors were set at libertie, who for that purpose were conducted to Bayone: When thembassador stoode in his presence, the king spake to him, excusing and alleadging that thempror had bene principally the cause of his restraining, for that in an example new and against humanitie, he had kept reteined his embassadors and the agents of his confederats: But seing he was now to go to Bayone to thende there might be an vniuerſall deliuerie at one time, he deſired him to cary from him a letter to thempror, and to deliuer a meſſage from him of this tenor: That whereas thempror had ſaied to his herald that he had falſefied his faith, he had ſaied falſely, and that howe many times he had ſpoken it, ſo many times had he lied, and that for aunſwere to thende not to linger the tryall of their quarells, he vvould aſſigne him the place vvhere they might together performe the combat: But thembaſſador refuſing either to cary the letter, or to deliuer the meſſage, the king ſaied he would ſend to ſignifie no leſſe to him by a herald: he added alſo to the meſſage, that albeit he was not ignorant that themprour had ſpoken wordes againſt the honor of his brother the king of England, yet he would make no mencion of that, knowing that the ſaied king was well hable to deale in his owne defenſe: And yet if thorow the indiſpoſicion of his body he had any lawfull impedimēt, he offred to preſent his perſon to hazard for him: Not many daies after the king of England gaue the ſame deffiance, and with the ſame ſolemnities and ceremonies. The ſame ſomewhat offending the honor of the princes of Chriſtendome who in their rage of malice could not forbeare to defile their mindes with ſuch paſſions, hauing ronning amongeſt them a warre of ſo great importance and ſo much preiudiciall to all the common wealth of Chriſtendom: But amyd theſe great heates and furies of warre and armes, the order of our ſtory draweth into diſcourſe ſome reapport of the king of England touching the refuſing of the Lady Katherine of Aragon.

The ſaied king had to wife the ſaid Lady Katherine daughter to Ferdinand and Elyzabeth kings of Spayne, a queene worthy of ſuch parents, and for her vertues and good behauior vniuerſally beloued & reuerenced of the whole eſtate of the realme: In the time of the father of that king, ſhe was maried to prince Arthure eldeſt ſonne to the crowne, but being almoſt no ſooner maried then ſhe was made a widow by the haſty death of her husband, ſhe was eftſoones by the conſent of her father and father in law, married to prince Henry the younger brother, but with diſpenſacion of Pope Iulio in regard of thaffinitie that was neare and ſtraite: of which mariage was procreated a ſonne, who died immediatly, and afterwardes there ſucceded no other generacion of children then a daughter. The ſame giuing occaſion to the court to murmure, that for the vnlawfulnes of the mariage being not diſpenſable in the firſt degree, the crowne was by miracle depriued of iſſue male: This occaſion was aptly taken and managed by the Cardinall of Yorke, who knowing the kings deſire to haue ſonnes, began to perſwade him, that refuſing his firſt wife who iuſtly was not his wife, he might diſpoſe himſelfe to marie an other: Wherein much leſſe that he was induced by conſcience, or of a ſimple deſier to bring iſſue male to the king, but he was caried in that action with a ſecret opinion that in drawing his king to embraſe a ſecond mariage, he might happlie induce him to fix his affection vpon the Ladie Renea daughter to king Louvys: A matter which was deſired by him with no ſmall induſtrie and ambicion: for that knowing he was generally hated of all the realme, he ſought to prepare remedies for his owne eſtate againſt all accidents that might happen both during the life and after the death of the king: he tooke alſo one ſtrong inducement to that practiſe vpon the greate malice he had conceiued againſt themperour, for that neither in demonſtracions nor with effects, he did not further and ſatisfie his incredible pride: neither did he doute for the great authoritie the king and he had with the Pope, to diſpoſe him to publiſh iudicially the diuorce: The king opened readely his eares to this councell, not that he was caried with thoſe endes which the Cardinall of Yorke had faſhioned: But (according to thopithopinion of many) he tooke the chiefeſt reaſon of his inducement vpon the loue he bare to a Ladie of the Queenes traine whom he determined to make his wife: In which courſe of loue and chooſing, the king was ſo ſecret and priuate, that his pretence was neyther knowen to the Cardinall nor communicated with others, but when it beganne to burſt out eyther into knowledge or into coniecture, the Cardinall of Yorke that firſt inſinuated the mocion of diuorce, had no meane to diſſwade him from it, and leſſe authoritie to leade him in an other counſell then ſuche as he had perſwaded him before: But the king ſeeking to eſtabliſhe his conſcience vppon good groundes, ſearched out the opinions of Diuines, Lawyers, and men religious, of whom the moſt ſorte made him aunſwere that his firſt mariage was not ſounde nor lawfull, either for that their learning led them to beleue ſo, or elſe according to the cuſtome of men, they diſpoſed their knowledge to gratifie their Prince: Therefore as ſoone as the Pope was deliuered out of priſon, he diſpatched Embaſſadours to induce him to enter the league and to labour accordinge to the ordenaunce geuen for the reſtitucion of Rauenna: But the chiefeſt ende and induſtrie of theſe Embaſſadours conſiſted, to obteyne facultie to proceede in the diuorce, which he ſought not by way of diſpenſacion, but by declaracion that the mariage with Katherne was of noane effect: The king beleued that the Pope, for that his eſtate was weake in forces, and his perſon voyde of reputacion, and hauing no ſtay nor ſupporte vppon the puiſſance of other Princes, And laſtlie in recordacion of the greate fauours receiued of him for his deliuerie, he woulde not be vneaſie to conſent to the thing whereunto he was deepelie bounde by ſo many obligacions.

To which the king adioyned the conſideracion of the Cardinalls credit, whom he knewe for that he had alwayes fauored his affaires and affore him the doinges of Pope Leo, he was very gracious and mightye with the Pope: And to cut of from the Pope all excuſes of feare for any offence that might happen to him by thEmprour beeing ſonne of the ſiſter of Katherne, and the better to allure him with ſewertie, the Kinge offered to wadge for his ſauetye a garde of foure thowſande footemen: An offer which the Pope harkened vnto, and in that inclinacion though he conſidered the importance of the matter and the infamye that might redownde to him, yet beeing at Orbietta and aſyet in the condicion of a Newter betweene the Frenche Kinge and thEmprour, and of litle confidence with eyther of them, And in that regarde eſteeming muche to preſerue the amitye of the Kinge of Englande, he had no ſtomacke to impugne the kinges demaund: And albeit he declared in ſhowes and demonſtracions a ready deſire to be agreeable to the kinge, yet holding thinges in ſuſpenſe for the difficultie of the meanes that were proponed, he kindled ſo much the more the hope and importunitie of the king and his agents, which wellſpring or original of many aduerſities, tooke augmentacion and increaſſing dayly.

Aſſoone as the Pope had giuen audience to Monſr Vavvdemont and Monſr Longeuille, and aunſwered them with wordes generall, he diſpatched to the kinge togethe with Longeuille, the Biſhop of Piſtoya, to ſignifie vnto him, that beeing without money, without force, without authoritie, and wretched by all other priuacions, it could litle profit the confederats to haue him to declare: That onely he might doe a better office to ſolicite a peace, to which ende he had giuen him commiſſion to goe to thEmprour to exhort him with wordes ſharpe & rigorous to embraſe it: A matter which the king would not conſent vnto, not for that he remeyned ill contented of the Popes newtralitie but that he doubted the negociacion was extended to some further matter: Neither did thEmprour complayne that the Pope in so great a diſſenſion ſtoode indifferent.

Lawtrech entring into the Realme of Naples, Andre Dore retyreth from Genes.

But nowe at ſuch tyme as Monſr Lavvtrech marched and came on, and direction giuen that the armies by ſea ſhould doe the like, there were found many difficulties to giue impediment to thenterpriſe: for, the twelue gallies of the Venetians which before were reduced to Lyuorna, hauing ſuffred many vexacions in thexployt of Sardignia both by the rage of the ſea, and for want of vittells, departed the tenth of February from Lyuorna to goe to Corfu to readdreſſe and refurniſhe their wants: Neuertheleſſe the Venetians promiſed in their place, to ſende twelue other gallyes to ioyne with the Frenche armye by ſea, which was not without their difficulties for the perplexities they had paſſed, and for the controuerſies hapned betwene Andre Dore and Ranſo de Cere: by reaſon of which accidents albeit Ranſo remeyned ſicke at Pyſa, yet it was ſette downe that Andre Dore who with all the gallyes was come to the ſhoares of Lyuorna, ſhoulde with his fleete of gallyes ſet his courſe for the Realme of Naples: And Ranſo with the other Frenche gallyes and the foure of Fryer Bernardyn together with the foure of the Venetians, which were all aſſembled into one fleete, ſhoulde prepare for thenterpriſe of Sicilie: But Andre Dore with his eyght gallyes accompanied with eyght other of the French kings, croſſed ſayle and retyred to Genes, taking this excuſe that it was neceſſary both for him and his gallyes to take ſome reſt, eyther for that ſuch was the true ground and occaſion, or els the intereſts of the affayres of Genes caryed his mynde with an inclinacion to newe thoughtes: for, where the Genovvaies had demaunded of the king to ſuffer them to gouerne freely of them ſelues, and for that gift of libertie did offer him two hundred thowſand duckats: The king refuſing to gratifie a demaunde ſo farre from the common weale of his affayres, it was beleeued that Andre Dore eyther the Author or at leaſt the furtherer of theſe demaunds, held it not reaſonable that the king ſhould accompliſhe the conqueſt of Sicilie, if firſt he did not conſent to the libertie of the Genovvaies: There was alſo brought in queſtion an other cauſe of controuerſie which was of importance: for, the king hauing diſmembred the citie of Sauona from the Genovvaies, it was doubted leaſt moſt part of thentercourſe and trafficke of Marchaunts beeing transferred in ſhort tyme to Sauona in fauor of the king and for the oportunitie and ſituacion of the place, And that the king making there his ſtaple, and building veſſelles for his ſeruice, the citie of Genes woulde ſtand depriued of moſt part of her inhabitants and plenty of riches: Andre Dore employed all the arte and induſtrie he could to induce the king to reſtore Sauona to the auncient ſubiection of the Genovvaies.

But a farre better ſucceſſe and felicitie followed the enterpriſes of Lavvtrech, then the expedicions of the ſea, for that aſſoone as he was arriued at Askoly, and had ſent Peter Nauare with his footebands to Aquila, Ieramo and Iulia Noua were rendred to him at the firſt brute of his comming: The Marquis of Saluſſo by the ſame direction followed him with his regiments by the waye of Lyoneſſa: And laſt of all ſucceeded Horatio Baillon with an hundred and fiftye light horſemen, and foure thowſand footemen Florentyns of the blacke bands: The Venetians had alſo promiſed to ſend him without the perſon of the Duke of Vrbyn, foure hundred light horſemen and foure thowſand footemen of thoſe bands which they had in the towne of Rome: And in ſupply of the others which they were bownd to adminiſter & employ to the warres of Naples, they had accorded to paye three and twenty thowſand duckats

kats for euery moneth: Assuring also that for the regarde of the nauie at sea, they would aduaunce xxxvj. vessells to giue ayde to thenterprise of Sicilie: Neuertheles they gaue manifest signes that they were weary of the burden, and proceeded very slowly in the matter of exspenses, by whose example the French king did the like: seeing at the same time complaynts were comen from Monsr de Lavvtrech that the assignacion for an hundred and fifty thowsand crownes monthly for the charges of the warre which the king had made to him at his departure out of Fraunce, of which was to receiue about two hundred thowsand crownes, was reduced to three skore thowsand crownes onely the moneth, and that but for three monethes to come: A matter which as it brought no small greefe and dispaire to him, so he burst out in complaints against the king and his omission and carelesnes as not to be moued neither with reason, nor with his faith, nor with the memorie and example of his propper domage: This was one especiall poynt of his greefe and complayning, that where the king had conuerted to thenterprise of Fontarabye his treasors and forces which ought to haue serued him for the defense of Myllan, it was the cause to make him to lose the whole estate and Duchie of Myllan: The enterprise of Aquila succeeded happely, for that as Peter of Nauare made his approches, so the Prince of Melffy went out of it, & for the French king, did enter the sonne of the Count Montoiro: In like sort the launceknights of the Venetians tooke by composicion Ciuitella, A litle towne but well fortefied and hath his situacion seuen myles beyond Tronto: The taking of this towne was furthered by the preuencion of two hundred harquebuziers spanish who were sent for the defense of it: All Abruzza followed thexample of Aquila, & the whole residue of the Realme of Naples had done the like, had not th Imperiall army yssued out of Rome: This army after passion of many difficulties & tumults, and the souldiers fully satisfied of all their paies from the tyme of the Popes deliuery, marched out of Rome the seuenteene daye of February: A day which had bene most ioyfull and of speciall respiracion to the long miseries of the wretched people of Rome, if their calamities which they supposed to be ended by the departure of the launceknights, had not eftsoones recontinued in a newe course by the Abbot of Farfa and others of the famulie of the Vrsins, who entring the towne with the peysants of their dominions immediatly vppon the breaking vp of the others, did for many dayes many great insolencies: By reason of these calamities greeuous for their continuance, & lamentable for their wretched succession discending from one enemie yll, to an other that was worse, the citie of Rome was not onely made naked of a greate parte of her inhabitants with the desolacion of many houses and pallaices, But also it stoode rent and defaced, in images of worthy and auncient presence, of pillors representing the monument and memorye of greate Princes and Conquerors, of many singular stones for their vallue precious and for their raretye greately esteemed, and lastly of many ornaments of antiquitye suche as drewe delight to the eyes of the beholders, and gaue greate reputacion to the towne that so longe had preserued them: Neuertheless the launceknightes continuing in their mutynies and wouldenot departe without imprest for two payes, where the Spanyards were satisfied with more facilitye, The Pope desirous to purge the towne of suche a contagion, was constrayned to furnishe them with twentye thowsande duckatts more, which he payed vnder cooller to deliuer the two Cardinalls ostages: And afterwardes they reteyned twenty thowsand more as from the people of Rome, and albeit it was doubted that this pay was made by the Pope, yet it passed vnder that name to thend to giue lesse occasion of complaynt to Peter Nauare taketh Aquila.

The Imperial army yssueth out of Rome.

Lavvtrech: Who notwithstanding complayned not a litle that the Pope with that money was the cause that thImperiall armye went out of Rome, by which action his victory which was before manifest and certeyne, was nowe reduced to doubtfull tearmes and vncerteyne euents of warre: There yssued out of Rome according to computacion, fifteene hundred horse, foure thowsand footemen spanish, two or three thowsand footemen Italyans, and fiue thowsand launceknights: So great diminucion had the plague brought vppon that nation.

By the remouing of thImperialls out of Rome, Monsr Lavvtrech, who otherwayes would haue taken the straight waye to Naples, was constrayned to fetche a circuit more long by Povvylla along the sea coast: he had some reason to take that marche for the difficultie to drawe his artilleries if in these places he shoulde haue found impediment of ennemies to passe the Mounteine: But much more to make prouision of vittells least he fell into want if he happly were driuen to plant the courrse of his victorie before the walls of Naples, So that partly by compulsion, and partly vppon those reasons inducing, he tooke his way to Ciuita de Chiora the capitall towne of the furthermost Abruzza: for the water of Pescairo makes seperacion of the hethermost Abruzza from the furthermost: There did render vnto him Sermono with many other townes of the contry, and in that property of inclinacion, eyther for affection they boare to the French name, or for hatred to the Spanyards, there was almost no towne which sent not out at least xxv. and xxx. myles before, to yeld them selues: And yet because he would passe with a greater sewertie and stabilitie, he forbare to aduaunce with that diligence which both by his felicitie he might, and by his fortune was offred: And it was beleued to thend to gather in safetie during the moneth of Marche, the reuenue of the tribute of Povvylla amounting to foure skore thowsand duckats and was leauied in fiue townes, that he would send thether Peter Nauare with his regiments, for whose disagreements and controuersies which Monsr Lavvtrech was compelled to endure, there was litle good order in the armye: But being departed from Guast and vnderstanding that one parte of thennemies to whome was ioyned the Prince of Melffe with a thowsand of those launceknights which the Viceroy Don Charles had brought out of Spayne, and two thowsande Italyan footemen comen out of Aquila, was arriued at Nocero fortye myles from Termyny drawing towards the sea: And an other part of the ennemies to be passed to Campo Basso which is thirty miles from Termyny vppon the common or ordinary way to Naples: he sent out before Peter Nauare with his regiments of footemen, and went him selfe the last day of February to Sera within twelue myles of Termyny, from whence the fourth daye of Marche he arriued at Saint Seuero: But Peter Nouare according to the addresse that was giuen him, passed on, and in one day entred within Nocero, and in an other he gat into Foggio, making his entry at one gate when the Spanyards who were retyred to Troya, Barletta, & Manfredonia, would haue entred by the other: The conqueste of these places serued greatly for the reuitteling of the army.

The army that was with Monsr Lavvtrech conteyned in the whole foure hundred launces, and twelue thowsand footemen, men not very well prepared and trayned for the warre: But there were to ioyne to him, the Marquis of Salusso who marched before all the others, The regiments of the Venetians, and the blacke bands of the Florentyns, whome Lavvtrech desired not a litle to ioyne with him: for that bearing a name to be a Colonie of footemen as apt and resolute for assaults as any infanterie that then was in Italy, they serued as good examples and whetters on of the

residue of his armye, wherein were bodyes stronge and stable for the fight: But when he vnderstoode by the reapport of Peter Nauare whome he sent to take the view, that there were within Troya and the consynes about it, fiue thowsand Almains, fiue thowsand Spanyards, and fiueteene thowsand Italyans, And that for the bitternes of the cold that then was, he was not able to keepe the field, Monsr Lavvtrech the eyght of Marche went to Nocero with all the footemen and light horsemen: And the Marquis of Salusso newely arriued, put into Foggia with the men at armes and a thowsand footemen: Vppon which dispersing of the armye Monsr Lavvtrech gaue it out that he would giue battell if occasion offred, aswell for many reasons generally mouing, as chiefly for that the assignacions which the king had giuen to him, being withdrawen and diminished, he was not able long time to susteine the expenses of the warre: he left within Saint Seuero with a slender gard all thEmbassadors and other natures of people that were not apt for the warre. And so he seemed to be there in sewertie, without any necessitie or compulsion to giue battell but vppon aduauntage, neither had he want of vittells, though he lacked meale: Afterwards he yssued out the xij of Marche and tooke the field three myles beyond Nocero and within fiue myles of Troya: for, Nocero & Barletta which are distant one from another xij miles, are not further from Troya then eight miles: The Imperials who had now assembled together all the companies that were within Manfredonia and Barletta, & had plenty of vittells within Troya, yssued out to skirmish, though all the bands of footemen except the launceknights, were not payed: And the day following, they rooke the field without artilleries, in a strong place vppon the hill of Troya: But Lavvtrech the xiiij day inuironed that hil on the part aboue that loketh to the South, drawing towards the Mounteine: And turning his face to Troya, he began to ascend, where after he had wonne the hill in a hoat skirmishe, he incamped in a place that commaunded them, from whence he compelled them with his artilleries to retyre some into the towne and some backe againe: So that both the towne of Troya and the Imperiall army remeyned betwene the french army and Saint Seuero: which both made vneasie the passage of succours that might haue comen to Naples, and also stopped for the most part the vittells that might haue bene brought to them, Notwithstanding they consumed not much as being discharged of all vnprofitable mouthes and the generall baggage and traine of the armye: And on the other side was stopped by them the trafficke of vittells that passed from Saint Seuero to the French campe, besides that they helde in daunger Saint Seuero which they might assault with parte of their people and the French not to perceiue it.

The armies lying incamped in this sort, that is to say the french men beyond Troya towards the mounteine, And the Imperials on this side towards Nocero at the backe of the towne, And the most part of the places thereabouts being cõmaunded by the french: They remeined there in that order vntil the xix. day, al the nights being spent in alarmes, & the daies rõning out in skirmishes, in one of which was taken prisoner Martio Colonno: The Imperials oftentimes cut of the vittels that went from Saint Seuero & Foggia to the french armye, which for that impediment felt some incommoditie, & had neede of a strong eskort or cõduit to defend the vittellers. Here the Imperialists drew into councel what was to be done, Amongst whom the Marquis of Guast perswaded to offer the battel, seing the french army went on increasing daily, & theirs was more & more weakned: But the councell of capteine Alerson caried most authoritie, who proued by reasons & argumẽts that there was more hope of the victory in temporising & suffring the time, then by aduaũcing to referre things to the

arbitracion of fortune: The xix. daye thImperialls retyred within Troya to eſchewe the continual vexacions of thartilleries of thennemies: But hauing afterwards rampared their place againſt the furie of the ſhot, they repayred thether againe in good ſeaſon, and returned in yll time within Troya: But the xxj. daye at the appearing of the morning, they brake vp and went towardes the mounteine to Ariano making a great dayes marche: They found within Troya a great quantitie of vittells farre ſurmounting that which the French men beleued before, And hauing cut of all paſſages by the which vittells might be brought to them, they made to them ſelues a vaine promiſſe of the victorie: it was then they leauied and brake vp, eyther to draw the French into a place where they might find want of vittells, or for an intelligence they had, that the day following they exſpected in their campe the blacke bands: Who as they marched beeing lodged in Aquila, had in their inſolencie ſacked that citie, not being prouoked by iniurie, or other occaſion: The xxij. day Lavvtrech incamped at Lyoneſſa vppon the riuer of Ofanto which the Latyns call Aufidium, ſix miles from Aſcoly, hauing ſent the blacke bands and Peter Nauare with his regiments and two Cannons, to take Melffo: Where after they had battred a ſmall breach, the Gaſcoins preſented them ſelues to the wall, and the black bands with more furie then good direction of their Capteines did the like: Wherein the one nation ſeruing with an emulacion of the other, and they both being well beaten in flanke by ſmall ſhot, the aſſalt was repulſed with the death of many Gaſcoins and three skore of the blacke bands: And the ſame furie continuing, they ranne the like fortune the next day in an other aſſalt which they gaue, after the battery had executed: But in the night there came to the campe a ſuccour of artilleries ſent by Monſr Lavvtrech, with the which hauing made two great battries the morning following, the payſants within Melffa began in their feare to draw into tumult: by which accident the ſouldiers being in number ſix hundred, & troubled in their ordinary office of ſeruice by the mutinie of the payſants which ſtill redoubled into worſe degrees, they abandoned the defenſe of the place: Inſomuch as the whole campe entring where no reſiſtance was made, they turned their felicitie into blood, ſlaying in their furie all the payſants & men of the towne: Onely the ſouldiers retyred into the caſtell together with the Prince, who not long after yeelded ſimply as was ſayde, to diſcreſſion notwithſtanding they pretended that their liues were excepted: The Prince was ſaued with a very fewe of his followers, all the others were put to the ſword, conteyning three thowſand bodies, & the towne deliuered vp to ſacking: In the towne was found great ſtore of vittells to the great commoditie and comforting of the French men, who, for their hard prouiſion, ſuffred no ſmall wants in Povvylla: The xxiiij day the Spanyards departed from Ariano and incamped at Tripaldo which is xxv. myles from Naples vppon the high waye, and xl. myles from Ofanto: with whome ioyned the Viceroy, the Prince of Salerno, and Fabricio Maramo with a regiment of three thowſand footemen and twelue peeces of artilleries: it was thought alſo that Captaine Alarſon yſſued out of Naples with two thowſand footemen to ſuccour Dogania: But Lavvtrech ſtayed vpon the territories of Ofanto to make great prouiſions of money, & had all his cõpanies incamped betwene Aſcalo & Melffe: And ſince the accident of Melffe, were rendred to him Barletto, Trany and all the townes thereabouts except Manfredonia wherein was a ſtrength of a thowſand footemen: In this ſucceſſe and rendring of townes, he ſent out Peter Nauare with foure thowſand footemen to take the rock of Venoſa, which being garded & valliantly defended by ij hundred & fifty ſpaniſh footemen, he tooke it at laſt to diſcreſſion, & reteyning the Capteines priſoners

ners, he sent away the others without weapõs: And there he had giuen order that the reuenue of the tribute of Povvilla should be receyued for him, which for the troubles & impediments which the warre brought, aũswered not the value & price that were wont to rise by it. In this place the commissarie Pisano with the Venetian regimentes conteining about two thousande footemen, came to Monsr Lavvtrech, who in this sorte was busied to assure him selfe of vittells and prouisions, A matter which was made more easie to him, after he had got into his power Ascoly by the meane of the Venetian regimentes: And at this tyme rising into courage by the happy euent of his affayres, he vrged the Pope with hawty wordes to declare him selfe for the league: Who notwithstanding they of Viterbo would not before receyue him for their gouernour (of which Octauian Spirito was the cause) yet beeing afterwardes raunged and made plyable through feare, he had transported his Court to Viterba: And Vespasian Colonno being dead at the same time, who ordeyned by his testament that Isabell his onely daughter shoulde be maryed to Hipolito de Medicis, the Pope vnder that cooller gatte possession of all those places which he helde in the territories of Rome, notwithstanding Askanio pretended that they apperteyned to him by the ceassing of the line masculine of Prospero Colonno. About this time Monopoly was rendred to the Venetians, for whome and to whose vse according to the laste couenauntes made with the French king, were gotten all those portes of the realme of Naples which they possessed before they were ouerthrowen by king Lovvis the xij. in Guiaradada.

By reason of these prosperities of the French, the Duke of Ferrara was induced to sende his sonne into Fraunce to accomplish and giue perfection to the mariage: A matter which he had deferred before by great industrie, refusing with the same policie to be Capteine of the League: But themprour who sent no men out of Spayne to releeue the daungers of the kingdome of Naples, had giuen ordenance that the Duke of Brunsvvich should passe out of Germanie into Italy with new supplies of Launceknights for the succour of that kingdome: These supplies were prepared with so muche the more care and diligence, by how muche they vnderstoode the necessitie to reskew it was great for the comming on of Monsr Lavvtrech. But to thende the aduauncing of those supplyes should not trouble the hope of the victorie, it was agreed by the consent of the king of Englande, the French king, and the Venetians, that the Lorde Frauncis of Saint Poll, discended of the house of Burbon, should passe into Italy with foure hundred launces, fiue hundred light horsmen, fiue thousande footemen Frenche, two thousande Svvizzers, and two thousande Launceknightes: This armie was appoynted to followe them if they passed to Naples, and otherwise, to make warre vppon the Duchie of Millan, adioyning to them the regimentes of the Venetians and the bandes of Frauncis Sforce: For the defrayment of this armie, was set downe a paye of threescore thousande duckets monthly: of which the king of Englande was to contribute euery moneth thirtie thousand: And the Venetians had resolued in the counsell of Pregati, to wage ten thousande footemen.

Monsr S. Pol appoynted to the warres of Italy.

In this time the inhabitants of Millan were reduced to an extreme and miserable subiection for the intollerable exactions imposed by Antho. de Leua: who the better to prouide for the payes of his souldiours, had drawne into his owne handes all the vittells of the Citye, and hauing bestowed them in publike storehouses and Garniers, he solde them in his owne name at what rate or prise he would, the inhabitantes beeing driuen to buy them according to his lawe, or else to dye for hunger:

And yet the money rayſed vppon that extreme meane, beeing not ſufficient to pay the Launceknightes that were lodged in houſes, they were ſuffred to make dayly raunſomes of the maiſters and owners, of whome ſuche as woulde yeelde no money, were kept in chaynes and yrons: And becauſe to auoyde ſo great cruelties and intollerable impoſtes, many dyd flee continually out of the Citie notwithſtanding the rigour of the commaundementes and diligence of the warders, there was confiſcation of goodes publiſhed agaynſt ſuche as were abſent, who were ſo many in number, that to auoyde the trouble to ſette them downe in writing, they cauſed them to be putte in print: The Nobles and beſt ſorte of Citizens ſuche as remayned there, were ſeene in their garmentes poore and ragged, and in their countenances aſtoniſhed and deſolate, expreſſing by a lamentable compaſſion, the calamities they endured, And their pallaces and places of beſt frequentation were reduced to ruines and rubbege, ſuche as were heauye teſtimonies of the crueltie of the Spaniardes. And yet all thinges ſucceeded happely to hym that was the cauſer of all theſe miſeries: For where Capteine Mus laye incamped at Lecqua with ſixe hundred footemen as a ſouldiour of the League, and hauing taken awaye the barkes to thende the Spaniardes that were within Coma, could not reskew it by the waye of the lake: Antho.de Leua with the bandes of footemen that were within Nouaro iſſued out of Millan and incamped fifteene myles beyonde with the Launceknightes: And after he had taken the Rocke of Olgina ſtanding vpon the ſhores of Adda, which capteine Mus had taken before: he ſent Phillip Toruiello with the bands of footemen Spaniſh & Italians, to giue ſuccours to Lecqua ſtanding vpon the other ſhore of the lake, where capteine Mus with the ayde of the ſouldiors whom he had drawne from the Venetians and Duke of Millan, and with certayne peeces of artilleries from the Venetian campe, had taken and fortified all the paſſages, of themſelues conteining many difficulties for the ſteepenes of the mountaynes and other places of hard acceſſe: But thimperialls who tooke the mountayne oppoſite that commaundeth Lecqua, after they had made many vayne attemptes to paſſe in many places, at laſte they forced that place where the Venetian ſouldiours garded, Companies whom the Capteine eyther for that he had leſſe confidence in their vertue, or at leaſt to beſtow them where was leaſt daunger, had diſperſed into places moſte ſtepe & inacceſſible. Capteine Mus with his ſouldiors and artilleries, was eſtſones remounted vpon the barkes and ſaued himſelfe, not without ſuſpicion that the Venetians had made a light defence to gratifie the duke of Millan, to whom it was nothing agreable that he tooke Lecqua: And afterwards to thende to cary by accorde that which he could not winne by armes, he changed both the ſeruice & pay wherin he was, and goeth to thimperials, obteining of Anth.de Leua by way of accord for reward of that infidelity, both Lecqua and many other places: And he got of Ieronte Moron, who by letters & intelligence had bin the author of this practiſe, ceſſion of his rights: By reaſon of this accord Anth.de Leua who before had bin much afflicted by hunger, was releeued both with vittells & money: for the capteine who aſpiring to high and great things, tooke afterwardes vppon him the title of Marquis, payed thirtie thouſand duckets, and ſent into Millan three thouſand ſackes of corne.

During all this while Monſr Lauvtrech marched towardes Naples, and by the thirde daye of Aprill was come to the Rocke Manarda, hauing lefte for the garde of Povvilla (where onely Manfredonia held for themprour) fiftie men at armes, two hundred light horſemen, and xv. hundred or two thouſand footmen, all bands of the Venetians: But the imperials who had reſolued in abandoning al the countrey thereabout, about,to laye onely for the defence of Naples and Caietta, and to cutte off vittelles from thennemies; after they had ſackt Nola, and caryed to Naples all the vittelles that were within Capua: they incamped vppon the hill of Saint Martin, and the daye following entred within Naples with tenne thouſande footemen Spaniſh and Launceknightes, hauing decaſſed the bandes of the Italians, except ſixe hundred who were vnder Fabricio Maramo, for that Sero Colonno was gone to Abruzza with his bandes of footemen. Naples was very naked of inhabitantes,for that almoſte all men of qualitie,and ſuche to whom their fortune had yet leſte any meane, were retyred into Iſchia, Capria, and other Ilands confining: It was ſuppoſed that there was within the towne ſufficient prouiſion of corne for more then two monethes,but for fleſhe and other natures of vittelles, the quantities were very ſmall. Capua, Nola, Acero, Auerſa, and all the places thereabout yeelded to Monſr Lavvtrech, who remayned foure dayes with his army in the Abbey of Acero whiche is ſeuen myles from Naples: He had aduaunced and did ſtill marche with a verye ſlowe paſe, to thend to tary for the vittells which could not obſerue the ſpeede of the armie for thimpediment of fowle wayes and raynes, ſuche as had made all the countrey full of waters: Beſides,it behoued him to make great prouiſions of vittels: for that the brute ranne that his armie according to the corruption of the diſcipline of warre at this daye, conteyned more then twentie thouſand horſemen, and foureſcore thouſande footemen, of whom two partes were men vnprofitable for ſeruice: From this place he ſent out to the enterpriſe of Calabria, Simon Roman with an hundred and fiftie light horſemen, and fiue hundred Corſegnans not payed, but were come from the campe of thimperialls: And Phillip Dore who with eyght gallies of Andre Dore and two ſhippes was come into the waters of Naples, bothe tooke a ſhippe laden with grayne, and with his artilleries draue the Imperialls from Magdelaine: And albeit with the ſame vallour and fortune he tooke a little afterwards two other ſhippes loaden with grayne, and brought vppon thennemies many other diſcommodities, yet his gallies onely were not ſufficient to holde the port of Naples wholly beſieged: for the helpe whereof Lavvtrech ſolicited that the ſixteene gallies of the Venetians mighte be ioyned with the fleete of Phillip: Theſe after they were with ſlowe diligence aſſembled in order at Corfu, were nowe come vp to the port of Trany: But notwithſtanding the Cities of Trany and Monopoly were alreadye rendred to the Venetians,yet thoſe gallies preferring their particular profites before forreine intereſtes,though they knewe that all things depended vppon the victorie of Naples, yet they were ſlowe to aduaunce, to thend to take alſo Pulignano, Ottronto, and Brunduſo. The ſeuententh daye of Aprill Lavvtrech incamped at Cauiano within fiue myles of Naples, And the ſame daye the light horſemen of thimperialls whoſe celeritie and diligence appeared farre greater then the negligence of the Frenchmen, tooke from the French a great quantitie of vittells,a prouiſion which they were not well furniſhed of: They had alſo fortified Saint Hermo, whiche is in the toppe of the mount Saint Martin, and commaundes muche the towne of Naples, to thend to take from the French men all commodities to vex it with their artilleries, And for that they were maiſters of that mountayne,they gaue impedimēt to the French to approche neare the moſte partes of the Citie. The Frenche men tooke ſome hope of good euent by the diſcordes that were amongeſt thennemies, of whom the Marquis of Guaſt for ſome particular quarrell,hurt the Count Potenſa and ſlewe his ſonne: But the xxj. daye the Frenche army came to Caſoria within three myles of Naples vppon the waye of Auerſa: And the ſame daye was embraſed of both parties a skirmish vnder the walles of Naples, wherein was slayne Migliato, he who had impugned by all his industrie the deliuery of the Pope, for the whiche he was the bearer of the Emprours Commission to his Capteines: The xxij. daye the armie incamped within a myle and an halfe of Naples, where Monsr Lavvtrech forbad his souldiours to skirmish, as a matter vnprofitable to the estate of the seruice: There was Pozzolo rendred to him. At last, beeing the last but one of Aprill, he brought his armie very neare the Citie of Naples, and incamped betwene Poggio Royall which is a stately house for pleasure and buylded by Alfonso of Aragon the seconde when he was Duke of Calabria, and the hill of Saint Martin: The campe was extended euen within halfe a myle of Naples, and the person of Monsr Lavvtrech laye somewhat before Poggia Royall at the pallace of the Duke de Monte Alto: In this place he had made great fortification, stretching out the face of his lodging towardes the way of Capua: It was a place of very good situation, and aptly seruing to cutte of from them of Naples the commoditie of the water conduits that come from Poggia Royall: He made account to plant an other lodging somewhat before that, aboue the hyll that is beneath the mount Saint Hermo, to thende to cutte off more commodities from those of Naples, and to vexe the towne more nearer. But to haue a more true and perfect information of these matters, it were necessarie to set downe by description the situation of the Citie of Naples, and the countrey thereaboutes.

THVS Monſr Lavvtrech hauing reduced his whole armie vnder the walles of Naples, the firſt thing he drew into conſultation was, whether it were beſt to attempt thexpugnation of the towne with the furie of artilleries, and vallour of men: An action wherevnto many of his Capteines aduiſed him, wiſhing that for the better execution of thenterpriſe, the regimentes of footemen might be encreaſed with newe numbers: They alleaged manye difficulties, in regarde of whiche there could be no hope to enterteyne the army any long ſpace before the towne: The firſte difficultie conſiſted in vittelles, the traffike and reaſort whereof was alwayes in daunger by the inroades of thennemies, who hauing many companies of light horſemen, commaunded by their incurſions all the wayes and paſſages of the feeldes: The ſeconde impediment reſted in the hope very vncertayne that Naples would render for famine, by reaſon the gallies of Phillip Dore beeing not ſufficient to holde the porte beſieged or reſtrayned, and the Venetian gallies not aryuing notwithſtanding they were promiſed dayly: there came from Caietta to Naples foure gallies laden with meale, and by the weake defence of the hauen, other veſſells entred the towne dayly with releefe: The thirde doubt was referred to the colde prouiſions of the Venetians, who beeing taxed to paye monthly to Monſr Lavvtrech xxij. thouſande duckets, were already become behind with him for lx. thouſande. The ſucceſſe of thenterpriſe ſtood alſo deſperate both by the ſlender releefe of money that came out of Fraunce, and alſo by the maladies and diſeaſes that generally reigned in the armie, ſuche as did not proceede ſo much by the ſtinche and ordinarie corruption of that ayre, which by cuſtome beginneth to deliuer infection in the ende of Sommer, as through the great quantities of raynes that fell, whiche by ſo muche more offended the armie, by howe muche moſte parte of the ſouldiours laye in the open fieldes, hauing no other couer then the skye: yet neuertheleſſe Lavvtrech conſidering that in ſo great a multitude and vertue of defendantes wherein he knewe to conſiſt not the leaſt difficultie, and for the fortification of the mount Saint Martin which laye apte to be ſuccoured, it would be an action very harde eyther to take the hill, or to force the towne, And happly foreſeeing not to exſpend his money with ſmall hopes, fearing to want for the furniſhment of exſpences ordinary: tooke this reſolution not to aſſault the towne, but to beſiege it: hoping that in very ſhort time the enemies would fall into the wante of vittells to feede their bodies, or money to conteyne the ſouldiours: So that vnder thoſe hopes, and the reaſons and conſiderations of them, he conuerted his whole mynde and all hys prouiſions to the beſieging of Naples, cutting off all meanes of acceſſe or reaſort of vittelles by lande, and ſoliciting the comming of the Venetian gallies to reduce the towne to an abſolute priuation of releefe by ſea: And yet altering his reſolution in ſome poyntes, he ſet the campe at libertie to skirmiſh, leaſt the ſouldiours liuing without action might become effeminate and abated in vallour: In ſo muche as there paſſed many skirmiſhes betwene the campe and the defendantes of the towne, to the great commendation of the ſouldiours of the blacke bands, who being moſt reſolute and ready in that kinde of fighting by the diſcipline of Iohn de Medicis, had not as yet made anye ſhowe of their vallour in the playne fielde in any battell pitched and raunged where they were to keepe their ground, and eyther to be founde dead or liuing in the places appoynted to them. About this tyme came to the armie foureſcore men at armes of the Marquis of Mantua, and an hundred from the Duke of Ferrara, who notwithſtanding he had bene amply receyued into the protection of the French king and the Venetians, yet he deferred ſo long as he could to ſende to tharmie, reſeruing to him ſelfe to dreſſe and regulate his deliberations according to the conieƈture and iudgement of the accidents and euentes of the warre.

In this eſtate and condition of affayres thImperialles were not without their hope to bee hable to breake the fleete of Phillip Dore, who roade wyth his Gallies in the gulfe of Salerne: In whiche enterpriſe they reapoſed not their fundation and hope ſo muche in the numbers and goodnes of their veſſelles, as in the vallour and dexteritie of their ſouldiours: For they furniſhed ſixe Gallies, foure Foyſtes, and two Brigantins, with a thouſande harquebuſiers Spaniſh, and that of the moſte approued and beſt choyſe of the armie: And with them entred as commaunders, Don Hugo Viceroy accompanied almoſte with all the Capteines and perſonages of authoritie: To this armie by ſea diſpoſed and gouerned by the direction of Gobbo a ſtowte and famous Capteine for ſea ſeruice, were adioyned many Barkes of fyſhermen, to thende to aſtoniſh thennemies a farre of through the multitude and number of veſſelles appearing: This fleete departed from Poſſilipo, and by a directe courſe made with the Ile of Caprio, where Don Hugo to the great preiudice of that exployte, loſte tyme to heare a Spaniſhe Hermit, who vnder reaſons and perſwaſions of hys profeſſion, inflamed them to feight according to the glory of that nation gotten in ſo manye victories. From thence, leauyng on the lefte hande the Cape of Minerua, they entred into the mayne ſea, and ſente before two Gallies with thys direction, that beeing come within ſighte of the ennemies, they ſhoulde make ſhowe as thoughe they woulde giue backe and flee to thende to drawe thennemies into the mayne to feighte. But Phillippe Dore beeing aduertiſed the day before by verye faythfull and aſſured

eſpialls

espialls of the intention and stratageme of the enemies, dispatched a messenger with diligence to Monsr Lavvtrech, to sende to him foorthwith three hundred harquebuziers, who being commaunded by Captaine Croche, were arriued with Phillip Dore a litle before the Nauie of the enemies were discouered: Whiche when he beheelde a farre of resembling for the nomber of vessels, a huge wood replenished with manye strong trees, notwithstanding he hadde before with great courage aduaunced all necessarie preparations to execute the fight, yet the consideration and viewe of the vessels giuing him manye timerous impressions, he stoode long suspended betweene hope and feare: But he was presentlye deliuered of that perplexitie, when by the drawing neare of the fleete of the enemies, he discerned them to conteyne not aboue sixe vessells of helme: Therefore with a courage resolute and as a Captaine well experienced in the warres by sea, he caused to enlarge and as it were he caste of as though they woulde runne awaye, three other gallies of his to the ende that with spooning afore the sea and winning the wynde, they might in their time charge the enemies both in side and in powpe: And the personne of him selfe with fiue gallies made directlye with the front of the enemies, who were to discharge their artilleries to take from him by the thickneſſe of the smoke, both his leuell and his viewe: But Phillip to turne vppon them selues the daunger he sawe prepared for hym, gaue fyre to a verie greate basiliske, whose force caryed his charge with great violence thorowe the gallie Admirall of the enemie, wherein was the person of Don Hugo, and at the first shoote, killed fourtie men, of whom the Captaine of the gallie was one with many officers and men of place. This furie of the basiliske he folowed with all his other sortes of artilleries by whom were executed and hurt many bodies of the enemies: who for their partes lost no time both to defende and endomage, for that the artilleries of the gallie of Don Hugo being fiered at a token giuen, slewe the Captaine and Patron of the gallie of Phillip: In whiche medlye the greate artilleries hauing done their execution, the gallies by the helpe of their oares, drewe neare one to another, and with their small shotte and other furies whiche men in fight doe vse beganne a blooddie fight: In whiche the Genovvais who were not without trayning and experience in such encounters, hadde better meanes to auoyde the perill by fighting lowe and as it were bowing downe standing vppon theyr gardes within the bodie of the pauishes or couertes: As these two gallies were in fight together with a woonderfull furie and astonishment, three other gallies of th Imperialls obseruing their aduauntage inuironed straightly two of the Genovvayes, and hadde alreadie gotte the vpperhande: But the three first gallies of Genovvay those that were shaked of and made as though they ranne away, were gotte into the mayne sea, and with the fauour of the wynde came with a fierce charge vppon the enemies, and playing in flanke vppon the gallie Admirall, they reuersed with a shot the mayne yarde of the gallie, called the Neptune which did no smal domage to her seruice: There Don Hugo hauing already a wound in his arme, whileſt he was laboring to encourage his souldiers & neuer was free frō the daunger of stones and wyldefyers which were throwen from the tops of the enemies gallies, was slaine in fighting, giuing by his death an honourable testimonie of his vallour and fidelitie: There the Admirall of Phillip and the gallie called the More rent in peeces the Admirall of Don Hugo, and the other two, with their artilleries ſonke the gallie of Gobbo wherein Fieromoſquo died: And in the meane while the other gallies of Phillip hadde reskewed and recouered two gallies of their companie ſore preſſed and afflicted by the Spanyardes, and in that action had taken their foyſtes: Onely two Spaniſhe gallies not without ſome greeuous teſtimonie of the encounter, fell of from the fight, ſeeing the abſolute victorie of the enemies: The Marquis of Guaſt and Askanio, their gallie being in perill both of water and fyre, their oares broken and their ſouldiers bleeding in their deadlye woundes, were made priſoners, the ſhyning of their armours being gylt preſeruing their lyues which their vallour could not doe.

In this battell Phillip was much holpen by certaine captiues whom he deliuered, who being for the moſt part Turkes and Mores ſhowed their cruelty in the fight, accordinge to the cuſtome of thoſe nations: The dead bodie of Don Hugo was caſt into the ſea without other ceremonie or regarde of his greatneſſe, and likewiſe Fieromoſquo: The principalls of the priſoners of this battell, were the Marquis of Guaſt, Askanio Colonno, the Prince of Salerne, Saintcroſs, Camille Colonno, Gobbo, Serenon, with manye other Captaines and gentlemen of marke: The dead bodies of this battell conteyned more then a thowſande footemen, and of the Spanyardes there were verie fewe who were not eyther ſlayne or greeuouſlie wounded: The priſoners with three gallies were ſent by Phillip to Andre Dore, and one of the two gallies that eſcaped, paſſed not long after to the pay and ſeruice of the French.

By this victorie as the Frenchmen roſe into great hopes of good ſucceſſe for the generall enterpriſe, wherein happelie their preſuming was not without preiudice, for that it reduced Lavvtrech to a more negligence or omiſſion in the prouiſions that were to be made: So on the other ſide it repleniſhed the imperialls with no ſmall feare and aſtoniſhment to fall into wante of vittels, ſeeyng both they remayned depriued of all commaundement by ſea, and alſo the fauors of the lande were taken from them in many partes, but eſpeciallie ſince the loſſe of Pozzolo a place whiche adminiſtred a great traffike of vittels to Naples: And the towne of Naples was alreadie fallen into great wantes of meale and fleſhe, and the ſtore of their wine wel waſted: In ſo much as being through their neceſſitie driuen to folowe the examples and cruelties of men of warre in that caſe, the daye after the ouerthrowe at ſea, they put out of the Citie no ſmall nombers of mouthes vnprofitable, and eſtabliſhing orders for the diſtribution of vittels, they prouided in any wiſe that the Launceknights ſhoulde haue leſſe wantes then the other ſouldiours: By theſe expulſions and good informacion of their other doings within the towne, Lavvtrech nouriſhed his firſt hope which was alſo wel encreaſed and confirmed by a ſurpriſe made of a Brigantyn the ſeuenth daye of Maye wherein he founde by certaine letters written to the Emperour by his Captaines, that the flower of the armie was loſte, The towne was not prouided of corne for a moneth and a halfe, that they were driuen to grynde theyr meale with the force of theyr handes, that the Launceknightes beganne to incline to tumult, that there was no money to furniſh their pay, and that there remayned remayned no remedie for his affayres, vnleſſe he comforted them with a ſpeedie prouiſion of money and ſuccours both by ſea and land: To which extremities was not forgot to be adioyned the ſtroke of the plague begunne in Naples which is ſo much the more contagious where Launcknightes doe frequent, by howe much in their rudeneſſe they forbeare not to conuerſe with ſuche as are infected, and muche leſſe to manage and vſe in their owne perſons, anye thing that was theirs.

On the other ſide the French men were not free from thoſe afflictions and calamities which a warre trayneth after it: They ſuffered great want of water for that from Poggio Royall, euen vnto the front of the armie, the campe was ſerued onely with ceſternes: The malladies of the campe went on multiplying and encreaſing, which diminiſhed not a litle the ſtrength of the armie: And the enemies being farre aboue them in light horſemen, made continual ſallies eſpecially by the way that leadeth to Soma, and did not onely bring to the reliefe of the towne much fleſhe and many ſortes of wines, but alſo cut of oftentimes the traffike of vittels that paſſed to the French campe: Many of the Captaines dealt with Lavvtrech to wage more companies of light horſemen to oppoſe againſt the cauallerie of the enemie, which he did not onely refuſe to doe, contrarie to good foreſight and order of warre, but alſo he gaue ſufferaunce to the moſt part of the French horſemen to lie diſperſed within Capua, Auerſa, and Nola, a matter which made eaſie to the enemies all their exploytes: others perſwaded him for that diſeaſes had done much to diminiſh the infanterie or footmen of the armie, to leuie a proporcion of ſeuen or eight thowſand footmen, aſwel to ſupplie the weaknes of the armie, as to be more ſtrong and mightie according to their deſire in the beginning: A counſel which as he had begunne to denie alreadie, ſo he ſtoode reſolute to refuſe it ſtill, alleadging that he had no money, notwithſtanding he had at that time receiued from Fraunce a conuenient prouiſion, and had gathered the tribute of the cattell of Powille together with the taxation of the townes which he had taken, and laſtly the Barons of the Realme that were with him were readie to lende him any reaſonable quantitie of money he woulde require: By which experience I may ſay that it is a worke worth the labour, to obſerue and conſider what diſorders are bredde by the obſtinacie of thoſe that are preferred to great thinges, or do manage the place of high authoritie: for Monſr Lavvtrech no dout the principall captaine of the Realme of Fraunce, as he caryed with him a long experience in matters of warre and enterpriſe, and commaunded in the armie with great reſpect and authoritie: So on the other ſide he was by nature hawtie and imperius, and hauing a ſinguler weening in him ſelfe, would reiect the counſel of all others, and ſtopping his eares from the reaſons of other men, he interpreted it to his diſhonour that the worlde ſhoulde perceyue that he gouerned not alwayes by his owne arbitracion and iudgement: In which conceyte of ſingularitie and weening, he refuſed to make thoſe prouiſions whiche if he hadde accompliſhed, might happlie haue giuen him the victorie, but being reiected, were the cauſes that the enterpriſe begunne with ſo great a hope was paſſed into extreame ruine: The ſouldiers of the blacke bands who were lodged in the front of the armie, skirmiſhed dayly, wherein running on in the humour of their courage and forwardneſſe, they woulde oftentimes preſſe ſo neare the walles of Naples, that the ſmall ſhotte within the towne had power of them, and in their retyring becauſe they hadde not horſemen to backe them, they fel into the mercie of the horſemen of the enemies: In ſo much as prouing to their harmes the disaduauntage to make skirmishes without horsemen vnder the walles of Naples, they began to giue ouer the often practise of the thing, which so often had brought them harme.

After this victorie by sea, the towne of Stabia standing vpon the sea side, yeelded to Monsr Lavvtrech, but not the Castel, by whose example also was rendred Saint Iermyne: And by this successe and victorie of the fleete, the garrisons that were within Caietta hauing recouered Fondy and the countrey there abouts, Lavvtrech dispatched thyther Don Ferrand of Caietta, sonne to the Duke of Tracetta, and the Prince of Melffe, he who had newly contracted with the Frenchmen taking his reason vpon the omission of thimperials, whose Captaines he thought were careless to deliuer him: Moreouer, the streame of victorie running with many courses, Simon Romaine at the same time made a great aduancement in Calabria, much helping him in that action the readines and inclinacion of the people crying with great affection vpon the name of the French.

But all these exploytes for their qualitie good and happie, and for their maner honourable and full of valour, were not sufficient to carie the victorie of the warre, for that it depended wholly eyther vpon the conquering or vpon the defending of Naples: The same inducing Monsr Lavvtrech who chiefly applied the siege & not altogether desperate to take the towne by force for the slaughter of so many of their good souldiers of Spanyards at the battell vpon the sea, solicited earnestly the comming of the French and Venetian Nauie to the end to depriue whollie that Citie of all vittels that might be brought to it by sea: he caused also to remoue the campe and planted it in front vpon a hil both more neare Naples, and more commaunding the Mount Saint Martin: Where the blacke bands cast a trenche, not onely to drawe from that hill a trench, which being stretched out to the sea side and hauing vpon that end to the seawarde a bastilion, closed vp the way of Somma: But also to the end that immediatly after the sea armies were come, they might with better oportunitie cary by force the Mount Saint Martin, hauing cut out before, an other trench betweene the citie and the Mount to stoppe them for succouring one another: And afterwards at one time to execute Naples by water with the sayd armies by sea and land, beating it within from the front of their campe, and vexing it without with one part of the armie, and conuerting the other part to inuade the Mount: So might the enemies, whose necessities to defende so many seuerall places would driue them to deuide their forces, be more easely ouercome in some place: And yet they helde it not good to abandon Poggio Royall, though the front of the campe were farre of, to thende that if the enemies did recouer it, they should not cut from them the commoditie of fresh waters, onely they closed vp their campe behinde or on the backside.

These counsels and deuises albeit they were considered with great skil and knowledge in warre, yet many difficulties were opposed against them: first the trenches conteyning more then a mile euen to the sea, could not be cast with speede aswell for want of pioners to laye out the worke, as for the diseases of the souldiers being weakned from all hardnes of labour: secondly (which was very necessary for the besieging and inuasion of the towne) the armies by sea did not come, for that neyther Andre Dore with his gallies that were at Genes did stirre, neither was there any aduertisement of the comming of the Nauie prepared at Marceilles, and also the Venetians regarding more their profit particuler then the benefite generall and common, or rather respecting lesse, interests principall, then ends more inferior and accidentall,

employed their Nauie at the expedition of Brunduſa and Ottranta: of which cities Ottranta had couenanted to yeeld, if within ſixteene dayes it were not reskued, and for Brunduſa notwithſtanding it had receyued by accorde the Venetians, yet the Caſtel helde good for th Emperour, whereof the one hauing a ſtrong ſituacion vpon the ſea, gaue ſmall hope to be taken, and the other ſtanding within the towne and of greater circuite then the other, ſeemed not to be able to make long reſiſtaunce for that it had loſt two rockes: The xij. day of May they made a battrie with thartilleries vpon the hill, which executed a torret that vexed not a litle the fielde: They ſhot oftentimes alſo into the towne but that offended litle, and many skirmiſhes were performed at Saint Anthonies: The ſixteenth day the artilleries being planted vpon the top of the mountaine vpon certaine torrets betweene Saint Gennaraes gate and the gate of Capua, and kept them alſo from erecting a baſtilion whiche the defendants had begunne: within the towne moſt mouthes were fedde with ſodden corne, & for feare of extreme famine, they deliuered the towne dayly of many nombers of people whom the calamities of the warre had reduced to a harde election, either to languiſh in famine within the towne in the eyes and compaſſion of their friends, or to runne to the mercie of the enemie in whom it was not reaſonable they ſhoulde hope for ſauetie and ſuccour, hauing ſo iuſtly offended them: And the Launcknightes notwithſtanding they ſuffred leſſe then the other nations of ſouldiers, yet both for want of bread and farre greater neceſſities of wine and fleſh, they proteſted oftentimes to mutine: But they were eftſoones reclaymed with many good offers and meanes, and for the moſte parte kept enterteyned with falſe letters and promiſes of ſuccours.

The xix. day the pionners and ſouldiers were brought to worke at the newe trenches, and planting two cannons vpon the baſtilion when it was made, they wonne and reuerſed two myles neare to Magdaleine, garded by two enſignes of Launceknightes, againſt which they neuer addreſſed any enterpriſe for that they were apt to be reskued from Naples.

The affaires of the French men begin to decline.

Hytherunto the affaires of the Frenchmen haue runne in a courſe happie and pleaſing, but they beganne to ſwarue to declination for many cauſes manifeſt and apparant: for, as Phillip Dore by the ſecrete ordinance of Andre Dore was retyred with his gallies to lie about Pozzouv, ſo by that meane there entred dayly within Naples where were left no other ſortes of people then ſouldiers, ſome quantitie of vittels in Barkes: And albeit the Venetian Nauie after they had conquered Ottranta, gaue continuall hopes to diſcend and fall with Naples, yet they temporiſed and interpoſed dayly newe delaies and excuſes, hoping to get ſpeedely the great Caſtell of Brunduſa: Laſtly the affliction of diſeaſes and ſickneſſe encreaſed dayly in the armie, and where the blacke bands were wont to be in all actions three thowſande ſtrong, Nowe what for their hurt men who were vnprofitable to the ſeruice, and what for their ſicke men in whom was more weaknes then vallour, and what for the bodies dead whoſe places were emptie, they were reduced to a nomber of two thowſand.

The xxij. day the Spanyardes made a braue ſallie vpon thoſe that defended the newe trenches, where was a continual labour and working of men in hope to perfect them within ſixe or eight dayes: At this ſallie Horatio Baillon being appointed to a place of perill with a very litle companie, was ſlaine as he was fighting in good example to his ſouldiers, a death more meete for a ſimple ſouldier then worthie ſuch a Captaine.

The Imperials rising into courage and hope by the successe of this sallie, made it good with a newe action and greater forces, but the whole campe being in armes and running to the defence of the trenches, they retyred againe into the towne: Philip returned in the ende to the golfe of Naples for the great instance and solicitation that was made to him: The trenches that had bene begunne to close vp the way of Somma, were not finished the xxvij. day: The Spanyards made roades dayly through the countrey, brake downe wayes, and made open passages, and brought into the towne great quantities of flesh: Against whom the horsemen of the campe made litle head for that they went rarely to the feeld: And Monsr Lavvtrech beginning nowe to wishe for a supplie of footmen (though he yelded not wholly to the counsell of others) solicited that they would send him out of Fraunce by sea sixe thowsand footmen of any nation, alleadging that for want of vittels, and the stroke of maladies and diseases, the campe was much diminished: And yet amongst so many difficulties, and in so small exspectation of remedie, it was he onely that had hope of the victorie, reaposing himselfe whollie vpon the famine of that Citie.

In this time things fel out well in Calabria with Simon Roman, who had with him two thowsand footmen aswel corsegnans as souldiers leuyed of the countrey: And albeit the Prince of Bisignan and one of the sonnes of Captaine Alerson were opposed against him with a regiment of fifteene hundred footmen waged of the countrey, yet they found it a hard matter to stande against him, insomuch as the sonne of Alerson retyred to Tarenta leauing the Prince in the field: Not long after, Simon folowing the course of his fortune, got Cosense by accorde, and successiuely after that, he tooke in a towne thereby the Prince of Stigliano, and the Marquis of Lauie his sonne with two other of his children: But in Povvylla the garrison that helde Manfredonia for themprour vexed all the countrey with incursions and roades without any resistance of the horsemen or footmen of the Venetians, who were gone vp to the conquest of those townes: Moreouer, in the quarters about Rome, things were not well appeased, for that Ferro Colonno hauing taken Paliano notwithstanding he was forbidden in the Popes name on the behalfe of the daughter of Vespasian, yet the Abbot of Farfa recouered it, making prisoners Serro, and Prospero de Gauy, though afterwards Serro made escape by the helpe of Lovvys Gonzaguo.

Whilest the armies were in action about Naples, and trauailed with those difficulties and with those hopes, Antho. de Leua being aduertised by good espiall, that there was negligent garde in Pauya, in which towne was Peter Lungeno with foure hundred horsemen, and a thowsand footmen Venetians, and Hannibal Pissynard Captaine of Cremona with three hundred footmen which he had ledde thyther to mainteyne in the deuotion of the Duke, all the countrey beyonde Pavv: he drewe to him a companie of souldiers of confidence and choyse, whom he led thyther one night when was least dout of any action, & hauing with no lesse fortune then celeritie skaled the towne by ladders in three places, he tooke it by assault before the souldiers heard the alarme: in this exployt he made prisoners Peter Lungeno, and one of the sonnes of Ianus Fregoso: From thence he followed his victorie to Biagrassa, where the garrison and townesmen rendred vp the place to him after they had endured some execucion of the Cannon, & so preparing to goe to Arona, Federike Boromeo compounded with him bynding himselfe to followe th Emperours faction.

Duke of Brūdſwyke in Italie for the Emperour.

About this time the Duke of Brundſvvyke being issued out of Trente, had passed the tenth day of May the riuer of Adice with an armie of x. thousand footmen, & vj. hūdred horsmen wel armed many of thē being gentlemen: This army being repulsed from

frō Chiusa discended vpon the territories of Verona. And albeit for that it was knowē long time before that he would come, there was a resolution set downe that Monsr saint Pol should go before to meete him: yet making nō greater speede in this expedicion then in others, the launceknights were in Italy before saint Pol could be in order to marche: And as to omitte occasions is to breede impediment and difficulties, so comming on with his marche with so slowe a foote, he was driuen afterwardes to abide many daies in Ast, both to reassemble and mooster his companies, and to obey the difficultie of vittells, of which a greate darth and skarcety raigned in all the partes of Italy, but chiefly in the quarters of Lombardie: And there was not to be hoped for, a more great and more ready succour for the generall affaires, then of the Senat of Venice, who albeit had assured that their armie should take the fielde with xij. thowsand footemen; yet the Duke of Vrbyn being within Verona, disposed himselfe to no other enterprise then to defend the townes of most importance of their estate. By which omission the Launceknights who were discended vpon the lake of Garda, had Pisquiero by accord, and successiuelie Riuolto and Lunaro: In so much as being vnder that propertie of fortune, made Lords almost of the whole lake, they drew contribucions of money from many places, committing to fire and sworde such as had no meane to satisfie them with raunsom: Antho. Adorno who was ariued in this armie, perswaded them to goe vp towardes Genes, but both for their necessity and want of money, and for other impediments and difficulties: and also for their desire to haue conference with Antho. de Leua issued out of Myllan to that ende, they marched slowly along the contrey of Bressia, whether went to meete them Andre de Burgos and captaine George: By whose meanes it was feared the Duke of Ferrara, who in so great a feare of others made no preparacion, enterteined some secret intelligence or practise: After this the Launceknights marched vp towardes Adda to ioine with Antho, de Leua: who being passed the riuer of Adda the ix. of Iune with an armie of six thowsand footemen and sixtene greate peeces of artilleries, and being incamped neare those companies that were within three miles of Bergama, in which citie and also in Bressia and Verona, the Duke of Vrbyn had distributed his bandes of soldiers: he perswaded them for an extreame desire he had to reconquer Loda, to embrase the recouerie of the state of Myllan, before they passed to Naples: By whose perswasions they incamped the xx. of May before that citie, out of which issued the Duke of Myllan, who retyring to Bressia left for the defense of the towne, Iohn Pavvle his bastard brother with a garrison of three thowsand footemen. And after the artilleries had plaied which being planted in two seuerall places, did greate execucion, Antho. de Leua to whom the first assalt apparteined, brought his bandes of Spaniards neare the place where the ruine was greatest. There they fought breauelie for the space of three howers, but at last the vertue of th Italians defendāts being nothing inferior to the vallour of the Spaniards assailants, they were repulsed by the same vertue which ledde them first to the fight: So that reiecting all hope to carie it by assalt, they reduced all their confidence to the fauor and working of famine: The rather for that the harueste being not yet made, there was within Loda so greate wante of vittells that the share and distribution of breade ronning equally betwene the soldiors and the inhabitantes, the towne of necessitie was either to perishe vnder the rage of famine, or the townesmen to issue out to the great perill of their liues: But the plage began now to be warme amongest the Launceknights, and the armie withall, suffring no small afflictions for want of vittells, they began to breake vp, and many returned into their contreis by the waies of the Svvizzers

and Grisons: An action which bred no great care in the Duke of Brundſwike their captaine, who hauing conceiued greate hopes in Germanie for the example of the regiment which George Fronſpergh ledde, he found by proofe and triall the matters of Italy to be farre more intricat and hard then he imagined: And his money falling ſhort, much leſſe that he could leade them to the kingdom of Naples, ſeeing it was impoſſible for him to conteine them before Loda: Neither was he releued with any comfort by Antho. de Leua, who rather tooke awaie all his hope of remedie, that waie filling him with continuall complaintes of the pouertie and wantes of Myllan: For, after he had loſt all hope to recouer Loda, he deuiſed all the waies he coulde to giue them occaſion to breake vp and goe awaie, fearing leaſt they would eſtabliſh their abiding in the Duchie of Myllan, and by that meane would intrude them ſelues to be competitor with him in the gouernment, and ſhare with him in the ſpoile: And he forgatte not in this time of temporiſing to giue order both to threſh out the corne thorow all the eſtate of Myllan, and to carie and laie vp all their harueſt within the towne of Myllan: At laſt the xiij. of Iulie as they were going to giue a newe aſſalt to Loda, the Launceknightes in their diſcontentments fell into mutinie: in which rage a thowſand of them went their waie to Coma, and the others that remained retired in greate diſorder thartilleries from before Loda: But fearing leaſt they woulde returne into Germanie, the Marquis of Guaſt whom Andre Dore lette goe for twelue daies vppon his faith, came to Myllan to perſwade Brundſwike not to ſuffer his ſouldiours to returne into Germanie: Neuertheleſſe the ſoldiers whoſe rudenes could not be reclaimed with wordes and reaſons, reteined their reſolucion to goe awaie and paſſed by Coma, except two thowſand who remained with Antho. de Leua to whom in thoſe daies Moraro was rendred. And it was not dowted that if the Launceknightes had continued before Loda a few daies more, they had honorably caried the towne both by their vertue, and want of vittells in the towne: In which expedicion many deſired a readines in the Duke of Vrbyn, to thende that whileſt they laie about Loda, he might draw neare Crema, or Piſquaiton, or at leaſt kepe menteined there ſome cornetts of horſemen to vexe them: And albeit whileſt they were vpon the confins of Breſcia, he did ſometimes both accoaſt them and moleſt them, yet neuer comming ſo neare them as three miles, and ſtanding onely vpon defending of the eſtate of the Venetyans, he paſſed no further then the riuer of Eglia: Neither was Monſr ſaint Pol for his parte more diligent to aduaunce and come on, who, notwithſtanding all the reſolucions ſette downe and confirmed by ſo many promiſes made by the king to ſend on his behalfe bandes of ſoldiers againſt the Launceknightes, ariued not in Piedmont but at ſuch time as the Launceknightes departed, and yet his armie conteined farre fewer nomber then had bene promiſed and publiſhed: Neuertheleſſe the confederates forbeare not for all this to ſolicite of newe the Pope to declare himſelfe for them, wherein they required him that proceeding againſt themperour with armes ſpirituall, he would alſo depriue him of the Empire and the realme of Naples: But he ſtoode vpon theſe excuſes, that if he ſhould declare for them, he could then be no more a conuenient meane to practiſe & ſolicite peace: That his declaracion would ſturre vp a greater combuſtion amongeſt the princes of Chriſtendome and yet bringe no profit to the confederats for that his pouertie and weaknes would alwaies impugne the good they exſpected in him: That the priuacion of the emprour for Naples and the empire would ſette all Germanie in an vprore: both for ſuſpicion that he would appropriate to himſelfe thauthoritie to elect themperour,

The bandes of Launceknights vnder Brundſwike do mutine.

and

& for ielowsie that he would establish that election in the person of the french king: Lastly he reduced to their memories the imminēt daunger of the Lutherans which went on encreasing by the diuision of the time: Neuertheless not being hable in reason and comlynes to resist thimportunities that were vrged to him, he promised to enter with them so farforth as the Venetians would restore to him Rauenna, which condicion he proponed as impossible to be graunted, and confirmed this offer with his promise and obligation not to molest the state of Florence: vpon which occasion thembassadors of England came to Venice the xx. of Iune to solicite the Senat to render Rauenna, protesting for the Pope to assure the obseruacion of his promises: But being not hable to induce the Senat, they went away ill contented.

In this time the Pope recouered the citie of Rymyny, which Iohn Sassatello hauing before assaied in vaine to recouer, was at last yeelded vp vppon condicion of life and goods saued.

The Popes intēcion touching Florēce.

But now by the operacion of the time and course of euentes and affaires, began to be laied open and discloſed the Popes most deepe and secret thoughtes, such as he had before dissembled with great art: For, where before, he had firmely imprinted in his minde a desire to restore to his house the greatnes which aunciently it had had in Florence, he was driuen in publishing by singular cunning, the contrarie, to perswade the Florentyns that much lesse that he had any such thought, seeing all that he desired of that common wealth was, that they would according to thexample of other Christian princes, acknowledge him for Pope, and that in causes particular they would forbeare to persecute such as depended vpon him, or deface or reuerse the armes and ornamentes proper to his house: To these endes and with such commissions, he sent to Florence as his embassador when he was deliuered, a Florentyn prelat: And for that the state of Florence would not giue him audience, he forgat not, the better to cloake his dissimulacion, to recontinue a new instance by the solicitacion of the french king that they would send to him an embassador, seeking by these simplicities & offers to haue them familiar with him, & to draw them with more facilitie into the ambushes, he had dressed against them: But when he sawe these deuises and labors soart to none effect, he began to perswade Monsr Lavvtrech, that where as such as gouerned the state of Siena were dependants and deuote to themperour, it were conuenient for the better course of his affaires there, to referre to that gouernment Fabio Petruccio: Neuertheless albeit Lavvtrech saw reason and conueniency in the deuise, yet in regard of the contradiction of the Florentyns, he forbeare either to follow it or to effect it: And when the Pope sawe he could worke none of these to his driftes, and hauing no inclinacion to dissolue or leaue of the practise which his ambicio kept enterteined in him, he wrought secretly in such sort that Pirrhus di Castello vnder pretence that thinhabitants of Siena had done him wrong, made him selfe Lorde of Chiusa with a strength of eight hundred footemen, and by the good diligence & office of certeine exiles of that towne: The Popes reason to raise this man to the iurisdiction of Chiusa, was to make him an instrument vnder that oportunitie, to trauell and trouble the gouernment of Siena: But the Florentyns discerning depelie into the Popes driftes, complained to the Vicont of Loraine embassador to the french king, that the doinges of the Pope tended to no other ende then with the commoditie of Siena to trouble and disorder the affaires of Florence: In which regard thembassador procured of the Pope that the action of Chiusa should cesse.

for that on the one side the Count of Burello was passed from Sicile into Calabria with a thowsand footemen, where he ioined himselfe with the residue: And on the other side, Symon Roman had raunged to discression with the fauor of mines, and trenches the Castell of Cosenso, though by a wounde he receiued of a harquebuze in the shoulder, the course of the victorie was somewhat hindred: he ioined his forces afterwardes with the Duke of Somma who with the bandes of footemen of the contrey, held besieged Catanzara, a towne strong by fortificacion but weake by the want of vittells: In this towne was the sonne in law of Alarson with two hundred horsmen and a thowsand footemen: And as in taking this towne they stoode in good degree to commaund the whole contrey euen vp to high Calabria: so neuertheless necessitie constrained them to turne against the forces vnited with the succours that were come from Sicile who had now made some aduauncing: But Symon being abandoned of one parte of his footemen leaiued of the contrey, was driuen for his sauetie to retire within the castell of Cosensa, and the other parte of his footebands not without the slaughter of many of them, disparsed and went away: The Corsegnans went wandring towardes the army, in so much as not only the region of Calabria was left in daunger, but also it was feared least the victors would aduaunce & addresse their forces to Naples. On the contrary, the affaires of the frenchmen drewe good succesſe and issue in Abruzza by this accident, as the bishop Colonno was approched within xij. miles of Aquila to sturre vp Abruzza to commotion, he was ouerthrowen and slaine by the Abbot of Farfa, with whom were put to the sworde iiij. hundred bodies of soldiours, and eight hundred taken prisoners: In the confins of Caietta the Spaniardes went wandring and retiring being caried with feare for the ariuall of the prince of Melffe, And the garrison of Manfredonia, through the slender vallour and action of the Venetyan bandes, committed many domages without perill or resistance.

Cardinall Cãpeius Legat in England.

Like as the Pope perseuered still in his resolucion to declare himselfe for neither partie: So the french king espying the intelligences and practises which he entertained, began to hold him for suspected. And to themprour he was nothing aggreable, though for no other cause, yet for that he had sent as Legat into England Cardinall Campeius to debate there the controuersie delegated to him, and to the Cardinall of Yorke: for, where the king of England solicited vehemently to haue published the inualiditie of the first mariage: The Pope hauing delt verie liberally in wordes and promises with his Agents, and also being of litle fidelitie or credit with other princes, laboured to kepe himselfe vnder his protection: he made at last secretly a Bull decretall by the which he pronounced the mariage to be of no force, and gaue the Bull to the Cardinall Campeius: he charged him withall that in showing it to the king and the Cardinall of Yorke, he should tell them that he had commission to publish it if in iudgement the knowledge and informacion of the cause succeded not wel: wherein it seamed the Pope wrought vpon this ground. That both they should be brought with more facilitie to consent to haue the cause iudicially debated, and also indure with better temperance of minde the delaies and longenes of the iudgement: Which he had inioined his Legat to holde of and prolonge to as long a tract of time as he could: And as he should not deliuer the Bull vntil he had receiued new commission from him, so neuertheless he should labour to perswade the king by all the meanes he could that his intention was to deliuer it vp to his handes in the ende: of this embassage in the person of that man & of the delegation of the cause, themprours embassadors that were within Rome complained not a litle, though with lesse

authoritie for the ill termes of his affaires in the kingdom of Naples.

About Naples many were the difficulties happening vpon both the one & other partie, but such as in all discourse of reason, made more apparant on the french side the hope of the victorie though it was hindred by the vertue and obstinacie of the ennemies: Within the towne of Naples the wantes of vittells grew daily to extremities, especially of wine and flesh, a calamitie without his comfort for that no prouision could enter the towne by sea for the impediments of the Venetian gallies being after so longe exspectation ariued nowe the x. of Iune in the goulffe of Naples, to the nomber of x xij. And albeit the horsmen of the towne made daily sallies out not towardes the face of the armie, but to those quarters of the contrey where they thought to find vittells, by whose industry some praies of flesh were alwaies brought in, and the whole estate of the towne somwhat releued and refreshed: yet these prouisions and comforts brought in by these aduentures, were not such as being depriued of the commoditie of the sea, they might suffice to nourishe and enterteine them longe: Besides, they began to grow short in money, the stroake of the plage afflicted them much, and they had much to doe to kepe enterteined the Launceknightes whome they coulde no longer abuse with vaine hopes and promises: In which discontentment many of them went by troupes to the french armie notwithstanding the authoritie and grace which the prince of Orenge, who by the death of Don Hugo commaunded in the place of Viceroy had with them, was of some force to reteine them: who the better to frame their mindes with authoritie & discipline which he coulde not raunge by lenitie and easynes, he made prisoner captaine Cattay a Gascon with many of his soldiours beinge of the remeindars of the regiments of the Duke of Bourbon, And afterwardes he did the like by suspicion, to Fabricio Maramo whom notwithstanding he sette at libertie presently. On the other side discases encreased daily in the french campe, the same beinge the cause that Lavvtrech, to thende not to haue so great a space or circuit to garde, would not suffer to be perfected the last trenches, which neuertheless coulde not easely be finished for the impediment of certeine waters: Besides, the campe suffred want of vittells and nourriture though more for the ill order and gouernment that was vsed, then through any other occasion: Neuertheless Monsr Lavvtrech obseruing his owne rule and councell hoped more in the necessities that were within Naples, then he feared or douted his proper difficulties, and perswading himselfe of thexpedicion of the victorie, either for that cause, or for their want of money, he forbare to make any newe leauies of footemen, a matter which the whole armie desired for the vniuersall diminucion which was made by death and diseases, not onely of persones meane and base, but euen of such as satte in places of authoritie as the Popes Nuncio and Loys Pisano commissarie of the Venetians, who died in the face of the towne the xv. daie. He hoped also to allure to the campe either all or the most parte of those bandes of Launceknightes that were within Naples, a practise wherein the Marquis of Saluss'a first, and afterwardes himselfe, had reaposed of longe time greate confidence in vaine: So that vpon these groundes together with certeine hopes that were giuen him to draw to the armie certeine light horsmen that were within Naples, he forbare to make any newe leauies of light horsmen such as had bene most necessarie for the seruice, of whom if he had waged but foure hundred he had stopped in good time the hurtfull incursions which the soldiours of the towne made so often to his disaduauntage: And yet in those actions of praie and bootie, he was not without his felicitie, for that as the horsmen of Naples returned one daie with a riche spoile of cattell, they were encountred by the blacke bandes, who as they were the sinewes and strength of the armie, so without them there had bene no seege planted before the walles of Naples: By them the bootie was recouered from the Napolitains with the losse of three skore horsmen notwithstanding the Spaniards issued out of the towne to reskew them: Thus Monsr Lavvtrech was not without hope that thimperialls would be constrained to leaue Naples to discression: And therefore laying to cutte them of from all retraite within Caietta, he gaue order to garde well Capua and kepe in deuocion the sea towne of Vulturno: And to depriue them also of meane to retire into Calabria, besides that he cutte of certeine passages, apte for their purpose, he recontinued the working at the trenche begon so often and left of for sondrie accidents he now raised it so high that the springes and waters which before gaue impediment were nowe beneath the worke: besides, he sought to put in defense certeine houses adioyned neare to Naples, and to haue them garded with a thowsand footemen which he ment to leauie to that ende, turning also to that seruice the fauour of the Venetyan gallies which were come vp right ouer against the trenche. This trenche also serued aptly for that resort of vittells to the armie that came from the sea coast, and was no lesse conuenient to cutte of the ennemies if they returned that waie with their booties: for, by reason of the greate ditches and waters at Poggio Royall that had bene cut vp, the waie from the campe to the sea conteined a greate and daungerous circuit: Thimperialls sought to vexe and hinder those that wrought at the trenche, And beinge one daie issued out in very stronge troupes, the pioners by the ordenance of Peter Nauare who solicited the worke, made as though they fledde, and thimperialls pursuing them more in rashnes then in good gouernment of warre, fell vpon an ambushe dressed for their destruction, wherein were hurte and slaine an hundred bodies: Neuertheless the trenche was not halfe finished aswell for wante of pioners as by other accidentes ioyned to an ordinarie negligence which oftentimes hindreth the effect of the good directions and ordenances that are giuen: In which good course of direction if the campe had continued, many were of opinion that considering the straite tearmes and condicion of Naples, Monsr Lavvtrech had honorably caried the towne. And at the same time was offred a faire occasion and of greate consequencie, if the execucion had bene as resolute as the offer was ready: Monsr Lavvtrech being informed that the souldiours of Naples were issued out in greate troupes to goe on forraging and for bootie, and for that he would at one blow ridde the contrey of those incursions and open himselfe a waie to the absolute victorie, sent out the xxv. of Iune by night, the regiment of the blacke bandes, the horsemen of Florence, and three skore french launces with a bande of Svvizzers and Launceknightes, whom he directed to take the waie of Beluedere and Pedegrotto, to encounter the forraigers, and to vexe them in their retire: he appointed capteine Burio with the Gascon footemen to stande vpon the hill which is aboue Grotta, and vpon the alarme giuen, to discende and cutte the ennemies from entring into Grotta. The beginning of this exploit was well executed and drew with it a good issue, for that the companies of Lavvtrech hauing encountred thimperialls, they charged them and put them to fleight, more then three hundred bodies remaining prisoners and slaine, besides an hundred horses of seruice and greate stoare of baggage: And in the encounter Don Ferrand of Gonsagua was striken from his horse as he fought, and being made prisoner he was estsoones recouered by the furie of the Launceknightes: But this medley had his imperfection by captaine Burio,

who eyther through negligence which is yll, or by feare which is worse, appeared not in the place to the which he was appoynted, which if he had done according to his direction, they had no doubt giuen an absolute ouerthrow to thimperials. Monsr Lavvtrech had also sent to Caietta six gallies of the Venetians, and had appoynted two to ryde at the mouth of Garillan to fauour the Prince of Melffe: And because that notwithstanding the impedimentes of the gallies, some releefe of vittels entred into Naples by the fauour of certayne Frigots, he put out to the sea certayne small Barkes to oppose agaynst the seruice of the Frigots: And lastely he gaue order that all the heardes of cattell should be driuen away fifteene myles compasse from Naples, to thend thimperialls should not with such facilitie chase them.

But nowe by reason of a newe accident whiche long tyme before had disclosed certayne signes and tokens, the French affayres were not a little intangled: Andre Dore eyther by corruption and long working wyth him, or of his owne proper motion whiche in cases of alteration caryeth men not a little, determined to leaue the French paye, to the which he was bounde tyll the ende of Iune, A resolution which he had long tyme before established in his mynde as was gathered by many argumentes and coniecturs: In that disposition he retyred to Genes, and would not go vp with his Gallies to the kingdome of Naples, no though the French king offred to make him capteine generall of the army by sea which he prepared at Merseilles: Against which offer he alleaged only his impotencie of body in which reigned so many maladies drawne on with yeres and old age, that he was nowe no more hable to beare the trauels of an army: But the originall and first motion of this chaunge was afterwards attributed aswell by himselfe as others, to diuerse causes: Touching him selfe he complained that the French king to whom he had done faithfull seruice for the space of fiue yeres, had raysed to the place of high Admirall by sea Monsr Barbesieux, A place which though he had refused once, yet he looked that the king would make a newe instance to him to take it: Secondly, that the king had not satisfied him of the xx. thousande duckets due for his payes past, without the which he was not hable to enterteine his gallies: That he would not harken to his iuste petitions to restore to the Genovvayes their accustomed iurisdiction of Sauona, And lastely, that becawse he vrged these petitions with importunitie, the king had debated in hys counsell to cutte off hys head as one that vsed too arrogantly hys authoritie. Others were of opinion that hys yll contentment grewe fyrst from the difference and controuersies betweene hym and Ranso de Cero for the enterprise of Sardignia: In whiche contention he construed agaynst the kinge that he had with more partialitie inclined to the reaportes of Ranso, then fauoured hys iustifications: That the king had too muche importuned hym to delyuer vp hys prisoners whom he desyred, but especially the Marquis of Guast, and Askanio Colonno, as a matter of great importaunce, neuertheless offering to paye their raunsome. These were the causes coniecturall gathered by straungers: but afterwardes it was both beleeued and discerned manyfestlye that in thys reuolte he was not caryed so muche wyth disdayne that the Frenche helde not reputation of him according to his merites, or wyth anye other propertie of yll contentment, as wyth an ambition and emulation to delyuer Genes, and so to make hym selfe greate vnder cooller of the lybertie of hys countrey: Wherein hauinge no other meanes to dryue hys dryftes to their true effecte, he resolued to followe no more the Frenche, nor to ayde them wyth hys Gallies in the action of Naples, lyke as also it was beleeued that to hynder the conqueste of Sicile, he had aduaunced and brought on the enterprise of Sardignia. So that hauing repleniſhed all the thoughtes of hys minde wyth this deuiſe of ambition, and ſeeking to confirme it with ſome greater authoritie, he ſolicited by the interpoſing of the Marquis of Guaſt, to enter into the paye of themprour, notwithſtanding the profeſſion of great hatred whiche for the memory of the ſacke of Genes he had made many yeres agaynſt the Spaniſh nation, accompanied with ſeuere cruelties executed vppon any particulars of them when ſo euer they fell into his handes: But for that he couered his intention with a cloke of deepe arte and diſſimulation, the matter was not yet come to the knowledge of the Frenche kinge, who in that ignoraunce had not looked to remedie an euill of ſo great importaunce, though he was not without ſome ſuſpicion of the reuolte by the occaſion of ſurpriſing a Gallie: wherein paſſed as a paſſanger into Spayne a Spaniarde ſente vnder the cooller to raunſome certayne priſoners, and amongeſt other thinges was founde aboute hym a letter of credence from Andre Dore to thEmperour, And yet ſuche was the ſuttletie of the Spaniarde or compaſſion of ſuche as had him in hande, that they ſuffred hym to continue hys waye without examining hym. At laſte Monſr Barbiſieux beeing aryued at Sauona with a fleete of fourteene Gallies, Andre Dore fearing ſome ſtratageame, retyred with hys Gallies to Genes, and afterwardes conueyed hys priſoners to Lerice, A matter whiche when the Frenche king vnderſtoode by credible relation, and taſting the daunger whiche was nowe become wythout remedie, he diſpatched to hym Peter Frauncis Nocere to reduce hym to hys paye agayne: By hym the king offred him to ſatisfie hys deſyre touching Sauona, to paye in the twentie thowſande duckettes that were due before, and to giue hym twentie thowſande more for the raunſome of the Prince of Orenge whome he had taken before, and the kinge ſette hym afterwardes at libertye at ſuche tyme as he made peace wyth themperour at Madrill: Laſtely he offered hym that in caſe he woulde delyuer his priſoners, he woulde defraye their raunſome before they came oute of his handes, And yet if he refuſed to delyuer them, the kinge promiſed not to impute or charge agaynſt hym hys deniall. But Andre Dore, whoſe reſolution was more conſtant and ſettled, then that the kinges offers coulde remoue it, gaue ſmall eare to the ſolicitation, but iuſtified wyth complayntes hys going from the king: In ſo muche as Monſr Barbeſieux, to the greate preiudice of the affayres of Naples, was conſtrayned by the neceſſitie of thinges, to ſtaye at Sauona: And yet paſſing further afterwardes, he lefte for the garde of Genes fiue hundred footmen, with direction to remayne within tenne myles of the Citie for the rage of the plague that raygned there: And for the ſame ſeruice he putte on lande thyrtie myles from Genes twelue hundred Launceknightes newly aryued, who as they had receyued their firſte paye of the Frenche men, ſo for that the Venetians had not made good the ſeconde according to their bonde, Triuulco gouernour of Genes was driuen to leauye it by his meanes.

Vpon this reuolting of Andre Dore, the Pope being aduertiſed that he enterteined practiſe with the Emprour, ſignified the ſame to Lavvtrech the xxj. of Iune, whome he required to conſent that he mighte reteyne hym in his paye to thende to depriue themprour of his ſeruice, aſſuring him that Phillip Dore ſhould depart from Naples within ten dayes: for which cauſe Monſr Lavvtrech reſtored to Phillip for that he would not kindle or incenſe him, the Secretorie Serenon whom he had alwayes reteyned with him to thende to come by his meane to the knowledge and light of many things that lay in darknes and ſhadow: And yet for the ſuſpicion he had had conceyued of the Pope, he interpreted finiſterly the aduertiſement he had ſent him. At laſte Andre Dore, notwithſtanding that Bardeſieux in paſſing further wyth his armie by ſea conteyning nynteene gallies, two foyſtes, and foure brigantines, aſſiſted with the perſon of the Prince of Nauarre, had ſpoken with him: yet forbearing to cloake or diſſemble any longer the thing he intended to do, he diſpatched a gentleman to thEmprour in the companie of the generall of Grayfreers, who was nowe created Cardinall and was ſente to themprour from the Pope: There was reſolued with this Gentleman a contract bearing theſe couenauntes: The libertye of Genes to be vnder the protection of themprour: the iuriſdiction of Sauona to remayne to the Genovvayes: Pardon to Andre Dore that had bene ſo great a perſecutor of the Spaniſhe name: Enterteynment in themprours ſeruice with twelue gallies, and threeſcore thouſande duckets by the yeare, with manye other articles very honorable. In regarde of this league Phillip departed the fourth daye of Iulye from before Naples wyth all his Gallies: Whoſe going away was nothing preiudiciall to the Frenche but onely in reputation, for that he had of late not onely made yll garde, but alſo had ſuffred his Brigantines to conueye into Naples by ſtealth, certayne proportions of releefe: He had alſo caryed the ſonne of Anthony de Leua to Caietta, and was a backe for many dayes to the forreagers to paſſe vittells into Naples: But if he had followed that ſeruice with the ſame fidelitie he ſhowed in the beginning, his going awaye had bene very hurtefull to their affayres. Monſr Lavvtrech taking occaſion vppon his departing, ſolicited ſo muche the more the comming of the French army, which according to the Popes ordinance was ſtayed with great indiſcreſſion about the action of Ciuitavecchia.

But for the retyring of Phillippe wyth his gallies, the Venetian armie by ſea who had taken the charge of the worke from the ſea ſhoare vntill they mette with the trenches of Peter Nauarre, was dryuen to leaue that action, and apply to the garde and ſeruice of the ſea: Whiche to thende to holde more ſtrayte and encloſed, there were appoynted certayne armed Frigottes to ſcoure day and night the coaſt: vſing likewiſe a greater diligence by lande in oppoſing agaynſt the dayly incurſions of the Spaniardes, whome notwithſtanding when they encountred, their vallour was turned into feare, and in that feare they fledde away without feighting: In ſo muche as Naples was reduced to an extreme neceſſitie, and the Launceknightes proteſted oftentimes to goe awaye if they had not ſpeedie ſuccours both of money and vittells: By reaſon whereof Monſr Lavvtrech who had reappoſed a great confidence in thoſe operations, perſwaded him ſelfe that for the long practiſe and intelligence he had holden with them, they would in thoſe diſorders and wantes paſſe dayly to his armie.

But the fyfteenth daye of Iulye all the Fleete of the Venetian Gallies except thoſe that were aboute Caietta, returned into Calabria to bee reuittelled of biſkytte: By whoſe going awaye the hauen beeing layde open, manye Frigots paſſed into Naples with vittelles of all ſortes excepte wyne: A releefe comming in a tyme apte, for that within Naples there was not ſo muche ſtoare of corne as woulde laſte tyll the ende of Iulye. And on the other ſyde, in the Campe which was filled full of the plague by the infection of ſuche as came out of Naples, maladies and diſeaſes encreaſed greatly: which reſpecting neyther place, authoritie, nor complexion, ſo touched Monſr Vavvdemont that he bare more likelyhood of death then hope of lyfe, and reduced Monſr Lavvtrech into great maladies: By whoſe abſence and reſtrayning for the ſickneſſe he ſuffred, the ſeruice declined to ſuche diſorder, that the Imperialls had leaſure to execute their incurſions without impediment, and wyth the ſame facilitie cut off the vittelles that came to the armie, reducing the whole campe to great wantes of releefe: And yet muche leſſe that the Frenche coulde bee broughte to leauye newe companies of light horſemen, ſeeing in theſe diſorders Valerio Vrſin beeing in the paye of the Venetians with an hundred light horſemen, went from the armie for that he was not payed, by whoſe example many other companies of light horſemen left the ſeruice for want of pay, and the reſidue were made vnprofitable by reaſon of diſeaſes: The men at armes of the Frenche were beſtowed in garriſon in the places thereabout, And the bandes of the Gaſcons beeing diſperſed into ſeuerall places of the countrey, were buſie in gathering in of harueſt and ſeeking praye and bootie. Neuertheleſſe there was great hope in certayne bandes of footemen which were ſayde to come with the armie by ſea, which armie hauing ſtayed more then twentie dayes after they parted from the porte of Liuorno, aryued at laſte the eyghteenth of Iuly, with many gentlemen and money to comforte the campe: Onely this ſupply brought to the armie but eyght hundred footemen, the reſidue that marched with it remayning beſtowed partely for the garde of Genes, and partly to follow thenterpriſe of the caſtell of Ciuitavecchia: At the comming of theſe ſuccours Monſr Lavvtrech hauing ſent to the ſea ſide bandes of ſouldiours to receyue the money that was brought, the gallies could not come to land for the impediment of the ſea that was great and ſwelled with waters: And therefore the next day the Marquis of Saluſſa returned thither againe with his launces, and with a groſſe regiment of Gaſcons, Svvizzers, and Launceknightes, accompanied with the blacke bands: But in their returning they were encountred by the Imperials being iſſued out of Naples in great trowpes, who gaue ſo furious a charge vppon the Frenche horſemen, that they turned their backes, and in fleeing they ſo ſhaked and troade their footemen that they diſordered them whome they ſhoulde haue defended: In this encounter Don Dugo de Pepoly ſucceding by the death of Horatio Baillon to the gouernment of the Florentine bandes, beeing ſet on foote with fortie harquebuziers before the eſquadron of the blacke bands, became priſoner to the horſemen: yea ſuche was the furie of thimperialls that if the vallour of the blacke bandes had not reteyned them, they had in this medley made a great ſlaughter, for that they foughte wyth a wonderfull reſolution, but chiefly the horſemen: There were lefte dead of the French men more then an hundred bodies, and no leſſe number paſſed ouer to the calamitie of priſoners, amongſt whom were many of the gentlemen of the ſea army that were ſette on lande, And alſo Monſr de Candales Nephewe to the Marquis of Saluſſa: Onelye the money was preſerued and ſente in ſafetye to the Campe: The faulte of this diſorder was layde vppon the Frenche horſemen, beeing farre inferiour in vallour to the ennemies, A matter whiche dyd not a little diminiſhe the vertue of the footemen of the armie, as knowing that nowe they coulde not ſtande aſſured of reskewe in the horſemen: But the matter that moſte endomaged and weakned the armie, was the ſickneſſe of Monſr Lavvtrech, who albeit laboured with the vertue of his mynde and courage to ſuſteyne and beare oute the feebleneſſe of hys body, yet beeing not hable with his hande and preſence to aſſiſt actions, he could not prouide and remedie many things that went to declination: for thimperialls taking libertie to make roades abrode, did not only make purueiance of all things they ſtoode neede of except wine which they could not cary, but alſo in that libertie they cutte from the armie oftentimes the reſorte of vittelles

and norriture, taking their baggage and forrage euen vppon their ramparts, and winning their horſes ſometimes as they were ledde to the watering: In ſo muche as beſides the generall diminution of the armie by diſeaſes, euen thinges neceſſarye beganne to fayle in the campe, which was almoſte reduced of an armie beſieging, to a campe beſieged, if they had not ſene to the garding of the paſſages agaynſt the footmen that ranne away. And of the contrarie, within Naples all commodities and hopes encreaſed, the launceknightes mutined no more, and all the other bandes of ſouldiours in glory and emulation ſtroue to ſuffer and endure: With theſe dangers no leſſe manyfeſt then ſtill increaſing, the obſtinacie of Monſr Lavvtrech was at laſt vanquiſhed, who both had ſent into Fraunce to be ſupplied with ſix thouſand footmen by ſea, and alſo had diſpatched Ranſo de Cero being come with the army by ſea, towards Aquila to leauy foure thouſande footemen and ſix hundred horſemen, giuing him aſſignation for money to the treaſorer of Aquila and Abruzza: Whiche ſupplies as Ranſo vndertooke by promiſe to bring to the campe within few dayes, ſo they would haue ſerued better for the aduauncement of the affayres, if they had bin prepared before: By the xxix. daye the wayes and ſtraytes were ſo broken, that there was no ſuretie of paſſage to Capua whiche laye vppon the backe of the armie, and wherein almoſte all ſortes of people laboured of diſeaſes and ſicknes: Monſr Lavvtrech who ſomewhat before had bene eaſed of his feauer, was eſtſoones falne into it agayne with a more infirmitie and daunger then before: The men at armes were almoſte all diſperſed in the villages, eyther for diſeaſes and ſicknes in deede, or at leaſte to refreſhe them vnder ſuche an excuſe: The regimentes and bandes of footemen were almoſte reduced to nothing: And within the towne of Naples bothe the plague abating and other diſeaſes diminiſhing, by whiche helpes there were as yet ſeuen thouſande footemen ſtrong, there was feare leaſt they woulde ſallye out and inuade the Campe: In whiche regarde Monſr Lavvtrech cauſed to tarye the fiue hundred footemen whiche Ranſo de Cero had ſente after the ouerthrowe of Symon Roman, to thende to ſtoppe that the bandes of ennemies who were in Calabria came not vp towardes Naples: He ſente alſo to leauye a thouſande footemen in the countrey thereaboute: He reteyned the Duke of Nola wyth two hundred lighte horſemen, and Rinuccio Farneſo wyth an hundred, whom they promiſed to bring to him foorthwyth: He ſente for backe agayne two hundred Eſtradiottes of the Venetians who were gone to thenterpriſe of Tarenta: He reuoked vppon greate penalties all the men at armes that were whole and hable: He ſolicited daylye the comming of Ranſo, and haſtned (albeit very late) wyth a greate vehemencie and efficacie, all other prouiſions. By the ſeconde daye of Auguſt there were ſcarcely in the Frenche campe an hundred horſe, by reaſon of which diminution the Imperialls made dayly incurſions euen vp to their trenches: They tooke all aduauntages of their weaknes, and omitted no oportunitie whiche their diſorders or declination offred to them: They wonne Somma, performing thexployte by the ayde of skaling ladders, and they ſacked it, finding within it a companie of men at armes and a cornet of light horſmen: By theſe actions growing on to extremities, Monſr Lavvtrech ſeeing him ſelfe almoſt beſieged, ſolicited Monſr Saint Pol to ſende him ſuccours of men by ſea, and called vppon the Florentins to turne to his reskew the two thouſand footemen whom they had leauyed to ſende to Saint Pol, which they conſented to readily: Monſr Candales who was let goe vppon his fayth, was dead in the campe: The prince of Nauarre, Vavvdemont, Camillo Trivulco, and the old & new maſters of camp, were falne ſicke: Lavvtrech was eſtſones falne into the pangs of his feuer, All thembaſſadours were ſicke, all the Secretories paſſed by maladies, and al perſonages of account were kept ſuppreſſed by the diſeaſes of the campe, except the Marquis of Saluſſo and the Count Guido: yea there was ſcarſly to bee founde through the whole campe a body who coulde boaſt of hys ſoundnes: The bands of footemen periſhed miſerably of hunger, and almoſt all the ceſternes being drawne dry, there was an vniuerſall want of water. Suche were the diſorders of the campe by theſe afflictions, and muche more redoubled by omiſſion and negligence, that all action was taken from the armie other then to ſtande vpon their gardes and defende their campe, abyding the comfort of reskew. After this the Spaniardes brake vp the water conduit of Poggia Royall, and notwithſtanding it was eftſones recouered, yet they coulde make no vſe of it without great daunger. Monſr Lavvtrech exſpected within two dayes the Duke of Somma with fifteene hundred footemen, and with the ſame expedition he looked for the bands of horſemen and footemen of the Abbot of Farfa, which he had ſent for ſince he had giuen the defeate to the Biſhop of Colonno.

About this time and in theſe extremities returned the gallies of the Venetians, very yll armed and appoynted, and ſo ſlenderly furniſhed with vittels & prouiſions, that to get meate and norriture conuenient for their feeding, they were driuen to runne all along the ſea ſhores thereabout, and by that occaſion had no care to gard the port of Naples: But the Spaniardes in whom was equall their inſolencie & their fortune, beeing returned the eyght day to Somma, made pillage of it of newe, and tooke away with them all the reſidue of the horſe which Count Guido had there in garriſon: They charged alſo the skort or garde of the French vittels, who were two hundred Launceknightes, and they fleeing in their cowardiſe into two houſes, yelded their lyues to diſcreſſion. By reaſon of theſe incurſions and felicities of thimperialls, the ſouldiours that kept the campe were oftentimes without meate to eate, A calamitie of all others moſte wretched when is wanting foode to feede the bodye which ſtandes to defende his lyfe: All their incommodities were made greater by the huge circuite of place where the army was incamped, which propertie of error as it was diſcerned in the beginning, ſo the daunger redoubling by the fauour of the place, their eyes beheld a miſerable conſuming of their ſouldiours euery day by the neceſſitie of too muche action: And yet Monſr Lavvtrech ſtanding firmely vpon the hope and dayly exſpectation of ſuccours, could not be brought to reſtrayne it or make it leſſe, who albeit in his owne perſon he was not well reſtored, yet in that weaknes of body he tooke payne to viſite the whole campe to maynteine due order of watche and warde, fearing to be inuaded: But ſo ſwiftly did things runne to declining, that by the xv. daye the great puiſſance and vallour of the imperiall horſemen had cut of all reaſort and entercourſe betweene the campe and the gallies, neither coulde the ſouldiours of the campe, for wante of the ſeruice of horſemen, make any incurſion or do exploytes beneficiall: Euery night the alarme was giuen to the campe twiſe or thriſe, in ſo muche as the ſouldiours waſted with ſo manye paynes and incommodities, were not hable to ſende out ſuche skort for vittells as was needefull: But the thing that amid ſo many calamities, made them moſte diſcomforted, was the death of Monſr Lavvtrech, yeelding vp his life the ſame night, vpon whoſe authoritie and vertue all the counſells and actions of that ſeruice depended, and in whoſe perſon ſtoode repreſented the hope and exſpectation of that warre: It was thought he fell into the relaps of his diſeaſe by the continuall paynes he put his body vnto before it was well confirmed.

Death of Monſr Lavvtrech.

The

The whole charge and gouernment of the campe remeyned now in the perſon of the Marquis of Saluſſa, A man whoſe weakenes made him vnhable to manage wel ſo great an authoritie: And in this dayly increaſing of the French diſorders, Andre Dore with twelue gallies arriued at Caietta as ſouldiour to th Emprour, the ſame reducing the French nauye to ſuch ſtraights, that they beganne to make no more ſo good gard as they had wont: At that time alſo the Count of Sarny with a thowſand Spaniſh footemen, tooke Sarny, expulſing three hundred footemen that were there in garriſon: And afterwardes marching by night the xxij. of Auguſt, with a greater force to Nola, he tooke it, and droaue Valerio Vrſin lying there in garriſon to retyre into the caſtell, alleaging for his excuſe that he was deceiued by the men of the contry: he ſent to demaund reskew of the Marquis of Saluſſa, who ſent him a ſtrength of two thowſand footemen, but carying with them the ordinary infelicitie of the campe as they marched towards the place by night, they were ſet vppon by the bands of Naples, and cut in peeces: The xxij. daye the campe beeing both naked of men and voyde of gouernment, ſtoode enterteyned onely with hope of the comming of Ranſo, who being aſyet in Naples, was not wiſhed to haſte on for the taking of Naples, nor in hope to be hable to make any reſiſtance in that place where they were incamped, but onely that by a greater ſtrength they might breake vp and leauy the ſeege: By this time Monſr Vavvdemont was dead, and the Marquis of Saluſſa, Count Guido, Count Hugo, and Peter of Nouare extremely afflicted with ſicknes: In which generall perſecucion of the french campe, Maramo to thend to depriue them wholly of foode and vittells, yſſued out of Naples with foure hundred footemen, and finding Capua almoſt abandoned, entred into it, by whoſe comming thether, the French men forſaking Pozzolo, beſtowed the garriſon that was there, within Auerſa, A place of very ſpeciall importance for the campe: But when Capua and Nola were loſt, the army was at a maze where to ſeeke vittells to conteine the bodies which the ſtroake of diſeaſes had yet left on liue: So that their extremities making them no longer to hold good, and the rage of their neceſſities carying them neceſſarily to obey the aduerſitie of the time, they reſolued to embraſe their laſt ſhift, and brake vp by night to retyre to Auerſa: But th Imperialls keeping a ielous eye vppon their doings, and hauing good informacion of their diſlodging, ſet vppon them and ouerthrewe them in the waye, where beeing taken Peter Nauare with many other chieftaines and perſonages of condicion, The Marquis of Saluſſa eſcaped & retyred with one part of the army into Auerſa: But being purſued no leſſe by his owne infelicitie then by the vallour of th Imperialls, and being reduced to an eſtate not to menteyne defenſe, he ſent out of Auerſa Count Guido Rangon to perley with the Prince of Orenge, betwene whome ranne theſe capitulacions: That aſwell he as the other Capteines ſhould remeine priſoners, except Count Guido, to whome in recompenſe of thaccord, was graunted libertie: That the Marquis ſhould do all that he could with the French men and Venetians for the rendring & giuing vp of the whole kingdom: That the ſouldiers and ſuch as by thaccord were to haue libertie, ſhould leaue their enſeignes, their armes, their horſes and their goods, graunting onely to thoſe that were of greateſt qualitie, the ſeruice of moyles and curtalls: That the Italian ſouldiours ſhould not beare armes againſt th Emprour for ſix monethes: In this ſorte all bands and regiments were defeated, all Capteines cut of by death, or made priſoners in fleing, or at leaſt take in the accord: Auerſa was ſacked by the army Imperial, who afterwards retyred to Naples & demaũded eight paies: Ranſo who the day following was drawen neare to Capua with the Prince of Melffe and the Abbot of Farfa, hearing of the accident and aduenture of the army, returned into Abruzza, which contry onely together with certeine peeces in Povvylla and Calabria, held good for the confederats.

This was the yſſue and euent of thenterpriſe of the kingdome of Naples, diſordered by many cauſes, but guided to his laſt errour by two principal reaſons: The one, for the maladies and diſeaſes engendred partely by the cutting away of the water conduits of Poggio royall to depriue them within Naples of the meane and vſage of grinding: for, when the waters were diſperſed all ouer the playnes, and hauing no yſſue, were driuen to ſtand ſtill & gather modde, they ſo corrupted the ayre, that the french men by nature intemperat and impatient of heat, fell into maladies, and they in time were turned into the nature of the plague, whoſe contagion was caried into the body of the armie by certeine that were infected who were expreſly ſent out of Naples: The other errour was that Monſr Lavvtrech who had drawne out of Fraunce all the beſt experienced Capteines of that nation, was too ſinguler in his owne hope and weening: And not remembring what litle honor it brought to him at ſuch time as he lay at the defenſe of the eſtate of Myllan, to write to his king that he would ſtoppe thennemies for paſſing the riuer of Adda, he had nowe in the ſame partialitie ſince the ſeege of Naples, aſſured his king by ſundry letters that he would not leauy his campe from before the walls of Naples, till he had honorably caried the victory of the towne: By which proppertie of errour and ſelfe promiſe for that he would not be reproued of his worde and iudgement, he ſtoode obſtinate not to leauye the ſeege contrary to the councell of his other Capteines, who ſeeing the campe full of maladies and infection, perſwaded him alwayes to retyre in ſauety to Capua or to ſome other place of refreſhing: The rather for that hauing in his hands and deuocion almoſt all the kingdom, much leſſe that he could haue wanted eyther vittells or money, ſeeing he might with facilitie haue conſumed the Imperialls to whome all things were lacking.

The proceedings of Mõſr Saint Pol in Lombardy.

During theſe proceedings in the Realme of Naples, the affaires of Lombardy were not without trauel and diuerſitie of fortune, for that after Monſr Saint Pol had aſſembled his forces and made prouiſion of vittells, he tooke beyonde Pavv certeine townes and borowes commaunded before by Antho. de Leua, who the thirde of Auguſt was gone to Torretta, laboring to gather into Myllan ſo great prouiſions of vittells as he could, for that thorow the whole eſtate of Myllan, the haruеſts were ſo poore and barreine, that it was thought there were skarcely ſufficient vittells to feede for eyght moneths the mouthes that were in the contry: Afterwardes he retyred to Marignan beeing not able for want of money to abide long tyme in that place: At this tyme the Duke of Vrbyn was at Breſcia, and Saint Pol at Neweca-ſtell in Tortono, from whence beeing comen to Plaiſanca, they met and had conference together at Monticella vppon the ryuer of Pavv, where it was reſolued that the armies ſhould vnite and aſſemble about Loda: from thence Saint Pol paſſed the ryuer of Pavv neare to Cremona, they of Plaiſanca ſuffering him without reſiſtance to conuert the barkes that were there to the vſe of a bridge: And therefore Antho. de Leua who had at his deuocion the bridge of Caſſan, Caruaggia, and Treuy, brake downe the bridge and abandoned the places of Guiaradada, lyke as he had before abandoned Nouaro: onely he had beſtowed within Pauya, ſeuen hundred footemen, and fiue hundred within Saint Angeo: Monſr Saint Pol had in eſtate and payment foure hundred launces, fiue hundred light horſemen & fiueteene hundred launce-knights, but in numbers & true mooſter farre leſſe both through his own negligence

and deceite of his officers: for theſe forces and other companies of Svvizzers and Launceknightes which were exſpected, the Venetains had agreed to pay for euerie moneth twelue thowſande duckats, to Monſr Saint Pol, who had alſo at Turea three hundred Svvizzers enterteined and payed for nine hundred, and three thowſande footmen French: The Venetians had three hundred men at armes, a thowſand light horſemen, and ſix thowſande footemen: And with the Duke of Millan were more then two thowſand footmen of choiſe. Antho. de Leua had foure thowſand Launceknightes, a thowſande Spanyards, three thowſande Italians and three hundred light horſemen: The regiments of the confederates paſſed the riuer of Adda, and ioyned their forces together the two and twentie of Auguſt, Antho. de Leua being yet at Marignan: from that place the Duke of Vrbin ſent to Saint Angeo, a ſtrength of three thowſand footmen, and three hundred light horſemen with ſix cannons, vnder the conduit of Iohn Naldo, who as he was in camping was ſlaine with a bollet from the artilleries, for reuenge of whoſe death the Duke went thither in perſon and caried the towne: The fiue and twentie of Auguſt, the armie of the confederats lodged at Saint Zenon vppon the riuer of Ambra which is within two myles and an halfe of Marignan: The ſeuen and twentie day they paſſed ouer Ambra, and drewe neare to Marignan: The Spanyards at their approaching retyred within Marignan to an olde rampart, and after they had skirmiſhed many howers, they iſſued and ſpredde them ſelues at large, making as though they would either giue or take the battell: But after thartilleries had played on both ſides the ſpace of an hower by which time the night drew on, they retyred within Marignan & Riozzo, and at the lodging or planting of the campe, they aſſaulted it brauely: The day after Antho. de Leua made his retraite with all his companies to Millan, and the confederates went to Landriano: There they tooke councell whether they ſhould attempt to force Millan, & during the action of that conſultacion, the armie marched with intencion to enter the towne of Myllan by ſurpriſe, which enterpriſe was broken by a great abundance of raine, which making the wayes heauy and troubleſom, ſtopped them for going to the gate of Verceill where they ſhould haue entred: But ſeeing that exployt fruſtrat and the deuiſe diſapoynted wherein they were more confirmed of the impoſſibility of the action, by the relacion of a gentleman whome they ſent to take a viewe of Myllan, they determined to goe incampe before Pauya by the way of Biagraſſa: Both for that there remeyned no other nature of action for the armie, & alſo for the hope they had to cary it eaſily, hauing no greater a ſtrength to defende it then two hundred launceknights and eyght hundred Italyans: Thus keeping that waye they ſent out beyond the ryuer of Theſin, certeine bands of footemen, which tooke Vigeuena: And the nynth of September Monſr Saint Pol arriued at Saint Alexis within three myles of Pauya, where both the armies approching neare together, there came an aduertiſement that put them in a greater aſtoniſhment: for, the plague being great in Genes, for feare of whoſe infection the towne being almoſt left abandoned of inhabitants and ſouldiers, in which generall confuſion Theoder Tryuulco gouernor of the towne, being retyred into the caſtell: Andre Dore tooke the aduauntage of that occaſion and drew neare the towne with certeine gallies, hauing neuertheleſſe a very ſlender hope to force it for that he had with him but fiue hundred footemen. But as where the feare is generall there the mindes and corages are leaſt aſſured, ſo the French nauy that roade in the hauen, fearing leaſt their way to returne into Fraunce would be cloaſed vp, leſt without care or gard the matters of Genes, and hoyſſed ſaile to goe to Sauona, the firſt veſſell that arriued there, being the gallye of Monſr Barbe-

ſieux: So that both for the weake forces of ſouldiours that were within the citie notwithſtanding Theoder was returned to keepe the pallaice, And for that the people and commons for the iniurie of the libertie done to the towne of Sauona, were becomen ennemies to the name of the Frenche, Andre Dore made his entry into the towne finding made againſt him no great reſiſtance: Suche was his ambicion and ſo ſtronge and violent his appetit of dominion, that the plague which forced the naturall inhabitants to leaue their patrimonye and place of abiding, had not power to make him tymerous to enter, where the others in their feare fled from thinfection: But this fowle loſſe of the citie hapned chiefly by the negligence and too much ſecuritie of the French king: for, both not looking that the matters of Naples would ſo ſpeedily fall to ruyne, and alſo beeing perſwaded that in all accidents the retrait of the nauye to Genes and the neighbourhood of Monſr Saint Pol, would ſuffice eyther to ſaue or reskewe, he omitted to make neceſſarye prouiſions: Theoder who was retyred within the caſtell, demaunded ſuccours of Saint Pol whome he put in hope to reconquer the towne, if there were ſent to him forthwith a ſtrength of three thowſand footemen: which demaund being conſulted vppon amongeſt the Capteines confederat, the French men ſhewed a diſpoſicion to goe thether preſently with the whole campe: But the Duke of Vrbyn proued that to prouide boates to make a bridge vppon Pavv, and to leauye neceſſarye proporcions of vittells, was a matter which woulde drawe a longer tract of tyme then the preſent buſines required: So that according to his councell it was determined that Monſr Montilan ſhould turne from Alexandria to Genes, A regimēt of three thowſand launceknights and Svvyzzers who were come out of Fraunce to the armye of Saint Pol, and were arriued at Alexandria: But in caſe they would not bē led thether, then the reſolucion boare, that they ſhould be led to the campe, & in their places ſhould be diſpatched and beſtowed a colonie of three thowſand others: and that as in the meane while there ſhould be made labor and practiſe to preſſe Pauya: So the Venetians promiſed that if thenterpriſe of Pauya fayled, they would conuert to the ſuccours of Genes all their companies, ſo farre forth as they might dwel aſſured of the affaires on that ſide.

Thus was reſolued and continued the ſeege of Pauya, & the better to aduaunce it to a good end & yſſue, there were planted the xiiij day on this ſide the riuer of Theſin in the plaine there below, nyne cannons which executed vpon a baſtillion adioyning to the arſenack or ſtorehouſe for municions, which in fewe howers was reduced almoſt to ruine, And beyond the riuer of Theſin were braked three cannons to beate (when the aſſalt ſhould be giuen) a flanke that aunſwered the arſenack: And vppon a litle hill ſide on this ſide Theſin were beſtowed fiue cannons which cōmaunded two other baſtillions: And vpon the point of the ſaid litle hill were beſtowed three other cannons which plaied vppon the wal: Al which fury of artilleries belōged to the Venetians, reſeruing the great ſhot of Monſr Saint Pol to beate vpon the defenſes: By the day following Annyball Capteine of Cremona was come with a trench as farre as the ditch of the baſtilliō on that ſide of the arſenack, of which two parts were already ſo reuerſed to the earth, that the ſoldiers that were within had almoſt abādoned it: This day was ſlain with a bollet frō the artilleries, Malateſta Sogliano one of the capteines of the Venetians: And after the artilleries had plaied with a cōtinual execution al the day & night following, the army was raūged & prepared to giue the aſſalt, moſt part of the wall on all ſides of the three baſtillions, being made euen with the earth: But when in the morning following they went about to draine the water out of the ditches, they found ſo great a reſiſtance by the fundacion of the wal, that they cōſumed

there all that day and the day following, by which occasion the assalt was prolonged till the xix. day, when the ditch was almost cleared of all the water: By this the bastillion at the corner being wonne by the first appearing of the day, they began to giue thassalt, And deuiding their companies into three, the first action apperteyned to Antho. de Castello with the Venetian regiments, the second to Monsr de Logers, leading the souldiers of Saint Pol, and the last to the Capteine of Cremona commaunding the regiments of the Duke of Myllan being twelue hundred footemē: The person of the Duke of Vrbyn came on foote with two hundred men at armes, and affronted the bastyllions which made a valliant defense for more then two howers, vnder the vallour of two hundred launceknights and eight hundred Italyans with a very fewe Spanyards, who notwithstanding in the action they shewed great courage and resolucion, yet for the smalnes of their numbers they defended their bodies with great hazard and difficultie, the rather for the rage of thartilleries planted beyonde Thesin, which alwayes executed vpon the principall part or flower of the ramparts: In the assault Peter Viragno was hurt in the thighe with a shot of a harquebuze, of which wound albeit he dyed within fewe dayes after, yet he would not haue his body remoued from the place, to thend his souldiours should not abandon the assalt: In like sort was wounded with a harquebuze Peter Botticello, but with more fauor for that he dyed not, and with lesse show of constancye for that he retyred from the assault: They were both Capteines of the Duke of Myllan: At last within xxij. howers the assaylants by their vallour made their entry with small hurt to them selues, and right great commendacion to the Duke of Vrbyn: The slaughter of the souldiours within, was about seuen hundred bodies, almost all launceknights: But when the armye began to enter the towne, Galeas Biragno being no longer hable to preserue the place which he saw by all properties of destinie to declyne from him, retyred into the castell with all the souldiers that remeyned of the slaughter at the assalt, together with many inhabitants of the towne, which immediatly was deliuered to sacke and spoyling, though of litle profit by reason it had passed that affliction twyse before: The castel was receiued by composicion without any assalt or exployt of warre, both for that there were in the campe no municions to batter it, and also the ditches which were both large and deepe were not in so short time to be filled vp, And lastly there were within it a regiment of fiue hundred men of warre stronge: These were the capitulacions betwene the army and the castel: That the Spanyards with all those sorts of artilleries and municions which they could cary in their hands, and with all their trayne of baggage, should goe to Myllan together with the launceknights of whom was left of the generall slaughter, a very small number: And that th Italians might goe whether they would, except to Myllan.

Vppon the taking of Pauia, the Duke of Vrbyn gaue out his reasons that it were not good to force Myllan, onles they had an armye sufficient for two batteries: But to thende to vexe it and restrayne it, he thought it good to take Biagrassa, Saint George, Monce, Coma, and to minister succours to Genes: for, notwithstanding the launceknights and Swyzzers had made aunswer to Monsr Montilan that they would go to Genes, yet the launceknights taking thoccasion that they were not payed, went away to Turea, by which alteracion there was no propertie of succours sent to the castell which Andre Dore labored to vndermyne with all diligence, for which cause and to apply a remedy so necessary, Monsr Saint Pol with an hundred launces and two thowsand footemen remeining with him, prepared the xxvij. day to goe to the succors of Genes: he passed Pauy at Portostella in the mouth of the riuer of The-

ſin,and drew towards Tortono with promiſe to turne backe againe,if he ſaw his ſuccours could not be made profitable to the place: All this while the Duke of Vrbyn, ſtayed for him at Pauya,and with him were foure thowſand footemen Venetians,and a thowſand of the regiments of the Duke of Myllan. At this time Antho.de Leua who was retyred to Myllan,made an order that no man ſhould keepe or make any meale in their houſes except ſuch as had redeemed and bought the tribute of it,who payed vnto him for the ſpace of ix. moneths,three duckats for euery meaſure of meale: with the money growing of this impoſicion, he payed for all that tyme the horſemen,and the footemen Spaniſh and launceknights. A contribucion which did not onely defend him from the daunger preſent, but did enterteyne him all the winter following,hauing diſperſed his regiments of Italian footemen within Nouaro & certeine townes of Lomelino with other villages of the territories of Myllan, In which wretched townes he gaue ſuffrance to the ſouldiours during the whole time of the winter,to ſpoyle and raunſom the miſerable inhabitants: The firſt daye of October Monſr Saint Pol arriued at Gauy a place within xxv.myles of Genes hauing for his better expedicion,left his artilleries at Noui: The day following he tooke the rocke of the borow of Fornaro, but paſſing further towards Genes, and vnderſtanding there was entred a newe ſtrength of ſeuen hundred footemen Corſegans, he returned eftſoones to the borow of Fornaro:Such was his want of money, that he had not with him in all,aboue foure thowſand footemen aſwell of his owne as of the companies of Montilan,& a thowſand who had bene ſent from the campe with Nicholas Dore: And yet of thoſe fewe that were with him, many trowpes paſſed continually into Fraũce,which making him diſpaire of the ſucceſſe of thẽterpriſe,he diſpatched Montilan with three hundred footemen to Sauona before which towne the Genouvaies were incamped: But there was no meane for them to enter, both for that it was reſtrained & enuyroned with trenches, and all the paſſages & places of acceſſe taken: The x. of October he retyred him ſelf within Alexandria, & afterwards to Senazzaro betwene Alexandria & Pauya,to haue conference with the Duke of Vrbyn: onely he was almoſt left without ſoldiers: And there conſulting vppon the common affayres, where the Duke declared that there was remeyning but foure thowſand footemen of all nations & natures,And that Antho.de Leua had what without & within Millan foure thowſand launceknights ſtrong,ſix hundred Spanyards,and xiiij hundred Italians: It was reſolued that the Duke ſhould retyre to Pauya,& Saint Pol to Alexandria, A matter accorded vnto him by the Duke of Myllan: There were alſo occupied ſpeches and deuiſes to make new leauies of footemen,and then if the tyme fauored,to aduaunce to execute thenterpriſe of Biagraſſa,Mortaro,and the caſtell of Nouaro.

But when the inhabitants of Sauona ſaw that Montilan could not enter for their ſuccors,they agreed amyd ſo many diſtreſſes,to render the towne the xxj. of October,if within certeine dayes they were not reskewed: And therefore Saint Pol who was careſull to releeue it,and not hauing of his owne companies aboue a thowſand footemen ſtrong,required a ſupply of three thowſand footemen of the Duke of Vrbyn & Myllan,who furniſhed him but with xij. hundred, Inſomuch as hauing no aſſurance to be able to reskew it with ſo ſmall a number, he ſuffred it to be loſt: And after the Genouvaies had it they choaked the hauen with ſtones for that they would make it vnprofitable to ſeruice: And by the example of that aduerſitie, Theoder Tryvulco diſpayring to be ſuccored, and being without money and comfort, gaue him ſelf vp to compoſicion: Aſſoone as the caſtel was conquered,it was in a popular fury raſed by the Genouvaies,who with the authority of Andre Dore eſtabliſhed in that

citie a newe gouernment ſuch as had bene affore time ſolicited vnder the name of libertie: This was the ſubſtance of it: That by the councell of foure hundred cityſens ſhould be created all the magiſtrates and dignities of their citie, but chiefely the Duke and ſupreame Magiſtrat, to continue for two yeares: They abrogated the lawe by the which the gentlemen were excluded before out of that creacion: And ſeeing the fundacion and ground of greateſt importance reſted in this to eſtabliſhe their libertie, that they ſhould preſently labour to reconcile the factions and diuiſions of the Cityſens, which of long time had bene there more greate and hurtefull then in any other citie of Italye, ſeeing beſides contencions priuate, there had raged for longe time the factions of Guelffes and Gebelins: To deface themulacion betwene the gentlemen and populars, which populars were not yet reduced to one vnitie of will amongeſt themſelues: And laſtely to reappeaſe the mightie and ſtronge partialitie and controuerſie betweene the two famulies of Adorney and Fregoſey: By reaſon of which diuiſions it was likely that their citie, moſt conuenient to commaunde the Sea aſwell for the ſituacion as for the ſcience and knowledge of marine matters, had not bene onely at ſeuerall ſeaſons vexed and depreſſed, but alſo for longe time had bene kept vnder a croſſe of continuall ſubiection: Therefore to cure that euill euen to the roote, they proceeded by obſcuring the names of all the famulies and houſes of the citie, conſeruing and reteining onely the memorie and name of xxviij. of the moſt noble and notable, except the Adorneys and Fregoſeis, which they vtterly ſuppreſſed and aboliſhed: vnder the name and nomber of which famulies, they gathered all thoſe gentlemen and populars who remeined without name of their houſes: wherein the better to confound the memory of all factions, they ſought to intangle and intermedle the famulies of the gentlemē with the houſes of the populars, & reciprocally the names of the populars whith the gentlemen: Such as had bene parteners with the Adorneys they coopled with thoſe that had folowed the name of the Fregoſey, & ſo of the contrary, eſtabliſhing vnder that commixtion of houſes and names, an equall affinitie betwene both: And as by this lawe it was ordeined that there ſhould be no diſtinctiō of power to hinder the one more then the other to aſpire to honours and magiſtracies: ſo by this confuſion of names and men they hoped that within the courſe of a few yeares, the poiſoned memorie of factions and quarrells would be vtterly defaced & quēched: And in the meane while thauthoritie of Andre Dore remeined great amongeſt them, without whoſe conſent and priuitie both for the reputacion of the man and for the authoritie of themprours gallies which he commaunded, and for his other condicions & parts, they would not paſſe any deliberaciō of things which were of greateſt importance: only the thing which made his puiſſance and greatnes leſſe troubleſome, was, that he would neither ſuffer the treaſor to be adminiſtred with his ordenance, nor intrude himſelfe into thelection of the duke and other magiſtrats, & much leſſe communicat in cauſes more particular & leſſe: By which maner of behauiour the cityſens being reduced to mindes peaſible, became more inclined to marchandize then to ambicion, & reteining ſtill impreſſions of their trauells and ſubiections paſſed, they had great reaſon to loue & folow that forme of gouernment: After this the french fleete and the nauie of Andre Dore buckled togeather betwene Monaro and Nice, where one of Dores gallies was ſonke.

After the loſſe of Sauona, the Duke of Vrbyn and Monſr ſaint Pol, mette togeather of new at Seuaro betwene Alexandria and Pauya: where the Duke of Vrbyn to the greate diſcontentment of Frauncis Sforce, and Monſr ſaint Pol, reſolued to repaſſe on the other ſide the riuer of Adda, both leauing to the Duke of Myllan, the garde of Pauya, and councelling Monſr ſaint Pol to ſpende the winter in Alexandria: with which alteracions the french kinges officers were not onely diſcontented, but alſo himſelfe not taking for payment certeine light excuſes which the Venetians made to him, complained bitterly that they had not ſuccoured the caſtell of Genes and the citie of Sauona which the Genovvayes in their rage had vtterly deformed: After this, a ſupplie of a thowſand Launceknights were ſent to Saint Pol, with whom, accompting the thowſand footemen which Villecero had in Lomelyno, remained a ſtrength of foure thowſand footemen.

In this time hapned a tumult in the Marquiſedom of Saluſſa: The accident was this: After the death of the Marquis Michaell Anthonie, Frauncis his brother hauing taken vpon him the iuriſdiction by reaſon that Gabriel the ſecond brother to Anthonie, euen in the time of his eldeſt brother by direction of the mother who had managed the gouernment of the children during their minoritie, had bene kept priſoner in the rocke of Rauel vnder cooller that he was almoſt eſtraunged from his vnderſtanding: it hapned that the capteine of the Rocke deliuered him, by which meane ſeazing vppon the mother who had holden him priſoner and being gladſomely embraſed of the people, he conquered the whole eſtate: To which felicitie of the time it ſeamed his brother gaue place, and fledde, in his feare to Carmagnola, where, hauing afterwardes reaſſembled his forces, he ouerthrew his brother Gabriel.

There paſſed no more actions of conſequency in Lombardie for this yeare, ſauing that Count Caiezza ranne vppe euen as farre as Myllan, taking aduauntage vpon the negligence of the Venetians, who omitted to ſende to Monſr ſaint Pol the forces they had promiſed for the enterpriſe of Sarauallo, Gauy, and other places of the Genovvays: There was alſo made an attempt of an exploit of greate importance: for, Monti Ian and Vecellero with two thowſand footemen and fiftie horſemen, departed in the euening to Vitado to ſurpriſe Andre Dore in his pallacie, the which ſtanding vpō the Sea coaſt reteineth a verie neare neighbourhood to the walls of Genes: But this plotte was vaine in the effect, for that the footemen for the tediouſnes and longnes of the waie conteining xxij. miles, could not reach the place where they were to execute their enterpriſe before the night was waſted, and being diſcouered by the clearnes and benefitte of the daie, the alarme aroaſe which from hande to hande was brought at laſte to Andre Dore, who conueighing himſelfe out of the backeſide, was receiued into a barke and by her ſwiftenes of ſailes and oares, he auoyded the daunger that was prepared againſt his life. Onely the french men miſſing by miſaduenture the perſonne of Andre Dore, conuerted their rage vppon his pallaice which they ſacked and afterwardes returned in ſauetie: Alſo Count Caiezzo hauing layed an ambuſhe betweene Myllan and Monceo, ouerthrew fiue hundred Launceknightes and an hundred light horſemen who were ſent out to skorte or ſaffe conduit the vittellours: But being afterwardes ſent to Bergama, he ſo afflicted that citie with pillage and robbinge, that the Senate of Venice who had eſtabliſhed him capteine generall ouer their infanterie, decaſſed him and depriued him with infamie of their paye, whom in their compaſſion they could not endure in ſo greate acuſtome of inſolencie and auarice: About this time the Spaniards tooke the towne of Vigeuena: And Belioyenſe who was eſcaped out of the handes of the french men, being ſent by Antho. de Leua with two thowſand footemen to ſurpriſe Pauya wherein was a garriſon of fiue hundred footemen

of the Duke of Myllan, preſented himſelfe one night before the walls, but being diſcouered he was compelled to retire without any effect: There ariued in the contrey of Genovvay a ſupplie of two thowſand footemen Spaniardes, whom the emprour ſent out of Spaine either to defend Genes, or elſe to be conuerted to Myllan according to the neceſſitie and occaſion of affaires: Belioyenſe wente out to meete this ſupplie and conduct them: who as they made ſhowe that they would take the waie either to Plaiſanca or of Caſa, ſo Monſr ſaint Pol put himſelfe in preparacion to ſtoppe their comming, and ſent to ſolicite the Venetyan bandes to make them ſelues ſtrong at Loda, to the ende that the bandes of Myllan ſhould not come out to backe them: he laboured alſo to perſwade them to execute iointly the enterpriſe of Myllan, being thereunto induced through the wante of vittells and other diſpaires of thoſe wretched inhabitantes: But the Duke of Vrbyn was not of that opinion, like as alſo the Venetyans proceeded coldly in the braue actions of that time, wherein both for the rapporte of Andre Nauager their embaſſadour nowe returned out of Spaine, and in regard of a certeine practiſe and intelligence which was interteined at Rome with themperours embaſſadour, the opinions of the Senat were diuerſe, many inclining to haue an accord with themprour: and yet it was at laſt reſolued to continue the confederaciō with the french king: at which time Torniello hauing paſſed the riuer of Theſin with two thowſand footemē, tooke Baſignan & went towards Lomelina: And thabbot of Farfa going with his cornets of horſemen to Creſcentyn a place of the Duke of Sauoye, was defeated by night & taken priſoner: but being afterwardes ſet at liberty by the working of the Marquis Montferat and the Marquis of Mus, he ouerthrew certeine regiments of Antho. de Leua, and tooke their artilleries.

There began to riſe a dout that the Pope inclined to themperors ſide, both for that the Cardinal Saint Croſſe being ariued at Naples, cauſed to be deliuered three Cardinalls who were there in oſtage: and alſo according to the rumor that ran, he had cōmiſſion from themperour to cauſe to be rendred Oſtia and Ciuitavecchia, And by his meane and working the Pope being alſo ſolicited, Andre Dore reſtored to the Syennoys Portohercole: But there were daily more and more arguments and teſtimonies that the Popes minde was caried with a diſpoſicion to new thinges, for that by his meane though ſecretly, Braccio Baillon for the intereſt of the affaires of Perouſa, moleſted Malateſta, notwithſtanding he was in his paie: And when he vnderſtoode that the Duke of Ferrara was come to Modena, he conſpired to take him in his returning with an ambuſh of two hundred horſemen layed by Pavvle Luzaſquo vpon the confins of Modena: But for that the Duke ſtirred not out of Modena both the deuiſe was diſcloſed and the effect diſappointed.

About this time the realme of Naples notwithſtāding the ouerthrow of the Frēch was not entyrely deliuered of the calamities of the warre: for, as Symon Romain hauing aſſembled newe companies, had taken Nauo, Oriolo, and Amigdalaro, townes ſtanding vpon the ſea ſide at the pointe of thappenin: So drawing to him into one ſtrength Federik Caraffa whom the Duke of Grauino had ſent with a thowſand footemen, together with many others of the contrey, he had an armie reaſonably well compounded. But after the victorie of thimperialls about Naples, and being abandoned of the companies of the Duke of Grauyna he entred into the towne of Barletta by the Caſtell, and putting it to ſacke and pillage, he ſtaied there: At what time the Venetians helde Trany garded by Camylla, and Monopoly defended by Iohn Conrardo, both captaines of the familie of the Vrſins: After this Ranſo de Cero and the prince of Melffe came into the kingdom with a thowſand footemen: who being reduced betwene Nocero & Gualdo, and afterwardes retiring from thence by the commandement of the Pope who would not offend the mindes of the victors, embarked themselues at Sinigalo and went by sea to Barletto with intencion to renewe the warre in Povvilla: a matter determined vpon by common consent of the confederates to the ende to constraine thimperiall armie to make their aboade in the kingdom of Naples vntill springe time, at what time they drewe to counsell and conference to make new prouisions for their cõmon sauetie: for which matter the french king sent to Ranso a releefe and succours of money, like as also the Venetians concurring with the king in the same desier, the rather to reteine more easely and kepe still by the helpe of others, the townes which they had taken in Povvylla, offred to furnish him of twelue gallies: But when the king vrged them to arme and appointe those gallies, reseruing to defraie the charge and exspenses vppon the foure skore thowsand duckats whereunto they were bounde by the contribucion promised to Monsr Lavvtrech, they would not harken to it: The king of England promised not to be behinde with his parte of the prouisions ordinarie: And the Florentyns had contracted to pay the thirde parte of the companies which Ranso had leauied: The imperialls shewed no greate readines or dispositicion to quench so greate a preparacion of trouble, beinge buysied on all partes to exact money to satisfie the soldiours of their duties and paies past: wherein both to leauie those exactions with more facilitie, and the better to assure the kingdom with examples of seueretie: the prince of Orenge euen in the market place of Naples where the plage raged most, and in the publike view of the people, caused to be beheaded Federike Caietan sonne to the Duke of Tracetto, and Henry Pandon Duke of Bouiano a discendant of one of the daughters of olde Ferdinand king of Naples, together with foure other Napolitains, extending also the same rigour of punishment vpon other places of the kingdom: with which maner of proceding no lesse pityfull in the persons, thē dangerous for the example, he reduced into feare and astonishment the mindes of all men, not omitting to proceede against the absent such as had folowed the french faction with confisquacion of their goods, which afterwardes he suffred to be compounded for with money, & did not forget any violence or extremity by the which he might draw greatest summes of money: All which actions of murder and oppression were supposed to haue their deuise and resolucion by the witte of Ierom Moron to whom was giuen in recompense of his seruices, the Duchie of Bouiano: To these emotions and sturres was added the exploit of Iohn Iacques Franquo in Abruzza, who entred for the french king into Matrina which is neare to Aquila, by whose comming all the partes & people of the contrey drew into commocion, neither was the region of Aquila without suspiciō of rising, where lay sicke with six hundred footemen Serro Colonno: Moreouer the Venetians made prouision for the affaires of Povvylla, who sending by sea certeine companies of light horsmen to furnish Barletto, one part of the vessells which caried them perished in the lakes of Barletto and Trany, where there Treasorer was drowned seeking to saue his life in a litle skiffe: The companies of horsemen who had for their leader Iohn Conrardo Vrsin, being sore beaten with the rage of the tempest, fell into the handes of the imperialls: & Iohn Pavvle de Cero who made his shipwracke neare Guast, remeined prisoner to the Marquis: In the latter end of the yeare, the region of Aquila became for the league by the meane of the Bishop there and good working of Count Montoiro with others of the exiles, who being hardly vsed by the imperialls sought their remedie by reuolt.

Execucions at Naples.

In the beginning of the yeare 1529. began to appeare on all sides certeine signes and & good disposicions to peace, which seamed to carie a generall desier to be solicited & negociated in the Popes court: for, as there was good aduertisemēt that the Cardinall Saint Crosse (such was the title of the Spanish generall) was gon vp to Rome with warrant from the emprour to conclude a peace: so the french king whose desier to end the warres was nothing inferiour, dispatched to the same end a commission to his embassadours, in which action also the king of England tooke interest, and in the same regard sent agents to Rome, which matters of negociaciō & hope of peace ioyned to the trauell & wearynes of princes, brought the confederats to proceede slowly in the prouisions of the warre: for that in Lombardie their greatest thought & care was whether the Spaniards being come to Genes could passe to Millan, from whēce the launceknights for want of pay, were almost all retired: and to conduit them thether, Belioyense with a hundred horsemen was gonne vp as farre as Casa: and from thence in habit disguised was passed into Genes, from whence he led the saied foote-bands of Spaniards to Sauona, with intencion to gather together fiue hundred more newly come out of Spaine, and were disbarked at Villa franco.

But in the realme of Naples the imperialls could not but dowt, that the rebellion of Aquila and Matricia together with the sturres and risinges that had bene made in Povvilla, would breede & bring forth some matter of farre greater importaunce: and therefore to cut of and remedie the mischiefe affore the ill were come to his fulnes, they determined to conuerte to the expugnacion and suppression of those places, the forces they had: & in that resolucion the Marquis of Guast with his regiment of Spanish footemen, was sent out to recouer the townes of Povvilla, and the prince of Orenge likewise with his Launceknights was dispatched to reconquer Aquila and Matricia: who assoone as he made his approches to Aquila, they that were within issued out and left the place abandoned, The prince compounding for the citie and the whole contrey at a raunsom of an hundred thowsand duckats, and tooke awaie by vertue of his conqueste & contract the oblacion of siluer which the french king Loys the tenth had consecrated to Saint Barnard: from thence he sent soldiours to Matricia where lay in garrison Camyllo Pardo with foure hūdred footemen, who was gonne awaie not many daies before with promise to retorne againe: But being not without his seuerall feares, both for the wante of wine, whereof was left no stoare, the necessity of waters which were all cutte from them, and for the faction betwene the towne and the souldiours which was stronge and violent, and lastely for some other reason which men in their timerusnesse wante not: he did not onely not retourne againe, but also he kept from them some of that releiffe of money which the Florentyns had sent to him for the defending and succouring of that place: By reason of which disorders, both their leader hauing left them, and their wantes without comfort or hope of releuing, the soldiours went in their araie vpon the walls, and the townesmen rendred the place. The consideracion of these good euents and issues, brought a feare least the prince of Orenge would passe into Tuskane, at the instance of the Pope, who being deliuered of a most daungerous but short disease, ceassed not to solicite and giue hopes to all men: he promised the frenchmen to sticke to the league, so farre foorthe as Rauenna and Seruia were rendred to him: And he offred to compound vnder reasonable condicions with the Florentyns and Duke of Ferrara, who touching the payments of mondy made before to Monsr Lavvtrech, affirmed that what he did in those paymentes was of his liberalitie and not by vertue of obligacion, for that the Pope had forborne to ratifie. On the other side, now that he had recouered (though at great charges) the Castells of Ostia and

Ciuita vechia by vertue of a cõmiſſion which the Cardinal Saint Croſſe had brought, he enterteined with themperour intelligences more ſecrete and practiſes more certeine then before: yea they debated rather vpon their affaires particular (which began to be managed in a courſe more aſſured and ſecret) then that there paſſed betwene them any action or ſolicitacion tending to the vniuerſall peace. Onely in Barletto theſtate of affaires was this: Barletto was holden for the frenche king, within the which was Ranſo de Cero, and with him the prince of Melffe, Federike Caraffa, Symon Roman, Camyllo Perdo, Galeas de Farurſo, John Conrard Vrſin, and the prince of Stigliano: The Venetyans had Trany, Pulignany and Monopoly: their forces in thoſe places were two thowſand footemen and ſix hundred horſemen Albenois, whereof two hundred were within Monopoly: They had alſo at their deuocion the port of Bieſtry: Nowe after the french king had ſent in the beginning a ſmall prouiſion of money to thoſe companies, he forbare afterwardes to releue them with any further ſupplies, nor did not accept the xij. bodies of Gallies offred to him by the Venetyans of which three periſhed in the lake of Bieſtry with a great foyſt, as they wẽt to reuittell Trany and Barletto: And of the reſidue they had loſte at ſundrie times fiue more ſauing notwithſtanding their artilleries and other furniſhments: The french men helde alſo the mount Saint Angeo, and Nardo in the quarter of Ottranto, and Caſtro wherein was the Count Dugẽto: The actions of the warre were perfourmed with the bodies and men of the kingdom, and with the forces of the contrey, many rebelles to themprour were aſſembled in ſundrie places, and many were drawne into companies and ſtrength, who as aduenturers folowed the warre for pillage onely: So that the condicion of the contrey was farre more miſerable then any man would haue beleeued, euery towne and place being layed open to robberies, prayes, raunſoms and wretched burninges on all ſides: Onely the extorſions and inuaſions of Symon Roman were more intollerable then any other, who ouer running with his light horſemen and a bande of two hundred and fitie footemen all the partes and confins of thoſe contreys, brought oftentimes into Barletto greate droaues of cattell, and greate quantitie of corne, with othennature of bootie and ſpoile: And in that libertie of warre running a race of vexacion and crueltie, he woulde ſometimes by ſurpriſe and ſometimes with force, inuade townes and places with wretched examples and actions of inhumanitie: of which the towne of Canoſa was a lamentable experience, where entring by night by the benefitte of skaling ladders, he putte the towne to ſacke and many of thinhabitantes to death whom he founde ſleeping in their laſt reſt, he ſtripped likewiſe in that exploit many horſemen of the fortie men at armes that laie in the caſtell: At laſt the Marquis of Guaſt forbearing to exeeute any action vpon Barletto being a towne ſtronge and fortified, ſetled his campe in march before the towne of Monopoly with iiij. thowſand Spaniards footemen and two thowſand Italyans, for, the Launceknightes beinge in nomber two thowſand fiue hundred, & ſtaying in Abruzza, refuſed to go to Povvylla: he incamped himſelfe in a ſmall vallie ſo ſhadowed and couered with the mountaine, that he could not be endomaged with the artilleries of the towne: In the towne were Camillo Vrſin & Iohn Vetturio treaſorer, to whom Ranſo ſent ſpeedely vpõ the gallies three hundred footemen: Monopoly is a towne of ſmall circuit, and hath the ſea on three partes of it, and towards the land it beareth a wall of three hundred or three hundred & fifty paſſes with a ditch about it: right againſt this wall the Marquis cauſed to be made a baſtillion within the ſhot of harquebuze, & two others vpon the ſea ſhoare, of either ſide one: They bette the ſea and the gate towardes the ſea and gaue impediment that no

ſuccours or vittels ſhoulde enter by the helpe of the gallies: And ſo hauing made theſe preparations in the beginning of April, the Marquis gaue the aſſault to Monopoly where he loſt more then fiue hundred ſouldiers and many pioners, beſides three peeces of artilleries which were broken, retyring with his harmes about a mile and an halfe from the place for that he was not able to endure the vexation of the artilleries out of the towne: By reaſon of which retiring the Venetians iſſued out and ranne vpon the baſtillions which he hadde made, making ſlaughter of more then an hundred bodies, and with the ſame felicitie they aſſured the Port or Hauen by a mount which they raiſed vpon the ſhore right oueragainſt the baſtillion of the enemies: Neuertheleſſe, though the Marquis was repulſed, yet he coulde not bee made deſperate, but making newe approches to Monopoly, and returning from whence he was repulſed, he raiſed two caualiers to beate within the towne, he caſt alſo trenches to leade him euen vnto their ditches, and filled them with ſixe hundred loades of earth rammed in baskets: But not long after, that Baſtillion was burned by the induſtrie of two hundred footmen iſſuing to that ende out of Monopoly: Afterwards the Marquis being approched with a trench vpon the right ſide of the batterie: and hauing driuen another trenche on the right ſide of the lodging of the Spaniards within a hand throwing of the ditch, and alſo after he had fortified a Baſtillion behinde the ſame, he planted vpon it his artilleries and executed three ſcore faddoms of wall there about within foure faddoms of the earth: But vnderſtanding that the ſame night were entred newe companies ſent by Ranſo, he retyred his artilleries, and conſequently the end of the moneth of May drawing on, he brake vp his campe: During the lying of this campe before Monopoly and after it was leuied and retyred, there followed diuers factions and emotions, both for the great harmes and domages done by them of Barletta by ſpoyle and bootie, and alſo the garriſon that was within mount Saint Angeo hauing for commaunder Federik, Caraffo, tooke Saint Seuero, and reskewing the towne of Viro, they compelled th Imperialls to leuie their campe from before it: After that Caraffa went by ſea with xxvj. ſailes to Lanciano, where laye an hundred and three ſcore men at armes, and entring the place by force, he brought awaye as teſtimonies of his valloure three hundred horſe of ſeruice, and a great bootie of other natures of thinges, without leauing anye garriſon in the place: There were alſo manye trowpes of exiles who did greate harmes in Baſillicato, for whiche difficulties as the imperials exacted with all their induſtrie the taxes and impoſitions: So there is no dout that if the French king had ſent money and any reaſonable ſupplie of ſuccours, newe affaires and buſines had not growen vpon the imperials throughout the whole kingdome, which had at leaſt ſo encombred th Emperours armie that it would haue entangled the courſe of their owne affaires: But ſo diſordred were their companies both vndiſciplined and accuſtomed to tumults, and deliuered vp without any ſuccours or refreſhing (for the Florentins miniſtred onely reliefe to Ranſo) that they coulde not doe any action of great conſequence, ſeeing withall that both the Duke of Ferrara refuſed to ſende to Ranſo by ſea foure peeces of artilleries, and alſo the ſtore of money and corne began to diminiſh within Barletta: Moreouer, about ſixe hundred rebels of the countrey of Calabria, beſieged by the Viceroy within Montlyon, were driuen for want of munition and vittels to render the place, and in that calamitie were led priſoners to Naples: Afterwards the Prince of Melffe with the armie by ſea, and Federik Caraffa by land, went to incampe before Malfetta, a place aforetime belonging to the Prince, where Federik in fighting for the ſauetie of his life, was ſlaine with a ſtone: In reuenge of whoſe death the Prince extended his indignacion ſo farre vpon the towne, that taking it by force, he put it to a miſerable ſacke: A lyke miſaduenture fel vpon Simon Roman, for that as the Venetian armie which from the cape of Ottronta vexed all the countrey, was drawen neare to Brunduſo, they ſet on land certaine companies of ſouldiers with whom was Simon Roman, and caryed the towne, but in aſſaulting the rocke Simon was ſlaine with a bollet.

Proceedings of Monſr Saint Pol in Lombardy.

Whileſt the Realme of Naples was thus trauelled with diuers ſucceſſes, the matters of Lombardie ſuffred no great tranquillitie: Monſr Saint Pol about the ende of march tooke by force the towne of Seuarella, and the Caſtel compounded to ſtand newter: But the vallour of the enemies recouered againe the thing whiche by his induſtrie he could not keepe, for that he loſt one night by ſurpriſe, the towne which erſt he had wonne by force, the ſame with other reaſons driuing a feare into him, that he was no longer able to ſtoppe the Spanyardes the way to Millan, he ſawe alſo a dayly diminucion of the nombers of his campe for want of money, whereof as he receiued but very litle from the King, ſo of that litle being a Captaine of litle gouernment, he exſpended one part for him ſelfe and ſuffred an other part to bee imbeacelled and robbed by his officers: The King and Venetians diſputed what enterpriſe were good to take in hand: The King made inſtance to aduaunce the exployte of Genes, both for the importance of that citie, and alſo for that it beganne to be a beleefe amongſt them that the next ſommer the Emperour woulde paſſe into Italie: And for that the King eſteemed that the Venetians had neuer holpen him eyther to reskewe or to recouer that Citie, Wherein notwithſtanding they excuſed them ſelues by an vniuerſall rumour running in Italie of the diſcending of newe Launceknightes, yet he could not but dout that they were ill contented to fauour the victorie of that enterpriſe: But the Venetians to obſcure for the time the memorie of that exployte, brought into deuiſe the action of Millan whiche both they layde out to be very eaſie for the ſmall nomber of ſouldiers that were with Antho. de Leua, and alſo they offred that when the conqueſt of Millan were perfourmed they would adminiſter to the enterpriſe and beſieging of Genes: In which regarde the reſolution went by the Kings conſent to imbrace the enterpriſe of Millan with a camp of ſixteene thouſand footmen, of whom euery one to make prouiſion for the moyty: This reſolucion was made in march and in the abſence of the Duke of Vrbin, who for that the Prince of Orenge and the Launceknightes were drawen neare the confines of the kingdome, was retyred vpon his owne eſtate almoſt againſt the will of the Venetians; who neuertheleſſe reteyned him of newe into their paye with the ſame condicions which aforetime they hadde paſſed to Bartl. Aluiano and the Count Petillano, ſending him alſo for his defence three hundred horſemen and three thouſande footemen according to the contract of their obligacion, and gaue the title of gouernour to Ianus Fregoſo: There were in the armie of the Venetians ſixe hundred men at armes, a thowſande light horſemen, and foure thouſande footemen, notwithſtanding they were bounde to mainteine xij. thouſand: This armie the ſixt of April tooke by force Caſſiano, and the rocke rendred to diſcreſſion, when Antho. de Leua & Toruiello being commen out of Millan to diuert or draw away the enemies, returned back without doing any thing: The Spaniards paſſed frō Genes to Millan, notwithſtanding to ſtop them, there had bene made ſo many deuiſes & reſolucions: for, where Monſr Saint Pol & the Venetians had ſuppoſed that they would make their paſſage by the partes of Tortona & Alexandria, they tooke at their departure frō Voſtaggio & by the direction of Belioyenſo, the way that was more long by the moūtaine of Plaiſance & places ſubiect to the church: And being comen to Varſy in the sayde mountaine, notwithstanding Saint Pol made to march from thence an hundred and fiftie horsemen appoynting their waye to Loda, and also the companies of the Venetians, who for that they woulde be before, sent one parte of their bands to the Duke of Millan, but both later by one daye then they shoulde, and in lesse nombers then they promised, yet they passed by night the ryuer of Pavv at Areno vsing the seruice of the vessels of Plaisanca: So that being no more able to stoppe their vniting with Antho. de Leua, whoe for the more safetie and facilitie of their ioyning was come to Landriano within twelue miles of Pauia, they mette and ioyned with him, and so being conduited to Millan so poore and naked of al things that they seemed to beare the resemblance of rogues, they encreased the calamities of the inhabitants there, by putting them to spoyle and robberie euen in the streets: Thus was litle profitable to the French and Venetians al their actions and doings of the whole winter, which were extended to stoppe the passage of their souldiers to take Gauy and places inuironing Gonos and Casa, places doing great domages to the whole countrey: Moreouer, Antho. de Leua tooke Binasquo by composition: But where the Spaniards had serued their turnes of the Barkes of Plaisanca, and that as was beleeued, they had not remoued had they not bene assured that in case of necessitie they might retire into that citie, besides many other apparances and tokens, the confederates began to rise in suspicion, that the Pope specially touching the restitution of the Castels, was either entirely accorded, or at least verie neare to accorde with th Emperour.

Nowe where the Pope in great secrecie, had disposed all his thoughtes to recouer the estate of Florence, wherein albeit to circumuent the French Ambassadours, he enterteyned sundrie practises and ledde both them and the other confederates in diuers humours of hope to accord with the league: Yet being partly mooued with feare of the greatnesse of the Emperour and the prosperitie of his affaires, and partly through hope to induce him more easely then he could induce the French King, to restore aud reestablish his house in Florence, he enclined much more on the Emperours side then on the French Kings: He had also a vehement desire to make easie his deuise to drawe to his deuocion the estate of Perousa, in which action it was beleeued that he enterteyned Braccio Baillon, who managed euery day newe driftes in those confines: By reason whereof Malatesta douting least whilest he was in his pay, he should be oppressed with his fauour, thought it necessarie for him to seeke to put him selfe in the protection of an other: Therefore either induced with that reason, or caryed with a couetousnes after greater parties, or pushed on with a passion of auncient hatred, he refused to reenter into his paye, pretending that he was not bounde for the whole yeare, but at his election, for that as he alleaged the contract appeared not by writing, notwithstanding the Pope mainteyned a further obligation: So that he solicited to enter into the paye of the French and Florentins, complayning bitterly of certaine intelligences and practises enterteyned against him by the Cardinall of Cortono, and of a letter which he had surprised written by the Cardinall Medicis to Braccio Baillon: But the Pope seeking indirectly to stoppe the effect of his deuice, forbad by Edicts publike that none of his subiectes without his leaue, shoulde take the payes of other Princes vpon paine of confiscation: Neuertheless, Malatesta forbare not for that to prosecute his deuise: The Frenchmen bounde them to indue him with a charge of two hundred horsemen, two thowsand crownes pension, the order of Saint Michael, and in time of warre with two thowsand footemen: And the Florentines gaue him the title of Gouernor, two thousand crownes pension, a thousand footmen in time of warre, fiftie horsemen for his sonne, and fiftie for the sonne of Horatio with fiue hundred crownes for the paye of them both: They tooke vpon them the protection of his estate and of Perousa, and aswel the French King as they made him one ioynt allowance in time of peace of an hundred crownes the moneth to enterteyne ten Captaines: And the Florentines a part made him a paie for two hundred footmen for the garde of Perousa, and for his part he was onely bounde to this to goe to their seruice with a thousande footemen when their affaires required, yea, though he shoulde not haue the bandes promised from the Frenche King: Of this dealing the Pope complayned highlye to the Frenche King as a matter done directlye to let him for disposing according to his will, of a Citie whiche was vassall and subiect to the Churche, the same making the King who bare no mynd to kindle the Pope, to deferre the action of ratification: and for the same cause the Pope hoping to be able to alter or retyre Malatesta, perswaded him to continue out his yeare, and at the same time he enterteyned secretly Braccio Baillon, Sero Colonno, and the exiles of Perousa, who hauing assembled and mustered bands of souldiers, lay incamped at Norcio: But all these practises together with all offers and oblacions serued to no purpose, for that Malatesta was resolutely fixed to continue no longer in the Popes paye, and as the Florentins ministred ayde to him openly, so he feared so much the lesse those stirres or emocions by howe much they ceassed foorthwith, the Pope finding they were vnperfect and insufficient to leade on his hopes to their effectes: Besides, the Pope would not suffer the Duke of Ferrara to dwel in rest, and he was so farre off from obseruing the couenants made with the Duke in the name of the Colledge of Cardinals, that the byshoprike of Modena being newly fallen into vacacion by the death of Cardinall Gonzaguo, an estate promised to the Dukes sonne by the sayde couenants, he bestowed it by his authoritie vpon Ierom Moron, seeking vnder colour of refusing the possession, occasion to prouoke against him suche a personage and minister bearing great authoritie in the Emperours armie: He enterteyned also a practise with Ierom Pio, to occupie Reggia, and that by the meane and operacion of Hubert de Gambaro gouernour of Bolognia: But when the Duke was informed of the state of the practise and how farre it extended, he passed Pio to such propertie of punishment as his offence deserued: He layde plotts also to surprise Rauenna, which likewise sorted to none effect: And about this time inclining dayly by apparant degrees to the Emperours part, and being also well aduaunced in the solicitation of things, he sent vnto him the Byshop of Vasono his stewarde, he called backe the cause of diuorce of the King of Englande which he had done long time before, had not the regarde of the Bull which was already in Englande in the hands of his Legat Campeius reteyned him: For, as the good fortunes of the Emperour encreased in Italie, so he sought not onely not to offende him further, but also to reuoke the offence he had done him alreadie, being in deede determined before he was sicke, to reuoke the cause: In which action he sent Frauncis Compagnio into Englande to the Cardinall Campeius, dissembling to the King that he was sent for other matters including notwithstanding matter apparteyning to that cause, where in deede he brought commission to Campeius to burne the Bull: And albeit Campeius for a maladie the Pope was fallen into, deferred for a time the execution of that commission, yet when he knewe he was recured, he perfourmed the thyng he was commaunded: So that the Pope being thus deliuered of that feare, reuoked the cause though not without great indignation of that King, especiallie when he required

the Bull of the Legate and vnderstoode by him the vnworthie accident of it: These matters made both more seuere and more readie the ruine and fall of the Cardinall of Yorke, whose authoritie the King supposed to be so great and gracious with the Pope, that if his mariage with the Lady Anne had bene agreeable to him, he might haue obteyned of the Pope what dispensation he had woulde: By whiche occasion opening his eares to the enuie and mallice of his aduersaries, he grewe kindled against him euen to the taking from him his goodes and treasure of a wonderful value, and in his indignation leauing him a smal part of the reuenues of his benefices, he restrayned him to his Byshoprike with a slender traine of seruants: And so not long after, eyther by a surprise of letters which he wrote to the French King, or for some other propertie of malice of his enemies, who gathering by the Kings speches that he was not without inclinacion towardes him, and therefore feared least he woulde rise againe into his auncient authoritie, he was conuented to appeare in counsell to speake for him selfe in matters to be obiected against him: For whiche cause as he was brought towards the Court as prisoner, he was suddenly taken with a fluxe, engendred either of the humour of disdaine, or of the passion of feare, of which he dyed the seconde day after he was apprehended with the maladie, an example in our dayes worthie of memorie touching the power whiche fortune and enuie hath in the Courts of Princes.

Cause of the ruine of the Cardinal of Yorke.

About this time fell out in Florence to the greate preiudice of the gouernment that then was, a newe chalenge against Nicholas Cappony Gonfalonier, it happened almost vpon the end of the second yeare of his magistracie, and was incensed principallie by the enuie of some of the chiefe citisens, who tooke occasion of the vaine suspicions and fond ignorancies of the commons: Nicho.Cappony during all the time of his magistracie hath had these two principall obiectes, the one to defend him selfe against the freshe enuie of those that had bene honored of the house of Medicis, suffring the principals amongst them to communicat with the other Citisens in the honors and counsels publike: And the other not to stirre or make angrie the minde of the Pope in matters which were not of importance touching the libertie: Of whiche things both the one and other had bene founde profitable to the common wealth: for, like as many euen of those who were persecuted as enemies to the gouernment, being assured and embraced had bene firmely conioyned with the others to preserue the state, knowing withall that the Pope for matters happening in the times when the gouernment chaunged, was ill contented with them: So touching the Pope, albeit he desired vehemently the returning and restauration of his friends, yet hauing no newe prouocation or matter of wrong, he had so much the lesse occasion to burst out & to complaine as he did cõtinually with other Princes: But against these matters was opposed the ambition of certaine particulers of them, who knowing wel ynough that if such shoulde be admitted to the gouernment as had bene friends to the Medicis being in deede men of most experience and vallour, that their estate and authoritie should be made lesse, labored by all the studies and deuises they coulde to keepe the common people full of suspicion both of the Pope and of them, not sparing to slaunder the Gonfalonier aswel for those causes, as also to thende to depriue him of his magistracie for the thirde yeare, to charge him that he bare not a minde so farre estraunged from the familie of Medicis, as the interest and profite of the common weale required: Which imputacions and chalenges not mouing him at all, and holding it very necessarie not to haue the Pope incensed, he tooke the more libertie to enterteyne him priuatly with letters and em-

baſſages, yet ſuch as he had not begunne nor proſecuted without the continual priuitie and knowledge of ſome ſuch as were principals & chiefe magiſtrates, neyther did he manage them to other ende then to reteyne or retyre the Pope frō ſome act of precipitation: But where as a letter that was ſent to him from Rome fel by misfortune into interception, bearing certaine wordes to breede ſuſpicion in ſuch as knew not the ground and foundation of thoſe thinges, and the ſame letter being paſſed ouer into the hands of ſome of thoſe that ſate and managed the ſupreme function: There were certaine youngmen prepared to ſedition, who riſing into armes inuaded by force the publike pallace, and in their inſolencie reſtrained the Gonfalonier almoſt vnder garde, and going on to confirme this beginning with actes of manifeſt rebellion, they ſummoned together in maner of a tumult, almoſt all the magiſtrates and many citiſens, where they debated to depriue him of his magiſtracie: Whiche being approued in the great counſel, his cauſe was afterwards referred to the examination of the law, wherein being abſolued by iudgement and ſentence, he was ledde with great honour to his houſes accompanied with the greateſt preſence of the Nobilitie: In his place was preferred Frauncis Carduccio, a perſonage vnworthie of ſo great a dignitie regarding his lyfe paſſed, his cuſtomes and his wicked endes and intentions.

Nowe beganne new ſtirres to appeare in Lombardie, Monſr Saint Pol hauing paſt the riuer of Pavv at Valencia, the xxvij. of Aprill, by reaſon of which proceeding the Imperialls abandoned the Borowe of Baſignagua, and the pariſhe of Caira: From thence Saint Pol ſent Guido Rangon with one parte of the armie to Montaro, a place ſtrong for the double ditches, flankes and waters: And as they had planted by night their artilleries without prouiſions of baskets, without trenches and other like preparations, they were by day charged by thoſe that were within, ſuche as did them greate harmes, and cloyed two peeces of their artilleries and put the reſidue in daunger to be loſt: At that time albeit there was within Millan a ſlender prouiſion of thinges neceſſarie, yet the preparacions of the French and Venetians were in no better condicion, who complayning one of an other, were both negligent to furniſhe thinges needefull: In ſo muche as amongſt other difficulties the confederates fell into ſome dout, that the Duke of Millan for the litle hope he ſawe remayning to reconquer that ſtate eyther by his owne forces or with their ſuccours, woulde make ſome accorde with the imperials by the meane and working of Moron: But the thoughtes and deuiſes of the Frenche King tended altogether to peace for a diſtruſt he hadde not to bee able otherwaies to recouer his children: Whereunto alſo the Emperour bearing a manifeſt inclination, two gentlemen whom the Lady Margarit had ſent to him for that effect, were returned from Spaine bringing to her ample commiſſion to goe through with the peace: Of whiche when the French King was aduertiſed by a ſecretarie of his whom for that matter he had diſpatched into Flaunders, he required the confederates for their partes to addreſſe commiſſioners alſo: And hauing determined in him ſelfe to leaue there all the prouiſions of the warre, yet ſeeking to worke vnder ſome iuſt colour, he complained that the Venetians had refuſed to contribute to the money for his paſſage: Who albeit in the beginning (ſo farre foorth as the Emperour paſſed) they had earneſtlye ſolicited him to paſſe, which alſo the King had offred to perfourme with two thouſande foure hundred Launces, a thouſand light horſemen & xx. thouſand footmen, in caſe the confederates would giue him mony to paie aboue this, a thouſand light horſemen and xx. thouſande footmen, & contribute to the moytie of the

exſpenſes

exſpenſes of thartilleries: yet what ſoeuer was thoccaſion, they chaunged counceil and retyred from thoſe offers.

At this time Monſr Saint Pol with foure cannons tooke Saint Angeo by force, wherein was a garriſon of foure hundred footemen, and in the ſame expedicion he conuerted his ſtrength to Columbano to open to his campe a paſſage of vittells from Plaiſanca, and made him ſelfe maiſter of the place by compoſicion. Afterwards being informed that there lay a force of foure thowſand footemen within Myllan but much weakned with maladies, he thought to aſſalt it: The ſecond of Maye Moraro rendred to Monſr Saint Pol at diſcreſſion, though after it had ſuffred ſo great an execucion of thartilleries that there was no more poſſibilitie to make defenſe: Torniello left alſo the towne of Nouaro but not the caſtel, wherin he put a very ſlēder ſtrength of footemen, & retyred his perſon to Myllan: So that the Imperials helde no other peece beyond the ryuer of Theſin then Gaya and the rocke of Biagraſſa, Monſr Saint Pol hauing alſo gotten the rock of Vigeuena. The tenth day he marched to the bridg of Locqua to ioyne with the Venetians at the borow of Saint Martyn: Here the Duke of Vrbyn came to the armie, And from thence being gone vp to Belioyenſo to haue conference together, the reſolucion was in the common counceil to incampe before Myllan with two armies on two ſides, for which expedicion Monſr Saint Pol paſſing ouer Theſin ſhould turne to Biagraſſa to force it, & the ſame day the Venetians to go to the borow Saint Martyn which is within fiue miles of Millan, the Venetians aſſuring that their campe conteined xij thowſand footemen, & Monſr Saint Pols viij thowſand, to whom was to be ioyned the bands of footemen of the Duke of Millan. By this direction Monſr Saint Pol paſſed the riuer of Theſin, and finding the towne of Biagraſſa abandoned, he caried the caſtell by accord, And ſo incamping at Gazzano about eight miles from Millan, he conferred of newe with the Duke of Vrbyn at Binaſquo the third of Iune: In which place they were credibly certefied that the Venetians had not in their campe the one halfe of xij. thowſand footemen according to the capitulacions of the contract, A matter which for that Monſr Saint Pol complained greatly vpon, it was ſet downe that Millan ſhould be approched with one camp onely on that ſide of Lazzaretto, notwithſtanding the proteſtacion of Count Guido, who alleaged that Antho. de Leua at whoſe deuocion remeined only Millan & Coma, was wont to ſay that Millan could not be forced but with two camps: But not many daies after thoſe opinions & councels being chaunged, the Chieftaines of both the armies being aſſembled within Loda, The Dukes of Millan & Vrbin notwithſtanding they ſolicited before to haue the campe go to Myllan & were flatly againſt the expedicion of Genes, yet they were now of a contrary aduiſe, the Duke of Vrbin alleaging many reaſons to iuſtifie that newe counceil: But principally he inſiſted vppon this that ſeing th Emprour made preparacion to paſſe into Italy for whoſe conduit Andre Dore was departed from Genes with his gallies the eight of Iune, And withall ſeing in Germany there was intencion to ſend newe companies of launceknights into Italy vnder Capteine Felix, he ſtood indifferent, & in his reaſon & experience could not finde out whether it were better to take Millan or not to take it: Theſe were the reaſons he inferred, But it was beleued that for an opiniō he had of the ſucceding of the peace which was negociated in Flaunders, he had ſignified to the Senat of Venice that it was a matter vnprofitable to put them ſelues in exſpenſes for the recouerie of Myllan: The ſumme & concluſion of his counceil was that the regiments of the Venetians ſhoulde tarye at Caſſiana, the companies of the Duke of Myllan to keepe within Pauya, and Monſr Saint Pol to lye at Biagraſſa, And they by the ſeruice of their

horſemen to ſtoppe that there entred no releeffe of vittels into Myllan where it was ſuppoſed they would within ſhort time fall into want of foode, for that a very ſmall porcion of the contry was conuerted to tillage and ſowing: This opinion could not be altered in him by any reaſons or inducements of Monſr Saint Pol, neither did he approue the abiding of him and his army at Biagraſſa, alleaging that to pyne & hunger Myllan, it was enough that the Venetian regiments remeyned at Moncio, and the bands of the Duke of Myllan at Pauya, & at Vegeuena: he ſayd alſo that the king preſſed him, that in caſe he went not vp to incampe before Myllan, then to execut thenterpriſe of Genes, which he had in intencion to attempt with a great celerity, hoping that in the abſence of Andre Dore, Cæſar Fregoſa to whom the French king had made a graunt to be gouernor & not his father, would reduce that ſtate to alteracion with a very ſmall ſtrength of footemen: But theſe proceedings and expedicions together with an informacion how much was diminiſhed in footemen the armye of the confederats, did ſo aſſure Antho. de Leua of all daungers for Myllan, that he ſent out Torniello with a very ſlender ſtrength of horſemen and three hundred footemen to recouer Nouaro, obſeruing the oportunitie whileſt the French and Venetians were wandring betweene the ryuer of Theſin and Myllan: he made his entrye by the caſtell which was holden for thImperialls, by which commoditie he recouered Nouaro, and afterwards ſallyed out with his forces to pyll the contrey and get vittells: But this conqueſt was not without his contrary accidents, for that as the Capteine of Nouaro was yſſued out of the caſtell and walked into the towne, two ſouldiours of the Duke of Myllan and three inhabitants of Nouaro that were priſoners in the caſtel, fell vppon the Capteine and ſlue him with the ayde of certeine others that wrought at the caſtell, And in the ſame fortune making priſoners certeine Spaniſh footemen, their vallour made them Lordes of the place hoping after ſo great an aduenture to be ſuccoured by their frendes: They tooke the reaſon of their hope vppon this that the Duke of Millan as ſoone as he vnderſtoode that Torniello was gone out, hauing a feare and iealouzie of Nouaro, had diſpatched into thoſe quarters his brother Iohn Pavvle with a good ſtrength of horſemen and footemen, and he in that expedicion was alreadie gone vp and ariued at Vegeuena: But Torniello was no ſooner aduertiſed of the accident of the caſtell, then he returned with ſpeede to Nouaro, where what with threates which priuaileth muche where the hope is leſſe then the peril, & what with preparacions to giue thaſſault which can not but make timerous ſuch as haue no remedy in their daunger, he ſo aſtoniſhed the ſaid ſouldiours of the Duke of Millan, that compounding only for the ſafety of their perſons, they rendred the caſtel without caring for the liues of the inhabitants of Nouaro by whoſe vallour they executed thexployt of the caſtell: It was determined to vex Millan as much as might be with the forces of the Venetians & regiments of the Duke of Millan, notwithſtanding the Duke of Millan alleaged that becauſe he would be more neare the lands of the Venetians, he would not abide at Moncio, but at Caſtiano: and Monſr Saint Pol who lay incamped at the Abbay of Bibaldono, determined to returne beyond the riuer of Pavv to draw towards Genes: According to which reſoluciō he marched vp to lodge at Landriano which is xij. miles from Millan betwene the waies of Loda and Pauia: And minding the day following which was the xxj. of Iune, to incāpe at Lardiragno vpon the way of Pauia, he ſent before, his artilleries, his cariage, & the auantgard, and departed him ſelfe ſomewhat later with the battell and the rearegard: But when Antho. de Leua was aduertiſed by his eſpialls where he made his abiding and how the auauntgard was gone before, he iſſued out of Millan with his ſouldiours all

couered for their vppermoſt garments with white ſhirts, And becauſe of long tyme his body had beene reduced to debilitie by dolors and griefes, he cauſed his owne perſon to be armed in a chaire which foure men bare: And by that time he was comen within two myles of Landriano without ſownd of drom, he vnderſtoode by his eſpialls that Saint Pol was not yet departed from Landriano, So that ioyning celeritie to the fauors which the tyme and occaſion offred, he haſtned his march & charged vppon them before they were aware of his comming: The firſt eſquadron of the French men commaunded by Iohn Thomas de Gallera, was ſo farre marched away, that he could not in time be at the ſuccors of the reſidue: And albeit Monſr Saint Pol reapoſing much in a regiment of two thowſand launceknights, was diſcended on foote and fought valliantly, yet after they had menteyned a light defenſe, he ſaw them beginne to retyre in whoſe vallour he had layed vp his chiefeſt confidence: And albeit they were ſuſteyned and reskewed by Iohn Ieronimo de Caſtillon & Clavvdo Rangon, Commaunders ouer two thowſand Italians who expreſſed great effects of their vallour: yet in the ende both the horſemen and launceknightes not hable to ſtand againſt the furie and fortune of their ennemies, turned their backs leauing a wretched effect of the hope that was conceyued of them: By their example th Italyans did the like: And Monſr Saint Pol diſpayring to finde by fighting the ſauetie which the reſidue could not finde by fleeing, was eftſoones remounted vppon his horſe, and as he would haue paſſed ouer a great ditche, he fell into the calamitie of a priſoner, hauing pertaking with him in that fortune Iohn Ieronimo de Caſtillon, Clavvdo Rangon, Liquack, Carbon, with other leaders of importance: All the companies were defeated, many horſemen taken priſoners and all the baggage and trayne of the armye and the artilleries ryffled: Almoſt all the men at armes founde ſauetye in the ſwiftnes and ronning of their horſes together with Count Guido leading the auauntegarde with whome he retyred into Pauya, and from thence in the beginning of the night, the ſame feare following them nowe beeing free and at large, which they ſawe in the extremitie of their perill, they went to Loda but ſo perplexed with aſtoniſhment that they were almoſt at poynt to breake and diſorder of them ſelues: Many of the ſouldiours remeyned in the wayes, their horſes hauing no forces to cary them whether their feare would chaſſe them, And the Capteines excuſed their ronning awaye for that their companies were not payed, of whome the French bands returned all into Fraunce.

Monſr Saint Pol priſoner to Antho. de Leua.

Thus armes and warre beeing almoſt layed aſide thorowe all Italy by reaſon of the harde euents and aduerſities of the French men, The cogitacions of the greateſt Princes were conuerted and diſpoſed to accord: The firſt accord that ſucceeded was betweene the Pope and the Emprour which was concluded at Barſelona to the Popes greate aduauntage: Wherein th Emprour had the one of theſe two reaſons, eyther for that hauing a greate deſire to paſſe into Italye, he ſought to take awaye all impediments to his voyage, accompting it in that regarde verye neceſſarye to haue the Popes amitye: or els for that he woulde with verye large and ample capitulacions giue the Pope a greater occaſion to forgette the wronges and offences which he had receyued of his Agents and his armye: The ſubſtance of thaccorde was this: That betweene the Pope and the Emperour ſhoulde be a perpetual peace and confederacion: That the Pope ſhould giue paſſage to the Emprours armye through the dominions of the Churche, in caſe it ſhould depart out of the kingdom of Naples: That th Emprour in contemplacion of the new mariage and for the tranquillitie of Italy, ſhould reſtore in Florence the ſonne of Lavvrence

de Medicis, to the ſame eſtate of greatnes wherin were his predeceſſors before they were expulſed, hauing notwithſtanding regarde to the exſpenſes which were to be defrayed for the ſayd reſtitucion according to the arbitracion to be made aſwell by him as the Pope: That thEmprour ſhoulde aſſaye aſſoone as he coulde, eyther by armes or ſome other way more comely, to reeſtabliſh the Pope in the poſſeſſion of Ceruia, Rauenna, Modona, Reggia, and Rubiero, without preiudice to the rights of the Empire and the ſea Apoſtolike: That the Pope hauing recouered the townes aboue ſayd, ſhould accord to thEmprour thinueſtiture of the Realme of Naples in remuneracion of that benefit, and ſhoulde reduce the tribute of the laſt inueſtiture to a white horſe for a fyne or acknowledgement of chiefe: That he ſhould accord to him the nominacion of xxiiij Cathedrall Churches, for the which they were in difference, remeyning to the Pope the diſpoſicion of the Churches which ſhould not be in patronage, & of other benefices: That when thEmprour ſhould be paſſed into Italy, the Pope and he ſhould meete & common together to conſult of the particular quiet of Italy & the vniuerſal peace of Chriſtendom, receiuing one an other with ceremonies and honors due and accuſtomed: That thEmprour, in caſe the Pope required the ayde of the arme ſecular to reconquer Ferrara, ſhould aſſiſt him euen to the ende as Aduocate, Protector and eldeſt ſonne of the ſea Apoſtolike, & that with all the good meanes which at that time ſhould be in his power: And that they ſhould agree of thexſpenſes, proceedings, and formes to be vſed according to the qualitie of times and accidents: That the Pope and Emprour with a common councel ſhould deuiſe ſome meanes to drawe lawfully into iuſtice and examinacion of the lawe by Iudges not ſuſpected, the cauſe of Frauncis Sforce, to thende he might be reſtored if he were found innocent: That otherwayes thEmprour offered notwithſtanding the diſpoſing of the Duchie of Myllan apperteyned to him, to diſpoſe of it with the councell and priuitie of the Pope, and to inueſt in it no perſon which ſhould not be agreable to him, nor otherwiſe to transferre it but in ſorte as he ſhall thinke moſt expedient for the tranquillitie of Italie. That the Emperour promiſed to make to conſent Ferdinand king of Hungria his brother, that for the tyme of the Popes life and two yeares after, the Duchie of Myllan ſhoulde be furniſhed of ſaltes from Ceruya, according to the confederacion made betwene thEmperour and Pope Leo confirmed in the laſt inueſtiture of the kingdome of Naples, not approuing neuertheleſſe the couenaunt that had bene made with the French king, and without preiudice to the rightes of thEmpire and the king of Hungria: That neyther of them a parte, to the preiudice of this confederacion, ſhoulde make touching matters of Italie, new leagues, nor obſerue ſuche as were made to the contrarie of this: And yet neuertheleſſe the Venetians might enter this league, ſo farre foorth as they left all that they poſſeſſed in the Realme of Naples, and accompliſhed all their obligacions to the Emperour and Ferdinand by vertue of the laſt confederacion made betwene them, And alſo to reſtore Rauenna and Ceruya, reſeruing the rightes of the domages and intereſtes ſuffered in regarde of theſe matters: That thEmperour and Ferdinand ſhoulde doe all that they coulde to haue the Heretikes reduced and brought home to the true waye, wherein as the Pope ſhoulde vſe ſpirituall remedies, ſo in caſe they woulde ſtande obſtinate, thEmperour and Ferdinand ſhoulde force them by armes, and the Pope to labour other Chriſtian Princes to aſſiſt them according to their ſeuerall meanes: That the Pope and thEmperour ſhoulde not receiue the protection of the ſubiectes, vaſſalls, and feodatories of one an other, but for the regarde of the iuriſdiction direct which they had of any one, without extending any further: And that all protections taken in other forme ſhould be interpreted voyde and derogate within one moneth: That to make this amitie and coniunction more firme and ſtable, they were to confirme it with the ſtraite knots of parentage, ThEmprour promiſing to giue for wife Margarit his baſtard daughter with a dowrye of twenty thowſand duckats of yearely reuenue, to Alexander Medicis ſonne to Lavvrence late Duke of Vrbyn, vppon whoſe perſon the Pope determined to conuert and beſtowe the temporall greatnes of his houſe, hauing at ſuch tyme as he was in daunger of death created Cardinall Hipolito, ſonne of Iulian. They contracted at the ſame tyme in articles ſeperat: That the Pope ſhoulde accord to thEmprour and to his brother to reſiſt the Turke, the fourth part of the reuenues of benefices Eccleſiaſtike in the ſame manner that his Predeceſſor Adrian had done: That the Pope ſhould giue abſolucion to all thoſe who within Rome and other places had offended againſt the ſea Apoſtolike, and to all ſuch as had miniſtred any proppertie of ayde, councell or fauor, or that any way participated, or ſecretly approued, or expreſly allowed, or directly had conſented, to the actions that had beene done: That where the Emprour had not publiſhed the Croiſſade graunted by the Pope which was leſſe ample then others that had bene beforetimes graunted, That the Pope (the firſt beeing reuoked) ſhoulde paſſe an other of more full and ample forme according to the skoape of thoſe that had bene graunted by the late Popes Iulio and Leo. Before this accorde was paſſed and after all the difficulties were reſolued, aduertiſement came to thEmprour of the ouerthrowe of Monſr Saint Pol: In regarde of which ſucceſſe ſo honorable for the reputacion of his armies there, and no leſſe profitable for the generall eſtate of his affayres, albeit it was doubted that to help his condicions, he would haue chaunged ſome braunch or article of matters agreed vppon, yet he confirmed them all both in ſubſtance and circumſtance, and with a ſinguler readines ratified them the ſame daye which was the xxix. of Iune, accompliſhing with ſolemne othe before the high alter of the cathedrall Church of Barſelona.

Peace betwen thEmprour & French king negociated in Cambray.

But the negociacions of peace betwene thEmprour and the French king were not purſued with leſſe deuocion and diligence, And the better to aduaunce them to ſome good ſucceſſe & yſſue, after the cõmiſſions on all ſides were comen, the towne of Cambray was indifferently appoynted for the aſſemblie and meeting, A place fatal for ſo great concluſions, and where were to conferre together the Lady Margaret of Auſtria and the Lady Regent mother to the French king: The French king labored with all his meanes and diligence, (though he ment not in him ſelfe to performe it) which alſo he confirmed by promiſſes to the confederat Embaſſadors of Italy (hauing therein the conſent & priuitie of the king of England) not to make any accord with thEmprour without the conſent & ſatisfaction of the confederats: for, he feared leſt they entring into a ielouſie & ſuſpicion of his will, would not preuent him & be the firſt that would compownd with the Emprour, and by that meane to leaue him excluded out of the amitie of both ſides: In which reſpect he ſought to perſwade them not to hope in the peace, but rather to keepe their thoughts diſpoſed & turned to the prouiſiõs of the warre: wherein to eſtabliſh ſome good order & forme of proceeding, not ceaſſing to ſolicit continually, he had ſent into Italy the Biſhop of Tarby with commiſſion to goe to the ſtates of Venice, the Dukes of Millan, Ferrara & Florence, both to ſolicit prouiſions apperteyning to the warre, and to promiſſe that if the Emperour paſſed into Italy, he woulde alſo diſcend at the ſame tyme with a mightie armye, ſo farre forthe as the other confederats woulde contribute for their parte touching the preparacions needefull: Neuertheleſſe the negociacions of accord continued more and more, Inſomuch as the ſeuenth day of Iuly both the Ladies made their entries into Cambray by ſeuerall gates with a great pompe, And being lodged in two houſes adioyning hauing an entrye the one within the other, they ſpake together the ſame day, and gaue order to their agents to treate of the articles: Wherein becauſe the kinge woulde be neare at hand to reſolue all difficulties occurring, he was gone vp to Compiequo, to whome the Venetians hauing feare of the yſſue of that coniunction had made many large and great offers: And for the more abſolute negociacion of this peace there were ſent to Cambray as interpoſers in the action, the Biſhop of London and the Duke of Suffolke Embaſſadors for the king of England with whoſe conſent and participacion that aſſembly was made: The Pope ſent thether the Archbiſhop of Capua: There was alſo a preſence of Embaſſadors from all the confederats: To whome the French men made relacion of things farre otherwiſe then was the truth of that that was debated: Wherein the king eyther reteyned ſo great an impietie, or els had ſo ſimple and ſole a thought of his intereſt perticular which conſiſted wholly in the recouerie of his children: That where the Florentyns made greate inſtance to him, that according to thexample of king Levvys his father in lawe and his predeceſſor in the yeare a thowſand fiue hundred and twelue, he woulde conſent that they might accorde with thEmprour for their ſauetie: he refuſed it vnder this promiſe that he would neuer make any accord without comprehending them in it, Aſſuring them alſo that he was moſt ready to follow the warre and promiſed no leſſe to all the others euen in the greateſt heate of ſolicitacion for peace. About the xxiij. of Iuly came aduertiſement of the capitulacions made betweene the Pope and thEmprour, at what tyme albeit the preſent negociacion was well aduaunced, yet it was ſo troubled and hindred for ſome difficulties touching certeine townes of Franche Counte, that the Lady Regent gaue order to prepare to depart: Neuertheleſſe by the working of the Popes Legat, & principally by the operacion and good office of thArchbiſhop of Capua, the concluſion was eſtabliſhed, the French king not leauing to promiſe to the confederats the ſame things he had offred before. At laſt being the fift daye of Auguſt, the peace was ſolemnly publiſhed in the great Church of Cambray, whereof the firſt article conteyned: That the kings ſonnes ſhould be redeliuered ſo farre forth as their father payed to thEmprour for their raunſome twelue hundred thowſande crownes in ready money, and to the king of England for him two hundred thowſand: That the king ſhould render to the Emprour within ſix weekes after the ratificacion, all that he poſſeſſed in the Duchie of Myllan: That he ſhould leaue vnto him Aſt with reſignacion of the rights apperteyning: That he ſhould leaue aſſoone as he could, Barletto with all thoſe peeces which he helde in the Realme of Naples: That he ſhould require the Venetians that according to the forme of the capitulacions of Coignar, they ſhould render the townes of Povvylla: That in caſe they would not, he ſhould declare him ſelfe their ennemie and ayde the Emprour to recouer them with a monthely contribucion of thirtye thowſande crownes, and with twelue gallies, foure ſhippes, and foure gallions payed for ſixe monethes: That he ſhoulde reſtore as muche as was in his power of the pryce of the gallyes taken at Portofino, or els to aunſwer the value deducting and defalking ſo muche as had beene taken ſynce by Andre Dore or other the Emprours Miniſters: That according to the former couenants at Madrill, he ſhoulde renownce the ſouerainty of Flaunders and Artoys, and reſigne the rights of Tournay and Arras: That he ſhould call

in the proceſſe agaynſt the duke of Burbon, and render to him that was dead his honour, and to his heyres his goods: and yet themprour complayned afterwards, that aſſoone as the king had recouered his children, he tooke them from them: That the goods of whom ſo euer occupied in regarde of the warre, ſhould be reſtored to their ſucceſſours: in which poynt themprour tooke occaſion alſo to complaine, for that the king made not reſtitution of the goods occupied vpō the prince of Orenge: That all billes of defiance and chalenge ſhould be ſuppreſſed and cancelled, and chiefly that of Robert de la Marche. The Pope was comprehended in this peace as principall, and the Duke of Sauoy was generally included as ſubiect to themprour, and ſpecially brought in by the nomination of themprour: It was alſo ſet downe that the king ſhould meddle no more in the affayres of Italy nor of Germany in fauor of any potentate, to the preiudice of themprour, notwithſtanding the French king in times following maynteined that he was not by that defended to recouer that which the duke of Sauoy vſurped vpon the realme of Fraunce, as alſo all that he pretended to apperteine vnto him by reaſon of the rightes and claymes of the Ladye Regent his mother: There was alſo one article whiche bare that in the peace it was ment that the Venetians and Florentins ſhould be comprehended, ſo farrefoorth as within foure monethes they were at a poynt with themprour for their differences, which was a kinde of ſecret and ſilent excluſion: That the like ſhould be of the duke of Ferrara: But touching the Barons and exiles of the Realme of Naples, there was no mention made of them.

Aſſone as this accorde was paſt to concluſion, the French king went immediatly to Cambray to viſite the Lady Margaret: And being not without ſome ſhame for ſo fowle a fact agaynſt the confederates, he eſchewed for certayne dayes with ſundrye euaſions, eyther to ſee or heare their Embaſſadours: But in the ende giuing them audience apart, he excuſed him ſelfe vpon the impoſſibilitie to recouer otherwyſe his children: Onely he gaue them comfort that he would ſende the Admirall to the Emperour for their benefite: He gaue them alſo ſundrye other ſweete and vayne hopes, promiſing ſeuerally to the Florentins to lende them for the remedie of their daungers imminent, fortie thouſande duckets, A promiſe performed with the ſame fidelitie that his other offers were: And he ſuffred as though it tended to their benefite, Peter Stephen Colonno whoſe ſeruice he would accept no more, to go to their paye. But during the action and ſolicitation of theſe things, Antho. de Leua had recouered Biagraſſa, and the Duke of Vrbin remayning at Caſtiano which he laboured with the hands working of infinit pyoners to fortifie, compelled them of Pauia and Saint Angeo to holde good, ſaying that the lodging of Caſtiano was very apt to miniſter ſuccours to Loda and Pauia. Afterwards Antho. de Leua went vp to Enzagua, A place within three myles of Caſtiana, from whence he ſent out continually bandes of ſouldiours to skirmiſhe with the Venetians: And laſtely from Enzagua he drewe to Vavvry, eyther for that he ment to runne vp vppon the territories of Bargamaſquo, or elſe becauſe the Venetians had cut from him the courſe and vſage of all water.

Themprour ſendeth to the P. of Orenge to inuade the ſtates of the Florentins.

Viſtarino about this time entred into Valentia by the caſtell, and cut in peeces a garriſon of two hundred footemen that were there: And by this time were aryued by ſea at Genes a regiment of two thouſande Spaniards to tary for the comming of themprour, who immediatly after he had paſſed the accorde with the Pope, ſent direction to the Prince of Orenge to reenforce the army and inuade at the Popes requeſt the ſtate of the Florentins: And when the Prince was come to Aquila and mooſtred his companies vppon the frontiers of the kingdome, he was ſolicited vehemently by the Pope to aduaunce and passe further: For which solicitation he went vp to Rome the laste of Iuly without his forces, to resolue with the Pope vppon the prouisions for the warre: Where after many actions and negociations which sometimes were vppon the poynt to be broken for the difficulties whiche the Pope obiected touching the defraymentes: It was at laste resolued that the Pope should delyuer to him presently thirtie thousande duckets, and within a very shorte tyme after fortie thousande more, to thende that at thEmperours exspences he might first reduce to the obedience of the Churche thestate of Perousa by chasing out Malatesta Baillon, and afterwardes make inuasion vppon the Florentins, to readdresse in that Citie the famulie of the Medicis: An enterprise whiche the Pope esteemed of very easie action, for an opinion he had that beeing abandoned on all sydes, they woulde according to the custome of their elders, rather giue place to the tyme, then to bring vppon their countrey a moste manyfest daunger? Vppon these conditions the Prince of Orenge assembled hys forces which conteyned three thowsand Launceknights, the remaynders aswell of those companies which the Viceroy had brought oute of Spayne, as of others who had passed oute of Germanye into Italye vnder George Fronspergh, and foure thowsande Italians not payed vnder these Colonells, Peter Levvis de Farnose, the Count Saint Second, Colonel Martio, and Serre Colonno: For their better safetie in approching anye place, and to execute anye peece of force, the Pope caused to bee drawen oute of the Castell Saint Angeo, and to bee carryed wyth them, three Cannons with other peeces of Artilleries: And after the Prince of Orenge, was to followe the Marquis of Guast with the bandes of Spanish footemen that were in Povvilla. But at Florence both the generall deliberation was farre otherwise, and the mindes of particular men very resolute to defende their countrey and their libertie, An euent contrary to that which the Pope exspected of that Citie.

Themprour at Genes, vvhither the princes of Italy send embassadours to him.

Whileste these preparations were managed on all partes, the person of themperour departed from Barselona with a great fleete of shippes and gallies, fraughted with a thowsande horsemen, and nyne thowsande footemen: And after he had runne not without perill and trauell a course of fifteene dayes at sea, he aryued the twelfth of August at Genes, where was brought to him the first aduertisement of thaccorde made at Cambray: And at the same tyme passed for him into the partes of Lombardye, Capteine Felix, whom he had taken into his paye with eyght thowsande Launceknightes. The discending of themprour with such a puissant preparation, made astonished the minds of all the regions of Italy, beeing nowe assured that they were left and deliuered vp for pray by the french king: And therfore the Florentins who in that astonishment were not lesse carefull then apperteined to the charge of good citisens, vpon the first aduertisements they had of his comming, sent out foure Embassadors of the most principall and chosen of their towne, to congratulate his comming, and to labour to make some composition with him for their affayres: But afterwards eyther vpon better consideration of things, or vpon the cõmon custome of men to receyue comfort when they knowe the vttermost of their mishap, they tooke courage and began to moderate their commissions, restraining their embassadors to debate only with him of their interests, & not to meddle with the differences of the Pope: wherin they hoped that both for the memory of things past, and for the litle cõfidẽce which is wont to be betwene Popes & Emprors, he would be so much discontented with themprours greatnes, as to be driuen to desire that the authoritie and forces of thestate of Florence might be adioyned to the power of the Church.

The

The Venetians were discontented that the Florentins being ioynt confederates with them, had sent Embassadours to their common enemie without communicating with them: The Duke of Ferrara made also the same complaynt, notwithstanding that following their example he dispatched Embassadours to themprour aswell as they: The Venetians consented that the duke of Millan should do the like: But he had long tyme before enterteyned a secret practise with the Pope to bring him to compound with themprour, which he did so muche the more solicite and aduaunce, by how much he knew euen before the ouerthrowe of Saint Pol, that he could lay no good ground of hope in the French king nor in the Venetians.

Themprour disbarked at Sauona the bands of Spanish footemen whiche he had brought with him, and conuerted them into Lombardy to thend Anth. de Leua might issue out strong into the field: He made an offer to disbarke them at Spetio to thende to sende them into Tuskane, but the Pope had an opinion that so many forces were not necessarie, especially seeing he wished for the preseruation of the countrey, not to addresse without neede so great a furie agaynst the towne of Florence: And yet proceding nowe openly agaynst that state and agaynst Malatesta, he caused to be stayed in the townes of the Church the knight Sperello, who before the capitulation of Cambray beeing sent with money by the French king to Malatesta who had ratified his paye, returned to Perousa: He caused also to be stayed neare to Bracciano, the money sent by the Florentins to the Abbot of Farfa beeing interteyned in their paye with two hundred horsemen, to thende he might leauye for their seruice a thousande footemen: But he was constrayned eftsones to render it to him againe, for that where the Pope had appoynted Legates with themprour, the Cardinalls of Farnesa, Saint Croff, and Medicis, of whom Saint Croff passing by his landes, the Abbot caused him to be stayed, and would not redeliuer him if first he had not restored to him his money.

The Florentins continued still in their preparations, And as they had in vayne moued themprour for a surceasse of armes vntill he had giuen audience to their Embassadours, so prouiding for the euill before the mischiefe happned, they sent to sommon Don Hercules eldest sonne to the duke of Ferrara, whom six monethes before they had taken into their paye with title of Capteine generall, to come to their succours with his companies according to the Articles of his contract: But notwithstanding he had receyued the money that was sent him for impreſt to wage a thowsande footemen allowed for his garde when he marched, yet his father preferring considerations of estare before fidelitie, made him refuse to goe thither, without that he payed backe agayne the money, but sent to their aydes his bandes of horsemen: By reason of which dealing the Florentins denied him the election of the seconde yere.

By the xix. daye of August the Prince of Orenge was come to Terny, and the Launceknightes to Fuligno where was mooſtred the whole army: But it was a matter ridiculous that notwithstanding the peace was made and published betweene themprour and Frenche king, yet the Bishop of Tarba as the kinges Embassadour at Venice, Florence, Ferrara, and Perousa, did not onely boast of the mightie prouisions his king made for the warre, but also comforted them to do the lyke. After this the Prince of Orenge with six thousande footemen aswell Launceknightes as Italians, came and incamped neare to Spello, where presenting him selfe before the towne accompanied with many horsemen to view the situation, it happned that Iohn Vrbina a man for his long trayning in the warres of Italy of the best place and reputation amongeſt all the Capteines of the Spaniſh infanterie, was hurt with a ſhot out of the towne in the thigh, of which wound he dyed within fewe dayes after, to the great domage of the army, for that almoſt the whole courſe of the warre paſſed by his counſell and gouernment: In reuenge of whoſe death thartilleries were planted before Spello, wherin was a ſtrength of more then fiue hundred footemen & twenty horſe vnder the leading of Lyon Baillon baſtard brother to Malateſta: But after there were ſpent certayne bolleys of ſhot vpon a tower whiche is without the towne on the wall ſide, The defendants notwithſtanding Lyon had giuen a great hope to Malateſta to preſerue the towne, yeelded immediatly vpon condition that the towne & inhabitantes ſhould remayne at the diſcreſſion of the Prince, and the ſouldiors with their liues ſaued & ſo much goods as they could cary, ſhould go out in ſafetie wyth their ſwordes onely, and not to ſerue agaynſt the Pope nor themprour in three moneths: Neuertheles contrary to their aſſurance giuen which by the law of armes is a warrant ſufficient and hable, they were almoſt all ſtripped & ſpoyled at their going out: Iohn Baptiſta Burgeſo one of thexiles of Siena was vehemently charged with this accord, who hauing begon to treate with Fabio Petruccio that was in the army, made perfect the concluſion by the ayde of the other capteines, A matter whiche Malateſta referred to diſlōyaltie, but many others attributed it to faintnes of corage. After thembaſſadours of Florence who firſt preſented themſelues before themprour had congratulated his comming, they began to ſignifie vnto him that as their Citie was not ambicious, but thankfull for benefites receyued, and ready to offer all the offices and commodities they could to whom ſoeuer would profeſſe the protection and preſeruation of it: So they ſought to excuſe their action of entring into league with the french king, vpon the wil and inclination of the Pope who then commaunded them, and vpon the law of neceſſitie which had hithervnto compelled them to continue in it: They ſayd they could not paſſe further, for that they were not enhabled by commiſſion: only they had expreſſe commaundement from their common wealth not to open their eares to any practiſe with the Pope, and to viſite his other Embaſſadours, but not the Cardinall Medicis. The great Chauncellor newly called to the dignity of Cardinall, made them aunſwere, that it was neceſſary they ſhould ſatisfie the Pope and reduce him contented both of their doings and of their meanings: And they complayning of the iniuſtice of that demaund, he eſtſones replied that ſeeing their Citie was confederate with thenemies of themprour, and had ſent out armed bandes agaynſt him, that it was falne from her priuileages and diuolued to thempire, and therefore it was in themprour to diſpoſe of it according to hys owne arbitration: But at laſt it was ſayde vnto them on themprours behalfe, that they ſhould procure to be ſent to them ſufficient commiſſion to compounde with the Pope, and that afterwardes ſhoulde be conſidered the differences that were betwene the Pope and them, which if they were not firſt reſolued and compounded, themprour would not common with them of their proper intereſts. Whereuppon theſtate of Florence diſpatched a commiſſion very large and ample to compounde with the Emprour, but not to accord with the Pope: In ſo much as themprour departing from Genes the xxx. of Auguſt and went vp to Plaiſanca, the Embaſſadours following his Court were not admitted into Plaiſanca, for that is was vnderſtanded that their commiſſion was not ſuch as themprour had demaunded: By which meane all things ſuſpended and remayned without accord. Themprour cauſed alſo to depart from his Court thembaſſadors of the duke of Ferrara, whom he receiued with hard tearmes: and yet returning afterwardes with new conditions and happly with new fauors, they were admitted and heard. Moreouer the emprour ſent embaſſador to the french king, the Count Nauſavv, to congratulate with him the newe accorde confirmed with the knot of parentage, and to receiue the ratification: In recõpenſe of which embaſſage and for the ſame expedition, the king ſent to him thadmirall of Fraunce. The king ſent money to Ranſo de Cero to thend that with all his companies he might retyre from Povvilla: and cauſed to be rigged twelue gallies to be ſent thither vnder Phillip Dore agaynſt the Venetians, agaynſt whom themprour ſent out Andre Dore with xxxvij. gallies: Neuertheles the king iudging that the recouering of his children would be more certayne, if there remayned any difficultie in Italy to themprour, he continued to giue diuerſe hopes to the confederates, and promiſed particularly to the Florentins to ſende money to them ſecretly by thadmirall, Not that he had any deſire to miniſter to the wantes of them or the others, but to thend they ſhould ſhew themſelues more hard and ſeuere to compound with themprour.

During all this while there was ſolicited a continuall practiſe of accord betwene themprour and the Duke of Millan, the action wherof was managed wholly by the Pronotory Caraccioll, whoſe office was to come and go from Cremona to Plaiſanca: But where themprour helde it ſtraunge that the Duke reappoſed leſſe confidence in him then he looked for, and the Duke on the other ſide was hardly brought to truſt him at all: there was an ouerture and motion made that tyll the Dukes cauſe were throughly examined, Alexandria and Pauia ſhould be depoſed of truſt into the Popes handes. To this thEmprour would not conſent, bothe for that he thought the Duke was not hable to reſiſte his forces, and alſo for that Anthony de Leua was gone vp to Plaiſanca, who beeing alwayes an enemie to peace and quietnes, had incenſed themprour with many reaſons to purſue the warre: And therefore themprour charged him to goe on with thenterpriſe of Pauia, hauing a deuiſe alſo that at the ſame tyme Capteine Felix who was come with the new ſupplies of Almains aſwell footemen as horſemen and with artilleries, and had firſt paſſed by Peſquiero, and afterwards was entred vpon the lands of Breſſia, ſhould make warre on that ſide vpon the Venetians: of which expedition he had made Capteine generall the Marquis of Mantua, newly returned to the deuotion of the Imperialls.

All this whyle the Pope was not ydle to labour a peace betwene themprour and the Venetians, with hope to conclude it at his cõming to Bolognia: for that where he had before ſolicited to meete themprour and confer with him at Genes, they had ſithence by cõmon conſent referred the place of their enteruiew to Bolognia, chiefly for many apt cõmodities which that city yelded to ſo great an aſſembly. They were not induced being Princes of the greateſt importance to meete together by a common deſire only to confirme the league of their new amitie and coniunction: but alſo they had to cary them their further ſeuerall reſpects, themprour puſhed on by neceſſitie, being determined to take the Crowne of the Empire, & the Pope by ambition, hauing a deſire to aduance the enterpriſe of Florence: and in thẽ both indifferently did concur a ioynt deuotion to eſtabliſh ſome orderly forme ouer the affaires of Italy: a matter which they could not accompliſh without reſoluing the affaires of the Venetians & duke of Millan, and without keping ſome good hande vpon the imminent dangers of the Turke, who being entred into Hungria with a puiſſant army, came on to inuade Auſtria & take Vienna. In this time were done no actions of conſequence betwene themprour & Venetians, for that the Venetians hauing an abſolute inclination to accord with him, & becauſe they would not incenſe him further, had giuen order to retyre their army by ſea frõ thenterpriſe of the caſtell of Brunduſa to Corffu: And seking only to preserue the townes which they helde, they forbare also for that time all exploytes in the regions of Lombardy, except certen light rodes and incursions: and so being only carefull for the gard of their townes, they had put into Bressia the duke of Vrbin. Touching the Almains they were reduced to Lunaro, conteining a nũber of a thousand horsmen & eight or ten thousand footmen: They had resolued together with the Marquis of Mantua, to execute the enterprise of Cremona, where was the duke of Millan, who seeing himselfe excluded from all accorde with thempror, & that Anth. de Leua was gone to incampe before Pauia, & Caracciol gone vp to Cremona to denounce warre to him, cõtracted with the Venetians to conclude no accord with thempror without their consent: and in recompence of that cõtract they bound thẽselues to minister to him for the defence of his estates, a regiment of 2000. footmen payed, with contribution of 8000. duckets for euery moneth: They sent also artilleries & men to Cremona, with which proportiõ of succors & promises, the duke had confidence to be able to defend Cremona & Loda: For touching Pauia, it made a very slender resistance agaynst Anth. de Leua, not only for that it conteined not sufficient vittels for two moneths, but also becausse capteine Pissinard to whom it was cõmitted to kepe & gard it, had not many dayes before sent out of the towne foure companies of footmen to S. Angeo, where Ant. de Leua had made as though he would incampe: for which want of vittels & weaknes of men of whom the numbers were very small within the towne, and worse furnished for the seruice, there was no confidence in all construction of warre and warre causes, to be hable to defende it, and therfore whẽ he saw thartilleries were planted & bent to execute, not enduring the proofe of one bollet, nor the venture of one assalt, he rẽdred the town vnder saftie of life & goods aswell for himselfe as his souldiours: In this action he was charged greatly (which also was a cause to hasten the rendring of the town) that he was more caryed by couetousnes not to loase the wealth and ryches he had gathered together vpon so many prayes and pillages, then induced by any desire to preserue the glory he had gotten in so many excellent and braue exploytes of warre, and chiefly in the seruices of Pauia.

Now was the warre very hotly kindled in Tuskane, for that as the Prince of Orenge had taken Spello, and the Marquis of Guast who followed him with the Spanish infanterie beginning to drawe neare him with his armie, so he went on and aduaunced by good degrees till he came at the bridge of Saint Iohn neare to Perousa vppon Tyber, where ioyned with him the regimentes of Spanish footemen: In this Citie was a strength of three thousand footmen of the Florentins: And the Prince before he planted his campe before Spello, sent a messenger to Perousa to perswade Malatesta to obey the will of the Pope: Who seeking to appropriate to hym selfe by what waye so euer, the Citie of Perousa, and to thende the armie might passe further, made this offer to Malatesta, that if he would leaue Perousa, he would preserue his estates and his proper goods, he would consent that he might freely goe to the defence of the Florentins, and would be bound that Braccio and Sforce Baillons, nor any other his enemies should reenter into Perousa: And albeit Malatesta assured him that he woulde not accept any offer without consent of the Florentins, yet he opened more and more hys eares to thembassages of the Prince, who after he had conquered Spello, solicited hym more vehemently: All these offers and deuises Malatesta communicated wyth the Florentins, beeing happly inclined to passe thaccorde, for that both he feared the ende of things, and was no lesse doubtfull that the Florentins would not continue to giue him all the aydes and succours he desired:

desired: and when by necessitie he shoulde be driuen to accorde, he had no hope to find better condicions then those that were offred him, holding it a better way that without offending the Pope, or to giue him occasion to depriue him of the goodes and places which he preserued for him, to keepe him selfe possessed of the paye of the Florentins, then in standing to his defence which by many arguments was fraile and easuall, both to put wilfully into daunger his whole estate, and also to pul vpon him the hatred of his friends and the towne: So that as he assured dayly and perseuered in this that he woulde not accorde without their priuitie, so also he added that if they would haue him to defende Perousa, they must of necessitie supplie him of new with a thousande footemen, and turne the residue of their companies to make head at Orsaio, a place within fiue miles of Cortona vpon the confines of Cortona and Perousa, a matter which they could not doe without decaying the garrisons of their other townes: And yet the weaknes of the towne was such, that by necessitie they must retyre at euery moouing of the enemies: he perswaded with them also, that in case he did not accord, the Prince leauing the enterprise of Perousa woulde take his way to Florence, in which case also it was needfull that they left him within Perousa a thousand footemen of seruice, which yet would not be sufficient since the Pope had meanes to vexe the Citie with other forces then with the regiments imperial: But if he did accorde, then the Florentins were to retire to them selues all their bands of footemen who should be accompanied with two or three hundred men of choyse of his owne trayning, and for his part his estates and goods being left to him, and his enemies excluded from all exspectation to haue Perousa, he shoulde bee reduced to better tearmes and estate of quietnes to hearken to their defence, if the election had rested in the Florentins, they coulde haue bene better contented to continue the warre at Perousa: But discerning that Malatesta interteyned a continuall intelligence with the Prince, and no lesse assured that he had not discontinued to practise with the Pope, they douted vpon these good grounds, least by the incitation and importunitie of his friends and folowers, and in compassion of the domages of the citie and countrey, and lastly for suspicion of the enemies and instabilitie of the people, he would in the end giue place to the power of the time: They interpreted it also to too great a daunger & hazard to put into Perousa almost the whole reputacion and flower of their forces, exsposed to the peril of the fidelitie of Malatesta, to the apparant daũger to be forced by the enemies, & to the manifest difficulty to reuoke thẽ againe in case Malatesta should accord: They also brought into consideration that the chaunging of Perousa could preiudice them litle, both the friends of Malatesta remayning there still, and he reteyning his Castels and Borowes, & none of his brothers returning thyther at all, so that so long as it perseuered in this estate, it could not be that the Pope would not be in suspicion of it: Thus they wandred in suspence and incertaintie of mynde, and in that perplexitie making their chiefest care of the safetie of their men, and hauing no assured confidence in the constancie of Malatesta, they dispatched secretly the sixt of september a man of credence to drawe away their bands of souldiers from Perousa fearing to bee abused if the accorde went on: But being informed afterwards that they could not get away for that the enemies were comen neare at hand, they sent with diligence to Malatesta their consent that he might compound: But his necessities and feare of further daunger were swifter then the diligence they made to dispatch to him their consent, for that before the messenger aryued, the Prince of Orenge the ix. of September hauing passed Tiber at the bridge of Saint Iohn, and being drawen into campe and offering certaine skirmiſhes, he was driuen to compounde the ſame night: By whiche compoſition he bound him ſelfe to depart from Perouſa, with obligacion of ſufferaunce to enioy his goodes to goe to the ſeruice of the Florentins, and to retire their companies in ſafetie, and to giue him the better time to leade them vpon the dominions of Florence, the Prince of Orenge promiſed not to remoue in two dayes from the place where he lay incamped: So that they iſſued out of Perouſa the xij. daye, and making very ſpedie marches, they went the ſame day to Cortono by the waye of the mountaines long & troubleſome, but free and aſſured: Thus was the body of the warre reduced vpon the lands of the Florentins, to whom albeit the Venetians and Duke of Vrbyn had giuen many hopes that they would ayde them with three thouſand footemen, a ſtrength which for ſuſpicion of the Princes comming into thoſe quarters, they had ſent vpon the ſtate of Vrbyn, yet becauſe they would not diſpleaſe the Pope, that promiſe ſoarted to none effect: Onely the Venetians gaue money to the commiſſarie Caſtrocaro to wage two hundred footemen, and notwithſtanding that ſtate and the Duke of Ferrara enterteined continual ſolicitation to compounde with the Emperour, yet they forbare not to comfort the Florentins and encourage them to ſtande to their defence, hoping vnder ſuch propertie of difficultie to raunge thEmperour more eaſely, and to get to them ſelues better condicions: The Florentins at that inſtant had principallie two actions in hand, the one to temporiſe and delay the armie ſo long as they might haue time to rampart and fortifie their towne, vnder the walls whereof they looked that in the end the warre would be reduced: the other, to labor to appeaſe the mind of thEmperour, yea euen in according with the Pope, ſo farre-foorth as the forme of their libertie and gouernment popular, were not innouated: By reaſon whereof, being not yet come the excluſion of their Embaſſadors, they had ſent a meſſenger to the Prince of Orenge and made a nominacion of embaſſadors to goe to the Pope, deſiring him when they ſignified vnto him the election, that he would make a ſurceance of the armie vntil they were ariued, which he refuſed to doe: So that the Prince being aduaunced and come on with his forces, he battred and gaue the aſſault to the ſubburbs of Cortono which looke to Orſaio, in which citie were ſeuen hundred footemen ſtrong, he was repulſed from thence finding both force and vallour where he exſpected but weaknes or diſloialtie: There was a greater ſtrength of footemen within Aretzo: But as Antho. Frauncis Albizi commiſſarie, fearing leaſt the Prince, after the taking of Cortono leauing Aretzo behinde him, would take the way of Florence, and preuenting the companies that were with him in Aretzo, the citie of Florence in that aſtoniſhment would draw to accord for want of the readieſt ſuccours that they had, determined to abandon it: So, for thoſe reaſons and conſiderations, without the publike conſent of the ſtate though happly obſeruing a ſecret intencion of the Gonfalonier, he went from Aretzo with al his companies leauing onely two hundred footemen within the Caſtel: But being arriued at Feguina by the counſel of Malateſta that was there who allowed well that they ſhould reduce all their forces to the defence of Florence, he ſent backe againe to Aretzo a thouſand footemen to the end it ſhould not be left altogether abandoned: And as in the courſe of calamities accidents happen by ſucceſſion, ſo the xvij. day the towne of Cortono for whoſe keeping and defending a thouſand men had bene a ſtrength ſufficient ſeeing the Florentines vſed not ſuch order as they ought, rendred notwithſtandyng it was verye litle preſſed by the Prince with whome the towne compounded to pay him xx. thouſand Duckats: By the accident of Cortono the ſouldiers that lay within Aretzo douting of their ſufficiency to defend it, abandoned that

Citie,

Citie, which the xix. day compounded also with the Prince, but with capitulaciõs & clauses rather to rule & gouerne them selues in their libertie vnder shadow of the Emperours protectiõ, then to beare any longer the yoke & subiection of the Florentins, declaring to be false & fayned the professiõ which to this day they had made to be friends to the family of Medicis & enemies to the gouernmẽt popular: At which time th Emperour refused expresly to giue any more audience to the Florentine embassadors, vnles they restored the house of Medicis, & the Prince of Orenge, notwithstanding the embassadors that were with him detested without any regard the Popes couetousnes and the iniquity of that enterprise, had neuertheles told thẽ that without restoring the Medicis he must of necessity cõtinue the warre: whereupon calling his army into view & muster, he found that he had strong three hũdred mẽ at armes, fiue hundred light horsmen, two thousand fiue hundred lañceknights braue bodies, two thousand footmen Spanish, & three thousand Italians, al disposed vnder the leading of these captaines, Sero Colonno, Peter Maria Rossa, Peter Levvys de Farnesa, and Iohn Baptista Sauella, and to them afterwards came Iohn Sassatello bringing with him the mony which he had receiued before of the Florentins whose pay he had accepted: To thẽ also was adioyned Alexander Vitelly hauing betwene three & foure thousand footmen: Onely the Prince had smal store of artilleries, & therefore he prayed ayde of them of Siena to furnish him, who standing in case not to refuse to so mighty an army of the emperour any thing they demañded, they gaue order to refurnish him with some proporcion of artilleries, but prepared it with as great delayes & longnes as they could, both for the hatred they bare against the Pope, & ielousie they had of his greatnes, & also for that they were ill cõtented with the mutacion of the gouernment of Florence, with whõ by reason of their cõmon hatred against the Pope, they had for certaine moneths enterteined together a secret peace & intelligence: In this meane while the Pope had giuẽ audience to the Florentyn embassadors, to whom he answered that as his intencion was not to alter the libertie of the citie, so he was not caryed into this way of enterprise & armes, so much for the iniuries he had receiued of that gouernment & necessity to assure his owne estate, as in regard of the capitulations he had made with th Emperour, in which debating now vpon the interest of his honor, he required no other thing of thẽ then that they would voluntarily referre themselues to his arbitrement & power, which being done, he would make to them good declaration & testimonie with what propertie of zeale & deuocion he desired the benefit & aduancement of their cõmon countrey, and vnderstanding afterwards that the feare & astonishment was encreased at Florence specially since they were aduertised that th Emperour had refused to heare their embassadors, & in that regarde where they had elected new embassadors to go to him, which he thought was done to submit & accord to him that he demaunded, & desiring that the matter might be suddenly done to auoyd the destruction of the countrey: he dispatched in post to the armie the Archbyshop of Capua, who passing by Florence, found them of the towne otherwaies disposed then the Pope was persuaded: But in this meane while the Prince of Orenge aduaunced, & was come the xxiiij. to Mountuarche in the vale of Arno whiche is within xxv. miles of Florence, abiding there for eight cannons from Sienna whiche were sent away the daye after, onely they continued to bee caryed with the same tract and slowneſſe with the whiche they had bene prepared, in so muche as by their want and impediment the Prince who the xxvii. day had led the armie euen vp to Feguina and Anchisa was driuen to abide in that place vnto thend of the fourth of October: And from thence proceeded the difficultie of the whole enterprise: For, after the losse of Aretzo when the Florentins found that their hopes failed together with the fauours and promises made from all partes, and also that the fortifications which were made in the citie on that side towards the mountaine notwithstanding the continuall labour of pioners and workemen, could not by the iudgement of souldiers be reduced to defence, sooner then eight or ten dayes: And being aduertised on the other side that the armie of the enemies aduaunced and wonne way, and Ramassotto who was in armes by the Popes ordinaunce with three thousand footemen, had sacked Firensolo and was entred into the countrey of Mugello, which was not without daunger that he would goe vp to Prato: By these arguments of feare and impediments the citisens being reduced to an vniuersall astonishment, began to incline to accorde, the rather for that many in their feare were fled from the daunger which in their cowardise they durst not defend: So that at the counsel board of the Dieci where are debated the affaires of the warre, and in which counsel were present the principall citisens of the gouernment, the vniuersall consent and aduise was to dispatch to Rome a free and ample commission to submit and referre themselues to the Popes wil: But when this resolucion was related to the supreame magistrate without whose consent there could no deliberacion passe, the Gonfalonier who obstinately susteyned the contrarie opinion, was against it, who ioyning with him the Magistrate popular of the colledges (who participated with the authoritie of the tribunes of the people of Rome) in which office or societie were happly many persons of sinister vnderstanding and great temeritie & insolency: And hauing also their opiniõ supported with the boldnes & threatnings of many young men: he brought to passe that that day nothing was established: And yet it was a thing manifest that if the day folowing which was the xxviii. of September, the Prince had aduaunced and comen on one remoue, the faction that impugned and inueyed against the accorde, had not bene able to resist the strong inclinacion of all the others, of so small causes depend oftentimes the moments of right great things: Thus the surceance and temporising of the armie made by the Prince of Orenge in vaine, whiche some interpreted to bee done expresly to interteine the warre for that he had not sufficient artilleries to affront the Citie of Florence, was the cause that within the towne many entred into courage and resumed the spirits which through the former astonishment they had lost: But the thing that confirmed them in this resolution, was, that the fortificacion continued without any intermission of time and whiche the hands of many nombers of men did so raise and aduaunce, that before the Prince of Orenge remoued from the place where he lay incamped, the captaines iudged that the ramparts were sufficient for defence: So that ceassing nowe all inclination to accord, the citisens with a generall resolucion stoode prepared to defende with their bodies & liues the place which til then they had labored to make strong by their industrie and worke of their hands: wherein the better to assure their mindes so wel induced they were aduertised that Ramassotto who led with him without pay or discipline, not souldiers trayned but peysants rawe & vnarmed, & had taken the field not with intencion of fight but to rob & spoile, after he had wasted with raking and sacking the whole countrey of Mugello: He retired with the booties he had taken vppon the territories of Bolognia, where did dissolue in disorder and disagreement the bandes he hadde leuyed and ledde in insolencie and licenciousnesse, though after they hadde solde to him their shares and most parte of the spoyles: Thus of a warre easye and tractable, and whiche might haue taken ende with a small losse to anye partie, was deriued a warre most heauye and hurtfull to all,

and ſuch as could not be led to his end till the whole countrey was waſted, and the principall Citie in hazard of her lateſt deſolacion: The fift of October the Prince of Orenge departed from Feguino, but he ordred his marching ſo ſlowly to tarie for the artilleries of Syenna which now drue neare, that he coulde not before the xx. daye raunge all his companies and artilleries into the plaine of Ripoly which is within two miles of Florence: He incamped all his armie the xxiiij. day vpon the litle hills neare the rampars obſeruing with the ſauetie of his owne, the places that moſt helped him to anoye his enemies: And of this armie as one parte occupied all the litle hills eminent to the Citie which ſtretch from the gate ſaint Myniato to the gate ſaint George: So the other part from the ſaid gate ſaint Myniato was extended euen to the way of the gate ſaint Nicholas: There were within Florence eight thouſand footemen, all bodies of ſeruice, and their chiefeſt reſolucion was to defend Prato, Piſtoya, Empoly, Piſa and Lyuorna, which places they had ſtrengthned and fortified with ſufficient garriſons, leauing all other places and peeces rather to the fidelitie and diſcreſſion of the peoples, and the fortreſſes to the benefite of their ſituacion, then to beſtowe great bands of ſouldiers to garde them: But now the warre riſing by burning degrees into his heate, all the countrey was filled full of combuſtion, of incurſions, and bands of licenſious ſouldiers: And the Siennoys notwithſtanding their former profeſſion of league and amitie with the ſtate of Florence, did not onely riſe vp to make pillage in euery place, but alſo in that libertie of warre they ſent bands of ſouldiers to occupie Montpulſion, hoping that afterwards the Prince woulde conſent that they might reteyne it: Neuertheleſſe, finding it defended by a garriſon of the Florentins, their ambicion was eaſely ſtopped, and their aſpiring inuentions preſently defeated, the rather for that not long after Napoleon Vrſin arriued there a ſouldier of the Florentins with three hundred horſemen, who woulde not depart from Rome before the Pope were vpon his way to goe to Bolognia: The Prince of Orenge when he had beſtowed his army and ſtretched it out at large vpon the hills of Monticio, Gallo, and Giramont, and after he had brought to him from Lucquay both pioners and certaine peeces of artilleries, he cauſed to caſt a rampart to the ende to make it profitable to giue an aſſault to the baſtillion of ſaint Myniato: But on the other ſide to hinder the vſe and ſeruice of it, were planted in the garden of ſaint Miniato, foure Cannons vpon a caualier: The townes of Collo and ſaint Gimignano rendred immediatly to the Prince, they were places of importance to make eaſie and ſafe the reſort of vittels, that came from Sienna: The xxix. day the Prince planted vpon the baſtillion of Giramont foure Cannons to beate the ſteeple of ſaint Myniato for that a ſaker which the defendants of the towne had mounted there, played with great hurt vpon the armie: Two of thoſe cannons were broken and reduced not ſeruiceable within fewe houres, to recompence which default the day folowing an other cannon being brought to the place, after they had executed in vaine about an hundred and fiftie ſhotte of bollette, and yet coulde not diſmount the ſaker, they forbare to ſhoote anye more where ſo litle good was done by their laboure: By whiche reſiſtaunce and other difficulties and impediments concurryng, euerye one interpretyng it to a harde matter to carie Florence ſpeciallie with one onelye armie, the actions and exploytes afterwardes beganne to proceede ſlowlye and rather in manner of skirmiſhes then in forme of aſſaulte: The ſeconde of Nouember was perfourmed a great skirmiſhe againſt the baſtillion of Saint George, another vppon the baſtillion of Saint Nicholas, and a thirde vppon the waye that goeth to Rome: The fourth daye was planted vppon Giramont a culuerine right againſt the pallace of the Lordes whiche ſet open the gates at the firſt ſhotte: But at this time the horſemen that were within Florence ranne vp to Valdipeſo, and made pray of an hundred horſe moſt part horſes of ſeruice: And in the ſame fortune certayne horſemen and harquebuziers of the Florentines iſſuing out of Pontadero tooke three ſcore horſe betweene the cabans and the tower of Saint Romain.

The Pope & the Emperour at Bolognia.

By this time the Pope was arriued at Bolognia, after whom thEmperour folowed according to the ceremonie and cuſtome of great Princes, for that when two Princes are to enterviewe and meete together, the tradicion beareth that he that repreſenteth the greateſt dignitie ſhall come firſt to the place appointed, ſeeing it is both iudged and taken for a great ſigne of reuerence that he that is inferior ſhall ſhowe office and go to the other: And there being receiued of the Pope with great ſhowes and teſtimonies of honour, and lodged in the ſame pallace with him ioyning one to the other, it ſeemed by the demonſtracions of office and familiaritie paſſing betweene them that they had alwayes liued in an indiſſoluble league of amitie and good will: There theEmperour receiued aduertiſements which cleared him of all ſuſpicion of inuaſion by the Turkes, whoſe armie together with the perſon of their Lorde and Prince being preſented before Vyenna, wherein was a great garriſon of Launceknightes, they had not onely giuen in vaine many aſſaultes to the place, but alſo hadde bene ſo repulſed with ſo great a ſtaughter, that with the ſmall confidence they had to carie it, and what with the want of great artilleries to batter it, & what by the compulſion of the time which in that region is very ſharpe, being in the moneth of October: They brake vp and went their wayes, not retyring to anye other place neare vnto it, but tooke the way of Conſtantinople which is a marche of three monethes: So that thEmperour being cleared and aſſured of that ſuſpicion whiche before hadde not onely made him inclined notwithſtanding the conqueſt of Pauia, to accorde with the Duke of Millan, but alſo had induced him to deale with the Pope to thinke vpon a meane to compounde with the Florentines, to the ende that being eaſed and diſpatched of the affaires of Italie, he might paſſe with all his forces into Almany to the ſuccours of Vyenna and his brother: According to which perſwaſion as the Pope and he began to debate vpon the affaires of Italie: So the thing that moſt concerned the Pope and lay neareſt his hart, was the enterpriſe againſt the Florentins, whereunto alſo thEmperour ſeemed to beare a manifeſt inclinacion aſwel to ſatisfie the Pope touching the matter of capitulation at Barſellona, as alſo for that the citie of Florence being alwayes caryed with a deuocion to the crowne of Fraunce, it could not be but the embaſing of his greatneſſe was very agreeable to them: Therefore when the Florentins had choſen foure embaſſadours to goe to the Pope at Bolognia, and making alſo petition to ſpeake to the Emperour, he woulde neuer giue them audience but one time, and that when it pleaſed the Pope, from whome alſo he drewe the ſubſtaunce of the aunſwere he made them: Thus they concluded to continue the enterpriſe, and becauſe it fell out more hard, and entangled then the Pope exſpected, there was a determinacion to employ in this action all the bands and companies of ſouldiers that were in Lombardy in caſe there hapned occaſion of accord with the Venetians & Frauncis Sforce: which companies as they were to be payd by the Emperour, ſo alſo the Pope was to contribute monthly to the Prince of Orenge who was gone vp to Bolognia to ſolicite thoſe matters three ſcore thouſande Duckats, to thend that where themperour found the burden too heauy to beare out ſo great exſpenſes, he might be ſhared to defray all thoſe regiments that were alreadie about Florence: After this was brought in queſtion and

conference the other intereſt of the Pope, which was cõcerning the matters of Modena & Reggia: wherein the Pope, to auoide the note of obſtinacie and ſelfewill, making ſhow to continue in the ſame inclinacion he had profeſſed many times before, that as if the intereſt of thoſes two townes only were brought into queſtiõ he would make no difficultie to diſpoſe of them according to the will of themprour: So neuertheleſſe he proteſted that in caſe of alienacion of Modena and Reggia, Parma & Plaiſanca would ſo remaine ſeperat and cutte of from theſtate eccleſiaſtike, that in conſequence they would ſeame to be more then halfe aliened: Themperour aunſwered him that it was a regard and conſideracion both iuſt and reaſonable: But for his part he could do no more then vſe his authoritie whileſt his forces were occupied in the enterpriſe of Florence: Neuertheleſſe in ſecrete he could haue wiſhed that with the good ſatisfaction of the Pope, thoſe townes had remained to the Duke of Ferrara, with whom in his waie to Bolognia he had had conference & giuen him great hope and comfort to worke with the Pope what he could for the benefite of his affaires: ſo much had that Duke by his good induſtrie and working made inſinuacion into themperours grace and fauour, and alſo made ſuch impreſſions of compaſſion in the mindes of thoſe that gouerned him moſt, that he wanted not in his court the operacions of greate perſonages to make his cauſe fauoured and recommended. There remained now the two articles of moſt importance and difficultie, concerning the Venetians and Frauncis Sforce, with whom as touching to accord and compounde themprour ſeamed now nothing ſo ſeuere and hard as he had bene before: which as it was altogether contrary to the inclinacion with the which he was come into Italye, ſo he tooke his reaſon both vpon the difficultie of thinges appearing greater then he imagined in Spaine: and alſo for that he found by reaſon of the new coniunctiõ which Frauncis Sforce had made with the Venetians, that the conqueſt of theſtate of Myllan would not be a matter of eaſie action: he ſaw alſo how farre he was imbarked into exſpenſes and charges by ſo greate a traine of ſoldiours and followers which he had brought with him and cauſed to come after him aſwell out of Spaine as Germanie: But the chiefe cauſe was thimportunitie of his brother, who for the tumultes of the Lutherians and other ſignes appearing of innouacion, ſolicited him to paſſe into Almanie, whether it was credible that within a ſhorte time the power of the Turkes would eftſones retorne: a matter which he gathered vpon the proteſtacion which Solyman made, who in his paſſion of ſpite and ignominie, had ſworne at his breaking vp from before Vienna that he would eftſones recontinue the quarrell with an armie more mighty and prepared: In theſe regardes were equally concurring thintereſts of his honour and ſauetie: For that themprour to whom it ſeamed that if he ſhould go out of Italye and leaue thinges vnperfect, he could neither cary awaie aſſurance for him ſelfe, nor reputacion to his name, beganne to giue out many ſignes and tokens of a minde inclined not onely to come to accord with the Venetyans, but alſo to pardon Frauncis Sforce: In which good diſpoſicion the Pope omitted no good office of perſwacion and inducement both to ſolicite & confirme him, no leſſe mouing him a deuowt deſier to haue an vniuerſall tranquillity, then for that themprour ſtanding no more reſtrained and intangled with other enterpriſes, he might with better opportunitie drawe him to conuert all his forces againſt Florence: Onely themperour ſeamed moſt of all to be deteined by this reaſon, that it could not but be againſt his dignitie to giue occaſion to the world to beleue, that neceſſitie had almoſt induced him to pardon the crime of Frauncis Sforce: And Antho. de Leua being with him at Bolognia ſolicited vehemently that he would make an other resolucion and disposing of that estate, sometimes preferring the memorie of Alexander the Popes nephew, and some times naming others meete to receiue such a preferment: Neuertheless for that there could not easely be found out to gouerne that estate, a personage with whom Italie would be contented, & the Pope hauing no inclinacion to conuert it to any of his, not that he wanted ambicion to embrace so great a thing, but because he sawe he could not accomplishe it without newe warres and newe troubles: ThEmperour at last was brought to consent to graunt safeconduit to Frauncis Sforce vnder colour to haue accesse to him to submit and iustefie him selfe, but in true meaning that libertie of accesse was graunted to thende thinges might be reduced to some composicion: The Venetians were not ill contented with his going to themprour, for that they hoped that at one time would be introduced some forme of accord to their affaires.

Neuertheless the course of armes and warre ceassed not for all these in the regions of Lombardie: for that Belioyenso who in the absence of Antho. de Leua was chiefe Commaunder at Myllan, went out with seuen thowsande footemen, to incampe before Saint Angeo, wherein were remayning for the strength and garrison of the towne, foure companies of footemen of the Venetians and the Duke of Millan: And after he had vsed vppon it the seruice of his great artilleries, and that by reason of certeine raynes and showers that fell from aboue, the harquebuzes that manned and defended the walls vncouered, were made vnprofitable: He brought neare his souldiours couered with their shields, and being armed with their swords and pykes, he gaue thassault in which he presented in his owne person no lesse vallour and resolucion then was seene in any of the others: But when the defendantes were no longer hable to keepe fire in their matches by reason they stoode open to the rayne, and in that regarde being driuen to feight with other weapons, they beganne to abandon the walls no lesse thorow the vallour of their enemies who prest on with a furie equall to the fortune that fauoured them, then for their owne astonishment which was made so much the greater by howe much they were made lesse apt to doe seruice by the wretched accident of rayne that tooke away the vse of their peeces: As soone as thImperialls saw the walls abandoned of bodies to defende them, the same fierceneese that ledde them to giue the assault, brought them on to enter the place, where, in the rage of their victorie, all suche wretched creatures as they founde, they made them eyther passe by the edge of the sworde, or at least put them vnder the sentence of bitter captiuitie: After this, he determined to passe ouer to the other side of the riuer of Adda, and by that time he had put ouer one parte of his armie at the bridge of Casciano, he saw certeyne bands of Spanyardes of a newe leauie departing to goe to Millan, but preuenting them, he caused the souldiours that were left in the towne to take armes, by which impediment being stopped and denied to enter, they returned againe to the armie: But notwithstanding all these euents, and that the armie of Launceknightes was alreadie vpon the landes of the Venetians, the negociacions of the peace were so farre aduaunced and in so good tearmes, that all councells and studies of the warre beganne to vanish and growe colde: for, when Frauncis Sforce was brought to the presence of thEmperour at Bolognia, and hauing with humilitie and submission praised his benignitie in admitting him to his presence: He tolde him that so much did he reappose for him selfe in his owne iustice and equitie, that for all thinges happened before the Marquis of Pisquairo restrained him within the castell of Myllan, he desired no other propertie of suretie or supporte then his owne innocencie: And that therefore

therefore he renounced frankely the safe conduit, the bill or escript whereof the Duke holding in his hande, he layed it at his feete, a matter which much pleased the Emprour: There was a moneth spent in debating of the difficulties aswell concerning his accord as the composition with the Venetians: But at last by the continuall working and interposing of the Pope, both the one and the other were concluded the xxiij. of December, Frauncis Sforce being bounde to paie to the Emprour within one yeare, foure hundred thowsand duckats, and fiue hundred more within tenne yeares, that is fiftie thowsand euerie yeare: and for the pawne and assuring of these payments themprour to kepe in his handes Coma and the Castell of Millan, which he bounde himselfe to render and readelyuer vp to Frauncis Sforce assone as the payment of the first yeare were finished: he gaue him also the inuestiture of the Duchie, or rather confirmed that which had bene giuen to him before: But to furnish three payments and to perfourme the giftes and bribes which he promised to those that gouerned the emprour, he imposed greate taxes vpon the towne of Myllan and throwe the whole Duchie, notwithstanding the people had bene miserably wasted and consumed both by the crueltie of their long warres, and also by the rage of hunger and pestilence: Touching the Venetians they accorded: That they should render to the Pope Rauenna and Ceruia with their territories, sauing their rightes, and also the Pope to pardon all such as had conspired or donne any thing against him: That they should giue vp to themprour by the ende of the next Ianuarie, all that they possessed in the realme of Naples, and to paye him the residue of the two hundred thowsand duckats due vpon the thirde article of the last peace contracted with them: That is to saie xxv. thowsand within one moneth next folowing, and xxv. thowsand at the yeares ende, but vpon condicion that their peeces should be rendred to them within one yeare, if either they were not rendred alreadie according to the tenor of the saied peace, or at last the controuersies and differences iudged by common arbitratours: That they should paie to the exiles fiue thowsand duckats for euerie yeare for the reuenues of their goods according to the disposicion of the treatise of the same peace: That ouer and besides this, they should paie to the Emprour an hundred thowsand duckats, the one moitie within tenne monethes, and the other halfe within a yeare after: it was further accorded that the rightes of the patriarch of Aquilea which had bene reserued to him in the capitulacion of VVormes against the king of Hungria, should be decided: That the Duke of Vrbin should be comprehended in this peace and confederacion, because he was an adherent and in the protection of the Venetians: That the Venetyans should pardon the Count Brunoro de Gambaro: That the traffike and entercourse should be free amongest all their subiects: and that there should be giuen no place of retraite to the corsaires or roauers who would trouble either partie: That it should be lawfull to the Venetyans to continue peasibly in the possession of all those thinges which they helde: That all those that had bene published rebelles for folowing the faction of Maximilian, the Emprour, and the king of Hungria since the yeare 1523. should be restored: onely the restitucion should not extende to the goods that had bene brought to their fiske: That betwene the saied parties there should not onely be a peace but also a perpetuall league defensible for their estates of Italye against all Christian princes: The emprour promised that the Duke of Myllan should kepe and holde in his estate, a strength of fiue hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horsemen, six thowsand footemen, and a good bande of artilleries, for the defense of the Venetians, and the Venetians to menteine the

THE ARGVMENT OF THE TWENTEETH BOOKE.

THemprour taketh the imperiall crowne at Bolognia, and from thence passeth into Almanie: The famulie of Medicis by the aide of themprours armie retorne to Florence: Ferdinand is chosen king of Romains: The Pope will not harken to a councell: The french king stirreth vp the Turke against themprour, and hath conference with the Pope at Marseilles.

THE TVVENTEETH BOOKE OF THE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

IT seamed that the conclusion of this peace and confederacion had reduced to their last ende, the warres of Italye which for their continuance, and longnes, had drawne a space of viij. or x. yeares, and for their horrible accidents had left to all the regions of that climat, matter of lamentable and iust compassion: Onely the citie of Florence, either more wretched in destinie, or lesse worthy of so good participacion, was not dispensed from tumultes and daungers of armes, seeing that as she was a meane & helpe to reduce others to peace, so of the contrarie, in the tranquillity of others was wrought to her selfe, matter of a more heauy and daungerous warre: for, where it was supposed that all natures of difficulties were so resolued and disgested that there was no further dowt nor impediment to deteine the accord from his perfection: Themprour leauying his companies & bandes of men of warre from the state of the Venetians, sent out to make warre against the Florentins, an army of foure thowsand launceknights, two thowsand fiue hundred Spanish footemen, eight hundred Italians, and more then three hundred light horsemen with fiue and twenty peeces of artilleries: But in this warre either for the ill directiō of the capteines, or worse order of the soldiours, much lesse that there was done any exploit notable, seeing there was performed no action worthy the exercise of a penne to write it, The assailantes lacking harts to inuade the towne, and the defendantes hauing no deuocion to assaie the fortune of a battell: They saw in the accompt of their prouisions that they had meanes sufficient to make defence for many monethes: and in the reckoning of the mindes and inclinacions of men, they dowted not of an vniuersall resolucion of the citie to resiste the quarrell inflicted against their common libertie: in which regards they hoped by tēporising so to make weary the campe of thenemies, that either for want of money which maketh the soldiour mutinus, or for some other accidēts which ordinarily ensue a cāpe, they would driue the ennemies through difficulties to dissolue the warre which they durst not resist by their vallor: Neuertheles either to auoid these difficulties or to prepare a remedy, the prince of Orenge had sent out xv. hundred footemen, & iiij. hūdred horsemen with iiij. peces of artilleries, to take Lastra wherin were three enseignes of footemē, of whom was passed to the sword two hundred bodies and the

towne taken before the reskewes of Florence could ariue: it hapned alſo that in the night of the xj. of December, Stephen Colonno with a thowſand harquebuziers and iiij. hundred halberdiers and partiſanes all armed with corſelets and caſſakins after the maner of camiſado of Spaine, ſet vpon the regiment of Sero Colonno lying in the houſes neare to the Church of Saint Margaret de Monticio, and in that ſurpriſe they ſlew and wounded many ſoldiours without the loſſe of one perſon of theirs: About that time were ſlaine with the bollette within the gardin of Saint Mymato, Maria Vrſin and Iulio ſaint Croſſe: And in the like fortune, Pirrhus going to Saint Peters Borovv to take Montopoly which is a towne of the contrey of Piſa, he was cut of by the footemen that were within Empoly, and being defeated in the waie betwene Palaia & Montopoly, many of his companies fell into the fortune of priſoners: The Florentyns ſent to the borow of Saint Sepulchro, Napolion Vrſin with an hundred & fiftie horſemen, to encounter Alexander Vitelly who was ſent to deſtroie the contrey all a long the ſaied borow and Anguiaro.

Camiſado.

But now the warre beginning to fall into action of terror and aſtoniſhment: after the regimẽts newly ſent by themprour were paſſed the Alpes, the townes of Piſtoya and Prato being abandoned of the Florentyn garriſons, were yeelded vp to the Pope: By reaſon whereof the armie that had left behind them no impediment, marched not to ioine with the others, but remaining incamped on the other ſide of Arno, they went to lodge at Peretola neare the walls of the citie, vnder the authoritie & gouernment of the Marquis of Guaſt, though the prince of Orenge was alwaies ſuperior and abſolute aboue all: By which diſpoſing of the armie apart and ſeparate, things were rather reduced to the forme of a ſeege, then to an action of oppugnacion: At this time alſo Pietraſanta was rendred to the Pope: And as the Pope labored with a perpetuall ſtudie and care of minde, to leade to perfection the purpoſes he had pretended to reeſtabliſh and ſette vp his houſe in Florence, ſo towardes the ende of this yeare partly at the requeſt of Malateſta Baillon who gaue him hope of accord, he ſent to Florence directly to him Rodolffo Pio biſhop of Faenſa, with whom were debated diuerſe and ſundrie thinges, ſome with the priuitie of the citie and for their profitte, and ſome in ſecrecie by Malateſta againſt the weale of the citie, matters which much leſſe that they ſoarted to any effect, ſeeing it was diſcerned that Malateſta who was now come to the expiracion and full time of his paie, had enterteined them with art & conning to thend that the Florentins fearing to be abandoned of him, would eſtſones reteine him into their pay with title of capteine general of the warre, which in thend he obteined: This enterpriſe of Florence continued alſo the yeare a thowſand fiue hundred and thirtie: and albeit the prince of Orenge in beginning to make new caualiers & caſt new trenches, made demonſtraciõ to batter vehemently the baſtillions but chefly the baſtillion of Saint George which was very ſtrong: yet what thorow his ignorance which could not be without his ignominie, and what for the difficultie in the action wherein his errour was nothing leſſe, not one deuiſe was put in execucion, the garde of the whole Mount apparteining to Stephen Colonno.

In the beginning of this yeare, the Florentins, taking hope in the matters of negociacion with the biſhoppe of Faenſa, ſent of newe other embaſſadours to the Pope, and to themprour, but with expreſſe commiſſion to innouate nothing nor harken to any mocion by the which the gouernment might be altered, or the generall iuriſdiction diminiſhed: So that as they were repugnant in the principall article, ſo they could neuer obteine audience of themprour, but according to the vanitie of their commiſſion they retorned to Florence without any concluſion.

There

There were within Florence nyne or tenne thowsande footemen strong, but payed according to the number of fourteene thowsande: And as the souldiours were resolute to defende the Citie with a great affection and readynes of fayth, So to confirme them the more, all the Capteines being assembled in the Church of Saint Nicholas, after the celebration of the Masse, and in the presence of Malatesta, they made a solemne othe to stande against the iniuries and inuasions offred agaynst the Citie vntill the laste man: Onely in this vniuersall constancie, was founde vnconstant Napoleon Vrsin, who notwithstanding he professed him selfe assured to the Florentins by receyuing their money and impreſt, yet he became a reuolte, and returning to Bracciano, compounded his affayres with th Emperour and the Pope, and reuoked from the seruice of Florence certaine capteines whom he had sent thither before.

But the Pope omitted no diligence wherein he thought was any meane to aduaunce his intention, Wherein he so wrought with the French king that he sent Monsr Clermont to excuse thaccorde he had made by necessitie to redeme his children: And where he alleaged how impossible it was to comprehend that state in thaccorde, he counselled them with reasons & inducements to lay themselues downe to the necessitie of the time, and take suche conditions as they might, so farreforth as they were conducible to the profit and conseruation of their liberty: In which good inclination, & to helpe to raunge the issue of things to their weale and benefite, he offred as it were to interpose in the action: He also commaunded by publike protestation Malatesta and Stephen Colonno being of the kings creation and dependancy, to depart from Florence, notwithstanding a part and seuerally he gaue them comfort to the contrary: But the thing that imported moste to staye his reputation and astonishe the people, was, that to satisfie the Pope and the Emprour, he retyred his ordinarie Embassador resident at Florence, leauing there notwithstanding as a person priuate Emilio Ferier, by whom for that he woulde not vtterly leaue them desperate, he made secret promise to ayde thē assone as he had recouered his children. Such was the Popes ambition in this action, and so suttle was his humor to serue his turne of all meanes that eyther art or industrie could insinuate, that he had almoste brought the Frenche king to make retyre from his Court thembassadour resident for Florence: Wherein to drawe better fauour to his purposes, he sent by the Bithop of Tarby the Cardinalls Hatte to the Lorde Chauncellor, and not long after he gratified him with the legation of the realme of Fraunce: And by him he solicited a new enteruiew and conference at Thurin betwene themprour, the French king, and himselfe: But he was aunswered in the full counsell of the king sitting, that it was enough that the children of the Crowne of Fraunce were vnder captiuitie, without that the person of the king should seeke to intrude himselfe into that calamitie.

The Pope and themprour did now determine to go to Sienna, to be more ready and apt to fauor thenterprise of Florence, and afterwards to drawe to Rome for the coronation of the Emprour: But whether it was a true or false deliberatiō, as they were vppon the poynt prepared to depart, the Emprour receiued letters out of Germany soliciting him to returne thither, the electors making instance for regard of the dyets, and Ferdinand standing to be chosen king of Romains, and others in respect to celebrate the counsell. By these new instances whether more effectuall for their sodennes or for their cōformitie to themprors will, al deuises & counsels to passe further were dashed, in which variatiō the empror was cō tēted to receiue the Imperiall Crowne within Bolognia, beeing assisted with a great affluence of people, but susteyning a verye slender pompe and exspences: He was crowned vppon Saint Matthiewes daye, a daye of many happye predictions, for that on that daye was he borne, in that daye was the Frenche king taken prisoner, and during that daye was he celebrated with the enseignes and ornamentes of thImperiall dignitie.

But before thEmperour departed to returne into Germanie, he laboured to accorde wyth the Pope, the Duke of Ferrara, who the seuenth daye of Marche came to Bolognia vnder safeconduit: And because there was no other meane of issue or ende betweene them, they referred to the person of the Emperour the arbitration and Compromise of righte and action touchinge all their controuersies: To the whiche the Pope was induced by the generalitie of the Compromise, suche as comprehended also the quarrell and tytle of Ferrara, whiche the Pope doubting that according to tearmes of righte, it woulde not diuolue to the sea Apostolike, he thoughte thEmperoure had an easie meane in vsing silence for Ferrara, to bringe hym to render Modena and Reggia: The Pope also was induced by the worde and promyse whiche thEmperour made to hym, that if he founde that he had righte to those two Cities, he woulde pronownce iudgemente of hys syde, but if by examination it appeared otherwyse, he woulde suffer to expyre and determine the tyme of the Compromise. And to assure the obseruation of the sentence and resolution of the Compromise, there wente a couenaunt that the Duke shoulde depose Modena into the handes of thEmperour, at whose instance he had reuoked before his Embassadours from Florence, and ayded the army with a proportion of Pyoners.

After this thEmperour departed from Bolognia the xxij. daye, the Pope hauing lefte hym satisfied that hys intention was to consente to the Councell, if he thoughte it mighte anye waye auayle for thextirpation of the Heresies of the Lutherans: The Cardinall Campeius wente wyth hym as Legate, And so he passed by Mantua, where after he had receyued threescore thowsande duckettes of the Duke of Ferrara, he gaue to hym in chiefe for euer the towne of Carpy: After whome the Pope the xxxj. daye tooke hys waye to Rome, leauing the matters of Florence in the same estate of difficulties they were before.

The Imperialls made many signes and braueries as though they would assault the Citie, for whiche cause they had begon a trenche before the Bastillion of Saint George, where beeing perfourmed a hoate skirmishe the xxj. of Marche, they without receyued greate harmes: The xxv. daye the Prince of Orenge finding his campe muche vexed by a towre adioyning to the side of the Bastillion of Saint George towardes the gate of Rome, battered it with hys artilleries, But finding it very strong and well appoynted, after certayne volues of Cannon, he forbare any further execution. There aryued dayly at the campe newe companies and bands of souldiours, by whose insolencie and licentiousnesse for that there was no warres in any other parte of Italie, the harmes and ruines of the countrey of Florence encreased continually. The Citie of Voltero was rendred to the Pope, but the Castell holding good for the Florentins, suffred greate executions with two Cannons of thimperialles, and two Coluerines broughte from Genes: And the Florentines desyring to succour it, sente oute to Empoly

an hundred and fyftie horſemen and fiue enſeignes of footemen, who making their marche by nighte, paſſed by the Campe neare the Mounte Olyuet, and beeing diſcouered, there were ſente oute after them certayne guidons of horſemen, who ouertooke them, but beeing skirmiſhed withall by the harquebuziers, they retyred with ſome loſſe: And the horſemen that were iſſued out of Florence by an other waye behinde the campe, ſaued them ſelues at the ſame tyme with the footmen within Empoly, where they were receyued by Frauncis Feruccio commaunder of that place: This man beeing ſente in the beginning of the warre by the Florentins to Empoly as commaunder ouer a verye ſmall companie of horſemen, and with a verye little authoritie, had, what with the obſeruation of the warre, and with thoportunitie of that ſeate, and with thoccaſion of prayes and ordinarie incurſions, aſſembled together a good crewe of ſouldiours of choyſe: with whome bothe by hys vallour whiche he had well expreſſed, and alſo by his lyberalitie which was infinite in hym, he was ryſen to ſo good eſtate of reputation, that the Florentins had no ſmall exſpectation of hym: Feruccio then departed from Empoly with two thouſande footemen and fiue hundred horſe, with whiche armie marching with great celeritie, he entred within the caſtell of Voltero the xxvj. of Aprill earely in the morning, where hauing well refreſhed his ſouldiours, he aſſaulted preſently the towne which was garded by Iohn Baptiſta Borgueſo with a verye ſlender ſtrength of footemen, and winning before night two of their trenches, he had the towne the next moarning together with the artilleries that were come from Genes: The firſt action he managed after he was Lorde of the towne, was by extorſions and wayes compulſiue to exacte money of thinhabitauntes of Voltero, and no leſſe by that good helpe then by his vallour and induſtrie, he conſtrayned to reuolte Gimignana and Collo, and cutting off the traffike of vittelles that came from Sienna by that waye, he had reduced the armie of the ennemies to greate difficulties, whoſe capteines thinking of no other expedition then of the ſiege, the Marquis of Guaſt retyred thartilleries within Prato. But (ſo ſuddayne and vncertayne are the things of warre) there happned into thoſe quarters vnlooked for, Capteyne Maramus leading a regiment of two thowſande fiue hundred footemen without paye: By reaſon of which ſuccour beeing come agaynſt the Popes will, he kepte on his courſe, for that Maramus went to incampe with his people at the ſuburbes of Voltero. The nynth of Maye was executed a greate skirmiſhe without the gate called Romegate, wherein remayned dead and wounded of them within the towne an hundred and thirtie perſons, & of the ſouldiors without more then two hundred bodies, amongſt whom was Capteine Baragnino a Spaniard. Amidde theſe enterchaunges of skirmiſhes and factions of warre, the Florentines forbare not to hope continually for ſome ſuccours from the Frenche king, who accordingly fayled not to enterteyne their hope wyth promiſe of a ſufficient reskewe when ſo euer he had recouered hys children: Wherein the better to aſſure and confirme them, he gaue aſſignation to the Florentin Marchuntes for twentie thowſande ducketts due to them long tyme before, which ſumme beeing lente by them to the Citie, was brought to Piſa by Levvis Alaman, but by ſuche parcelles and dribletts, that it dyd little comforte the warre: Moreouer Iohn Pavvle de Cere whome the Florentins had taken into their paye for the garde of that Citie, came awaye to Piſa. But by the conquering of Voltero was bredde to the Florentins a domage of farre greater importance: for that where Feruccio both contrary to the commiſſion giuen to him, and alſo becauſe he woulde goe the ſtronger to the action of Voltero, and hauing withall to secure a confidēce in the fortres of Empoly, had left for the defence of it so small a garrison, that thimperials vsing thoccasion that was offred, went to incampe about it vnder the conduit and leading of the Marquis of Guast: And as for the weaknes of the defendantes and garrison, they tooke it without any resistance and with many harmes put it to sacke: So in the losse of that was brought to the Florentins more matter of affliction then in anye other thing during the warre, for that hauing determined to assemble in that place newe companies and regimentes, they hoped by the oportunitie of the situation which importeth muche, both to reduce into distresse and difficulties the armie that lay on that side of Arno, and also to open the commoditie and waye for vittells to passe to that Citie which began already to feele the want of norriture and comfort. To this also was added a newe occasion to depriue them more of the hopes they had conceyued: for after the French king had deliuered ouer his money which he was to paye to themprour, and retyred his children which was in the beginning of Iune: In place of so many aydes & succours which by his promises he had reserued till that time, he sent into Italy at the instance of the Pope (who to haue wholly at his deuotion the kinges Agents, created Cardinall the Bishop of Tarby Embassadour resident in his Court) one Peter Frauncis Pontriemoly, a man of great confidence with him, to insinuate some motions and practise of accorde with the Florentins, who by that manner of dealing discerned no further hope to be succoured by the king: Wherein they beleued the more by this inducement, that both he and the king of Englande ioyning together, did all that they could so to allure and gouerne the Pope, as they might hope to seperate him from the Emprour: And in that regarde the Frenche king laboured to haue some participation and interest to reduce and conuerte the Florentins to the Popes amitie. After the Marquis of Guast had taken Empoly, he went with the bands of souldiours whom he ledde, to ioyne with Maramus in the suburbes of Voltero: where hauing in one strength almoste six thowsande footemen, they began to batter the towne, and when they sawe they had brought to the earth more then fortie faddomes of wall, they followed thexecution of thartilleries with three furious assaultes, but with worse effect then their vallour deserued, since in the action they lost more then foure hundred men: They made afterwardes a newe batterye, and with certayne chosen bands of Spaniardes and Italians consoarted together, they gaue an other very braue and resolute assault, but with greater domage & harmes then the former assaultes: in which regarde the campe brake vp rather with great prayse then good effecte of their doinges. The same moarning about an howre before day, Stephen Colonno issuing out of the gate of Faenza, and Malatesta by the posterne that leadeth to Prato, went to giue the Camisado with three thowsande footemen to the launceknightes that were lodged in the Monastery of Saint Donat where they had fortified themselues: Stephen passed the trenches and slew many of them, But the alarme being giuen to the residue, they put themselues in order with resolution to defend their place to the last man: So that after Stephen had receyued a light hurt in the mouth, he retyred for feare of greater reskewes, complayning muche that Malatesta had not followed him.

Empoly sackt by the Marquis of Guast.

The Florentins out of hope to be succoured by the fr. king.

But in Florence were entred no nature of vittells nor norriture from anye parte, albeit their wantes of comfortes went on encreasing dayly, yet so resolute were they to defende their lybertie, that there could be discerned no diminution of that constancie and fidelitie that at first armed them to so holy an action: And where Feruccio was gone from Voltero to Pisa, and laboured by his authoritie and in-

dustrie to assemble as great a strength as he coulde, all the hopes of the Florentins were reduced to his comming: for they had signifyed to hym to aduaunce and come on, and not to forbeare for anye waye or other daunger to ioyne hymselfe to the defence of the Citie, beeing resolued to giue battell to thennemies assoone as he had ioyned his forces with the mayne armie that was within Florence: Of whiche deuise the succesſe and issue was not so good and happie, as was greate and manyfest the rashnes of the resolution, if I maye tearme those counsels rashe whiche are drawne or deryued from a laste necessitie: for in this rested the errour of that counsell, that they were to passe thorowe the countreys of thennemies, suche as were occupyed and commaunded by a verye strong armie though dispersed into manye seuerall places. The Prince of Orenge who had aduertisement of this deuise, thought to goe before wyth one parte of the armie, whereof he made his greateſt assemblie of the Italian footemen: And Malateſta Baillon with whom he had many secrete and strayte intelligences, hauing happlye assured him in secrete that the Florentins suspected leaſt in hys absence he woulde assayle the armie, wente out to meete hym: And fynding him neare to Ciuiniano in the mountayne of Pistoya, a waye whiche he tooke passing from Pisa towardes Lucquaye in regarde of confidence reapposed in the Chauncellours faction well affected to the popular gouernment, he gaue hym the skirmishe with a verye small companie of men: At the firste shocke the Prince, whose rashnesse was greater then his conduite, and in whome was lesse the humor of counsell and discression then apperteyned to the place he managed, was slayne doing rather the office of a priuate souldiour then of a Capteyne or commaunder: Neuertheleſſe his souldiours gotte the victorie, and made prisoners together with manye others, Iohn Pavvle de Cere, and Feruccio whome Maramus slewe beeing prisoner, in reuenge as he confessed of a trumpet whome he had caused to be hanged beeing sente to him at the siege of Voltero to declare a message. The prince of Orenge slaine.

Thus the Florentins seemed delyuered vp to a condition abandoned of all succours bothe diuine and humaine, in whome also increased dayly afflictions of famine without hope of further remedie or comforte: And yet albeit their extremities for their nature were no lesse heauye and greeuous, then their remedies desperate, yet the obstinacie of those that opposed agaynst the accorde, was nothing abated, but was augmented by the same degrees which multiplied their wantes and extremities: Those men beeing induced by a laste dispayre not to pull vpon them their owne ruine without the destruction of the countrey, and standing nowe no more wilfully resolued to dye for the safety of the countrey, but that their common countrey and their lyues should take ende together: were also followed of many, who flattered them selues with this impression that the succours of the great God of wonders woulde not appeare before thinges were reduced to suche tearmes as there remayned no further exspectation in humayne helpe: And as the Magistrates and almoste all suche as managed any publike authoritie, were concurrant in this obstinacie, and no place left to impugne it, for that greater was the awe of the Magistrates and threates of armes, then the reasons or perswasions of those that were of the contrarie opinion: So there had bene daunger that the warre woulde haue ended with the laste destruction of that Citie, had it not bene for the industrie of Malateſta, who seeing the aduersitie of the Citie to be without remedie, dyd as it were constrayne them to incline to accorde: Wherein happlye he was caryed by pitie and compassion to see wholly perishe throughe the rage of her Citiſens, a Citie ſo auncient and flouriſhing: And happly he was moued by the diſhonour and domage that mighte come to him to bee preſent at ſo greate a ruine: But the principall cauſe of his induction was, that he hoped to obteyne of the Pope by the meane of that accorde, ſuffraunce to returne to Perouſa: So that whileſt the Magiſtrates and ſuche as were moſt furious and forward, were conſulting to make iſſue out of the Citie the ſouldiours to giue battell to thenemies, who both exceeded them in numbers and aduauntage and ſtrength of place, and that he refuſed to go out with them: They ſuffred their paſſion to cary them ſo farre, that they decaſſed him and depoſed hym from his charge of Capteine, and ſente certayne of the moſte diſordered amongeſt them to denownce agaynſt him a commaundement to go out of the towne with his companies: A matter which both for the ſoddennes comming vnlooked for, and for the property of iniurie being not deſerued, did ſo inflame and kindle him, that ſtriking at one of them with his dagger, the aſſiſtantes that were by him had muche to do to deliuer him with his life out of his hands: By which accident the preſent company being aſtoniſhed, & the whole Citie beginning to ryſe, thoſe that were not ſo farre incenſed with paſſion and fury, began in better temperãce to reprehend the raſhnes of the Gonfalonier, who though he went to arme himſelfe, proteſting ſometimes that he would ſet vpon Malateſta, and ſometimes that he woulde iſſue out to feight with thenemies, at laſte thinges were qualified to this moderation, that the deſperate obſtinacie of many gaue place to the extreme neceſſitie of the whole: In ſo muche as in thoſe moodes they ſente out foure Embaſſadours the nynth of Auguſt to capitulate with Don Ferrand Gonſaguo, who for the death of the Prince of Orenge commaunded in the army, the Marquis of Guaſt beeing retyred before: with whom the day following the concluſion was made, of which theſe were the principall articles, that the Citie within very few dayes ſhould pay foureſcore thouſande duckets for the withdrawing of the armie: That the Pope and the Citie ſhoulde giue authoritie to themprour to declare within three monethes what ſhould be the fourme of the gouernment, alwayes reſeruing and ſauing their lybertie: That there was generally pardoned all maner of iniuries done agaynſt the Pope, his friendes, and his ſeruauntes: That tyll the declaration and ſentence of themprour were paſſed, Malateſta Baillon ſhould remayne within the Citie in garriſon with two thowſande footemen. Aſſone as this accorde was made, and whileſt the money was collected for the armie, whereof there was neede of a farre greater ſumme, for that in the Pope was found little readines to releeue the Citie with money in ſo great a daunger: The Popes Commiſſarie called Bart. Valory ioyning with Malateſta who aſpired altogether to returne to Perouſa, made a conuocation of the people in the publike place according to the auncient cuſtomes of that Citie, to the which the Magiſtrates and multitudes agreed through feare: And in that Parliament they introduced a newe fourme of gouernment, by the whiche was giuen authoritie to twelfe Citiſens of the faction of the Medicis, to diſpoſe as they thought good of the pollicie of the Citie, who reduced it to that fourme whiche it was wont to carye before the yeare a thowſande fiue hundred ſeuen and twentie. After this the armie diſlodged and brake vp, and hauing receyued money for the orderly pay and ſatisfying of the vniuerſall bandes, the Italian capteines conuerting to their owne priuate vſage to the great ignominy of their diſcipline, that which ſhould haue runne amongſt the ſouldiours by ſhare, retyred into Florence loaden with the money which was appoynted to paye the armie: They contented with a litle the regiments of footemen and diſ-

missed them, who remeining without leaders or commaunders went dispersed into diuers places of the contry: But for the Spanyards & launceknights being fully aunswered of all their payes, they went out of the townes and iurisdiction of Florence, & drew to the contry of Sienna to reorder the gouernment of that citie: And as Malatesta Baillon, whome the Pope suffred to returne to Perousa without tarying for the declaracion of th Emprour, left the citie wholly to the arbitracion and will of the Pope: So, after the souldiours were gone out of it, the persecutions & punishments of the Citizens began, the ende of one calamitie being the beginning of an other: for, those into whose power and administracion was diuolued the gouernment and authoritie, partly to assure better the state, and partly by malice conceiued against the authors of so many euills, and partly for memorie of iniuries perticularly receyued, but principally to satisfie the intencion and endes of the Pope though he made small manifestacion thereof: Those I say (obseruing happly the superficies and outward declaracion of the wordes but wresting and peruerting the inward sense) interpreted that the chapter or article by the which pardon was promised to such as had iniuried the Pope and his friendes, extended not to deface and wipe out the wrongs & crymes which by them selues were committed in matters that cõcerned the common weale: In which inclinacion to reuenge thinformacion, things being preferred vp to the Magistrates, six of the principalls were beheaded, many imprisoned, and a great number bownd ouer according to the tradicions and statutes of the citie: Insomuch as the citie being so much the more made weake and feeble, by how much she was shaked in her pillors and chiefe foundacions, And withall those that had pertaked in these reuenges and punishments being reduced into greater necessities and difficulties: The power of the Medicis returned more free, and more absolute, yea almost royally into that citie, which had for so long and great a warre, remeyned much impouerished of money, made naked both within and without of many inhabitants, and spoyled both of dwellings and goods abroad, & lastly stoode now more then euer deuided in it selfe: A calamitie which yet was made so much the more great and heauy, by how much had bene more lamentable for many yeres their vniuersall necessitie and difficultie to make prouision of vittels in forreine contries for the generall skarcetie and darth which the whole contry endured: for, as for that yeare by reason of the afflictions and impediments of the warre they made neither seede time nor harueste, so it was so seueare a calamitie continued to the yeares succeeding, that the citie being raked and dreyned had yssued out more money to make prouision of corne from forreine regions and cattell without the lymits of their own dominions, then had bene defrayed for the exspenses of so great a warre full of heauy burdens and charges.

In this meane while th Emprour assembling the dyet at Auspurge, had caused to be elected king of Romains, Ferdinand his brother: And calling into question the cause of the Lutherans, both suspected touching the power of Princes, and for the multitude and ambicion of their followers deuided into diuers heresies, and euen the life and example of Martyn Luther the originall Author of that opinion, being now almost of no consideracion: The Princes of Germany could deuise of no better remedie then to assemble and celebrate a councell: for, both the Lutherans seeking to couer their cause with the authoritie of religion, solicited vehemently to haue their cause disputed in a publike and free councell: And on the other parte it was beleued that the decrees which the councell should set downe would beare authoritie sufficient, if not to reduce and remoue the minds of the heretikes from their errours, at leaſt to retyre and recouer to a more ſownd opinion one parte of the multitudes infected: But in Germany euen thoſe that followed the factions and opinions of the Catholikes, deſired the conuocacion of a councell, to thende to reforme the exceſſiue charges and abuſes of the Court of Rome: Where, what with the authoritie of indulgences, and with the profit of diſpenſacions, and laſtly with the annates or yearely frutes of benefices that were giuen, together with the allowances that in thexpedicion of them reuerted to the offices infinitely multiplyed in that Court: It ſeemed there was no other ſtudye or care then to exacte by thoſe corrupcions a huge maſſe of treaſor throughout all Chriſtendome, without regarding the health and true comforting of ſoules, nor that matters Eccleſiaſtike were rightly adminiſtred and gouerned: for, both many benefices incompatible were transferred and heaped vppon one perſon, and alſo without reſpecting the merits and worthines of men, they were eyther beſtowed by partialitie and fauor, or at leaſt ſuch perſons were introduced who for their age were incapable, or for their doctrine inſufficient, or (which worſe is) for their life and example, moſt ſlaunderous.

The Emperour was verye forwarde to ſatisfie this vniuerſall inſtance and ſolicitacion of the partes and ſtates of Germanye, And helde it alſo not out of purpoſſe for his affayres to appeaſe in thoſe prouinces the cauſes of the tumultes and contumacye of the peoples: In which regardes he vrged the Pope by reducing to his memorye the conference they had together at Bolognia, to call a councell, promiſing him (leaſt he feared his authoritye and dignitye ſhoulde fall into daunger) to bee there in perſonne to take perticularly care of him: But for the Pope, albeit there was nothinge in the worlde that coulde bee offered more to his diſpleaſing or diſcontentement then the aſſemblye of a councell, yet, to nouriſhe the opinion that men had of his good intencion, he diſſembled that inclinacion or rather cauſe of feare: And yet in effecte he had many deepe and ſetled feares: one was, leaſt the councell, to moderate the abuſes of the Court and the indiſcreete permiſſions of many Popes, woulde not too much diminiſhe and reſtrayne the power of the ſea Apoſtolyke: an other was (which was no ſmall impreſſion in him) that albeit when he was called to bee Cardinall he had proued by witneſſes that he was borne in lawefull mariage, yet in truthe he knewe it was contrarye, And albeit there coulde bee founde no lawe written that forbadde any man (not lawefully borne) to aſcende to the Papacie, yet there was enterteyned amongeſt them an auncient and common opinion, that no man vppon whome coulde bee proued illegittimacion coulde bee capable of a Cardinalls place: Thirdely he reduced to remorſſe and conſcience, that he was rayſed to the ſea Apoſtolyke not without ſome ſuſpicion of ſymonie practiſed with the Cardinall Colonno: And laſtely he feared leaſt for the ſeuerities and rudenes whiche he had vſed towardes his naturall contrye, accompanyed with ſo manye tumultes and aduerſities of warre, he ſhoulde bee made perpetually infamous in the generall councell, the rather for that it had appeared vppon theffectes that he was moued not to reduce that citye to a good and moderate gouernment, but was induced with ambicion and enuye to put it eftſoones vnder the yoke and ſeruitude of his houſe: In regarde of theſe cauſes and feares, lyke as he abhorred the name of a councell, and coulde not accompt the fidelitie of the Emperour a ſufficient ſewertye to him: So, after he had communicated the whole matter with ſome Cardinalls deputed to the diſcuſſion of a cauſe of ſo greate

waight, who also stoode in feare to be corrected by the councell: he aunswered that there were many reasons against the calling of a councell in that time, both for that there was no assured stabilitie of peace amongest the Princes of Christendom, And also the feare was no lesse that the Prince of Turkes would recõtinue the warre, in which case it were not good that he found the regions of Christendom encombred with the disputacions and contencions of the councell: Neuertheless making show to referre the resolucion of it to thEmprour, he concluded that he was contented that he should promisse in the dyet, the induction of the councell with these obseruacions: That it might be celebrated in Italy: That a reasonable tyme were assigned for the calling of it: That it be assisted with the person and presence of thEmprour: And that the Lutherans and other heretikes promising to referr themselues to the determinacion of the councell, should in the meane while desist from the practise of their corrupcions, And rendring to the sea Apostolike their due obedience, they should returne to their former conuersation of Christian Catholikes: This article made more hard the whole practise and negociacion of the councell: for, the Lutherans were not onely not to desist from their opinions, and ceremonies before the celebracion of the councell: but also it was beleued that they had no inclinacion to the councell, where they could exspect no other matter then a reprobacion of their doctrine, the rather for that their principall opinions had bene many times refuted as hereticall, by the former councells: yea it was thought they insisted vppon the conuocacion of this councell, for that knowing it was a matter fearfull to Popes to stand in presence of a councell, they were of opinion that the court of Rome would not accorde to it, And so by that meane, they should support their cause with the nations of the world, with a greater authoritie.

With these actions and intencions determined the yeare a thowsand fiue hundred and thirty, and successiuely followed the yeare 1531. wherein was wrought no great matter of emocion and stirre: for, notwithstanding it was comprehended by many signes that the French king was not onely ill contented with the accords and contracts made with the Emprour, but also stoode very desirous to innouate things to new tumults, with whom the king of England bare the same inclinacion especially against thEmprour for that standing in defence of the cause of the sister of his mother, he impugned the matter of his diuorce: yet the French king beeing both impouerished of money, & litle leasure to respire from the trauells of so long warrs, he sawe the time was not yet apt to kindle matters of innouacion: Neuertheless he omitted not in the meane while to conspire aswell in Germany with such Princes as bare mindes estraunged from thEmprour, as in Italy with the Pope, to whome the better to assure his amitie, he made an ouerture of mariage betweene his seconde sonne and the Popes Neece: In which practises and conspiracies he suffered him selfe to be so much ouercaried with malice and reuenge, that to the great offence of God and perpetuall infamie to the crowne of Fraunce which alwayes made principall profession to defend Christian religion, and for those merits was honored with the title of Christianissimus: he enterteyned practises with the Prince of Turkes to stirre him vp against the Emprour: Towards whome the Turkes were ordinarily ill disposed, no lesse for a naturall hatred they bare to the name of Christians, then for the matter of controuersies they had with his brother tending to questions for the Realme of Hungrie with the Vayuode whome he had taken into his protection: The Turkes also began with much ielousie to suspect and enuye the greatnes of thEmprour.

By this time thImperiall Capteines leauied their forces from the territories of Sienna to leade them to Piemont: But before they departed, to satisfie the Pope, they reestablished within Sienna the famulie of Montonowo, repossessing them of their cõtry and goods & yet altered not the forme of the gouernment: And to assure them in their estate, they left them a garde of three hundred Spanyards depending vppon the Duke of Malfy, vnder whome, beeing not able to keepe his authoritie, thinges so reuerted forthwith to their olde disorders, that suche as had beene reestablished and restored, left for feare the thinge they could not holde by force. Moreouer the Emperour pronownced the forme of gouernment for Florence, dissembling that parte of the authoritie giuen to him, which lymited their libertie saued: for that according to the very instructions which the Pope had sent to him, he expressed that the citie shoulde be gouerned with the same Magistrate and in the same manner it was wont in the tymes when the Medicis ruled it: he declared also for chiefe of the gouernment Alexander the Popes Nephewe, and his sonne in lawe: And that in case of him and his yssue extinct, there shoulde succeede from hand to hande, the children, the descendants, and the next procreated of the same famulie: he restored to the citie all the priuileadges agreed vnto beforetymes by him and by his predecessors, but with this condicion annexed to be deposed from them as often as the citie shoulde attempt any thinge against the greatnes of the famulie of Medicis, inserting throw all the decree, wordes which showed that he tooke not his ground and inducement onely vppon the power that had beene giuen to him by the parties, but also vppon the authoritie and dignitie imperiall: In which manner of dealing where he happly satisfied the Pope more then was extended by the facultie giuen him by the writ of compromisse: he offended him as much immediatly after in a matter which was no lesse greeuous to him then the other was agreeable: for, after the Doctors especially assigned had heard and examined the controuersie betwene the Pope and Duke of Ferrara, before whome both the parties had produced many testimonies and inscripcions, with a long course of processe and pleading, he pronownced sentence according to their councell and relacion, that as Modena and Reggia apperteyned of right to the Duke of Ferrara, so the Pope in receiuing of him an hundred thowsand duckats, and reducing the tributes to the auncient manner, he should inuest him of new in the iurisdiction of Ferrara: Wherein the Emprour labored to insinuat into the Pope, that where contrary to his promisse made in Bolognia not to pronownce in case he founde his cause not to be iust, he had giuen sentence: That he was not to complaine against him, but rather to blame the Bishoppe of Vasona his Nuncio, to whome he alwayes gaue significacion that he woulde not pronownce sentence, for that he woulde not bee constrayned to passe iudgement against the Pope: But he perswading the contrarye and interpreting those significacions for a discharge of the promisse he had made to giue sentence if the right were in him, had pressed so muche the publicacion of the sentence that he was halfe constrayned to it for the regarde of his honour: An excuse whiche the Pope woulde sooner haue admitted, if the sentence and iudgement had not beene in the same sorte and manner, Wherein thEmprour had many tymes assayed to reduce the matter by accorde: But the poynte wherein the Pope was moste offended, was, that the Emperour in pronowncinge vppon the matters of Modena and Reggia, hadde followed a waye and taken a courrse of a Iudge moste rogorous, but in the action of Ferrara wherein the rigour was manifestelye for hym, he hadde donne the office of a friendelye Arbi-

Arbitrator and Compromittor: Therefore though he woulde neither ratifie the sentence pronownced, nor accept the payment of the money wherein the Duke was condemned, neither did he at the next feaste of Saint Peter accept the tribute which was publikely offred to him according to auncient custom: yet the Emprour forbare not for all that to consigne vnto the Duke of Ferrara Modena which he had deteyned in deputacion till that daye leauing them to decyde afterwards the differences betweene them: So that by reason of that dealing, there was not for many moneths betwene the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara, neither an open warre nor an assured peace, the Pope lying alwayes in watche, to oppresse him with conspiracies and surprise, or els to exspect the occasion to heape against him an open warre with the supportacion of greater Princes.

This yeare of 1531. brought forth no other accidents, and the tranquillitie also went on continuing for the yeare following, A yeare more daungerous for forreine warres, then for the emocions of Italy: for, the Turke beeing kindled with the ignominie of his repulse at Vienna, and no lesse vnderstanding howe thEmprour was intangled in Germany, prepared a right huge and great armye, wherein boasting insolently of his forces, he let not to publish that his intencion was to constraine thEmprour to come to battell with him: By the rumor and renowme of which preparacions, both the Emprour put him selfe in as good order as he could, reuoking into Germany the Marquis of Guast with his Spanish regiments and a great band of horsemen and footemen Italyans: And the Pope promised to contribute to him a defraiment of forty thowsand duckats for euery moneth, sending for the same expedicion as Legat Apostolike, his Nephew the Cardinall of Medicis: And lastly the Princes and free townes of Germany, prepared in fauor of thEmprour and for the common defense of Germany, A very huge and mighty army: But the effects aunswered nothing the renowme and the feare: for, Solyman who for the greatnes of his preparacions, and difficultie and distance of the way could not enter into Hungarie but verie late, did not drawe directlie with his armie where thEmperour was, but exhibiting onely a show of warre together with certeine bragging Caualcadoes and braueries of horsemen, he returned to Constantinople leauing the enterprise vnperfect for want of vallour which he had induced and managed with so mightie preparacions: Neither did thEmperour shew any greater deuocion or readines, seeing that when he vnderstood the Turkes drew neare, much lesse that he made out to meete them, seeing vppon their retyring he omitted to pursue with all his forces the faire occasion that was offered him to reconquer Hungarie for his brother: Onely yeelding to his importunate desire to go into Spaine, he gaue order that certeine bands of Spanish footemen & some regiments of Launceknightes should be conuerted to thenterprise of Hungarie: But that order was immediatlie disordered by the insolent behauiours of thItalians, who pushed on by certeine their Captaines disdaining that the authority and conduit of the enterprise was giuen to others and not to them, so mutined, That hauing no reason to alleage for their tumult and the presence of the Emperour who went thither to appeale them, being not sufficient to conteine them, They tooke resolutely and vniuersally their way into Italie, in which disorder they marched with great hast for feare to be followed, and in their way with minds malicious they burned many villages and houses in reuenge as they said of the burnings & wasting committed in many places in Italie by the Launceknights: ThEmperour also returned by the way of Italie, and where he had set downe in what order and by what places should passe his Court and all his trayne, The Cardinall Medi-

cis, caried with humors and passions of youth, would not obey the order generallie giuen to all the traine, but in his insolencie respecting lesse the Emperours order then his owne ambicious will, he aduaunced and gotte before together with Peter Maria Rossa vppon whom chiefly was layed the fault of that sedicion: This bred no litle indignacion in thEmperour, either for that he imputed the beginning and discourse of the matter to the Cardinall, or else he feared least the Cardinall standing ill contented that Alexander his cossin was preferred to the administracion of the state of Florence, would goe after the bandes of Italians to lead them to trouble the affaires of Tuskane: In which regard he caused to be apprehended by the way, the Cardinall and with him Peter Maria Rossa: But after he had better considered of thimportaunce of the matter, he wrote letters for the redeliuerie of the Cardinall to whome as well as to the Pope he protested many excuses: Onely Peter Maria remeyned prisoner, though not long after he was released, working greatlie for him with thEmperour, the iniurie which it seemed he had done to the Cardinall.

Enteruiew of the king of England and French king.

The retyring of the Turke deliuered the regions of Italie of a great warre that threatned to fall vpon them: for, where the Frenche king and king of England with mindes full of emulacion against thEmperour, had an enteruiewe and conference together betwene Calice and Bolleyne, where taking their groundes that the Turke would abide that winter in Hungarie and hold intangled the forces of thEmperour: They consulted that the French king vnder that oportunitie should inuade the Duchie of Millan, and hauing a disposicion to draw the Pope to their parte by violence and astonishment whom they could neuer allure by other meanes, they deuised to take from him the obedience of their kingdoms in case he would not cõsent to that which they desired of him, which was for the action of Millan for the French king, & for the king of England to giue sentence on his side in the cause of diuorce: And to relate their intencions, they were determined to sende to him with sharpe commissions, the Cardinalls of Tournon and Tarbes both which bare no small authoritie with the Frenche king: But the newes which they receiued of the retyring of the Turke before the time of their enteruiew was determined, did not onely well moderate those deuises and their seuerities, but were also the cause that the king of England would not suffer to passe to Calyce the Lady Anne Bulleine to celebrate mariage with her publikely in that assembly, Notwithstanding that both the cause was hanging in the Court of Rome, & also he was forbidden by writs Apostolike vnder paine of very great iudgements to innouate nothing to the preiudice of the first mariage: But so deepe did the French king dissemble that albeit to confirme the minde of the king of England that he would be against the Pope, he impose by his owne authoritie vppon the Clergie of his Realme a taxe of tenthes, & dispatched the two Cardinalls to the Pope, yet not obseruing the fidelitie of his word and promisse, he sent them furnished with commissions farre differing from the resolucion of the two kings in the beginning.

The Emprour being comen into Italy with a desire to speake with the Pope, the place of their meeting and enteruiewe was eftsoones assigned at Bolognia, A place which the Pope accepted willingly, the rather for that he would giue no occasion to thEmprour to goe to the Realme of Naples and by that occasion to make a longer aboad in Italy: A matter whereunto albeit thEmprour was induced by the reasons and perswasions of many of his Court, yet it was entierly contrary to his principall intencion who desired to make haste into Spaine chiefly for the desire he had to haue sonnes, his wife remeyning there: So that those two personages of that eſtate and greatnes mette at the ende of the yeare at Bologna, where were obſerued betweene them the ſame demonſtrations of amitie and the ſame offices of familiaritie whiche they vſed before, but there was no more the ſame correſpondencie of willes whiche had beene expreſſed vppon their negociations the other tyme: for themperour had a great deſire to aduaunce the Councell, the better to reduce to reſte and contentment the regions and peoples of Germanie: He offred to diſſolue the armie liuing at a great charge bothe to him and others, But to thende he might do it with more ſuretie, he inſiſted to haue renued the laſt league made at Bologna, both to comprehend in it all the Italians, and to taxe the quantities & rates of money which euery particular was to contribute, if the ſtates of Italy were inuaded by the French: He deſired alſo to haue Katherine the Popes Neece maryed to Frauncis Sforce, aſwel to preſſe the Pope by a greater neceſſitie to looke to the preſeruatiō of that ſtate, as alſo to breake the practiſe of parentage that was ſolicited with the french king: Of all theſe matters not one was acceptable to the Pope, ſeeing the confederation was a motion contrarie to the deſyre he had to ſtande a newter ſo much as he could betwene the Princes of Chriſtendome: Wherein both he doubted many daungers generally, and eſpecially he feared leaſt the Frenche kinge taking his example and inſtigation by the king of Englande, woulde depriue him of the obedience of his kingdome: Touching the conuocation of a Councell, it was no leſſe grieuous to hym then before for the auncient cauſes and impreſſions: And for parentage with the Duke of Millan, it pleaſed hym nothing at all, for that he interpreted it to a meane to take an open hatred with the Frenche kinge, with whoſe ſeconde ſonne he had a vehement deſyre to conioyne his Neece. Theſe matters were drawne into negociation and counſell, but principally was ſolicited the poynt of the confederation, In whiche action running many monethes, were deputed for themprour, Cnōuos, the great Commaunder of Leo, Granuelle, and Prato, his chiefe counſellors: And for the Pope were delegate the Cardinall Medicis, Iames Saluiatio, and Guicciardin: Who as they refuſed not to go through with the confederation, for that it was all one to vncouer the Popes intention, and to gyue themprour cauſe to conceyue iuſtely a greate ſuſpicion of him, So they made inſtance to haue the Venetians ſownded and to be drawne to conſente to it, alleaging that bothe without them the defence of Italie would be but weake, and that ioyntly with them ſhoulde be protected with more reputation the common affayres if the defence were continued vppon the renowme of the former confederation: Where, if there were reſolued an other without them, it would deliuer to the world an opinion that betwene themprour, the Pope, and Venetians were apparant matter of diſcord: In this regarde the Venetians were ſolicited to condiſcend to a new confederation for the vniuerſall defence of all the regions of Italy, for that by the firſt league their obligation extended no further then for the affayres of Millan and Naples: Themprour alſo wiſhed with great deſire that they might be bound to the defence of Genes, where it was thought that when the warre was on foote, the Frenche men would be apt to recontinue their former inuaſion, a matter which they might pretende to do lawfully by reaſon of their rightes and intereſts particular, without preiudicing the contractes of Madrill and Cambray. But the Senate of Venice refuſed abſolutelye to renewe the confederation, or to amplifye the obligations conteyned in the ſame, A matter whiche broughte no ſmall diſcontentment to themperour, thoughe they affirmed to obſerue inuiolably that coniunction: But themperour was ſo much the more importunate, and ſo refuted all reaſons that were alleaged to the contrarye, that the articles of the confederacion beganne to be commoned vppon: And for the more effectuall handling of thinges there were ſummoned all the Pottentats of Italy who ſent Embaſſadors to this negociacion: They were required to enter the league, and to contribute in caſe the warre went on, euery one according to his power and poſſibilitie, wherein they made no difficultie or reſiſtance, but labored ſeuerally to eaſe the demaunde of the contribucion: Onely Alfonſo d'Eſte reaſoned with them that it was not reaſonable he ſhould enter into a league to defend the ſtates of others, if firſt he were not aſſured of his owne: he alleaged there could no accorde be made to warrant him againſt the Pope, nor to enter league with him: neither could he promiſſe to contribute with his treaſor to the defenſe of Myllan and Genes, if neceſſitie compelled him to exſpend it continually to keepe bands of ſouldiours within Modena and Reggia, and alſo for the ſewertie of Ferrara: Vppon which reaſons was deriued a new practiſe and labor to accord him with the Pope: who bearing a mind farre eſtraunged from that mocion, and yet not willing to oppoſe him ſelfe ſo apparantly againſt the inſtance of thEmprour, he proponed condicions very hard and impoſſible to be obſerued, affirming that if he ſhould leaue Modena and Reggia to Alphonſo who otherwayes would not come to accord, he would that Alfonſo ſhould reacknowledge & hold them in chief of the ſea Apoſtolike: A matter which for that it could not be done in ſuch ſort as to be iudicially auaileable without the conſent of the electors and Princes of thEmpire, reduced the Emprour to a difficultie which had no yſſue: This brought the Emprour to entreat the Pope, that at the leaſt during the league, he would be boũd not to vexe the ſtate which Alfonſo held, Inſomuch as after many importunities and diſputings the Pope conſented to aſſure him for xviij. monethes: And ſo at laſt was reſolued the concluſion of the league paſſed and contracted vppon S. Mathievves day, A day alwayes happy to thEmprour: This league and confederacion conteyned an obligacion of thEmprour, the king of Romaines, and all the other Pottentats of Italy except the Venetians, for the defenſe of Italy: Onely the Florentyns were not otherwayes named then in the ſame manner they were expreſſed in the league of Conguac, and that to thend not to trouble their entercourſſe and trades in the Realme of Fraunce: it was ſet downe with what proporcion of ſouldiours euery one ſhould be concurrant, and with what quantities of money to contribute for euery moneth: ThEmprours rate was xxx. thowſand duckats, The Pope for him and the Florentyns was taxed at twenty thowſand, The Duke of Myllan at fifteene thowſand, The Duke of Ferrara at ten thowſand, the Genovvaies at ſix thowſand, the ſtate of Sienna at ten thowſand, and the citie of Lucquay at a thowſand: And to thend to be found prepared againſt all ſuddeine & vnlooked for inuaſions vntill defenſe might be made with the contribucions afforenamed, it was agreed that immediatly ſhould be leauied a loane of a ſumme of money almoſt equall to the taxacions, and that not to be exſpended onleſſe the preparacions to inuade Italy were manifeſtly diſcerned: There was alſo ſet downe a ſmall contribucion yearely for thinterteinment of thoſe Capteines that remeyned in Italy, and to defraye certeine penſions to the Svvyzzers to ſtoppe that nation for giuing ayde of men to the French king: Ouer this league was declared Capteine generall by common conſent, Antho. de Leua, with ordenaunce that he ſhould remeine in the Duchie of Myllan. Touching the generall councell there was nothing cõcluded to the liking of thEmprour, who ſtil ſolicited the Pope to ſend out preſent ſummonce for it: But he refuſed to accompliſhe the mocion alleaging that as in that ill diſpoſicion of the time and mens mindes, there would be daunger

daunger leſt the kings of England and Fraunce would not appeare, So if the councell were celebrated without them much leſſe that there could be introduced either vnion or reformacion of the Church, ſeeing it was to be feared leſt things would diuolue to a manifeſt ſciſme: Onely he was content to ſend out Nuncioes to all Princes to induce them to ſo holly a worke: But albeit thEmprour made a queſtion to him what would be the yſſue of thinges if thoſe two Princes did diſſent from them without iuſt cauſe, and preſſed him in that caſe to intimat the councel, yet he could neuer diſpoſe him to it, So that his Nuncioes were aſſigned and ſent out with a very ſlender hope to bring backe any good concluſion. ThEmprour was no better ſatisfied touching the negociacion of the parentage, for that when the two Cardinalls which the French king had ſent were comen to Bolognia and had eftſoones recontinued the negociacion of the mariage with the ſecond ſonne of Fraunce, The Pope gaue aunſwer to the offer made for the Duke of Myllan and exhibited by the Emprour: That whereas the Frenche king had long time before made an ouerture of mariage for his ſonne, & he had harkned to the mocion by the conſent of thEmprour declaring at that time his good conſent and liking, he ſhould nowe doe too greate a wronge to the Frenche king if during the negociacion he ſhould giue his Neece in mariage to one of his ennemies: But he perſwaded him that that practiſe was artificially introduced by the French king to enterteine him, and not with intencion to conclude it, ſeing there was betweene the parties ſo great diſagreement and inequalitie of degree and condicion: Laſtly he aſſured him that he would not commit ſo great an offence to the king, if he ſawe not before, the practiſe and ſolicitacion altogether broken: And the Emprour for his parte beeing not to be perſwaded that the French king would adioyne his ſonne to a matche ſo farre vnequall to him, encouraged and aduiſed the Pope, that for the better vncouering of the kings diſſimulacions, he would preſſe the Cardinals to ſend for a procuracion to contract them, which accordingly was accompliſhed in fewe dayes and exhibited in very ample forme: By which readines and reſolute meaning not onely was loſt all hope of affinitie with Frauncis Sforce, but alſo the ſolicitacion with the French king was purſued with ſo muche the more importunitie, and to it was further added according to the deuiſe betweene them longe before, that the Pope and the Frenche kinge ſhoulde contracte together at Nyce, A citye of the Duke of Sauoye ſtanding vppon the ryuer of Var and ſeparateth Italye from Prouence. Theſe matters were not a litle diſcontenting to thEmprour, aſwell for a ſuſpicion he had that betwene the Pope and French king were concluded a greater coniunction to his preiudice, as alſo for that he was ielous that in the Pope remeyned not ſome ſecrete memorie and impreſſions of his impriſonment, of the ſacke of Rome, of the mutacion of Florence, and of other wronges: To theſe he adioyned the paſſion of diſdayne wherein he iudged that the honor which the Pope had done to him in making two iorneyes to Bolognia to ſpeake with him, woulde ſtande derided and diminiſhed if he ſhoulde make a voyage by ſea ſo farre as Nyce to meete with the French king. But in vaine were theſe ſuſpicions and the cauſes of them, though he could not diſſemble them, for that in the Popes mind was vehemently noriſhed and affected the deſire of that affinitie, beeing happly moued more with ambicion and appetit of glorye in that beeing of a houſe almoſte ſimple and priuate he had obteyned in recompenſe of a baſtarde Nephewe of his, A baſtard Daughter of ſo mightye an Emperour, and nowe in exchaunge of his Neece legyttimate, he had honored his howſe with the ſeconde ſonne of Fraunce lawefully borne and orderly aſſured: Then that he was induced which many councelled him, that by the meane of that parentage he might giue cooller of right (though more apparant then true) to the Frenche king, to enter for his ſonne and for his Daughter in law vppon the eſtate of Florence: To theſe diſcontentments of thEmprour, may be added alſo as a full accompliſhment of his diſliking, That where he made inſtance to the Pope to create three Cardinalls exhibited by him, he obteyned onely and that with difficultie the calling of th Archbiſhop of Bary, the Pope making his excuſes vppon the contradiction of the Colleage of Cardinalls: The Emprour ſtoode litle appeaſed in the readines which the Pope ſhowed to make a ſecret confederacion with him, wherein he promiſed to proceede iudicially to pronownce iudgements and cenſures and all other things that might be done by right againſt the king of England and againſt the Lady Anne Bolleyne: And they were bownd to make no new confederacions or accords with Princes without reciprocall conſent one of an other.

Thus thEmprour departed from Bolognia the daye after the concluſion of the confederacion, being now no leſſe aſſured in him ſelfe that the ſayd mariage would goe on together with thenteruiew betweene the Pope and the French king, Then he had reaſon to doubt ſome greater coniunction: And beeing embarked at Genes he paſſed into Spaine with this reſolute intencion that if the mariage of Katherine de Medicis were celebrated with the ſeconde ſonne of Fraunce, he woulde diſſolue and breake the matche made betwene his Daughter and Alexander de Medicis: Not many dayes after the Pope departed to goe to Rome beeing accompanied with the two French Cardinalls and nothing troubled with the newe confederacion: for that as he was excellent in ſimulacions and practiſes in which he was not ſurmounted with feare, ſo he had told them that vppon concluding the league the ſpaniſh armie was to diſſolue & decaſſe, A matter which would turne more to the benefit of the french king, then the league or confederacion could doe him hurt, ſeeing that aſwell for the obligacions it conteyned as for the obſeruancie and execucions of the ſame, many difficulties might happen and ſundry impediments ariſe.

Thus the ſolicitacions and practiſes begon, were continued betwene them: And as the French king was deſirous in regard of his honor and for ambicion more then for other needefull matter, that the perſon of the Pope might come to Nyce, ſo to allure him the more, he promiſed not to require of him any confederacion, nor to incenſe him to warre, and much leſſe to drawe him from tearmes of iuſtice in the cauſe of the king of England, nor to importune him to create newe Cardinalls: Neuertheleſſe he was ſomewhat puſhed on by the incitacion of the king of England who had now ſolemnly maried the Ladye Anne Bolleyne, by whome hauing by due order of time procreated a Daughter he had, to the preiudice of the Daughter of his firſt wife, declared her Princeſſe of the Realme of England, A title which is transferred to ſuche as are moſte neareſt the Crowne: By reaſon of which action the Pope not hable to diſſemble ſo great a contempt againſt the ſea Apoſtolike, nor refuſe to graunt iuſtice to thEmprour, had with the vowes and iuſtificacions of the Conſiſtorie publiſhed that king guiltie of the cryme of contempt: A matter which moued the king of England to deſire with more importunitie both the parentage and enteruiewe of the Pope with the French kinge, hoping muche in that kinge to remedye his cauſe, and that if the Pope were induced to common vppon new matters againſt thEmprour, he woulde deſire to reſtore him and to drawe him to their coniunction, and ſo almoſte to conſtitute a triumuirate to giue lawes to the thinges of Italy: At laſte his going was concluded but not to Nyce, for some difficultie interposed by the Duke of Sauoy touching the consigning of the Castel to the Pope, hauing in likelyhood no inclination to displease the Emperour: But the place was chaunged to Marseilles greatly to the pleasing and appetite of the French king, who interpreted it not a little to his honour to reduce the enteruiew into his kingdome, Neyther was it discontenting to the Pope, as one that desired to satisfie him more with demonstrations to please his ambition, then with effects according to true meaning. The Pope caused to be published a brute that he went to this enteruiew principally to solicite an vniuersall peace: secondly to perswade an enterprise agaynst the Infidells: thirdly to reduce and call backe to good wayes the king of Englande: and lastely and onely for common and generall interests, and to establish some good fourme in the vniuersall affayres: But beeing in deede not hable to dissemble the true cause of his iourney, before he departed he sent his Neece to Nice vpon the gallies which the French king sent to him, accompanied with the duke of Albania vncle to the young Lady: Which gallies after they had deliuered the Lady to Nice returned to the port Pisan, and tooke in the fourth of October the person of the Pope with a trayne of many Cardinalls, whom with a happy nauigation they brought in few dayes to Marseilles: There he made his solemne entry, and after him entred the French king, who had visited him before by night: They were lodged in one Pallace, and exercised reciprocally one vpon an other right great offices and demonstrations of amitie, And the king who especially laboured to insinuate into his fauour and to winne him, besought him to sende for his Neece to come to Marseilles, which beeing perfourmed with a willing readines in the Pope, who forbare to preuent the king in that motion to shewe that he would first debate of the common affayres, so soone as the Lady was come the contractes wente on which were immediatly confirmed and made perfect by the consommation of the mariage, to the incredible gladnes of the Pope: Who albeit with such art solicited his affayres with the king, that the king reappposed a wonderfull confidence in his wordes, and honored him with a singular affection: yet both contrary to thopinion of all men and especially agaynst thexspectation of themprour, no article or capitulation was passed betweene them: Onely the Pope shewed him selfe alwayes well inclined and desirous that the state of Millan might be conuerted to the Duke of Orleance husbande to his Neece: A matter also vehemently thirsted after by the king for a hatred & despite he bare to the Emprour and his greatnes & fortunes, But much more for that the duke of Orleance hauing to his share an estate of that apparance & greatnes, he thought that therby would be quenched the occasiõs of contentions betwene his children after his death, which otherwise he feared might fall amongest them for the title of the Duchie of Britaine: An estate which the king in the yere before contrarie to the couenauntes made by king Levvis with those people, had annexed and vnited to the Crowne of Fraunce, wherevnto he induced the subiects of that state to consent more by his kingly authoritie then of their proper inclination and will. Moreouer in this enteruiew muche lesse that the king coulde obteyne any fauour of the Pope in the cause of the king of Englande, seeing beeing discontented with the inciuilities of the Agentes of that king whom he founde in the Popes chamber protesting and appealing from him to the Councell, he tolde the Pope that it should nothing offende him if he pursued that king and his cause according to the rule of iustice: yea he was so moderate in his demaundes and dealings, that in nothing did he offende the minde of the Pope, sauing that more to satisfie others of his Court and counsell then to content himselfe, he solicited him to create three Cardinalls: A matter not a little discontenting to the Pope, not so muche for thinstance whiche themperours Embassadour made to the contrarie, as for that he interpreted it to an action of great consequence both for thelection of other Popes hereafter, and for the disobediences whiche might happen in hys lyfe and after, to adde so many Cardinalls to the French nation beeing at that time fixe in number: Neuertheless to preuent a greater euill with satisfying the lesser, he accomplished the kings demaunde, making to be concurrante in the action of that creation, a brother of the Duke of Albanie to whome he had before promised the Cardinalls Cappe: In all other regardes they seemed to stande firme and assured in all sortes of fidelitie and satisfaction, and in that good estate of inclination and amitie the Frenche king was not curious to communicate with him many of his counsells, and especially his determination to stirre vp agaynst themprour certayne Princes of Germany, and chiefly the Lantgraue van Hesse and the Duke of VVittemberg, who the sommer following drewe into commotion: And so wyth these actions and demonstrations of amitie and office, after they had passed a moneth at Marseilles, the Pope returned vppon the same Gallies that brought hym: But beeing with great stormes and tempestes of sea aryued at Sauona, where reaposing no more confidence neyther in the prouisions of the gallies, nor in the industrie and experience of those that gouerned them, he sente backe agayne the same gallies that had deliuered him out of his first perilles, and tooke his course to Ciuitavecchia in the gallies of Andre Dore, from whence beeing returned to Rome with a right great reputation and wonderfull felicitie, especially to suche as had seene him prisoner in the Castell of Saint Angeo, he reioysed as it were at his wyll in the full fauour of fortune, feeling notwithstanding in the secrete apprehensions of his spirite and minde the chaunge that was speedily to happen to him, In which impression he seemed to foresee and discerne his laste ende: for it is certayne that almoste assoone as he was returned from his voyage to Marseilles, from whence he seemed to bring certayne predictions and comettes of his death, he caused to make the Ring with all other habites accustomed to bury Popes, assuring his familiars with a mind wel reposed & resolute, that his lateste dayes could not be deferred for any long time. Neuertheles nothing retyring for all those impressions, from his cares & studies accustomed, he solicited as he thought for the greater suretie of his house, to buyld a very strong Citadell within Florence, not knowing how soone was to ende the felicity of his Nephews: of whō being mortal enemies one to an other, Hippolito the Cardinall dyed before the ende of the yere of the Popes death, not without suspicion of poyson, And Alexander the other Nephew who commanded at Florence was (not without a great note of indiscression) secretly slayne by night in Florence by the handes of Lavvrence one of the same famulie of Medicis.

The Pope sickned about the beginning of sommer, whose griefe in the first apprehension was the paines of the stomack, which drawing with them to passions of a feuer & other accidents, kept him long time vexed & tormented, somtimes seming to be reduced to the poynt of death, and sometimes so eased and releeued, that he gaue to others but not to himselfe a kinde of hope of recouering. And during the time of his maladie the Duke of VVittemberg by the ayde of the Lantgraue van Hesse and other Princes, concurring also the money of Fraunce, recouered the Duchie of VVittemberg which the king of Romains possessed: By which occasion fearing a greater combustion they came to composition with the king of Romains agaynst the will of the French king, who well hoped that themprour in regarde of those emotions motions would ſtande intangled with a long and tedious warre, and that happlye their armies being victorious would diſcende vpon the duchie of Millan. In lyke ſort about that time Barbarouſſo Baſcha & capteine generall to Solyman of all his Nauies and armies by ſea, paſſed to the conqueſt of the kingdome of Thunis: In his way thither he skowred along the ſhores of Calabria, and ranne vp aboue Caietta, where ſetting on lande certayne bandes of his ſouldiours, he ſacked Fondy, with ſuch a feare and aſtoniſhment to the Court and peoples of Rome, that it was ſuppoſed that the Citie of Rome had bene left abandoned if in that courſe of victorie they had paſſed on further: This accident was kept from the knowledge of the Pope, who being no longer hable to make reſiſtance agaynſt his maladie, exchaunged this life for a better the xxv. of September, leauing behinde him in the Caſtell of Saint Angeo many ryche ſtones and iewels, more then was exſpected of him, and in the Chamber of the ſea Apoſtolike infinite offices, contrary to cuſtome and good order, but in the treaſorie a very ſmall ſtore of money, wherein he beguyled the opinion of all men: He was rayſed from baſe degree to the place of the Popedome with a wonderfull felicitie, but in managing the place he proued a verye great variation of fortune, wherin if both the properties of fortune be euenly balanced the one with the other, the worſer fortune without all compariſon was farre more familiar with him then the better: For as there could happen to him no greater infelicitie then the aduerſitie of his impriſonment, for that with his owne eyes he behelde with ſo greate a ruine and deſtruction, the ſacke of Rome, A deſolation whiche his fortune ſuffred him to bewayle with pitie and compaſſion, but not to turne away or remedie the harme: So alſo by him moued the generall deſolation of his naturall countrey, to the which by howe muche more he was bounde by perpetuall obligations, by ſo muche greater was his aduerſitie to be a chiefe inſtrument in the ruine of the place where he had taken his firſt beeing: He dyed hated of all the Court, ſuſpected to moſt Princes, and for the diſcourſe of his lyfe, he left behind him a renowme rather hatefull then acceptable: for he was accounted couetous, of litle fidelitie, and naturally farre of from doing pleaſures to men: And in that humor albeit during hys tyme of Pope he created xxxj. Cardinalls, yet vppon none of them did he impoſe that dignitie to content himſelfe, but was drawne as it were by the violent lawe of neceſſitie and to pleaſe others: yea he called to that dignitie the Cardinall of Medicis, not of his proper and free election, but at the contemplation and perſwaſion of others, and at a tyme when beeing oppreſſed with a daungerous maladie, yf he had dyed, he had lefte his friends and kinred in the ſtate of beggers and depriued of all ayde: Neuertheleſſe he was in counſel very graue, and in his actions much foreſeeing: Touching paſſions and affections a conqueror of himſelfe, and for the facultie of his minde and ſpirite of great capacitie and power, if tymerouſnes had not oftentimes corrupted his iudgement. Immediatly after his death the Cardinalls going the ſame night into the Conclaue, elected in his place with full voyce, Alexander of the famulie of Farneſa, a Romayne by Nation, and for his time the moſt auncient Cardinall of the Court: In which election their voyces ſeemed conformable to the iudgement and inſtance that Clement had made, the perſon elected being moſte worthy to be preferred before all the others to ſo ſoueraigne a degree, for that he was both furniſhed with doctrine and good learning, and fully repleniſhed with good apparantes and cuſtomes: And for the Cardinalles they were ſo muche the more forwarde to paſſe the election in his perſon, by howe much for the greatnes of his age beeing already vpon the threeſcore and ſeuenth yeare, and ſup-poſed to beare a weake and vnſounde complexion (which opinion he nouriſhed with arte) they hoped he would not ſitte long in the ſeate. But touching his actions and operations whether they aunſwered thexſpectation conceiued of him, or whether they were worthy of the incredible gladnes which the people of Rome tooke to haue after the end of an hundred and three yeres, and after the ſucceſſion of thirteene Popes, a Pope of blood and nation a Romaine, and of language and education of one familiaritie with themſelues: it ſtandeth in the teſtimonie and relation of thoſe who are to write of the accidents hapning in Italy ſince his election: So is to be verified the ſentence of the prouerbe, that The office ſetteth out the dignitie of the perſon that manageth it.
